UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT CASES (INCLUDING LOSSES)

Thornell v. Jones, 602 U.S. 154, 144 S. Ct. 1302 (2024). In this capital case from Arizona, the Supreme Court reversed, by a vote of 6 to 3, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals’ opinion granting habeas relief on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing. Petitioner was sentenced to death for three murders. The trial court found three aggravating circumstances applied to two of the murders: multiple homicides, murder for pecuniary gain, and the murders were especially heinous, cruel or depraved. An additional aggravating factor, murder of a young child, applied to the third murder as well. The trial court concluded that the mitigating circumstances were not sufficiently substantial to outweigh the aggravating circumstances, and sentenced petitioner to death. In state postconviction, petitioner argued that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to present a variety of mitigating evidence. After petitioner’s request for postconviction relief was denied, he sought federal habeas relief, which a Ninth Circuit panel granted. The Supreme Court majority reversed, finding that the Ninth Circuit departed from Strickland’s prejudice inquiry in at least three ways: (1) “it failed adequately to take into account the weighty aggravating circumstances in this case”; (2) it applied a “clearly unsound” rule prohibiting a court considering a Strickland claim from “assessing the relative strength of expert witness testimony,” e.g., comparing defense expert testimony with a contrary opinion of a prosecution expert to determine what weight to give the defense expert; and, (3) it erroneously found that the district court erred by “attaching diminished persuasive value” to petitioner’s mitigating evidence because there was no link between that evidence and petitioner’s crime. 144 S.Ct. at 1310-1311. This last mistake by the Ninth Circuit was based on a misinterpretation of Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982). The majority clarified that while Eddings held that a sentencer may not “refuse to consider . . . any relevant mitigating evidence,” it did not hold that a sentencer cannot find mitigating evidence unpersuasive. Id. at 1311. Turning to its own Strickland prejudice analysis, the majority held that petitioner was not entitled to habeas relief:

[m]ost of the mitigating evidence [petitioner] presented at the federal evidentiary hearing was not new, and what was new would not carry much weight in Arizona courts. Conversely, the aggravating factors present here are extremely weighty. As a result, there is no reasonable probability that the evidence on which [petitioner] relies would have altered the outcome at sentencing.

Id. Justices Sotomayor, Kagan and Jackson dissented.

Shinn v. Martinez Ramirez, 596 U.S. 366, 142 S.Ct. 1718 (2022). The equitable rule announced in Martinez v. Ryan providing that ineffective assistance of post-conviction counsel can provide “cause” to forgive the procedural default of a claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel does not permit a federal court to dispense with 28 U.S.C. § 2254(e)(2)’s narrow limits on federal evidentiary hearings even where a prisoner’s state post-conviction counsel was at fault for failing to develop the state-court record on the ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim.

Dunn v. Reeves, 594 U.S. 731, 141 S.Ct. 2405 (2021) (per curiam) (1998 trial and sentencing). Reversing grant of habeas relief by Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Alabama death penalty case on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and present evidence of petitioner’s intellectual disability as mitigating evidence. The Alabama court did not violate clearly established federal law when it rejected petitioner's contention that his attorneys were ineffective in failing to hire a neuropsychological expert they had successfully obtained funding to retain. Petitioner did not call trial counsel as witnesses at the state post-conviction hearing to explain this omission. The Eleventh Circuit mischaracterized the state court decision when it held that the state court, in denying relief, had adopted a per se rule that the absence of testimony by trial counsel would always preclude a finding of deficient performance. Rather, the actual analysis of the claim by the state court indicated a case-specific approach and the record supported a number of theories for why counsel proceeded as they did. "[T]he Alabama court's treatment of the spotty record in this case was consistent with this Court's recognition that 'the absence of evidence cannot overcome the strong presumption that counsel's conduct fell within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance.'" (Citations and internal quotation marks and brackets omitted).

Mays v. Hines, 592 U.S. 385, 141 S.Ct. 1145 (2021) (per curiam) (1985 offense and 1989 resentencing). In Tennessee death penalty case, reversing the grant of habeas relief by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals on claim that trial counsel had been ineffective at the guilt and sentencing phases of the trial by failing to suggest that the man who discovered the victim's body was the actual killer. The victim worked at a motel where petitioner had rented a room. Her body was found stabbed to death by a regular patron of the motel. In state post-conviction proceedings, the patron's account for his presence at the motel was shown to have been false. While he claimed at trial to have simply stopped by to visit the motel owners and fortuitously found the victim when he entered a room to use the bathroom, in fact he was there for a regular tryst with a woman who was not his wife. Although defense counsel was aware of the affair at the time of trial, defense counsel decided to forgo eliciting the embarrassing information. In granting relief, the Sixth Circuit failed to "carefully consider all the reasons and evidence supporting the state court's decision" that petitioner had failed to establish prejudice. Instead of evaluating the substantial evidence linking petitioner to the crime, e.g., his "flight [from the motel] in a bloodstained shirt, his theft of the [victim's] vehicle and money, and his ever-changing stories about stabbing and robbing various people on the day of the crime," the court of appeals focused on all the reasons why it thought the third party "could have" been a viable alternative suspect. "This approach plainly violated Congress' prohibition on disturbing state-court judgments on federal habeas review absent an error that lies 'beyond any possibility for fairminded disagreement.'" (Citations omitted.)

Shinn v. Kayer, 592 U.S. 111, 141 S.Ct. 517 (2020) (per curiam) (1997 trial and sentencing). In Arizona death penalty case, summarily reversing the grant of habeas relief by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals on claim is ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals violated AEDPA jurisprudence in ruling that the state court unreasonably applied Strickland v. Washington when the state court held that Kayer had failed to establish prejudice from trial counsel's alleged deficient performance. The federal appeals court arrived at its conclusions about the significance of the mitigating evidence trial counsel had failed to develop and present "without ever framing the relevant question as whether a fairminded jurist could reach a different conclusion." Because the state post-conviction court did not articulate its specific reasons for finding that Kayer failed to establish prejudice, the Supreme Court looked to what theories or arguments could have supported the state court's conclusion. Perhaps the most probable was that the state post-conviction court simply found "that the new mitigation evidence offered in the postconviction proceeding did not create a substantial likelihood of a different sentencing outcome.” In finding to the contrary, the Ninth Circuit impermissibly substituted its own judgment as to the relative weight of the aggravating and mitigating evidence instead of asking “whether a fairminded jurist could take a different view.” Unlike the Ninth Circuit, a fairminded jurist could have given substantial weight to Kayer’s prior conviction for burglary given that it involved a handgun and the capital crime was committed by a firearm. And a fairminded jurist could also have taken a different view of the mitigating evidence than did the Ninth Circuit. While the Ninth Circuit found that evidence of Kayer’s bipolar disorder and untreated alcohol and gambling addictions supported the finding of the statutory mitigating circumstance of mental impairment, “reasonable jurists could debate the extent to which these factors significantly impaired [Kayer’s] ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the law at the time of the murder” given that the record reveals that Kayer had extensive opportunities to consider his actions—planning the murder in advance, driving his victim to a remote area, and subsequently returning to the murder scene and shooting the victim in the head a second time. Moreover, Kayer’s planning of the murder, efforts to hide the body, interactions with [the victim] before and after the murder, and attempts to profit from his crimes using an alias display a measure of control and intentionality.

The Ninth Circuit had relied on Arizona Supreme Court direct appeal decisions in its prejudice analysis, concluding that they established a reasonable probability that the state supreme court would have reversed Kayer’s death sentence on direct appeal had trial counsel developed the mitigating evidence that was presented in the post-conviction proceeding. But “because the facts in each capital sentencing case are unique, the weighing of aggravating and mitigating evidence in a prior published decision is unlikely to provide clear guidance about how a state court would weigh the evidence in a later case.” And the Arizona Supreme Court decision focused on by both the Ninth Circuit and Kayer had distinguishable aggravating and mitigating circumstances, thus falling “far short of placing the state court’s prejudice determination in this case beyond the realm of fairminded disagreement.”

*Andrus v. Texas, 590 U.S. 806, 140 S.Ct. 1875 (2020) (per curiam) (2012 trial and sentencing). In Texas death penalty case stemming from a double murder occurring during a botched carjacking, the Supreme Court reversed the unexplained denial of relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing and remanded for consideration of prejudice in light of this opinion. Trial counsel was constitutionally deficient by: (1) “perform[ing] almost no mitigation investigation, overlooking vast tranches of mitigating evidence”; (2) presenting evidence that, “due to counsel’s failure to investigate compelling mitigating evidence, . . . backfired by bolstering the State’s aggravation case” and (3) “fail[ing] adequately to investigate the State’s aggravating evidence, thereby forgoing critical opportunities to rebut the case in aggravation.” Trial counsel, by his own admission, was barely acquainted with the few mitigation witnesses he did call at the sentencing phase: petitioner’s mother, his biological father, a drug expert, and a prison counselor. Additionally, trial counsel “acknowledged that he did not look into or present the myriad tragic circumstances that marked [petitioner’s] life.” As shown by expert testimony presented in the state habeas proceedings, petitioner’s background of “very pronounced trauma” resulted in “posttraumatic stress disorder symptoms from, among other things, ‘severe neglect’ and exposure to domestic violence, substance abuse, and death in his childhood.” Trial counsel also ignored avenues of mitigation of which he was aware. Although at trial, trial counsel had “averred that his review did not reveal that [petitioner] had any mental-health issues, in fact there were “materials prepared by a mitigation expert well before trial” that “pointed out that [petitioner] had been ‘diagnosed with affective psychosis,’ a mental-health condition marked by symptoms such as depression, mood lability, and emotional dysregulation.” In addition, “a clinical psychologist briefly retained to examine a limited sample of [petitioner’s] files had informed [trial counsel] that [petitioner] may have schizophrenia.” Such known evidence would have led a reasonable attorney to investigate further. “Yet counsel disregarded, rather than explored, the multiple red flags.” The record showed that trial counsel’s failure to investigate resulted from inattention rather than strategy. The result of the deficient investigation was the presentation of evidence that actually aided the State’s case in aggravation. For example, petitioner’s mother “sketched a portrait of a tranquil upbringing,” during which petitioner got himself into trouble and involved with drugs despite his family’s best efforts. Trial counsel was ignorant of the falseness of such testimony and had failed to heed the warning of the mitigation specialist that petitioner’s mother appeared to be motivated by self-interest. And the uninformed decision to call petitioner’s mother ultimately undermined petitioner’s own testimony, which recounted, inter alia, his mother’s sale of drugs during petitioner’s childhood. Counsel even highlighted the discrepancy between petitioner’s testimony and that of his mother, which could have been interpreted by the jury as an insinuation that petitioner was the one who was lying. Finally, trial counsel failed to investigate and present evidence to rebut the State’s case in aggravation. In order to establish the future danger to society aggravator, the State emphasized evidence of aggressive behavior by petitioner both while incarceration as a juvenile and awaiting trial. But had counsel “genuinely” investigated petitioner’s experiences in juvenile custody, “counsel would have learned that [petitioner’s] behavioral problems there were notably mild, and the harms he sustained severe.” Alternatively, “with sufficient understanding of the violent environments [petitioner] inhabited his entire life, counsel could have provided a counternarrative of [petitioner’s] later episodes in prison.” Instead, “counsel left all of that aggravating evidence untouched at trial— even going so far as to inform the jury that the evidence made it ‘probabl[e]’ that [petitioner] was ‘a violent kind of guy.’” The State’s case in aggravation also highlighted petitioner’s alleged commission of a knifepoint robbery at a dry-cleaning business. Despite petitioner’s assertions of innocence, trial counsel failed to investigate the incident. Had counsel done so, “counsel would have discovered that the only evidence originally tying [petitioner] to the incident was a lone witness statement, later recanted by the witness, that led to the inclusion of [petitioner’s] photograph in a belated photo array, which the police admitted gave rise to numerous reliability concerns.” (Footnote omitted.) Failing to cast doubt on the aggravating evidence was “hardly the work of reasonable counsel.” Assuming that the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals found no deficient performance, such a conclusion was erroneous as a matter of law. (The rejection of the claim was without analysis.) As for the prejudice prong of the Strickland test, it was unclear from the record whether the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals considered this prong in ruling that petitioner was not entitled to relief. Although the concurring opinion by the state appellate court discussed prejudice in some detail, that analysis did not receive majority approval. Additionally, in that analysis, the state court concurrence “seemed to assume that the prejudice inquiry here turns principally on how the facts of this case compare to the facts in Wiggins.” The Supreme Court, however, has “never before equated what was sufficient in Wiggins with what is necessary to establish prejudice.” In light of the “uncertainty as to whether the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals adequately conducted that weighty and record-intensive analysis in the first instance,” the case was remanded for the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals to address Strickland prejudice.

Capital Cases*

Garza v. Idaho*, 586 U.S. 232, 139 S.Ct. 738 (2019). Trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to file a notice of appeal as requested by his client even though defendant’s plea agreement contained an appeal waiver. The presumption of prejudice recognized in Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470 (2000), applied despite the waiver of appeal.

Sexton v. Beaudreaux*, 585 U.S. 961, 138 S.Ct. 2555 (2018) (per curiam). In murder and attempted robbery case, grant of habeas relief by Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is reversed. The petitioner had alleged that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek suppression of certain eyewitness identification testimony. The state habeas court had summarily denied the claim. Looking to the state court record, there was “at least one theory that could have led a fairminded jurist to conclude that the suppression motion would have failed.” It would have been reasonable to conclude that the petitioner failed to prove that the identification was not reliable under the totality of the circumstances. In analyzing the claim, the Ninth Circuit erred by essentially inverting the Richter rule. Instead of asking whether there were arguments or theories that could have supported the state court’s ruling the Ninth Circuit considered arguments against the state court’s decision that had not even been raised in the state habeas petition. Further, the Ninth Circuit failed to apply appropriate deference to the state court decision. “The Ninth Circuit essentially evaluated the merits de novo, only tacking on a perfunctory statement at the end of its analysis asserting that the state court’s decision was unreasonable.” Yet this was an instance where deference to the state court should have been “near its apex” given that general rules were at issue as to both the propriety of the identification and the effectiveness of trial counsel.

McCoy v. Louisiana, 584 U.S. 414, 138 S. Ct. 1500 (2018). Although this is a case under the Sixth Amendment, it is not about counsel’s effectiveness, but rather about a defendant’s “[a]utonomy to decide that the objective of the defense is to assert innocence,” regardless of how reasonable an alternative strategy determined by counsel may be. 138 S. Ct. at 1508. Petitioner was arrested, tried, and convicted of the murders of his estranged wife’s mother, stepfather, and son. Throughout the proceedings, he “insistently maintained” that he was out of state at the time of the killings and that corrupt police killed the victims during a botched drug deal. Nevertheless, at trial, his attorney concluded that the evidence against petitioner was overwhelming and, over petitioner’s strong objections (he “opposed [counsel’s] assertion of his guilt at every opportunity, before and during trial, both in conference with his lawyer and in open court,” 138 S. Ct. at 1509), conceded during his opening statement at the guilt phase that petitioner had committed all three killings. His attorney believed that this concession was necessary in order to secure a sentence less than death at the penalty phase of the trial. At the penalty phase, counsel urged mercy on the basis of petitioner’s mental and emotional issues, but the jury returned three death verdicts. (Before and during trial, petitioner sought to have counsel removed, but his requests were denied. The trial court also determined that petitioner was competent to stand trial.) Post-trial, new counsel representing petitioner moved for a new trial, arguing that the trial court violated petitioner’s constitutional rights by allowing his counsel to concede guilt over petitioner’s objection. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the trial court that counsel's concession was permissible because counsel reasonably believed that admitting guilt afforded petitioner the best opportunity to avoid a death sentence. SCOTUS held that, under the Sixth Amendment, a defendant may insist on maintaining innocence at the guilt phase of a capital trial (just as the defendant may insist on refusing to plead guilty or on representing herself, despite overwhelming evidence of guilt or lack of legal experience). "These are not strategic choices about how best to achieve a client's objectives; they are choices about what the client's objectives in fact are." 138 S. Ct. at 1508. Even if counsel reasonably concludes that concession of guilt is most likely to avoid the death penalty, the defendant may not share that objective, and that is the defendant's decision to make. SCOTUS noted that the trial court had found petitioner competent to stand trial, even though counsel believed that petitioner was not competent. SCOTUS concluded that counsel had options short of conceding guilt: "If, after consultations with [counsel] concerning the management of the defense, McCoy disagreed with [counsel's] proposal to concede McCoy committed three murders, it was not open to [counsel] to override McCoy's objection. [Counsel] could not interfere with McCoy's telling the jury 'I was not the murderer,' although counsel could, if consistent with providing effective assistance, focus his own collaboration on urging that McCoy's mental state weighed against conviction." 138 S. Ct. at 1509. SCOTUS also noted that counsel did not concede guilt because he believed petitioner to be perjuring himself by declaring innocence; counsel thought petitioner believed what he was saying but counsel disbelieved it, and counsel's approach was not designed to avoid suborning perjury but rather to avoid a death sentence. SCOTUS did not apply Strickland here "[b]ecause a client's autonomy, not counsel's competence, is in issue." 138 S. Ct. at 1510-11. Petitioner's Sixth Amendment right was violated when the trial "court allowed counsel to usurp control of an issue within McCoy's sole prerogative," and the error was thus structural and no prejudice analysis was required. SCOTUS remanded for a new trial.

Ayestas v. Davis, 584 U.S. 28, 138 S.Ct. 1080 (2018). Although this is a funding case under 18 U.S.C. § 3599(f), the ineffective assistance of counsel (IAC) discussions are significant, especially with regard to the procedural default argument and Sotomayor's concurrence. Petitioner, a Texas death row inmate in federal habeas corpus proceedings, moved for funding under 18 U.S.C. § 3599(f), which makes funds available if they are "reasonably necessary," and the motion was denied by the district court. The United States Supreme Court held that the district and Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals applied the wrong legal standard in denying the motion for funding. Petitioner was represented by four sets of lawyers, one at trial, one on direct appeal in state court, one on state habeas, and another in federal habeas. Although some claims of IAC were raised in the state habeas petition, others, including failure to investigate petitioner's mental illness and substance abuse, were not. (As Sotomayor's concurrence notes, although petitioner was not diagnosed with schizophrenia until he was in prison and while his state post-conviction application was pending, trial counsel had information that petitioner had a history of head trauma as well as substance abuse, but failed to follow up on this information, as did state post-conviction counsel.) Federal habeas counsel (fourth set of lawyers) raised these latter claims in federal court; the district court denied them as barred by procedural default because they had not been raised in state court. After SCOTUS remanded for reconsideration under Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1 (2012) and Trevino v. Thaler, 569 U.S. 413 (2013), petitioner's counsel filed an ex parte motion in district court pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3599(f) for funding to investigate and develop evidence in support of his ineffective assistance of trial and state habeas counsel claims. The district court denied the motion for funding and the habeas corpus petition. With regard to funding, the district court held that, under Fifth Circuit precedent, habeas counsel was required to demonstrate “substantial need” for investigative services, and had not done so. (The district court also ruled that the IAC claim was procedurally barred, so funding was not available to develop it.) Both the district court and the reviewing Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals refused to issue a COA on the IAC claims. SCOTUS granted review to decide if the lower courts applied the correct legal standard in denying the funding request. It first determined that it had jurisdiction to review and rule upon this issue, because, contrary to Texas’ argument, the district court’s denial of petitioner’s funding motion was a judicial rather than an administrative decision. SCOTUS then determined that the Fifth Circuit’s standard that funds are only available under § 3599(f) if the petitioner can show a “substantial need” for services is different from, and more burdensome than, the requirement set forth in §3599(f) that funds are available if the services are “reasonably necessary.” Section 3599(f) uses the term “necessary” to mean something less than essential; it calls for “a determination by the district court, in the exercise of its discretion, as to whether a reasonable attorney would regard the services as sufficiently important.” 138 S. Ct. at 1093. And after Trevino, “[i]n those cases in which funding stands a credible chance of enabling a habeas petitioner to overcome the obstacle of procedural default, it may be error for a district court to refuse funding.” 138 S. Ct. at 1094. However, “[p]roper application of the ‘reasonably necessary’ standard thus requires courts to consider the potential merit of the claims that the applicant wants to pursue, the likelihood that the services will generate useful and admissible evidence, and the prospect that the applicant will be able to clear any procedural hurdles standing in the way.” Id. SCOTUS remanded the case, leaving open the question for the Fifth Circuit to consider whether funding can be reasonably necessary where a habeas petitioner seeks to present a procedurally defaulted IAC of trial counsel claim depending on facts outside the state court record.

Davila v. Davis*, 582 U.S. 521, 137 S.Ct. 2058 (2017). The ineffective assistance of post-conviction counsel does not provide cause to excuse the procedural default of an ineffective assistance of appellate counsel claim.

Jae Lee v. United States*, 582 U.S. 357, 137 S.Ct. 1958 (2017). Petitioner, a lawful permanent resident who had spent 35 years in the United States after leaving South Korea with his parents when he was 13 and never returning to South Korea, established prejudice from his attorney’s deficient performance in advising him to accept a guilty plea in a drug case after erroneously informing petitioner that he did not face mandatory deportation. That there was a likelihood of an increased sentence as well as deportation had petitioner gone to trial did not negate the showing of prejudice where the record established that deportation was the determinative issue in petitioner’s acceptance of the plea; it would not be irrational for someone in petitioner’s position to risk additional prison time in exchange for holding on to some chance of avoiding deportation.

Weaver v. Massachusetts*, 582 U.S. 286, 137 S.Ct. 1899 (2017). A petitioner raising a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failing to object to closure of the courtroom to the public during jury selection is required to prove prejudice. For purposes of this case, the Court accepts the petitioner’s interpretation of Strickland prejudice as requiring a showing of either a reasonable probability of a different outcome in the petitioner’s case, or, that the particular public-trial violation was so serious as to render petitioner’s trial fundamentally unfair. The Court distinguishes a public-trial violation during jury selection from other errors that have been deemed structural “because they cause fundamental unfairness, either to the defendant in the specific case or by pervasive undermining of the systemic requirements of a fair and open judicial process.” These errors include: (1) failure to give a reasonable-doubt instruction; (2) biased judge; and (3) exclusion of grand jurors based on race. Regarding claims involving allegations of race or gender discrimination in the selection of the petit jury, which have necessitated automatic reversal where preserved and raised on direct review, “this opinion does not address whether the result should be any different if the errors were raised instead in an ineffective-assistance claim on collateral review.” Looking to prejudice here, the Court finds that petitioner failed to show either a reasonable probability of a more favorable result or that the trial was fundamentally unfair.

Buck v. Davis, 580 U.S. 100, 137 S.Ct. 759 (2017) (1997 trial and sentencing). In death penalty case out of Texas where petitioner sought to reopen federal habeas proceedings in light of Martinez and Trevino, the Fifth Circuit’s denial of a COA is reversed. First, the Fifth Circuit exceeded the limited scope of the COA analysis by essentially conducting merits review in determining that Buck was not entitled to a COA. Second, regarding petitioner’s procedurally defaulted ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, petitioner established deficient performance by his trial attorney who introduced expert testimony at the sentencing phase that petitioner’s race predisposed him to violence. Petitioner was prejudiced by counsel’s action as there was a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have harbored a reasonable doubt about petitioner’s future dangerousness had the expert testimony not been presented. (A finding of future dangerousness by the jury was required before a sentence of death could be imposed.) Third, the district court abused its discretion in denying petitioner’s Rule 60(b) motion to reopen the proceedings as the circumstances of this case were extraordinary. The State’s argument that Teague precluded petitioner from relying on Martinez and Trevino was waived.

Woods v. Etherton*, 578 U.S. 113, 136 S.Ct. 1149 (2016) (per curiam). The Court reversed the Sixth Circuit’s grant of habeas relief because a “fairminded jurist” could have concluded that repetition of an anonymous tip by police officers in state court cocaine possession trial did not establish that the uncontested facts it conveyed were submitted for their truth, in violation of the Confrontation Clause, or that appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert plain error or ineffective assistance of trial counsel based on the Confrontation Clause issue. The police stopped the car driven by the defendant based on an anonymous tip. Drugs were found in the driver’s side door compartment. The defendant and his passenger were arrested. The passenger/co-defendant, who testified as part of a plea agreement, testified the drugs belonged to the defendant. Three police officers described the content of the anonymous tip leading to the arrest. Trial counsel objected the third time and the prosecution agreed just to move on. The prosecution also discussed the content of the tip during closing arguments. The jury was instructed “that ‘the tip was not evidence,’ but was admitted ‘only to show why the police did what they did.’” In addressing the claim of appellate counsel’s ineffectiveness, the state court reasoned that appellate counsel may reasonably have decided not to raise the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness because trial counsel’s failure to object was a strategic decision. The state court also held that, even if trial counsel’s conduct had been deficient, there was no prejudice because there was ample evidence of guilt. The Sixth Circuit, reviewing the case under AEDPA, held that appellate counsel was ineffective “and that no fairminded jurist could conclude otherwise. Etherton v. Rivard, 800

F.3d 737 (2015). Without ruling on the merits of the court's holding that counsel had been ineffective, we disagree with the determination that no fairminded jurist could reach a contrary conclusion, and accordingly reverse." The Sixth Circuit concluded that "the contents of the tip were admitted for their truth because the tip was referenced by three different witnesses and mentioned in closing argument." The Sixth Circuit then found prejudice by finding that the "evidence was not enough to convict" without the co-defendant's testimony. And that is where the tip came in." "In reaching these conclusions, the Sixth Circuit did not apply the appropriate standard of review under AEDPA," because a "fairminded jurist" could conclude otherwise on each of these points. A "fairminded jurist" could also conclude that trial counsel did not object "because the facts of the tip were uncontested and in any event consistent with Etherton's defense." Likewise, a "fairminded jurist" could conclude that appellate counsel was not ineffective for reaching the same conclusion. "Given AEDPA, both Etherton's appellate counsel and the state habeas court were to be afforded the benefit of the doubt. Because the Sixth Circuit failed on both counts," reversal was required.

Maryland v. Kulbicki*, 577 U.S. 1, 136 S.Ct. 2 (2015) (per curiam). Certiorari granted and state court finding of ineffective assistance of counsel reversed. The state court held that trial counsel were ineffective in murder case for failing to challenge the state's evidence based on comparative bullet lead analysis (CBLA). The defendant was accused of killing his mistress, while the two were "ensnarled" in a paternity and child support suit. He was convicted in 1995. An FBI Agent examined a bullet fragment found in the defendant's truck and a bullet from the victim and testified that the results were "the sort one would "expect" if "examining two pieces of the same bullet." Additionally, the FBI Agent examined a bullet recovered from a handgun in the defendant's home and testified that it "likely came from the same package." In 2006, in state post-conviction proceedings, after "CBLA had fallen out of favor" and long after the initial post-conviction application had been filed, Kulbicki first asserted that counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the CBLA evidence. The post-conviction court rejected this claim. In the appeal to the Maryland Court of Appeals, Kulbicki abandoned his ineffective assistance of counsel claim, but the state court reversed on "that ground alone." The state court based its finding on counsels' failure to find a 1991 report coauthored by the FBI Agent that testified at trial, which "presaged the flaws in CBLA evidence" found by the Maryland court 15 years later. The state court "offered no support" for the finding that counsel was ineffective in failing "to predict the demise of CBLA," the validity of which was "widely accepted" at the time of trial. Even the 1991 report the state court relied on "did not question the validity of CBLA." Thus, the state court violated "the rule of contemporary assessment of counsel's conduct." 136 S.Ct. at 4 (quoting Lockhart v. Fretwell, 506 U.S. 364, 372 (1993)). This failure was especially clear in that "there is no reason to believe that a diligent search would even have discovered the supposedly crucial report." While the state appellate court, two decades after trial, found the report by "Internet research" on a Government Printing Office website, there is no support for a finding that counsel could have found this information prior to trial or used it if they had found it. "Given the uncontroversial nature of CBLA at the time of Kulbicki's trial, the effect of the judgment below is to demand that lawyers go 'looking for a needle in a haystack,' even when they have 'reason to doubt there is any needle there.'" Id. at 5 (quoting Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, 389 (2005)).

Christeson v. Roper, 574 U.S. 373, 135 S.Ct. 891 (2015) (per curiam). The Supreme Court granted review, vacated, and remanded due to the District Court in Missouri abusing its discretion in denying the petitioner's request for substitution of federally-appointed habeas counsel. Petitioner's first habeas petition was dismissed as untimely because appointed counsel filed 117 days past the one year statute of limitations, despite having been appointed nine months before the deadline. Counsel did not even meet with their client until the deadline had passed. Nearly seven years later, appointed counsel consulted with new counsel, who realized that the only option to reopen the final judgment was a Rule 60(b) motion arguing equitable tolling, which appointed counsel could not make because the argument for equitable tolling would have to be "premised on their own malfeasance in failing to file timely the habeas petition." New counsel filed a motion to substitute counsel, which was denied. New counsel appealed to the Eighth Circuit, which ultimately dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, reasoning that new counsel were not authorized to file the appeal on petitioner's behalf. While this appeal was pending, the Missouri Supreme Court set an execution date. New counsel again filed a motion in the District Court for substitution of counsel. The court denied finding that "the interests of justice" would not be served by substitution. The Eighth Circuit summarily affirmed. Under 18 U.S.C. § 3599(e), a court may replace appointed counsel with "similarly qualified counsel . . . upon motion" of the petitioner. Under Martel v. Clair, 132 S. Ct. 1276 (2012), a motion for substitution should be granted when it is in the "interests of justice." Factors for consideration "include: the timeliness of the motion; the adequacy of the district court's inquiry into the defendant's complaint; and the asserted cause for that complaint, including the extent of the conflict or breakdown in communication between lawyer and client (and the client's responsibility, if any, for that conflict)." The District Court's primary error was in failing to acknowledge appointed counsel's conflict of interest despite the fact that tolling was available only for "serious instances of attorney misconduct." Holland v. Florida, 560 U.S. 631, 651-52 (2010). Appointed counsel clearly could not make this argument, which was a clear conflict of interest. "Counsel cannot reasonably be expected to make such an argument, which threatens their professional reputation and livelihood." "Given the obvious conflict of interest here," the District Court abused its discretion in denying substitution of counsel.

Jennings v. Stephens, 574 U.S. 271, 135 S.Ct. 793 (2015). In federal habeas, petitioner asserted entitlement to sentencing relief on three grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel. Two of those grounds were under Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003), and asserted ineffective assistance for failing to investigate and present evidence of a disadvantaged background, low intelligence, and organic brain damage. The third ground asserted under Smith v. Spisak, 558 U.S. 139 (2010) that counsel was ineffective in arguing in closing arguments that he could not "quarrel with" a death sentence. The District Court granted relief on the Wiggins claims but denied relief on the claim based on Spisak. The state appealed. In response, petitioner argued that the District Court was correct in granting relief based on Wiggins and that counsel was also ineffective under Spisak. The Fifth Circuit reversed under Wiggins and held that it lacked jurisdiction to address the Spisak claim because the petitioner had failed to file a timely notice of appeal and had failed to obtain a certificate of appealability. The Supreme Court held this was error. While it is unclear whether 28 U.S.C. § 2253(c) requires a certificate of appealability when a petitioner seeks to cross-appeal in a case already before a court of appeals, it is clear that § 2253(c) does not apply when the petitioner simply defends a judgment on alternative grounds. A certificate of appealability is not required in this circumstance. Thus, the Fifth Circuit erred in failing to consider the Spisak claim. Remanded.

*Hinton v. Alabama, 571 U.S. 263, 134 S.Ct. 1081 (2014) (per curiam) (1986 trial and sentencing). Under “a straightforward application” of Strickland, defense counsel’s failure in capital murder trial to request additional funding to replace an inadequate expert amounted to deficient performance. In February 1985, the first victim was killed during a restaurant robbery. In July 1985, the second victim was killed in a “very similar” restaurant robbery. Later the same month, a third man survived a similar robbery-shooting (which was not charged) and identified the defendant in a photo-array. The defendant was arrested and a .38 caliber pistol was seized from his home. State “firearms and toolmark” experts testified that bullets from all three crime scenes were fired by this weapon. No other evidence linked the defendant to the two murders. Recognizing the importance of his issue, counsel requested funding to hire his own expert. The trial court, believing that the statutory maximum that he could grant for each murder count was $500, authorized $1000 in funding but invited counsel to request more funding if that was insufficient. The statutory maximum relied on by the trial court had been amended more than a year prior to the defendant’s arrest. The statute at the time of the ruling actually authorized the court to approve “any expenses reasonably incurred.” “Operating under the mistaken belief that he could pay no more than $1,000,” trial counsel searched for a qualified expert but could locate only one person, Andrew Payne, willing to perform the services for only $1000. Counsel did not believe Payne had the necessary expertise, but hired him anyway. Payne testified that the barrel of the defendant’s revolver had been corroded to the point that it was impossible to say whether a particular bullet had been fired from the gun. He also testified that the bullets from the three crime scenes did not match one another. “On cross-examination, the prosecutor badly discredited Payne.” He had testified in only two cases in the preceding eight years and one of those cases involved a shotgun rather than a pistol. He also conceded that he had to obtain assistance from one of the state’s experts to operate the microscope at the state laboratory and that he had vision in only one eye. In closing argument, the state also highlighted the fact that Payne’s expertise was in military ordinance, not firearms and toolmark identification, and that he had graduated with a degree in civil engineering “more than half a century before the trial.” In post-conviction, the defense presented three qualified experts, who all testified that they could not conclude that any of the six bullets had been fired from the defendant’s revolver. The state presented no evidence in rebuttal. The state trial court denied relief finding no prejudice because Payne said the same thing as the post-conviction experts. The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed for the same reason. The Alabama Supreme Court remanded for the trial court to determine whether Payne was “a qualified firearms and toolmarks expert.” After the trial court found that Payne was qualified, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that, under Strickland, “it was unreasonable for Hinton’s lawyer to seek additional funds to hire an expert where that failure was based not on any strategic choice but on a mistaken belief that available funding was capped at $1,000.”

The trial attorney’s failure to request additional funding in order to replace an expert he knew to be inadequate because he mistakenly believed that he had received all he could get under Alabama law constituted deficient performance. Under Strickland, “strategic choices made after thorough investigation of law and facts relevant to plausible options are virtually unchallengeable; and strategic choices made after less than complete investigation are reasonable precisely to the extent that reasonable professional judgments support the limitations on investigation. In other words, counsel has a duty to make reasonable investigations or to make a reasonable decision that makes particular investigations unnecessary.” 466 U.S., at 690–691. Hinton's attorney knew that he needed more funding to present an effective defense, yet he failed to make even the cursory investigation of the state statute providing for defense funding for indigent defendants that would have revealed to him that he could receive reimbursement not just for $1,000 but for “any expenses reasonably incurred.” An attorney's ignorance of a point of law that is fundamental to his case combined with his failure to perform basic research on that point is a quintessential example of unreasonable performance under Strickland.

The Court further clarified its holding:

We wish to be clear that the inadequate assistance of counsel we find in this case does not consist of the hiring of an expert who, though qualified, was not qualified enough. The selection of an expert witness is a paradigmatic example of the type of “strategic choic[e]” that, when made “after thorough investigation of [the] law and facts,” is “virtually unchallengeable.” Strickland, 466 U.S., at 690. We do not today launch federal courts into examination of the relative qualifications of experts hired and experts that might have been hired. The only inadequate assistance of counsel here was the inexcusable mistake of law – the unreasonable failure to understand the resources that state law made available to him—that caused counsel to employ an expert that he himself deemed inadequate.

The Court remanded for a proper prejudice determination. The state court had held that, because Payne’s testimony was the same as the post-conviction experts’ testimony, there could be no prejudice. The Supreme Court rejected this analysis.

It is true that Payne's testimony would have done Hinton a lot of good if the jury had believed it. But the jury did not believe Payne. And if there is a reasonable probability that Hinton's attorney would have hired an expert who would have instilled in the jury a reasonable doubt as to Hinton's guilt had the attorney known that the statutory funding limit had been lifted, then Hinton was prejudiced by his lawyer's deficient performance and is entitled to a new trial.

Burt v. Titlow*, 571 U.S. 12, 134 S.Ct. 10 (2013) (6th Cir. 2012)). Under Pinholster, “[w]hen a state prisoner asks a federal court to set aside a sentence due to ineffective assistance of counsel during plea bargaining, our cases require that the federal court use a ‘doubly deferential’ standard of review that gives both the state court and the defense attorney the benefit of the doubt.” In this case, the Supreme Court reversed the grant of relief because the Sixth Circuit “failed to apply that doubly deferential standard by refusing to credit a state court’s reasonable factual finding and by assuming that counsel was ineffective where the record was silent.” Petitioner, along with her aunt, was charged with first-degree murder of the aunt’s husband. Even though petitioner claimed innocence, trial counsel negotiated and advised petitioner to accept a plea agreement in which the defendant would plead guilty to manslaughter and receive a sentence of 7-15 years – which was higher than provided for in state sentencing guidelines – in exchange for her testimony against her aunt. After entering the plea “and only days away from offering self incriminating testimony in open court,” petitioner retained new counsel and demanded a sentence of only three years in exchange for her testimony. When the state rejected this demand, petitioner moved to withdraw her plea and refused to testify against her aunt. The aunt was acquitted and the petitioner was convicted of second-degree murder at trial. “Although a defendant’s proclamation of innocence does not relieve counsel of his normal responsibilities under Strickland, it may affect the advice counsel gives.” The Sixth Circuit rejected the state court’s conclusion that counsel’s conduct was not deficient “because the ‘record in this case contains no evidence that’ he gave constitutionally adequate advice on whether to withdraw the guilty plea.” The Supreme Court found this finding to be “troubling.”

We have said that counsel should be “strongly presumed to have rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment,” Strickland, 466 U. S., at 690, and that the burden to “show that counsel’s performance was deficient” rests squarely on the defendant, id., at 687. The Sixth Circuit turned that presumption of effectiveness on its head. It should go without saying that the absence of evidence cannot overcome the “strong presumption that counsel’s conduct [fell] within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance.” Id., at 689.

Trevino v. Thaler, 569 U.S. 413, 133 S.Ct. 1911 (2013). The holding of Martinez v. Ryan applies where state law says that ineffective assistance of counsel (IAC) claims “must be raised in an initial-review collateral proceeding.” This holding also applies where state law does not require IAC to be raised first in collateral review, but “[t]he structure and design of the [state] system in actual operation, however, make it ‘virtually impossible’ for an ineffective assistance claim to be presented on direct review.” Here, while Texas permits IAC claims before the trial court in a motion for new trial, this “vehicle is often inadequate because of time constraints and because the trial record has generally not been transcribed at this point.” Id. at 1918 (quoting Ex parte Torres, 943 S.W.2d 469, 475 (Tex. Crim. App. 1997) (en banc)).

The present capital case illustrates why it does not. The trial court appointed new counsel for Trevino eight days after sentencing. Counsel thus had 22 days to decide whether, and on what grounds, to make a motion for a new trial. She then may have had an additional 45 days to provide support for the motion but without the help of a transcript (which did not become available until much later—seven months after the trial). It would have been difficult, perhaps impossible, within that time frame to investigate Trevino’s background, determine whether trial counsel had adequately done so, and then develop evidence about additional mitigating background circumstances.

Id. at 1919. In addition to the inadequacy of the direct review process, the “Texas courts in effect have directed defendants to raise claims of ineffective assistance of trial counsel on collateral, rather than on direct, review.” Id.

Capital Cases*

[W]here, as here, state procedural framework, by reason of its design and operation, makes it highly unlikely in a typical case that a defendant will have a meaningful opportunity to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel on direct appeal, our holding in Martinez applies.

Id. at 1921.

Chaidez v. United States*, 568 U.S. 342, 133 S.Ct. 1103 (2013). The decision in Padilla v. Kentucky does not apply retroactively to convictions that had already become final.

Missouri v. Frye*, 566 U.S. 133, 132 S.Ct. 1399 (2012). In this felony driving while revoked case, the Court held that counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to communicate a formal favorable plea offer from the state to the defendant. The defendant was charged with a felony that carried up to a four year sentence. Prior to trial, the state offered two plea bargains. On the first, the state agreed to recommend a three year sentence, without a recommendation regarding probation but with a recommendation of 10 days in jail. On the second, the state offered to reduce the charge to a misdemeanor and to recommend a 90 day sentence. The state put an expiration date on both offers, which passed without defense counsel even advising the defendant of the offers. Subsequently, but before trial, the defendant was again arrested for driving with a revoked license. He ultimately plead guilty with no plea agreement. The state recommended a three-year sentence, made no recommendation on probation, and requested 10 days in jail. The Court noted the desirability of plea bargaining. “Ninety-seven percent of federal convictions and ninety-four percent of state convictions are the result of guilty pleas.” The Court also noted, “[t]hough the standard for counsel’s performance is not determined solely by reference to codified standards of professional practice, these standards can be important.” Here, the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice require counsel to “promptly communicated and explain to the defendant all plea offers made by the prosecuting attorney,” and “this standard has been adopted by numerous state and federal courts over the last 30 years.” Likewise, “[t]he standard for prompt communication and consultation is also set out in state bar professional standards for attorneys.”

[A]s a general rule, defense counsel has the duty to communicate formal offers from the prosecution to accept a plea on terms and conditions that may be favorable to the accused.

Counsel was deficient, here, because counsel “allowed the offer to expire without advising the defendant or allowing him to consider it.”

To show prejudice from ineffective assistance of counsel where a plea offer has lapsed or been rejected because of counsel’s deficient performance, defendants must demonstrate a reasonable probability they would have accepted the earlier plea offer had they been afforded effective assistance of counsel. Defendants must also demonstrate a reasonable probability the plea would have been entered without the prosecution canceling it or the trial court refusing to accept it, if they had the authority to exercise that discretion under state law. To establish prejudice in this instance, it is necessary to show a reasonable probability that the end result of the criminal process would have been more favorable by reason of a plea to a lesser charge or a sentence of less prison time.

Here, the defendant could show that he would have accepted one of the offers had he known about the state's plea offers, as he later entered a guilty plea with no deal at all. While this might not be enough of a showing in a case where the state's case become stronger after the initial plea offer, it was enough of a showing here. Nonetheless, "there is strong reason to doubt the prosecution and the trial court would have permitted the plea bargain to become final." Specifically, because of the defendant's additional arrest following the plea offer, the prosecution and the trial court likely would not have adhered to the deal. Case remanded to allow the state court to resolve this issue in the first instance.

Lafler v. Cooper*, 566 U.S. 156, 132 S.Ct. 1376 (2012). In this assault with intent to commit murder case, counsel was found to be ineffective in advising respondent to reject the state's plea offer and proceed to trial. The prosecution twice offered to dismiss two of the charges and to recommend a sentence of 51 to 85 months for the other two charges in exchange for a guilty plea. Respondent initially indicated a willingness to enter the deal, but later rejected the offer because counsel convinced him that the prosecution would be unable to establish his intent to commit murder on the basis that the victim had been shot below the waist. After a full and fair trial, respondent was convicted on all four counts and received a mandatory minimum sentence of 183 to 360 months. Respondent asserted ineffective assistance of trial counsel for advising him to reject the state's plea offer. Rather than applying Strickland as was inappropriate in this circumstance, the state court simply found that respondent's rejection of the plea offer was knowing and voluntary. "By failing to apply Strickland to assess the ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim respondent raised, the state court's adjudication was contrary to clearly established federal law." The Supreme Court again rejected the argument that Lockhart v. Fretwell modified Strickland. The Court also reiterated the desirability of pleas as "criminal justice today is for the most part a system of pleas, not a system of trials. Ninety-seven percent of federal convictions and ninety-four percent of state convictions are the result of guilty pleas." On deficient performance, the Supreme Court noted that "an erroneous strategic prediction about the outcome of a trial is not necessarily deficient performance," but the State conceded that counsel's conduct was deficient in this case. Thus, the only question before the Court was how to apply Strickland's prejudice test where counsel's ineffectiveness resulted in rejection of a plea offer.

In these circumstances a defendant must show that but for the ineffective advice of counsel there is a reasonable probability that the plea offer would have been presented to the court (i.e., that the defendant would have accepted the plea and the prosecution would not have withdrawn it in light of intervening circumstances), that the court would have accepted its terms, and that the conviction or sentence, or both, under the offer's terms would have been less severe than under the judgment and sentence that in fact were imposed.

Respondent established a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the plea offer and the court would have accepted the guilty plea. In addition, prejudice was shown as respondent received a sentence 3 ½ times more severe than he likely would have received by pleading guilty. In fashioning a remedy, the Court noted that “a remedy must ‘neutralize the taint’ of a constitutional violation.”

The correct remedy in these circumstances . . . is to order the State to reoffer the plea agreement. Presuming respondent accepts the offer, the state trial court can then exercise its discretion in determining whether to vacate the convictions and resentence respondent pursuant to the plea agreement, to vacate only some of the convictions and resentence respondent accordingly, or to leave the convictions and sentence from trial undisturbed.

In short, “[t]oday’s decision leaves open to the trial court how best to exercise that discretion in all the circumstances of the case.”

Martinez v. Ryan*, 566 U.S. 1, 132 S.Ct. 1309 (2012). In this criminal sexual conduct with a minor case, the Court qualified the opinion in Coleman v. Thompson, by recognizing that a federal habeas court may excuse a procedural default of an ineffective-assistance claim when the claim was not properly presented in state court due to an attorney’s errors in an initial-review collateral proceeding, i.e., the first proceeding in which a claim of ineffective assistance at trial can be raised. State law prohibited arguing ineffectiveness of trial counsel during the direct appeal. In state post-conviction, the first opportunity to assert the issue, the issue was not presented. When it was raised in a successive state post-conviction petition, the state court dismissed due to a state court procedural bar that was an independent and adequate ground. Thus, the claim could only be heard in federal court by establishing cause to excuse the procedural default. Cause can be established in two circumstances.

The first is where the state courts did not appoint counsel in the initial-review collateral proceeding for a claim of ineffective assistance at trial. The second is where appointed counsel in the initial-review collateral proceeding, where the claim should have been raised, was ineffective under the standards of Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 104 S.Ct. 2052, 80 L.Ed.2d 674 (1984). To overcome the default, a prisoner must also demonstrate that the underlying ineffective-assistance- of-trial-counsel claim is a substantial one, which is to say that the prisoner must demonstrate that the claim has some merit.

In other words, the State can “elect between appointing [effective] counsel in initial-review collateral proceedings or not asserting a procedural default and raising a defense on the merits in federal habeas proceedings.” At bottom, ineffectiveness of post-conviction counsel is not a “freestanding” claim for relief, but merely one that allows a federal court to find cause and prejudice for failing to adequately assert the issue in state court, which “allows a federal court to consider the merits of a claim that otherwise would have been procedurally defaulted.”

Martel v. Clair, 565 U.S. 648, 132 S.Ct. 1276 (2012). The Court held that the standard to be applied in evaluating a capital habeas petitioner’s motion to replace appointed counsel under 18 U.S.C. §3599(d) is the “interests of justice” standard applied in non-capital cases under 18 U.S.C.

Capital Cases*

§3006A. The initial habeas petition was filed by appointed habeas counsel in 1994. An evidentiary hearing was held in 2004 and post-hearing briefs were filed in February 2005. The District Court informed both parties that there would be no additional materials submitted. After that, in March 2005, the petitioner moved to replace appointed counsel because “they were seeking only to overturn his death sentence, rather than to prove his innocence.” The District Court denied the motion and the Supreme Court applied the “interests of justice” standard, which “contemplates a peculiarly context-specific inquiry.”

Those factors . . . generally include: the timeliness of the motion; the adequacy of the district court’s inquiry into the defendant’s complaint; and the asserted cause for that complaint, including the extent of the conflict or breakdown in communication between lawyer and client (and the client’s own responsibility, if any, for that conflict). Because a trial court’s decision on substitution is so fact-specific, it deserves deference; a reviewing court may overturn it only for an abuse of discretion.

Id. at 1280(citations omitted). Courts “cannot properly resolve substitution motions without probing why a defendant wants a new lawyer” in “an on-the-record inquiry,” which will make possible meaningful appellate review of the trial court’s exercise of discretion. Here, after the court’s initial inquiry, the petitioner dropped his complaint. When the petitioner renewed the substitution motion, it was based on counsel’s failure to challenge guilt-or-innocence phase issues when, in fact, counsel had raised many challenges to the conviction, including to the sufficiency of the State’s evidence. Regardless, the timing of the motion alone in this case “precludes a holding that the District Court abused its discretion.” “The case was all but over but the deciding; counsel, whether old or new, could do nothing more in the trial court proceedings. At that point and in that forum, Clair’s conflict with his lawyers no longer mattered.”

Maples v. Thomas, 565 U.S. 266, 132 S.Ct. 1276 (2012). The Court addressed the question of whether the habeas petitioner could establish “cause” to excuse the procedural default of issues due to the petitioner’s failure to timely appeal the state trial court’s order denying post-conviction relief. The petitioner was an Alabama death-sentenced inmate. He was initially represented in state post-conviction by two New York attorneys, who were associated with same large law firm serving pro bono. An Alabama attorney, designated as local counsel, had moved for their admission pro hac vice, but made clear to the New York counsel that he “would undertake no substantive involvement in the case.” The petition was filed in August 2001. In the summer of 2002, with the petition still pending, the New York attorneys left the firm and their new employment disabled them from continuing to represent the petitioner. They did not, however, inform the petitioner of their departure and did not seek the Alabama trial court’s leave to withdraw or move for substitution of counsel. In May 2003, the court denied the petition. Notice was sent to the attorneys at the law firm, but it was returned, unopened, to the trial court clerk. Local counsel also received notice but did not even contact the New York firm to ensure their receipt of notice because they were copied on the same letter from the court. The 42 days allowed for filing a notice of appeal expired on July 7, 2003. Over a month later, the Assistant Attorney General assigned to the case sent a letter directly to the petitioner informing him of the missed deadline and that he had four weeks to file a federal habeas petition. He clearly understood that local counsel and the New York counsel were providing no representation as counsel were not copied on the letter. In the federal habeas proceedings, the court did not entertain the habeas claims because of the state procedural default, which could be overcome only by demonstrating “cause” for the default and actual prejudice as a result of the alleged violation of federal law. “Cause” exists where “something external to the petitioner, something that cannot fairly be attributed to him” impeded his efforts to comply with the state procedural rule. As held in Coleman v. Thompson, negligence on the part of counsel does not qualify as “cause” because the attorney is the prisoner’s agent. “Thus, when a petitioner’s postconviction attorney misses a filing deadline, the petitioner is bound by the oversight.” Without disturbing this general rule, the Court held that “cause” existed to excuse the missed notice of appeal deadline in this case.

Abandoned by counsel, Maples was left unrepresented at a critical time for his state postconviction petition, and he lacked a clue of any need to protect himself pro se. In these circumstances, no just system would lay the default at Maples’ death-cell door.

Counsel’s abandonment of the petitioner without notice severed the principal-agent relationship as counsel was no longer the petitioner’s representative. The petitioner could not be faulted for failing to act on his own behalf because he lacked any reason to believe that counsel were not representing him. The Court also noted Alabama’s “low eligibility requirements” for capital trial lawyers. Counsel need only be a member of the Alabama bar with five years’ prior experience in the active practice of criminal law. No capital experience or even capital-case-specific professional education or training is required. Appointed counsel were also undercompensated. Until 1999, counsel were paid $40 per hour in court and $20 per hour out of court, with a cap of $1000 for out-of-court work. “[D]eath penalty litigation is plainly time intensive,” as “[o]ne study of capital trials from 1990 to 1997 found that defense attorneys spent an average of 1,480 out-of-court hours preparing a defendant’s case.” Even now, Alabama capital counsel are paid only $70 per hour.

Cullen v. Pinholster, 563 U.S. 170, 131 S.Ct. 1388 (2011) (sentenced in May 1984). The Court reversed the Ninth Circuit’s finding of ineffective assistance of counsel and held that federal habeas review under 2254(d)(1) is limited to the record that was before the state court that adjudicated the claim on the merits. Prior to sentencing, trial counsel moved to exclude any aggravating evidence due to the state’s failure to provide notice of the evidence to be introduced as required by state law. That motion was denied and trial counsel rejected the court’s offer of a continuance. In sentencing, trial counsel presented only testimony from the petitioner’s mother concerning the petitioner’s troubled childhood and adolescent years. In state habeas, counsel asserted ineffectiveness in failing to adequately investigate and in failing to furnish the defense expert with adequate background materials. The petitioner presented evidence from a new expert, Dr. Woods, that the petitioner suffers from bipolar mood disorder and seizure disorders. The state court summarily rejected the claims on the merits. In federal court, the district court granted an evidentiary hearing and received additional evidence from two new medical experts. The district court and the Ninth Circuit granted habeas relief. The Supreme Court found error in the federal courts considering evidence that was not before the state court when the claim was unadjudicated on the merits. The Court also found error in the federal courts’ finding of ineffective assistance of counsel. Review of the state court’s decision is “doubly deferential.” First, there is a “highly deferential” look at counsel’s performance. Second, this must be done through the “deferential lens of § 2254(d).” Here, “[t]he state court record supports the idea that [petitioner’s] counsel acted strategically to get the prosecution’s aggravation witnesses excluded for lack of notice, and if that failed, to put on [petitioner’s] mother.” Counsel interviewed the mother and retained a psychiatrist. Counsel “confronted a challenging penalty phase with an unsympathetic client, which limited their feasible strategies.” Specifically, the petitioner bragged in his trial testimony about “his criminal disposition” and “hundreds of robberies.” The defense expert, who did not testify, had noted “psychopathic personality traits” and diagnosed antisocial personality disorder. “Given these impediments, it would have been a reasonable penalty-phase strategy to focus on evoking sympathy for [petitioner’s] mother.” “[I]t certainly can be reasonable for attorneys to conclude that creating sympathy for the defendant’s family is a better idea because the defendant himself is simply unsympathetic.” In finding that the state court had unreasonably applied Strickland, the Ninth Circuit “erred in attributing strict rules to this Court’s recent case law” in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000), Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003), and Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374 (2005). Here, just as the relevant standard in Wiggins was the standard of practice for capital cases in Maryland at the time of trial, the relevant standard of professional competence here was the standard “that prevailed in Los Angeles in 1984.” Even if trial counsel performed deficiently, there was no showing that the state court unreasonably concluded there was no prejudice in light of the extensive aggravating evidence and the unsympathetic defendant. The “new” evidence presented in state habeas “largely duplicated the mitigation evidence at trial.” To the extent it did include “new factual allegations or evidence, much of it is of questionable mitigating value.” If trial counsel had presented Dr. Woods’ testimony, it would have opened the door to rebuttal by a state expert. Likewise, the “new evidence” concerning the petitioner’s family—“substance abuse, mental illness, and criminal problems”—“is also by no means clearly mitigating, as the jury might have concluded that [petitioner] was simply beyond rehabilitation.” The Ninth Circuit again erred in relying on Williams and Rompilla in finding prejudice. “[T]his Court did not apply AEDPA deference to the question of prejudice in those cases; each of them lack the important ‘doubly deferential’ standard of Strickland and AEDPA” and “therefore offer no guidance with respect to whether a state court has unreasonably determined that prejudice is lacking.” Even if the federal court might have reached a different conclusion as an initial matter, the state court did not unreasonably apply Supreme Court precedent in finding no prejudice.

Harrington v. Richter*, 562 U.S. 86, 131 S.Ct. 770 (2011). The Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit’s finding of ineffective assistance of counsel in murder and attempted murder case for failing to consult with blood evidence experts. The State’s case was built on the testimony of the attempted murder victim and circumstantial evidence. While the state had not planned to present blood pattern evidence, the approach was altered following defense counsel’s opening statement. The State presented expert testimony by both a blood spatter expert and a serologist to contradict the defense theory.

The pivotal question is whether the state court’s application of the Strickland standard was unreasonable. This is different from asking whether defense counsel’s performance fell below Strickland’s standard.

Id. at 785. In this case, the state court’s decision was “unaccompanied by any explanation.”

Capital Cases*

Under §2254(d), a habeas court must determine what arguments or theories supported or, as here, could have supported, the state court's decision; and then it must ask whether it is possible fairminded jurists could disagree that those arguments or theories are inconsistent with the holding in a prior decision of this Court.

Id. at 786. “[E]ven a strong case for relief does not mean the state court’s conclusion was unreasonable.” Id.

As a condition for obtaining habeas corpus from a federal court, a state prisoner must show that the state court’s ruling on the claim being presented in federal court was so lacking in justification that there was an error well understood and comprehended in existing law beyond any possibility for fairminded disagreement.

Id. at 786-87. In assessing the effectiveness of representation, “[t]he question is whether an attorney’s representation amounted to incompetence under ‘prevailing professional norms,’ not whether it deviated from best practices or most common custom.” Id. at 788. “Counsel was entitled to formulate a strategy that was reasonable at the time and to balance limited resources in accord with effective trial tactics and strategies.” Id. at 789. “Reliance on ‘the harsh light of hindsight’ to cast doubt on a trial that took place now more than 15 years ago is precisely what Strickland and AEDPA seek to prevent.” Id. Counsel’s failure to consult a blood expert was not unreasonable. Even if it was apparent that expert testimony would support the defense, competent counsel might elect not to use this evidence. “Counsel was entitled to formulate a strategy that was reasonable at the time and to balance limited resources in accord with effective trial tactics and strategies.” Here, counsel had “reason to question the truth of his client’s account, given his initial denial of involvement and then production of evidence. Thus, concentrating on the blood pool carried its own serious risks, such as exposing the petitioner’s story as “an invention.” “An attorney need not pursue an investigation that would be fruitless, much less one that might be harmful to the defense.” “Even apart from this danger, there was the possibility that expert testimony could shift attention to esoteric matters of forensic science, distract the jury from whether [the petitioner] was telling the truth, or transform the case into a battle of the experts.” Id. at 790.

To support a defense argument that the prosecution has not proved its case it sometimes is better to try to cast pervasive suspicion of doubt than to strive to prove a certainty that exonerates. All that happened here is that counsel pursued a course that conformed to the first option.

Id. Counsel also was not ineffective in failing to anticipate that the state would offer expert testimony. “Just as there is no expectation that competent counsel will be a flawless strategist or tactician, an attorney may not be faulted for a reasonable miscalculation or lack of foresight or for failing to prepare for what appear to be remote possibilities.” Id. at 791. Here, the prosecution did not anticipate that it would present expert testimony until the eve of trial. Even if counsel had anticipated the state would call an expert, Strickland does not enact Newton’s third law for the presentation of evidence, requiring for every prosecution expert an equal and opposite expert from the defense.” Id.

Capital Cases*

In many instances, cross-examination will be sufficient to expose defects in an expert's presentation. When defense counsel does not have a solid case, the best strategy can be to say that there is too much doubt about the State's theory for a jury to convict.

Id. Prejudice was not established.

Strickland asks whether it is "reasonably likely" the result would have been different. This does not require a showing that counsel's actions "more likely than not altered the outcome," but the difference between Strickland's prejudice standard and a more-probable-than-not standard is slight and matters "only in the rarest case." The likelihood of a different result must be substantial, not just conceivable.

Id. at 792 (citations omitted). "There was ample basis for the California Supreme Court to think any real possibility of [the petitioner's] being acquitted was eclipsed by the remaining evidence pointing to guilt." Id.

Premo v. Moore*, 562 U.S. 115, 131 S.Ct. 733 (2011). The Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's finding of ineffective assistance of counsel for recommending a plea bargain in felony murder case without first seeking suppression of a confession assumed to have been properly obtained. Counsel asserted he did not move to suppress the confession in light of the petitioner's admissible confessions to two other witnesses. The state court decision was not an unreasonable application of either part of the Strickland rule. "With a potential capital charge lurking, [petitioner's] counsel made a reasonable choice to opt for a quick plea bargain." The Ninth Circuit erred in resting its holding on Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991) because Fulminante may not be incorporated into the Strickland performance inquiry. Fulminante involved the admission into evidence of an involuntary confession. It "says nothing about the Strickland standard of effectiveness." Thus, "a finding of constitutionally adequate performance under Strickland cannot be contrary to Fulminante."

There are certain differences between inadequate assistance of counsel claims in cases where there was a full trial on the merits and those, like this one, where a plea was entered even before the prosecution decided upon all the charges....

Hindsight and second guesses are ... inappropriate, and often more so, where a plea has been entered without a full trial or, as in this case, eve before the prosecution decided on the charges. . . . There is a most substantial burden on the claimant to show ineffective assistance. The plea process brings to the criminal justice system a stability and a certainty that must not be undermined by the prospect of collateral challenges in cases not only where witnesses and evidence have disappeared, but also in cases where witnesses and evidence were not presented in the first place.

Capital Cases*

Sears v. Upton, 561 U.S. 945, 130 S.Ct. 3259 (2010) (per curiam) (1993 trial and sentencing). The Court held that the state postconviction court failed to apply the proper prejudice inquiry in determining that counsel's facially inadequate mitigation investigation did not prejudice the petitioner. Because "some mitigation evidence" had been presented, "the state court determined it could not speculate as to what the effect of additional evidence would have been." "[I]t is plain from the face of the state court's opinion that it failed to apply the correct prejudice inquiry . . . for evaluating [petitioner's] Sixth Amendment claim." At trial, "counsel presented evidence describing his childhood as stable, loving, and essentially without incident" in an effort to "portray the adverse impact of [his] execution on his family and loved ones." This strategy backfired as the prosecutor "used the evidence of [petitioner's] purportedly stable and advantaged upbringing against him during the State's closing argument." Rather than being "privileged in every way," as the state argued, petitioner's parents had a physically abusive relationship and divorced when the petitioner was young. He suffered sexual abuse from a male cousin. He was demeaned by his mother referring to him and his brothers as "little mother fuckers." His father was also "verbally abusive," even berating him in front of his school principal during a parent-teacher conference. His father disciplined him "with age-inappropriate military-style drills." He "struggled in school, demonstrating substantial behavior problems from a very young age." He repeated the second grade and was referred at age nine to a local mental health center for evaluation. By the time he reached high school, he was described as "severely learning disabled" and "severely behaviorally handicapped." His older brother was "a convicted drug dealer and user, who introduced [petitioner] to a life of crime. "Environmental factors aside, and more significantly," the postconviction evidence revealed that petitioner "performs at or below the bottom first percentile in several measures of cognitive functioning and reasoning," likely due to "significant frontal lobe damage [the petitioner] suffered as a child, as well as drug and alcohol abuse in his teens." He had a "grandiose self-conception" and beliefs of "magical thinking," due to a "profound personality disorder." "[T]he fact that some of this evidence may have been 'hearsay' does not necessarily undermine its value—or its admissibility—for penalty phase purposes" because:

We have . . . recognized that reliable hearsay evidence that is relevant to a capital defendant's mitigation defense should not be excluded by rote application of a state hearsay rule. See Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95, 97, 99 S. Ct. 2150, 60 L.Ed.2d 738 (1979) (per curiam) ("Regardless of whether the proffered testimony comes within Georgia's hearsay rule, under the facts of this case its exclusion constituted a violation of the Due Process Clause. . . . The excluded testimony was highly relevant to a critical issue in the punishment phase of the trial); see also Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302, 93 S. Ct. 1038, 35 L.Ed.2d 297 (1973) ("In these circumstances, where constitutional directly affecting the ascertainment of guilt are implicated, the hearsay rule may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice").

In considering the state court's prejudice analysis, the Court noted that the state court "appears to have stated the proper prejudice standard," but then "did not correctly conceptualize how that standard applies to the circumstances of this case." Because some mitigation evidence had been presented, the state court concluded that it could not "be fairly compared with those where little or no mitigation evidence is presented and where a reasonable prediction of outcome can be made."

Capital Cases*

Likewise, the state court found it “impossible to know what effect [a different mitigation theory] would have had on [the jury].” In short, in the state court’s view, “counsel put forth a reasonable theory with some supporting evidence,” which precluded finding “a reasonable likelihood that the outcome at trial would have been different if a different mitigation theory had been advanced.” The state court committed two errors in its analysis. First, it “placed undue reliance on the assumed reasonableness of counsel’s mitigation theory,” when the reasonableness of counsel’s theory was, “at the very least, called into question” by the state court’s “determination that counsel had conducted a constitutionally deficient mitigation investigation.”

[T]hat a theory might be reasonable in the abstract, does not obviate the need to analyze whether counsel’s failure to conduct an adequate mitigation investigation before arriving at this particular theory prejudiced [petitioner]. The “reasonableness” of counsel’s theory was, at this stage in the inquiry, beside the point: [petitioner] might be prejudiced by his counsel’s failures, whether his haphazard choice was reasonable or not.

The Court made this “plain” in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000), where the Court “rejected any suggestion that a decision to focus on one potentially reasonable trial strategy—in that case, petitioner’s voluntary confession—was ‘justified by a tactical decision’ when ‘counsel did not fulfill their obligation to conduct a thorough investigation of the defendant’s background.’” Id. at ____ (quoting Williams, 529 U.S. at 396). “A ‘tactical decision’ is a precursor to concluding that counsel has developed a ‘reasonable’ mitigation theory in a particular case.” Second, “and more fundamentally, the court failed to apply the proper prejudice inquiry.” The Court has “never limited the prejudice inquiry under Strickland to cases in which there was only ‘little or no mitigation evidence’ presented.” To the contrary, “the Strickland inquiry requires . . . probing and fact-specific analysis,” rather than “the type of truncated prejudice inquiry undertaken by the state court in this case.” A proper prejudice analysis must consider “the newly uncovered evidence” and the mitigation evidence introduced during sentencing.

Berghuis v. Thompkins*, 560 U.S. 370, 130 S.Ct. 2250 (2010). Under AEDPA, counsel was not ineffective in murder trial for failing to request a limiting instruction, informing the jury that it could consider an accomplice’s acquittal in a prior trial only in assessing the accomplice’s credibility and not as substantive evidence of the defendant’s guilt. Here, without considering whether the state court used an incorrect legal standard or applying “AEDPA’s deferential standard,” prejudice could not be shown in light of significant evidence of guilt independent of the accomplice, including an eyewitness and a surveillance photo of the crime identifying the defendant, as well as, the defendant’s friend’s testimony that the defendant confessed to him.

Jefferson v. Upton, 560 U.S. 284, 130 S.Ct. 2217 (2010) (per curiam). The state court rejected Jefferson’s claim of “constitutionally inadequate” assistance due to counsel’s failure “to investigate a traumatic head injury that he suffered as a child” because of “a finding that the attorneys were advised by an expert that such investigation was unnecessary.” The Eleventh Circuit erred in presuming this finding was correct, under pre-AEDPA law, without having fully considered the applicable exceptions to a presumption of correctness under 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d) and Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963). The court considered only whether the findings were “fairly supported by the record,” even though Jefferson had consistently argued that “the state court’s process was deficient” because: “those findings were drafted exclusively by the attorneys for the State pursuant to an ex parte request from the state-court judge, who made no such request of Jefferson, failed to notify Jefferson of the request made to opposing counsel, and adopted the State’s proposed opinion verbatim even though it recounted evidence from a nonexistent witness.” Remanded for further proceedings.

Padilla v. Kentucky*, 559 U.S. 356, 130 S.Ct. 1473 (2010). Padilla, a native of Honduras who had lived in the U.S. for 40 years legally and fought for the U.S. in the Vietnam War, pleaded guilty based on counsel’s incorrect advice that deportation was unlikely. Starting with the premise that “the negotiation of a plea bargain is a critical phase of litigation for purposes of the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel,” the Court found deficient conduct in counsel’s failure to advise Padilla that his conviction for drug distribution made him subject to automatic deportation. The Court declined to consider whether there is some “distinction between direct and collateral consequences” for Strickland purposes because of the “unique nature of deportation,” which is “an integral part—indeed, sometimes the most important part—of the penalty that may be imposed on noncitizen defendants who plead guilty to specified crimes.” “The first prong [of Strickland]—constitutional deficiency—is necessarily linked to the practices and expectations of the legal community,” described in Strickland as “prevailing professional norms.” While ABA standards and the like “are ‘only guides,’ and not inexorable commands,” these standards may be valuable measures of the prevailing professional norms of effective representation, especially as these standards have been adapted to deal with the intersection of modern criminal prosecutions and immigration law.” Here, the Court cited the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, NLADA standards, and others in finding, with some qualification, that “[t]he weight of prevailing professional norms supports the view that counsel must advise her client regarding the risk of deportation.”

When the law is not succinct and straightforward . . . , a criminal defense attorney need do no more than advise a noncitizen client that pending charges may carry a risk of adverse immigration consequences. But when the deportation consequence is truly clear, as it was in this case, the duty to give correct advice is equally clear.

In addressing whether there is a distinction between giving bad advice and no advice, the Court found “no relevant difference ‘between an act of commission and an act of omission’ in this context.” Case remanded for a determination of prejudice.

Wood v. Allen, 558 U.S. 290, 130 S.Ct. 841 (2010) (crimes in 1993 and direct appeal in 1996). Under AEDPA, the Court upheld the Eleventh Circuit’s finding that counsel was not ineffective in failing to pursue and present mitigating evidence of the defendant’s borderline mental retardation as the failure was a strategic decision rather than a negligent omission. The state court’s factual findings in denying relief were reasonable. Counsel were aware of a favorable expert report about low IQ, but that report also contained the expert’s conclusion that the defendant had a high level of adaptive functioning. In addition, the report contained details of the defendant’s 19 prior arrests and his attempt to murder a prior ex-girlfriend when the capital murder involved the killing of an ex-girlfriend. All of the defendant’s counsel read the report. Lead counsel told the counsel handling sentencing that nothing in the report merited further investigation. Sentencing counsel told the judge that counsel did not intend to introduce the expert report before the jury. Thus, the failure to present the report “was not mere oversight or neglect but was instead the result of a deliberate decision to focus on other defenses.” While Wood’s counsel asserted that counsel’s strategic judgment was not reasonable due to the failure to make a reasonable investigation of Wood’s mental deficiencies before deciding not to pursue or present such evidence, the Court declined to reach that question because the argument was not “fairly included” in the question presented: “Whether the state court reasonably determined that there was a strategic decision under § 2254(d)(2) is a different question from whether the strategic decision itself was a reasonable exercise of professional judgment under Strickland or whether the application of Strickland was reasonable under § 2254(d)(1).”

Smith v. Spisak, 558 U.S. 139, 130 S.Ct. 676 (2010) (sentenced in 1983). Without deciding whether “deference” to the state court decision was required under AEDPA, the Court reversed the Sixth Circuit’s finding of ineffective assistance due to an inadequate closing argument in the capital sentencing phase. Counsel described the crimes in detail, acknowledged that the defendant’s “admiration for Hitler inspired his crimes,” referred to the defendant as “sick,” “twisted,” and “demented,” and said that he would never change. Counsel did argue, however, that the defendant should not be executed due to mental illness (schizotypal and borderline personality disorders characterized by bizarre and paranoid thinking), despite the “substantial” aggravating factors. The Court assumed that counsel’s conduct was deficient, but found no prejudice, as the defendant admitted three murders and two other shootings by asserting a not guilty by reason of insanity plea. In addition, the defendant himself gave very damaging testimony admitting his “Aryan” admiration of Hitler and his crimes. He also testified that he would continue to commit similar crimes if he had the chance.

Porter v. McCollum, 558 U.S. 30, 130 S.Ct. 447 (2009) (per curiam) (sentenced in 1988). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The defendant, after proceeding pro se with stand-by counsel, plead guilty to shooting his former girlfriend. His stand-by counsel was appointed to represent him in sentencing and presented only his ex-wife’s testimony and an excerpt from a deposition. “The sum total of the mitigating evidence was inconsistent testimony about [the defendant’s] behavior when intoxicated and testimony that [he] had a good relationship with his son.” Id. at 33. No mental health evidence was presented and the trial court found no mitigating circumstances. Because the state court did not decide whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, the Court reviewed this element of the claim de novo. While “counsel had an ‘obligation to conduct a thorough investigation of the defendant’s background,’” id. at 39 (quoting Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 396 (2000)), counsel “did not satisfy those norms,” id. Counsel was appointed a month before sentencing and had only one short meeting with the defendant about the sentencing phase. “He did not obtain any of [the defendant’s] school, medical, or military service records or interview any members of [the defendant’s] family.” Where counsel in Wiggins failed to “expand[] their investigation,” counsel here “did not even take the first step of interviewing witnesses or requesting records.” Id. “[H]e ignored pertinent avenues for investigation of which he should have been aware.” Id. at 40. Even court-ordered competency evaluations revealed his limited education, his military service and combat record, and his father’s “over-discipline.” Id. While counsel asserted that the defendant was “fatalistic and uncooperative,” the defendant had instructed him not to talk to his ex-wife or son, but otherwise “did not give him any other instructions limiting the witnesses he could interview.” Id. In short, while the defendant “may have been fatalistic or uncooperative, . . . that does not obviate the need for defense counsel to conduct some sort of mitigation investigation.” Id. There was also prejudice. In short, the judge and jury at sentencing “heard almost nothing that would humanize [the defendant] or allow them to accurately gauge his moral culpability. They learned about [his] turbulent relationship with [the victim], his crimes, and almost nothing else.” Id. at 41. Evidence was available that the defendant had routinely witnessed his father beat his mother. He was also routinely beaten by his father, particularly when he tried to protect his mother. His father even shot at him once. He attended classes for slow learners and left school when he was 12 or 13. He joined the Army at 17 and fought in the Korean War. His company commander testified that he fought in two major battles within a 3 month period and was wounded in both. In one of the battles his unit suffered more than 50% casualties. He was individually decorated for his actions in both battles. When he returned to the U.S., he went AWOL and was sentenced to six months’ confinement, but he was honorably discharged. Id. at 33-34. After his discharge, he suffered from posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), which the Court noted is “not uncommon among veterans returning from combat,” as the Secretary of Veteran Affairs testified before Congress in 2009 “that approximately 23 percent of the Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans seeking treatment at a VA medical facility had been preliminarily diagnosed with PTSD.” Id. at 35 n.4. He also developed a serious drinking problem. An expert in neuropsychology also found that he suffered from “brain damage that could manifest in impulsive, violent behavior.” Id. at 36. The expert testified that two statutory mitigating circumstances were present: substantially impaired ability to conform conduct and extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

Unlike the evidence presented during [the defendant’s] penalty hearing, which left the jury knowing hardly anything about him other than the facts of his crimes, the new evidence described his abusive childhood, his heroic military service and the trauma he suffered because of it, his long-term substance abuse, and his impaired mental health and mental capacity.

Id. at 33. The aggravation evidence “[o]n the other side of the ledger” was not substantial. Id. at 41.

Had the judge and jury been able to place [the defendant’s] life history “on the mitigating side of the scale,” and appropriately reduced the ballast on the aggravating side of the scale, there is clearly a reasonable probability that the advisory jury—and the sentencing judge—“would have struck a different balance,” Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 537, and it is unreasonable to conclude otherwise.

Id. at 42. Thus, under AEDPA, the state court’s finding of no prejudice was “an unreasonable application of our clearly established law.” Id. at 44. The state court did not consider the expert testimony for purposes of nonstatutory mitigation and “unreasonably discounted the evidence of [the defendant’s] childhood abuse and military service.” Id. at 43. The evidence of childhood abuse “may have particular salience” in a case like this where the defendant killed his former girlfriend. Id. The military service was important as “[o]ur Nation has a long tradition of according leniency to veterans in recognition of their service, especially for those who fought on the front lines.” Id.

Capital Cases*

The military service was also relevant mitigation because of “the intense stress and mental and emotional toll that combat took.” Id. at 44.

Wong v. Belmontes, 558 U.S. 15, 130 S.Ct. 383 (2009) (per curiam) (sentenced in 1982). The Court reversed the Ninth Circuit’s finding of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The Court did not resolve whether counsel’s conduct was deficient because it found that prejudice was not established.

That showing requires [the defendant] to establish “a reasonable probability that a competent attorney, aware of [the available mitigating evidence], would have introduced it at sentencing,” and “that had the jury been confronted with this . . . mitigating evidence, there is a reasonable probability that it would have returned with a different sentence.”

Id. at 386 (quoting Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 535, 536 (2003)). The Court accepted the lower court’s conclusion that a reasonably competent lawyer would have introduced more mitigation evidence, but found no likelihood of a different result.

In evaluating that question, it is necessary to consider all the relevant evidence that the jury would have had before it if [counsel] had pursued the different path—not just the mitigation evidence [counsel] could have presented, but also the . . . [aggravation] evidence that almost certainly would have come in with it.

Id. In this case, counsel had put on nine lay witnesses for testimony spanning two days to testify about the defendant’s terrible childhood, with an alcoholic and abusive father, living in a small house, and not doing well in school. His younger sister died when she was only 10 months old and his grandmother drowned. He had plead guilty to accessory after the fact of murder and had a religious conversion in custody where he adapted well. The evidence counsel did not present was “merely cumulative” or “would have triggered admission” of powerful aggravation evidence in rebuttal. Id. at 387. Specifically, there was extensive evidence that the defendant had committed the prior “execution style” murder to which he plead guilty as an accessory. Id. at 385. He had boasted to several people and admitted to his counselor while in custody that he had committed the murder. Counsel had structured the mitigation evidence to keep this evidence out. There was no prejudice from not using expert testimony because the mitigating evidence “was neither complex nor technical” and the jury could “use its common sense or own sense of mercy” to “understand the ‘humanizing’ evidence.” Id. at 388. Moreover, presenting expert testimony would have opened the door to the evidence of the prior murder, which was the “elephant in the courtroom” kept out only by counsel’s careful presentation of the mitigation. Id. at 390.

Bobby v. Van Hook, 558 U.S. 4, 130 S.Ct. 13 (2009) (per curiam) (sentenced in 1985). In this pre-AEDPA case, the Court reversed the Sixth Circuit’s finding of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The Court reiterated that the Strickland “standard is necessarily a general one.” Id. at 7.

Capital Cases*

Restatements of professional standards . . . can be useful as “guides” to what reasonableness entails, but only to the extent they describe the professional norms prevailing when the representation took place.

Id. In this case, the Sixth Circuit erred by “relying on ABA guidelines announced 18 years after Van Hook went to trial” in 1985. Id. In short, “[t]he ABA standards in effect in 1985 described defense counsel’s duty to investigate both the merits and mitigating circumstances in general terms,” id., rather than the “detailed prescriptions for legal representation of capital defendants” in the 2003 Guidelines, id. at 8. It was error to judge counsel’s conduct based on the 2003 Guidelines and to treat the Guidelines “not merely as evidence of what reasonably diligent attorneys would do, but as inexorable commands with which all capital defense counsel ‘must fully comply.’” Id. The Court noted that it was expressing “no views” on how post-2003 representation should be judged, id. at 8 n.1, but declared here:

What we have said of state requirements is a fortiori true of standards set by private organizations: “While States are free to impose whatever specific rules they see fit to ensure that criminal defendants are well represented, we have held that the Federal Constitution imposes one general requirement: that counsel make objectively reasonable choices.” Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 479 (2000).

Id. at 9. The Court also held that, applying the appropriate standards, counsel was not ineffective. While the lower court held that counsel “began their mitigation investigation too late,” counsel had three months from the time of indictment to trial and “contacted their lay witnesses early and often,” including talking nine times with the defendant’s mother. Id. at 9. They contacted one of their experts a month before trial and met with the other expert a week before the trial court verdict. They attempted to obtain VA medical records seven weeks before trial. Id. They also “looked into enlisting a mitigation specialist when the trial was still five weeks away.” Id. at 10. The scope of counsel’s investigation was also not unreasonable. Counsel presented evidence that the defendant’s parents were “heavy drinkers” that encouraged his drug and alcohol use as a child and that he continued abusing drugs and alcohol into adulthood. Id. He grew up in a “combat zone” with his father holding his mother at gun and knife-point and engaging in “sexual violence.” Id. His drug and alcohol abuse resulted in him being forced out of the military. He had attempted suicide five times in the month before the murder. Id. There was also expert testimony about his diminished capacity at the time of the offenses—a “homosexual panic”—from his borderline personality disorder and drugs and alcohol. Id. at 10. While counsel did not interview a stepsister, two uncles, two aunts, and a psychiatrist that had treated the defendant’s mother, this conduct was not deficient. Id. at 10.

[T]here comes a point at which evidence from more distant relatives can reasonably be expected to be only cumulative, and the search for it distractive from more important duties. The ABA Standards prevailing at the time called for . . . counsel to cover several broad categories of mitigating evidence, which they did. And given all the evidence they unearthed from those closest to [the defendant’s] upbringing and the experts who reviewed his history, it was not unreasonable for his counsel not to identify and interview every other living family member or every therapist who once treated his parents.

Capital Cases*

Id. at 11 (citations omitted). In short, this was not a case like Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003), where counsel “failed to act while potentially powerful mitigating evidence stared them in the face,” or Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374 (2005), where evidence “would have been apparent from documents any reasonable attorney would have obtained.” Bobby, 558 U.S. at 11.

It is instead a case, like Strickland itself, in which defense counsel’s “decision not to seek more” mitigating evidence from the defendant’s background “than was already in hand” fell “well within the range of professionally reasonable judgments.”

Id. at 11-12 (quoting Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 699 (1984)). Finally, even if counsel’s conduct was deficient, there was no prejudice as only two witnesses “even arguably would have added new, relevant information.” Id. at 12. In addition, the lower court failed to consider the aggravation evidence “[o]n the other side of the scales,” id. at 12, which included a history of luring homosexual men into secluded settings to rob them many times in the past, as he did in this case that resulted in murder. Id. at 13.

Knowles v. Mirzayance*, 556 U.S. 111, 129 S.Ct. 1411 (2009). Reversing the Ninth Circuit’s holding, under AEDPA review, that the decision of the California Court of Appeal, that defendant was not deprived of effective assistance of counsel when his attorney recommended withdrawing his insanity defense, was not contrary to or an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, and defense counsel was not ineffective. Defendant was charged with murder and plead not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. Under California law, this required a bifurcated trial, first on guilt or innocence (with the burden of proof on the state) and then on insanity (with the burden of proof on the defendant. Although the defendant confessed, the defense first sought conviction only on the lesser included offense of second-degree murder based on the defendant’s inability to premeditate or deliberate. Counsel presented medical testimony in the guilt-or-innocence phase, but the jury rejected this evidence and convicted of first-degree murder. Counsel had intended to present the same medical testimony in the insanity phase, along with testimony of the defendant’s parents, but the parents refused to testify. On the advice of counsel, who believed it was unlikely the defense would prevail, the defendant withdrew the insanity plea. Following confusion from the Ninth Circuit’s remand, the Magistrate Judge and District Court granted relief and the Ninth Circuit affirmed even though it appeared that the District Court had “evaluated counsel’s strategy under a ‘nothing to lose’ standard,” meaning counsel had no true tactical reason for withdrawing the plea because there was “nothing to lose” in pursuing insanity. Even following the Supreme Court’s remand for consideration in light of Carey v. Musladin, 549 U.S. 70 (2006), the Ninth Circuit granted “because defense counsel’s failure to pursue the insanity defense constituted deficient performance as it ‘secured ... [n]o actual tactical advantage.’” The Supreme Court reversed.

The question “is not whether a federal court believes the state court’s determination” under the Strickland standard “was incorrect but whether that determination was unreasonable—a substantially higher threshold.” Schriro [v. Landrigan], 550 U.S. 465 (2007)]. And, because the Strickland standard is a general standard, a state court has even more latitude to reasonably determine that a defendant has not satisfied that standard. See Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 664, 124 S.Ct. 2140, 158 L.Ed.2d 938 (2004) (“[E]valuating whether a rule application was unreasonable requires considering the rule’s specificity. The more general the rule, the more leeway courts have in reaching outcomes in case-by-case determinations”).

129 S.Ct. at 1420.

We conclude that the state court’s decision to deny Mirzayance’s ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim did not violate clearly established federal law. The Court of Appeals reached a contrary result based, in large measure, on its application of an improper standard of review—it blamed counsel for abandoning the NGI claim because there was nothing to lose by pursuing it. But this Court has held on numerous occasions that it is not “an unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law” for a state court to decline to apply a specific legal rule that has not been squarely established by this Court. This Court has never established anything akin to the Court of Appeals’ “nothing to lose” standard for evaluating Strickland claims.

Id. at 1419 (citations omitted). The Court also rejected the Court’s “nothing to lose” reasoning: “Finding that counsel is deficient by abandoning a defense where there is nothing to gain from that abandonment is equivalent to finding that counsel is deficient by declining to pursue a strategy where there is nothing to lose from pursuit of that strategy.” Id. at 1419 n.3.

Under the doubly deferential judicial review that applies to a Strickland claim evaluated under the § 2254(d)(1) standard, see Yarborough v. Gentry, 540 U.S. 1, 5-6 (2003) (per curiam), Mirzayance’s ineffective-assistance claim fails. It was not unreasonable for the state court to conclude that his defense counsel’s performance was not deficient when he counseled Mirzayance to abandon a claim that stood almost no chance of success.

Id. at 1413. “Even if Mirzayance’s ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim were eligible for de novo review, it would still fail” under Strickland. Counsel’s conduct was not deficient because his counsel merely recommended the withdrawal of what he reasonably believed was a claim doomed to fail.” Counsel reasoned that “[t]he jury had already rejected medical testimony about Mirzayance’s mental state in the guilt phase, during which the State carried its burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt” and, thus, the defense could not meet its burden in the insanity phase because “there was almost no chance that the same jury would have reached a different result when considering similar evidence.” Id. at 1421. Counsel also believed the experts could be impeached for other reasons.

[W]e are aware of no “prevailing professional norms” that prevent counsel from recommending that a plea be withdrawn when it is almost certain to lose. And in this case, counsel did not give up “the only defense available.” Counsel put on a defense to first-degree murder during the guilt phase. Counsel also defended his client at the sentencing phase [where he received the lowest possible sentence for his first-degree murder conviction]. The law does not require counsel to raise every available nonfrivolous defense. Counsel also is not required to have a tactical reason-above and beyond a reasonable appraisal of a claim's dismal prospects for success-for recommending that a weak claim be dropped altogether.

Id. at 1421-22 (citations omitted). While the Court of Appeals faulted counsel for not persuading the reluctant parents to testify, the Magistrate Judge and District Court had found more than reluctance. They found refusal.

[C]ourts of appeals may not set aside a district court's factual findings unless those findings are clearly erroneous. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a); Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 573-574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985). Here, the Court of Appeals failed even to mention the clearly-erroneous standard, let alone apply it, before effectively overturning the lower court's factual findings related to counsel's behavior.

Id. at 1421. "Competence does not require an attorney to browbeat a reluctant witness into testifying, especially when the facts suggest that no amount of persuasion would have succeeded."

Id. There was also no prejudice. "It was highly improbable that a jury, which had just rejected testimony about Mirzayance's mental condition when the State bore the burden of proof, would have reached a different result when Mirzayance presented similar evidence at the NGI phase."

Wright v. Van Patten*, 552 U.S. 120, 128 S.Ct. 743 (2008) (per curiam). The Court vacated the Seventh Circuit's holding that the defendant had been denied the assistance of counsel under Cronic during his plea hearing for reckless homicide because his lawyer was not physically present "but was linked to the courtroom by speaker phone." Because the Court's precedents have not addressed this question, it could not be said that the state courts had unreasonably applied clearly established Federal law under AEDPA in applying Strickland rather than Cronic as the Seventh Circuit did.

Schriro v. Landrigan, 550 U.S. 465, 127 S.Ct. 1933 (2007) (1989 offense, 1993 direct appeal, 1995 state post-conviction proceeding). The Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's grant of an evidentiary hearing on the question of whether counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation despite the defendant's instruction to counsel not to offer any mitigating evidence. In sentencing, counsel attempted to present the testimony of the defendant's ex-wife and birth mother, but, at the defendant's request, both refused to testify. The defendant also informed the court that he did not want to present any mitigating evidence. Counsel proffered that the witnesses would have testified that the defendant's birth mother used drugs and alcohol (including while she was pregnant with the defendant), that the defendant had abused drugs and alcohol, and that he had been a good father. When counsel tried to proffer additional mitigating evidence, the defendant "would have none of it" and contradicted counsel. The defendant also informed the court that "if you want to give me the death penalty, just bring it right on. I'm ready for it." In reversing the Ninth Circuit, the Court held that, if the defendant "instructed his counsel not to offer any mitigating evidence" then "counsel's failure to investigate further could not have been prejudicial under Strickland.” 127 S.Ct. at 1941. The Court also rejected the Ninth Circuit’s finding that, “due to counsel’s failure to investigate, [the defendant] could not have known about the mitigating evidence he now wants to explore.” This finding was rejected because the proffered evidence “overlaps” with the evidence relied on in the habeas proceedings and because it was plain from the transcript “that Landrigan would have undermined the presentation of any mitigating evidence that his attorney might have uncovered.” Id.

In short, at the time of the Arizona postconviction court’s decision, it was not objectively unreasonable for that court to conclude that a defendant who refused to allow the presentation of any mitigating evidence could not establish Strickland prejudice based on his counsel’s failure to investigate further possible mitigating evidence.

Id. at 1942. The Court also rejected the Ninth Circuit’s finding that the decision not to present mitigation was informed and knowing. “We have never imposed an ‘informed and knowing’ requirement upon a defendant’s decision not to introduce evidence. Even assuming, however, that an ‘informed and knowing’ requirement exists in this case, Landrigan cannot benefit from it. . . .” Id. (citation omitted). First, this issue was not raised in state court. Second, counsel informed the trial court that he had carefully explained the importance of mitigation to the defendant and it is “doubtful that Landrigan would have sat idly by” if this were not true. Finally, Landrigan’s final statement to the court to “bring it right on” clearly indicates the defendant understood the consequences of not presenting mitigation. Finally, the Court rejected the Ninth Circuit’s finding of a “colorable” showing of prejudice because most of the evidence available could have been presented through the defendant’s birth mother and ex-wife and was proffered to the sentencing court anyway. Thus, “[t]he District Court could reasonably conclude that any additional evidence would have made no difference in the sentencing.” Id. at 1943. The “mitigation evidence was weak,” the defendant had an “exceedingly violent past” (“before he was 30 years of age, Landrigan had murdered one man, repeatedly stabbed another one, escaped from prison, and within two months murdered still another man”), the defendant showed no remorse, and the defendant was “belligerent” and “flaunted his menacing behavior.” In sum, “[o]n this record, assuring the court that genetics made him the way he is could not have been very helpful.”

*Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, 125 S.Ct. 2456 (2005) (1988 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing “to make reasonable efforts to obtain and review material that counsel [knew] the prosecution [would] probably rely on as evidence of aggravation at the sentencing phase of the trial,” id. at 377, which would have led to significant mitigation. Counsel interviewed the defendant, who provided minimal assistance in mitigation and “was actively obstructive by sending counsel off on false leads,” id. at 381, and a few of the defendant’s family members, and reviewed the reports of court-appointed examiners, who assessed only competence and capacity at the time of the offenses. Finding nothing “particularly helpful” in these sources, id., counsel did not conduct additional investigation for information “that might have cast light on [the defendant’s] mental condition,” id. at 382. Counsel also did not obtain the file of a prior conviction for rape and assault, even though counsel knew the state intended to rely on the aggravating circumstance of a significant history of felony convictions indicating the use or threat of violence and knew that the state specifically intended to read the testimony of the prior rape victim into evidence in sentencing. In mitigation, the defense presented brief testimony from the defendant's family members, who "argued in effect for residual doubt, and beseeched the jury for mercy." Id. at 378. In addressing the ineffective assistance claim, the Court noted that, in a capital sentencing, "defense counsel's job is to counter the State's evidence of aggravated culpability with evidence in mitigation." Id. at 380-81. While "reasonably diligent counsel may draw a line when they have good reason to think further investigation would be a waste," id. at 383, counsel's conduct in this case was "deficient in failing to examine the court file," id., on the prior conviction because counsel knew the state intended to rely on it and "the prior conviction file was a public document, readily available for the asking at the very courthouse where [the defendant] was to be tried," id. at 384. While counsel opposed admission of the evidence, this was insufficient because "[c]ounsel's obligation to rebut aggravating evidence extended beyond arguing it ought to be kept out." Id. at 386 n.5. Here, despite knowing of the state's intent to rely on the evidence, counsel did not look at any part of the file, until the day before the sentencing phase began and then looked only at the transcript of the victim's testimony. The obligation to review the remainder of the file was particularly pressing here owing to the similarity of the violent prior offense to the crime charged and [the defendant's] sentencing strategy stressing residual doubt. Without making efforts to learn the details and rebut the relevance of the earlier crime, a convincing argument for residual doubt was certainly beyond any hope.

Id. at 386. In reaching this conclusion, the Court emphasized "[t]he ease with which counsel could examine the entire file. . . . Suffice it to say that when the State has warehouses of records available in a particular case, review of counsel's performance will call for greater subtlety." Id. at 386 n.5. The Court also noted that "[t]he notion that defense counsel must obtain information that the State has and will use against the defendant is not simply a matter of common sense." Id. at 387. It is described "in terms no one could misunderstand" in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice "in circulation," id., at the time of trial and the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases promulgated in 1989, "shortly after" this trial, and made "even more explicit" in the 2003 revisions. Id. at 387 n.7. "[I]n any case, [we] cannot think of any situation in which defense counsel should not make some effort to learn the information in the possession of the prosecution and law enforcement authorities." Id. at 387 n.6. The state court's application of Strickland was objectively unreasonable because the court reasoned that "defense counsel's efforts to find mitigating evidence by other means excused them from looking at the prior conviction file." Id. at 388. The Court rejected this reasoning because "[n]o reasonable lawyer would forgo examination of the file thinking he could do as well by asking the defendant or family relations whether they recalled anything helpful or damaging in the prior victim's testimony." Id. at 389. Counsel is not required to look for a needle in a haystack, when a lawyer truly has reason to doubt there is any needle there. But looking at a file the prosecution says it will use is a sure bet: whatever may be in that file is going to tell the defense counsel something about what the prosecution can produce.

Capital Cases*

Id. The Court cautioned, however, that, although counsel's conduct was unreasonable in the circumstances of this case, a different result might be obtained in other situations "where a defense lawyer is not charged with knowledge that the prosecutor intends to use a prior conviction in this way." Id. at 390. Because the state court never reached the question of prejudice, the Court examined this issue "de novo." Id. Prejudice was uncontested by the Commonwealth and the Court found prejudice. If counsel had looked in the file, counsel would have discovered "mitigation leads that no other source had opened up," id., including information that the defendant grew up in a "slum environment" and had numerous prior incarcerations for offenses "often of assaultive nature and commonly related to over-indulgence in alcoholic beverages," id. at 391. The file also contained information "pointing to schizophrenia and other disorders, and test scores showing a third grade level of cognition after nine years of schooling." Id. "The jury never heard even of this and neither did the mental health experts who examined [the defendant] before trial." Id. at 392. If the experts had reviewed these records, they (like "their post-conviction counterparts") would have "found plenty of 'red flags' pointing up to a need to test further." Id. This testing would have established that (1) the defendant "suffers from organic brain damage, an extreme mental disturbance significantly impairing several of his cognitive functions"; (2) the impairments probably resulted from "fetal alcohol syndrome" and, thus, existed since childhood.; and (3) the defendant's capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the law was substantially impaired at the time of the offenses. Id. "These finds in turn would probably have prompted a look at school and juvenile records, all of them easy to get," which showed that (1) the defendant's mother was often missing from the home for a week or more at a time when the defendant was 16; (2) the defendant's mother was frequently drunk and "the children have always been poorly kept and on the filthy side which was also the condition of the home at all times"); and (3) the defendant's "IQ was in the mentally retarded range." Id. at 393. "This evidence adds up to a mitigation case that bears no relation to the few naked pleas for mercy actually put before the jury" and "'might well have influenced the jury's appraisal' of . . . culpability." Id. (quoting Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 538 (2003) and Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 398 (2000)).

Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 125 S.Ct. 551 (2004). Trial counsel's "failure to obtain the defendant's express consent to a strategy of conceding guilt in a capital trial" is not automatically deficient performance and must be evaluated under the Strickland test rather than under the Cronic test. The Court recognized that some decisions concerning "basic trial rights" must be made by the defendant and require that "an attorney must both consult with the defendant and obtain consent to the recommended course of action." These basic trial rights include the determination of "whether to plead guilty, waive a jury, testify in his or her own behalf, or take an appeal." Id. (quoting Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751 (1983)). For other matters, "[a]n attorney undoubtedly has a duty to consult with the client regarding 'important decisions,' including questions of overarching defense strategy," id. (citing Strickland, 466 U.S. at 688), but this "obligation . . . does not require counsel to obtain the defendant's consent to 'every tactical decision,'" id. (citing Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S.400, 417-418 (1988) (an attorney has authority to manage most aspects of the defense without obtaining his client's approval)). With respect to capital cases, the court recognized that the gravity of the potential sentence in a capital trial and the proceeding's two-phase structure vitally affect counsel's strategic calculus. Attorneys representing capital defendants face daunting challenges in developing trial strategies, not least because the defendant's guilt is often clear. Prosecutors are more likely to seek the death penalty, and to refuse to accept a plea to a life sentence, when the evidence is overwhelming and the crime heinous. In such cases, "avoiding execution [may be] the best and only realistic result possible." ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Defense Counsel in Death Penalty Cases § 10.9.1, Commentary (rev. ed.2003), reprinted in 31 Hofstra L.Rev. 913, 1040 (2003).

Id. In circumstances where guilt is clear, counsel must "strive at the guilt phase to avoid a counterproductive course," id., such as presenting logically inconsistent strategies in the trial and sentencing. Id. (citing, inter alia, Lyon, Defending the Death Penalty Case: What Makes Death Different?, 42 Mercer L.Rev. 695, 708 (1991) ("It is not good to put on a 'he didn't do it' defense and a 'he is sorry he did it' mitigation. This just does not work. The jury will give the death penalty to the client and, in essence, the attorney.")). Thus, "[c]ounsel . . . may reasonably decide to focus on the trial's penalty phase," id., and "counsel cannot be deemed ineffective for attempting to impress the jury with his candor and his unwillingness to engage in 'a useless charade.'"

To summarize, in a capital case, counsel must consider in conjunction both the guilt and penalty phases in determining how best to proceed. When counsel informs the defendant of the strategy counsel believes to be in the defendant's best interest and the defendant is unresponsive, counsel's strategic choice is not impeded by any blanket rule demanding the defendant's explicit consent. Instead, if counsel's strategy, given the evidence bearing on the defendant's guilt, satisfies the Strickland standard, that is the end of the matter; no tenable claim of ineffective assistance would remain.

Id.

Holland v. Jackson*, 542 U.S. 649, 124 S.Ct. 2736 (2004) (per curiam). The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals erred in finding that the state court decision denying relief on the basis of an ineffective assistance of counsel claim was an "unreasonable application" or "contrary to" Strickland. The petitioner in a murder case sought state post-conviction relief on the basis of counsel's failure to adequately investigate. The court denied relief. Afterwards, the petitioner filed a motion to reopen on the basis of "newly discovered evidence" and attaching an affidavit that would have contradicted the testimony of the state's primary witness. On appeal, the state court held that the affidavit was not properly before the court. Alternatively, the court stated it would deny relief on the merits. "[W]hether a state court's decision was unreasonable must be assessed in light of the record the court had before it." Here, the District Court and the Court of Appeals made no findings warranting the admission of new evidence buttressing a previously rejected claim. Instead, the Court of Appeals "simply ignored entirely the state court's independent ground for its decision, that [the] statement was not properly before it." Thus, the court erred in finding that the state court's decision was an unreasonable application of Strickland. The court also erred in finding that the state court's decision was "contrary to" Strickland (in three instances) due to imposition of a different burden of proof on prejudice than "reasonable probability." The important holding here is that “the unadorned word ‘probably’ is permissible shorthand when the complete Strickland standard is elsewhere recited.”

Yarborough v. Gentry*, 540 U.S. 1, 124 S.Ct. 1 (2003) (per curiam). The Court reversed the Ninth Circuit’s grant of relief because the state court determination that counsel was not ineffective was not objectively unreasonable under the AEDPA. The defendant had been convicted of assault with a deadly weapon for stabbing his girlfriend. On appeal, he argued that his trial counsel’s closing argument deprived him of his right to effective assistance of counsel. The state court denied relief, as did the federal district court, but the Ninth Circuit reversed. The court held that the right to effective assistance extends to closing arguments. Nonetheless, counsel has wide latitude in deciding how best to represent a client, and deference to counsel’s tactical decisions in his closing presentation is particularly important because of the broad range of legitimate defense strategy at that stage. Closing arguments should “sharpen and clarify the issues for resolution by the trier of fact,” but which issues to sharpen and how best to clarify them are questions with many reasonable answers. Indeed, it might sometimes make sense to forgo closing arguments altogether. Judicial review of a defense attorney’s summation is therefore highly deferential – and doubly deferential when it is conducted through the lens of federal habeas. The Court found that the Ninth Circuit erred in finding the state court decision to be objectively unreasonable. While the Ninth Circuit found and relied on the fact that counsel did not highlight a number of potential exculpatory pieces of evidence, the Court found “these other potential arguments do not establish that the state court’s decision was unreasonable.” Relying on a number of law review articles and treatises, the court found that “focusing on a small number of key points may be more persuasive than a shotgun approach.” “In short, judicious selection of arguments for summation is a core exercise of defense counsel’s discretion.” “When counsel focuses on some issues to the exclusion of others, there is a strong presumption that he did so for tactical reasons rather than through sheer neglect.” That presumption has particular force where a petitioner bases his ineffective assistance claim solely on the trial record, creating a situation in which a court “may have no way of knowing whether a seemingly unusual or misguided action had a sound strategic motive.” Here, “counsel plainly put to the jury the centerpiece of his case.” The court also found that counsel’s argument was not deficient in reminding the jury of evidence of the defendant’s bad character but also stating that evidence was legally irrelevant. “This is precisely the sort of calculated risk that lies at the heart of an advocate’s discretion. By candidly acknowledging his client’s shortcomings, counsel might have built credibility with the jury and persuaded it to focus on the relevant issues in the case.” The Court also found that counsel’s conduct in making only a passive request that the jury reach some verdict was not unreasonable. “Given a patronizing and overconfident summation by a prosecutor, a low-key strategy that stresses the jury’s autonomy is not unreasonable.” The Court also rejected the Ninth Circuit’s finding that counsel was ineffective for failing to argue explicitly that the government had failed to prove its case. The court held “[c]ounsel’s entire presentation, however made just that point.” Finally, the Court rejected the Ninth Circuit’s finding of ineffectiveness because counsel admitted that he did not know the truth which implied that he did not even believe his client’s testimony. The Court held, however, “there is nothing wrong with a rhetorical device that personalizes the doubt anyone but an eyewitness must necessarily have. Winning over an audience by empathy is a technique that dates back to Aristotle.” In sum, the Court found that the Ninth Circuit’s decision “gives too little deference to the state courts that have primary responsibility for supervising defense counsel in state criminal trials.”

Capital Cases*

Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 123 S.Ct. 2527 (2003). Counsel ineffective in capital habeas case, decided under the AEDPA, for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel relied on arguments that the defendant was not directly responsible for the murder and did not present any social history or other mitigation, despite knowledge of at least some of the defendant's background information. The issue before the Court was "whether the investigation supporting counsel's decision not to introduce mitigating evidence of Wiggins' background was itself reasonable." Id. at 523 (emphasis in original). "In assessing counsel's investigation, we must conduct an objective review of their performance, measured for 'reasonableness under prevailing professional norms,' which includes a context-dependent consideration of the challenged conduct as seen 'from counsel's perspective at the time.'" Id. (quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 688). In this case, where counsel had only limited records available and did not investigate further, counsel's conduct "fell short of the professional standards that prevailed in Maryland in 1989," because no "social history report" was prepared even though counsel had funds available to retain a "forensic social worker." Id. at 524.

Counsel's conduct similarly fell short of the standards for capital defense work articulated by the American Bar Association (ABA) – standards to which we have referred as "guides to determining what is reasonable." Strickland, supra, at 688; Williams v. Taylor, supra, at 396. The ABA Guidelines provide that investigations into mitigating evidence "should comprise efforts to discover all reasonably available mitigating evidence and evidence to rebut any aggravating evidence that may be introduced by the prosecutor." ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases 11.4.I(c), p. 93 (1989) (emphasis added).

Id. "Despite these well-defined norms, . . . , counsel abandoned their investigation of petitioner's background after having acquired only rudimentary knowledge of his history from a narrow set of sources." Id. (citing the ABA standards again). The Court found that "[t]he scope of their investigation was also unreasonable in light of what counsel actually discovered" in the records available to them, "particularly given the apparent absence of any aggravating factors in petitioner's background." Id. at 525 (citation omitted).

In assessing the reasonableness of an attorney's investigation, . . . , a court must consider not only the quantum of evidence already known to counsel, but also whether the known evidence would lead a reasonable attorney to investigate further.

Even assuming [counsel] limited the scope of their investigation for strategic reasons, Strickland does not establish that a cursory investigation automatically justifies a tactical decision with respect to sentencing strategy. Rather, a reviewing court must consider the reasonableness of the investigation said to support the strategy.

Id. at 527. In this case, "counsel were not in a position to make a reasonable strategic choice . . . because the investigation supporting their choice was unreasonable." Id. at _____. "In assessing prejudice, we reweigh the evidence in aggravation against the totality of available mitigation evidence.” Id. at 536. “[W]e evaluate the totality of the evidence – ‘both that adduced at trial, and the evidence adduced in the habeas proceeding[s].’” Id. (quoting Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. at 397-98). Prejudice was found here because counsel did not discover “powerful” evidence of “physical torment, sexual molestation, and repeated rape,” as well as, alcoholic parents, foster homes, homelessness, and “diminished mental capacities.” Id. at 535. “Had the jury been able to place petitioner’s excruciating life history on the mitigating side of the scale, there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have struck a difference balance.” Id. at 537. While Williams v. Taylor had not been decided at the time of the state court decision, the Court held that it “made no new law” in Williams v. Taylor and had just applied Strickland to conclude that “counsel’s failure to uncover and present voluminous mitigating evidence at sentencing could not be justified as a tactical decision . . . , because counsel had not ‘fulfill[ed] their obligation to conduct a thorough investigation of the defendant’s background.’” Id. at 522 (quoting Williams, 529 U.S. at 396). Like in Williams, the state court decision here was “objectively unreasonable,” id. at 527, and an unreasonable application of Strickland (under the AEDPA standards) because the state court did not conduct an assessment of whether the decision to cease all investigation . . . actually demonstrated reasonable professional judgment. The state court merely assumed that the investigation was adequate. In light of what the . . . [available] records actually revealed, however, counsel chose to abandon their investigation at an unreasonable juncture, making a fully informed decision with respect to sentencing strategy impossible.

Id. at 527-28. The state court decision was also an unreasonable application of the facts to the law because the state court erroneously concluded that the [available] . . . records reflected sexual abuse, when the records did not mention it at all, “much less . . . the repeated molestations and rapes of petitioner. . . .” Id. at 528. The state court conclusion was proven to be incorrect by clear and convincing evidence as required by 28 U.S.C. 2254(e)(1). The facts are discussed in more detail below in the capital sentencing section

I. TRIAL PHASE

A. NUMEROUS DEFICIENCIES AND INADEQUATE DEFENSE

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Upshaw v. Stephenson, 97 F.4th 365 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 145 S.Ct. 175 (2024). In armed robbery case, affirming grant of habeas relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to investigate alibi witnesses. (The appeals court also affirmed the grant of relief on a Batson claim.) The robbery occurred just after 3:35 a.m., at a gas station located approximately three and a half miles from petitioner’s home. A man later identified as Darnell Walker was standing near the coffee machine when the robbery occurred. The masked robber demanded money from a patron and then fired his gun repeatedly after the gas station employee, Tina Williams, locked herself in a bullet-proof glass “cage.” When the robber aimed his gun at Walker, Walker did not run but instead urged the employee to unlock the cash to stop the shooting. A few hours after the incident, petitioner and Walker were arrested invading a police officer’s home. Five days later, Williams identified petitioner in a police photo array as the gas station robber. Petitioner entered a plea on the home invasion case but went to trial on the gas station robbery. Although petitioner provided trial counsel with the names of alibi witnesses, including his aunt and grandmother, trial counsel never contacted them. Trial counsel did call petitioner’s boss who testified to dropping petitioner off at petitioner’s home between 3:15 and 3:20 a.m. Nevertheless, petitioner was convicted. The aunt and grandmother could have corroborated petitioner’s arrival home at the time provided by the employer and petitioner’s presence there for the next half hour or so. In denying relief, the state court impermissibly collapsed Strickland’s two prongs into a single question concerning the strength of the undeveloped alibi evidence. The state court discounted the importance of petitioner’s grandmother because she did not see petitioner at the exact time of the robbery. This was an unreasonable factual determination given that the grandmother stated she was with petitioner, who did not have a car, between 3:20 and 3:30 a.m., making it impossible for him to get to the gas station three and half miles away by the time of the robbery at 3:37 a.m. The state court record was devoid of any basis to defend counsel’s inaction. Trial counsel performed deficiently and the state court unreasonably applied Strickland. Prejudice is also established on the state court record, which showed that the prosecution’s case “was not overwhelming.” Other than Williams’ testimony, the only evidence against petitioner was that he had been arrested for home invasion with Walker several hours after the gas station was robbed. The alibi witnesses that petitioner provided but were ignored by defense counsel could have accounted for petitioner’s whereabouts at the time of the crime, up until he left the home and became involved in the home invasion. This created the requisite substantial likelihood of a more favorable result had at least one of the missing alibi witnesses been called. The finding of prejudice was supported by other factual discrepancies in the record. Although Williams testified that the masked robber wore blue sneakers and carried a gun, petitioner’s boss said that petitioner was wearing tan Timberlands and that he had never observed petitioner “wearing purple gym shoes.” The officer who apprehended petitioner hours after the robbery stated that petitioner was wearing tan Timberlands and did not smell like gunpowder, nor did he carry a gun or any shell casings.

2023: Rogers v. Superintendent, 80 F.4th 458 (3rd Cir. 2023). In murder prosecution where the victim was a bystander who was killed during a shootout between petitioner, co-defendant Hayes, and a third man, trial counsel was ineffective by sitting silently while the trial judge admonished a witness, Singleton, about testimony that was favorable to petitioner but contrary to Singleton's prior testimony at Hayes's trial, and offered no arguments when Singleton later changed his testimony. At issue was whether Hayes or petitioner initiated the gun fight. Singleton was a passenger in Hayes's car and he testified at Hayes's trial that petitioner shot first. Hayes was acquitted. At petitioner's later trial, Singleton initially testified that it was Hayes who initiated the gun battle. Shortly thereafter, the trial judge ended proceedings early for the day. After excusing the jury, the judge admonished Singleton for his inconsistent testimony, accusing him of committing perjury. The judge "warned Singleton that if he was 'playing some little game here,' the judge would ensure he 'receive[d] a maximum consecutive sentence' for perjury." (Citation omitted.) Prior to dismissing Singleton, "the judge advised him to '[d]o some long hard thinking' before resuming his testimony, because if he 'sa[id]that [Hayes shot first] again, it is [p]erjury.'" (Citation omitted.) Petitioner's counsel said nothing in response to the judge's reprimand. The following day, the prosecutor led Singleton to testify that it was in fact petitioner who fired the initial shot and his previous testimony to the contrary was a mistake due to his nervousness. Again, defense counsel offered no objection and did not cross-examine Singleton about his revised account of the crime. At the close of trial, the jury was instructed on both self-defense and unreasonable belief voluntary manslaughter but returned with a conviction for third-degree murder. In state post-conviction proceedings, the post-conviction court credited defense counsel's explanation for his inaction – that Singleton lacked credibility no matter how he testified and counsel wanted to rely on an independent eyewitness, Summers. Missing from this explanation was any acknowledgment of Summers's testimony at Hayes's trial, where she had retreated from her identification of Hayes as the first shooter and claimed that she was looking down when she heard the shots being fired. Indeed, trial counsel could not recall watching Summers testify at the Hayes trial or reviewing the trial transcript. (At petitioner's trial, Summers repeated her testimony that she was looking at the ground when the gun battle began.) Because the state post-conviction court "unreasonably applied Strickland when it found counsel's performance adequate, having failed to properly 'consider prevailing professional standards,'" the Third Circuit affords its decision no deference. (Internal citation omitted.) Applying de novo review, the Third Circuit concludes that trial counsel was deficient. Trial counsel stated that he viewed the admonishments by the trial judge to be unproblematic. Existing state precedent, however, had found such behavior to constitute reversible error. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court itself had proscribed questioning from the bench that "clearly convey[s] the impression that the trial court d[oes] not believe [a witness'] trial testimony" or puts "pressure [on] a witness to testify in a particular way." (Citation omitted.) Thus, trial counsel's belief that the trial judge's actions were permissible was unreasonable. "[C]ounsel has a 'duty to investigate' the applicable law when formulating his strategy, and counsel could have corrected his mistaken beliefs through basic research." Regarding the failure to cross-examine Singleton on his changed testimony, trial counsel's dismissal of the importance of Singleton as a witness was unjustified. And "[t]he significance of Singleton's testimony increased when Summers—the only other eyewitness at trial—disclaimed seeing who shot first. A key retreat for which [petitioner's] counsel should have been prepared, given

Capital Case*

Summers's equivocation the week prior at Hayes's trial."

Rather than gamble the defense on Summers, a reasonable defense attorney would, at the very least, cross-examine the prosecution's central witness regarding why he changed his initially favorable testimony. . . . Failing to do so was unreasonable "under prevailing professional norms."

(Citations omitted.) As for prejudice, the state post-conviction court applied a standard higher than mandated by Strickland, rendering its finding of no prejudice contrary to clearly established federal law.

Analyzing the prejudice claim de novo, we conclude that [petitioner] has carried his burden. Had [trial] counsel objected to the trial judge's admonishment of Singleton and cross-examined Singleton about his changed testimony, "a reasonable probability" exists that "the result of the proceeding would have been different." (Citation omitted.) Had the jury learned of the admonishment, it might have concluded that the trial judge's threats of perjury persuaded Singleton to change course. A logical inference under the circumstances, considering that Hayes had been acquitted for the murder and Singleton admitted that his "initial purpose" in cooperating with authorities "was to help [Hayes], to make a statement for [Hayes]." (Citation omitted.) Or the jury might have discredited Singleton's testimony altogether, undermining a key part of the prosecution's case against [petitioner]. Either way, counsel's failures surrounding the admonishment are "sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome" of the trial. (Citation omitted.) And without Singleton's testimony against [petitioner], the prosecution's remaining evidence was negligible.

The denial of habeas relief is reversed.

Neal v. Vannoy, 78 F.4th 775 (5th Cir. 2023) (2009 trial and sentencing). Affirming grant of relief in Louisiana double murder case where the primary issue was the identity of the person who fired the murder weapon and trial counsel failed to utilize: (1) a serology report indicating the possible presence of blood on the shoes of key prosecution witness Darby on the night of the murder; (2) a forensic report showing petitioner's shoes were excluded as the source of the bloody shoeprint found at the scene, whereas the shoes of his half-brother, Zannie, could not be excluded as the source; and (3) an inconsistent prior statement of Darby, wherein Darby told the police petitioner did not have a gun when he exited the vehicle at the home where the killings occurred. Although the state post-conviction court made a factual finding that trial counsel's omissions were strategic, this finding was rebutted by clear and convincing evidence, i.e., the declaration by trial counsel submitted in the state post-conviction proceeding admitting that he neither reviewed the physical or forensic evidence nor utilized expert assistance. (In the declaration, trial counsel also stated that he could not recall having seen the serology or shoeprint reports and claimed he would have used them if he had them. The state post-conviction court, however, found that the evidence had been disclosed to counsel, thereby defeating petitioner's alternative Brady claim.) There was no evidence in the state court record contradicting trial counsel's assertions about the relevant reports and the record showed that utilizing the forensic reports would have been consistent with the trial defense, which revolved around impeaching Darby's credibility. In determining whether trial counsel performed deficiently, the evidence trial counsel failed to utilize is examined in light of the competing trial theories. The prosecution's theory that petitioner was the shooter was based primarily on Darby's testimony that petitioner exited the vehicle with an AK-47 and petitioner and Zannie then entered the residence where the killings occurred. (Darby made a deal with the prosecution in exchange for his testimony against petitioner.) The defense theory, in contrast, was that petitioner waited in the vehicle while Darby and Zannie went inside the house where Darby then shot the victims. The defense version of events was supported by the only eyewitness who testified. This eyewitness described the shooter as matching a physical description of Darby rather than petitioner. Because of the importance of undermining Darby's testimony, it was deficient performance not to have used the serology report that indicated that blood may have been present on Darby's shoes. That the prosecution could have attempted to explain away the finding does not excuse counsel's omission. Nor does the record support a finding that counsel wanted to avoid revealing the possible blood found on petitioner's boots. "Trial counsel repeatedly asked broad, open-ended questions to the prosecution's witnesses regarding the forensic evidence without any concern for 'risk.'" Regarding the evidence that Zannie could not be excluded as the source of the bloody shoeprint, respondent contended that trial counsel could have decided not to elicit that fact because it supported Darby's claim that Zannie entered the home. The evidence, however, had to be "viewed together, not in isolation."

If counsel had reviewed and investigated the shoeprint and serology analysis, he could have argued to the jury that out of the three codefendants, Zannie's and Darby's shoes placed them at the scene. These analyses would have supported the defense theory, which featured Darby as the shooter and Zannie as the second person in the house. Trial counsel's failure to bring that to the jury's attention was inconsistent with his actual trial strategy.

Finally, trial counsel was deficient in failing to impeach Darby with his statement during a police interview that he did not observe petitioner with a weapon when he exited the vehicle. Although trial counsel was not provided with the interview tape until shortly before cross-examining Darby, trial counsel should have been on notice that Darby was going to testify that he saw [petitioner] exit the vehicle holding the murder weapon. During the State's opening statement, the prosecutor stated, 'as [petitioner] [and Zannie] get out [of the vehicle], [Darby's] going to tell you he sees [petitioner] with that Mack 90, semi-automatic rifle; and [Zannie] leave the car and walk down the street.'" Trial counsel should have immediately noted this material inconsistency in Darby's February 22 interview when he listened to the tape, and he should have introduced it during cross examination.

Utilizing the interview would have furthered the defense theory that Darby was a liar and the true killer. In finding prejudice from trial counsel's deficiencies, it is noted that first degree murder includes the element of specific intent to kill. Unpersuasive is respondent's contention that other circumstantial evidence corroborated petitioner's identity as the shooter and his specific intent to kill the victims. Specifically, respondent pointed to petitioner's fleeing the scene of the homicides immediately after those homicides occurred, while in possession of the gun used to commit those homicides, and then shooting at the officers from the car while they were pursuing him. The three key pieces of evidence that trial counsel failed to utilize "at the very least, create a 'reasonable probability that, absent the errors, the factfinder would have had a reasonable doubt respecting guilt.'" (Citation omitted.) Further, the state court's decision finding no prejudice was unreasonable, as "no fairminded jurist could have reached the same judgment as the state court." (Citation omitted.)

2022: Hewitt-El v. Burgess, 53 F.4th 969 (6th Cir. 2022). Affirming grant of habeas relief in case involving armed robbery and related offenses where trial counsel failed to present an available alibi defense because of counsel's mistake of fact and counsel failed to seek exclusion of petitioner's prior armed robbery convictions because of counsel's mistake of law. The convictions at issue were based solely on the testimony of the victim. Three witnesses were available to testify in support of petitioner's alibi that he was at home, almost a half-hour from the crime scene, when the crime occurred. Trial counsel failed to call any of these witnesses at trial because counsel mistakenly believed that the crime occurred between noon and 12:30 p.m., when petitioner was at home alone. The victim twice testified, however, each time in defense counsel's presence, that the crime occurred at 1:00 or 1:30 p.m. At that time, all three witnesses were present at petitioner's home. And because defense counsel believed that evidence of petitioner's prior convictions would unavoidably come in at trial, when in fact that evidence almost certainly would have been excluded with a proper motion, defense counsel reminded the jury again and again that his client had been convicted of armed robbery five times before. Prior to trial, petitioner disclosed to trial counsel that several people could confirm that he was at his own home at the time of the shooting. When the case proceeded to trial, petitioner sought new counsel due to the failure to defense counsel to pursue the alibi witnesses. Defense counsel informed the court that he had contact with one or two of them and that they would not be witnesses for petitioner. He also indicated that he expected witnesses to contact him. The request for new counsel was denied. At trial, the victim testified that a third man shot the victim at petitioner's direction after the two men robbed him. In opening and closing statements, and during examination of petitioner, defense counsel repeatedly brought up petitioner's criminal history. Regarding the offense, petitioner testified that the victim had called him asking to purchase Vicodin. According to petitioner, he provided the victim with contact information for the third party to make the drug buy. Defense counsel then brought out from petitioner that the victim called him back between 12:00 and 12:30 p.m. to confirm that he had connected with the third party and that petitioner was alone at the time preparing a Valentine's Day dinner for his fiancée. Defense counsel failed to elicit from petitioner that three people were with him between 1:00 and 1:30 p.m. The jury took less than an hour to convict petitioner. Although petitioner was granted a new trial by the trial court on his ineffective assistance of counsel claims, the state appellate court reversed. Petitioner's allegation that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek exclusion of the prior convictions was procedurally defaulted. Cause to overcome the default in federal habeas was established, however, by appellate counsel's failure to properly raise the issue on direct appeal. The State's speculation about what the appellate panel that heard the case would have ruled had the issue been adequately briefed was irrelevant as to the existence of prejudice, because that depended on “whether, in [petitioner’s] appeal, a reasonable, impartial decisionmaker would have found that [trial counsel’s failure] to exclude [petitioner’s] conviction undermined confidence in the verdict.” On this record, confidence in the verdict is undermined. Regarding the merits of the claim, even the state appellate court recognized that defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to seek exclusion of the prior armed robbery convictions. (Defense counsel mistakenly believed they were admissible because petitioner was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. Petitioner’s stipulation to his status as a felon, however, would have permitted the exclusion of evidence concerning the prior armed robbery convictions.) As to the failure to call the alibi witnesses, the state appellate court’s determination that trial counsel performed reasonably was premised on the same mistake of fact that led trial counsel to view their testimony as immaterial. Thus, the state appellate court’s ruling was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts. Trial counsel’s failure to competently investigate the alibi defense was deficient performance. The question of prejudice is considered cumulatively. (Regarding the alibi witnesses, one of whom was a disinterested third party, prejudice would be subject to de novo review as the state appellate court did not decide the issue.) “[E]ven if one assigns to [petitioner’s] prior-convictions deficiency the same measure of prejudice that the state court assigned to it—namely, a ‘substantially increased risk of unfair prejudice’ to [petitioner] —that mistake, when combined with [defense counsel’s] failure to call any alibi witnesses, resulted in prejudice as defined by Strickland.”

Dunn v. Neal*, 44 F.4th 696 (7th Cir. 2022). Affirming grant of relief in murder case on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to consult with a forensic pathologist. The primary dispute in this case was whether the victim died from a fall down a set of stairs or from being pushed down the stairs and then bludgeoned with an unknown object by petitioner after the victim landed at the bottom. At the time of the incident, petitioner lived with his former girlfriend, Sims, and her two sons in a second floor apartment. The apartment shared a balcony with a neighbor, the victim, and had stairs leading to ground level. A man riding by on a bike observed petitioner and Sims in an altercation on the balcony with Sims screaming for help and being pushed halfway down the stairs. The victim then came out of his apartment but was pushed back into his apartment by petitioner. The man called 911 and left the scene. When the police arrived, the victim was found lying at the bottom of the stairs in a pool of blood with a baseball bat underneath him. Petitioner was nearby, along with Sims’s son, Willie. Willie testified that earlier in the evening he had heard an argument between petitioner and the victim and heard petitioner tell the victim not to hit him with the bat. When Willie looked outside, he observed the victim strike petitioner in the shoulder with the bat. A struggle over the bat then ensued and the victim fell backward down the stairs, landing on the banister first and then flipping over it and hitting the pavement below head first. Sims also testified about the confrontation between petitioner and the victim. Like Willie, she heard petitioner tell the victim to stop hitting him with the bat. She went outside after hearing a thud and saw the victim at the bottom of the stairs with the bat under him. Petitioner was at the top of the stairs. Petitioner then descended the stairs and, according to Sims, tugged at the victim’s arms imploring him to get up. Photographs of petitioner taken at the hospital that night corroborated his statement to the evidence technician that he had been struck by the bat. This was also consistent with petitioner’s statements to authorities that evening. Forensic testing of the bat further supported petitioner's claim that the victim had struck him with it rather than vice versa. (Indeed, at trial, the prosecutor conceded that the bat was not used by petitioner to hit the victim.) The cause of death was massive blunt trauma to the head but the manner of death was deemed to be uncertain by the pathologist who performed the autopsy. At trial, the State called a forensic pathologist who opined, inter alia, that the victim's injuries were not consistent with a fall down the stairs. A blood spatter expert also testified for the State, supporting its theory that an unknown instrument was used to strike the victim when he was at the bottom of the stairs. Evidence of petitioner's shoeprint over the victim's blood was presented but there was additional evidence of multiple persons, including petitioner, "stomping around the crime scene." In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner presented testimony from a forensic pathologist who opined that the victim's injuries were much more consistent with a fall than with being bludgeoned by a blunt object. Although the pathologist could not determine whether the victim fell or was pushed, notably the prosecution had denied reliance on the fall itself constituting the cause of death. Trial counsel admitted that he had no strategic basis for failing to consult such an expert. Rather, he explained that he had focused on evidence that the bat had not caused the fatal injury. The post-conviction petition was denied on the ground that petitioner had failed to prove that consulting with a forensic pathologist would have changed the result. On appeal, the state appellate court sometimes cited the correct Strickland prejudice test but ultimately applied the erroneous heightened standard utilized by the lower court. The state appellate court's analysis was also contrary to Strickland by imposing a burden on petitioner to show that a jury would have accepted his expert's conclusions.

In order to demonstrate a reasonable probability that evidence would have changed the outcome, however, a defendant need not convince jurors of his version of events; the defendant must merely create a reasonable doubt as to whether the government has established its version. That is not a mere semantic difference. It is fundamental that the defendant does not bear the burden of proof to demonstrate his innocence.

In short, under the correct standard, "a reasonable probability of doubt in the mind of just one juror is sufficient." Because the standard applied by the state court was contrary to Strickland, de novo review of the claim was appropriate. (The state court did not address deficient performance.) On the record of this case, where the cause of death was the key issue, it was unreasonable for trial counsel to have failed to consult with a forensic pathologist. Looking to the explanations given by the post-conviction pathologist for his opinion, and the fact that the pathologist's testimony would have supported the eyewitness's accounts, prejudice is established.

Rogers v. Dzurenda, 25 F.4th 1171 (9th Cir. 2022) (1981 or 1982 trial and sentencing). In Nevada triple murder case, affirming the grant of habeas relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in investigating and presenting the not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI) defense. Defense counsel were both extremely inexperienced, which was reflected in their representation of petitioner.

Capital Case*

Their performance was characterized by the failure to take basic steps to prepare their chosen mental health experts for trial and to rebut the State of Nevada's foreseeable evidence. They did not call or even consult the one expert, Dr. Donald Molde, appointed by the court to address [petitioner's] legal sanity at the time of the offense. These deficiencies made the defense's insanity case less supported, less persuasive, and more vulnerable to predictable and preventable attacks by the prosecution.

Prior to trial, a competency hearing had been conducted where petitioner was ultimately found to be competent to stand trial. Only one of the evaluating mental health professionals, Dr. Molde, had also assessed petitioner's mental state at the time of the offense. Although Dr. Molde concluded that petitioner was competent to stand trial despite the signs and symptoms of paranoid schizophrenia, Dr. Molde found that petitioner had not been competent at the time of the crime and his arrest. At least ten mental health professionals evaluated petitioner in the eight months prior to trial. Although lead trial counsel had determined almost immediately that an NGRI defense would be presented at trial, she waited until the month before trial to discuss the issue with any of the evaluators. Three psychiatrists were selected for the defense. Not included was Dr. Molde who was not even consulted. Defense counsel never met with two of the chosen psychiatrists before trial. She did not prepare them for their testimony by, inter alia, going through the DSM-III with them or discussing the report of the State's expert. Nor did trial counsel provide those two psychiatrists with police reports that detailed petitioner's delusional behavior before and after the offense. The only expert with whom trial counsel discussed the issue of insanity before trial was the third chosen psychiatrist, Dr. Pauly. "But trial counsel did not meet with Dr. Pauly in person, discuss with him the other expert reports that contradicted his conclusion that [petitioner] was schizophrenic, or give him daily progress notes from [the mental health facility] that detailed [petitioner's] behavior while he was being evaluated." At trial, defense counsel did not explain to the jury in opening statement the NGRI defense that was to be presented. Although the first two psychiatrists called by the defense opined that petitioner was schizophrenic, both maintained that it was not possible for them to determine his mental state at the time of the offense because of petitioner's unwillingness or inability to discuss the crime. Only Dr. Pauly testified that petitioner was insane at the time of the offense. His conclusion was based on his brief evaluation of petitioner and, "most importantly," bystander reports. Dr. Pauly also noted that petitioner had displayed violent and antisocial behaviors in the past. In rebuttal, the State called a psychologist from the mental health facility where petitioner was evaluated pretrial, Dr. Gutride. Based on his daily interactions with petitioner and psychological testing, Dr. Gutride testified that he had diagnosed petitioner with antisocial personality disorder (ASPD). In closing argument, the State contended that petitioner's bizarre behavior was intentional, in an attempt to avoid criminal responsibility. The two defense attorneys split their closing, with one arguing that petitioner did not commit the offense and the second claiming that petitioner did not know the nature or quality of his acts at the time of the crime. The jury rejected the NGRI defense and sentenced petitioner to death. Because petitioner's ineffective assistance of counsel claim related to the NGRI defense was not adequately developed in state post-conviction proceedings, an evidentiary hearing on the claim was conducted in federal court in light of Martinez. The district court concluded that the evidence presented in federal court fundamentally altered the claim that had been raised in state court, rendering the claim procedurally defaulted. Post-conviction counsel's ineffectiveness provided cause, however, to overcome the default. Relief was then granted on the merits. Because the claim was not adjudicated on the merits in state court, de novo review was applied. In agreeing with the district court that trial counsel's investigation, preparation, and execution of their chosen insanity defense fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, the appeals court noted several significant errors, the most significant of which was the failure to call as a witness—or consult at all—Dr. Molde. Lead counsel conceded that she did not make a strategic decision to present Dr. Pauly instead of Dr. Molde. Rather, the omission of Dr. Molde was the result of defense counsel dropping the ball. Thus, no deference was due to the selection of Dr. Pauly over Dr. Molde. “Furthermore, the failure to call Dr. Molde as a witness was deficient performance because Dr. Molde’s testimony would have lacked deficiencies that existed with regard to other expert witnesses that trial counsel did decide to call,” e.g., Dr. Molde was a neutral, court-appointed expert, whereas Dr. Pauly was hired by the defense and, unlike Dr. Pauly, Dr. Molde had reviewed all the relevant records and had seen petitioner on more occasions than any of the mental health professionals to testify other than the State’s expert, Dr. Gutride. The error in regard to omitting Dr. Molde was compounded by trial counsel’s further error of failing to adequately prepare their chosen mental health experts: Drs. Pauly, Richnak, and Rich. As to Dr. Pauly, defense counsel waited until a month before trial to contact him and when they did, they failed to provide him with documents that were essential to his testimony or to adequately discuss with him the materials he was given. Most critically, counsel failed to give Dr. Pauly the daily progress notes from the mental health facility leading up to trial that would have supported the schizophrenia diagnosis. Additionally, trial counsel failed to investigate petitioner’s background in order to fully prepare their experts. This was objectively unreasonable. The obligation to conduct a background investigation “is especially pertinent in preparing mental health experts, because any gaps in the experts’ knowledge about the defendant will severely undercut the efficacy of the defense.” Although defense counsel’s office had an in-house staff investigator, defense counsel instead used an outside investigator who was unable to investigate petitioner’s childhood in Ohio due to limited funding. The omission of a proper background investigation that could establish a historical foundation for the schizophrenia diagnosis was significant because the entire theory of the prosecution, supported by its expert, was that petitioner was feigning mental illness. “For similar reasons, trial counsel performed below the required standard of competence by not ensuring that Drs. Rich and Richnak received and reviewed all relevant documents.” And “[e]ven when trial counsel provided their experts with useful documents, they failed to adequately discuss those documents with the experts or discuss how the expert would respond to expected lines of inquiry on cross-examination.”

As [petitioner’s] Strickland expert testified, the prevailing norms at the time of Rogers’s trial required counsel to give their competency experts “everything you possibly could” because “you’d want them to be prepared to ... render a reliable opinion.” We conclude that trial counsel performed deficiently by not adequately preparing their experts, thereby undercutting the persuasiveness of the NGRI defense as demonstrated through expert testimony.

Capital Case*

Trial counsel also performed deficiently by not preparing to rebut the State's mental health expert, Dr. Gutride. "First, trial counsel did not discuss Dr. Gutride's reports with Dr. Pauly. With adequate discussion, Dr. Pauly would have been better prepared to explain the basis not only for his disagreement with Dr. Gutride's diagnosis, but also to explain that Dr. Gutride did not have a sufficient basis for his conclusions" concerning the ASPD diagnosis. "Second, trial counsel did not prepare to impeach Dr. Gutride with the fact that it was accepted at the time of [petitioner's] trial that a diagnosis of schizophrenia preempts, or precludes, a diagnosis of ASPD." And it was "objectively unreasonable for trial counsel to not point out that Dr. Gutride himself observed symptoms of a mental illness that would preempt his own diagnosis." Also objectively unreasonable was trial counsel's failure to explain the elements of the NGRI defense to the jury in their opening statement. Regarding the prejudice assessment, the appeals court "decline[d] the State's invitation to subjectively determine what a particular jury in rural Nevada is likely to do" by looking at a factually similar case where the jury rejected a NGRI defense that had been supported by Dr. Molde, as well as at the general failure of NGRI defenses in Nevada. Instead, "[f]ocusing on what a reasonable, impartial juror would find compelling, we conclude there was a reasonable likelihood that [petitioner's] NGRI defense would have succeeded if trial counsel performed effectively." The appeals court notes numerous ways that counsel's deficient performance harmed the NGRI defense, e.g.: (1) because of trial counsel's failure to explain the law concerning the NGRI defense, "the jury had little context for understanding the significance of the State's evidence of [petitioner's] bizarre behavior before and after the crime, or the defense evidence of mental illness"; (2) the jury heard from only a single defense witness, Dr. Pauly, who was willing and able to testify to whether petitioner was legally insane at the time of the offense and this came after two mental health experts testified to being unable to render an opinion, despite being defense witnesses; (3) Dr. Pauly was subject to attack because he was hired by the defense, had little contact with petitioner, and had not reviewed the daily progress reports; (4) the jury was not provided the information necessary to place the testimony by petitioner's mother about his violent and impulsive behavior in the proper context, which would have bolstered the schizophrenia diagnosis and undermined the opinion of the State's expert that petitioner was malingering; (5) proper investigation would have uncovered evidence of petitioner's mother's drinking while pregnant and child abuse, which Dr. Pauly could have explained were contributing factors to the development of schizophrenia; (6) Dr. Pauly not only failed to show the connection between petitioner's adolescent antisocial behaviors and his schizophrenia diagnosis, he also did not testify that his schizophrenia diagnosis preempts an ASPD diagnosis; and (7) because of trial counsel's ineffectiveness, the jury did not hear defense counsel impeach Dr. Gutride's conclusions or his credibility with readily available evidence. In contrast, had counsel performed effectively, the jury would have heard the standard for legal insanity during opening arguments and would have been primed to consider the testimony of the mental health experts in the context of the defense's NGRI theory. Perhaps most importantly, if trial counsel had contacted Dr. Molde and given him all the relevant documents, he would have confirmed Dr. Pauly's testimony that [petitioner] "did not know right from wrong or know the nature and quality of his act." Dr. Molde would have explained how the bystanders' descriptions of [petitioner's] behavior and his numerous examinations allowed him to reach the conclusion that [petitioner] was insane at the time of the offense. He would have testified that [petitioner] had a “rock-solid” case for NGRI. Unlike Dr. Pauly, as a court-appointed expert, Dr. Molde would have been immune from the State’s “hired gun” attacks. He would have also been largely immune from attacks related to the amount of time spent with [petitioner] because Dr. Molde conducted more examinations of [petitioner] than any other psychiatrist or psychologist except for Dr. Gutride.

In addition, with proper preparation, “Dr. Molde’s testimony would have severely undercut the State’s witnesses.” On this record, the State’s contention that Dr. Molde’s testimony would have simply been cumulative to that of Dr. Pauly is rejected. In addition, with adequate preparation, Dr. Pauly would have been a more effective witness and his discounting of Dr. Gutride’s opinion more persuasive. And adequate preparation would have led to impeachment of Dr. Gutride on cross-examination.

2021: United States v. Baptiste, 8 F.4th 30 (1st Cir. 2021). In joint trial of two men (Baptiste and Boncy) charged with federal crimes stemming from a scheme to bribe Haitian officials to approve a lucrative port project in Haiti, the deficient performance by one man’s attorney prejudiced both men, justifying the grant of a new trial for the pair. One defendant was entitled to relief under the Sixth Amendment while the other’s due process right to a fair trial was impaired. The deficiencies of the attorney for defendant Baptiste were numerous and the Government did not defend defense counsel’s performance. Instead, it argued that a new trial was not appropriate in light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt. But a judge can grant a new trial under Rule 33 to prevent “a miscarriage of justice” — even if “there [is] sufficient evidence to convict.” The Government also attempted to rely on the positive performance by Boncy’s counsel as salvaging the defense for the two defendants. But this ignored that Boncy’s attorney “spent much energy trying make Baptiste the real culprit in this conspiracy while distancing Boncy from Baptiste’s deception.” In granting a new trial, the district court properly considered the cumulative impact of the many deficiencies by Baptiste’s counsel. These multiple deficiencies included: (1) raising an entrapment theory, despite being told it had no legs, that essentially put Baptiste in the middle of a bribery scheme; (2) failing to challenge a photo of cash sent from Baptiste’s phone, which the government argued showed money Baptiste used for bribes — even though Baptiste told counsel during the trial that the money represented Christmas bonuses for Baptiste’s staff, not bribes for Haitian functionaries; (3) not effectively contesting agent testimony labeling certain words by Baptiste (captured on tape) code for bribes — a failure that tacitly endorsed the idea that the agents were not simply speculating about what the words meant; and (4) not calling any witnesses, including a 20-year acquaintance of Baptiste and a Haitian legal expert — the first of whom (according to an affidavit filed with Baptiste’s new-trial motion) would have testified that Baptiste had an excellent reputation with Haitian officials and so had no need to bribe his way into their circle, and the second of whom (according to another affidavit) would have testified that certain actions (making political contributions, lobbying officials by promising them to fund social programs to help local communities, etc.) were legal in Haiti. Not clearly erroneous was the finding that Boncy was prejudiced by the errors by Baptiste’s counsel, where Boncy’s attorney was forced “to play an outsized role at trial rather than pursue his preferred defense strategy for his own client.”

Hughes v. Vannoy*, 7 F.4th 380 (5th Cir. 2021). Affirming the grant of habeas relief in second degree murder case where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to interview an eyewitness who contradicted petitioner’s account of the shooting. Petitioner and the victim had been fighting. According to petitioner, the gun fired accidentally when the victim pulled on the gun and the two men collided. His testimony was contradicted, however, by an eyewitness who was supposedly watching the fight from outside her apartment across the street. The eyewitness testified that she observed the victim backing away from petitioner with his hands raised at the moment the gun fired. It was brought out at trial that the eyewitness originally told the police that she came outside her apartment after hearing the gunshot and then observed the men arguing. She explained at trial that she had “transposed” the events in her statement due to “nerves.” Trial counsel never attempted to interview the eyewitness or her roommate. In the state post-conviction proceedings, the roommate testified that the eyewitness was actually inside their apartment at the time of the shooting. The eyewitness also testified at the post-conviction proceeding, reiterating her trial testimony. Trial counsel testified that he learned before trial of the changed story of the eyewitness and intended to impeach her with the earlier police report. Trial counsel conceded that he had no tactical basis for failing to interview the eyewitness and admitted that he would have discovered the roommate had he done so. Any reliance on the police statement as a basis for forgoing an interview with the eyewitness would have been unreasonable given that the statement was clearly incorrect for indicating the men were seen arguing after the gunshot. Reasonably competent counsel would have sought to clarify what the eyewitness had actually seen. Because there was no reasonable argument that trial counsel satisfied Strickland’s deferential standard of adequate performance, the state court’s determination to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Prejudice is found given that the eyewitness’s testimony was the lynchpin of the prosecution case. Although petitioner’s adopted daughter also provided inculpatory testimony, her trial testimony contradicted her initial statement to police in which she said that her back was turned at the moment the gun fired. Additionally, her sister also testified at trial that the adopted daughter told her she did not witness the shooting because her back was turned while tending to her child. On this record, which included a nonunanimous jury verdict, “no fairminded jurist could conclude that the failure to introduce [the roommate’s] testimony would not have ‘undermine[d] confidence in the outcome.’”

2020: Dunn v. Jess, 981 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2020), affirming, 430 F.Supp.3d 568 (E.D. Wis. 2019). In felony-murder case where petitioner slapped the victim, causing him to fall to the ground, and the victim was observed upright and apparently unharmed afterwards before being found dead hours later in a different location, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence supporting the no-causation defense. In preparation for trial, defense counsel consulted a forensic pathologist who opined, after viewing the report of the medical examiner (ME), that the victim died immediately from his head injuries. Also before trial, the prosecution notified defense counsel that the co-defendant had retained experts (a pathologist, a blood stain expert and a neurologist and mechanical engineer) who supported a no-causation defense. Defense counsel proceeded to trial without investigating the findings of the co-defendant’s experts. This was because defense counsel erroneously believed that the ME had concluded the victim died immediately from a fatal blow to the back of his head and would testify to that at trial. This belief was harbored by defense counsel even though the ME’s report did not contain this conclusion about the immediacy of death and defense counsel never confirmed it with the ME in advance of trial. At trial, the ME stated that she had no way of knowing definitively if the victim's skull fracture caused instantaneous death and then opined that there was no reason to think it would because it did not affect the victim's vital center. In state post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel claimed to have learned of the ME's actual opinion shortly before trial commenced. Trial counsel defended his decision to nevertheless forgo calling his own expert on the ground that he planned to draw out the fact that there were multiple injuries when cross examining the ME and because his expert had informed him that the ME's conclusions in the autopsy report were well-reasoned. According to defense counsel, eliciting favorable testimony from a government witness was more advantageous than calling his own. Based on this explanation, the state appellate court found no deficient performance by defense counsel. The federal appeals court disagreed, finding that trial counsel's mistaken belief about the ME's opinion "infected his trial strategy to such an extent that his approach to investigating and presenting a no-causation defense cannot be reasonably viewed as strategic, even with the 'heavy measure of deference' afforded him under Strickland." It was unreasonable for the state court "to view trial counsel's decision to consult with a forensic pathologist as satisfactory performance, considering trial counsel did not use the crucial information gleaned from that consultation." Also unreasonable was the state appellate court finding that trial counsel's explanation for his approach contained reasonable strategic and practical reasons. The inability of defense counsel to elicit from the ME an opinion directly supporting the no-causation defense demonstrated the unreasonableness of counsel's behavior. The flaw in the analysis of both trial counsel and the state appellate court was in seemingly viewing evidence of multiple injuries suffered by the victim—which trial counsel did elicit on cross-examination—as adequate evidence to support the no-causation defense. "But while evidence that [the victim] had more injuries than could be explained by the slap and fall lends some support to the theory that [petitioner] did not cause his death, it is not nearly as strong as evidence that [the victim] died immediately after the blunt force trauma to the back of his head." According to the ME, all of the victim's injuries contributed to his death. And in order to convict for felony murder, the jury only needed to find that petitioner's conduct was a substantial factor in bringing about the victim's death. Thus, evidence that the victim died immediately from one fatal blow was much stronger evidence that petitioner did not cause his death. Trial counsel's "practical" explanation for not calling the defense expert--the expert's opinion that the ME's conclusion was well-reasoned--also did not survive scrutiny. Notably, the ME's report did not contain her conclusion that there was an interval of survival. It was not until shortly before trial that counsel realized that there was a contradiction between the opinions of his expert and the ME. When trial counsel realized that the ME in fact disagreed on the immediacy of death, his decision to not call his expert pathologist "cannot reasonably be called 'practical'" and the state court unreasonably applied Strickland when it determined that counsel did not perform deficiently. Additionally, the state court "failed to adequately consider or address counsel's decision to disregard the exculpatory expert reports he was informed about shortly before trial." Even if his erroneous belief about the ME's opinion explained his initial failure to investigate the co-defendant's experts, once defense counsel understood his error there was no reasonable strategic basis for inaction. The record shows deficient performance. Prejudice was evaluated de novo because that prong of Strickland was not addressed by the state appellate court. The testimony of the expert called at the state post-conviction hearing, which contradicted the ME's trial testimony in key respects, was sufficient to establish the requisite reasonable probability of a more favorable result had counsel not performed deficiently.

Calderon-Rosas v. Att’y Gen. United States*, 957 F.3d 378 (3d Cir. 2020). Finding that illegal immigrant was entitled to a remand to reopen his immigration proceedings based on his retained attorney’s deficient performance in failing to present readily available evidence about the medical condition of the immigrant’s U.S. citizen children that would have supported his application to cancel removal.

United States v. Nolan*, 956 F.3d 71 (2nd Cir. 2020). In Hobbs Act case involving robbery and a firearm where the prosecution relied heavily on eyewitness identification, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately challenge the identifications or combat the problems inherent in such evidence. Petitioner was convicted of participating in a drug-related robbery. Four of the five adults present in the apartment at the time of the robbery—all testifying at petitioner’s trial pursuant to grants of immunity—identified petitioner as one of the robbers. The significant indicia of unreliability associated with the identifications included: (1) the two robbers were partially disguised and carried guns, on which the eyes of the victims were likely focused; (2) the victims were initially unable to give investigators a detailed description of the robbers beyond noting that they were light-skinned or Hispanic; (3) the four victims did not identify petitioner (who is white) as one of the intruders until they saw his photo in a photo array presented to them more than a month after the crime, and even then, at least one of the victims did not firmly identify petitioner until law enforcement allowed that victim to view photos of petitioner on Facebook; and (4) the victim who first viewed the Facebook photo discussed with two other victims her identification of petitioner and showed the other two victims his Facebook photo before these victims were asked to identify petitioner from a photo array. Although trial counsel filed a pre-trial motion seeking to exclude the eyewitness identifications, counsel abandoned the motion in favor of attempting to impeach the testimony at trial. This was professionally unreasonable. Many of the factors now recognized by the Appeals Court as negatively impacting the reliability of eyewitness identification were present here, e.g., the perpetrators wore disguises, the presence of weapons, the stress of the situation, the cross-racial nature of the crime (petitioner was white while the victims were black and Hispanic), and the passage of time (many weeks) between observation and identification. Additionally, “and perhaps most egregiously, the police employed highly irregular procedures in pursuing the witnesses’ identification of [petitioner], potentially biasing the victims’ identifications by, for example, allowing them to talk among themselves about [petitioner’s] identification and allowing them to view his photos on Facebook.” Had the motion been successful, the case would likely have ended given the importance of the eyewitness identifications to the prosecution. But even had the motion not succeeded, trial counsel would still have been able to impeach the witnesses. Also deficient was trial counsel’s failure to consult with or present an expert on eyewitness identification. A lay juror would not know about the likely impact on perception of extreme stress and weapon focus, nor would the juror necessarily understand that the detective’s identification practices were highly suggestive. On this record, prejudice is established. Trial counsel was independently ineffective in making no effort to preclude the prosecution from introducing a highly prejudicial Facebook photo of petitioner posing with what appears to be a handgun, but which was actually a BB gun. The photo was not direct evidence of the charged crime, and the prosecution's proffered rationale — that the photo was supposedly probative of petitioner's access to, knowledge of, and comfort with firearms — was "weak on its face." No valid ground could be discerned for failing to seek exclusion of the photo. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to seek a limiting instruction concerning the photo. Defense counsel's handling of the photo was sufficiently prejudicial to petitioner that there is a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different had the photo not been admitted.

Cook v. Foster*, 948 F.3d 896 (7th Cir. 2020). In case involving convictions related to a home invasion robbery, trial counsel was ineffective in multiple respects in presenting the defense theory that a longtime friend of the co-defendant took part in the crime in petitioner's place after petitioner backed out of participating. First, trial counsel failed to locate and produce the friend, Hall, at trial. The state appellate court's finding that this failure did not constitute deficient performance was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Moreover, this failure to investigate could not be cured by later discovered facts—"in this instance, that Hall for a time had absconded while on parole." (At the state postconviction hearing, Hall explained how he in fact could have been located and testified that he would have complied with a subpoena.)

Had the jury seen Hall, it is reasonable to conclude that there would have been strong corroboration of some damning evidence: both [of the female accomplices] were friends with Hall; Hall had known [the co-defendant] since childhood; Hall stopped by [one of the accomplice's] home twice on the night of the robbery; neither woman told the police about Hall's visit; and Hall was arrested at [one of the accomplice's] house[s] the next day. It is true that Hall did not blurt out a confession at the postconviction hearing, but that does not mean that his presence before the jury would have had no impact. The content of his testimony is relevant instead to the question of prejudice.

Second, defense counsel did not object to hearsay testimony, unsupported by a proper foundation, about cell phone records. The failure to object was serious, because the testimony at issue "provided the critical link between [petitioner's] phone and the robbery and thus enabled the police to locate [petitioner]." Although the state appellate court saw the use of petitioner's phone during the crime as evidence of his involvement, it concluded that the impact of the missing records was diluted because other evidence proved a similar point. But this conclusion was premised on a serious misapprehension of the facts in the record. Because nothing explained counsel's failure to keep out the testimony, his performance in failing to object was deficient. Third, defense counsel failed to bring out the de facto immunity the state had given to one of the female accomplices in exchange for her testimony. In light of other challenges to the veracity of the female accomplices mounted by defense counsel, counsel's failure in regard to the immunity issue might not constitute deficient performance if standing alone. But it is another negative factor to be considered when counsel's performance as a whole is assessed. Also deficient was defense counsel's withdrawal of a question he had posed to one of the female accomplices about Hall's possession of a gun immediately before the crimes. (After the prosecutor objected to the question, defense counsel withdrew the question without providing the trial court the opportunity to make a ruling. In the state postconviction proceeding, the trial court acknowledged it would have overruled the objection which would have resulted in testimony that Hall frequently carried a gun similar to the one used in the crimes.) In assessing prejudice, the cumulative impact of all errors determined to meet the deficient performance standard are considered together. The three significant errors that led the trial judge to find prejudice, considered objectively, lead to the same conclusion here: confidence in the verdict is undermined by (1) defense counsel's failure to investigate Hall's location; (2) his failure to question an accomplice about immunity; and (3) his failure to object to or otherwise seek to exclude the hearsay testimony about the location and use of petitioner's cellphone. The state appellate court unreasonably applied the Strickland prejudice prong "when it concluded that the result in [petitioner's] case could stand, despite counsel's subpar performance."

2017: Browning v. Baker*, 875 F.3d 444 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 584 U.S. 1019 (2018) (1986 trial). Petitioner was convicted in Nevada state court of four crimes arising from a robbery of a jewelry store and the murder of its owner, and was sentenced by a jury to death. The attorney appointed to represent petitioner at trial had been practicing as a defense lawyer for less than a year, and petitioner may have been his first capital client. After the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed petitioner's conviction on appeal, petitioner filed a habeas petition in state court alleging, among other claims, that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to perform an adequate investigation before trial. The state court held an evidentiary hearing, during which evidence was presented that the three identifications of petitioner were questionable for several reasons, including that they were cross-racial identifications (petitioner was black) and that there was an innocent explanation for petitioner's fingerprints at the store. Petitioner also presented the testimony of trial counsel that he wanted to call petitioner's girlfriend as a witness to testify that she and petitioner had been in the store prior to the date of the homicide and that there was a person of Cuban descent who may have better matched the description of the perpetrator provided by witnesses. Trial counsel testified that he could not find petitioner's girlfriend at the time of trial. He also testified about the investigation of the case, saying that he never went to the store while it was a crime scene, he conducted no interviews himself but instead had an investigator do so, he did not interview the informants prior to trial even though he knew they were long-time informants, and he did not inquire whether they were given benefits for their testimony against petitioner. He did not hire a fingerprint examiner or a shoe print examiner because he was a former prosecutor and trusted the state's forensic witnesses' examinations. Trial counsel did not have his investigator interview a witness he had been informed was selling jewelry from the store with one of the informants, and he did not follow up on a witness's initial statement that the man she had seen running from the store was white, not black. The trial investigator testified at the evidentiary hearing that he had no autonomy in the investigation and did only what trial counsel told him to do, he did not start work until 5 months after petitioner's arrest, even though he had been appointed much earlier, he did not get the file until 10 months after petitioner's arrest, and that only included police reports, he performed a total of 12 hours work on the case, and trial counsel denied his request for additional investigation funds. He requested funds to perform specific investigation that counsel denied, such as interviewing the informants and others who had information on the informants. The prosecutor also testified for the defense at the hearing that he had given one of the informants concrete benefits – a job, and leniency in sentencing in a criminal case. The defense also called the investigating officer, who got a description of the perpetrator from the victim before he died – describing his hair as shoulder length, loosely curled, and wet – completely different from petitioner's four-inch Afro with braids on top. Petitioner also testified that he saw a Cuban man enter one of the informants' car wearing a Hollywood hat and a tan jacket that had been identified by witnesses and found in the informants' apartment. The state court denied relief. Petitioner filed a habeas petition in federal district court, which also denied relief but granted a certificate of appealability on several claims, including limited IAC claims. The Ninth Circuit expanded the COA to include a claim that petitioner's trial counsel was ineffective generally for failing to investigate, holding that the district court's limitation of the IAC COA was error: because, under Strickland, the court is required to consider counsel's conduct as a whole to determine whether it was constitutionally adequate, "the IAC portion of the COA should have been crafted at a higher level of generality." The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeal held that the Nevada Supreme Court unreasonably applied clearly established Supreme Court precedent in denying some of petitioner's claims, and reversed the district court's denial of habeas corpus relief and remanded. These included Brady claims as well as IAC claims [but only the IAC claims are discussed here]. Counsel's performance was deficient for (1) failing to interview the state investigator before calling him to testify at trial (Nevada court agreed); (2) failing to investigate the bloody shoeprints at the scene (state court's acceptance of counsel's statements that he could just argue the source of the prints was unknown was unreasonable – not okay to simply rely on fear of learning the truth, especially when there is no reason to believe the results will be inculpatory); (3) failing to interview the informants (state court finding that it was reasonable strategy for counsel not to interview them himself was only part of the analysis – did not consider whether it was deficient for counsel not to permit his investigator to interview them). Counsel's "failure to investigate what happened [on the date of the crime] 'so undermined the proper functioning of the adversarial process that [his] trial cannot be relief on as having produced a just result'" (quoting Strickland). Petitioner was prejudiced because the case against him was weak, and the evidence that the shoeprints could not have been made by paramedics or a responding officer (or petitioner), that the identifications against him were grossly suspect, and that the victim's description of the perpetrator differed greatly from petitioner's appearance would have made a significant impact. The state court's conclusions otherwise were objectively unreasonable. Court grants guilt phase habeas relief. NOTE: In 2019, Clark County District Judge Douglas Herndon granted the defense motion to dismiss the case based on the unavailability of witnesses and the taint on their prior testimony from trial counsel's failure to conduct meaningful cross-examinations. On August 21, 2019, Judge Herndon ordered Paul Browning released. In 2020, the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed Judge Herndon and the case was dismissed. Browning passed away in 2021. United States v. Laureys*. 866 F.3d 432 (D.C. Cir. 2017). Petitioner was convicted by a jury in federal court of attempted coercion and enticement of a minor and travel with intent to engage in illicit sexual conduct, based upon his online encounter with an undercover agent posing as a pimp for a nine-year-old girl. He was sentenced to twenty years in prison after a trial in which he testified in his own defense that he was merely engaging in fantasy when discussing a desired encounter with the girl with the undercover officer. Following an evidentiary hearing, the district court denied relief on petitioner's claim that his trial counsel was ineffective for having failed to obtain and present testimony of a mental health expert at petitioner's trial, despite having been aware that mental health testimony was needed. The district court concluded that counsel's failure to present the testimony of a mental health expert with whom he had corresponded prior to trial was not due to his lack of effort but rather due to mutual misunderstandings, and also that petitioner did not establish prejudice because he himself testified about his intent and there was no evidence he would not have testified if an expert did so instead. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court's denial of relief. The record indicated that trial counsel was seeking an "internet compulsivity diagnosis" that he had settled upon through his own online research, and led his selected expert to believe that he was only interested in establishing a diminished capacity defense that the expert did not support, rather than a fantasy defense that the expert could and would have provided, and to which petitioner ended up testifying at trial. "Trial counsel focused [the expert] on an invalid diminished capacity defense to the exclusion of all other possible defenses." Trial counsel's statements to the contrary during habeas proceedings were completely at odds with the trial record. "[T]rial counsel's grievously misguided effort to employ a mental health expert in his client's defense was so flawed as to be 'the sort of serious blunder that will singlehandedly support a Strickland claim.'" (internal quote omitted). "Counsel admitted that he had never handled an insanity defense, and yet he appears to have considered himself qualified, as a layperson, to effectively diagnose his client as an 'internet sexual compulsive' and pursue confirmation of a diminished capacity diagnosis with potential experts." Counsel's deficient performance was prejudicial because petitioner's defense and own testimony would have been significantly bolstered by expert testimony regarding fantasy chat, "and more specifically, the existence of a subculture of men who meet first online and then offline for sex with one another spurred on by child sex fantasies, such that a 'reasonable probability' of a different outcome at trial exists." The mental health expert testimony also would have rebutted the "dubious, quasi-expert testimony" by the undercover officer.

2016: Hardy v. Chappell, 849 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2016) (1984 trial). In capital murder case, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present proof that the prosecution's star witness was the real killer. The California Supreme Court's denial of relief on that issue was contrary to and involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. The charges against petitioner arose out of his alleged involvement as the killer in a murder-for-hire plot that resulted in the stabbing deaths of a mother and her child. At trial the prosecution maintained that petitioner killed the victims himself, and supported that theory with testimony from one Calvin Boyd, who was acquainted with the others involved in the plot and claimed to have turned down a request to carry it out, and from Colette Mitchell, petitioner's former girlfriend. Petitioner's defense counsel made no opening statement and presented no evidence, and the jury found him guilty and sentenced him to death. Later, evidence presented in a state habeas proceeding told "a very different story than the one presented at trial," and resulted in factual findings that trial counsel had been deficient in failing to present proof that Boyd was the real killer, and that petitioner could not have been present at the time the killings took place. On review, the California Supreme Court accepted many of the lower court's factual determinations and agreed counsel's performance had been deficient, but denied guilt-or-innocence phase relief on the ground that "there was 'substantial evidence' to convict [petitioner] under an aid-and-abet or conspiracy theory." (The state court did grant relief to petitioner on his ineffective assistance claim related to the death sentence.) A federal district court later denied petitioner's pro se habeas petition. On appeal, because the finding of deficient performance was not contested, the focus of the analysis was on prejudice. Liking the California Supreme Court's approach in this case to the "contrary to" example contained in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000), the Ninth Circuit found that the "substantial evidence" threshold used by the state court "was not the correct standard, and consequently, the relevant question regarding prejudice at the guilt phase was never properly addressed.” Id. at 818-19. After observing that “[s]ubstantial evidence is ‘such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion,’” and that use of that standard “created a much higher bar for [petitioner] than the law required,” the circuit court held that, “[t]o the extent that the California Supreme Court found the Strickland prejudice prong was not met because substantial evidence remained to convict [petitioner] under a different theory, it applied a standard contrary to clearly established federal law.” Id. at 819 (quoting Richardson v. Perales, 402 U.S. 389, 401 (1971)). And because the state court used the wrong standard, no deference was owed to its decision on the prejudice prong of Strickland. Reviewing the prejudice question de novo, the Ninth Circuit found that petitioner “was clearly prejudiced in the guilt phase by [trial counsel’s] performance.” 849 F.3d at 820. The circuit court first rejected the California Supreme Court’s alternative aider and abettor / conspiracy theory, explaining that, in light of the prosecution’s positions at trial, “no reasonable reading of the record” could support a finding that the jury convicted petitioner as an aider or abettor, id. at 821; that “although [petitioner] was found guilty by the jury of conspiracy to commit murder for insurance proceeds, his conviction rested on being the actual killer,” id.; and that, “even if the aid-or-abet and conspiracy theories of guilt could supplant what the jury found at trial—that [petitioner] was the actual killer—it is reasonably likely the jury would have had a reasonable doubt under those theories based on the evidence that should have been presented at trial,” id. at 822. After further explaining that Mitchell’s testimony was suspect from the start and would have been further undermined by the evidence indicating that Boyd was the real killer, the circuit court summed up its prejudice analysis as follows:

This is not a case where counsel’s deficient performance had no bearing on the outcome due to otherwise strong or overwhelming evidence of guilt. ... Instead, the verdict was only weakly supported by the evidence. No witness except Boyd placed [petitioner] at the scene of the crime, no witness reported seeing [petitioner] leaving the apartment complex the night of the crime, and no blood, fingerprint, footprint, hair, or other forensic evidence linked [petitioner] to the crime. No murder weapon was found and no evidence was presented that linked [petitioner] to any knife similar to the one used by the killers. Indeed, no physical evidence whatsoever linked [petitioner] to the crime. [Petitioner] was convicted of being the actual killer primarily on the strength of Boyd’s now discredited testimony. It cannot be reasonably argued that strong or overwhelming evidence of guilt under any theory exists without Boyd’s testimony. Thus, there is a substantial likelihood that the jury would not have convicted [petitioner] had [counsel] performed effectively.

849 F.3d at 824. Finally, the Ninth Circuit added that even assuming the California Supreme Court did correctly conceptualize and apply the Strickland prejudice standard, it applied it in an objectively unreasonable manner. NOTE: James Hardy was freed on February 14, 2019 after pleading guilty to two counts of first-degree murder in exchange for a suspended sentence and release on probation.

Jones v. Calloway*, 842 F.3d 454 (7th Cir. 2016). The Seventh Circuit affirmed the district court’s determinations that petitioner’s showing of “actual innocence” was sufficient to overcome the procedural default of his ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, and that he was entitled to relief on the merits. Petitioner was convicted of being the shooter in a homicide that took place on a Chicago street. Prior to his bench trial, however, his two co-defendants were tried for the same offense. In that earlier trial, the prosecution contended that one of those defendants – Stone – was the actual shooter; Stone himself agreed in both a post-homicide statement and in testimony at his own trial, maintaining that he alone had fired upon the decedent, and that he had done so in defense of his half-brother. Despite these admissions, petitioner’s trial counsel failed to call Stone, who was by all accounts willing to testify, as a witness. Petitioner initially asserted counsel’s ineffectiveness in this regard during his state post-conviction proceeding, but the trial-level state court dismissed the claim as procedurally defaulted because it was not supported with an affidavit from Stone as required by settled state law. The state appellate court agreed with that determination, but also “went on to apply Strickland based on the existing record,” and held both that counsel’s omission was a matter of “trial tactics” that were virtually “immune” to challenge, and that petitioner could not show prejudice. 842 F.3d at 459. A federal district court later granted relief after holding an evidentiary hearing at which Stone, trial counsel, and others testified. On appeal by the state, the Seventh Circuit began by agreeing with the district court “that the new evidence of actual innocence warrants a merits review of Jones’s Strickland claim.” 842 F.3d at 462. The court explained:

In brief, the decisive evidentiary points are these: Stone turned himself in two days after the crime and immediately confessed to shooting [the decedent]. From the beginning he has consistently maintained that he alone shot ... and that he did not plan the crime with either [the co-defendant] or [petitioner]. [His] account matches the physical and forensic evidence; the accounts of the prosecution’s eyewitnesses do not. His testimony is also corroborated at least in part by some of the eyewitnesses And Stone’s testimony in the district court was entirely consistent with his testimony at his own trial. The eyewitness testimony, moreover, was all over the map. No two witnesses gave the same account of the shooting. ... In short, ... the new evidence, considered in light of the entire record, raises sufficient doubt about [petitioner’s] guilt to undermine confidence in the verdict without the assurance that it was untainted by constitutional error.

842 F.3d at 462. The Seventh Circuit then concluded the state appellate court’s remarks about the ineffectiveness claim were defective in multiple ways. First, with regard to deficient performance, the Seventh Circuit found that the state court’s decision involved an unreasonable application of Strickland both because it inappropriately relied upon a “presumption” that counsel’s omission was strategic in the absence of any record evidence to establish that proposition, and because it then “treated the Strickland presumption as essentially un rebuttable.” 842 F.3d at 464; see also id. (“A court adjudicating a Strickland claim can’t just label a decision ‘strategic’ and thereby immunize it from constitutional scrutiny. Because there was no post-conviction hearing in state court, [counsel’s] actual reason for omitting Stone was then unknown.”). With regard to prejudice, the Seventh Circuit found that the state court applied a standard that was “contrary to” Strickland when it required petitioner “to show that ‘but for counsel’s shortcomings, the outcome of the proceeding would have been different.’” Id. (quoting state court opinion). The Seventh Circuit

then added that the “reasons” proffered by the state court in support of “its no-prejudice finding were so flawed as to fall outside the bounds of reasonable judicial disagreement.” Id.; see also id. (explaining that state court’s assumption that Stone would have refused to testify was “speculative” and would not have been dispositive even if correct, and that its reliance on eyewitnesses overlooked their internal inconsistencies and their conflicts with the physical evidence). Finally, proceeding under § 2254(a), the Seventh Circuit observed that its analysis “overlap[ped] so significantly [with its § 2254(d) inquiry] that [petitioner’s] entitlement to relief flows easily from [the] § 2254(d) conclusion.” 842 F.3d at 465.

Liao v. Junious*, 817 F.3d 678 (9th Cir. 2016). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to secure medical evidence to support the defense expert’s opinion that the defendant was sleepwalking at the time of the offense and did not have the requisite criminal intent when he struck the victim on the head with a hammer three times. The victim was the son of the defendant’s girlfriend. He was awakened in the early morning hours after the defendant struck him with the hammer. He pushed the defendant to the ground and asked what he was doing. The defendant did not respond. The victim ran and awakened his mother, who told the defendant to call the police. After several requests, he did so. When his girlfriend asked why he did it, he said that he had been dreaming someone was hitting him and he had fought back. The victim testified that the defendant had argued with the victim’s mother before they went to sleep and he believed the defendant’s anger at her was the reason for the attack, as the victim had known the defendant for five years in which the defendant never struck him and never showed any animosity towards him. In preparation for trial, counsel consulted with an expert in sleep disorders who advised that the defendant should undergo a medical examination and sleep studies. Counsel filed a motion requesting authorization for the procedures, which was initially denied by a court commissioner. Counsel renewed the motion with additional information and the commissioner took the matter under advisement. When counsel’s associate later called to inquire about the status of the request, a court clerk erroneously told him that the motion had been denied when in fact it had been granted. “Instead of conducting any further inquiry into the status of his motion, counsel proceeded to trial without the benefit of the medical examination and study” his expert recommended. The state conceded that counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing “to verify what the court clerk told his associate over the phone.” Prejudice was established. While the defense expert in sleep disorders testified to his opinion that the defendant was sleepwalking at the time of the offense, he did not have the sleep studies or medical examination he had recommended. Thus, the prosecutor was able to discredit the expert’s opinion on cross-examination and in rebuttal from a state expert. Then, “[h]aving set up her summation with the precision of a surgeon, the prosecutor belittled and mocked” the defense expert’s testimony in final argument. If the additional testing had been done, two experts would have been available to testify that the defendant was a sleepwalker and that his behavior on the night of the assault was consistent with sleepwalking as it was not a “focused assault that leads to injuries that might have been expected had there been an intent to really seriously injure or kill” and “there was amnesia and confusion” afterwards. The state court’s determination to the contrary was an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented and was a “demonstrably unreasonable” application of Strickland. Thus, the state court’s review was entitled to no deference and the issue was considered de novo. “Counsel’s error left Liao’s defense weak and pregnable. It would not have been so with the evidence the jury did not hear because of counsel's mistake."

2015: Rivas v. Fischer, 780 F.3d 529 (2nd Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second-degree murder case in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence challenging the testimony of the medical examiner concerning the time of death. The defendant was charged with killing his former girlfriend in her apartment. The victim had not been seen or heard from after about 8:15 p.m. on Friday until Sunday evening. Shortly after the murder, the medical examiner estimated the time of death as Saturday evening going into Sunday. While the defendant was questioned, he was not arrested as he had alibi evidence that accounted for his whereabouts on both Saturday and Sunday. The case remained a "cold case" for five years until a new District Attorney was sworn in. The defense alleged that he asked the medical examiner to review the case again with an eye toward expanding the time of death to include Friday evening, when the defendant had no alibi. The medical examiner was under criminal investigation by the D.A.'s office and other state agencies for a variety of misconduct, including improper disposal of waste and stealing and mishandling of body parts. The medical examiner resigned in 1993, in part to avoid prosecution. While some of these facts were reported in the local news, neither the defendant nor counsel was aware of this information as "both then lived downstate." Whether it was due to an eagerness to please the prosecutor or simply an independent reevaluation of the evidence, the medical examiner revised his opinion to a finding that the murder occurred on Friday evening. Thus, in late 1992, nearly six years after the murder, the defendant was indicted. The only thing that had changed in the case facts during that six years was the medical examiner's estimation of the time of death. Nonetheless, counsel failed to investigate the reason for this change or to independently consult with a medical expert about the time of death. He never even considered doing so and, instead, chose to rely on the alibi evidence that accounted for the defendant's whereabouts all weekend except for three and a half hours on Friday evening between 9:00 p.m. and 12:30 a.m. when the state alleged the murder occurred. During cross-examination of the medical examiner, counsel confronted the witness with contemporaneous newspaper accounts of his earlier estimation that the murder occurred on Saturday evening, but the witness denied that he had ever "tied" himself to a Saturday night estimation. He explained on redirect that he had not had a chance, at the time of the earlier estimations, to review some of his slides, which showed "some decomposition to the brain," which pushed the time limits back to Friday evening. In closing, the defense argued, without any evidence, that the medical examiner "had to stretch science beyond the breaking point" to place the time of death on Friday evening, but counsel did not directly challenge the witness' credibility or suggest that he might be biased in favor of the District Attorney's office. Counsel's conduct was deficient in: (1) failing to consult an independent forensic pathologist, who would have confirmed that the revised findings were not scientifically reliable; (2) failing to investigate the medical examiner's qualifications and background, which would have revealed his prior misconduct and that he was under investigation when his opinion was revised; (3) failing to review the medical examiner's file, which would have revealed that there were no "brain slides" as alleged in the redirect testimony; and (4) failing to impeach the medical examiner with a search warrant application in which a police officer swore that the medical examiner had estimated the time of death as between Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning. Reliance simply on the alibi, which did not account for the precise time that the prosecution asserted was the time of the murder, "amounted to no defense at all." Thus, the state court's finding that counsel's conduct was based on reasonable trial strategy was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Prejudice was also established because, absent his counsel's unprofessional errors and omissions, a fact finder would have had a reasonable doubt respecting his guilt." Although the state court "did not make any express findings as to prejudice," the court held that it was "required to assume for the purpose of argument" that the court had adjudicated prejudice, as well. That "assumed" adjudication was also an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Thomas v. Clements*, 789 F.3d 760 (7th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S.Ct. 1454 (2016). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to consult with a pathologist or other medical expert. The case involved the death of the defendant's ex-wife, with whom he still lived and with whom he still had sexual relations with. A neighbor downstairs heard noises for an hour that included the deceased screaming "Stop, stop. I love you. I love you." Subsequently, the defendant called the police saying the deceased was unconscious. She was unresponsive when police arrived. After several inconsistent statements, the defendant admitted causing the death but stated that it was unintentionally caused during sex and horseplay when he had his forearm across the deceased's throat. The state argued intentional murder, however, and supported this theory with the testimony of the medical examiner, who concluded that the death was caused by strangulation, which was intentional and would have taken at least four minutes of continuous pressure. While the state trial court had addressed the issue of deficiency, the state appellate court did not. Because the Seventh Circuit looks only to the "last reasoned opinion" in state court, the court held that there was no "look through" to the trial court. Because the appellate court did not address this issue, no deference was required and the claim was reviewed de novo. Although the court acknowledged that the result might be different under deferential review, the court found counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to consult a medical expert, despite being aware of the opinion of the state expert and that there was no external bruising on the deceased's neck or evidence of any struggle. Counsel admitted that there was no strategy for this failure and that counsel simply did not consider consulting with an expert. In finding no prejudice, the state court addressed the issue in only two sentences in which the court held that the defendant failed to demonstrate that consultation with and presentation of a defense expert "would have led to a different result at trial." Because this is the "wrong standard" and the defendant was required only to show a "reasonable probability" of a different result, the state court's adjudication was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Thus, the Seventh Circuit also reviewed this prong de novo. Again, acknowledging that the result might be different under deferential review, the court found prejudice. The state's theories of motive for murder were weak. Additionally, the state's case "suffers from a very serious flaw in terms of timing." While the state and its medical expert relied on four minutes of intentional strangulation, the neighbor heard noise for an hour, there was no evidence of a struggle, and the state provided no explanation of "how a woman being choked to death can scream 'Stop, stop, I love you, I love you' loud enough to be heard one floor below her." Under these circumstances, testimony from a defense expert that there was no evidence of intentional strangulation and that the evidence was entirely consistent with the defendant's statements of accidental death during sex and horseplay showed a reasonable probability of a different result.

Gebaree v. Steele*, 792 F.3d 991 (8th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 577 U.S. 1182 (2016). Counsel ineffective in child sodomy, molestation, and abuse case for failing to object to the inadmissible testimony of state experts vouching for the credibility of the alleged victim's and establishing the defendant's "propensity" for the crimes. There were four alleged victims, two of whom were the children of the defendant's live-in girlfriend, and two of whom were the defendant's children with the girlfriend. In 1996, three of the girls reported physical abuse. Thereafter, one of the three also alleged sexual abuse against herself and one of the others, who initially denied "bad touch[ing]" but then agreed. No physical evidence of sexual abuse was found, but there was substantial evidence of physical abuse found upon examination of the girls. Following conviction, a new trial was granted on the basis of trial counsel's failure to impeach the girls by introducing statements they had made recanting their allegations of sexual abuse. During retrial, both girls again alleged sexual abuse. The defendant testified and admitted physically disciplining the children, but denying it was abusive. He also denied the sexual abuse allegations. A state expert, Dr. Kelly, testified about the marks and evidence of physical abuse on the girls' bodies, as well as his opinion that these wounds had been intentionally inflicted. The District Court found counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object when Dr. Kelly, who had never interviewed the two girls alleging sexual abuse or been present during their interviews, went further and testified that their disclosure of the details of sexual abuse were "consistent" and "credible." Likewise, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the testimony of Dr. Sisk, a psychologist, who testified that he interviewed the defendant and administered testing "designed to uncover abusive or neglectful attitudes." He concluded that the defendant held "parenting beliefs that contributed to abuse and neglect." Defense counsel elicited further damning conclusions on cross-examination. No strategy explained counsel's failures. Counsel could not recall in post-conviction why she had not objected but speculated that she did not want to highlight Kelly's testimony by objecting and that she chose to "argu[e] away" Sisk's conclusions. Prejudice established as the state relied heavily on this inadmissible testimony by both doctors in closing arguments. The Eighth Circuit affirmed with respect to the sexual abuse convictions, but not the physical abuse convictions. In finding reasonable strategy based on counsel's testimony of what she "might have" been thinking, the state court's adjudication was an unreasonable application of Strickland. The only evidence of sexual abuse was the inconsistent testimony of the girls. In this context failure to object to the improper vouching and improper "propensity" evidence so as "not to draw attention" to the testimony was objectively unreasonable. With respect to Sisk she did draw attention to the testimony by eliciting greater detail in cross-examination. Likewise, the alleged strategy of explaining away the testimony was non-existent as counsel did not even mention this testimony in her closing argument. Because the state court relied on this unreasonable determination of the facts, the Eighth Circuit reviewed the issue de novo and found no reasonable strategy. Likewise, because the state court had not reached the issue of prejudice, this issue was reviewed de novo. Prejudice found as "[t]he doctors' inadmissible testimony strengthened an otherwise very weak case" of sex-abuse as there was no medical evidence and no independent eyewitness accounts and the testimony of the alleged victims was "conflicting and inconsistent." These convictions were reversed. As there was substantial credible evidence of physical abuse, however, there was no prejudice here and those convictions affirmed.

2014: Mosley v. Butler, 762 F.3d 579 (7th Cir. 2014). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder and arson case for failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. In its prior decision, in Mosley v. Atchison, 689 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2012), the Seventh Circuit agreed with the District Court that Mosley had met the requirements of 2254(d) by showing that the state court decision denying relief “rested on an unreasonable determination of facts and an analysis that was contrary to Strickland.” Id. at 580. The Seventh Circuit remanded, however, for determination of whether Mosley was entitled to relief under 2254(a), which “depends on whether he ‘is in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.’” The defendant was convicted in a bench trial under an accountability theory for an apartment building fire in which an elderly resident died. The state’s theory was that the defendant was a gang member, who ordered two younger gang members to set the fire in retaliation for the actions of Fernando, a resident in the building, who was a rival gang member. Her car window had been smashed out earlier because “she refused to pay ‘taxes’ to the Gangster Disciples for selling drugs out of her apartment.” Fernando testified that the defendant had threatened her at least five times and immediately before the fire, she heard the defendant outside the building saying “burn this motherfucker down.” Fernando’s friend corroborated this testimony. The defense presented only the testimony of Coward. She testified that the defendant was in a schoolyard across the street three hours before the fire with her and a group of people and she never heard him order anyone to set a fire or burn the building. Counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present testimony from two other witnesses, Jones and Taylor. Jones testified that she had been in the schoolyard with the defendant and a group of others for about two and half hours before the fire started. When the fire broke out, the defendant and the others from the schoolyard ran to the burning building in order to help the victims. She saw the defendant run into the burning building to aid rescue efforts. Taylor, who was a friend of the defendant. Taylor lived in the apartment right above Fernando. She would have testified that the defendant visited her earlier in the evening. Later, about 45 minutes before the fire she looked out her apartment window and saw the defendant and a group of other men and children (but no adult women) in the schoolyard. She never heard him say anything about burning down the building. After the fire started, she saw the defendant and others run over from the schoolyard, yelling that the building was on fire. The defendant rescued her infant son by catching him as Taylor dropped him from her window. Counsel testified that “he had not planned to call any witnesses at the trial because he was convinced that his motion for judgment of acquittal would be granted.” After the motion was denied, he spoke to Coward during a short recess and decided to call her to testify. He did not recall ever talking to Taylor but testified that he would not have called her to testify because her testimony that he had been in the building earlier contradicted his theory that the defendant was in the schoolyard all night and her testimony that no women were in the schoolyard contradicted Coward. During its initial review, the district court found counsel ineffective based on Jones and Taylor. During the remand for consideration under 2254(a), however, the court addressed only Taylor in finding that counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present her testimony. Counsel’s conduct was deficient, not based on strategy, and prejudicial.

Vega v. Ryan*, 757 F.3d 960 (9th Cir. 2014). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to review prior counsel’s file and, as a result, failing to call as a witness a Catholic priest to whom the alleged victim, the defendant’s stepdaughter, had recanted her allegations of sexual abuse. The initial allegation was made in 1996 and the defendant was charged in federal court. The charges were dismissed after Counsel 1 learned that the alleged victim had recanted her allegations to her mother and a priest. Later, the defendant was charged in state court, but again the charges were dismissed after Counsel 2 learned of the recantations. State charges were brought again

(eight counts) and Counsel 3 represented the defendant. After two mistrials, the defendant was convicted on five counts. After trial, counsel filed a motion for mistrial or to vacate judgment on the grounds that he had just learned that the alleged victim had recanted her allegations to the priest. The motion was denied. Counsel 3's conduct was deficient because counsel did not review the files of Counsel 1 and Counsel 2, which contained notes by both counsel that the alleged victim had recanted to the priest. The state court held that counsel's conduct was not deficient because the defendant knew of the recantation and did not inform counsel. This was an unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law under Rompilla where counsel were held to be ineffective for failing to obtain and review records—"all matters that Rompilla himself would have had some knowledge."

Rompilla is dispositive here. . . . The Court made clear in Rompilla that counsel had a duty—independent of whatever knowledge his client may have—to make reasonable investigation including, at a minimum, reviewing "the court file" on Rompilla's prior conviction. If Rompilla's counsel had a duty to review the court file in a prior case, it is minimally incumbent on Vega's counsel to review the file of the previous attorneys who handled the charges in the same case.

We think it apparent from Rompilla that the client's own knowledge of what is in his file is irrelevant to the discharge of his counsel's duty.

Here, counsel needed to look no further than previous counsel's files, which were "at his fingertips," to find the arguably exculpatory evidence. "[W]e can conceive of no circumstances where the decision not to read a client's file—a file prepared to answer the same charges—would be reasonable." Prejudice was also established because the priest was available and willing to testify because the recantation statement from the alleged victim was not obtained during confessional and, thus, was not privileged. The state could held that there had been no prejudice because this recantation would have been cumulative to the evidence admitted at trial that the alleged victim had recanted to her mother. The state court's holding was unreasonable. First, the recantation to the priest occurred at a different time as the recantation to the mother and the priest spoke to the alleged victim alone. Second, the family members in this case were pitted against each other and some testified (and the state argued) that the mother had pressured the alleged victim to recant in order to protect the defendant. Third, although there was no "priest-penitent privilege" here, state law "recognized the special relationship between priests and their parishioners." Thus, the priest's testimony "would have been of much greater weight" than the evidence of the recantation to the mother, such that it "could have tipped the scales" in the defendant's favor. In addition, the jury's verdict indicated prejudice, as well, in that the jury could not reach a unanimous verdict on three of the eight counts.

2013: McClellan v. Rapelje, 703 F.3d 344 (6th Cir.), cert. denied. 571 U.S. 1036 (2013). Counsel's conduct in murder case was "grossly deficient" in failing to interview witnesses and appellate counsel's procedural default of the issue did not bar merits review. The case arose out of a "barroom conflict" between two groups that spilled outside when they were asked to leave. The prosecution's theory was that the shooting was premeditated as the defendant left the bar and retrieved a gun from his car prior to the shooting. Numerous witnesses were available to testify that the defendant had the gun with him to start with and never went to his car to retrieve it. Likewise, these witnesses would have testified that the alleged victim who was much larger than the defendant “rushed him with a chrome object in his hand that appeared to be a gun” before the defendant pulled out his gun and fired. Cause and prejudice was established to overcome the procedural default because both the defendant and his aunt informed appellate counsel in letters, provided to the court, of the basis for investigation.

Cannedy v. Adams*, 706 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2013), amended, 733 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2013), cert. denied, 571 U.S. 1170 (2014). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in lewd acts upon stepdaughter case for failing to present witnesses who could have corroborated the defendant’s testimony that the stepdaughter had motives to lie. Her friend could have testified that the stepdaughter communicated with the witness by America Online Instant Message that she lied because she wanted to move to her natural father’s home rather than with her mother and the defendant. Prejudice established as there was no physical evidence and there were “significant inconsistencies in the government witnesses’ testimony.” In denying this claim, the state court unreasonably determined the facts in finding that counsel’s conduct was not deficient, as the defendant had informed counsel about the message and the witness’ willingness to testify and yet counsel failed to interview the witness.

2012: Elmore v. Ozmint*, 661 F.3d 783 (4th Cir. 2011) (tried initially in 1982 and retried in 1984). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital murder trial for “blind acceptance of the State’s forensic evidence” and failure to investigate or adequately challenge that evidence. The defendant spent nearly 30 years on death row. His death sentence was vacated by the state court in 2010 based on a finding of mental retardation on an Atkins claim. The defendant, a black, mentally retarded, handyman, had done work for the elderly, wealthy white victim and others in her neighborhood. The state’s evidence through the trials and for 17 years was that the victim was raped and murdered in her home on the evening of January 16, 1982, when the defendant had no alibi. Her body was discovered by a neighbor on January 18 and the neighbor immediately pointed at the defendant as a suspect. The defendant’s thumbprint was found on the exterior frame of the back door of the home and he was arrested on January 20 and tried less than three months later. The neighbor, police, and state experts testified during trial. Essentially, based on circumstantial evidence, including a TV guide open to the evening of January 16, the state put the time of death on that evening, even though the state’s pathologist who performed the autopsy days later, put the time of death anywhere between 11:00 a.m. on January 16 and to 11:00 p.m. on January 18. The state argued that the defendant entered the backdoor where the fingerprint was located, assaulted the victim, forced her into her bedroom and sexually assaulted and killed her on the bed before dumping her body in the bedroom closet, cleaned the scene of fingerprint and other evidence, and stole some money before leaving in his own car. During the 1984 trial, where the state’s evidence was identical to that from the 1982 initial trial, the state’s pathologist based on “history” received “estimated” the time of death to be the evening of January 16. A fingerprint analyst and four police officers testified the defendant’s thumbprint was “recent” and “fresh,” although the analyst conceded it could have been there for a month. An agent from the South Carolina Law Enforcement Division (SLED), who assisted in processing the scene, testified that he collected a number of hairs from the victim’s bed, but took no photographs of the hairs and did not collect the bedding.

Capital Case*

Another SLED agent testified that there were 49 hairs, 4 consistent with the victim, but 45 were Negroid with rare “banding” and a “reddish cast,” which was consistent with the defendant. Of the 45 Negroid hairs, the agent testified that four appeared to have fallen out normally, but 41 were forcibly removed by the 75-year-old victim during the sexual assault. Although the crime scene was “a particularly bloody one,” the state’s evidence was that there were small amounts of blood on the defendant’s shoes, coat, and denim pants. There was no blood or evidence in the defendant’s car or elsewhere. While the defendant’s ex-girlfriend testified that he was wearing a white shirt that she threw away that evening, no one asked for details, which would have been that she saw no blood on the shirt and she threw it away simply because she did not want his clothes at her house. All of the identifiable blood in the house was Type A, which was consistent with the victim and 40-45% of the population. Small amounts of Type A and Type B blood were on the defendant’s clothing. A jailhouse snitch, who later recanted in post-conviction proceedings, also testified during trial that the defendant had spontaneously confessed to him. The only defense evidence was the defendant’s own testimony denying involvement in the murder and denying confessing to the jailhouse snitch. Defense counsel essentially conceded the time of death, made only perfunctory efforts in cross-examination, and actually “vouched for the investigators” in closing arguments by citing SLED as a “fine department” with “good personnel,” who are “experts at everything they do.” The jury convicted after only two hours of deliberations. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as counsel conducted no independent analysis of the State’s evidence and never even thought to suspect irregularities in the chain of custody. Indeed, just days prior to the 1982 trial, counsel requested to see only the evidence the state intended to introduce during the trial. Even with “a rare second chance to contest the State’s case – along with near-perfect knowledge of what that case would be,” the same counsel did nothing more to prepare for the 1984 retrial. While counsel cited sparse state funding available, counsel made no effort to obtain funding and apparently never even considered challenging the state’s case as counsel had complete faith in the police. Indeed, it appears that counsel’s only preparations for trial was in the 10 day period prior to the 1982 trial and in the ten day period prior to the 1984 trial. If counsel had adequately investigated, a defense pathologist would have placed the most likely time of death, based solely on the autopsy evidence rather than a TV guide and the like, between 11:00 a.m. and 3:00 p.m. on January 17, a time frame when the defendant had an alibi. The pubic hair evidence on the bed could have been challenged by the lack of any photographs or seizure of the bedding, even though everything else in the house, including undisturbed rooms,” were photographed. Likewise, there was a “conspicuous omission of any reference to the hairs” in the affidavit in support of an arrest warrant. In addition, the hairs were contained in a clear plastic baggy on which the agent wrote directly when all the other evidence in the case had distinctive SLED labels on which the agents wrote. The defense theory was that the hairs allegedly found on the bed were removed from the defendant by police following arrest. The defendant could not challenge whether the hairs were actually his in post-conviction because neither the slides nor any record of them could be located. The print evidence could have been challenged because the defendant’s thumbprint on the backdoor frame was upside, which was consistent with him leaning on the door to wash windows rather than touching it on his way into the house or leaning on it as the state theorized. Likewise, while the state examiner had testified during trial that there were no other identifiable prints in the house, there was an identifiable print on the underside of a blood-smeared toilet seat in the bathroom connected to the victim’s bedroom. This print did not match the defendant. No determination could be made in post-conviction whether it belonged to the victim, as her prints also could not be located. The testimony that the defendant's print was "fresh" or "recent" also could have been challenged as there is no way to determine the age of a latent print. In addition, the evidence concerning the blood on the defendant's clothing could have been challenged because there were irregularities in the chain of custody for those items. In addition, the small amounts of blood on the clothing was inconsistent with the likely amount of the blood the actual killer, who had carried the victim's body allegedly from the bed to the closet, would have had on him. To make matters worse, the state's autopsy report reflected "apparent pubic hair" on the victim's chest and abdomen during autopsy. The evidence log by the pathologist listed this same evidence as "fibers, hairs from chest & abdomen." When this evidence reached SLED, the report of analysis of this evidence, marked as "Item T," was that it contained only "blue fibers." This evidence was not mentioned during any of the trials and "could not be located" during post-conviction until the post-conviction appeal, which was then remanded for analysis of the long hidden "blue fibers" of "Item T." Visual analysis of the slides revealed four human hairs, three animal hairs, and a single blue fiber. The human hairs were Caucasian. Experts disagreed on visual inspection about whether it was consistent or inconsistent with the victim, although everyone agreed it was inconsistent with the defendant. Mitochondrial DNA testing revealed that one of the Caucasian pubic hairs found on the victim's abdomen was not consistent with the victim. The defense also presented behavioral profiling evidence in post-conviction that tended to exculpate the defendant and implicate the neighbor who allegedly found the body, but was never seriously considered as a suspect by anyone because he was a County Councilman known personally to officers and defense counsel. The state court's determination that counsel's conduct was not deficient was both an unreasonable application of, and contrary to, the controlling Strickland principles." For example, the court found that no investigation was necessary because counsel "reasonably trusted in not only the integrity, but the infallibility, of the police," which the Fourth Circuit found to be a "notion abhorrent to Strickland, which was designed to protect the Sixth Amendment right to 'a reliable adversarial testing process.'"

A healthy skepticism of authority, while generally advisable, is an absolute necessity for a lawyer representing a client charged with capital murder. After all, the custodians of authority in our democracy are ordinary people with imperfect skills and human motivations. The duty of the defense lawyer "is to make the adversarial testing process work in the particular case, Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690 – an obligation that cannot be shirked because of the lawyer's unquestioning confidence in the prosecution.

Id. at _____. Here, counsel's conduct was deficient as "the need for scrutiny of the forensic evidence was indisputable." While counsel attempted to challenge the evidence in cross-examination, they "twice squandered opportunities to investigate the forensic evidence (prior to the 1982 and 1984 trials)." The state court also unreasonably applied Strickland because it "repeatedly relied on later-developed facts – unknown to Elmore's trial lawyers when they decided against investigating the State's forensic evidence prior to the 1982 and 1984 trials – to retroactively justify that decision." This was "in plain contravention of Strickland's contemporary assessment rule." The state court also unreasonably "deemed facts relevant to the prejudice issue to also be pertinent to the performance question." For example, the court held that counsel's conduct was not deficient in failing to investigate because the jury would have believed the state's evidence regardless of what the defense presented. On prejudice, the state court erroneously believed that the decision in Lockhart changed the prejudice-prong test. This was rejected as an unreasonable application of and contrary to Strickland in Williams. The PCR court also never considered "all of the trial and PCR evidence favoring Elmore's acquittal" in the prejudice analysis. To the contrary, the state court "embraced the theory that the only evidence that mattered was the evidence incriminating Elmore." Proper analysis leads to "only one reasonable conclusion:" a reasonable probability that Elmore "would have been acquitted" if counsel had performed competently. Counsel could have shown "gross violations of standard procedures for the handling of forensic evidence," as well as "the extraordinariness of finding so many incriminating hairs." There was "additional clear evidence that the SLED team was at least mistake-prone" and at worst "that the agents were outright dishonest."

Foster v. Wolfenbarger*, 687 F.3d 702 (6th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 568 U.S. 1228 (2013). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second-degree murder case for failing to investigate and present an alibi defense. The petitioner was at a woman's home having sexual relations. Afterwards her ex-boyfriend and father of her children showed up with friends. He assaulted the woman and then smashed the back window of the petitioner's vehicle as he was leaving. Police were called and the petitioner overheard the ex-boyfriend's address. Almost two hours later, the ex-boyfriend was shot as he arrived home by a man on foot. Petitioner was arrested and charged with first degree murder. His defense was based on mistaken identity. Prior to trial, a man sent a letter to counsel asserting that the petitioner was at his home at the time of the murder. Counsel spoke to the witness by phone for 15-20 minutes but chose not to call him as a witness because he thought he "would make a poor witness." Counsel's conduct was deficient. Even if the man was a "poor witness," counsel did nothing to investigate with respect to the other two potential alibi witnesses at the home at the same time. Either of these witnesses or all three together could have supported the defense. Moreover, the alibi defense was consistent with the mistaken identification defense presented.

Thus, this is not a situation where defense counsel is required to choose between two different avenues and pick the theory of the case that counsel believed was stronger. Instead, trial counsel chose not to investigate an avenue that potentially could have bolstered the defense that counsel was already pursuing.

Prejudice also established. The jury initially deadlocked before convicting on the lesser included offense of second degree murder. Moreover, the sole eyewitness against the petitioner described the shooter as 5'6, 180 pounds, and wearing a green jacket. The petitioner is 6'0', 240 pounds, and was wearing a blue jacket. "By any standard this is a weak identification." There was no other evidence, forensic or otherwise, linking the petitioner to the crime.

Toliver v. Pollard*, 688 F.3d 853 (7th Cir. 2012). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in first degree intentional homicide case for failing to present defense testimony from the petitioner's wife and cousin to support the defense argument that the petitioner tried to stop his brother from shooting the victim. The brothers lived with a man who sold drugs out of the residence. When some of the drug money was missing, they suspected that the victim had stolen it. The petitioner and his brother, who were both armed, brought her to the residence to question her. Three state witnesses testified that the petitioner ordered his brother to shoot her. The petitioner testified that he was pushing his brother back and trying to calm him when he shot her, but the brother shot and killed her anyway. Prior to trial, the petitioner's wife contacted counsel and told him that one of the state's eyewitnesses had told her that the petitioner was trying to wrestle the gun from his brother after the shooting. Counsel did not call her and never interviewed the cousin despite being told of his potential testimony by the petitioner. The cousin would have testified that he was present for a conversation between the two brothers one the brother admitted that he was to blame. While counsel was deceased and unavailable to testify, the pretrial state court record did reflect that the petitioner had requested new counsel because counsel would not follow-up on witness leads provided. The 7th Circuit had previously found prejudice prior to remanding the case for an evidentiary hearing and did not revisit that issue. Because the state court did not address the question of deficient conduct, the issue was reviewed de novo. Counsel's decision not to call these witnesses based simply on their family relationship to the defendant was not a "sound strategic choice." This testimony was crucial as the only defense witness was the petitioner.

Thomas v. Chappell*, 678 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 568 U.S. 1186 (2013). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. The petitioner was convicted of murdering two "'Deadheads,' who followed the Grateful Dead band on tour," near a homeless encampment by the San Francisco Bay. There was no direct evidence of guilt, but "considerable circumstantial evidence," although "none of the evidence presented by the prosecution plainly contradicted Petitioner's generally consistent account of what had occurred on the night of the murders and during the following morning." Id. at 1091. The defense argued that the state had not met its burden of proof and also argued that someone other than Petitioner had committed the crime. The only evidence presented of this was from the grand jury testimony of a homeless woman, who could not be located at the time of trial. Her testimony was characterized by the prosecution as "ridiculous, at best, perjurious at worst." Id. at 1093. Even according to the California Supreme Court, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present additional witnesses to corroborate the defense that another person committed the crimes. While the petitioner presented eleven corroborating witnesses, the state court found that competent investigation would have discovered only three of these witnesses. The District Court held that this was "not fairly supported by the record." Id. at 1098. Even considering just the three witnesses that the state court did, prejudice was found. The state's case was entirely circumstantial. The grand jury testimony of the one defense witness "was not particularly believable. Without any corroboration her story . . . appears to be fantasy." Id. at 1105. Even with that, the jury deliberated for almost five days, even though the argument and evidence only took six days to present. Moreover, "the jury struggled with precisely the theory that adequate representation would have bolstered." And, "[t]wo of the requested readbacks [of testimony during deliberations] related directly" to the theory that someone else committed the crime. Id. at 1103. The additional three witnesses corroborated her testimony.

2011: Breakiron v. Horn*, 642 F.3d 126 (3rd Cir. 2011). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective for several reasons murder committed during robbery case. The District Court vacated the murder conviction due to a Brady violation so only the robbery conviction was at issue. The petitioner never denied killing or theft but presented a voluntary intoxication/diminished capacity defense asserting he was guilty only of third-degree murder because he did not have the specific intent to kill. He also asserted guilt of only theft rather than robbery because he decided to steal after the murder was complete. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to request a jury instruction on the lesser- included offense of theft, which was supported by the evidence. This was the sole defense theory so no reasonable counsel would have failed to request the instruction. The state court's finding of no prejudice was both contrary to and an unreasonable application of Strickland. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to take corrective action during jury selection after a venire member testified in front of a panel of jurors that he knew the petitioner, who "used to do a lot of robbing." This juror was excused because he had a "fixed opinion" and could not be an impartial juror, but one of the venire members from the same panel served on petitioner's jury without ever being asked about other juror's statement. Counsel was ineffective in failing to move to strike the panel, seek a mistrial, or take other corrective action to ensure that no one exposed to the biased juror's testimony would serve on the jury. The state court's finding to the contrary was objectively unreasonable. While the state argued that the petitioner must show that the seated juror was actually biased, the Court held that Strickland requires an objective inquiry based on the prejudicial nature of the statement rather than a subjective view of the seated juror's opinions. In short, the proper inquiry was not whether the statement rendered the seated juror biased, but whether there is a reasonable probability that a juror exposed to that testimony would have voted to acquit.

. Counsel ineffective in second-degree murder case for failing to investigate a "causation" defense. The murder "arises from an incident that occurred when a party went awry." In essence, the victim was drinking, smoking marijuana, and using cocaine at a party. A woman at the party called the defendant and two other men asking for assistance with "a situation." When the men arrived they discovered that the victim had raped a woman. They pulled him outside and "punched him repeatedly." The defendant punched him 5-7 times and kicked him once. An ambulance was called, but the victim later died. The pathologist that conducted the autopsy found a chronic heart problem, possibly related to drugs, a .17 blood-alcohol level, noticeable levels of "cannabinoids" from marijuana, and significant levels of cocaine. There was blood in the lung tissue. The doctor concluded that the cause of death was asphyxia from inhaled blood that resulted from blunt-force injury to the face. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to pursue a causation defense after receiving this information. Counsel did not seek the records or interview the medics. Counsel claimed he did not get the report because he did not want to emphasize the victim's "fear and the effect of the attack." While this kind of fear might explain not offering the evidence during trial, "that is no reason not to read the report. How can one exercise reasonable professional judgment about whether to stop a causation-based investigation before reading the key report that might support it?" Id. at 246. Likewise, counsel's conduct was not excused by a defense medical expert agreeing with the cause of death found by the state's pathologist. The defense expert never saw the incident report or talked to the medics. "An attorney cannot hire an expert, give him whatever evidence he happens to have on hand (but not the evidence the client pointed to) and accept the report without further discussion." Id. at 247. "Hiring a medical expert to review an autopsy report does not amount to the outsourcing of all investigation into plausible causation theories, including a theory that may have nothing to do with the autopsy report.” Prejudice found. Investigation revealed that the victim was conscious when medics arrived, he fought medics when they tried to put him in the ambulance, and his mouth and nose were not flooded with blood, even though the state repeatedly argued that he “drowned in his own blood.” With this information, a defense expert could have testified that the cause of death was actually “cardio respiratory failure” due to cocaine toxicity from an “accidental” cocaine overdose. Prejudice especially with respect to the petitioner, as he was arguably the least culpable of assailants, such that there was no evidence of premeditation or anything else to suggest that he meant to kill the victim.

Sussman v. Jenkins*, 636 F.3d 329 (7th Cir.), cert. dismissed, 564 U.S. 1063 (2011). Counsel ineffective in child pornography and sexual assault of minor case for failure to adequately present evidence of the minor’s prior false accusation against his father during divorce proceedings. The petitioner was a former school mentor for the child, who also saw him frequently outside of school. Once the mentoring concluded, the child’s mother, acting on the advice of friends, asked the child if he had been abused. The child told his mother that petitioner had sexually abused him and the authorities were called. Counsel was initially precluded from eliciting testimony about the prior false allegation because he had not timely raised the issue pretrial as required by the Wisconsin rape shield statute. After the child testified that he did not report the abuse because he thought it “was right,” the trial court revisited the ruling and permitted counsel to inquire whether he had previously reported an unlawful touching. Counsel interpreted the court’s ruling to allow only cross of the child on this point. Thus, counsel did not seek to present evidence from the child’s father or counselor to establish the prior false accusations against the father or to establish that the child had denied to the counselor, as documented in his records, that petitioner had abused him. Because the state court addressed only prejudice, review of counsel’s conduct was de novo under AEDPA. While there is a presumption of reasonable professional judgment “as a general proposition of law,” that presumption “has little bearing” here. Counsel’s failure to file the pretrial motion was an oversight. Counsel’s failure to introduce the counselor’s note was due simply to a misunderstanding of the breadth of the trial court’s ruling. With respect to prejudice, the state court’s determination that the evidence would have been excluded even with a timely pretrial motion under the statute could not be reviewed as it was a matter of state law. The court could, however, consider the Confrontation Clause issue as the state court ruling precluded petitioner from confronting the witnesses against him. Here, with the evidence of the prior false accusations against his father, the jury could reasonably have concluded that the child was prone to use allegations of sexual abuse against father figures as a means either of gaining their attention or as a means of punishing them for abandoning him. This type of “evidence that exposes a motive to fabricate a specific kind of lie under a specific set of circumstances” directly implicated the petitioner’s confrontation rights. In failing to even address this confrontation issue, the state court unreasonably applied the law as construed by the Supreme Court. Prejudice established even though the jury heard evidence of the prior allegations. “[T]here is an obvious difference between an accusation and a false accusation.” Counsel did not establish that the prior allegation was false and did not explore the child’s motives for the false allegations against his father or draw parallels to the current case. While the child’s credibility was impeached generally, this evidence would have demonstrated that he “lies specifically about sexual abuse when he feels abandoned by father figures.” The child’s testimony was the only evidence of guilt. Even without the false-accusation testimony, the jury acquitted on some charges. Thus, “the jury harbored doubts as to some aspects of [the child’s] testimony.” Likewise, while a lay witness testified that the child had stated previously that his allegations against petitioner was false, failure to include the counselor’s note and testimony was prejudicial. The lay witness was thoroughly discredited as biased. The counselor was an objective third party with no motive to lie. The jury would “have given far more credence” to the counselor’s note. While this single note error might not require reversal due to required deference to “reasonable” state court determinations, the cumulative impact when combined with counsel’s failure to present the false allegation evidence required reversal.

United States v. Contentos, 651 F.3d 809 (8th Cir. 2011). Counsel ineffective in possession of child pornography case for failing to raise statute of limitations defense. The allegations were made by two 14-year-old girls, who alleged events eight years earlier. The government charged the defendant with possession “in or around 2001.” A general statute provided a five-year statute-of-limitations period. A later statute enacted July 27, 2006, extended the statute-of-limitations period, but only if the original period had not run. Thus, July 27, 2001, was the cut-off date for determining whether the statutory time was extended in this case. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to challenge this issue because the government did not present any specific evidence that the alleged conduct occurred before July 27, 2001. According to the girls’ testimony, the acts could have occurred any time between 2000 and 2002. Convictions vacated on these charges, although there remained valid convictions on other offenses.

2010: White v. Thaler, 610 F.3d 890 (5th Cir. 2010). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case for eliciting evidence about the defendant’s post-arrest silence and for failing to object to evidence the murder victim was pregnant at the time of her death. After a confrontation with a woman in a bar, the defendant ran over her and a second woman with his pickup while leaving the parking lot. The second woman, who was pregnant, died. The defendant never gave his exculpatory version of events—that he was fleeing from an angry mob—until his trial testimony. During direct, counsel elicited this fact. During cross, the state questioned the defendant “extensively about his post-arrest silence.” Because the state court did not adjudicate deficiency on the merits, the court reviewed this de novo. Counsel conceded he did not elicit this evidence as part of a strategy. Because the police did not advise the defendant of his Miranda rights at the time of arrest, there was no violation under federal constitutional law. Under the Texas Constitution, however, state cases held “that a defendant’s post-arrest, pre-Miranda silence could not be used against him at trial.” In short, “Texas law prohibits a prosecutor from impeaching a defendant with his post-arrest silence.” By opening the door, defense counsel allowed the prosecutor to “verbally pound[]” the defendant and to “mock[]” his testimony that he feared for his life. The prosecutor used the silence as “prior inconsistent conduct” and argued the defendant was not “credible” on this basis. The state court’s finding of no prejudice was “objectively unreasonable.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object or file a motion in limine to exclude evidence that the victim was pregnant. Again, because the state court did not adjudicate deficiency, this was reviewed de novo. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as the evidence of pregnancy was “irrelevant” under state evidence rules as the only disputed issue at trial was whether the defendant “intended to hit the victims with his truck.” Moreover, there was no evidence to show the defendant knew the victim was pregnant, as this only became apparent during the autopsy. Counsel conceded there was no strategy for failing to object to this evidence. Prejudice established, as the state referred to the death of the “unborn child” nine times in closing arguments. Prejudice was also clear as the murder conviction rested on the jury finding intent to kill the victim. By its verdict, however, the jury acquitted him of (finding no intent) attempted murder of the other woman, who was the person he had argued with. “Under these circumstances, the jury’s verdict of intentional murder is not reliable.” The state court’s finding of no prejudice was “objectively unreasonable.” While both of these issues were prejudicial, standing alone, the cumulative of “combined prejudicial effect . . . inexorably leads” to reversal.

English v. Romanowski*, 602 F.3d 714 (6th Cir. 2010) (affirming in part and reversing in part, 589 F. Supp. 2d 893 (E.D. Mich. 2008)). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in assault with intent to commit murder case for failing to adequately investigate prior to informing the jury in opening statements that the defendant’s girlfriend would be called as a witness to corroborate the claim of self-defense. Because the state court had failed to address the issue, although raised in state court, review was de novo. Counsel’s conduct was deficient, even though there were arguably valid strategic reasons for counsel’s decision not to call the girlfriend as a witness. “This is not a case where counsel simply failed to pursue a potential witness. . . . Here, counsel was actually prepared to call” the witness and informed the jury of this intent before discovering the problems and concerns that caused counsel to change his mind. Simple pretrial interviews of witnesses would have revealed the problems, but counsel “failed to interview any of the witnesses outside of the courthouse or prior to trial.” Reasonable trial strategy could not be developed on guesses of what witnesses would say. The unfulfilled promise to the jury to call the girlfriend as a witness was prejudicial because the unfulfilled promise (1) created a negative inference against the defendant generally; (2) caused a negative inference against the defendant’s own testimony, which counsel promised would be corroborated by the girlfriend; and (3) prejudicial, inflammatory evidence of the girlfriend’s witness tampering and alleged false evidence planting would not have been admitted if defense counsel had not identified her as a witness. In addition, the state’s evidence was not overwhelming as there were “no unbiased witnesses” and no physical evidence.

2009: Wilson v. Mazzuca, 570 F.3d 490 (2nd Cir. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in robbery case for numerous reasons and the state court finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. In December 1992, the victim was robbed at gunpoint by two men. That day, he gave a general description of the man that assaulted him and demanded cash and then selected the defendant’s photo from a book of “mug shots” maintained by police. The defendant was arrested almost two years later on unrelated extortion charges. The next day the robbery victim picked him out of a line-up and the defendant was charged with the robbery. Under New York law, the initial photo identification was inadmissible except for rebuttal purposes. During opening statements, defense counsel asserted mistaken identification and insufficient police investigation. The trial court warned defense counsel that if he proceeded along the line of the police investigation, the door would be opened for the photo identification. Following opening, the trial had to be continued because the victim did not appear. He was brought in under a Material Witness Order. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in eliciting testimony from him on cross that he did not appear because he feared the defendant would retaliate against him for testifying. This was “objectively unreasonable” because there had been no mention of fear in appearing before. “To ask these questions on the theory that [the witness] might say that he was not afraid of [the defendant] was “reckless and objectively unreasonable.” Counsel also opened the door on cross to the photo identification. Counsel initially “appeared to misunderstand the legal issue” but “[t]his mistaken belief was entirely unreasonable, especially in light of the court’s warning following opening that “was more than sufficient to dispel any misunderstanding” on counsel’s part. During the rebuttal, the state referred to the photos as “mug shots” without objection from the defense. The trial court suggested that the “mug shots” be redacted to exclude the booking plaque hanging around the defendant’s neck. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in objecting to the redaction. Counsel had “no strategic explanation” for the failure to object to the “mug shot” label or for objecting to redacting the photos. Next, counsel’s conduct was deficient in introducing the unredacted arrest report on the extortion charges, despite the trial court expressing concerns and sua sponte raising the possibility of whether the defendant had been denied the effective assistance of counsel. Counsel’s reasons, in showing the prior arrest was “baloney” and to be “honest” with the jury, were “incomprehensible.” It also appeared that counsel “did not even realize that the report contained prejudicial information linking the defendant to “prior threatening and violent activity.” Finally, counsel presented a character witness and inquired about the defendant being a role model for youth in a community organization. Although the trial court gave counsel an opportunity to strike his own question, counsel declined. This testimony opened the door for the state to inquire on cross about the witness’ knowledge of the defendant’s prior convictions for drugs, weapons, theft, and assault. “It was objectively unreasonable for defense counsel, particularly in the face of the trial court’s warnings, not to have understood that eliciting reputation testimony would lead to the introduction of [the defendant’s] criminal history.” In short:

The record indicates that defense counsel misinterpreted and misunderstood the law, failed to pay attention, acted recklessly, and did not appreciate the consequences of his decisions, even though in many cases he was explicitly warned of the risks by the trial court.

Prejudice established. The state’s whole case was built on the “single eyewitness identification made two years after the robbery by a reluctant eyewitness who testified only after being served with a material witness warrant.” “On the other side of the ledger,” due only to defense counsel’s errors, the evidence undermined the “mistaken identification defense, corroborated the eyewitness identification, and implied [the defendant] had a propensity for criminality and violence. Indeed, the state’s closing argument relied primarily on the “evidence that would not have been admissible but for [counsel’s] decisions at trial.” In addition, the trial court expressed concern about ineffective assistance during the trial or in “real-time, not merely post hoc.”

Richards v. Quarterman*, 566 F.3d 553 (5th Cir. 2009) (affirming 578 F. Supp. 2d 849 (N.D. Tex. 2008)). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case (with death a day or so after assault) for a number of reasons. The case involved a number of homeless people living on the streets near a church tent known as the “slab church.” Two eyewitnesses testified that they observed the victim and defendant in a minor altercation and returned later to see the victim standing over the defendant, who appeared to be asleep, with a stick and length of steel. The defendant got up, picked up a piece of asphalt, and hit the victim 9 or 10 times around the head and face. The defendant’s brother later discovered the victim’s body and testified that the defendant told him, consistent with the eyewitness testimony, that the victim had choked him into unconsciousness. When he awoke, he hit the victim in self-defense. First, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present evidence (and preventing the state from presenting evidence) of the victim's pre-death statements that significantly varied from the state's evidence and theory. In essence, the victim had gone to a nearby house at 3:00 a.m. and told a witness there he had been attacked by 3-5 men after he had fallen asleep and that another man [not the defendant] was the principal assailant that hit him in the head with a brick. Due to counsel's sustained hearsay objections, the victim's statements were excluded. The victim also told the police officer that responded to the house that he was attacked by 4 men around 3:00 a.m. and that he knew the men. Again, counsel's sustained hearsay objections excluded the victim's statements. Another homeless man testified that he was with the victim in the area around 6:00-7:00 a.m. when a man (not matching the defendant's description) walked by and the victim became agitated and said he was the attacker from the night before. Again, the victim's statements were excluded based on counsel's objections. Finally, counsel failed to present the defendant's testimony that his fight with the victim occurred around 10:00 or 10:30 p.m. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on any legitimate strategic reason. The state court's contrary findings were an unreasonable application of Strickland. Second, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to request instruction on aggravated assault, a lesser-included offense. This was not the result of any reasoned trial strategy. Counsel initially stated she thought the request would have been frivolous. But, counsel's "testimony strongly suggests that she both failed to recognize" that it "was entirely possible for the jury to believe that [the defendant] did not act in self-defense but also believe that he did not kill [the victim]." Counsel "misunderstood the law governing lesser-included offenses." Thus, her additional explanation that she did not want to give the jury the option of convicting of a lesser offense was "a 'post-hoc rationalization' rather than a genuine account of her decision-making process." The state court's contrary finding was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Third, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to put into evidence the defendant's VA medical records to establish the defendant's physical problems, which included a triple bypass surgery, left side weakness, frequent chest pains, and an inability to walk more than half a block without stopping. Counsel's "ethical" explanations for not presenting this evidence "were developed after the fact" and "make no sense." "[T]here is nothing implausible about being strong enough to hit someone two to three times with a rock in self-defense but not strong enough to kill the person." The medical evidence also might have made the self-defense claim "more plausible." Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on reasonable strategy. The state court's contrary findings were an unreasonable application of Strickland and the state court's factual findings on this were rebutted by clear and convincing evidence. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to interview important witnesses prior to trial. Again, the state court's contrary findings were an unreasonable application of Strickland and the state court's factual findings on this were rebutted by clear and convincing evidence. Prejudice established based on the "cumulative effect" of the errors. "But for the deficiencies in [counsel's] performance . . . , the jury would have heard compelling evidence that there was another, more serious assault on [the victim] after the one described by the prosecution's witnesses and [the defendant] himself, as well as of [the defendant's] documented frailties."

Bigelow v. Haviland*, 576 F.3d 284, rehearing denied, 582 F.3d 670 (6th Cir. 2009) (affirming 476 F. Supp. 2d 760 (N.D. Ohio 2007)). Counsel ineffective in kidnaping, assault, and arson case for failing to adequately prepare and present alibi evidence. The defendant was arrested based on his resemblance to a composite sketch of the attacker. He maintained that he was in a different city at the time of the attack. He presented one alibi witness to state that he was working with the defendant 150 miles away on the day of the crimes. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to identify other alibi witnesses. He called some witnesses, whose names the defendant had provided. They could verify that the defendant had been there sometime during the month, but could not pinpoint the relevant day. The defendant then attempted to locate additional witnesses, sending letters to some people. Four days before trial, one potential alibi witness contacted counsel and informed him he had met the defendant that day and identified the location where wedding preparations were being made. The witness believed only three people were there and the third person, the home owner, could not verify the defendant's presence. Nonetheless, counsel called only this witness and did not search for other corroborating witnesses. If counsel had taken additional steps, he would have discovered that "many others" were at the house the day. "An attorney's duty of investigation requires more than simply checking out the witnesses that the client himself identifies," especially where, as here, the defendant suffered from an "untreated mental illness." Prejudice established because two additional alibi witnesses would have bolstered the defense. Thus, there would have been, at minimum, "two reasonably confident alibi witnesses, with no connection to [the defendant] and no axe to grind, who had time to observe him under ordinary conditions, versus two prosecution witnesses who caught no more than a glimpse of the perpetrator's face." There was, however, a third alibi witness. "The three witnesses who corroborated his alibi were strangers to [the defendant], to the victim and to the crime and thus had no reason to perjure themselves one way or another. And all of this must be weighed against the flaws in the prosecution's case." The state court's conclusions unreasonably applied Strickland.

2008: Avery v. Prelesnik, 548 F.3d 434 (6th Cir. 2008) (affirming 524 F. Supp. 2d 903 (W.D. Mich. 2007)), cert. denied, 558 U.S. 932 (2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second degree murder case for failing to investigate and interview alibi witnesses. The defendant gave counsel three names and the business address for alibi witnesses. Counsel's investigator went there and interviewed one of the individuals, who was not personally an alibi, but told the investigator that his brother, who the defendant had named, and another person had been with the defendant. The investigator left his business card but neither the investigator nor counsel took any other action to investigate. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, at bare minimum, counsel should have sought the witness' phone number and made a reasonable attempt to contact them. Failure to do so was not excused by strategy. "[T]he limitations on [the] investigation rendered it impossible for [counsel] to have made a 'strategic choice' not to have [the alibi witnesses] testify because he had no idea what they would have said." Prejudice was reviewed de novo because the state court did not rule on this issue. Although the state post-conviction judge found at least one of the witnesses to be "totally incredible," the Sixth Circuit noted that the hearing was more than a year after the trial. In addition, "evaluation of the credibility of alibi witnesses is 'exactly the task to be performed by a rational jury,' not by a reviewing court." The court also noted that there was "otherwise flimsy evidence" supporting the conviction, which was basically one eyewitness, "peeking" out a window in the dark. This witness also had made inconsistent statements and identifications.

2007: Bell v. Miller, 500 F.3d 149 (2nd Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective in robbery and assault case for failing to consult with a medical expert regarding the reliability of the victim's identification of the defendant. The victim was robbed and shot in the thigh with a shotgun in the street. When police arrived he had lost half his blood. He described his assailant as a black male with a lemon-colored shirt in a fashion that implied he did not know the shooter. He then lapsed into a coma for eleven days. He identified the defendant by name when he recovered although he continued to take painkillers every four hours and suffered from memory lapses and dizziness for a month. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he asked no questions about the medications or memory loss. He also asked no questions of the ER doctor concerning the effect of blood loss on consciousness and memory or the effect of the medications. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to consult a "medical expert regarding the effects of trauma, blood loss and painkillers" on the victim's memory. No strategy explained this failure. Prejudice found because there was evidence of "retrograde amnesia," which was exacerbated by the medications he was likely given in the ER, and that he likely had not fully regained consciousness when he first identified the defendant. While state law prohibited testimony on the reliability of eyewitness identification from social scientists, it is likely the trial court would have permitted a "medical expert" to testify to these factors. [It should be noted that while the court repeatedly referred to a "medical expert," the defendant's post-conviction evidence of prejudice was from a "neuropsychologist."] There was no evidence linking the defendant to the crime other than the victim's identification and he had three alibi witnesses. Under AEDPA, the court's review was conducted de novo because the state court had applied a state rule that was not regularly applied to deny relief and was, therefore, not adequate to bar habeas review. The state court's alternative statement that "if the merits were reached, the result would be the same" was not an adjudication on the merits requiring application of § 2254(d).

Fadiga v. Attorney General U.S., 488 F.3d 142 (3rd Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective in immigration proceedings where the issue of ineffectiveness is cognizable under the Fifth Amendment as a violation of due process but the courts often and in this case essentially used the Strickland standard. Here, the alien was a native of Guinea, who entered the country in 1991 on a visa that expired after one month. Eleven years later, INS brought removal proceedings. The alien applied for withholding of removal and protection under the Convention Against Torture. During the hearing, the alien testified that he had left Guinea due to political issues in the country, which rose to the level of his uncle being murdered due to political motivations, and his fear that he would be "arrested, tortured, or killed." Shortly after his departure, an arrest warrant had been issued for him charging "public disorder." The Immigration Judge (IJ) found dramatic inconsistencies in his testimony and the application filed and noted the lack of supporting witnesses and documents to corroborate the alien's testimony. Although the alien and his counsel essentially explained that the fault lay with counsel, the IJ ruled against the alien. The alien appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) and, represented by new counsel, asserted only the ineffectiveness of initial counsel, who provided an affidavit in support of the issue. The BIA denied relief and the case proceeded to the Third Circuit. Counsel admitted (and the court found) that counsel's conduct was deficient because a law student prepared the application and counsel assumed it was complete and accurate. Thus, counsel did not review the application with the alien or advise him to review it before signing it. He also did not discuss with the alien the need for additional witnesses and corroboration other than a simple generic letter about a month before the hearing, which is the only reason the alien was able to provide some documentation. In discussing a threshold procedural requirement applied by the BIA for ineffectiveness claims, the court held that the "Lozada requirements" do not require a bar or disciplinary complaint against counsel. Those requirements are aimed at serving, in essence, the interests of ensuring adequate counsel, deterring meritless claims of ineffectiveness, and prohibiting “collusion between counsel and the client” on these issues.

All of these interests—save the last—are served without a complaint where, as here, prior counsel has fully and openly owned up to his error and provided a detailed affidavit attesting to the problems in the representation. As to the “collusion” rationale, it seems unlikely that a lawyer would go so far as to commit perjury (i.e., intentionally filing a false affidavit) in furtherance of such collusion. Therefore, we find that the requirement of a complaint was excused in this case where counsel acknowledged the ineffectiveness and made every effort to remedy the situation.

Id. at 156-57. Prejudice found because the IJ’s doubts about the alien’s credibility and the lack of corroborating evidence were caused by counsel’s deficient conduct. “Thus, counsel’s errors contributed directly to the evidentiary defects that led the IJ to deny relief.” Id. at 163.

Richey v. Bradshaw, 498 F.3d 344 (6th Cir. 2007). On remand from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit again held that counsel was ineffective in inadequately cross-examining the state’s experts and failing to present competing scientific evidence on the cause of the fire that caused the deaths. See Richey v. Mitchell, 395 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2005). Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the State presented two experts to present a detailed, specific theory of arson, which was “fundamental to the State’s case.” Counsel retained his own expert late in the case and just deferred to his conclusion agreeing with the State’s experts without question. “[T]he mere hiring of an expert is meaningless if counsel does not consult with that expert to make an informed decision about whether a particular defense is viable.” 498 F.3d at 362. Here, the defense expert did not perform his own independent testing and deferred to the state expert’s who he believed to be better qualified.

[I]t is inconceivable that a reasonably competent attorney would have failed to know what his expert was doing to test the State arson conclusion, would have failed to work with the expert to understand the basics of the science involved, at least for purposes of cross-examining the State’s experts, and would have failed to inquire about why his expert agreed with the State. A lawyer cannot be deemed effective where he hires an expert consultant and then either willfully or negligently keeps himself in the dark about what that expert is doing, and what the basis for the expert’s opinion is. . . . The point is not that [counsel] had a duty to shop around for another expert who would refute the conclusions of [the defense expert] and the State’s experts. The point is that [counsel] had a duty to know enough to make a reasoned determination about whether he should abandon a possible defense based on his expert’s opinion. . . . Having simply been served up with [the defense expert’s] flat agreement with the State, and not having known either what [he] did to arrive at his conclusion or why he came out where he did, [counsel] was in no position to make this determination.

Capital Case*

Id. Counsel's conduct was not explained by strategy to simply challenge the identity of the arsonist since other circumstantial evidence against Richey "made such a choice unreasonable." In addition, because there were gaps in the State's proof "investigating the scientific basis for the State's arson conclusion became all the more imperative." Id. Counsel could have presented testimony to severely undermine the State's case by attacking the State's analysis as "unsound and out of step with prevailing scientific standards," disputing the conclusion that gasoline or paint thinner traces were found; testifying that the burn patterns and speed were consistent with a naturally occurring fire; and testifying that the most likely cause of the fire was a cigarette smoldering in the cushions of the victim's couch. Prejudice established for trial and sentencing. "Although the circumstantial evidence alone might have led to a conviction, the question before us is not one of the sufficiency of the evidence, but of undermining our confidence in the reliability of the result." Id. at 364.

Ramonez v. Berghuis*, 490 F.3d 482 (6th Cir. 2007). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in home invasion, assault, and aggravated stalking case for failing to interview and present the testimony of three witnesses. The defendant was charged with breaking into his ex-girlfriend's home (and she had two of his children living with her) and assaulting her. Even according to her preliminary hearing testimony, three witnesses saw a portion of the alleged events. Those three men were the defendant's son, stepson, and an acquaintance from work. Months prior to trial, the defendant insisted that counsel call these men as witnesses. Counsel did not interview them or even attempt to do so until just days before trial when he attempted to call one of them but was successful only in exchanging phone messages. At the close of the prosecution's case, the defendant insisted to the court that he wanted those witnesses called. The court declined to intervene in counsel's judgment. Thus, the defendant was left only with his own testimony, which counsel had also advised against. He denied breaking into the home, but admitted to pushing the woman when they got into an argument because she was high and his children were in the home. Counsel's conduct was deficient because of the "decision to limit (or more accurately, not to pursue at all until it was too late) any investigation regarding the three potential witnesses." The state court found that counsel had a reasonable strategy to focus just on undermining the alleged victim's credibility as to events inside the home, but that "strategy" was based on counsel's "belief that was grounded on a fatally flawed foundation" that the witnesses, who were outside, could not support that strategy. If counsel had interviewed the witnesses, he would have learned that they did witness events inside the home and their testimony would have corroborated the defendant's testimony.

That being so, the state court ignored the central teaching of Strickland, as reaffirmed by Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 522-23, that the investigation leading to the choice of a so-called trial strategy must itself have been reasonably conducted lest the "strategic" choice erected upon it rest on a rotten foundation.

In addition, counsel's explanation of "strategy" was contradicted by the record. Counsel was aware from the alleged victim's preliminary hearing testimony that the witnesses outside could have at least addressed whether the defendant kicked in the door and whether the alleged assault continued outside the home with one of the witnesses even assisting the defendant. "How could [counsel] rationally have concluded that . . . [none of the witnesses] could possibly have anything to add to [the defendant's] case? Of course the answer is he didn't—at least not entirely" since counsel did attempt to reach at least one of these witnesses shortly before trial and then conceded to the court during the trial that these witnesses could possibly contradict the alleged victim's testimony. With this recognition, it was "objectively unreasonable" for counsel "not to interview them (or at least make reasonable efforts to interview them) before coming to his ultimate choice of trial conduct."

In sum, the point is this: Constitutionally effective counsel must develop trial strategy in the true sense—not what bears a false label of "strategy"—based on what investigation reveals witnesses will actually testify to, not based on what counsel guesses they might say in the absence of a full investigation.

Prejudice was also established because the jury sent out a note during deliberations saying it was deadlocked on the home invasion count and the trial was one of a credibility contest between the alleged victim and the defendant. The court noted that there were inconsistencies in the post-conviction testimony of the three witnesses and the state court found one of them to be not credible and found a second one to be "not a particularly helpful witness," which did not appear to be a credibility finding. The state court made no "finding" as to the third witness. Regardless, the Sixth Circuit held:

a state court's blanket assessment of the credibility of a potential witness—at least when made in the context of evaluating whether there is a reasonable probability that the witness's testimony, if heard by the jury, would have changed the outcome of the trial—is not a fact determination within the bounds of Section 2254(e)(1). After all, what the state court has really done is to state its view that there is not a reasonable probability that the jury would believe the testimony and thus change its verdict.

The Sixth Circuit rejected this approach because "the question whether those witnesses were believable for purposes of evaluating [the alleged victim's] guilt is properly a jury question."

In the end, weighing the prosecution's case against the proposed witness testimony is at the heart of the ultimate question of the Strickland prejudice prong, and thus it is a mixed question of law and fact not within the Section 2254(e)(1) presumption. Even though the jury could have discredited the potential witnesses here based on factors such as bias and inconsistencies in their respective stories, there certainly remained a reasonable probability that the jury would not have.

The court also declared that "[a]ll it would have taken is for 'one juror [to] have struck a different balance' between the competing stories (Wiggins, 529 U.S. at 537)." The court footnoted that

Wiggins was a death penalty case in which a single juror's vote would have spared defendant's life. In [this] case, of course, even a single juror's holdout would have resulted in a hung jury rather than a conviction, while a jury's unanimous striking of "a different balance" would have produced an acquittal.

Raygoza v. Hulick*, 474 F.3d 958 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1033 (2007). Under AEDPA, trial counsel was ineffective in murder trial for failing to adequately investigate and present an alibi defense. The defendant, a gang member, was charged with murder and a second shooting of rival gang members in a Chicago Pizzeria. A confession was suppressed because of a Sixth Amendment violation as a result of extended interrogations despite the petitioner's representation by counsel. The petitioner waived jury trial. During the ensuing bench trial, the state's eyewitness testimony consisted of three rival gang members and a passerby who did not see the shooter's face and was only able to give a general description of the perpetrators' clothing as they fled from the scene. Another witness testified that Petitioner had been at a party near the scene shortly before the murder and trial counsel did not impeach her even though she had previously told police he was not present and never said that he was until two years after his arrest. Trial counsel conducted almost no cross-examination of the state witnesses and presented one alibi witness, the Petitioner's girlfriend, but argued the defendant was at home with his mother, girlfriend, and others. The state hammered in closing on the lack of additional alibi witnesses and the trial court found the petitioner guilty. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to prepare and present the alibi evidence. Although counsel met with the Petitioner's mother numerous times, he never inquired and never learned that the date of the alleged crime, the Petitioner's mother had a birthday party in her home which the defendant and nine others, including relatives and non-relatives, attended. The court also noted that "Mapquest (a popular internet site)" put the party an hour's drive away from the murder scene. Available alibi evidence included testimony from people at the party; testimony of an attorney, who was the mother's employer, and her husband, that they had called the home during the party and spoken to the Petitioner, who answered the phone; and phone records and train tickets corroborating the available testimony in parts. Although trial counsel asserted his trial strategy was to attack the identification witnesses, he never attempted to interview any of them or the state's other witnesses. In addition, "[i]n a first-degree murder trial, it is almost impossible to see why a lawyer would not at least have investigated the alibi witnesses more thoroughly." Id. at 964. The court noted that counsel may have been influenced by his own opinion of the petitioner's guilt, but held that this "would hardly distinguish him from legions of defense counsel who undoubtedly do the same every day, yet who conscientiously investigate their clients' cases before coming to a final decision about trial strategy." Id. Counsel also asserted that each of the alibi witnesses could be impeached due to some alleged bias. Even if this were true, counsel "does not seem to have considered what impact they would have cumulatively." Id. The court also found prejudice, "even taking into account both the AEDPA standard or review and the fact that the trial judge [who was also the post-conviction judge] subjectively believed that the array of additional alibi witnesses would not have swayed his judgment." Id. at 965. The state's case was "not particularly strong."

Obviously, a trier of fact approaching the case with fresh eyes might choose to believe the eyewitnesses and to reject the alibi evidence, but this trier of fact never had the chance to do so.

Id. at 965.

2006: Rolan v. Vaughn*, 445 F.3d 671 (3rd Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to adequately investigate and present two witnesses who would have supported the claim of self-defense. The defendant told counsel about the witnesses and counsel notified the state that they were alibi witnesses (rather than self-defense), but never attempted to contact the two witnesses. The state did contact the witnesses. One (who died prior to post-conviction proceedings) refused to cooperate with the state and denied being an alibi witness and the other declined to be a witness against the defendant. During trial, the defendant informed the court that he had two witnesses but counsel refused to call the witnesses. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[f]ailure to conduct any pretrial investigation is objectively unreasonable." Counsel's decision was not given "the normal deference to strategic choices because it was uninformed." Under AEDPA, the state court's ruling that the second witness would have refused to testify on behalf of the defense was an objectively unreasonable finding of fact that was not supported by the record. The witness had stated only that he would not testify for the prosecution. Prejudice found because the state's case was weak and this witness would have bolstered the affirmative defense and undermined the prosecution's claims of a premeditated murder during a robbery. This witness "also shows the relevance" of the other witness, who died after trial without ever having been interviewed.

Stewart v. Wolfenbarger*, 468 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 2006). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for several reasons. Counsel failed to provide alibi notice to the prosecution of the place of the alibi, as required by Michigan law, which resulted in the exclusion of alibi testimony. Counsel also failed to investigate a potential witness, who resided in a home where a prosecution witness alleged that the defendant made death threats against the victim. This witness would likely have testified that the defendant was not at his house on the date of the alleged threats. Prejudice found because the failure to give proper alibi notice resulted in the trial court's exclusion of two of the three alibi witnesses when the jury knew that others should be available and the one that testified was impeached with prior convictions, the prosecution emphasized the lack of other alibi witnesses during cross-examination of the one alibi witness who did testify, and the witness not called would have cast substantial doubt on the key prosecution witness's testimony that the defendant made death threats against the victim shortly before the murder.

Goodman v. Bertrand*, 467 F.3d 1022 (6th Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery and a felon in possession of a firearm trial for numerous reasons. After police arrested two suspects in a getaway car, one of them brokered a deal by implicating the petitioner. One of the robbery victims initially chose someone else in a lineup and then chose the petitioner. The second robbery victim selected someone else in a lineup. Following an initial mistrial due to a hung jury, the second initial suspect agreed to testify against the petitioner in exchange for leniency and identifying another participant, who also testified against the petitioner. In the second trial, the eyewitness, who did not identify the defendant, did not testify for the state and did not testify for the defense because counsel failed to subpoena her because counsel erroneously believed that the State would call her as a witness. Because counsel could not demonstrate that she was unavailable, the trial court excluded portions of her prior testimony from the second trial. "There is little tactical wisdom in counsel resting on his hands and assuming the government would help make the defense case for him." Counsel also opened the door on direct examination of the defendant to cross-examination about two of the petitioner's prior armed robbery convictions. The nature of the prior felonies would otherwise have been excluded because counsel had stipulated to the petitioner's status as a convicted felon. Counsel also failed to request a limiting charge to the jury after two of the participant witnesses testified that they had been threatened due to their participation in the trial and the court admitted the testimony for the limited basis of reflecting on the witnesses' credibility by demonstrating that they had something to lose as well as to gain by their testimony. Finally, counsel failed to object to the prosecution's misleading statements in questioning that one participant witness had not been given any reason to testify and false statements in argument to bolster the credibility of another participant witness. The state court decision was "contrary to" clearly established federal law because the court conflated the heightened prejudice standard of Lockhart v. Fretwell, 506 U.S. 364 (1992) with the Strickland standard by citing to Strickland at times but repeatedly reasoning that the petitioner failed to show that his trial was "fundamentally unfair" or "unreliable." Even if it wasn't contrary to federal law, it was an unreasonable application of Strickland because the state court weighed each error individually when the "cumulative effect" of the errors required reversal. Rather than evaluating each error in isolation, . . . the pattern of counsel's deficiencies must be considered in their totality." Id. at 1030.

Stanley v. Bartley*, 465 F.3d 810 (7th Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to interview any witnesses or prospective witnesses. According to the state's case, three gang members were present at the time of the murder, including the state's primary witness, who was a cocaine addict and convicted felon. The petitioner's sister also testified, following a question directing her attention to a day and time shortly after the murder, that the petitioner told her he had killed someone. Other testimony was only secondary. Counsel read the statements prospective witnesses gave the police, but he did not interview anyone. He sought instead to only cross-examine the witnesses concerning any discrepancies. Counsel was aware of the statement of a prospective witness, who did not testify at trial, that a few hours before the murder, the state's primary witness and the murder victim had had a quarrel over cocaine that had involved pushing and shoving. Counsel cross-examined the state's principal witness about this argument, but he denied that the argument had been serious or had involved pushing or shoving. If counsel had interviewed the prospective witness, he would have been aware and could have cross-examined the witness and presented evidence that the murder victim had struck the witness with a wine bottle, punched him, and had knocked him down. Afterwards, the witness told the murder victim that he would catch "his ass later on." Counsel also had failed to interview the petitioner's sister, who had told officers that she saw him with a gun a week before the murder when he had been drinking, which always led him to talk about beating someone or killing them. Counsel was aware of her statement but failed to cross-examine her at trial about the date of the confession or the date on which she had seen her brother with the gun. He also failed to object to the prosecutor's having led her by prefacing his question about the confession with the statement that he was directing her attention to the night of the murder. The state's primary witness also testified in post-conviction that he had been drinking the night of the murder (he had denied that at trial), that he hadn't seen the defendant shoot the victim, and that in fact he didn't know who had the gun. Prejudice found.

Adams v. Bertrand*, 453 F.3d 428 (7th Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault case in which counsel cross-examined the alleged victim about prior inconsistent statements but did not call an available defense witness, who would have testified that he heard the alleged victim invite the alleged assailants to her room before events unfolded and saw the alleged victim smoking a cigarette with the alleged assailants after the alleged assault. Counsel made an unreasonable decision not to investigate the potential defense witness because counsel was aware even before the trial that the witness “could have swung the case in his client’s favor.” While counsel made minimal efforts to locate the witness, he did not pursue the matter because he had decided to call no witnesses. In other words, counsel “committed to a predetermined strategy without a reasonable investigation that could have produced a pivotal witness.” The state court’s determination of a reasonable trial strategy in this regard was not a reasonable application of Strickland. Prejudice found because this was a close case contingent on the alleged victim’s credibility and the available defense witness would have contradicted her in several significant respects.

2005: Gersten v. Senkowski, 426 F.3d 588 (2nd Cir. 2005) (affirming 299 F. Supp. 2d 84 E.D.N.Y. 2004)), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1191 (2006). Counsel was ineffective in sodomy and sexual abuse of daughter case for failing to consult with or call expert medical witness and psychological expert to rebut the testimony of the state’s experts. The defendant was charged with sexually abusing his daughter when she was between the ages of 10 and 13. During the trial, however, the daughter testified that the sexual abuse began when she was five years old with anal intercourse beginning when she was 7 years old and the sexual abuse occurring almost every night. The state called a medical expert that testified that physical examination revealed that the victim had suffered penetrating trauma to her hymen and tearing of the anus. The state presented a psychologist to testify about child sexual abuse accommodation syndrome, which corroborated the victim’s statements. The defense presented no witnesses. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that defense counsel’s conduct was deficient. “In sexual abuse case, because of the centrality of medical testimony, the failure to consult with or call a medical expert is often indicative of ineffective assistance of counsel.” Id. at 607. Here, counsel “essentially conceded” that the physical evidence was significant without investigating when a defense medical expert could have testified that the physical evidence was not indicative of sexual abuse, which would have cast doubt on the alleged victim’s credibility. A defense psychological expert also would have testified that the prosecution’s evidence of “Child Sexual Abuse Accommodation Syndrome” lacked any scientific validity for the purpose for which the prosecution used it. Counsel had no valid strategy for this course because “counsel settled on a defense theory and cut off further investigation of other theories without having first conducted any investigation whatsoever into the possibility of challenging the prosecution’s medical or psychological evidence.” Id. at 610. Prejudice found because the state’s entire case, aside from the expert evidence that should have been challenged, rested on the credibility of the alleged victim. The state court holding was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Henry v. Poole*, 409 F.3d 48 (2nd Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1040 (2006). Counsel ineffective in robbery case for presenting and emphasizing an alibi that was clearly given for the wrong day. The state’s evidence was dependent on the eyewitness testimony of the victim, who was robbed at 12:10 a.m. on August 10. The alibi presented covered “the night” of August 10 and counsel continued to argue this as an alibi even after its flaw was clearly exposed by the state in cross-examination. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the date and time of the crime were undisputed and counsel had been provided with the witness’ grand jury testimony, which revealed that her alibi was given for the wrong night. “The failure to recognize the difference between the beginning and the end of the day plainly falls below any acceptable level of professional competence.” Prejudice was found because the jury would likely have viewed the alibi as contrived, which is commonly accepted as evidence of a defendant's consciousness of guilt. Thus, the state's case was bolstered. Under the AEDPA, the state court's denial of relief was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland.

Jacobs v. Horn, 395 F.3d 92 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 962 (2005). Counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately investigate, prepare, and present mental health evidence in support of his diminished capacity defense during the trial. Counsel consulted with a psychiatrist, who reported orally that there was no evidence of a major mental illness. Even without expert testimony, counsel presented a heat of passion and diminished capacity defense asserting that the defendant was incapable of forming a specific intent to kill given his mental state at the time. The only evidence presented in support of this theory was the defendant's own testimony. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to inform his expert that the state was seeking the death penalty and failed to provide the expert with any background information concerning the crimes or the defendant's history. "Counsel did not question any of [the defendant's] family members or friends regarding his childhood, background, or mental health history, or obtain any medical records demonstrating mental deficiencies." When counsel made the decision not to investigate further, counsel knew or should have known from his interactions with the defendant that "he should initiate some investigation 'of a psychological or psychiatric nature.'" He also knew that the defendant had no criminal history or history of violence and yet admitted to stabbing his girlfriend more than 200 times. "In light of all that was known or made available to counsel, . . . counsel did not exercise reasonable professional judgment in failing to investigate further. . . ." If counsel had adequately performed, the evidence would have established that the defendant has mild mental retardation, organic brain damage, and schizoid personality disorder. He was also a witness and victim of abuse and suffered from drug and alcohol addictions. The combination of these factors substantially diminished his capacity to formulate the specific intent to kill. The court also noted that this was not a case where counsel made a strategic decision not to investigate and present this evidence. "The question raised here is whether counsel was ineffective by failing to investigate and discover evidence to support the defense he pursued." The state court's decision was unreasonable because the court found that counsel made a reasonable decision not to investigate further after receiving the psychiatrist's report while disregarding counsel's failure to provide the expert "with the necessary information to conduct a proper evaluation." This was an unreasonable application of Strickland because "Strickland mandates that counsel's decision 'must be directly assessed for reasonableness in all the circumstances.'" (quoting Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 691 (1984)).

Draughon v. Dretke, 427 F.3d 286 (5th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1019 (2006). Counsel ineffective for failing to retain a ballistics expert. The defendant was fleeing the scene of an armed robbery and shot and killed a pursuing bystander. He testified that he did not intend to harm anyone and had attempted to fire over the heads of his pursuers. The State's evidence from another pursuing witness was that the victim had been shot from only about 10 steps away and a ballistics expert testified that the bullet recovered from the body had not ricocheted before striking the victim. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel was aware that the State's argument of intent to kill and for death was based on the witnesses' testimony about the distance of the shot and the ballistics evidence. Prejudice found because a defense expert could have presented a strong case that the fatal bullet struck the pavement in front of the victim and was fired at a much greater distance than the witness' testimony reflected. The prejudice increased in sentencing because the only way to counter the state's argument was for the defendant to testify and in cross examination the prosecutor marched the defendant through the horrible details of a prior rape conviction, which the prosecutor had not elicited from the prior victim out of deference to her. Under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court had unreasonably applied Strickland.

Miller v. Dretke*, 420 F.3d 356 (5th Cir. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in deadly conduct case for failing to prepare and present evidence of treating physicians' testimony regarding the defendant's medical and psychological problems during sentencing. The defendant had been convicted of shooting into the unoccupied home of her in-laws a year after her husband died of a drug overdose, which his family blamed the defendant for. During sentencing, she and her ex-husband testified about her previous hospital for several weeks due to head injuries suffered in a car accident, her amnesia, post-traumatic stress disorder, and severe depression, which required medication and continuous care. Her testimony that she could not recall shooting into the home or previously threatening her in-laws was ridiculed as self-serving by the prosecutor and she was sentenced to 8 years and a fine of $5,000 with no recommendation of a suspended sentence. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he was aware of the defendant's mental and emotional problems but did not investigate further and made no effort to call the defendant's doctors as witnesses. This conduct was not excused by strategy because counsel admitted that he did not prepare for sentencing because he believed the defendant would accept a plea bargain offer, be acquitted, or given probation. "While [counsel] may have made reasonable tactical decisions based on the information that he had at the time, our review must focus on whether the information he possessed would have led a reasonable attorney to investigate further." Prejudice was found because expert testimony was available that the defendant had post-traumatic stress disorder, organic brain syndrome with frontal lobe dysfunction, memory loss, including amnesia, severe anxiety, depression, and some paranoia all of which was relevant and admissible in sentencing and would have explained the defendant's erratic, paranoid, and hostile behavior and would have supported the defendant's testimony that she could not remember the shooting or the prior threats. The "state habeas court was objectively unreasonable in holding otherwise" on deficient conduct and prejudice.

Smith v. Dretke*, 417 F.3d 438 (5th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately prepare and present evidence of self-defense. Although petitioner identified four witnesses for counsel, counsel did not interview them or call them to testify to corroborate the petitioner's testimony concerning the victim's history of violence. Counsel did not do so because of his erroneous belief that the testimony of these witnesses was inadmissible and that only evidence known to the defendant was permitted. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he "failed to achieve a rudimentary understanding of the well-settled law of self-defense in Texas" and because "[f]ailing to introduce evidence because of a misapprehension of the law is a classic example of deficiency of counsel." Id. at 442. The "state court was objectively unreasonable" in finding otherwise. Prejudice was found because petitioner's only plausible defense was that he acted in self-defense and he testified to that effect, but his testimony was easily discounted and disparaged by the prosecutor in argument without corroboration. "[A]n objectively reasonable court could not conclude otherwise." Id. at 444.

Tenny v. Dretke*, 416 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately prepare and present evidence of self-defense. Because the state did not address the District Court's finding of deficient conduct in its opening brief, the court held that the State had waived argument on this issue and assumed deficient conduct. Prejudice was found because the evidence counsel failed to prepare and present included evidence that the victim, the defendant's live-in girlfriend, had threatened to kill him in the days prior to her death and even on that day, she had stabbed him within the week before, she had threatened to burn the house down, she had violent tendencies and would have "insane rages," and she was strong enough to throw almost any grown man to the ground. In addition, a doctor, who examined the defendant in the hospital after the fight with the victim would have testified that the defendant had a black eye, his ear was cut, and he had a punctured lung from being stabbed and had "nearly lost his life." The defendant also could have provided additional testimony that he knew of the threats made against him and that the victim had stabbed her previous husband. Counsel did not call some of these witnesses because they worked at a monastery and had been involved in a sex-abuse scandal. This did not justify not presenting the evidence, however, because their testimony was corroborated by another witness not involved in any scandal and this testimony was significant. Under the AEDPA standards, the state court's decision was unreasonable.

Towns v. Smith*, 395 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in first degree murder case for failing to investigate a witness who had admitted to police, among others, that he had been involved in the crimes of which the defendant was ultimately convicted and that the defendant had played no part in these crimes. The witness was arrested with the murder weapon and he admitted that he drove the get-away car. He informed police in two statements that the defendant's brothers were the perpetrators. For unknown reasons, the police focused on the defendant rather than one of the brothers. When placed in a line-up, the single eyewitness to the murder tentatively identified him but only on the basis of size, which was similar to his brother. The prosecution initially intended to call the driver as a witness but then changed his mind at the last minute. Defense counsel insisted that he have the opportunity to interview him so the driver was held overnight in the local jail for that purpose. Counsel never interviewed him but then informed the court that he would not be called as a defense witness. Counsel's conduct was objectively unreasonable because "counsel could not have evaluated or weighed the risks and benefits of calling [the driver] as a defense witness without so much as asking [him] what he would say if called." Id. at 260. Prejudice was found because, if counsel had investigated, the driver would have testified that the defendant had nothing to do with the crimes. Prejudice was also apparent because of the notable weaknesses in the prosecution's case. These findings were made even though the driver refused to testify in post-conviction. He spoke to counsel and his investigator, who both testified, but refused to testify without immunity, which the government inexplicably refused despite having never charged the driver. At the time of trial though, the driver was not worried about incriminating himself because his attorney had secured a favorable immunity deal.

White v. Roper, 416 F.3d 728 (8th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1046 (2006). Counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present exculpatory testimony of two witnesses in the guilt-or innocence phase of trial. Because the state court did not address the merits of this claim, no deference was given under AEDPA. The defendant was charged, along with two other men, who did not receive a death sentence, in a drug-related murder. While there were witnesses that connected the defendant to the other men, no physical evidence connected the defendant to the crime scene. The defense was that the third man was not the defendant but a man named A.J. Constantine, who had a Jamaican accent. Two witnesses present at the time of the murder. One of them, who said that the defendant was not the killer, but who could not identify the third man, was called at trial. The other, who said that the defendant was not the killer and who also identified the killer as A.J., was never interviewed by counsel and did not testify. Another witness, who saw one of the co-defendants earlier in the evening looking for drugs and arranging to go to the victim's house, would have testified that it was A.J. with the co-defendant at the time. She was also never interviewed by counsel, who also did not attend the co-defendant's bench trial or obtain deposition transcripts from that trial until the eve of trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "counsel's investigation was too superficial." Id. at 732. "In other words, the presumption of sound trial strategy founders in this case on the rocks of ignorance, as in Wiggins." Id. (The district court had also found counsel ineffective in sentencing for failing to investigate and present mitigation, but the court did not address this issue because Missouri appealed only the guilt-or-innocence phase determination.)

Daniels v. Woodford, 428 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 550 U.S. 968 (2007). Analyzing this capital case under pre-AEDPA standards, the court held that the defendant was constructively denied counsel due to a conflict created by a series of events related to the appointment of counsel. The defendant had previously been convicted of a bank robbery in which he had been shot nine times by police officers rendering him a paraplegic. He negotiated a plea in exchange for being permitted to remain free for six months so he could seek medical treatment and rehabilitation. Despite the agreement, the court sentenced him to 13 years and immediately remanded him to custody. On appeal, Roth, a new attorney (who had previously represented the defendant on other matters) took over and the defendant was released on bond. While on bond, he was mistakenly arrested by an officer who believed there was a warrant for him. He sued the state alleging mistreatment in jail and lack of appropriate medical care. After his appeal was denied, he failed to surrender to custody. When two officers went to his home, he shot and killed both officers. Following his arrest, the court appointed a Public Defender, who moved to substitute Roth because the PD had a conflict due to the prior representation on the robbery. The PD in that case that negotiated the plea and release left the PD's office to join the prosecutor's interest and the new PD assigned was unaware of the plea agreement so the judge was never informed of the deal for release. A federal habeas petition alleging IAC on the robbery was pending at the time of the murder case appointment. Nonetheless, the court refused to relieve the PD office and Roth remained in a pro bono capacity. Roth was ultimately appointed as co-counsel, but then the state moved to relieve him because he was to be a witness for the state. Roth was relieved even though the defendant agreed to stipulate to the information the state sought to present through Roth and agreed to waive the conflict. After this, the PD assigned became ill and the case was reassigned to two new PD's. Ultimately, nine months into the case and only three months prior to trial, the court relieved the PD office on its motion due to the conflict. Appointed this time was a former prosecutor who had just started in private practice and had no capital case experience and a co-counsel with only a few years under his belt. From the beginning, the defendant's relationship with these lawyers

“was strained.” The defendant informed the court that he didn’t trust his counsel and sent a letter to that effect before the trial started. The federal court held that, “[g]iven this history, it is understandable that the [defendant] would mistrust the judicial process and his counsel” and the trial court should have granted the defendant’s motion to substitute counsel. In this instance, because of the “serious conflict” between the defendant and counsel, the court presumed prejudice and found error in the trial court’s failure to inquire into the conflict even though the defendant informed the court three months prior to trial that he did not trust counsel and informed the court again prior to the beginning of the trial. The federal court also found that counsel was ineffective, particularly given counsel’s “ineffective efforts to overcome the impasse” with his client. Counsel did not inform the court of the problems, attempt to adequately advise the defendant, or even call Roth for assistance even though the defendant trusted and confided in him. Counsel also failed to conduct a thorough investigation concerning mental health. “Even though [the defendant] refused to speak to his counsel, [counsel] still had an independent duty to investigate the facts of his case and possible mitigation evidence.” Counsel retained a psychologist to do a preliminary screening of the defendant to determine whether additional evaluation was needed. He found suggestions of organic brain damage but counsel never sought further testing and did not even request funds until one week before sentencing (which was granted a month after sentencing). Counsel also did not follow up on a prior psychiatric evaluation of the defendant done after the defendant had been shot. Although the defendant had a good relationship with this expert, counsel retained a different psychiatrist, who the defendant refused to speak to. Thus, the defense was left only with the screening psychologist. In addition, counsel did not investigate or present evidence explaining the defendant’s fear of returning to custody, much of which was available, regardless of the defendant’s lack of cooperation, in police records and public records of the defendant’s law suit against the county. “Instead of seeking further mental evaluations, [the defendant’s] counsel relied on the expert witness testimony of [a] psychologist . . . , who was not qualified to testify in a capital case and whose testimony toyed with the idea that [the defendant] could be a sociopath. This alone constituted a significant error.” Id. at 1204. Counsel’s conduct was not the result of strategy “but of a communication breakdown with their client, the court’s refusal to grant a continuance, a shortage of time, and repeated problems with securing state funding.” Id. at 1206. Prejudice found during trial and sentencing. During trial, despite overwhelming evidence of guilt, the defense argued that the defendant was not the perpetrator. Counsel did not pursue the more viable mental health defense even though the defendant was diagnosed as schizophrenic by prison psychiatrists many years before the murders. The psychiatrist retained by counsel was not provided with these records and was only able to do a cursory exam because of the defendant’s lack of cooperation. If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have established that the defendant has post-traumatic stress disorder from his shooting, paranoid delusions, and organic brain damage. This evidence could have been used in a diminished capacity defense (which has been abolished now in California, but is still available for crimes committed prior to June 1982) or an imperfect self-defense argument, which would have defeated a first-degree murder finding. Prejudice also found in sentencing because the jury deliberated for two days, which suggests that additional mitigation may have influenced the jury. Instead, the only mitigation presented was from the screening psychologist “who was woefully unprepared and who suggested [the defendant] may be a sociopath. This alone is sufficient for a finding of prejudice.” Id. at 1210. The defendant was also prejudiced in sentencing by the implausible trial phase defense that the defendant was not the shooter. “As a result, [the defendant] faced a jury that could only be profoundly annoyed by this ludicrous defense in the face of overwhelming evidence of culpability.” Id.

2004: *Soffar v. Dretke, 368 F.3d 441, amended, 391 F.3d 703 (5th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to interview living victim, who was the only eyewitness to the crimes, and failing to consult with a ballistics expert. The basic facts are that four people were shot in a bowling alley armed robbery and shooting and only one of these people lived. The surviving victim made a number of statements, including under hypnosis, describing the events and the lone assailant. After weeks with no suspect, the defendant, who had a history of confessing to crimes that he did not commit, was arrested on other charges and confessed in a number of statements. He initially said that he was the getaway driver for the assailant and ultimately said that his “accomplice” shot two of the victims and then the defendant shot the last two. Analyzing the case under pre-AEDPA amendments, the court found that counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview the surviving victim even though counsel was aware that there were significant discrepancies between his statements and the defendant’s “confession” and the victim had been unable to identify the defendant or his “accomplice” in a pretrial lineup. Counsel was also ineffective for failing to retain a ballistics expert, who could have established that the crime scene was consistent with the surviving victim’s statements and inconsistent with the defendant’s “confession.” Counsel’s conduct was inexplicable because the sole defense theory at trial was that the defendant’s “confession” was false and should not be believed. Although the state argued that there were potential pitfalls if counsel had called the surviving victim to testify, the court held that “an actual failure to investigate cannot be excused by a hypothetical decision not to use its unknown results.” Prejudice was found because the state’s case was “predominantly” based on the defendant’s “confession,” which would have been contradicted by the surviving victim and the ballistics evidence if counsel had adequately investigated.

McFarland v. Yukins. 356 F.3d 688 (6th Cir. 2004). Habeas relief granted in drug case due to the trial court’s failure to adequately inquire into counsel’s conflict, counsel’s actual conflict of interest that adversely effected his performance, and trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to present an adequate defense. The petitioner and her daughter were charged as co-defendants where drugs were found during a search of the home they shared. Both the defendant and her daughter were represented by the same retained attorney. On the day of the scheduled bench trial, counsel informed the court that the defendant and co-defendant had concerns about sharing the same attorney and that the evidence might well raise antagonistic defenses. The petitioner also informed the court that she believed she needed a separate attorney and that she had attempted to hire a different attorney but could not afford one. Rather than appoint a second attorney, the court severed the cases and ordered that they be tried in front of different judges. The trials proceeded at pretty much the same time. In the co-defendant’s trial, the state presented evidence that the bedroom where most of the drugs were found belonged to the co-defendant. A caller to the crack hotline also made complaints about a woman with the co-defendant’s name. A confidential informant also identified the co-defendant as the person discussing drugs. During the petitioner’s trial, the state did not present any evidence that the co-defendant lived in the house or in the bedroom where most of the drugs were found and did not present any evidence that the crack hotline telephone complaints and the confidential informant had both identified the co-defendant. Defense counsel did not bring any of this information out in cross-examination or present any evidence on its own. In closing argument, the defense argued only that the drugs belonged to one of two men that were also initially suspected. One of the men was present at the time of the search, but did not have a key to the locked bedroom where most of the drugs were found. The other man was not present at the time of the search and was connected to the house only by some paperwork identifying him as the co-defendant's husband. Both the defendant and co-defendant were convicted. They were represented on appeal by a different attorney but still had the same attorney between them. Appellate counsel did not raise any issue concerning ineffective assistance of counsel or a conflict of interest. In state post-conviction, the petitioner asserted ineffectiveness of trial counsel and of appellate counsel for failing to argue that trial counsel was ineffective but the state court denied on procedural grounds that the petitioner did not show good cause for a failure to assert the issue on direct appeal as required in state court. The court first found that the petitioner was entitled to relief under Holloway v. Arkansas because the petitioner objected to the joint representation and the trial court did not resolve the issue. Independent of the trial court's failure to inquire, reversal was also required because counsel had an actual conflict of interest that adversely affected representation. Finally, the court also found that counsel was ineffective under the standard of Strickland v. Washington because counsel failed to present a strong argument in petitioner's case that the co-defendant actually possessed the drugs. Prejudice was found under Strickland because the trial judge in petitioner's case mentioned her misgivings about the sufficiency of the evidence connecting the petitioner to the drugs. If counsel had adequately presented the evidence pointing to the co-defendant, trial court may well have ruled differently in the case. The court found that, with respect to all three of these arguments, the petitioner would have won on direct appeal had appellate counsel adequately raised the issues. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert these issues, which were clearly stronger than the arguments made by counsel on direct appeal. The conflict issue was an obvious one, and the petitioner was entitled to automatic reversal under the rule in Holloway. Because appellate counsel also represented the co-defendant, however, appellate counsel also had a conflict of interest. The court found that appellate counsel's ineffectiveness was the cause for petitioner's failure to assert ineffectiveness of trial counsel on appeal. Thus, the petitioner had established cause and prejudice for failing to assert these issues on appeal. Because the state court never ruled on the actual conflict of interest and the ineffective assistance claim under Strickland, the court reviewed these claims de novo. The only state court decision on the Holloway claim was the trial court's decision. Under the AEDPA, the court found that the trial court's actions contradicted the clearly established precedent of Holloway v. Arkansas because the state court confronted a set of facts that were materially indistinguishable from Holloway and yet arrived at a different result.

Earls v. McCaughtry*, 379 F.3d 489 (7th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault on child case for failing to object to testimony from an expert that she believed the alleged victim and for failing to redact a videotape of the expert interviewing the child when the videotape also included statements that the expert believed the child. Prejudice found because the child's credibility was the key issue in the trial and there were no corroborating witnesses even though numerous other people were present at the time of the alleged acts and no physical evidence.

Capital Case*

Harris v. Cotton*, 365 F.3d 552 (7th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to obtain a toxicology report that showed that the victim was under the influence of cocaine and alcohol at the time of his death. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the sole defense at trial was self-defense and counsel was aware that the toxicology report existed but did not obtain it solely due to "oversight," even though he knew that the victim's behavior prior to the shooting was "absolutely critical" to the defense. Prejudice was found because counsel attempted to question the state's pathologist about the victim's alcohol abuse but was prohibited from doing so because there was no evidence supporting this line of questioning. Prejudice also found because "[f]rom the perspective of a defense attorney, an affirmative defense of self-defense against a drunk and cocaine-high victim stands a better chance than the same defense against a stone-cold-sober victim." Id. at 556. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court held that the state court's decision was an unreasonable application of Strickland because the state court unreasonably applied the "reasonable probability" standard in finding no prejudice.

Jie Lin v. Ashcroft*, 377 F.3d 1014 (9th Cir. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in INS hearing for failing to collect available testimony and documentary evidence or to otherwise prepare for the hearing, failing to appear at the hearing other than telephonically, and failing to present legal or factual framework for asylum claims in the hearing or on appeal. The alien was fourteen years old and did not speak English. Counsel never met with him and had little or no contact with him prior to the hearing. Counsel did not investigate or prepare the basics in terms of factual issues. Counsel failed to even appear at the hearing other than by telephone and offered only the alien's unprepared testimony and conclusory legal arguments. The alien exercised his statutory right to counsel at no expense to the government. Thus, the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel falls under the Fifth Amendment right to due process. Counsel's actions in this case were deficient under the "low bar" of the Strickland standard. Id. at 1027. Prejudice found because the alien did have several plausible claims for refugee status. While counsel presented some of the factual basis for these claims the presentation of a few bare facts, without documentation and without the factual context that gives them meaning or the analytical context that gives them their power, does not suffice to place the critical issues squarely before the tribunal that must consider them.

2003: Anderson v. Johnson, 338 F.3d 382 (5th Cir.), denying rehearing and rehearing en banc, 89 Fed.Appx. 905 (2003). Counsel was ineffective in burglary case for failing to interview and present the testimony of an eyewitness that would have testified in the defendant's favor. During the crime, the victim, her young daughter, and the victim's boyfriend observed the suspect. The victim was unable to identify the suspect until three years later when she heard the defendant talking and then recognized him. She and her daughter then identified him in photo line-ups. The first trial ended with a hung jury. During the second trial, defense counsel cross-examined these witnesses and pointed out that the victim's boyfriend was not called to testify, but did not interview the boyfriend or present him as a defense witness. In state post-conviction, the defendant argued that counsel was ineffective and specifically stated that the boyfriend would have testified that the defendant was not the suspect. During federal habeas proceedings, the defendant presented the same claim and also offered, for the first time, an affidavit from the victim's boyfriend. The District Court granted relief. The Fifth Circuit first held that the claim was properly exhausted in state court, despite the defendant's failure to present the affidavit there, because the defendant had plead all of the facts in detail. The submission of the affidavit in federal court only supplemented the record but did not change the facts or legal arguments that were made in state court. The court then held that counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel, who was disbarred after trial, conducted no investigation and instead relied only on the state's discovery, which did not reveal that the victim's boyfriend affirmatively stated that the defendant was not the perpetrator. Since there were only two adult eyewitnesses, a reasonable attorney would have made some effort to investigate. The court also found that counsel's failure to investigate was not a reasoned decision, but was "likely the result of either indolence or incompetence." Id. at 393. Counsel's failure also could not be excused based on a belief that the witness would not have been credible. "In a claim grounded in failure to interview, the 'quality' and potential persuasiveness of the eyewitness is largely immaterial." Id. Prejudice was found because the state's case was grounded only on the identification of the victim and her daughter made three years after the crime. There was no other evidence connecting the defendant to the crimes. The court also considered the fact that the first jury to hear the same evidence hung. Finally, the court found, applying the AEDPA standards, that the state court's ultimate legal conclusion was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland.

U.S. ex rel. Hampton v. Leibach*, 347 F.3d 219 (7th Cir. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in sexual assault and robbery case for failing to investigate and interview exculpatory eyewitnesses and for making promises in his opening statement to the jury that he did not keep. The crimes were committed by gang members and occurred at a rhythm and blues concert near the stage. The defendant was tried with two co-defendants but a separate jury for each. In his opening statement, counsel promised that the defendant would testify that he had witnessed the attacks but was not involved and promised that the evidence would show that the defendant was not a gang member. During trial, the three victims and a security guard identified the defendant, but the evidence was shaky. The defendant's counsel presented only one witness concerning an identification of the defendant near the scene. In closing, counsel attacked the weakness of the state's case and the eyewitness identifications. Counsel's conduct in failing to interview exculpatory eyewitnesses identified by the defendant and to independently investigate was deficient. Although the state court found that counsel had a reasonable strategy for this failure, this finding was not supported by any evidence. Moreover, even if counsel had such a strategy it was based on an inadequate investigation and was unreasonable. While counsel vigorously attacked the eyewitnesses, he presented no exculpatory eyewitness evidence. The state court's "assertion that such testimony would have been 'redundant' is' plainly wrong; testimony by one eyewitness to a crime that the perpetrator was not the person named by another eyewitness is the antithesis of redundancy." The state court's finding that counsel also had a reasonable strategy to avoid "guilt by association" by establishing the defendant's presence at the scene with some suspected individuals was also unreasonable. Presence at the concert, knowing the perpetrators, and riding the same bus home was not incriminating since they and many of the witnesses lived in the same neighborhood as the defendant. Prejudice was found because of "the central role that eyewitness testimony played in this case, the vulnerabilities in the testimony of the State's eyewitnesses, and the shortcomings in human perception that so frequently render eyewitness testimony less reliable than other types of evidence.” The co-defendant’s acquittal highlighted the prejudice because he presented the type of evidence in question. The state court’s finding of no prejudice was also an unreasonable application of Strickland. “[U]nder Strickland, [the defendant] need not convince the court that such testimony more likely than not would have resulted in his acquittal; he need only establish that this is a reasonable probability, a better than negligible likelihood.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to fulfill his promises to the jury. While it may have been reasonable not to call the defendant to testify or to decide not to call witnesses to establish that the defendant was not a gang member, “the foundation for this claim is the broken promise as opposed to the decision not to pursue a particular line of testimony.” “[L]ittle is more damaging than to fail to produce important evidence that had been promised in an opening.” (quoting Anderson v. Butler, 858 F.2d 16, 17 (1st Cir.1988)). While the state court found that counsel changed his mind due to a reasonable strategy this finding was unreasonable because “[t]he potential disadvantages of [the defendant’s] testimony were ones that would have been obvious from the outset of the case.” While the broken promises to the jury “was not so prejudicial that it would support relief in and of itself, the breach serves to underscore the more important failure to investigate exculpatory occurrence witnesses.” The defendant’s “unexplained failure to take the witness stand” may have given the jury the impression that the state’s witnesses were correct in their testimony.

Alcala v. Woodford, 334 F.3d 862 (9th Cir. 2003). Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to adequately present alibi evidence. The underlying crime involved the disappearance of a twelve-year old girl, whose body was found several weeks later 50 miles away. The evidence connecting the defendant was only circumstantial identifications that put him in the area where the victim disappeared taking pictures of people on the beach. The girl with the victim on the afternoon of her disappearance did not identify the defendant as the man that took their pictures and an adult that was present then could not identify the defendant in photo lineups but then positively identified him seven years later during trial. The only evidence directly connecting the defendant to the crime was a jailhouse informant and a discredited forest service worker, who was interviewed twelve times prior to trial and initially provided nothing but gradually progressed up to placing the defendant with the body. During the second trial, following reversal, this witness denied even testifying in the first trial. During trial, the defense presented a number of alibi witnesses to establish that the defendant had been at a theme park seeking freelance photography work at the time when the one eyewitness placed him taking pictures of the victim shortly before her disappearance. While the witnesses confirmed that he had been at the park, none of them was able to give an actual date or time for the alibi. In federal court, the defendant presented testimony from another park employee, who had actual business records and her own personal calendar, who could testify that the defendant was at the park during the pertinent time and that it was, therefore, impossible for him to have committed the crime. The District Court granted relief and the state appealed. Applying the law prior to the AEDPA (because the federal habeas petition was filed in 1994), the court found counsel ineffective for failing to present the alibi witness and records that could establish the date and time of the alibi. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because this was by far the strongest alibi evidence available, counsel had listed this witness and subpoenaed her as a trial witness prior to trial and could not remember why she was not called, and the witness had told a defense investigator that her personal calendar would support the alibi. The court rejected the state’s argument that counsel made a strategic decision not to present the witness “because it would have us find a strategic basis . . . in the absence of any evidence” and because the court would not “assume facts not in the record in order to manufacture a reasonable strategic decision.” Id. at 871. Moreover, even if counsel had a strategic reason not to call this witness, it would have been an unreasonable strategy. Here, “counsel made a sound strategic choice to present an alibi defense,” but did not adequately present the evidence supporting the chosen defense theory. Id. at 870. Prejudice was found because the state’s case “was far from compelling” and was entirely circumstantial. Counsel’s failure at trial also harmed the credibility of the alibi evidence that was presented because trial counsel told the jurors that they would establish an alibi and then “utterly failed to do so, harming the credibility of [the] entire defense.” Id. at 873.

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Greenberg v. Covello, 2024 WL 4093267 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 5, 2024). In murder case where petitioner unsuccessfully claimed self-defense, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present a mental health defense to support his theory of imperfect self-defense. Petitioner claimed to have believed the victim was retrieving a gun from his truck when petitioner shot him, although no weapon was found in the truck. Following the offense, petitioner shot himself. Although services from a mental health expert had been authorized by the trial court, defense counsel failed to ask for an in-person evaluation of petitioner. The district court accepts the finding by the magistrate judge that it was unreasonable for the state appellate court to have found no prima facie case of deficient performance. Respondent’s argument that trial counsel’s conversations with psychology “experts” provided an adequate basis to rule out a mental defense was rejected. On the record of this case, the interactions had by trial counsel did not appear to constitute a sufficient investigation to justify neglecting a psychological evaluation. The record also refuted respondent’s argument that the decision to forgo a psychological evaluation was the result of a strategic choice to seek acquittal only, rather than possibly a manslaughter conviction. It was “simply not true that presenting a mental health defense would have guaranteed at least a manslaughter conviction, as contended by respondent.” A person suffering from PTSD, the diagnosis arrived at by the post-conviction expert, could still harbor an objectively reasonable belief in the need to defend themselves. “[T]here was nothing inconsistent in pursuing both a mental health defense and self-defense in this case and the failure to conduct an investigation into the former cannot be justified as a tactical or strategic decision.” That counsel and petitioner chose to focus on acquittal could not have justified a failure to obtain a psychological evaluation in this case. As to prejudice, the magistrate judge was unable to identify any rationale for the state supreme court to find that petitioner failed to present a prima facie case that he met the second prong of Strickland. In the alternative, assuming that the proper analysis under AEDPA was to look to the superior court’s reasoned decision on this prong, the magistrate judge found that the superior court’s methodology was both contrary to and an unreasonable application of Strickland. The district court agreed that under either analysis, § 2254(d) was overcome, and, applying de novo review, petitioner’s claim was meritorious. Respondent had argued that petitioner’s failure to provide an opinion from the actual expert who was authorized to evaluate petitioner at the time of trial meant that petitioner was required to show that every reasonable mental health expert would have diagnosed petitioner as suffering from PTSD. Petitioner did not do this, according to respondent, as shown by the superior court's finding that the conclusions by petitioner's habeas expert were overstated given the number of prison mental health professionals who did not diagnosis petitioner with PTSD. But this analysis by the superior court involved an unreasonable fact-finding process because the superior court ruled that the opinions contained in the prison records were inadmissible but then relied upon those same opinions to conclude it would be impossible to predict what diagnosis would have been given to petitioner had he been evaluated at the time of the 2011 trial. Further, "the superior court's approach ignored the only mental health expert evidence in the record, that from [the state habeas expert], who stated that the variation in PTSD diagnoses in the [prison] records did not undermine his assessment of petitioner." Also rejected was respondent's assertion that trial counsel, even if armed with the PTSD diagnosis, would have chosen not to use it because an imperfect self-defense theory would have been incompatible with a perfect self-defense theory. Again, the district court does not find the defenses inconsistent. Additionally, the record showed that defense counsel had intended to argue both imperfect and perfect self-defense. Although counsel ultimately treated the alternative imperfect self-defense theory mildly, this was apparently because the trial court had refused to admit the evidence trial counsel had that supported the theory, i.e., evidence related to petitioner's past police training, not because of an inconsistency in the two types of self-defense. Finally, the district court was unpersuaded by respondent's argument that prejudice could not be shown because petitioner did not establish whether rebuttal would have been presented or whether the jury would have believed the "defense-friendly" expert testimony. Notably, respondent had the opportunity to present rebuttal evidence in the state habeas proceeding but failed to do so. The state habeas expert addressed the most important issues the jury had to decide and there is a reasonable probability of a different outcome had such testimony been provided to the jury.

Gribble v. Folino*, 2024 WL 3557437 (E.D. Pa. July 26, 2024) (resolved with negotiated plea).

In capital murder case where the first-degree murder charge was premised on the prosecution's theory that petitioner premeditated the killing with his girlfriend in order to take the victim's money, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) cross-examine the medical examiner about findings in his post-mortem report that supported petitioner's account to police that petitioner and the victim had engaged in a fistfight prior to the killing after petitioner discovered the victim with petitioner's girlfriend, (2) cross-examine the medical examiner regarding the examiner's opinion that two people were needed to dismember the body, which supported the prosecution's premeditation theory; and (3) call the upstairs neighbor as a witness to testify that on the morning of the killing, he heard "banging and noise," a woman screaming for someone to stop, and then more banging like someone being thrown around the room. (The witness called 911, stating he thought someone was being killed below him.) The victim had been struck in the head multiple times with a hammer and dismembered. Petitioner was initially sentenced to death for the crime but received penalty relief on an unrelated basis. At the resentencing proceeding for petitioner, the post-mortem report about the fist marks on the victim was put before the jury which was unable to reach a unanimous verdict on the robbery aggravator, leading to a life sentence. If trial counsel "had properly introduced the fist-mark evidence, he would have bolstered the sworn statement that Petitioner gave to the police that he committed the murder in the heat of passion. (Footnote omitted.) This evidence would have undermined the prosecutor's argument at trial that the victim was the subject of a sneak attack". Additionally, at the penalty retrials of petitioner and his girlfriend, the medical examiner admitted on cross-examination that a single person could have dismembered the body and that he lacked experience with dismemberment at the time of the 1993 trial. (At the girlfriend's retrial, the jury unanimously rejected the robbery aggravator and she, like petitioner, received a life term.) As clearly demonstrated by the results of the penalty retrials, there is a reasonable probability that petitioner would have been convicted of third-degree murder or voluntary manslaughter instead of first-degree murder had trial counsel competently cross-examined the medical examiner. The cumulative impact of trial counsel's deficiencies, including the failure to call the upstairs neighbor as a witness, supported the rejection of the MJ's no prejudice conclusion. The parties were invited to renew their Joint Motion for Conditional Grant of Writ of Habeas Corpus. Note: The Commonwealth had conceded constitutional error and had negotiated a plea with petitioner. The concession was not accepted, under the belief that a federal court must independently find the existence of prejudicial constitutional error in order to grant a habeas petition. Following the above rejection of the MJ's recommendation to deny relief, the renewed Joint Motion for Conditional Grant of Writ of Habeas Corpus was filed and granted on July 30, 2024.

Eaddy v. Delbalso*, 2024 WL 776611 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 26, 2024). In murder case where killing occurred outside of a bar and none of the Commonwealth's six key witnesses testified to seeing the shooting, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to a reasonable doubt instruction given by the trial court that lowered the prosecution's burden of proof and by failing to adequately object to the admission of an unsworn statement by a prosecution witness. (The same faulty reasonable doubt instruction has been the basis for habeas relief in a prior case, Moore v. Rivello, 2022 WL 1749250 (E.D. Pa. May 31, 2022). Other courts have found, however, that the same instruction satisfied due process. In this case, as well as in Moore, the Commonwealth conceded that the instruction was unconstitutional.) In addition to providing the standard reasonable doubt instruction, the trial court inserted a section that described the process a person would go through in deciding whether or not to allow a loved one with a life threatening illness to have surgery. The instruction concluded: "If you go forward with the surgery, it's not because you have moved beyond all doubt. There are no guarantees. If you go forward, it is because you have moved beyond all reasonable doubt." This life-threatening illness instruction "unconstitutionally lowers the Commonwealth's burden by encouraging the jury, through an emotionally laden hypothetical, to act in the face of doubt instead of instructing the jury to hesitate in the face of doubt, even though the Supreme Court has made its preference for the latter clear." Although the problematic language was sandwiched between proper statements of the Commonwealth's burden of proof, "it is constitutionally intolerable that the Court 'has no way of knowing which of the two irreconcilable instructions the jurors applied in reaching their verdict'." (Citation omitted.) The state court disagreed, finding no constitutional violation. But in its analysis, it quoted only a portion of the problematic language inserted by the trial court and the part it did "quote" did not actually appear in the trial transcript. And the state court failed to consider the portion of the instruction that invited the jury to search for compelling evidence to take action. Thus, the state court impermissibly analyzed the jury instruction in two ways: "first, the [state] court quoted artificial language; second, it isolated that language from the emotive context that impermissibly encouraged the jurors in Mr. Eaddy's case to act in the face of doubt." The state court's approval of the instruction involved an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent, which requires that courts reviewing jury instructions for constitutional error consider how reasonable jurors could have understood the charge as a whole. As for whether counsel was ineffective, trial counsel's "failure to object to an unconstitutional jury instruction that lowered the Commonwealth's burden of proof could not have been strategic." Although the state court found no deficient performance because the same instruction had been upheld in the past, that was based on its unreasonable finding that a challenge to the instruction was "baseless." Although it may be correct that counsel cannot be ineffective for failing to raise a "baseless" claim, "the claim that this burden-lowering instruction is unconstitutional has had a basis in Supreme Court precedent for decades." Regarding prejudice, a careful review of the trial evidence established a reasonable probability that, but for trial counsel's failure to object to the reasonable doubt instruction, at least one juror would have harbored a reasonable doubt. Trial counsel was also ineffective, as conceded by the Commonwealth, in failing to object to admission of the unsworn statement by prosecution witness, Ms. Smith. After Ms. Smith denied on the stand that she witnessed the shooting of the victim, the Commonwealth confronted Ms. Smith with a statement she allegedly gave the police describing the shooting.

As the prosecutor read each sentence from the alleged statement aloud, Ms. Smith repeatedly denied providing that information to the police or knowing the details the statement contained. Significantly neither the alleged statement nor the subsequent identification of Mr. Eaddy contained Ms. Smith's signature. However, the trial court and the Commonwealth both told the jury that they could consider the alleged prior statement as substantive evidence.

No proper objection was made by trial counsel to use of the statement as substantive evidence despite the fact that the line of cases supporting such an objection had been mentioned by trial counsel at a side bar. "Not only did counsel fail to preserve Mr. Eaddy's objection to the entry of this statement, but he also declined the trial judge's invitation to provide her with this favorable authority. Given the substantial weight a jury might afford the putative statement of an eyewitness, there is no discernible strategic reason for refraining to pursue its exclusion." Counsel's deficient performance was prejudicial.

Not a single witness at Mr. Eaddy's trial testified that they saw the shooting. By contrast, Ms. Smith's putative statement, which she denied giving, identified Mr. Eaddy as the individual who shot [the victim]. This unsigned, inadmissible statement was therefore extremely important to the Commonwealth's case against Mr. Eaddy. The significance of this statement is underscored by the fact that the jury requested a copy of Ms. Smith's statement to review during deliberations. The day after the jury reviewed Ms. Smith's statement . . . the jury returned a verdict of guilty. If Mr. Eaddy's trial counsel had meaningfully objected, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different

Note: Post-conviction counsel's failure to raise the meritorious claims of ineffective assistance of trial counsel provided the necessary cause to overcome the procedural default of the claims under Martinez.

Oliver v. Smith*, 2024 WL 100198 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 9, 2024). In drug-related robbery-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present alibi evidence. Although the key alibi witness had been subpoenaed by defense counsel, she failed to appear in court. Trial counsel unreasonably failed to make any further efforts to either locate her or request a continuance. Also unreasonable was trial counsel's failure to call a woman whose name was mentioned by the prosecutor as a potential witness during voir dire and who could have corroborated part of the missing witness's account of the night of the offense. Both of these witnesses testified at the federal evidentiary hearing and were found to be credible by the magistrate judge. (The claim had been procedurally defaulted but the default was explicitly waived by respondent. Additionally, the magistrate judge found cause to overcome the default and permit the taking of new evidence in federal habeas proceedings in that petitioner had demonstrated the requisite diligence in state court in attempting to present the claim. Although respondent had stipulated to agreed upon facts concerning the two alibi witnesses, the district court had nevertheless required an evidentiary hearing in order for their credibility to be assessed.) As to prejudice, the Commonwealth's case at trial was based entirely on a prosecution witness's testimony that petitioner was one of the shooters who came from a certain location the night of the murder. Several other witnesses, however, testified that petitioner was not present that night. Given the weakness of the Commonwealth's case, had trial counsel presented testimony from the two available and willing witnesses that petitioner was elsewhere at the time of the murder, there is a reasonable likelihood that their testimony would have changed the outcome of the trial.

Attica v. Brittain*, 714 F.Supp.3d 483 (E.D. Pa. 2024). In arson case related to the burning of the complainant's car, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present two alibi witnesses and one witness who would have contradicted key testimony from a biased prosecution witness. James, a charged co-conspirator, was petitioner's nephew. The complainant was the boyfriend of James's mother. James had been in an altercation with the complainant and his mother at a bar earlier in the evening of the offense. According to the complainant, when he and his girlfriend returned home, James left a voicemail on his mother's phone threatening to burn and break the windows of the complainant's car. The complainant later witnessed James and petitioner drive by his home multiple times in a red Ford F150. The complainant, upon returning from a trip to his bathroom, saw a red truck pass his house and observed his car ablaze. After the fire department came and put out the fire, the complainant saw petitioner and James pass by again, laughing. James, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy and criminal mischief, provided a different account of the events. According to James, after the altercation with the complainant and his mother, he went to a different bar (bar 2) where he informed petitioner what had happened. Petitioner announced that the complainant would not get away with his behavior. James then accompanied petitioner in petitioner's red Ford F150 to a gas station to fill up a container with gasoline. At James's request, petitioner dropped James off at James's home. According to James, he was only in petitioner's car again after the arson when petitioner drove James by the complainant's home where James saw the complainant's burnt vehicle. The merits of petitioner's ineffective assistance of counsel claim is considered de novo because the state court's rejection of the claim was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts. Two witnesses had been available to testify that petitioner was at a third bar both at the time of the alleged arson and at the time when petitioner allegedly drove by the complainant's home with James. Also available was a witness who had been at bar 2 when James came in. According to this witness, petitioner was not there as James had claimed. Because there was no conceivable reason for trial counsel not to present testimony from these three witnesses, his failure to do so constituted deficient performance. And because the unrepresented favorable evidence directly attacked the credibility of the Commonwealth's fact witnesses, the requisite showing of prejudice is found.

2023: Moore v. White, 2023 WL 5918318 (W.D. Okl. Sept. 11, 2023), appeal pending, 23-6133 (10th Cir.). In case involving the killing of an infant, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to fully investigate the cause of death and the timing of the injuries attributed to petitioner, including the failure to timely consult with and retain expert witnesses and to present testimony from the expert witnesses as to the cause and timing of the fatal injuries. Although the claim was found by the state appellate court to be procedurally defaulted, petitioner's showing of actual innocence had overcome the procedural bar. And because the state appellate court did not reach the merits of the claim, the claim was subject to de novo review in the federal habeas proceeding. The statutory presumption of correctness was applied, however, to factual findings made by the state post-conviction court. A finding by the state post-conviction court that trial counsel consulted a second medical expert was successfully rebutted by petitioner. Although the state court found the attorney who testified on this issue to be a credible witness, his testimony about the second expert was qualified by uncertainty and other evidence, viewed cumulatively, indicated it was highly improbable that a second expert had in fact been consulted by defense counsel. As for what occurred at trial, the prosecution presented testimony from three medical experts in support of its theory that the infant died from shaken baby syndrome. The defense called no experts and relied instead on the testimony of petitioner and character witnesses. Trial counsel had consulted with an expert but did not make contact with the expert until trial was imminent despite knowing that the timing of the victim's injuries was of critical importance. When trial counsel received the expert's unhelpful opinion shortly before trial commenced, counsel was left with no supporting defense expert. Although defense attorneys are not required to "doctor shop," in this case the expert did suggest certain follow up tests and/or other types of medical experts who may have been able to more directly illuminate the cause of death and/or the timing of the injury. But because of the lateness of the expert's involvement, defense counsel could not feasibly have followed up on the suggestions or sought another expert. Counsel's delay in seeking assistance precluded counsel from formulating a properly informed strategy. Regarding prejudice, the showing of actual innocence previously made by petitioner to defeat the procedural default bar suffices to meet the Strickland prejudice standard. This is because the ineffective assistance of counsel claim "is intertwined with and inseparable from the presentation of experts and evidence that established Petitioner's claim of actual innocence."

Jones v. Quiros*, 686 F.Supp.3d 85 (D. Conn. Aug. 11, 2023), appeal pending, 23-7097 (2nd Cir.). In murder case, habeas relief is granted on two claims, one of which is ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to investigate and present evidence from an eyewitness, a friend of the victim, who saw the shooting and was not affiliated with petitioner or his gang. (The claim was found to have been adjudicated on the merits by the state court through its denial of a related claim of ineffective assistance by initial state habeas counsel for failing to investigate and locate the eyewitness in order to show trial counsel's ineffectiveness.) Pre-trial statements by the eyewitness consistently identified only two shooters and her physical descriptions of these shooters were different enough from petitioner "that no reasonable jurist could believe that 'pursuing [further] investigation' by contacting [the eyewitness] would be 'fruitless' or 'harmful' to [petitioner's] case." Additionally, evidence was presented in post-conviction proceedings showing that an adequate investigation would have easily uncovered the eyewitness's location. In finding no deficient performance, the state habeas court had relied on the fact that petitioner had not established that trial counsel's misapprehension of state law regarding the availability for funding of an investigator fell below the relevant professional norms. But

[e]ven if [trial counsel] did not have an investigator due to his unawareness of OPD policy and [petitioner's] indigence, [trial counsel] still could have sought out [the eyewitness] and interviewed her directly. To the extent that the [state habeas court's] conclusion constitutes an adjudication on the merits of [petitioner's] claim under the first Strickland prong, no "fairminded jurist could have reached the same judgment as the state court" as to the constitutional sufficiency of [trial counsel's] investigation.

Trial counsel's post-hoc speculation about why he did not investigate the eyewitness--a belief that she may not have been a strong witness--was unpersuasive. His stated defense involved showing that two other gang members were involved in the shooting, a defense supported by an alibi witness. Trial counsel's "articulated strategy for the case cannot be squared with his stated strategy in failing even to seek out an unbiased eyewitness who would testify that there were only two shooters, neither of whom she could identify as [petitioner]." Trial counsel's "baseless conjecture" as to what the eyewitness might have said in court did not provide "a reasonable justification for failing to investigate her exculpatory testimony." An attempt to discern an unarticulated reasonable strategy for trial counsel's investigative omission was unavailing. In assessing the reasonableness of the state habeas court's finding of no prejudice, an important factual error in its description of the trial evidence is noted. "It is axiomatic that a fairminded jurist would need to be familiar with the arguments and evidence put forth in a habeas petitioner's criminal trial in order to reasonably determine whether the outcome would be affected by additional testimony." Although the state court's error was "not dispositive of the issue of prejudice on this deferential habeas review," it did further highlight the unreasonableness of the state court's finding of insufficient prejudice. Most importantly, the state court found that the eyewitness's post-trial testimony was unreliable given its conflict with certain testimony given by another witness at the time of trial. The reliability determination was based, however, on a flawed analysis of the eyewitness's testimony. Rather than comparing the trial testimony of the other witness to determine the reliability of the eyewitness's habeas testimony, the state court should have compared the eyewitness's habeas testimony to the statements she made around the time of the offense. Had the state court done this, it "could have properly ascertained whether there is a reasonable probability that, if [the eyewitness's] 1992 statements were presented at [petitioner's] criminal trial in 1995, he would have been found not guilty." That the trial witness's 1995 testimony "appeared to more accurately depict the timeline of the police officers' arrival than [the eyewitness's] testimony two decades later . . . fails to support a legal conclusion that her 2015 testimony does not undermine confidence in the outcome of the 1995 criminal trial."

United States v. Smith*, 678 F.Supp.3d 172 (D. D.C. June 26, 2023). In multiple-murder/drug conspiracy case with a trial occurring over 20 years ago, trial counsel was ineffective as to the counts related to one of the murders petitioner was convicted of by promising in opening statement that an eyewitness was going to testify that petitioner was not one of the people seen committing that murder but then not calling the witness after learning mid-trial that the witness "was not just unhelpful, but potentially extraordinarily damaging to the defense." The deficiency in this case was not the failure to call the eyewitness, but rather "the failure to make an 'informed tactical choice' regarding the defense strategy for the [] murder—a strategy based around calling [the eyewitness] up until the day he was not offered to the jury." The deficient performance in this case "is the product of two related principles: failure to investigate before making strategic decisions and failure to deliver on a promise to the jury." The evidence showed that defense counsel poorly investigated the eyewitness's faults prior to promising his testimony, prior to the beginning of the defense case-in-chief, and even prior to the day of his testimony. "[W]hile counsel is free to change trial strategy to fit evolving needs, he is not free to develop, out of unjustified ignorance, an entire defense strategy around a 'bad witness,' so flawed that [defense counsel] believed calling him could have meant 'convicting [his] client' . . ." (Internal citation omitted.) Regarding prejudice, defense counsel's theory was that a man named Thomas was responsible, along with two other men, for an earlier shooting as well as the later murder petitioner was charged with. But the evidence supporting this theory that was presented by the defense needed the link only the eyewitness could provide. When the eyewitness was not called, defense counsel resorted to a standard insufficiency of evidence argument. That permitted the government to use the evidence that was admitted by defense counsel to suggest petitioner either was involved in the first shooting that night, or alternatively, that petitioner's only defense was so speculative as to be unbelievable. This was prejudicial to petitioner. If defense counsel had not promised the jury evidence of a third party's guilt of the crime and had not introduced evidence of the earlier shooting, there is a reasonable probability the members of the jury would not have credited the government's evidence as establishing petitioner's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Holt v. Smith, 2023 WL 3126313 (E.D. Cal. April 27, 2023) (1990 trial and sentencing). In California death penalty case involving convictions for rape, sodomy, robbery, burglary and murder, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to raise petitioner's incompetence to stand trial; (2) failing to raise certain mental state defenses at the guilt phase of the trial; and (3) calling petitioner to testify at the guilt phase of the trial. (Petitioner was also granted relief on a substantive claim of incompetence to stand trial.) In a prior order, it was found that the state court's denial of the claims at issue involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law and so the claims are considered de novo. Trial counsel dismissed indications of petitioner's incompetence that were apparent in petitioner's psychosocial history, as well as the advice of his own defense experts, "in favor of his perception that petitioner appeared to understand what was happening and was able to discuss the case with him without difficulty and was able to conduct himself appropriately in court." The evidence known to trial counsel "reasonably raised a doubt as to whether petitioner was competent to stand trial and at the least would have led a reasonable attorney to investigate further that avenue of defense.” Such evidence included that petitioner was mentally slow and behaved quite oddly while in court and elsewhere. (Other developable indicia of incompetence presented by petitioner was included only in sealed documents.) Further, trial counsel “knew or should have known that petitioner would not have himself been aware of his impairments and limitations, or that he would attempt to conceal them.” Trial counsel defended his failure to raise incompetence by claiming that his retained mental health experts refused to definitively state that petitioner was incompetent to stand trial. Both experts testified, however, that they had urged trial counsel to “move for incompetence.” And when the experts were provided with the habeas proffered evidence that trial counsel failed to even explore developing at the time of petitioner’s trial, they opined that petitioner was in fact incompetent to stand trial. In any event, trial counsel’s “stated belief that he could not raise a doubt as to petitioner’s competence unless his retained experts specifically opined incompetence” was not supported by state law, and instead suggested deficient performance on counsel’s part. This was especially so since trial counsel was aware prior to trial that testing by his penalty phase neurologist showed that petitioner suffered from brain abnormalities. Also of significance was that trial counsel ignored his own standard for assessing the competence of clients. He testified that he always requested a competency evaluation for a client who, like petitioner, had been in special education. Trial counsel explained his failure to adhere to his normal practice by professing that he was unaware that petitioner’s history of individualized education planning reflected placement in special rather than general education. “This inexcusable lack of awareness of information [trial counsel] himself believed critical to deciding whether to request a competency hearing may well have been a result of his practice of merely ‘skimming’ records rather than actually reading them.” Additionally, trial counsel “knew or should have known that petitioner’s institutional records reflected a long history of his auditory and visual hallucinations starting at age eleven.” On the record of this case, trial counsel “could not have reasonably believed that petitioner’s mental health impairments and deficiencies and manifestations thereof must have resolved by the time of trial merely because petitioner did not report such problems to [trial counsel].” Rather, the record suggested that trial counsel “simply failed to obtain and completely review and consider petitioner’s institutional records including those produced to the defense in discovery.” Other explanations by counsel for his inaction are found to be questionable. The developed and developable evidence of petitioner’s incompetence at the time of his trial was sufficient to raise a significant doubt whether petitioner was capable of rationally and factually understanding the trial and assisting in his defense. Trial counsel’s “explanation that he was concerned that his trial experts’ competency examination results would be shared with the prosecution does nothing to ameliorate this deficient conduct on the part of defense counsel.” And trial counsel’s unsupported belief that a Kern County jury likely would have rejected a mental state defense served only to emphasize his unreasonable failure to pursue the known and then developable evidence of petitioner’s incompetence. As to prejudice for the failure to raise petitioner’s competence to stand trial, absent defense counsel’s deficient conduct evidence would have been developed concerning petitioner’s organic personality disorder/syndrome with partial seizures and organic brain dysfunction that “could manifest itself in impaired auditory processing and seizure activity, deficits in judgment, cognition, planning, memory, and impulse control.” Evidence of petitioner’s family history of mental illness could also have been developed. (Evidence that could have been developed from petitioner’s jail records is redacted.) One trial expert indicated that he and the other expert would have considered the post-trial evidence had it been provided to them and it further supported a finding of incompetence to stand trial. On the record of this case, there is a reasonable probability that petitioner would have been found incompetent to stand trial had the issue been appropriately raised and properly considered by his counsel. . . . [A] preponderance of the evidence before this court establishes that petitioner's mental impairments left him unable to: rationally and factually perceive; recollect and relate the details of his crimes and understand the court proceedings; converse with and assist his counsel regarding the same and his own defense at trial; and knowingly and voluntarily waive rights and testify in his defense. The noted unrepresented but then available evidence of petitioner's family and psychosocial history, expert findings and opinions, and petition[er]'s aberrant behavior prior to and around the time of the capital crime and trial — all indicia of incompetence — is substantial.

Regarding the guilt phase defense, trial counsel's "decision to present guilt phase defenses of medical misadventure and insufficiency of evidence of robbery and rape was not reasonably informed by then available evidence of petitioner's mental impairments and intellectual deficiencies, and could not be justified as a tactical decision." Additionally, the chosen defenses were "wholly undeveloped, generally unsupported, and clearly unpersuasive." Predictably, trial counsel's "closing argument in support of his ill-conceived guilt phase defense theory was untethered from the law and facts before the jury, and deficient." The record established that trial counsel lacked any reasonable strategic basis for curtailing the investigation and development of evidence of petitioner's mental state at the time of the capital crime, and for failing to consider the presentation of defenses based upon petitioner's mental state. The "breakneck pace of this capital prosecution" — a mere 11 months from the capital offense to petitioner's incarceration on death row -- was itself "suggestive of an inadequate investigation given the facts and circumstances known and knowable to trial counsel." Although both of his guilt phase experts urged trial counsel to present mental state evidence, trial counsel "simply relied upon his stated belief that these experts 'did not provide me with a legal theory which would have made this evidence relevant at the guilt phase of the trial.'" One of the experts specifically told defense counsel that "[given petitioner's] organic problems and his seizure condition, he would not have been fully mentally aware during the commission of the crime." Because an objectively reasonable attorney would have considered and developed this information as a possible mens rea defense, trial counsel was deficient by doing neither. Under controlling legal standards, trial counsel's belief that "Kern County juries did not like [mental state] defenses," was not itself sufficient to provide a reasonable tactical basis to forego investigation, development, and presentation of mens rea defenses. This is especially true on the facts of this case where trial counsel had represented only two capital defendants prior to his appointment to represent petitioner, "suggesting his belief in this regard was unsupported by relevant experience." Additionally, trial counsel's own survey of potential Kern County jurors suggested that a majority of potential jurors in this case placed some amount of trust in psychological and psychiatric testimony when considering whether or not to impose the death penalty. Thus, trial counsel reasonably should have questioned his personal belief that a Kern County jury would not be receptive to mental state defenses. Notably, the guilt phase experts declared in habeas proceedings that they would have testified in support of a mental state defense at the guilt phase of petitioner's trial had his counsel so requested. "Petitioner's statements, admissions, and denials prior to and during his trial were not inconsistent with the psychotic exacerbations, remissions and transient 'fugue' symptoms noted by the defense mental health experts . . ." And any prosecution response to a mens rea based defense would have been subject to rebuttal by the defense. "The mere likelihood of a prosecution response thereto would not alone have served as a reasonable basis for defense counsel to reject the presentation of mens rea based defenses at the guilt phase of the trial." In assessing prejudice, among the persuasive considerations is the opinion by a post-conviction expert "that during the commission of the crime and at trial petitioner was intermittently and incipiently psychotic and suffering from a seizure disorder; that petitioner's actions were impulsive and not planned; and that petitioner's mental impairments interfered with his ability to form the mental state necessary for the crimes of which he was convicted." In contrast, the rebuttal by two prosecution experts, neither of whom examined petitioner, that he committed the capital crime purposefully and with criminal intent lacked persuasive weight. As to prejudice, it was of note that the jury deliberated nearly a full day before convicting petitioner on all counts and finding the special circumstance allegations to be true notwithstanding petitioner's admissions prior to and during trial. On the record of this case, "there is a reasonable probability that had the noted mental state evidence been presented to the jury at the guilt phase of petitioner's trial, it would have found a reasonable doubt as to mens rea." Even assuming that presentation of a mental state defense would have resulted in the disclosure to the prosecution of notes by the guilt phase experts of interviews with petitioner, "it may well have been persuasively argued that petitioner was not competent to make any damaging admissions reflected therein." Similarly, whether or not petitioner's prior rape when he was a juvenile would have been admissible as rebuttal evidence at the guilt phase "is a matter of speculation, and not evidence discounting the prejudice from counsel's deficient performance . . ." "The court finds a reasonable probability that absent defense counsel's deficient performance, at least one juror would have harbored reasonable doubt regarding petitioner's capacity to form the requisite intent for first-degree murder on the available theories, thus undermining confidence in the verdict rendered against petitioner." Given what trial counsel knew or should have known about petitioner's "organic, mental, intellectual, and functional impairments and occasional related problems discerning reality, remembering and relating perceptions, confabulating, and controlling his inappropriate affect," reasonable counsel would have investigated whether petitioner was competent to waive his rights and testify at trial. The fact that petitioner's testimony was not relevant to the primary defense – the victim died as the result of medical maltreatment – was "alone reason to seriously question counsel's decision to call him to testify in the guilt phase of the trial." As to the secondary trial defense of insufficiency of the evidence of rape, robbery and burglary, any benefit from calling petitioner to deny the rape allegation was outweighed by his damaging testimony and admissions from the witness stand. "This is especially so in that the prosecution's circumstantial rape case was arguably not strongly supported by the forensic evidence and expert testimony." And yet trial counsel failed to make any significant effort to refute that evidence. Further, petitioner's testimony "unreasonably placed his credibility [at] issue, and more importantly, resulted in a graphic narration of his crimes to the jury which was certainly damaging to the defense. Petitioner's admissions of his criminal intent and actions during his guilt phase testimony, in short, provided a windfall to the prosecution." Additionally, trial counsel "knew or should have known that petitioner’s graphic testimony describing his crimes likely would not demonstrate either his remorse or his humanity,” thus providing no benefit at the penalty phase. The deficient decision to call petitioner as a witness was prejudicial given that petitioner’s testimony “provided facts supporting the prosecution case and lessened the prosecution’s burden of proof at both phases of the trial. . . . Absent petitioner’s testimony, there is a reasonable probability at least one juror would have harbored reasonable doubt regarding the commission of the charged offenses.”

Penley v. Davids*, 2023 WL 2259131 (W.D. Mich. Feb. 28, 2023). In case where petitioner was convicted of charges related to the anal rape of his teenage son and acquitted of charges arising from an alleged second anal rape of his son, trial counsel was ineffective in numerous ways resulting in cumulative prejudice. First, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to questions by the prosecution to petitioner’s ex-wife about their history of frequent anal sex. In state post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel conceded that he should have objected at the outset of the questioning but stated that by the time he appreciated that an objection was warranted, he decided against raising the issue for fear of highlighting the issue. Based on this strategic decision, the state court found no deficient performance. The district court finds that the state court’s conflation of trial counsel’s failure to timely object with his much belated decision not to attempt to offset the damage done by the lack of a contemporaneous objection was an approach to the issue that was both unreasonable and unsupportable. And putting aside this analytical error, the decision by the state court was deficient for a number of reasons. While the fear of emphasizing prejudicial testimony can be a legitimate basis for opting not to object or seek a curative instruction when facing brief or isolated comments, here, the ex-wife testified at length about petitioner’s obsession with anal sex, culminating with her assertion that petitioner’s desire for anal sex often got “rough.” No legitimate strategy can be discerned from counsel’s inaction in this case. And any concern that a belated objection would “highlight” the objectionable testimony was undermined by the presumption that the jury would have followed the trial court’s instruction to disregard it. Also of note is the state court’s contradictory treatment of the evidence when raised in the context of a prosecutorial misconduct claim. There, the state court found that a proper objection could have cured any prejudice. Further, even assuming that counsel’s decision not to belatedly object constituted a valid strategic choice, “this determination says nothing about counsel’s failure to timely object when such would have prevented altogether the presentation of the testimony in question.” Counsel conceded that this decision constituted deficient performance. The Michigan Court of Appeals nevertheless disregarded this admittedly deficient decision because counsel’s subsequent decision not to belatedly rectify his error was allegedly a reasonable strategic choice to avoid highlighting the prejudicial testimony trial counsel erroneously allowed the jury to hear.

By this logic, the failure to timely object to unduly prejudicial evidence cannot be considered deficient performance so long as counsel responds to his initial error by making no attempt to rectify it – or, to put it another way, the greater the unfair prejudice, the more reasonable the decision not to seek curative relief. This hardly constitutes the type of “active and capable advocacy” Strickland is intended to protect.

Capital Case*

The state court decision finding no deficient performance constitutes an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. The second deficiency by trial counsel concerned admission of a report by a sexual assault nurse examiner that recounted the victim's claim that his brother committed suicide and had left a note saying he didn't want to be like petitioner. (The victim testified to this as well.) The report also noted, however, the victim's statement to the examiner, "I think he touched him too." It was deficient performance to fail to object to admission of the report, which contained a hearsay accusation that ran counter to the defense theory that petitioner's considerable criminal history did not involve sexual offenses. The deficiency in handling the report was twofold. First, there was no strategic advantage by acquiescing to admission of the report. Second, defense counsel was deficient in failing to request discovery of the note itself in order to verify its contents as reported by the victim. Notably, counsel failed to grasp any difference between evidence that the brother committed suicide and evidence about the note. The state court's finding that defense counsel was not deficient represented an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. The next deficiency involved a forensic interview by an employee of the Children's Assessment Center wherein the victim reported the two assaults. The interviewer's supervisor offered the opinion, without objection, that the allegations made to the interviewer constituted a "valid disclosure." The state court found no deficiency, concluding that the supervisor was vouching for the interview process rather than the credibility of the victim. The district court did not believe a reasonable juror would have intuitively understood that it was only the process that was being commented on. Further, an examination of the actual context of the use of the term "valid" belied the state court's conclusion about what was meant by the term. But even assuming that the jurors understood that use of the word "valid" merely communicated that the interview protocols were adhered to, the result is the same given the link the witness provided between proper use of the protocol and interviewees "sticking to the truth." The logical conclusion from the fact-finder hearing the testimony would be that the victim's allegations were considered truthful by the interviewer. Any competent attorney would have objected to the testimony in question, thereby obtaining from the court the necessary clarification or limiting instruction, and if necessary, used cross examination to clarify the matter. The failure of counsel to do so was deficient performance and the state court's contrary determination was unreasonable. Next, trial counsel performed deficiently by waiving petitioner's right to keep his shackles hidden from the jury. Regarding the state court's finding that the claim was waived, if it was premised on petitioner's failure to personally object when trial counsel made the waiver, the record did not show that petitioner made a knowing, voluntary and intelligent waiver. To the extent that the state court found that trial counsel waived petitioner's right to keep his shackles hidden, such a waiver is irrelevant. And the state court's apparent determination that trial counsel's waiver was not deficient performance is unreasonable. Prejudice is considered cumulatively. Considering the nature and importance of counsel's errors and the overall weakness of the evidence against petitioner, it is ruled that petitioner was unfairly prejudiced by his trial counsel's many unprofessional errors. In rejecting respondent's contention that the evidence against petitioner was overwhelmingly, it is noted that the medical evidence did not corroborate the victim's allegations, there were inconsistencies in the victim's account, there was evidence about possible motivations for the victim to have fabricated the allegations, and the jury rejected the counts associated with one of the two alleged assaults. Counsel's errors resulted in the jury hearing inadmissible and unfairly prejudicial evidence, as well as being exposed to the petitioner's shackles which undermined the presumption of innocence. Prejudice is established and habeas relief granted.

2022: *Roberts v. Broomfield, 637 F.Supp.3d 872 (E.D. Cal. 2022) (1983 trial and sentencing). In pre-AEDPA case, California death row inmate is granted habeas relief on a due process violation resulting from the cumulative errors in the guilt phase of this prison killing case. The key witnesses against petitioner were fellow inmates who testified either to having seen petitioner kill the victim or to alleged admissions by petitioner. Among the errors identified by the district court was deficient performance by trial counsel in failing to adequately cross-examine witnesses about the benefits they were receiving or requesting from the prosecution and failing to utilize an eyewitness's prior identification of someone other than petitioner being chased by the victim immediately after the stabbing. NOTE: The grant of relief was not appealed and Larry Roberts was not retried for the killing. Larry Roberts to walk off California's death row after 41 years - Death Penalty FOCUS

Neal v. Vannoy, 603 F.Supp.3d 310 (E.D. La. 2022), aff'd, 78 F.4th 775 (5th Cir. 2023) (1999 trial and sentencing). In double-murder case where the key witness establishing petitioner as the shooter of the victims was petitioner's uncle Darby, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to utilize evidence provided in discovery to impeach Darby's testimony. Petitioner, Darby, and petitioner's half-brother, Zannie, were apprehended as they fled the murder scene. Although each man shared some culpability in the crime, petitioner's eligibility for the death penalty rested on a finding that he specifically intended death or to inflict great bodily harm on the victims, either independently, or in conjunction with an aggravated burglary or drug transaction. The only independent eyewitness to testify at petitioner's trial described the shooter as someone who appeared more to match a physical description of Darby than petitioner. Critically for the prosecution's case against petitioner, Darby testified that it was petitioner who entered the home where the killings took place, along with Zannie. According to Darby, petitioner was armed with the AK-47 that was linked to one of the victim's wounds. Additionally, Darby claimed that petitioner later admitted to having shot someone in the home. Petitioner, in contrast, claimed to have remained in the car while Darby and Zannie went into the house. Defense counsel failed to challenge Darby's account of the crime with: (1) a serology report indicating the possible presence of blood on the shoes collected from Darby on the night of the murder; (2) a forensic report showing that petitioner's shoes were excluded as the source of the bloody shoeprint found at the scene, whereas Zannie's shoes could not be excluded as the source; and (3) an inconsistent prior statement of Darby wherein Darby told the police that petitioner did not have a gun when he exited the vehicle. (In the state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner offered an affidavit from someone from the medical examiner's office confirming that he tested Darby's shoes for blood and found that blood was present.) In rejecting the claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to utilize the evidence, the state court concluded that the omission by trial counsel was strategic. This determination was unreasonable as the record showed that trial counsel never reviewed the evidence at issue and so could not have made a strategic decision to forgo using it or employing a forensic expert to assist in determining whether the evidence was helpful to the defense case. Because there was no reasonable argument that trial counsel satisfied Strickland's deferential standard of adequate performance, trial counsel's "performance was deficient and the state court's determination to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland.” As to prejudice, the state court found that use of the evidence “would not have had any effect on the outcome given that the record establishes that [petitioner] was involved in the commission of the offense along with his co-defendants including attempting to kill police officers with a high powered assault rifle while fleeing the scene.” This ruling was also flawed: “Given the importance of Darby’s testimony to the State’s case and the value of the impeachment evidence, no fairminded jurist could conclude that the failure to impeach Darby’s testimony with evidence showing the presence of blood on his shoe would not have ‘undermine[d] confidence in the outcome.’”

2020: Dunn v. Warden, 2020 WL 13526316 (N.D. Ind. Dec. 23, 2020), aff’d, 44 F.4th 696 (7th Cir. 2022). In murder prosecution where the primary dispute was whether the victim died from a fall down a set of stairs or from being pushed down the stairs and then bludgeoned with an unknown object by petitioner after the victim landed at the bottom, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to consult a forensic pathologist. Eyewitnesses described an argument between petitioner and the victim who were neighbors sharing a second floor balcony with stairs leading to the ground level. Petitioner was heard telling the victim to stop hitting him with a baseball bat and one witness observed the victim striking petitioner with the bat. Medical reports and photographs corroborated that petitioner had been struck by the bat, and this was consistent with his statements to authorities that evening. It was unclear from one eyewitness’s observations whether the victim fell or was pushed down the stairs by petitioner as they struggled over the baseball bat. Another witness, the woman petitioner lived with, heard a thud and when she came out to the balcony, petitioner was at the top of the stairs and the victim was at the bottom. According to this witness, petitioner then descended the stairs and pulled at the victim’s arm, imploring him to get up. The victim was found at the bottom of the stairs when police arrived, with the baseball bat underneath his body. The cause of death was massive blunt trauma to the head but the manner of death was deemed to be uncertain by the pathologist who performed the autopsy. At trial, the State called a forensic pathologist who opined, inter alia, that the victim’s injuries were not consistent with a fall down the stairs. A blood spatter expert also testified for the State, supporting its theory that an unknown instrument was used to strike the victim when he was at the bottom of the stairs. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner presented testimony from a forensic pathologist who opined that the victim had not been struck at the bottom of the stairs. Trial counsel admitted that he had no strategic basis for failing to consult such an expert. Rather, he explained that he had a myopic view of the case and thought the State would argue that petitioner had struck petitioner with the baseball bat, a theory not relied upon by the State because the DNA and other evidence did not support it. The post-conviction petition was denied on the ground that petitioner had failed to prove that consulting with a forensic pathologist would have changed the result. On appeal, the state appellate court sometimes cited the correct Strickland prejudice test but ultimately applied the erroneous heightened standard utilized by the lower court. Because that standard was contrary to Strickland, the district court applied de novo review of the claim. (The state appellate court did not address deficient performance.) On the record of this case, where the manner of death was the key issue, it was unreasonable for trial counsel to have failed to consult with a forensic pathologist. Looking to the explanations given by the post-conviction pathologist for his opinion, which included why a fall could account for the location of the blood at the scene, and the fact that the pathologist’s testimony would have supported the eyewitness’s accounts, prejudice is established.

Capital Case*

And while it was true that after hearing all of the evidence, the jury could have concluded that the victim was pushed down the stairs by petitioner, this alternative theory was not presented by the State. But for trial counsel's deficient performance, there is a reasonable probability of a more favorable result.

Jones v. Cate*, 2020 WL 6150039 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 19, 2020). In second degree murder case where trial counsel pursued a theory of imperfect self-defense, counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present mental-health evidence supporting the chosen defense. Because the claim was not adjudicated on the merits in state court, it was reviewed de novo. The record indicated that neither the defense investigator nor trial counsel ever interviewed any potential witnesses regarding Petitioner's history of mental health issues or drug abuse. Aside from interviewing Petitioner's wife, "no members of the defense team made any effort to visit and interview Petitioner's family members and friends in an attempt to obtain information on Petitioner's background and upbringing." It further appeared that no effort was made to gather Petitioner's school records. "Had anyone bothered to do so, they would have learned about Petitioner's history of childhood abuse, that he struggled in school and failed second grade,[footnote omitted] with subsequent testing revealing that Petitioner has an IQ of 57, placing him squarely in the mentally retarded range." The sole indication that trial counsel considered Petitioner's drug use was a notation in the file about a one-hour consultation the defense investigator had with a forensic psychiatrist regarding methamphetamine. Importantly, the records did not suggest that trial counsel consulted with the psychiatrist about any other aspect of Petitioner's mental condition at the time of the shooting or that the psychiatrist ever interviewed Petitioner about his mental health history. Although trial counsel denied Petitioner's claim that Petitioner had informed him about his mental health history as well as about the symptoms he had experienced both at the time of the offense and while incarcerated, trial counsel was at least aware that while awaiting trial, Petitioner had been held in a padded "safety" cell at the jail and had been prescribed the antipsychotic drug, Mellaril. Respondent's contention that trial counsel likely disregarded Petitioner's mental-health issues because trial counsel chose to accept a prison nurse's opinion that Petitioner was "malingering," and that Petitioner did not complain to prison officials again about mental health issues while awaiting trial, did not excuse trial counsel from his duty to investigate. Post-trial mental health professionals, including an expert hired by habeas counsel, prison medical officials, and even Respondent's expert, determined that Petitioner has legitimate mental-health problems and a long history of psychiatric issues. (Petitioner was found to have suffered from, inter alia, schizophrenia, schizoaffective disorder, depression, and PTSD. It was opined that his chronic methamphetamine use would have further served to undermine his intellectual and cognitive deficits, potentially exacerbating his psychiatric symptoms.) Both Petitioner's expert and Respondent's expert agreed that the defense of imperfect self-defense was potentially available based on Petitioner's mental condition at the time of the shooting. That neither Petitioner nor his wife referenced his mental health symptoms or history in their various pre-trial statements to authorities did not justify trial counsel's failure to investigate. By not investigating the contours of a potential mental health defense, trial counsel was not able to determine if the defense was viable and could not therefore have made a strategic decision to forego such a defense. Counsel's failure to investigate constituted deficient performance. As to prejudice, "the evidence of Petitioner's mental health and drug issues could have been used by an attorney to raise reasonable doubt about Petitioner's ability to form the requisite intent to justify a second-degree murder conviction."

Zumot v. Borders*, 483 F.Supp.3d 788 (N.D. Cal. 2020). In first-degree murder/arson case involving the killing of petitioner's girlfriend, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present and debunk evidence that directly bore on petitioner's alibi defense and his credibility as a witness. Evidence at trial established that petitioner and the victim were involved in a tumultuous relationship with the victim at one point receiving a restraining order against petitioner and petitioner pleading guilty to having made threatening calls to the victim. Flaws in the state court's adjudication of the claim allowed it to be considered do novo by the federal district court. Trial counsel was deficient in failing to review video footage showing petitioner arriving at work at a time that supported his alibi defense and instead relying on a police report describing the footage. Also unreasonable was trial counsel's failure to present evidence that a third party, at the victim's direction, made the phone call some seven weeks before the victim's murder that the victim falsely told authorities was a death threat from petitioner. "The evidence that counsel failed to investigate and present to the jury could have directly impacted the jury's assessment of [petitioner's] credibility and his alibi along with its assessment of the reports [the victim] made to third parties about [petitioner]. In light of this record, counsel's errors undermine confidence in the outcome of the trial." (Petitioner was also granted relief on claims that the prosecution presented false evidence that involved the same evidence at issue in the ineffective assistance of counsel claim.)

2019: Hughes v. Vannoy, 2019 WL 5684501 (M.D. La. Nov. 11, 2019) (adopting the MJ's Report and Recommendation, 2019 WL 5686323 (M.D. La. Feb. 5, 2019)), aff'd 7 F.4th 380 (5th Cir. 2021). In case where petitioner was convicted of second degree murder for a killing petitioner maintained was accidental, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to conduct an investigation regarding the statements of an alleged eyewitness, Sandra Allen, and failing to interview Sandra prior to trial. The victim in this case was the live-in boyfriend of petitioner's daughter, Amy. Petitioner testified at trial that the shooting had been unintentional. He recounted that the gun accidentally went off when the victim grabbed the barrel during a struggle. Amy, in contrast, testified that her boyfriend had his hands up and was backing away from petitioner when petitioner pulled out his gun and shot the victim from one to two feet away. Sandra's trial testimony supported Amy's version of events. Sandra testified that she heard someone call for help, exited her home and then witnessed two men arguing and pushing each other. One man backed away with his hands up and she then heard a gunshot. After the gunshot, the man who had been backing away was on the ground and the other man left in a truck. Other witnesses, however, provided testimony that was consistent with petitioner's account of what had happened. An expert stated that the victim had a contact wound indicating that the shot was fired so close to the body that the barrel made an impression on the skin and the tissue in the area. Amy's sister testified that on the night of the shooting Amy told her that she had not witnessed the actual shooting. Following his conviction, petitioner alleged that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to investigate Sandra's statements and to interview her prior to trial. Shortly after the incident, Sandra had provided a written statement. In that statement, she said that she had been sitting in her front room when she heard someone call for help. She then heard a gunshot at which point she exited her house and observed two people arguing. A red truck thereafter left the scene. Approximately one week before trial, defense counsel was notified that Sandra would testify that she had seen the shooting and that the victim

had had his hands in the air and was surrendering when he was shot. Sandra explained at trial that her written statement differed from her trial testimony because she had “transposed” the sequence of events. In post-conviction proceedings, defense counsel conceded that he had not interviewed Sandra and he did not know that she had a roommate, Lee Allen. Defense counsel may have been aware that Sandra had given a television interview during which she stated, consistent with her written statement, that she had exited her home after hearing the gunshot, but he made no effort to secure a copy of the interview prior to trial. Lee Allen would have testified that he and Sandra were sitting in their home when they heard a gunshot. Sandra then exited the home and called police. Defense counsel explained that he had not interviewed Sandra because he did not believe that she would be able to deviate from her written statement. Defense counsel’s failure to interview Sandra constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is found given that Sandra was the sole alleged disinterested witness. Use of her television interview and testimony from Lee Allen would have “greatly diminished Sandra Lee’s credibility, leaving only the inconsistent testimony Amy Hughes and the physical evidence of the contact wound which corroborates the petitioner’s version of events.” Additionally, had defense counsel interviewed Sandra and roommate Lee Allen, Sandra may have testified consistently with her written statement and television interview. But even if she did not, defense counsel would have been in a position to mitigate the damage from her testimony had he conducted a reasonable investigation. The state court’s denial of relief, which did not specifically address this claim, was objectively unreasonable.

Rogers v. Gittere, 2019 WL 4655894 (D. Az. Sept. 23, 2019), aff’d, 25 F.4th 1171 (9th Cir. 2022) (1981 or 1982 trial and sentencing). In triple homicide death penalty case from Nevada on remand from the Ninth Circuit after it affirmed the grant of sentencing relief but reversed the procedurally-based denial of some guilt-related claims, habeas relief is granted on claim that trial counsel was ineffective with respect to their investigation and presentation of petitioner’s defense of not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI). Although the claim was deemed procedurally defaulted, that default was overcome by the ineffective assistance of post-conviction counsel. Trial counsel in this case settled on an NGRI defense immediately upon their appointment. In opening statement, however, trial counsel neglected to explain to the jury what was needed to show NGRI and how the evidence would establish it. Although trial counsel referenced anticipated evidence about petitioner’s mental state, e.g., that he was “paranoid” and “irrational,” this was not tied to the legal standard for NGRI. At the close of the statement, trial counsel told the jury that petitioner had not acted with intent, malice, or premeditation, suggesting that negating those elements had been the purpose of her comments about petitioner’s mental state. A Strickland expert opined that the opening statement failed to adhere to the prevailing standard of care in Nevada in 1981. The district court agreed, ruling that “trial counsel’s performance in failing to explain the NGRI defense to the jury in her opening statement, fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.” Turning to the actual presentation of the defense, although petitioner had been evaluated by numerous mental health professionals at Lake’s Crossing Center for the Mentally Disordered Offender (“Lake’s Crossing”), the institution where petitioner was held and where his competence to stand trial was assessed, trial counsel asked only one expert to opine on petitioner’s sanity at the time of the offense and this request came less than two weeks prior to trial. The expert, Dr. Pauly, opined that petitioner was schizophrenic and, at the time of the crimes, was incapable of knowing the nature and quality of his acts or that they were wrong. He was subjected to damaging cross-examination, however, because he had not been properly prepared for his testimony. Trial counsel never met with Dr. Pauly in person, never discussed with him the materials he relied on in reaching his opinions, never discussed with him reports from Lake's Crossing psychologist Gutride that contradicted his conclusions, never provided him with the Lake's Crossing daily progress notes, and never discussed with him how petitioner's violent behavior during his adolescence was related to his schizophrenia. Trial counsel also presented two other experts – Drs. Richnak and Rich – who had been appointed by the trial court to evaluate petitioner's competency to stand trial. They were not retained to opine on petitioner's sanity at the time of the offenses and were not provided with the materials they would need to do so. Instead, trial counsel used them only to testify that they had diagnosed petitioner as suffering from schizophrenia. With no objection, however, they were asked on cross-examination about petitioner's sanity at the time of the crimes, to which they expressed their beliefs that petitioner knew right from wrong at the time he was evaluated but neither was able to offer an opinion about petitioner's sanity at the time of the capital crimes. The district court found that "trial counsel performed unreasonably in not adequately preparing Dr. Pauly, Dr. Richnak and Dr. Rich to testify at trial." According to the district court, the presentation of Drs. Richnak and Rich "was mostly pointless, and worse, it was damaging to [petitioner's] NGRI defense" Notably, there was an expert not utilized by the defense who had been an obvious choice to present at trial – Dr. Molde. Dr. Molde had been appointed by the court to assess petitioner's competence to stand trial as well as his mental state at the time of the crimes. Dr. Molde had evaluated petitioner five times and concluded he was schizophrenic. Yet trial counsel never spoke with him. The failure to do so "was especially egregious given that Dr. Molde had recently testified in support of an insanity defense" that was presented by the same public defenders office that trial counsel worked for. Dr. Molde's testimony at the federal evidentiary hearing made plain "that he would have been an effective expert witness in support of [petitioner's] NGRI defense." Regarding petitioner's mental state at the time of the offense, Dr. Molde opined:

I believe that he did not know right from wrong or know the nature and quality of his act, that he was not competent at the time of the crime to know those things due to his schizophrenic disorder which I believe was quite active and intense and interfered with that ability.

In addition, Dr. Molde challenged the findings of the expert called by the state, Dr. Gutride. Dr. Molde, for example, disputed Dr. Gutride's diagnosis of ASPD, stating that it "had nothing to do with this case," and expressing the belief that schizophrenia and ASPD are mutually exclusive diagnoses. Trial counsel's failure to challenge the testimony of Dr. Gutride through cross-examination and with the experts that were utilized at trial was unreasonable. "The Court finds that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's objectively unreasonable investigation and presentation of [petitioner's] NGRI defense, [petitioner] would have been found not guilty by reason of insanity."

Dunn v. Smith*, 430 F.Supp.3d 568 (E.D. Wisc. 2019), aff'd, 981 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2020). In felony-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to conduct an adequate investigation and present independent evidence on the medical and scientific issues relating to the victim's death. The victim's body was found in the early morning hours of May 10, 2011, lying face up on a concrete patio behind Peg & Lou's Bar. There was a laceration to the back of his head and a small pool of blood under it. Fresh blood was flowing from his head and there was dried blood coming from his mouth and running horizontally to the ground on both sides of his face. His blood/alcohol concentration was later reported as .298. Although the victim had multiple injuries to his face and head, the cause of death was by traumatic injuries to the brain resulting from a massive skull fracture. Petitioner and co-defendant Crochet were arrested after it was reported that they had been involved in an altercation with the victim in the parking lot of the bar during the night of May 9, 2011. After initially denying striking the victim, petitioner later admitted to a police investigator that he had slapped the victim in the face when the victim approached Crochet in a threatening manner. According to petitioner, the victim fell when he was slapped and his head bounced off the pavement. Believing that the victim had been seriously injured, petitioner notified the bartender. At trial, the bartender testified that the victim was sitting up on the ground when the bartender went to the parking lot. There were no physical marks on him. The bartender helped the victim to the back area of the bar where he left the victim seated on the grass leaning against a patio chair. Petitioner and Crochet were charged with, inter alia, felony murder with the predicate crime being misdemeanor battery. Although trial counsel initially focused on a self-defense theory, he later recognized inconsistencies in the State's theory of the case: while the medical examiner opined that the victim died immediately from the severe trauma he sustained, the bartender described speaking with the victim following the altercation with petitioner and helping him walk to the back patio. Trial counsel conveyed his impressions about the contradictions to the prosecutor and unsuccessfully suggested a settlement of the case. In fact, the medical examiner had not stated in her report that the victim would have died immediately from the severe head trauma he sustained. Trial counsel did not speak with the medical examiner prior to her trial testimony where she told the jury that the victim's brain injuries would not have been instantaneous and would not necessarily have prevented the victim from communicating or moving after sustaining them. Although trial counsel had consulted with a forensic pathologist pretrial who believed, based on his review of the autopsy report, that the victim's death would have been instantaneous, trial counsel did not call the expert and so the medical examiner's testimony went un rebutted. Trial counsel had also failed to follow-up when the prosecutor revealed pretrial that the co-defendant's experts – a forensic pathologist and a blood spatter expert -- were expected to opine that the victim had stood up in the area where his body was found and then fallen down and hit his head. Trial counsel apparently dismissed the potential utility of these experts to his defense given that he already had the bartender's account and the medical examiner. After petitioner was tried and convicted, the co-defendant's experts issued their final reports supporting the theory that the victim's fatal injury occurred where his body was found. The State later dismissed the felony murder charge against the co-defendant and allowed him to plead guilty to aiding and abetting a felon and misdemeanor battery. Trial counsel's representation was challenged by petitioner in state post-conviction proceedings where he presented expert testimony supporting the theory that the victim's death was not caused by the blow in the parking lot. The medical examiner defended her prior opinion but conceded that there was nothing in her autopsy report that was inconsistent with the conclusion that the victim sustained the laceration and skull fracture on the concrete patio where his body was discovered. The trial court denied relief based on lack of prejudice. The state appellate court, however, ruled that there was no deficient performance. It accepted trial counsel's explanation that he strategically preferred getting his theory in through a State witness rather than a defense expert and that he did not believe the expert he had consulted contradicted the medical examiner in any way. In the federal habeas proceeding, the district court concluded that trial counsel's explanation for why he did not call his own expert was "plainly unreasonable," pointing out that his reasoning made no sense "if the State's expert is not going to provide the needed testimony upon which the defense is based.” And his decision to forego calling his own expert “was made without the kind of investigation that Strickland requires.” Trial counsel’s objectively unreasonable performance was not limited to his failure to interview the medical examiner and to call his own witness. It also extended to his failure “to seek an adjournment based on the State’s disclosure of the exculpatory findings of [the co-defendant’s] experts or adequately investigate those findings.” Although trial counsel attempted to defend this failure on the ground that petitioner wanted to proceed to trial, the flaw in this excuse was counsel’s failure to discuss the new evidence with petitioner. Presumably, petitioner wanted to go to trial with a complete defense. The state appellate court’s determination that trial counsel performance was adequate was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Addressing prejudice de novo, the district court acknowledged evidence in the record suggesting that there may have been an additional attack on the victim in the area where his body was discovered, including testimony potentially implicating the co-defendant. This evidence did not, however, implicate petitioner. “More importantly, the suggestion that [the victim] was later ‘finished off’ is inconsistent with the State’s theory that [petitioner] caused his death earlier in the parking lot with his single blow.” Looking to the expert evidence presented in the state post-conviction proceeding, the district court finds that confidence in the outcome of the trial is substantially undermined and prejudice is established.

Fontenot v. Allbaugh*, 402 F.Supp.3d 1110 (E.D. Okla. 2019), aff’d on other grounds, 4 F.4th 982 (10th Cir. 2021). In procedurally complicated murder case, habeas relief is granted to former Oklahoma death row inmate on numerous claims, including ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to adequately investigate the case and present viable evidence supporting petitioner’s innocence. Petitioner was convicted of the robbery, kidnapping, and murder of a convenience store clerk. Some six months after her disappearance, co-defendant Ward was interviewed by the police. He confessed and implicated petitioner as being involved in the crimes against the victim. Petitioner was then arrested and also confessed, although he later recanted the confession which failed to coincide with the prosecution’s evidence of the victim’s cause of death, the location of her remains, and the details of how petitioner supposedly killed her. After multiple trials, with petitioner being sentenced to death twice, he ultimately received a sentence of life without possibility of parole. Counsel is found to have performed deficiently for: (1) failing to introduce sworn statements by Ward exculpating petitioner of the crime; (2) neglecting to investigate evidence showing that the victim was being stalked by someone familiar to her; and (3) failing to investigate witnesses who were at the convenience store in the time before and after the victim’s disappearance. As for Ward’s statement, trial counsel conceded he was ineffective in failing to seek its introduction during petitioner’s retrial. Prejudice is found for this omission when considered cumulatively with Brady material that included alibi testimony. Regarding the alleged stalker,

There was no strategic or tactical reason not to present [available] evidence showing that [the victim] not only received obscene phone calls and that someone was watching and harassing her over a longer period of time prior to her disappearance, but also demonstrating her fear of this individual to the degree she inquired about buying a gun. Not only should [the witness with this information] have testified at trial, but defense counsel should have pursued such leads further.

Capital Case*

The failure to do so resulted in ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to call [the witness] and for not developing such evidence.

Again, it is the totality of the evidence not presented at trial, including about the existence of alternative suspects having motives to harm the victim, that establishes prejudice. Finally, had the defense utilized the information gleaned from the convenience store's register tape, witnesses would have narrowed down the window of the victim's disappearance lending credence to Ward's sworn statement of having kidnapping the victim with a man named Ashley. In the alternative, defense counsel could have used the information presented by one of the convenience store witnesses about seeing a man behind the counter with the victim, along with the account by several witnesses about a truck in the convenience store parking lot at least thirty minutes before the victim's abduction, to support a third party culpability theory. "This evidence considered cumulatively with the records impermissibly withheld by the State presents a viable defense that the man harassing [the victim] for months and weeks leading up to [her last sighting], was involved in her disappearance." The register tape could also have been used to call into question the thoroughness of the police's investigation. "But for defense counsel's failure to challenge the evidence the State presented, Mr. Fontenot would not have been convicted of these crimes. The failure to investigate this evidence deprived Mr. Fontenot of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel."

Gable v. Williams*, 2019 WL 1756468 (D. Ore. April 18, 2019), aff'd on grounds other than IAC, 49 F.4th 1315 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S.Ct. 1796 (2023). Granting habeas relief on claim that petitioner's constitutional rights were violated by the exclusion of evidence concerning a third party's confession to the murder petitioner was charged with, as well as on a claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present appropriate legal support, including citation to federal law, in support of the admission of evidence of third party guilt. (The substantive exclusion of evidence claim was raised in state court solely as a state law violation.) Although the claims were procedurally defaulted, petitioner satisfied the Schlup actual innocence test. Multiple witnesses recanted with persuasive explanations for why they had lied, including coercive interrogation tactics, and expert witnesses testified about how the unethical and flawed polygraph testing procedures and the improper and coercive interrogations combined to obtain false testimony from the examinees. In addition, there was the third party confession that had indicia of reliability. The showing of innocence overcame the default of both the substantive exclusion of evidence claim and the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Regarding the defaulted trial ineffective assistance of counsel claim, the district court ruled in the alternative that Martinez was satisfied to overcome the default. In light of the prior merits resolution of the exclusion of evidence claim, it was easily found that trial counsel's failure to assert petitioner's rights under Chambers v. Mississippi stated a substantial claim. Petitioner also demonstrated a reasonable probability that, absent the deficient performance of his post-conviction counsel, the result of the post-conviction proceedings would have been different. Therefore, the procedural bar to the trial ineffectiveness claim is overcome under Martinez.

2016: Harrison v. Tegels, 216 F.Supp.3d 956 (W.D. Wis. 2016). Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to identify inconsistencies in the alleged victim's statements and for failing to object to evidence of defendant's prior bad acts in this repeated sexual assault case. Defendant was accused of sexually assaulting his then stepdaughter "D.M.K." The state relied entirely on a recorded interview that D.M.K. gave to the police and the trial testimony of her mother, Kimberly, who recounted what D.M.K. allegedly told her about the assaults. At trial, counsel's theory of the case was that Kimberly persuaded her daughter to fabricate the allegations. During opening statements, counsel promised the jury that he would reveal many inconsistencies in D.M.K.'s and Kimberly's allegations. However, counsel never did. Counsel failed to present evidence of numerous and significant inconsistent statements that both D.M.K. and Kimberly made about the alleged assaults. Trial counsel was deficient for promising, and then failing, to identify inconsistencies in D.M.K.'s statements. Since D.M.K.'s statements were the only evidence of the sexual assault, the "credibility of the witnesses was the key issue for the jury to consider in evaluating the state's case." Id. at 966. Counsel failed to present evidence of significant inconsistencies with respect to the assaults such as the type of conduct involved, the frequency of the assaults, their location, and what defendant allegedly said to D.M.K. during the assaults. Some of the differences were fundamental and dramatic such as D.M.K.'s initial statement that she was assaulted hundreds of times, and then her revised statement that she was assaulted between one and five times. Counsel's failure to uphold his promise to show the inconsistencies in the witness's statements, constituted deficient performance. Counsel also failed to object to D.M.K.'s statement at trial that defendant often hid from the police around the time that the alleged assault occurred even though defendant was hiding for reasons unrelated to the case. The statement was so clearly irrelevant to trial that "there is no excuse for counsel's failure to object." Id. at 967. Counsel's errors were cumulatively prejudicial under Crisp v. Duckworth, 743 F.2d 580 (7th Cir. 1984) because "the case the jury heard was very different from the case that it should have heard" and defendant's trial "did not reliably test whether he did as he was accused." Id. at 974.

Gorby v. Wetzel*, 210 F.Supp.3d 725 (W.D. Pa. 2016), appeal dismissed, 2017 WL 5185335 (3rd Cir. April 25, 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective during the guilt-innocence phase because counsel failed to conduct an investigation from which he could have presented evidence of defendant's diminished capacity to compliment his voluntary intoxication defense in this capital murder and robbery case. Defendant was convicted in 1986 of murdering Drayton Sphar in Pennsylvania. At trial, counsel argued that defendant did not commit the murder. The judge gave the jury instructions as to murder and the defense of voluntary intoxication. Counsel did not present evidence to support the latter. Trial counsel was deficient for not raising the defense of diminished capacity because defendant's cognitive and mental impairments were so severe and noticeable that even rudimentary investigation would have revealed sufficient information to spur a deeper investigation into the diminished capacity defense. Counsel conducted a limited investigation of defendant's mental health and social history, which consisted of talking to defendant, his mother, and his step-father. Counsel did not cite a tactical or strategic reason for not investigating a diminished capacity defense. Counsel testified that he knew defendant performed poorly on standardized tests, received low scores on intelligence and achievement tests, did poorly in school and that defendant was hospitalized for head trauma. With this limited information, "it is difficult to comprehend why [counsel] did not obtain educational records, medical records, or consult a mental health professional during his investigation and preparation for trial, especially when counsel knew this was a capital case.” Id. at 741. The extent of defendant’s mental illness and drug/alcohol abuse was readily discerned by mental health professionals during PCRA proceedings. Furthermore, counsel was aware of the plethora of information that defendant was likely intoxicated during the crime, and thus could not form the specific intent to kill. Counsel did not present this evidence, despite asking the judge to instruct the jury on the voluntary intoxication defense. Counsel only argued that defendant did not commit the crime. As a result, counsel’s representation was “blatantly deficient at least with respect to his failure to investigate a diminished capacity defense.” Id. at 742. Counsel’s deficient performance was prejudicial because the investigation and presentation of the diminished capacity defense would have negated the state’s case for specific intent, and that there is a reasonable probability that a jury, after considering the evidence related to the diminished capacity defense, would have reached a different result.

Fenn v. United States*, 175 F. Supp. 3d 602 (E.D. Va. 2016). Counsel ineffective in receipt and possession of child pornography case for failing to lay the proper foundation for admission of the out-of-court statement of the defendant’s father that he downloaded the pornography. The defendant lived in the house with his parents and his brother. Several computers/hard drives in the defendant’s room contained pornography, including one which remained in the basement until just several days before the search. The basement was where the father often stayed working on computers. The father’s laptop also contained pornography. The day after petitioner’s arrest, his father told him and his mother that the father had been downloading pornography. Counsel’s entire defense was arguing a reasonable doubt by asserting that the father was the guilty party. He called defendant’s mother to testify about the father’s out-of-court statements against interest, but the government’s hearsay objection was sustained because counsel failed to establish that the father was “unavailable” under Federal Rule of Evidence 804(a). Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to subpoena the defendant’s father and call him to testify. While the father would not have provided exculpatory testimony, he would have asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. By doing so, he would have been “unavailable” and his prior statements admissible under Rule 804(b)(3)’s hearsay exception. Counsel’s conduct was not explained by strategy. While counsel claimed that he chose to rely only on the pornography on the father’s computer rather than calling him to testify, this explanation was “not credible for several reasons.” First, counsel never interviewed the father. Second, counsel stated that he expected the government to call the father to testify. Prejudice established as the father’s admissions “would have gone to the central issue at trial” of whether the defendant “knowingly” received and possessed the files. The admissions also directly substantiated the theory of defense.

2015: United States v. Army, 137 F. Supp. 3d 981 (E.D. Ky. 2015), aff’d, 831 F.3d 725 (6th Cir. 2016). Counsel ineffective in case of physician charged with unlawfully dispensing controlled substances for lying to his client and failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. The physician was a retired military pathologist, who returned to work due to financial problems. He went to work at a pain clinic, even though he was not a specialist in pain management. A month after he started, he gave notice that he was leaving because the clinic expected him to see 30-35 patients a day and he did not believe he could adequately treat so many patients in so short a time. The clinic convinced him to stay by doubling his salary and agreeing to make changes to allow him to better serve the patients. For many of the patients, the physician simply continued to use the treatment plans of the prior clinic doctor (Saxman), who was a specialist in pain management. Ultimately, the doctor was charged, along with the clinic owners, for conspiring to distribute controlled substances. For conviction, the government had to prove that the physician was operating “outside the course of ordinary medical practice,” which required a showing that the defendant “did not issue the drugs for a legitimate medical purpose and in the usual course of medical practice.” The physician asked counsel to call Dr. Saxman and some of his patients in his defense. Counsel told his client that the prosecutor informed him that Dr. Saxman “either had a deal in place or soon will be indicted,” which was not true. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in lying to his client and in failing to interview Dr. Saxman, who was not indicted and was still practicing medicine. As the defendant was following many of her treatment plans, she could have provided a legitimate medical reason for the treatment plans she created. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to interview and present the testimony of some of the defendant’s patients, who would have testified that the defendant prescribed pain medication for a legitimate medical purpose after regular examinations and adjustments in medications when necessary. Cumulative prejudice established.

LeTemps v. Secretary, Florida Department of Corrections*, 114 F. Supp.3d 1216 (M.D. Fla. 2015). Counsel in sexual battery and kidnaping case was ineffective in failing to investigate and challenge the semen stain analysis of a state technician and failing to properly cross-examine the arresting officer regarding the direction LeTemps was walking when he was arrested. LeTemps was convicted in 1989. In 2011, he filed a second motion for state post-conviction alleging actual innocence. The motion was summarily denied and affirmed in state court. In 2013, he filed a motion for leave to file a second or successive petition for writ of habeas corpus in the Eleventh Circuit, which was granted. The federal habeas petition filed in May 2013 was untimely under the statute of limitations but permitted under the “miscarriage of justice” exception as LeTemps made a credible showing of actual innocence. The evidence at trial revealed that the victim, who was fluent only in Spanish, was accosted around 4:30 a.m. while she was awaiting a bus. She was forced to undress and sexually assaulted at knife-point before managing to escape and run to the nearby home of Williams, who gave her the robe he was wearing and called the police around 5:00 a.m. Two hours after she gave her initial statement to police, she and her cousin, Maldonado, went to the area of the crime looking for her attacker. They encountered LeTemps, who was fluent only in Creole, and contacted police, leading to the arrest and conviction. Rathman, a forensic serologist, examined the robe given to the victim by Williams and found a semen stain. The stain contained blood type O, which matched the victim who was an O “secretor.” LeTemps was a type B “secretor.” She testified that she could not determine the blood-type of the semen donor because the amount of semen in the stain was insufficient. LeTemps, as well as his live-in girlfriend and a roommate, testified that he had been hope asleep at the time of the crime. He woke up around 6:30 a.m. and left to walk to work at 7:00 a.m. He was arrested as he was walking to work. Prior to filing his second state post-conviction application LeTemps’ counsel discovered a deposition of Rathman taken by the state prior to trial. In it Rathman revealed that she concluded that the semen stain was insufficient to type, as opposed to simply not containing type B, based on a “P30 test.” “P30 is a protein only found in seminal fluid.” According to Rathman, a dilution of approximately 1-in-200 would assure sufficient semen to pick-up the blood type of the donor. She took this number from the Serological Research Institute (“SERI”), which originated the technique. She found the dilution rate in this case to be 1 in 322. Her bench notes revealed that she arrived at this conclusion based on the assumption to 5,000 units would be “a neat semen stain.” In post-conviction, Harmor, the senior forensic serologist at SERI since 1979, provided an affidavit stating that Rathman’s calculations were incorrect because 3,000 units was the number used by SERI for a “neat stain” during the 1980’s. Using this figure, the dilution rate in this case was within the 1-in-200 minimum for accurate blood group detection. Thus, rather than being an insufficient sample of semen, the testing revealed that LeTemps was not the source of semen. Williams, a type A “secretor,” was also excluded as the source and Williams testified that no one other than he and the victim had ever worn the robe. In short, the semen donor was either a type O “secretor” like the victim or was a non-secretor. Another aspect of Rathman’s testing also excluded LeTemps as the semen donor. She performed a microscopic analysis of the semen stain and failed to detect spermatozoa, meaning the donor likely had a low sperm count or was sterile. Because LeTemps had three small children at the time, he had spermatozoa in his seminal fluid. Finding this evidence sufficient to establish the exception to AEDPA’s one-year limitations period, the Court proceeded to the merits of the claims. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate the testing standard used by Rathman. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to cross-examine the arresting officer concerning the direction LeTemps was walking at the time of his arrest. LeTemps’ home was south of the crime-scene and his place of employment was north of the location. At trial, the officer testified that LeTemps was walking south away from the crime scene and towards his home. His report, however, indicated that LeTemps was walking north bound towards his work-place. Prejudice established.

2014: United States v. Matthews, 999 F. Supp. 2d 352 (N.D.N.Y. 2014), gov’t appeal dismissed, 14-731, 14-2555 (2nd Cir. Nov. 25, 2014). Counsel ineffective in bank robbery and conspiracy case for failing to inquire into the history between his investigator and the defendant and failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. The robbery charge was based on a bank robbery in Syracuse. The conspiracy charge related to the Syracuse robbery, as well as two prior bank robberies in Whitesboro and Auburn. The defendant had previously pled guilty to the Whitesboro and Auburn robberies in state court. Thus, he was sentenced in this case to life under the “three-strikes” sentencing law. In 1982, the defendant had been arrested for attempted murder of a police officer, but was mistakenly released prior to trial. After three months of the most extensive manhunt in Syracuse history, Richard Haumann, a deputy police chief, arrested the defendant who was disguised in women’s clothes and a wig by tackling him as he attempted to flee. Following a trial in which Haumann testified, the defendant was acquitted of the attempted murder charge. Haumann was the investigator assigned by the Federal Public Defender Office to work on the defendant’s case. The government’s case concerning the Syracuse bank robbery revealed that Valerie Sewall and a male accomplice, who could not be identified from surveillance footage, robbed the bank. Eyewitness’ described the accomplice as approximately 5’7”, which matched the defendant and Sewall’s boyfriend. Sewall testified that the defendant had been her accomplice in all three of the robberies and that she cooperated with police in order to secure her release from custody and avoid prosecution on the Syracuse bank robbery. The defense conceded guilt on the Whitesboro and Auburn robberies, but denied involved in the Syracuse robbery. Counsel called a single alibi witness, who could not confirm the defendant’s whereabouts at the time of the crime, but contradicted Sewall’s testimony about the defendant’s whereabouts after the Syracuse bank robbery. Counsel was aware that Haumann and the defendant had a prior interaction and that Haumann had previously arrested the defendant. His failure to inquire further was deficient and he failed to discover the clear conflict of interest between the investigator and the defendant. Whether due to the conflict or simple negligence, counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present the available evidence. Counsel focused only on the time after the Syracuse robbery, even though there was no reasonable basis to limit the investigation in this fashion because counsel possessed police reports showing that two other witnesses accounted for the defendant's whereabouts before the robbery at a garage at approximately 11:30 - 11:45. It took 38 minutes to drive from the garage to the bank where the robber was on camera at 11:49. These witnesses were consistent with the defendant's statements to counsel and also contradicted Sewall's testimony of events leading up to the robbery and the defendant's whereabouts in other ways. Prejudice established on the Syracuse bank robbery charge, which was reversed. The conspiracy charge and life sentence were affirmed though because they were not depended on the Syracuse robbery evidence.

Moore v. Beard*, 42 F. Supp. 3d 624 (M.D. Pa. 2014), aff'd, 640 Fed.Appx. 159 (3rd Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 580 U.S. 908 (2016). Following the Third Circuit's finding that the state court's decision was contrary to and an unreasonable application of federal law under AEDPA, the case was remanded to the District Court for a hearing and de novo findings. The court held that counsel was ineffective in this first-degree murder case for failing to adequately impeach co-defendant Scott, who was a state witness, and failing to call co-defendant Jones as a defense witness in the second 1983 trial. The first trial ended in a mistrial when improper evidence from a suppression hearing was sent into the jury room during deliberations. The case involved a murder during a robbery at a veterinary office that was committed by two individuals. According to Scott, Jones planned the robbery and waited in the car, while Scott and petitioner entered the office and petitioner committed the murder. According to Jones, who was willing to testify for the defense but was not called, he met up with Scott and another man, Burgis, after the crime and Scott told him of the robbery and admitted that he was the shooter. Petitioner testified that he was at home in a different city at the time of the crimes and was not involved. Scott, who is now deceased, later signed an affidavit recanting his trial testimony and stating that he had been coerced by the prosecution to testify against petitioner. Jones was also deceased. Regardless of "whether his memory was clouded by the passage of time, age, or medical condition," lead trial counsel could remember virtually nothing about the case. Thus, the court relied on co-counsel's testimony and the record. During Scott's testimony, he admitted on direct that he was testifying pursuant to a plea agreement in which he agreed to testify and plead guilty to third degree murder for which he would be sentenced to five to ten years to be served concurrently with a federal sentence and that he would be confined in a federal institution. Lead counsel's failure to conduct any cross-examination on the topic of the plea agreement was deficient given that Scott's charge was reduced from first to third degree murder and the possible sentence was reduced from a possibility of the death penalty or 60 years down to 20 years. In addition, counsel did not delve into the fact that Scott was facing a number of federal robbery charges and that even prior to the retrial a motion to reduce his 20-year sentence, based on his testimony against petitioner, had been filed. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to call Jones to testify, even though counsel had identified him as a material witness and he was present in the courthouse during the initial trial. Co-counsel could recall only that he had been present when lead counsel interviewed Jones and that the interview lasted no more than 5-10 minutes. Jones was not interviewed before this and was not re-interviewed prior to the retrial. Co-counsel did not recall hearing information that Jones exonerated petitioner or that the man with Scott was Burgis, but co-counsel conceded, however, that this was an inadequate interview. Moreover, it was clear from Jones' testimony in his own subsequent trial and in later affidavits in this case that he denied involvement, contradicted Scott, and gave statements consistent with another defense witness that Scott admitted the robbery and murder afterwards, but it was Burgis with him rather than petitioner. Thus, counsel's failure to present Jones' testimony was also deficient conduct. Prejudice was also found.

Raether v. Dittman*, 40 F. Supp. 3d 1097 (E.D. Wis. 2014), aff'd, 608 Fed.Appx. 409 (7th Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in sexual assault of child and bail jumping case for failing to adequately cross-examine two state witnesses based on their prior statements to police and for inadequately preparing a defense witness and/or making an unreasonable decision to present that witness at all. The charges arose from an underage drinking party where the defendant, who was 18 years old at the time, was accused of raping D.N., who was then 14 years old. Five days after the party, D.N. told a school counselor that the defendant had raped her. A police officer then interviewed D.N., E. Bragg, E. Brown, and the defendant. In her statement to the officer, D.N. said that she was highly intoxicated and could remember only "bits and pieces" of the evening, but she recalled the defendant raping her and that Bragg had told her about some details of the evening. During trial two years later, D.N.'s testimony included numerous damaging details that were not included in her statement to the police but counsel did not impeach her based on these discrepancies. Bragg told the police that Brown found D.N. in the bedroom naked and yelled causing a number of people to go to the room where the defendant was also present. At trial, however, Bragg testified that she and others found the bedroom door locked and jimmied it open with a credit card, after which the defendant walked out. She also testified that D.N. told her about the rape the next day, which had not been mentioned to the police. Nonetheless, counsel did not impeach her based on this omission or the other discrepancies between her statement to the police and her trial testimony. Counsel's conduct was also deficient with respect to Brown, who told police that at some point in the evening she went in the bedroom and saw D.N. on the bed naked with the defendant standing next to the bed. Defense counsel called her to testify. She said that she never saw D.N. or the defendant in the bedroom or coming out of the bedroom. Counsel did not ask any questions to reconcile this testimony with her statement to police. On cross, she was impeached with her statement to police and admitted that she lied on direct because she wanted to help the defendant. After her testimony, out of the jury's presence, the trial court had her arrested for perjury. The state court held that counsel's conduct was deficient but found no prejudice. The state did not contest the state court's deficiency findings. Thus, the District Court addressed only the question of prejudice. The court found that the state court's adjudication was not a reasonable application of Strickland because the state court evaluated the errors only individually. Viewing the errors under the proper Strickland analysis, the District Court viewed the errors cumulatively – rather than "in isolation" – and found prejudice. With respect to D.N., the state court simply relied on the fact that the bottom line of her statement to the police and her trial testimony was that the defendant raped her. The District Court held, however, that the inconsistencies in her statement and testimony was significant and impeachment "could have been critical" to the jury in assessing her credibility, especially in light of the prosecutor's closing arguments asserting that her trial testimony was consistent with her statements to police. Similarly, failure to impeach Bragg was critical because her trial testimony that D.N. told her about the rape the next day bolstered D.N.'s testimony and credibility, which again the state argued in closing arguments. Impeaching Bragg could have been critically in persuading the jury that she was not credible and that D.N.'s testimony was not corroborated. With respect to Brown, the state court found no prejudice because it was the defendant's own credibility problems, with 13 criminal convictions at age 20, that "did him in." The state court's determination was unreasonable, in part, because it focused simply on counsel's failure to adequately prepare Brown to testify when the larger issue is that counsel should never have called her to testify because her testimony was damaging to the defense rather than helpful in any way. In short, counsel "handed the prosecution the argument that the defense was willing and in fact put before the jury a witness to perjure herself to save the defendant. It is hard to imagine how such an error would not be prejudicial." Id. at 1106 (citations omitted). The state court's focus here on weighing the defendant's credibility problems with Brown's in determining prejudice due to counsel's presentation of Brown's testimony "misses the mark" on the proper cumulative prejudice analysis of the prejudice from failing to adequately impeach the state's witnesses in conjunction with Brown not being "properly prepared by counsel (or not called at all)." Focus simply on the defendant's prior convictions, "in isolation, ignores the potential impact of the impeachment of the State's key witnesses," especially in light of there being no other evidence of the defendant's guilt. In other words, the jury could have found the defendant lacking in credibility but also found the State's witnesses lacking in credibility and "insufficiently convincing – the two are not mutually exclusive." Finally, the state court's finding of no prejudice was unreasonable because the state court relied on the defendant's impaired credibility, as addressed above, in combination "with other evidence that [the defendant] was in the bedroom with a nearly naked" D.N. This finding is not supported by the record. Brown testified only that she saw D.N. partly naked in the room, but she said nothing about seeing the defendant there and no other witness supported this finding at all other than D.N. and Bragg, both of whom should have and could have been impeached.

2013: Green v. Lee, 964 F. Supp. 2d 237 (E.D.N.Y. 2013), appeal withdrawn, 13-3190 (2nd Cir. Oct. 1, 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in sodomy, attempted sodomy, and sexual abuse case for failing to investigate and present a defense. The defendant was charged with ten counts related to the alleged sexual molestation of his granddaughter, G.G., and four of her friends, including B.M., who was G.G.'s friend and the first of the complainants to accuse Green of sexual abuse. In the fall of 2006, allegedly after watching a particular episode of Law & Order: SVU, B.M. alleged that she and G.G. had been abused in 1998-1999, but G.G. denied that any abuse had taken place and denied knowing B.M. until 2000. Green also denied any abuse and denied knowing B.M. in 1998-1999. In support of B.M.'s testimony, the prosecution presented: (1) a photo of B.M. and G.G. together dressed in Halloween costumes allegedly taken in 1998; and (2) a device called a "Turbo Twister Speller" that Green allegedly gave to B.M. to help with her spelling in 1999. To rebut G.G.'s testimony that she did not know B.M. prior to 2000, the People presented testimony from G.G.'s mother, Cindy. Cindy was Green's daughter-in-law, and was in the process of divorcing Green's son. She offered a souvenir Polaroid photograph in a photo jacket marked "6/98" of G.G. and B.M. at Coney Island. Even though she was not present when the picture was taken, she testified based on her daughter's hair length that the picture was taken in 1998-1999. Trial counsel had contacted a private investigator, "but for unexplained reasons, trial counsel ceased contact with [him] prior to the trial.” Post-trial this investigator ascertained–“[w]ith very little effort and easy access”–“that the film used in the Coney Island photograph was not manufactured until several years after the date the People represented the photograph was taken.” Likewise, the sweatshirt worn by B.M. in the Halloween photograph displayed a logo of a company that did not enter commerce until three years after the date testified to at the trial. The “Turbo–Twister” toy spelling machine given to B.M. by Green did not enter commerce until August 2001, not the years 1998 to 1999, as the testimony at the trial stated. And, the relevant episode of Law & Order: SVU did not air until several months after the time that B.M. suggested at the trial that she viewed the program. “These dates were crucial in that the Defendant and G.G. both testified that the family did not even meet B.M. and her mother until the year 2000.” Here, there was prejudice, particularly based on the Coney Island photograph, which “the trial prosecutor referred to . . . as the ‘one piece of evidence that the defense can’t get around’ and ‘the one piece of evidence in the whole case that is not capable of lying.’” Nonetheless, the People argued in habeas that this photograph was only “collateral” and “cumulative” evidence.

What the prosecution cannot be permitted to do is proffer evidence, passionately argue for its centrality to obtain a conviction, then abandon reliance on that evidence once the conviction is obtained and the evidence is shown to be false.

While New York state courts apply a prejudice standard that is “more generous toward defendants than the standard spelled out in Strickland, the federal court applied the Strickland standard. In this case, the state court “applied an overly demanding standard of prejudice,” essentially rejecting Green’s claim of ineffective assistance of counsel because Green could not prove to a certainty that he would have been acquitted “but for” the trial counsel’s deficient performance. “This strict ‘but for’ standard is different from an ‘unreasonable application’ of Strickland’s more defendant-friendly ‘reasonable probability’ standard and is therefore constitutionally deficient.” Green was prejudiced even on the counts that did not involve B.M. due to “spillover prejudice.”

Lopez v. Miller*, 915 F. Supp. 2d 373 (E.D.N.Y. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to investigate and call alibi witnesses. The case was 23 years old and involved the shooting of a drug dealer in a crackhouse. The case was not barred by the statute of limitations due to the court’s finding that the defendant had made a credible and compelling case of actual innocence. There was no murder weapon or forensic evidence connecting the defendant to the murder. The prosecution was based on the testimony of two witnesses, only one of whom identified the defendant. This witness was on a “two-day crack binge.” She did not call the police or provide any information until a month later following her arrest for prostitution. She made a number of contradictory statements. There was conflicting evidence whether she had a plea deal with prosecution in exchange for her testimony. The other witness who had been face-to-face to the shooter and spoke to him, did not identify the defendant and described the shooter as black and 6’3”. The defendant was 5’7” and the state conceded he “could not be described as black.” Counsel did not call the alibi witnesses, who were the defendant’s mother-in-law and sister-in-law. Counsel claimed to have interviewed both of these witnesses before deciding not to present them because they would not be believed because they were “closely related” to the defendant. On the trial record, however, counsel stated that he had interviewed a single alibi witness that he chose not to call. The state court made unreasonable determinations, without an evidentiary hearing, by finding that counsel had interviewed both alibi witnesses and made a reasonable decision not to present the testimony because their residences were close to the location of the shooting and did not render the shooting impossible. While the court assumed that counsel had interviewed the alibi witnesses, despite their declarations to the contrary, the court found counsel's conduct deficient in failing to call the witnesses to testify. The decision not to call the witnesses solely because they were "closely related" was unreasonable. Likewise, even though the alibi witnesses "were not perfect, the court cannot imagine any significant harm that was likely to result from calling them to testify – only benefit, and potentially tremendous benefit." In short, calling them "was clearly a better option than presenting no case at all." Likewise, counsel did not discover and present testimony of a man who was in the crackhouse at the time of the shooting who affirmatively declared that the defendant was not the shooter. Prejudice established in light of the prosecution's "weak" evidence.

Smith v. United States*, 980 F. Supp. 2d 854 (N.D. Ohio 2013). Counsel was ineffective in felon in possession of a firearm case for three reasons. The evidence established that the police were responding to an anonymous tip about men gambling when they observed the defendant and other men and other men sitting outside at a table with dice and cards present. As the police approached, the petitioner said he had to use the bathroom and started to enter a neighboring house. He was stopped on the front porch and officers found a gun near this spot. The defense alleged that the gun did not belong to the defendant and he was attempting to evade the police only because there was an outstanding warrant for his arrest. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel: (1) failed to obtain the police records and to move to suppress the gun; (2) failed "even to speak with the non-police witnesses to petitioner's arrest"; and (3) "advised petitioner that testifying would preclude him from obtaining the acceptance-of-responsibility adjustment" in sentencing. First, counsel's failure to move to suppress the gun was deficient and not based on reasonable strategy. Counsel "made unreasonable assumptions about the facts and law, thereby abandoning, without due consideration or information, the possibility of excluding the only evidence in the case that really mattered. Specifically, counsel assumed, "with no reasonable basis," that police were justified in detaining the petitioner.

Had [counsel] sought out the police records . . . , he would have learned: 1) the complaint came in nearly one hour before police responded; 2) police responded to the wrong address; 3) the complaint mentioned thirteen males, as opposed to the four males the officers mention in their reports; and 4) the complainant failed to provide any physical description of the alleged gambling suspects.

"[T]he police records suggested, at the very least, that the officers lacked any basis to attempt to detain petitioner . . . , even if dice were in plain view." Second, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to call the non-police witnesses who would have established that the porch was "cluttered with furniture and boxes" and "was an active neighborhood social hub accessible at all hours of the day and night," which made the defense theory that the gun was already on the porch more likely. "While counsel pressed this theory during his closing argument, he could point to no concrete evidence supporting it. Predictably, the prosecutor pounced on that omission in his rebuttal" argument. Finally, counsel's advice that petitioner should not testify "was unreasonable" because the defense based on denial of guilt "precluded petitioner from an acceptance-of-responsibility adjustment, regardless of whether he testified. Moreover, no reasonable attorney could conclude the adjustment was available in petitioner's case." Prejudice was established. Counsel's "errors essentially cut the legs out from under the defense before the trial even began and denied petitioner the opportunity to present a plausible, coherent account of the events occurring before his arrest. The errors were all the more significant, given the lack of compelling evidence against petitioner," which was "underscored by the jury's note [during deliberations] reporting its inability to reach a unanimous verdict" prior to being given an Allen charge.

2012: Williams v. Woodford, 859 F. Supp. 2d 1154 (E.D. Cal. 2012). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to call the defendant or his alibi witnesses to testify after promising at least 13 times in the opening statements that the testimony would be presented. The petitioner was a drug dealer. His house was burglarized and some of his drugs were stolen. The burglars left a pager behind. The next day a person the petitioner could have suspected (based on the pager) was killed. The state's case was based on this theory, the testimony of an informant that the petitioner confessed to him, and a belt and rope found on the victim. Even though counsel believed the petitioner should not testify due to evidence of other crimes and was giving this advice, counsel told the jury 10 times in the opening that the petitioner would testify. This conduct "was highly unprofessional" and prejudicial as it highlighted the petitioner's failure to testify and "undermined the presumption of innocence." Counsel's failure to present the testimony of the petitioner and two other alibi witnesses was a result of a failure to prepare for trial as counsel never talked to these witnesses. Counsel's failure to discuss the substance of the case with his own client "betrays a shocking degree of neglect on counsel's part." Counsel was also ineffective in failing to interview a primary witness, who had told the same alibi story to police multiple times in interviews, even when interviewed "in quite hostile fashion and without a lawyer." Prejudice was clear because this was a close case and even without the alibi evidence the jury deliberated for a day and a half before rendering a verdict. Under AEDPA, the state court made an unreasonable determination of the facts by making evidentiary findings without holding a hearing and allowing the petitioner an opportunity to develop his claims.

Baldwin v. Adams*, 899 F. Supp. 2d 889 (N.D. Cal. 2012), appeal dismissed, 12-17183 (9th Cir. May 5, 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for multiple reasons. The victim was shot multiple times with a .40 caliber pistol and left between parked cars. There were no leads in the case until more than two months later when an informant was arrested while standing near a car containing illegal drugs. He offered information and released without being charged with a crime. The petitioner's home was searched then based on a "parole search" and he was arrested due to a small amount of pot found. Police then interviewed Gaines (based on the informant's information), who said he dropped the petitioner off near the crime scene. When he returned, Hicks told him the petitioner shot the victim. Several months later, the weapon was dropped by a fleeing suspect, who generally fit the petitioner's description, in a low income housing project. Hicks was killed prior to trial. Gaines refused to testify, but his taped statement was admitted as a prior inconsistent statement. Counsel conduct was deficient for: (1) failing to object to the prosecutor's arguments that the defendant should be convicted "in order to protect community values, preserve civil order, or deter future law-breaking"; (2) failing to request a limiting instruction to limit evidence that the initial informant had been threatened to preclude consideration of this evidence for the impermissible purpose of consciousness of guilt because there was no evidence that the petitioner was responsible for the threats; (3) failing to object to the double hearsay in Gaines prior statement that Hicks told him the defendant killed the victim and Hicks was in fear for his life if he cooperated with police; (4) failing to request a limiting instruction to preclude the inference that Hicks was killed because of his knowledge because there was no evidence that petitioner was responsible for his death; (5) failing to present evidence that Hicks told police that he knew the shooter and petitioner was not the shooter; (6) failing to object to the prosecutor's closing statements that the defendant was involved in intimidating witnesses; (7) failing to object to the prosecutor's closing statements that two defense witnesses testified falsely solely because of fear of the petitioner, which both witnesses had repeatedly denied in cross; (8) failure to redact irrelevant prejudicial pejorative statements in a taped phone call and failing to obtain a limiting instruction related to this evidence; (9) failing to object to the prosecution's misstatements of law and assertion of personal knowledge and facts not in evidence in questioning defense witnesses and in closing arguments; (10) failing to object to the prosecution's improper vouching for witnesses in closing. Reversal was required due to prosecutorial misconduct and the "cumulative impact of the multiple errors" by defense counsel.

Hash v. Johnson*, 845 F. Supp. 2d 711 (W.D. Va. 2012). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in capital murder trial, which resulted in a life sentence, for failing to investigate the State's jailhouse snitch witness and failing to present an alternate theory of the crime at trial. The police initially had a suspect in the murder "but the case went cold." After a new Sheriff was elected and new officers were assigned to the case, the petitioner was arrested almost four years after the crime. The prosecution had no physical evidence linking the petitioner to the crime, but had three primary witnesses: (1) an alleged accomplice; (2) the petitioner's cousin, who claimed the petitioner confessed to her; and (3) "a known prison informant, to whom [the petitioner] allegedly confessed the crime." Counsel cross-examined the snitch about inconsistencies in his statement. Counsel also asked if the informant had assisted the government on prior occasions. The snitch said he had done so only once. If counsel had investigated, counsel could have impeached the snitch with evidence that he "was a prolific informant," as he had "provided information or testimony that implicated at least twenty people in at least three different federal prosecutions." Likewise, counsel cross-examined the snitch about whether he was testifying in state court in order to obtain a reduction in his federal sentence. The snitch said "somewhat, yes," but on redirect testified that the state court proceedings would have no effect on his federal sentence. The petitioner testified in his own defense. He admitted discussions of possibly robbing "an old lady" in the area with the testifying accomplice and another man but said he withdrew from the discussions and took no part in planning or committing the murder. The defense also presented 18 witnesses emphasizing the contradictory nature of the accomplice's and cousin's testimony and putting forward an alibi defense. In discovery in state habeas proceedings it was revealed that the snitch wrote to his federal judge and others in at least 25 letters concerning a sentence reduction. Five of those letters were written prior to his testimony in the petitioner's trial. Although he had been facing a potential life sentence, the snitch was initially sentenced to 180 months. Following his testimony in this case, his sentence was reduced to 60 months, which was basically time served. There had been "a deal" and the snitch's testimony to the contrary was false. He had been moved to the jail where the petitioner was confined specifically for the purpose of obtaining information against the petitioner. The state failed to disclose any of this information or that both the accomplice and the cousin had failed polygraph examinations regarding their statements against the petitioner. Overall, the picture in federal habeas proceedings was that: (1) the accomplice's and snitch's testimony was manufactured and contradicted the crime scene evidence; (2) the state failed to disclose communications between the police, the snitch, and the accomplice, who recanted in post-conviction proceedings and the recantation was credible; and (3) the police failed to seize and test a rifle found at the initial suspect's house that matched the caliber and type of weapon used in the murder. In addition, the initial suspect lived near the victim and a man matching his description was seen near the area where the victim's truck was found. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and impeach the snitch. Counsel admitted that he did not obtain the snitch's "federal file," which contained five letters in the snitch's own handwriting contradicting his trial testimony. In finding no prejudice, the state court unreasonably applied Strickland. The letters would have proven that the snitch lied in his testimony in that he clearly believed that he would get a sentence reduction in federal court in exchange for his testimony in this case. Likewise the state court's decision was unreasonable in concluding that counsel's conduct was not deficient in failing to investigate and present an alternate theory simply because counsel reviewed police reports and spoke to the initial investigator who said the case against the initial suspect "had gone cold and the investigation was at a dead end."

[I]t is not a reasonable strategic choice for defense counsel to rely on the finding of a police investigation. Counsel has an obligation to make [his] own independent investigation.

Here, the snitch's and the alleged accomplice's testimony was the primary evidence placing the petitioner at the crime scene and establishing the state's theory that the crime was committed by three people. Counsel should have contested this with evidence from the crime scene and the initial investigator, who believed the murder was committed by a single perpetrator. Because the state court did not consider prejudice on this, under Pinholster, the federal court was permitted to and did consider the evidence presented in federal court on this issue. The evidence revealed that the "multi-perpetrator theory was inconsistent with the evidence at the crime scene." [The court also found state misconduct for presenting false testimony and withholding evidence under Napue and Brady.]

2010: Larsen v. Adams, 718 F. Supp. 2d 1201 (C.D. Cal. 2010), aff'd, 730 F.3d 930 (9th Cir. 2013), amended and superceded on denial of rehearing, 742 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in possession of dagger case (which resulted in "three strikes" enhanced sentencing) for failing to adequately investigate and present exculpatory evidence. (The court excused the failure to comply with the federal statute of limitations based on "the 'actual innocence' gateway set forth in Schlup v. Delo, 513 U.S. 298 . . . (1995)"). The charge resulted from a 1:00 a.m. call to police of an assault with a deadly weapon in progress, with shot fired, in a bar parking lot. Two police officers approached in a single car with flashing lights and a siren, then with roof-mounted floodlights, side spotlights, and high beams. Ten to 20 people were in the parking lot. One officer testified he saw the defendant remove an object from underneath his clothing and throw it. The object turned out to be the dagger found underneath a car. There were numerous significant inconsistencies in this officer's testimony from his testimony in two preliminary hearings. The second officer testified generally about the call and arrest with the defendant giving a false name. The only other state witness was a detective, who ran fingerprints and discovered the defendant's true identity. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and failing to obtain crucial information about witnesses from the prosecutor, even though the defendant informed counsel he was innocent and counsel was aware that numerous other people were in the parking lot. Counsel had even informed the prosecution that the defense theory at trial would be that it was Hewitt's dagger. "A reasonable defense attorney would have attempted to interview as many percipient witnesses as possible." Counsel of at least three eyewitnesses, who were not interviewed. If counsel had pursued the investigation, it would have led to exculpatory evidence, including the parents of one of the known eyewitnesses. While not directly relevant, the court detailed counsel's "record of indifference to his professional responsibilities" and his disbarment after this trial, as evidence "bolster[ing]" the court's findings. If counsel had adequately investigated, a military retiree, who had also been a police officer for eight years, would have testified that he was in the parking lot when police arrived and observed another man (Hewitt) throw the dagger. This witness was initially handcuffed, but was released without being questioned after officers saw his police identification in his wallet. This man's wife also would have testified generally consistently, including that she had seen Hewitt through an object under a car. Another man, who had been inside the bar would have testified that he had been threatened with "the" dagger inside the bar by another man. This witness knew the defendant, who was inside the bar at the time, but was not in possession of "the" dagger. This prompted the bartender to make the call to police. Aside from these witnesses, Hewitt himself submitted an affidavit in federal court admitting the dagger was his. Hewitt's girlfriend also gave an affidavit stating Hewitt had told her the night of the incident that the defendant had been arrested for possession of Hewitt's knife. She also said that Hewitt felt bad and sold his motorcycle to post bail for the defendant. Even if counsel's conduct pretrial was not deficient, he was informed of the existence of the former police witness and his wife after conviction, but prior to sentencing and still failed to investigate or move for a new trial.

Barco v. Tilton*, 694 F. Supp. 2d 1122 (C.D. Cal. 2010). Counsel ineffective in murder and conspiracy case for failing to adequately investigate and present defense evidence. Although AEDPA applied, the court reviewed counsel's conduct de novo because the state courts had denied an evidentiary hearing and evidence was presented in federal court that further developed the claim. Prejudice was reviewed de novo because the state courts did not reach the issue. Petitioner's son had been assaulted with life-threatening injuries and was hospitalized for several months. While there were rumors that the victim's father committed the assault, the police were unable to assemble any evidence against him and the investigation was suspended. Four months after the assault on petitioner's son, there was a drive-by shooting at the victim's home, which resulted in death. The father of petitioner's grandson, who lived with petitioner, was arrested a short distance away with the murder weapon and other damning evidence on him. He had a cellphone call with someone at Petitioner's home (and a number of people lived there) shortly before the shooting. No additional arrests were made until after petitioner's daughter broke up with her boyfriend and had him arrested for breaking into her home. Only then, despite previously denying any knowledge, the boyfriend/accomplice went to police claiming a conspiracy led by petitioner. He was granted immunity in exchange for his trial testimony. Counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to investigate and introduce the boyfriend/accomplice's numerous crimes of moral turpitude, readiness to violently retaliate, and motive to falsely implicate petitioner; (2) failing to introduce the testimony of petitioner's family and friends to rebut the boyfriend/accomplice's testimony that numerous conversations about retaliation took place in their presence and were led by petitioner; and (3) failing to present testimony of character witnesses, particularly a veteran of the prison system to attest to petitioner's character for non-violence. Petitioner was a teacher who taught inmates in the state prison and at the California Youth Authority. The character witness would have also rebutted the allegation of a connection between Petitioner and the Mexican Mafia. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to retain an investigator despite the family's willingness to fund necessary investigation. Counsel also did not interview family members about the alleged discussions because, contrary to the trial record, he recalled that all of these conversations allegedly took place privately. Finally, counsel alleged a strategy not to present character evidence, but this decision was made "without even interviewing any of the character witnesses himself, to assess their demeanor and how they would have held up on cross-examination." Id. at 1145. It was "objectively unreasonable for [counsel] to make the decision not to call the character witnesses without interviewing them." Id. at 1146. His decision "cannot be deemed a fully informed one." Id. Prejudice established because the state's evidence was "weak" and the boyfriend/accomplice was "the critical witness" for the state. Without him, the state "would have been unable to proceed" against petitioner. Yet, the jury heard none of the evidence impeaching his credibility and rebutting his testimony and the jury did not hear credible evidence of petitioner's own character for non-violence.

United States v. Hebshie*, 754 F. Supp. 2d 89 (D. Mass. 2010). Counsel ineffective in arson case for failing to move for Daubert hearing, challenge testimony of prosecution experts, and challenge canine evidence. The prosecution arose from a fire in a commercial building in which the defendant leased space for his convenience store. The government built its case on "less than overwhelming" evidence of defendant's motive to burn down the store and arson experts and canine evidence. Although there were numerous articles in legal journals and cases casting a "critical eye on the scientific reliability of arson evidence" by 2006, when this case was tried, counsel did not investigate. "Ordinarily competent counsel would have understood that men and women had been convicted, sentenced, perhaps even executed, on the basis of flawed arson evidence." Aside from this general "drumbeat of concern about arson prosecutions," counsel "had been specifically warned about deficiencies in this case by predecessor counsel and by the experts retained by them." During trial, the court also "pointedly inquired" three separate times whether counsel wanted to challenge the evidence or needed a continuance. Counsel's alleged "explanations" for his behavior post-trial "were, in a word, incoherent." The most significant problems with the evidence was: (1) the government experts lifted a single sample from the area they believed was the origin of the fire and took no control or comparison samples; and (2) "Billy the dog sniffed a so-called accelerant" in the same area to which she had been led. The government never even looked for accelerant elsewhere. The single sample of "accelerant" taken was a "light petroleum distillate," which covers "a category so broad that a host of entirely benign substances fit within it." In addition, it could be found in many items sold in the convenience store or generated by heat of the fire itself with other materials, such as carpet glue. While requesting a Daubert hearing may not have resulted in excluding evidence, "exclusion (or in the case of the dog, strict limitation) was more than a 'reasonable probability.' It was likely."

Capital Case*

It is not an understatement to say that Lynch, the dog handler, was permitted to testify to an almost mythical account of Billy's powers and her unique olfactory capabilities. He presented unsubstantiated claims about the dog's accuracy. He was allowed to go on at great length about his emotional relationship with the dog and his entirely subjective ability to interpret her face, what she thought, intended, and the "strength" of the alert she gave in this case. Finally, Lynch was permitted to testify that the dog did not alert to anything else on the premises, as if the dog had been allowed to range widely on the fire scene (she was not), and as if the dog's failure to alert had evidential value (it did not).

Even though "scientific literature cast doubt on the significance of the dog's failure to alert (false negatives) and even raised concerns about canine 'proficiency' testing," counsel did not challenge this evidence. "Billy, like the traditional Ouija board, was simply allowed to point to [the defendant] as an arsonist." Counsel also did not challenge the "cause-and-origin testimony," even though no photographs were taken, except in the area the government expert believed relevant, and the "building was razed to the ground" making further investigation impossible. While no prejudice was found with respect to the cause-and-origin testimony which simply purported to identify where the fire began, the canine evidence and the lab results were essential to prove that the fire was "an arson, not an accident. Without it, there is simply no crime."

Robinson v. United States*, 744 F. Supp. 2d 684 (E.D. Mich. 2010). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of ammunition case for failing to fulfill his promise to the jury in opening that the petitioner would testify and in failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. Contrary to counsel's alleged strategy and reasons, there was no evidence of unforeseeable events following the opening that would cause counsel to change his strategy mid-trial and decide against the petitioner testifying. The court did not find prejudice "without more" on this issue, but found cumulative prejudice. The state's case was based solely on police officer testimony. The petitioner had provided counsel with names and numbers for prospective defense witnesses. Counsel did not interview them, although one of them credibly corroborated the petitioner's version of events.

Usher v. Ercole*, 710 F. Supp. 2d 287 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in child sex abuse case for: (1) failing to consult a medical expert to rebut the state's expert witness; (2) introducing unredacted medical records that contained otherwise inadmissible evidence and bolstered the testimony and credibility of the alleged victim; and (3) elicited damaging "outcry" testimony from a prosecution witness opening the door for the state to elicit additional damaging testimony. The state's medical expert testified that the size of the hymenal opening and other findings during physical examination established that the alleged victim had been sexually abused. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to consult and present rebuttal expert evidence that there were deficiencies in this expert's methodology and opinions, including that a large hymenal opening is simply not evidence of abuse and is explicable by other factors. Counsel could not make a reasoned decision as to the best defense strategy due to "counsel's failure to educate himself about the implications and validity" of the conclusions of the state expert, which was the only direct evidence of abuse aside from the testimony of the alleged victim. Counsel's conduct in introducing the unredacted medical records was likewise deficient because the records reflect "a coherent and frankly harrowing narrative of chronic abuse, with a suggestion of continuing danger." There was no strategic reason for admitting these records, which were at odds with the defense assertion that there was no sexual abuse. Finally, counsel's conduct in eliciting the "outcry" evidence and opening the door to more was deficient, especially in light of the trial court's in limine ruling limiting "outcry" evidence to the four to six words uttered by the alleged victim in the initial outcry to her mother. Prejudice established in the failure to rebut the state's expert testimony given the "relatively weak" state's case. The only evidence was the alleged victim's testimony, the testimony of a witness about what the alleged victim told her, and the expert testimony, which could have been "undermined by contemporaneous medical literature and informed expert testimony." While the additional errors might not be sufficient on their own to establish prejudice, "together with counsel's failure to consult a medical expert" there was cumulative prejudice. The state court's determination to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Young v. Washington*, 747 F. Supp. 2d 1213 (W.D. Wash. 2010). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to subpoena the petitioner's son, who was the undisputed triggerman and a previously acquitted co-defendant. The son went to trial first on a first-degree murder charge with a predicate felony of robbery. He testified and admitted that he was the shooter but that it was "a drug deal gone bad." As the predicate of drugs would support only second-degree murder, which was not charged, he was acquitted. The state proceeded against petitioner on the second-degree charge. While counsel hoped to call the son to testify, he did not subpoena him and the son refused to voluntarily appear. The state court unreasonably applied Strickland by finding that this "single lapse" rather than a "pattern of incompetence" did not constitute ineffectiveness. "In effect, the court of appeals treated counsel's general professionalism as a defense against allegations of specific deficiency, finding that the 'entire record' showed him to be a competent attorney." Because the state court did not reach prejudice, de novo review applied. Prejudice found as the son would have appeared if he had been subpoenaed. He would have been "legally obligated to appear to testify, and could have been held in contempt had he failed to appear. This is substantially different from offering testimony voluntarily." Likewise, the state's assertion that he would have refused to testify due to concerns about perjury charges was "speculative and unpersuasive."

2009: Madrigal v. Yates, 662 F. Supp. 2d 1162 (C.D. Cal. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in attempted murder trial for a number of reasons. The shooting was related to retaliatory gang attacks and witnesses identified the defendant, who was married with three children, had been working steadily since 1994, had moved away from East L.A., and had only a misdemeanor prior conviction. No physical evidence linked the defendant to the crime. During counsel's opening statement, counsel told the jury that he would present an alibi defense and a third-party culpability defense and the defendant would testify. The defendant did not testify and the only alibi witness called could not absolutely verify that the defendant was at work at the time of the offenses. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present an audiotape of the co-defendant's conversation with his girlfriend that appear to establish the co-defendant's involvement in the crime but exculpate the defendant. The tape was provided in discovery, but counsel could not recall whether he ever listened to it. Prejudice established because with "conflicting eyewitness statements, the prosecution's case was far from compelling." In addition, the fact that the jury deliberated for four days after a three-day trial "underscores the weakness of the case against [the defendant]." The state court's decision to the contrary was objectively unreasonable. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to call the defendant to testify after promising to do so in opening statement. While counsel testified that the defendant refused to testify at the last minute because of threats from his co-defendant, the court found the defendant's testimony to be more credible than counsel's, as counsel was "hostile and uncooperative" during the evidentiary hearing and "suddenly had a clear recollection of this single event, when he could not recall anything else." There was no tactical reason for counsel's decision "to promise the jury that [the defendant] would testify and then renege on that promise." Prejudice established as the jury was deprived of the defendant's testimony describing the details of his alibi and the basis of his belief that another man was the actual shooter. In addition, even though the jury was instructed not to consider the defendant's failure to testify against him, "it is reasonable to conclude that the jury nevertheless did so here."

The jury could have surmised that the reason for [the defendant's] failure to testify, after his trial attorney promised he would, was that [counsel] had realized, at some point during trial, that [the defendant] was not a credible witness or, even worse, that he would commit perjury if allowed to take the stand.

The state court's decision was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to present alibi testimony from the defendant's work supervisor. The supervisor had given a notarized statement to prior counsel and in two interviews had "unequivocally" asserted that the defendant was at work a 50-minute drive away at the time of the crimes. Counsel had never interviewed him and did not subpoena him for trial, but informed the jury he would testify. Counsel did not call him, however, and offered no strategy reason. Prejudice established because the supervisor "was a disinterested third party and had no apparent motive to fabricate an alibi" and his testimony would have been "certain and unequivocal." In addition, "the jury was expecting to hear [him] testify." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to call the defendant's brother as an alibi witness. The brother car pooled with the defendant to work everyday and had been asked by counsel to testify. Counsel did not call him to testify, however, even though he was present in court. Counsel's alleged reasons for the failure were that the witness was related to the defendant, a gang member, and recently released on parole. "However, that a witness 'might not . . . make the best appearance' at trial is not a reasonable basis for failing to call a witness." Prejudice established because he strongly corroborated the alibi and would have clearly undermined the prosecution's "relatively weak case."

[N]ot only were the multiple deficiencies individually prejudicial, but they also were cumulatively prejudicial. [Counsel] did not just botch one witness or one argument or one issue—he repeatedly demonstrated the lack of diligence required for a vigorous defense.

United States v. Montgomery*, 676 F. Supp. 2d 1218 (D. Kan. 2009). Counsel ineffective in possession of 100 or more marijuana plants with intent to distribute case for failing to let the defendant testify and in failing to move to dismiss based on the government's destruction of evidence. The government searched the defendant's home and took photographs and videotape but it is impossible to determine the number of plants from the photos and video. Nonetheless, the government destroyed all the marijuana plants, except for ten samples, two days after the search. During trial, agents testified that they counted 101 plants with roots, stems, and leaves. The defendant told counsel that he wanted to testify. Counsel's conduct was deficient in this regard because he told the defendant he would withdraw from the case if he did, so the defendant dropped the subject. While counsel denied this, the court found the defendant's testimony credible as defense counsel had "a very long history of attorney discipline which involves complaints of improper withdrawal, communications terminating representation and truthfulness in communicating with others." The defendant would have testified that he routinely counted his plants and on the day of the search he had 91 plants and ten cuttings that did not have roots or growth at the time. While there was no prejudice during trial due to the defendant's failure to testify, there was prejudice when the failure to testify was considered in light of counsel's failure to move to suppress or move to dismiss based on the destruction of evidence. Counsel asserted that he did not file a motion to dismiss because he planned to argue that the government had failed to prove there were at least 100 plants. This explanation was "nonsensical" though because there was "no reason why he could not do both." Counsel also stated that he believed a motion to dismiss would be frivolous because he could not establish bad faith. "[H]is testimony and case file suggest that he did not know the legal standard for showing bad faith in the Tenth Circuit." In short, counsel "did not reasonably investigate the facts and law regarding the government's destruction of evidence." In analyzing the case law and factors to be considered, however, the court found evidence of bad faith, including the government's failure to even follow DEA policy for which the government could not offer an innocent explanation and instead attempted to argue that it had followed proper policy. Thus, the factors weighed in favor of dismissing the charge that the defendant possessed more than 100 plants.

Couch v. Booker*, 650 F. Supp. 2d 683 (E.D. Mich. 2009), aff'd, 632 F.3d 241 (6th Cir. 2011). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to investigate and rebut the medical examiner's conclusions that the victim died as a result of drowning in his own blood from the beating. The victim had consumed extremely large amounts of cocaine at a party gone awry. He was subsequently found sexually assaulting a woman and then beaten by the defendant and other men. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate, which would have revealed that the victim was still speaking and coherent when police and firefighters arrived. He was combative when emergency medical personnel tried to render care and had to be restrained by five people. He was subsequently intubated and there was not blood in the airway leading to his lungs. The death was caused by pulmonary edema, "which has been associated by researchers with fatal levels of cocaine, such as the amounts found by toxicologists in the decedent." In short, the death "fit the pattern of a typical, sudden cocaine death occurring during a struggle while the person is subjected to police restraint" and was "accidental." While counsel had retained a defense expert, counsel did not provide the expert with the reports of the first or second responders and never talked to the expert, leaving that to co-counsel. By failing to provide the expert with the information, "defense counsel precluded [the expert] from conducting a complete review of [the state pathologist's] findings as to the cause of death."

Capital Case*

Hicks v. Howton, 675 F. Supp. 2d 1050 (D. Ore. 2009). Under AEDPA, trial and appellate counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case. Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and to cross examine witnesses. The defendant had an IQ of 60 and was charged with touching his step-daughter “with his hand, over her pajamas.” The state offered a plea deal of 20-22 months, which was rejected. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. The court noted first that the defendant’s cognitive impairments raised serious questions about his ability to understand the severity of the charges, the risks inherent in going to trial, and the consequences of not accepting the plea offer. Nonetheless, trial counsel simply told the defendant “to ‘think about’ the plea offer, without further discussion or assistance.”

Advising a client to “think about” a plea presumes the client is able to assess the situation he is in, weigh the pros and cons of going to trial—whether it be a bench trial or a jury trial—and, in this case, take into consideration . . . sentencing and the possibility of consecutive terms of imprisonment. Asking a client to think about a plea is only reasonable advice when the client has the cognitive ability to do the necessary thinking, or is provided support.

Likewise, trial counsel failed to adequately investigate and present a defense. Trial counsel met with the defendant only briefly prior to trial and his “file contained no evidence witnesses were investigated or interviewed.” “A file devoid of notes pertaining to investigation in preparation for trial is clear evidence that no investigation occurred.” During trial, “counsel did not subject the State’s case to meaningful adversarial testing.” Counsel did not raise or challenge ambiguities and discrepancies in the witnesses’ accounts of the touching. Counsel’s failure could not be justified or explained because the defense theory was that the state could not prove its case and witness credibility was central to the state’s case. In addition, proof that the defendant’s acts were done for the “purpose of sexual arousal or gratification” was a required element of the offense but the state made no attempt to prove this. Nonetheless, counsel failed to seize on this opportunity and to offer the plausible explanation that the defendant did not have the required criminal intent. Instead, counsel “performed little cross-examination” and “did nothing to test the State’s case” or consider the motives of the defendant’s wife. Likewise, counsel waited until after conviction to “investigate his client’s cognitive impairments,” even though he had been receiving social security disability benefits for seven years by the time of trial. Counsel was also obviously aware of the impairments since he mentioned this in opening statements and sought to have the defendant’s mother testify about this. The state court’s finding that trial counsel was not ineffective was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Sturgeon v. Quarterman, 615 F. Supp. 2d 546 (S.D. Tex. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in aggravated robbery case for two reasons. The case involved the robbery at gunpoint of a victim, who required a Vietnamese interpreter during testimony, by two black men. The crime occurred at night and involved the victim being repeatedly struck in the face. The victim gave descriptions of the attackers shortly after the crimes. The description did not match the defendant. The same day, a police officer stopped a car driven by the defendant. There were three passengers in the car, including co-defendant #1, who was the brother of the owner of the car. Co-defendant #1 had the victim’s credit card, driver’s license, and other incriminating evidence in his possession.

Capital Case*

The registration for the victim's car was found in the trunk of the car the defendant was driving. The defendant, the co-defendant, and a witness were all arrested. The robbery victim subsequently identified the defendant as one of his attackers. During retrial (following an initial appellate reversal), defendant testified as a state's witness. He testified that Co-defendant #2 had removed all of the victim's items from the victim's car and given them to him. He could not say whether defendant was involved or not. Counsel attempted to present an expert on the questionable reliability of eyewitness identifications, but this evidence was excluded because the proffered expert was unfamiliar with the facts of the case and because the expert provided insufficient information about the scientific studies on which he purported to rely. Counsel also attempted to call Co-defendant #2 to testify. He had been initially indicted, but charges were dismissed shortly after defendant's first trial when he plead guilty to unrelated charges. Co-defendant #2 refused to testify following the prosecutor's assertion that the charges had been dismissed without prejudice to refile against Co-defendant #2 if he made any inculpatory remarks. Counsel was ineffective in failing to obtain co-defendant #2's testimony. First, counsel should have objected that the applicable five-year statute of limitations had run on the aggravated robbery charges and a witness may not invoke the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination once the statute of limitations for that offense has expired. Second, counsel should have objected that the charges were dismissed by the state "with prejudice" pursuant to a plea agreement, which could have been established by co-defendant #2's prior defense counsel. Prejudice established because co-defendant #2 would have testified that he was a participant in the robbery and that the defendant was not. The state's case was "not particularly strong" because it rested only on the victim's identification of him and his later arrest in the company of a man, who possessed the victim's property. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to adequately prepare and present the expert witness on the issue of eyewitness identification. Counsel should have prepared the expert for cross-examination about the studies he relied on by advising him "to come prepared with this information." Likewise, counsel should have prepared the expert for cross on the facts of this case "by providing him with materials pertinent to the case, such as the police reports and the transcript of [the] first trial, which information was readily available." Prejudice established because the expert's "credentials are extensive" and the "problems of cross-racial identification are well known." The expert "would have provided important support for [the] defense of mistaken identity." The state court's conclusions to the contrary were an "objectively unreasonable application of the Strickland standard." Reversal was also required on due process violations related to the state's misconduct in threatening the co-defendant with prosecution if he testified and related to the pretrial identification, which was suggestive.

2008: United States v. Thompson, 561 F. Supp. 2d 938 (N.D. Ill. 2008). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of gun case. The defendant was stopped for DUI and the gun was found on the floorboard behind or partially under the driver's seat. The defense theory was that the defendant had no knowledge of the gun. Defense counsel was ineffective for failing to interview the defendant's wife about her knowledge of the gun since she drove the vehicle on a daily basis. She would have testified that another man rode in the backseat shortly before the arrest and that she had personal knowledge that he had a gun similar in appearance to the one involved here. Counsel also objected and asked the court to advise her of her 5th Amendment rights when the prosecution asked if the gun was hers. Counsel had no strategy. "Counsel was doing anything but acting strategically; rather, he was quite plainly making it up as he went along." Even assuming this was strategy, it was not supported by adequate investigation because, if counsel had adequately investigated he would have known that she would deny the gun was hers rather than invoking her rights following the trial court's warnings. Prejudice found because this testimony, along with her testimony at trial that the gun could not have been placed where it was from the driver's seat because of the particulars of the vehicle, likely would have resulted in acquittal. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to impeach one of the police officers, who testified that the defendant had been given traffic citations that were later dismissed by state court prosecutors. If counsel had investigated, he could have presented affirmative evidence that the defendant had not been given any traffic citations. While the court did not find prejudice with respect to the trial, the court did find prejudice with respect to the motion to suppress the gun, which the court had denied under the inevitable discovery doctrine, but now finds was error. New trial granted and the motion to suppress hearing reopened.

Byrd v. Trombley*, 580 F. Supp. 2d 542 (E.D. Mich. 2008), aff'd, 352 Fed. Appx. 6 (6th Cir. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for several reasons. First, counsel failed to object to the introduction of Petitioner's ten-year-old forgery conviction and the prosecution's use of the conviction as "bad man" evidence. Second, counsel failed to investigate and present an expert witness to counter the prosecution's witnesses. The failure to obtain a defense expert was not excused by cross-examination of the state expert. "Thorough cross-examination . . . does not excuse the abject failure of counsel to procure or even consult with an expert." Prejudice established because "the case turned on the credibility of Petitioner, as weighed against the credibility of the victim."

Guilmette v. Howes*, 577 F. Supp. 2d 904 (E.D. Mich. 2008), aff'd on other grounds, 624 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2010). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in home invasion case. Trial counsel was ineffective for conceding the entry element of the crime and focusing only on a mistaken identity defense. The alleged victim testified that her door "came crashing open" and she ran. When she looked back, no one was there, but she looked out the window and saw a man running off her porch to a van. She identified petitioner in two photo arrays, but at a preliminary hearing she was unable to distinguish between him and his brother. At trial, she could say only that petitioner looked like the man at her home. The only other evidence was a photo of a footprint in the snow taken from her sidewalk by police. After police left, the alleged victim also took a photo of a footprint on the threshold of the front door to her home. At trial, the prosecutor relied solely on this photograph to establish that the suspect entered the home. Counsel's conduct was deficient in conceding entry without investigating as a footprint expert opined that the threshold footprint was significantly different from the footprint found outside that police believed belonged to the suspect. While counsel's decision to focus on mistaken identity was likely strategy, the strategy was deficient in light of the alleged victim's credibility problems. Indeed, counsel even cross-examined her about the questionable value of the threshold footprint photograph. Likewise, an argument that the prosecution failed to prove entry would not have been inconsistent with the alibi defense.

The most successful criminal attorneys are often those who can create a reasonable doubt in the jurors' minds by throwing up one or two or more plausible alternatives to the defendant's guilt. Individual jurors need not be persuaded by the same plausible alternative to guilt to vote an acquittal.

Id. at 916 (quoting Moore v. Johnson, 194 F.3d 586, 611 (5th Cir. 1999)). Prejudice found because evidence suggesting that the person who made the threshold footprint was someone other than the suspect could have convinced the jurors that the prosecutor did not prove the element of entry. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to challenge trial counsel's ineffectiveness. Prejudice established because the claim and a review of the photographs could have changed the result of the appeal.

Espinal v. Bennett*, 588 F. Supp. 2d 388 (E.D.N.Y. 2008), aff'd, 342 Fed. Appx. 711 (2nd Cir. Aug. 18, 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second degree murder case for a number of reasons. First, counsel failed to investigate and discover the witness whose interview was recounted in a police report with the witness' name redacted. Counsel's conduct was deficient because this witness corroborated the defendant's alibi, which counsel had investigated without success prior to receipt of this document. Counsel thus had already chosen not to present an alibi. "Nonetheless, an existing trial strategy, even if initially reasonable, cannot excuse counsel's failure to investigate new evidence that could potentially exonerate his client or create reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury." Prejudice established because counsel's deficient conduct "eliminat[ed] his best opportunity to cast significant doubt on the prosecution's case at trial."

Although petitioner's alibi was before the jury, through his videotaped testimony, it was entirely uncorroborated. It is reasonable to expect a jury to discount an uncorroborated and self-serving statement offered by a defendant, and to give greater weight to an alibi corroborated by a witness whose credibility is not initially suspect. Moreover, this corroborating evidence would not have been merely cumulative, . .

. because it would have significantly strengthened the alibi claims already before the jury through petitioner's videotaped statements.

The state court's holding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland and was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented. Second, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to introduce the victim's statement, given to police before he died, that identified someone other than the defendant as the shooter. This statement was admissible under New York's "constitutional" exception to the hearsay rule and could have been used to rebut the prosecution's argument that the defendant was a shooter. While the court did not find prejudice based solely on this issue, the court considered "the cumulative effect of counsel's errors at trial." Third, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to impeach a government witness with his prior inconsistent statements that did not mention that there were two shooters rather than one. Again, while not finding individual prejudice, the court held that "counsel's failure to investigate evidence that might have corroborated petitioner's alibi defense was error of constitutional importance."

McGahee v. United States, 570 F. Supp. 2d 723 (E.D. Pa. 2008), aff'd, 370 Fed.Appx. 274 (3rd Cir. 2010). Counsel in drug and robbery case ineffective for failing to investigate and present three potential alibi witnesses made known to counsel by the defendant. “If the attorney can easily investigate, his decision not to do so raises greater concerns than if undertaking an investigation would clearly require the assembly of great resources.” Counsel’s conduct was not excused by strategy. “When an attorney knows the details of what a certain witness will testify to, and then chooses not to interview that proposed witness, the decision is due greater deference than when the attorney knows nothing about the potential testimony.” Here, counsel “elected not to investigate the alibi even though he knew none of the details about the potential defense, and nothing suggested that his investigation ‘would be in vain.’” Likewise, counsel’s conduct was not excused due to insufficient contact information being provided to him. “To investigate means to seek out unknown facts. . . . [I]n this day and age, searching for a phone number is not difficult.” In addition, counsel was provided with the name of the employer for two of the witnesses. “Surely, it does not take a trained investigator to find the phone number for a business or a . . . deputy sheriff. If [counsel] had made even cursory attempts to contact these witnesses, to find their phone numbers, and failed, it would be another question. But in this case, no such effort was made.” Counsel also could not rely on the lack of funding for an investigator because “there is no evidence, . . . that he requested funds for an investigator to search for the alibi witnesses.”

A final factor, and perhaps the most important, is the nature and quality of the strategy employed at trial. For example, where the defense counsel’s strategy is to attack a weak prosecution case, and where the presentation of the uninvestigated evidence could distract from that strategy, the attorney’s decision not to investigate is owed deference. In contrast, where an attorney fails to investigate a lead that might provide help for the defense actually employed at trial, the decision deserves greater scrutiny.

Id. at ____ (citations omitted). Counsel here “sought to create reasonable doubt by attacking the prosecution’s witnesses and calling into question the work done by the investigating officers” and two of four counts were dismissed. Nonetheless, counsel’s “decision cannot be labeled a strategic choice between putting on an alibi defense, on one hand, versus merely seeking to create reasonable doubt, on the other” because counsel failed to investigate.

Even if a particular trial strategy may be strong, a lawyer should still investigate other leads, especially those that do not conflict with that strategy. Various defenses need not be mutually exclusive; to determine that one strategy might work is not to exclude all other options.

Prejudice established because the Government’s case at trial was not overwhelming and there were no eyewitnesses other than a witness attacked by defense counsel for delaying in coming forward with allegations against the defendant and receiving benefits in his own case for disclosing the defendant’s name. “[A]dditional evidence, even of relatively minor importance, would have been more likely to tip the balance in [the defendant’s] favor at trial than if the Government’s case had been more extensive.” Although the alibi witness’ had their own credibility issues and contradicted each other to some extent, “the testimony was basically consistent.” In order to convict, a jury would almost have to believe all three men, one of whom was a police officer, were lying. In addition, it would be their word against the impeached Government witness. “Judging credibility is the paradigmatic role of the jury.”

2007: Hays v. Farwell, 482 F. Supp. 2d 1180 (D. Nev. 2007). Under AEDPA review, trial/appellate counsel was ineffective for numerous reasons in case where the petitioner was convicted of four counts of sexual assault on a minor and four counts of lewdness with a minor for alleging sexually abusing his oldest daughter, who was then eight years old. While many of the petitioner’s claims had not been presented in state court and there was no showing of cause and prejudice, “the default was forgiven based on his preliminary evidence demonstrating to this court that he is actually innocent of the charges against him.” Most of the claims were reviewed de novo because they had not been raised in state court or had been procedurally barred in state court. The charges arose because the petitioner’s wife, who “was an abusive and neglectful mother” of their five children, “wanted desperately to be released from the responsibility of her five young children and from her marriage.” In order to achieve her goals, she “schooled and coached eight-year old Jennifer about adult sexual behavior and then threatened and coerced her into making accusations of sexual abuse against her father,” who was not himself abusive to the children but “was unable, or unwilling to stop his wife’s actions” in general. Before reaching the issues related to counsel, the court granted relief on the bases of: (1) insufficient evidence to support the convictions; (2) improper denial of a new trial when the daughter, who was no longer in her mother’s custody, immediately confessed after the trial that her testimony was false and had been coerced; (3) double jeopardy; and (4) prosecutorial misconduct. Counsel was also held to be ineffective during trial for: (1) failing to request an evidentiary hearing on the motion for new trial in order to present the daughter’s testimony concerning the recantation; (2) failing to seek an independent medical expert to challenge the testimony of the examining nurse, which would have resulted in testimony (supported even by the state’s expert in habeas) that the photographs taken of the girls genitalia revealed no evidence of abuse or anything abnormal; (3) conceding guilt in closing argument; (4) failing to challenge the veracity or expertise of the social worker and the examining nurse called as state’s witnesses and “merely enhancing the State’s evidence by reinforcement”; (5) failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper argument denigrating the presumption of innocence; and (6) failing to argue on the defendant’s behalf at sentencing.

Schulz v. Marshall*, 528 F. Supp. 2d 77 (E.D.N.Y. 2007), aff’d, 345 Fed. Appx. 627 (2nd Cir. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in robbery case for failing to interview and adequately examine the only witness to identify the defendant pre-trial and in failing to present alibi evidence. If the eyewitness had been interviewed, counsel would have learned that when the police showed the witness a photo array the day after the robbery, the owner of the restaurant robbed, who was serving as an interpreter, pointed to the defendant’s picture and told the witness that he was the person. He also told the witness that if she did not help put him in jail, he would be released and hurt her. The eyewitness also would have told counsel that the defendant was innocent and she was 90% certain of her identification of another man, who had some similar physical characteristics to the defendant and had been arrested for numerous robberies, including a robbery on the same night three hours earlier, at a location about 10-12 miles away. The defendant’s roommate also would have given alibi testimony. In failing to find ineffective assistance the state court unreasonably applied the Strickland standard. During trial, the eyewitness did not identify the defendant, but the restaurant owner did. Nonetheless, counsel did not present the alibi witness. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on valid strategy. "The fact that only one of the two eyewitnesses had identified petitioner at the trial and [counsel] viewed the prosecution case as weak does not justify the failure to call an alibi witness with no known credibility issues." Likewise, counsel's concern that the jury would wonder why the defendant did not also testify to the alibi was insufficient in light of counsel's other major failure in not interviewing the eyewitness prior to her testimony and to show her the picture of the man the defense asserted was the guilty party. While counsel stated that he wanted to interview the witness, he testified the prosecutor prohibited this. This testimony was contradicted by the prosecutor, though. Even if counsel's testimony was accurate, "the decision to abandon such an interview attempt certainly cannot be considered strategic." Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to pursue this because there was "nothing to lose" and "no 'downside' at all" in interviewing the witness. If counsel had conducted the interview, counsel could have introduced the evidence against the other man and impeached the restaurant owner who identified the defendant during trial. Prejudice established because "[t]his [was] a case of underwhelming evidence. . . . All of the evidence against [the defendant] was affected by his counsel's failures." Id. (quoting Lindstadt v. Keane, 239 F.3d 191, 205 (2nd Cir. 2001)).

2006: Showers v. Beard, 586 F.Supp.2d 310 (M.D. Pa. 2008), aff'd, 635 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2011).

Under AEDPA, trial counsel was ineffective in murder trial for failing to present rebuttal expert testimony and appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert this issue on direct appeal. Petitioner was charged with the murder of her husband, who died from ingestion of liquid morphine Roxanol. The defense asserted that his death was a suicide. The state presented an expert who testified: (1) the taste of Roxanol could be disguised in food or drink, and (2) there was no evidence of forced swallowing. While counsel attempted to refute this in cross and in closing argument, the only evidence the defense presented was a lay witness to testify that the taste of Roxanol could not be masked. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel had retained a forensic psychiatrist prior to trial to review the victim's state of mind. The psychiatrist interviewed pharmacists and nurses that administered the drug, along with the pharmacist that prescribed the medication used in this case, and learned that it is difficult to disguise the taste. He informed counsel that they needed to call an expert to testify about the drug, which he could not do because he was not a toxicologist, and gave the expert names of three possible experts. "[W]hile . . . this case does not involve the death penalty, the guidelines associated with defending a death penalty case are nevertheless instructive as to the role of defense counsel in preparing a defense in a criminal case potentially involving the use of a medical expert." Counsel failed to adequately investigate here. Id. (citing ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases (1989)). Counsel knew the administration of the Roxanol was a crucial issue, but did not present a rebuttal defense expert. The cross-examination and counsel's arguments "did nothing to negate" the state evidence because the jury was instructed that counsel's arguments do not constitute evidence. The state court finding to the contrary "cannot be reasonably justified under Strickland" and the factual determination that counsel adequately performed "is plainly controverted by the evidence." Prejudice found because counsel could have presented the testimony of a forensic pathologist to establish: (1) the taste of the Roxanol could be disguised only in a large amount of a sweet-tasting or bitter substance; (2) the autopsy report showed no evidence of any such diluting or masking substance; and (3) the autopsy report did not indicate forced swallowing. Thus, the pathologist concluded the Roxanol was swallowed voluntarily. This testimony “would have been more convincing than testimony from a close family friend” and would have made the “innocence claim . . . considerably more compelling than a simple denial of guilt.” The state court’s finding of no prejudice “cannot be reasonably justified under Strickland.” Appellate counsel’s decision to pursue only eight issues on appeal, excluding this issue, was deficient and prejudicial.

Garcia v. Portuondo*, 459 F. Supp. 2d 267 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second-degree murder case for failing to adequately investigate and present alibi evidence, including foreign public documents. The defendant consistently maintained his innocence and asserted that he was in jail in the Dominican Republic on the day of the murder, but the jury heard almost nothing of this alibi. Counsel gave notice of the alibi with supporting documents prior to trial, but realized admissibility might be an issue. The trial court expressed doubt as to admissibility but suggested that counsel brief the issue. Counsel failed to do so and never offered the documents into evidence. The state’s case consisted of a single eyewitness. This witness, who was on Valium at the time of the crime and Thorazine during trial, identified the defendant as one of three assailants in a lineup five months after the murder after initially identifying someone else in the same lineup. This witness had made a number of inconsistent statements. The defense presented the victim’s sister as its sole witness. She testified that the defendant and her brother were friends, she did not see the defendant getting into the car when she saw her brother on the ground, and that she had talked to the defendant on the phone shortly after the murder and he was in the Dominican Republic. The prosecution discredited this testimony because she had no personal knowledge of his whereabouts and had not dialed the phone. In habeas, the District Court denied the state’s “motion to dismiss the petition as untimely, finding that the statute of limitations was tolled because Garcia’s was one of the “exceedingly rare case[s] in which the petitioner makes out a credible claim of actual innocence.” Counsel’s performance was deficient because the defendant’s family had provided him with numerous official documents from the Dominican Republic to establish the defendant’s alibi, but he made no efforts to verify the authenticity of any of the documents in his possession and made no effort to obtain additional documentary evidence to support the alibi. Counsel was also aware of several alibi witnesses who were prepared to testify, but they were not called. While counsel believed that the witnesses were truthful, he did not interview them because they were relatives and friends of the defendant’s wife and counsel believed they would not likely be credited by the jury. If counsel had investigated, he could have found additional documentary and testimonial evidence to support the alibi and could have established the admissibility of the foreign documents.

[A] decision not to prepare an adequate defense because a defense lawyer thinks the prosecution’s case is weak is not “strategic.” It is motivated by the desire to avoid work, not to serve the best interests of the defendant. “No lawyer could make a ‘strategic’ decision not to interview witnesses thoroughly, because such preparation is necessary in order to know whether the testimony they could provide would help or hinder his client’s case, and thus is prerequisite to making any strategic decisions at all.” Thus, . . . “[t]here is no reasonable trial strategy that would have excluded at least conducting interviews of the alibi witnesses to determine whether they could provide exculpatory evidence.”

Id. at 287-88 (citations omitted). Likewise,

Deciding that investigation is costly is not, as Strickland requires, equivalent to a reasonable and informed decision that investigation is unnecessary. Indeed, as one court has held, “There are costs involved whenever defense counsel is obliged to undertake an investigation. These costs are often substantial.... [However, h]aving accepted the responsibility of representing a criminal defendant, counsel owes a duty to his client that will on occasion require him to make financial outlays that might be considered unfair for an ordinary businessman who, unlike a licensed attorney, has not voluntarily adopted an enhanced ethical obligation to society.”

Id. at 288 (quoting Thomas v. Kuhlman, 255 F. Supp. 2d 99, 111 (E.D.N.Y.2003)). If counsel believed his retainer was insufficient to make investigation “financially feasible, he could have petitioned the trial court for public assistance. And even if the court denied his request, [he] could have undertaken less costly investigative measures, such as interviewing the available witnesses and issuing subpoenas for locally available information.” In short, counsel “could not have made a strategic decision not to present the alibi because he did not then know the details of such a defense or how credible it would have been.” Prejudice found because “[t]here is . . . little doubt that the alibi evidence, had it been produced at trial, would have altered the landscape substantially. The decision of a jury that did not weigh this evidence is not reliable.” Under AEDPA, the state court’s decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law because the state court rejected the claim on the basis that the defendant had not established his alibi when he was required “only to show that trial counsel’s performance fell below professional standards of competence and that the outcome of the case probably would have been different but for this deficiency.”

2004: Mitchell v. Ayers, 309 F. Supp. 2d 1146 (N.D. Cal. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in burglary case for failing to interview and present testimony of witness that would have corroborated petitioner’s defense that he entered the home only to escape from people who were threatening his life. During the break in, the family members understood petitioner to say at times “don’t call the police” and “call the police.” Other than the window through which he entered, nothing in the home was disturbed. When petitioner was arrested he was clearly impaired by drugs. Petitioner testified that he entered the home because he was being chased by a man to whom he owed money because, rather than selling drugs for the man as he was supposed to, he would sometimes use the drugs because he was addicted to crack cocaine and used heroin. A witness was available to corroborate petitioner’s testimony that a man with a gun had confronted him outside the home after petitioner had been using crack, which made him “paranoid.” Counsel knew about the potential witness and could have easily located him because he was in confinement and, on the day of trial, was in the court holding area along with petitioner. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview the witness, because whether Petitioner was actually threatened or only perceived that he was threatened in a drug- induced paranoid reaction, the witness would have supported Petitioner's otherwise uncorroborated testimony and was, therefore, "critical." Prejudice found because "[t]his was a close case in which the jury deliberated for an entire day after receiving only one and half days of evidence" and the prosecution evidence of intent "was relatively slim." Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court held that, due to the significant potential impact of the witness' testimony, the State court's decision was an objectively unreasonable application of federal law as set forth in Strickland.

United States v. Ramsey*, 323 F. Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2004), appeal dismissed, 2004 WL 2958443 (D.C. Cir. Dec. 21, 2004). Counsel was ineffective in drug distribution case for a number of reasons, but primarily failing to move for mistrial after the court suppressed an inculpatory statement after it was already heard by the jury. Counsel failed to realize until he heard the testimony that the defendant was questioned after he invoked his rights. This error was considered in conjunction, inter alia, with counsel's ignorance of the law and failure to understand the implications of an entrapment defense with respect to allowing evidence of predisposition until advised of the implications by the court. This resulted in counsel abandoning the sole defense in the midst of trial without having the defendant testify. Counsel's conduct was deficient and the proffered strategy reasons for failing to seek a mistrial were "so nonsensical that the Court is left to conclude that [counsel] simply abandoned what he had decided at some point during the trial was an unwinnable case, and had been unwilling to invest the time and effort that would be required by a second trial." Prejudice found, regardless of the likely outcome of a new trial, because counsel's deficient conduct deprived the defendant of a mistrial and, thus, "the opportunity for a second trial he otherwise would have had, untainted by an opening statement to the jury of an entrapment defense he could not present." A mistrial would have afforded counsel an opportunity to advise the defendant "of the substantial advantages of . . . pleading guilty in view of the strength of the government's case" after counsel had heard all of the evidence and realized that an entrapment defense could not be mounted.

Tucker v. Renico*, 317 F. Supp. 2d 766 (E.D. Mich. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in criminal sexual conduct and breaking and entering case for failing to introduce evidence tending to prove that the defendant and the victim has a long-term, common-law, spousal relationship. The alleged victim downplayed her relationship with the defendant as only "spiritual," explained her two children by him as a result of prior sexual assaults, and denied that he lived with her. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court held that ineffective assistance of appellate counsel established "cause" for not asserting trial counsel's ineffectiveness on direct appeal. Appellate counsel asserted only that the evidence was insufficient to support the convictions. Trial counsel was ineffective because adequate investigation and presentation would have revealed that the defendant lived with the alleged victim up through the time of his arrest, that the alleged victim held herself out as the defendant's wife, and that the defendant had an on-going relationship with their children and the alleged victim's family. Prejudice was found because these facts tended to negate the non- consensual nature of their sexual relations.

Casey v. Frank*, 346 F. Supp. 2d 1000 (E.D. Wis. 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in sexual assault case for failing to obtain the case file from the defendant's previous attorney, which contained numerous witness statements undermining the credibility of the alleged victims and an alleged corroborating eyewitness. The defendant was initially charged in 1993 for sexually assaulting a girl in the neighborhood. He was represented by a public defender, who assigned an investigator to interview potential witnesses. The investigator took a number of statements that raised questions about the credibility of the alleged victim and the prosecutor ultimately dismissed the charge without prejudice. A year later, the defendant's step-daughter alleged that the defendant sexually assaulted her, but the prosecutor brought no charges. In 1997, the stepdaughter alleged that the defendant had assaulted her in 1992 and that she witnessed the defendant assaulting the neighbor girl in the same time period. The defendant was charged with both assaults and retained counsel. Counsel requested two specific documents from the defendant's prior counsel, but did not request the entire file, which contained numerous witness statements challenging the credibility of both alleged victims and an alleged corroborating eyewitness. He also failed to independently discover the witnesses that previously gave exculpatory statements. While the state court held that trial counsel requested the previous attorney's entire file, this finding was an unreasonable determination of the facts under the AEDPA because the evidence showed only that counsel asked for two specific documents. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed "to obtain predecessor counsel's investigative reports" or to otherwise adequately investigate. While the state court found that counsel's failure was excused because counsel did not know the additional documents existed, this finding was unpersuasive.

A failure to investigate is not excused because it is not known in advance what will be found. That is precisely the reason to investigate. A lawyer must request a file to discover what documents it contains.

Here, it was particularly important because prior counsel represented the defendant not long after the alleged incident when the "witnesses' memories would have been fresher." Although the state court did not specifically address the prejudice analysis under Strickland and it was "debatable whether AEDPA applies to the court's determination on this point," id., the court applied the AEDPA standard. The state court's determination was unreasonable because the court "turned a blind eye to the potential impact of the witnesses who gave statements" to prior counsel. Indeed, the state court failed even to mention most of the statements, much less analyze their potential significance. The critical issue in the case was credibility, and a number of the statements severely undercut the credibility of the state's principal witnesses.

Moreover, many of the statements would have been admissible and none were cumulative. Thus, there was "more than a negligible chance that the statements counsel failed to obtain would have affected the outcome of the trial." Id.

3. Military Cases

United States v. Garcia, 59 M.J. 447 (C.A.A.F. 2004). Counsel ineffective in robbery, conspiracy, and stolen property case for two reasons. First, civilian defense counsel waived the Article 32 pretrial investigation without the accused's knowledge. This was deficient because waiver of this hearing must be personal to the accused. It was prejudicial because this hearing serves as a discovery proceeding for the accused and "stands as a bulwark against baseless charges." Here, if the accused had seen the potential strength of the government's case, he might have sought a plea agreement limiting his sentence. Second, military counsel (who tried the case alone) was ineffective for failing to adequately advise the accused of his options mid-trial when the strength of the government's case was clear and the accused first confessed his full involvement in the crimes to counsel. Without explaining the options to the accused, such as exploring the possibility of a plea agreement or changing the plea to guilty, counsel advised the accused to testify admitting his full involvement in the crimes. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. Much of what counsel elicited bolstered the government's case and opened the door to cross eliciting aggravating and damaging details not previously established by the government. Counsel also did not elicit any expressions of remorse or contrition so the testimony "had no mitigating impact." Counsel's argument in sentencing also highlighted the accused's culpability and including a statement that the accused was only "three-and-a-half pounds of trigger pull away from" murder. Under the circumstances, there was no discernable trial strategy for counsel's actions. "The extreme harshness of the sentence returned by the members is strong evidence" of prejudice. The government requested a sentence of a $23,000 fine and 86 years, but the penal returned a sentence including a $60,000 fine and 125 years of confinement.

Capital Case*

4. State Cases

2024: Roberto A. v. Commissioner of Corrections, 325 A.3d 1192 (Conn. App.), petition for certification denied, 327 A.3d 384 (Conn. 2024). Affirming the grant of habeas relief in sexual assault of a child case where trial counsel failed to investigate adequately and to call a noncumulative and credible alibi witness. The victim, a relative of some sort to petitioner, could not state the precise date the alleged assault occurred but the safest bet from her testimony was sometime in May 2019. The defense called petitioner's daughter as a witness. She resided in Georgia and testified that petitioner was living with her, her husband (G), and her children at the relevant time. According to her, her father never borrowed one of the family cars for an overnight trip in May of 2019. During cross-examination, however, she conceded it was possible that her father had been gone overnight to visit relatives in that time period. Her purported bias in favor of her father was hammered home during the prosecutor's closing argument. Petitioner had been employed in Georgia in May 2019 and his employer was also called by the defense. The employer, however, could not account for petitioner's whereabouts on a significant number of days in May. In his state habeas petition, petitioner alleged that trial counsel should have called his son-in-law, G, as an alibi witness. G testified at the habeas proceeding: (1) in 2009, he was a staff sergeant with the military and was stationed in Georgia where he lived in a house with his wife, their children and petitioner; (2) although he worked long days, he saw the petitioner every day because the petitioner "was a very active part of the household"; (3) he did not recall petitioner leaving the Georgia home overnight during the spring and summer of 2009, that petitioner did not borrow the family's car for an entire twenty-four hour period during that time frame, and that it was "[i]mpossible" for the petitioner to have traveled to Connecticut during that time without his knowing it. Trial counsel could not recall who G was at the time of the habeas hearing or the specifics of his strategy in presenting the alibi defense. The lower court found that trial counsel failed to contact G. This failure to investigate and secure G as a witness constituted deficient performance. Respondent's contention that trial counsel's omission was defensible because G was subject to impeachment for similar reasons as petitioner's daughter was unpersuasive. The lower court conceded that G was not entirely disinterested, but observed that G and petitioner's daughter were either in the process of divorcing or were divorced at the time of trial, that G was not close with petitioner, and, additionally, that G was a member of the military, lacked any criminal history, and lacked any acts of untruthfulness. The finding that G was a credible witness was not subject to second guessing by the appellate court and supported the conclusion that trial counsel performed deficiently. Regarding prejudice, the prosecution's case was not particularly strong in light of the absence of any DNA evidence or corroborating eyewitness testimony implicating petitioner. The weakness of the state's case was further illustrated by the fact that the jury deliberated for four days, requested a playback of the testimony of the alleged victim and her father, both of whom were prosecution witnesses, and sent a note stating, "[w]e are stuck," and asking for advice. The testimony by G was not cumulative in that it could have filled the holes in the other alibi witnesses' testimony.

Commonwealth v. Alceus*, 315 A.3d 853 (Pa. Super. 2024). Petitioner, who was convicted of crimes stemming from an alleged assault on his estranged wife and two of her young children, was deprived of effective assistance by counsel's failure to investigate and present character witnesses in support of petitioner's claim that his wife was lying about the incident. This was a classic "he said/she said" case, with only two direct witnesses providing conflicting accounts of what occurred—petitioner and his estranged wife. Thus, character witnesses could potentially have created a reasonable doubt. Yet trial counsel, by his own admission, never discussed character evidence with petitioner or investigated the availability of any such witnesses. Counsel explained that he did not want to risk taking away the jury's focus on video evidence of an interview with one of the minor children who was present the night of the incident and who did not make any disclosures about the alleged violence. But because trial counsel's strategy was showing that the estranged wife was a liar, character witnesses would have bolstered the defense theory. Counsel's failure to investigate or discuss character witnesses with petitioner "demonstrates that he failed to recognize the crucial role character evidence would have played in support of his overall trial strategy." Notably, trial counsel recognized that petitioner's prior convictions for theft and driving under the influence would not have been admissible as bad character evidence to contradict testimony that petitioner had a reputation for peacefulness. The record did not support the lower court's conclusion that trial counsel had a reasonable strategic basis for forgoing an investigation into potential character witnesses. As for prejudice, the lower court found that the character witnesses were not credible. But the lower court's explanation for that finding referred to only one of the witnesses and misconstrued his testimony. The other character witness did not testify in person. Instead, his testimony about petitioner's positive reputation was admitted by stipulation of the parties. Thus, there was no credibility finding about him. In finding no prejudice, the lower court also cited the Commonwealth's evidence at trial. But some of the evidence the court cited in its opinion was not presented at trial. Further, the lower court's reliance on evidence of the physical injuries sustained by the estranged wife and the children "ignore[d] the longstanding and well-settled precedent that character evidence is substantive evidence that, in and of itself, is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to a defendant's guilt." Petitioner did not contest that the injuries occurred. Rather, he asserted that he did not inflict them. Evidence of petitioner's reputation for peacefulness would have bolstered his defense and was wholly consistent with trial counsel's strategy to show the estranged wife was lying. Prejudice was established.

Johnson v. State*, 381 So.3d 1279 (Fla. Ct. App. 2024). In case involving a charge of lewd or lascivious molestation on a person older than 12 but less than 16, the cumulative effect of trial counsel's deficiencies undermined confidence in the jury's guilty verdict. Counsel's deficiencies were: (1) undermining the defense by presenting inconsistent testimony; (2) opening the door to testimony that petitioner exercised his right to remain silent when confronted by police; (3) failing to object to inadmissible child hearsay statements; (4) failing to seek appropriate redaction of the victim's child protection team interview; and (5) eliciting testimony about collateral, uncharged crimes.

Floyd v. State*, 898 S.E.2d 431 (Ga. 2024). In felony-murder case where murder conviction was predicated on petitioner's possession of a firearm by a felon, trial counsel was ineffective in his handling of the interplay between self-defense and felonious firearm possession. At trial, petitioner contended that he acted in self-defense, and he was acquitted of malice murder, felony-murder predicated on attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault, and two counts of aggravated assault. Although petitioner had not been indicted for felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, on the first day of the trial the State requested that the jury be charged on that theory as a lesser-included offense of malice murder, and the trial court so instructed the jury. Petitioner's sole defense was that he was acting in self-defense when he shot the victim. Trial counsel did not request a jury instruction under the statute that provided that self-defense was an absolute defense to various statutes criminalizing the carrying and possession of firearms, including the one prohibiting the possession of firearms by a convicted felon. (At petitioner's motion for new trial hearing, trial counsel conceded that he was unfamiliar with that statute at the time of trial.) Instead, during closing arguments, trial counsel told the jury that petitioner was guilty of felon-in-possession and that self-defense did not apply to the felon-in-possession count. Trial counsel failed to explain that, under the law, petitioner was justified in possessing the gun at the time he shot the victim if petitioner was acting in self-defense. Instead, trial counsel argued that self-defense applied to felony-murder if predicated on the attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault charges. At the start of its second full day of deliberations, the jury sent the court two questions. The first was: "Can [Appellant], as a convicted fellow [sic] with a weapon, be justified to use a weapon (gun) to defend himself if he fears for his life?" After conferring with counsel, the trial court responded on the jury note: "Yes if he reasonably fears for his life." The second question was:

- In the eyes of Georgia law what has precedence [sic]:
- self defense (at all costs)
- fellow [sic] in possession of a weapon defending himself

The trial court wrote in answer to that question, "That is an issue for you to decide." Trial counsel did not object to that response, telling the trial court it was "correct." The note with the responses

was provided to the jury, which returned with its verdicts later that afternoon. Deficient performance is shown by trial counsel's ignorance of the law which led to his failure to request a charge on the relevant statute, his failure to argue that self-defense applied to felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, and his agreement with the trial court's response to the jury's second question. "[N]o reasonable attorney would have agreed with the trial court's response to the jury's second question, which at best was a non-answer, and at worst, authorized the jury to convict on felony murder based on felon-in-possession even if it believed [petitioner's] claim of self-defense." Prejudice is established on the record of this case. Although the jury had been instructed that "[t]he fact that a person's conduct is justified is a defense to prosecution for any crime based on that conduct," the jury's confusion was evident by its question of whether petitioner, as a convicted felon, could be justified to use a gun in self-defense. Petitioner met his burden of showing that but for the cumulative effect of counsel's deficiencies, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different.

Gillespie v. State*, 244 N.E.3d 423 (Ind. Ct. App. 2024). In case involving, inter alia, convictions for drug dealing and possession that were based primarily on evidence seized from the home of a woman petitioner was romantically involved with (Cornwell), trial counsel was ineffective: (1) in failing to object to hearsay testimony by a police officer that petitioner stayed at the home sometimes, which undercut the defense theory that petitioner was merely present at the time of the search and had no actual or constructive possession of the seized contraband; (2) in allowing the officer during re-cross examination to repeat statements from three unnamed people about petitioner's involvement in dealing drugs at Cornwell's house, explain why these unnamed people were reliable, and to express his confidence that both Cornwell and petitioner were methamphetamine dealers; and (3) for failing to object to the trial court's cursory accomplice liability instruction and tender a more complete instruction.. The post-conviction petition challenging trial counsel's performance was adjudicated by the trial court. In such situations, "a post-conviction court's findings and judgment are entitled to greater than usual deference . . ." In this case, however, the post-conviction court adopted the State's proposed order verbatim, a practice that while not prohibited is also not encouraged. Thus, on appellate review, the normal clearly erroneous standard of review applied to the post-conviction court's findings and its findings did not warrant greater deference. In finding no deficient performance in the failure to object to admission of statements by Cornwell to the officer, the state post-conviction court observed that the statements were arguably not hearsay. But the lower court's analysis was legally flawed and there is a reasonable probability that a hearsay objection would have been sustained by the trial court. The failure to make a proper objection, which trial counsel conceded was not strategic, fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Regarding the statements by the unnamed informants and the officer's expression of his personal views about whether Cornwell and petitioner were drug dealers, the post-conviction court acknowledged that trial counsel's lack of control of the officer's testimony was arguably prejudicial to petitioner. The post-conviction court nevertheless credited trial counsel's effectiveness, noting that counsel established through the officer that Cornwell was the "main dealer" rather than petitioner, and that counsel elicited testimony that the officer had never personally witnessed any drug transactions involving either Cornwell or petitioner. The appellate counsel disagreed with this assessment.

Capital Case*

Counsel's questions on re-cross and his failure to interject and move to strike [the officer's] answers when they veered into inadmissible territory led to the jury hearing hearsay statements from three unnamed people directly implicating [petitioner] in dealing methamphetamine, testimony vouching for the credibility of those people, and opinion testimony about [petitioner's] guilt from a police officer. [¶] If Counsel had moved to strike and admonish the jury to disregard [the officer's] testimony, the trial court should have done so. Failure to prevent admission of inadmissible, prejudicial evidence demonstrates deficient performance.

As to the accomplice instruction, the trial court provided the jury with the statutory definition of accomplice liability. The instruction did not contain the additional language from Indiana's pattern instruction that clarified that "mere presence at the scene of the crime, or mere acquiescence in the commission of the crime, is insufficient to convict for aiding, inducing, or causing the crime charged." Despite the fact that the defense was that petitioner was simply present at Cornwell's home when the police discovered the contraband, trial counsel did not request that the pattern instruction be given in this case. Case law supported petitioner's argument that had the instruction been requested, it should have been given. Counsel's failure to object to the trial court's instruction and tender an alternate one constituted deficient performance. Considered cumulatively, counsel's deficiencies were prejudicial. "Hearsay evidence was the only evidence presented at trial showing [petitioner] was more than a visitor at Cornwell's house. The State relied on this evidence in its closing argument to the jury. Failing to object to this evidence allowed it to be used to establish [petitioner's] interest in the house and involvement in activities there." Without the hearsay evidence, the trial evidence was not overwhelming. All that connected petitioner to Cornwell's home was that his truck was parked there and he answered the door when police knocked. And while items linked to petitioner were found in Cornwell's truck, none of his personal items were found in the house. The prejudice from the inadmissible statements was compounded by the trial court's cursory accomplice liability instruction, which failed to focus on petitioner's knowledge and conduct. "Viewing the evidence without the inadmissible statements and with a full accomplice liability instruction, there is a reasonable probability the result of [petitioner's] trial would have been different."

McConnell v. State*, 688 S.W.3d 666 (Mo. App. 2024). Trial counsel were ineffective in failing to adequately investigate the charges against petitioner – three counts of statutory sodomy from incidents when the alleged victim ("Victim") was under the age of 17, and one count of rape occurring after Victim's seventeenth birthday. At trial, Victim claimed the statutory sodomy crimes occurred on separate Wednesday evenings at petitioner's home after petitioner's wife ("Wife") drove herself to church. In the post-conviction proceedings, the church attendance records of Wife were presented. They showed that she was absent from church on the Wednesday evenings at issue. Wife's medical records were also introduced, demonstrating her inability to drive at that time. Trial Counsel 1 admitted to discussing Wife's medical problems with petitioner numerous times, yet Trial Counsel 1 did not seek Wife's medical records. Trial Counsel 2 was aware that Wife could not drive while her leg was in a splint and that she was not going to church after she broke her leg, but did not attempt to secure either the medical records or church attendance records. Given what trial counsel knew, the failure to investigate the church and medical records was unreasonable. The investigation was additionally unreasonable in light of counsels' ignorance about their own case. They attempted to defend their omission on the ground that not all alleged incidents occurred at petitioner's home and some were in the home but not necessarily when Wife was away. This defense was not supported by Victim's trial testimony. And any argument that counsel made a strategic decision not to rely on the records failed given that an adequate investigation had not preceded any such tactical decision. As to prejudice for the statutory sodomy charges, "both sets of records would have made it more likely that the fact-finder would have determined the incidents of sexual abuse did not occur until after Victim's 17th birthday." This was true even assuming sufficient evidence for conviction remained from Victim's equivocal testimony that incidents could have occurred on days other than Wednesday. Although it is "only in rare cases" that an error warrants post-conviction relief even though it may not rise to the level of outcome-determinative prejudice, this case represents one of those rare cases. Additionally, there was a reasonable probability that petitioner could have been acquitted of the rape count but for trial counsels' deficient performance. Conviction on that count was dependent on a credibility finding that the first time petitioner had sexual intercourse with Victim, it was not consensual. (According to Victim, the subsequent encounters she testified to were consensual.) Had Victim's testimony about the statutory sodomy counts been contradicted by Wife's medical and church attendance records, "trial counsels' attacks on Victim's poor reputation in the community for truth telling could have convinced the trial court to disbelieve the rest of Victim's testimony."

State v. Gourdin, 549 P.3d 685 (Utah App. 2024), petition for cert. granted, 564 P.3d 958 (Utah 2025). In burglary-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request the files, notes and data underlying the State's witnesses' DNA reports and in failing to consult with an expert concerning this material. The DNA test results from the State witnesses did not implicate appellant. Rather, they either excluded him or were inconclusive. The State nevertheless presented DNA testimony at trial. In addition to suggesting that appellant deliberately removed his DNA through application of cleaning products found at the crime scene, the prosecution also argued that an inconclusive finding regarding DNA was not the same as an exclusion. A cigarette butt found in the victim's back yard had not been properly tested for a match against appellant's DNA as a result of an oversight. The State used other evidence in an effort to tie the butt to appellant. Post-trial, it was discovered that materials from the DNA analysis indicated that appellant was in fact excludable as a source for the DNA found on the cigarette butt. One of appellant's allegations of deficient performance in the handling of the DNA evidence concerned trial counsel's failure to obtain and present expert testimony concerning probabilistic genotype testing. This allegation was rejected both because such testing was not readily available at the time of trial and because appellant had given counsel reason to believe that additional DNA testing could unearth results unfavorable to appellant. Counsel nevertheless was found to have performed deficiently in failing to request the files, notes, and data underlying the State's witnesses' DNA reports.

It is one thing to decide not to generate additional evidence that the State does not already have, especially where counsel is concerned that the additional evidence might be unfavorable. But it is another thing to decline to take steps to adequately understand the evidence that is already in the State's possession and about which the State's witnesses are scheduled to testify. Trial Counsel's decision not to request the relevant files—and their follow-on decision not to enlist the assistance of an expert to help them understand the contents of those files—left Trial Counsel in a position where they did not fully understand key portions of the State's evidence.

Trial counsel's defense that they expected the State to provide them with any exculpatory information was unconvincing. Although it "is certainly a correct statement of the law that the State has an obligation to turn over to the defense any exculpatory evidence," this "reality does not absolve defense attorneys of their general investigatory obligation to ask the State to turn over the evidence it intends to present in support of its case." On the record of this case, there "was simply no other way for Trial Counsel to have fully understood the contents of the State's evidence against [appellant]" without the DNA files. Importantly, the DNA evidence the State intended to present was, in large part, inconclusive.

Where the critical DNA evidence in the case is in significant part "inconclusive"—as opposed to entirely exculpatory—and where the State intends to try to use that "inconclusive" evidence in its favor, it becomes important for the defense to seek disclosure of the underlying DNA files, which may contain further detail as to the reasons for the inconclusive nature of the evidence.

And had counsel obtained the files, counsel would have discovered the need for an expert to interpret them. Notably, ABA Guidelines expressly recognize that expert assistance is frequently necessary when defense counsel is faced with DNA evidence. Trial counsel was deficient in not requesting the files and, thereafter, obtaining expert assistance. The failure to do so was prejudicial. Although the significance of the cigarette butt was uncertain pretrial, it became a major focus of the State at trial.

[T]he State brought up cigarettes generally or the cigarette butt specifically with twelve different witnesses, and the cigarette butt was discussed on over ninety-five different pages of the trial transcript. The State emphasized the cigarette-butt evidence during its closing argument, noting that the DNA evidence on that score was "inconclusive" but nevertheless arguing that other evidence in the case "suggest[ed] that" the cigarette butt was [appellant's]. The State's arguments on this point were remarkably specific.

When the State emphasizes evidence to this extent in closing argument, that is a very good clue that the evidence mattered.

The State's emphasis on the cigarette butt appeared not to have gone unnoticed by the jury: "Of the twenty-five questions the jury asked during the trial, seven were about cigarettes." The questions "are also an indication that the cigarette-butt DNA evidence was an important part of the trial." And contrary to the assertions of the State, the other evidence against appellant was not overwhelming.

State v. Jeremias, 547 P.3d 672 (Table), 2024 WL 1874920 (Nev. April 26, 2024) (unpublished). In double-murder/robbery case, affirming grant of relief to petitioner Ralph Jeremias on claim of ineffective assistance in failing to further investigate witness Carrillo who could have testified that key prosecution witness Zapata told Carrillo that petitioner had not shot the victims and that Zapata had lied to police in order to obtain leniency. At trial, Zapata testified that he had traveled with petitioner to the victims' apartment, remained outside the apartment when petitioner entered, heard gunshots, saw petitioner quickly leave the apartment, and heard petitioner admit to shooting the victims. Several years before the trial, trial counsel received a letter from Carrillo with exculpatory information. Carrillo's attorney, however, refused to grant trial counsel permission to speak with Carrillo in order for trial counsel to authenticate the letter or secure Carrillo's testimony. Trial counsel failed to pursue other avenues for obtaining Carrillo's testimony, such as: (1) attempting to speak with Carrillo without permission from Carrillo's counsel, which was permissible under RPC 4.2 given that the subject of the conversation had nothing to do with Carrillo's case; (2) seeking a court order to authorize communication with Carrillo; or (3) monitoring Carrillo's prosecution and speaking with him at its conclusion, which was several months before petitioner's trial. "[S]ubstantial evidence supports the district court's conclusion that trial counsel's failure to pursue any of these investigative avenues was objectively unreasonable." Prejudice is also established. Contrary to the State's assertion, evidence against petitioner was not "overwhelming." First, although petitioner was seen near the victims' apartment roughly 1-2 hours before the shooting, neither petitioner nor his vehicle were identified leaving the scene after the shots were fired. Second, no physical or forensic evidence placed petitioner in the victims' apartment at the time of the shooting. Third, petitioner's use and possession of the victims' credit cards the evening of the murders was consistent with petitioner's testimony that he happened upon the murder scene after the fact and opportunistically took property. The only witness who testified that petitioner was in the apartment at the time of the shooting and later admitted to the shooting was Zapata, who testified as part of a plea agreement and whose vehicle was identified leaving the scene of the shooting. The record supported the district court's conclusion that there was a reasonable probability of a different outcome at trial if counsel had impugned Zapata's testimony. As to whether Carrillo would have been a credible witness, the State had consented to a limited evidentiary hearing solely on the issue of counsel's deficient performance. The State contested petitioner's efforts to produce Carrillo and conceded that Carrillo was credible for purposes of the hearing. "The State cannot now assert Carrillo was not credible when the State did not object to, and indeed assented to, the district court's decision to forgo Carrillo's testimony."

Schocker v. Fluke*, 13 N.W.3d 477 (S.D. 2024). Affirming grant of habeas relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to investigate and present an eyewitness to the charged offense of aggravated assault on a law enforcement officer. Petitioner, his mother, and two men, were involved in a hunting violation by the shooting of a deer that was not on the property of petitioner's mother, for which she had a landowner tag. A Game, Fish and Parks conservation officer investigating the case informed petitioner's mother that he was confiscating the deer, along with the tag that had been placed on it. Petitioner was verbally combative with the officer during the encounter and was observed by the officer approaching with a hunting knife as the officer was dragging the deer toward his vehicle. Petitioner dropped the knife after a warning from the officer. A video recording from the officer's body camera was played at trial. The sole witness for the defense was petitioner's mother who testified that she had instructed her son to cut her tag off of the deer. Defense counsel never spoke with either of the two men who were also witnesses to the alleged offense. In the habeas proceeding, he defended this omission by asserting that the body camera footage had captured everything and established the insufficiency of the evidence to support the assault charge. "Although the entire incident was recorded, it was unreasonable for [trial counsel] to forgo interviewing the few witnesses present at the scene based solely on his assumption that additional interviews with the witnesses would produce nothing beyond what was in the video." Notably, the body camera did not pick up discussions that could have been beneficial to the defense. In the habeas hearing, one of the two men that had been present with petitioner and his mother during the encounter, Hopkins, testified that prior to petitioner picking up the knife, petitioner stated that he was going to cut the tag off. In Hopkins's opinion, that was what petitioner's intent was. The deficient failure to interview and present testimony from Hopkins was prejudicial. To establish attempted aggravated assault, the State needed to prove that petitioner intentionally performed a physical act to put the officer in fear of imminent serious bodily harm. Hopkins's testimony was relevant to the jury's determination as to whether the acts performed by petitioner were sufficient to put a reasonable officer in fear of imminent serious bodily harm. And Hopkins's testimony was not cumulative to that of petitioner's mother.

[Petitioner's mother] testified that she may have told [petitioner] to cut the tag off the deer, but she was unaware of any action [petitioner] took in response. Hopkins's testimony went much further as it would have provided the jury with the only evidence of [petitioner's] stated intention when he picked up the knife. Moreover, Hopkins would likely be viewed by a jury as a more objective witness than [petitioner's] mother.

There is a reasonable probability that, but for trial counsel's deficient performance, the result of the proceeding would have been different.

2023: Beckett v. State, 675 S.W.3d 533 (Mo. App. 2023). In murder case where petitioner claimed that he shot the victim, his wife, accidentally, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and call at trial a firearms expert witness to support petitioner's defense. The victim was shot twice. At trial, the medical examiner testified that he determined the manner of death was homicide because the multiple shots were inconsistent with his experience with accidental shootings. A firearms forensic expert called by the prosecution opined, based on her testing, that the gun at issue would not fire accidentally. In the post-conviction hearing, petitioner presented testimony from a firearms expert who reviewed the relevant evidence and concluded that petitioner's account was plausible and that the shooting could have been unintentional. The expert explained in detail why he disagreed with certain findings by the prosecution's firearms expert and further testified that the published literature regarding unintentional discharges establishes that unintentional discharges can involve more than one shot. Because the strategy chosen by trial counsel was to argue the shooting was unintentional, "it was unreasonable to not investigate a firearms expert to verify the plausibility of [petitioner's] account of the events of that evening." Trial counsel did engage in some preliminary research and spoke with a gunsmith at a local gun shop but counsel did not seek out an expert with the qualifications of the post-conviction expert. At the post-conviction hearing, counsel conceded that he had no excuse for not doing so. Given that counsel was aware of the evidence the prosecution intended to present on the firearm issue, “[t]rial counsel’s failure to investigate the plausibility of [petitioner’s] account and the strength of [the prosecution firearms expert’s] and the medical examiner’s testimony was unreasonable and constitutionally deficient.” Petitioner met his burden of establishing that an appropriate expert “existed at the time of trial, that they could have been located through reasonable investigation, and the testimony would have benefitted the defense.” Notably, trial counsel testified to his belief that had he requested funds for the expert, the funding would have been provided by the public defender’s office. Petitioner also met his burden of establishing prejudice. The State’s theory as to petitioner’s mental state--that he “knowingly caus[ed] the death of another person after deliberation upon the matter”--could have been undermined through expert witness testimony regarding unintentional shootings and the plausibility of petitioner’s account of how the shooting occurred.

Langlinais v. State*, 2023 WL 5286991 (Tenn. Crim. App. Aug. 17, 2023) (unpublished). Trial counsel performed deficiently in defending petitioner against charges related to sexual offenses against a child and the cumulative impact of the deficiencies established prejudice. Trial counsel’s failure to object to the prosecutor’s improper comments during voir dire misled the jury into believing that rape of a child was a strict liability offense, which it is not. This deficiency was not corrected by trial counsel in voir dire, opening statement, or closing argument. The deficiency was compounded when trial counsel failed to correct an investigator’s mischaracterization of the victim’s testimony that petitioner, not the victim, placed petitioner’s penis in her mouth, and trial counsel failed to request any curative measures from the trial court. “The deficiency was further compounded when trial counsel failed to explain to the jury in his closing argument the elements of the offense, failed to provide the jury with the testimony as stated by the victim that she placed her mouth over [petitioner’s] penis, and failed to guide the jury on [petitioner’s] testimony as to his lack of intent.” Given the unique facts of this case, issues collectively establish the requisite prejudice.

People v. Alvarenga*, 218 A.D.3d 485 (N.Y. Supreme Ct. App. Div. 2023). In murder case, the cumulative effect of trial counsel’s errors deprived defendant of the effective assistance of counsel. There was no physical or eyewitness evidence connecting the defendant to the shooting of the victim. The primary evidence against defendant came from one of his roommates/co-gang member, Brenda. Brenda testified that prior to the killing, roommate/gang member Roberto had been in communication with another gang member over the telephone. Roberto told Brenda “to get ready,” after which she, Roberto, and defendant left their residence in a vehicle. During the trip, defendant used a slang phrase suggesting that he was going to kill someone. Defendant was armed at the time. After they arrived at their destination, defendant exited the car and returned “six [or] seven minutes” later stating, among other things, that “he didn’t know if he had hit him.” According to Brenda, defendant made additional admissions to her about the killing later that day. During her direct examination, the prosecutor asked Brenda if she knew whether Roberto had pleaded guilty “for his role in this incident.” Without objection from defense counsel, Brenda confirmed that he had. The prosecutor followed up by asking Brenda if Roberto had entered into a cooperation agreement, which she confirmed, and the written agreement was admitted into evidence, again without objection. Roberto was not called by the prosecution as a witness. No case was presented by the defense after the prosecution rested and defense counsel did not request an accomplice instruction regarding Brenda. Defense counsel was first found to have been deficient in failing to object to evidence pertaining to the guilty plea of Roberto, including the introduction into evidence of his cooperation agreement. The admission of this evidence violated defendant's right to confront the witnesses against him "and was prejudicial, particularly in light of the paucity of direct evidence connecting the defendant to the shooting, the prosecutor's summation comments regarding this improperly admitted evidence, and the lack of any limiting instructions." Also deficient was defense counsel's failure to request either an accomplice-in-law or accomplice-in-fact jury instruction with respect to Brenda's testimony. "[A]t a minimum, in light of the evidence presented, there were factual disputes as to Brenda's participation or intent, 'such that different inferences [might have] reasonably [been] drawn from the evidence as to [her] role as an accomplice.'" Finally, while the People advised trial counsel during the course of the trial that they would not be calling Roberto, trial counsel failed to timely request a missing witness charge. "The cumulative effect of these errors was to deprive the defendant of meaningful representation by his trial counsel."

People v. McCray*, 213 A.D.3d 423 (N.Y. Supreme Ct. App. Div. 2023). In murder case, trial counsel performed deficiently in numerous respects: (1) waiving preclusion of the unnoticed identification made by the sole eyewitness to the shooting; (2) introducing a mug shot that had been shown to a witness even though it had been suppressed; and (3) failing to object to a detective's improper identification of defendant in a blurry video. At the post-trial hearing, trial counsel claimed that each of his alleged errors was strategic. The appellate court found, however, that "certain highly prejudicial decisions by counsel were not, in fact, strategic, or, even if subjectively intended to be strategic, were objectively unreasonable." Regarding preclusion of the identification, trial counsel had been warned at the suppression hearing that going forward would result in a waiver of preclusion at trial. Trial counsel explained that he made a tactical decision to forgo preclusion in order to have the opportunity to cross-examine the eyewitness at an independent source hearing. The fact that trial counsel sought preclusion of the identification even after the cross-examination demonstrated, however, that trial counsel failed to understand that he lost the ability to seek preclusion. Additionally, the record did not support counsel's testimony that waiver of preclusion could not harm defendant at trial because the jury would still hear the witness's "spot on correct" description of the shooter. The description given by the witness, based on the witness's fleeting observations, was in actuality quite vague: a tall, black man with a shaved or bald head. Regarding the introduction of the successfully suppressed mug shot, trial counsel explained that he did this in order to show the jury the suggestive nature of that single photo identification procedure. This, of course, would not have been necessary had the witness's in-court identification been precluded, adding prejudice to the first error. Trial counsel also claimed not to have sought removal of the word "shooter" from the mug shot because it showed the suggestiveness of the identification procedure. This justification was not supported by the record, however, as the word was written after the identification was made, a fact trial counsel conceded he did not know at the relevant time. Similarly, trial counsel's claim that he chose not to redact defendant's criminal history from the mug shot in order to show it related to a nonviolent drug crime was undermined by his opposition to that conviction being used for impeachment. "In these circumstances, it was objectively unreasonable to introduce the mug shot at all." Finally, as to the failure to object to a detective's improper identification of defendant in a blurry videotape, which placed defendant within two buildings of the shooting, trial counsel explained that he strategically forwent an objection because he wanted to show that the police were lying. "[I]t was unreasonable to forgo exclusion, in the first place, of inadmissible and damaging evidence . . . , as opposed to permitting its introduction and trying to convince the jury to reject it as a lie." Without the errors by trial counsel, the case against defendant would have been considerably weaker. "The only remaining identifying witness provided circumstantial, rather than direct, evidence of defendant's guilt, and his testimony was extensively impeached." Prejudice is thereby established.

Pratt v. State*, 303 A.3d 661 (Me. 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective in defending petitioner against a charge of domestic violence assault against her daughter by putting at issue a parental discipline justification defense during opening argument, which opened the door to otherwise inadmissible testimony about petitioner's allegedly poor parenting practices, and in failing to object to the prosecutor's improper elicitation of testimony about other children having been removed from petitioner's home. Regarding the parental discipline justification defense, which was expressly waived by counsel after the close of evidence, the lower court found it was reasonable for trial counsel to have raised the theory initially, along with self-defense which trial counsel ultimately relied on. The lower court reasoned that if petitioner had chosen not to testify, counsel would have had two alternative grounds to argue to the jury. Acknowledging that a defendant has the final say in whether or not to testify, the appellate court noted that "it falls below the objective standard of reasonableness for trial counsel to not have any idea of whether the client will testify." Here, trial counsel knew that petitioner intended to testify. Indeed, trial counsel promised her client's testimony in opening statement. Furthermore, "simply employing the reasonable due diligence required of lawyers means that trial counsel has a duty to know to a fair degree of certainty how the client will testify." In fact, trial counsel took notes on petitioner's written summaries of the incident, which supported a self-defense theory, and trial counsel acknowledged during the PCR hearing that petitioner's version of the incident aligned with the self-defense justification. But even if trial counsel was uncertain about how petitioner would testify, counsel was under no obligation to raise parental discipline justification in the opening statement.

Even if the utmost deference is given to trial counsel—and it is assumed that trial counsel was reasonably unsure whether [petitioner] viewed the incident as self-defense, parental discipline, or both—it fell below the objective standard of reasonableness for trial counsel to open the door during opening statements to prejudicial evidence for a defense that, at best, he thought only might be generated by [petitioner's] or the victim's testimony.

Turning to prejudice, "the testimony about [petitioner's] parenting practices—which did not make it any more or less probable that [petitioner] struck the victim or acted in self-defense and served only to establish and highlight [petitioner's] bad character—reasonably could have impacted the jury's verdict and thus is of significant prejudicial effect." Additionally, the improper testimony concerning the removal of other children was found non-prejudicial on direct appeal because of other testimony that came in because of the open door from the parental discipline theory. Thus, the prejudicial effect of the improper removal testimony had to be reassessed in a broader context. "[D]ue to the cumulative effect of trial counsel's opening the door to [petitioner's] parenting practices and his failure to object to prosecutorial error, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceeding would have been different."

Dugger v. United States*, 295 A.3d 1102 (D.C. 2023). Reversing denial of relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in case involving multiple charges related to defendant's shooting of his friend, Samuel Wright, which defendant claimed was done in self-defense after Wright shot at him first. Although numerous deficiencies occurred, three stood out: (1) trial counsel elicited testimony during his cross-examination of a witness that defendant was a drug dealer, and rather than moving to strike that testimony, he repeated and highlighted it for the jury; (2) trial counsel failed to impeach Wright with any of his criminal convictions, including for the violent offense of second-degree assault and for drug possession; and (3) trial counsel did not object when the trial court instructed the jury, at the government's request, that it could consider the evidence of Wright's peaceful character when assessing who was the first aggressor. (No such evidence had been introduced and the instruction was erroneous.) Trial counsel's pretrial conduct—(1) misrepresenting his qualifications to the trial court and his client when he replaced original trial counsel, (2) failing to retrieve predecessor counsel's trial file, and (3) failing to retain a defense investigator—"fell so far below professional norms, and he so blatantly lied about his core qualifications to take on this representation, that the presumption that he otherwise acted strategically throughout trial is simply not warranted." (Internal footnote omitted.) The conclusion that the normal presumption was rebutted in this case was "bolstered by the fact that [trial counsel] was in the midst of disciplinary proceedings stemming from similar misrepresentations in another case—in which he caused his civil client's suit to be dismissed for want of prosecution through his clearly non-strategic inaction—leading to his disbarment." The three specific deficiencies identified by the court worked together to contribute "to a narrative that [defendant] was a violent drug dealer and Wright a peaceful man, a narrative that substantially undercut the entire defense theory that Wright was the first aggressor." Regarding the revelation of defendant's history as a drug dealer, the government attempted to discount the prejudicial impact by pointing out that drug dealing was not related to the charges in this case. But this ignored the reality that drugs and guns are commonly believed to go together. Because of that natural inference, it undercut the plausibility of defendant's claim to have only obtained a gun shortly before the offense because of a recent assault he experienced. As for Wright's prior convictions, trial counsel was deficient whether or not he actually knew about them. If he did, he was clearly deficient in not alerting the jury to Wright's violent past. If he did not know about them, he was deficient in failing to discover them. A "simple search of Maryland judiciary's publicly accessible website would have revealed them. Competent defense counsel, in a case of this magnitude when claiming self-defense, would run at least a rudimentary criminal history check on the complainant and lead government witness, particularly one with an admitted 'tendency to put [his] hands on people.'" The failure "to introduce evidence of Wright's violent criminal past, even if only as impeachment, seriously undermined the defense." (Internal footnote omitted.) Regarding the erroneous peaceful character instruction, the government and lower court discounted the prejudice by noting the general assumption that jurors do not consider non-existent evidence in their decision-making. But this ignored the countervailing assumption that jurors give great weight to the trial judge's words and follow the instructions. "When those two assumptions point in contrary directions, as they do here, the latter is probably the dominant of the two, and at the very least it offsets the former so that it is no longer warranted." That the government did not capitalize on the instruction in its closing arguments, that Wright himself acknowledged some violent tendencies, and that the jury was instructed about considering past acts of violence by both parties when assessing the reasonableness of defendant's alleged fear did not "entirely mitigate the potential harm from the erroneous peaceful character instruction." Although the erroneous instruction was not on its own sufficiently prejudicial to warrant vacating the convictions, the three deficiencies when considered in combination satisfied the Strickland prejudice prong as to most of the convictions. "Together, the deficiencies contributed to a picture of [defendant] as the dangerous criminal and Wright as the law-abiding and peaceful victim. We thus conclude that, but for [trial counsel's] errors, there is a reasonable probability the outcome of the trial would have been different." (Convictions for, e.g., unlawful possession of a weapon and fleeing a law enforcement officer were not impacted by the deficiencies at issue and were not vacated.)

Commonwealth v. Tavares*, 202 N.E.3d 1238 (Mass. Supreme Judicial Ct. 2023). Following defendant's conviction for murder, the motion judge did not err or abuse her discretion in granting a new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel, where trial counsel was made aware of but failed to use proffer evidence from a confidential informant that could have raised a reasonable doubt whether defendant murdered the victim. The prosecution theory at trial was that defendant was alone when he killed the victim. According to the proffer, two individuals, "H.H.," who was armed with a nine millimeter handgun, and "another man," went to the victim's apartment intending to rob the victim of money and marijuana. When the victim lunged for the gun, he was shot and killed. The evidence at issue had the potential to aid defendant by: (1) corroborating his mistaken identity claim; (2) undercutting the Commonwealth's theory that defendant was the sole shooter in the victim's murder; and (3) challenging the credibility of two witnesses who reported that only one man came to the victim's home on the night of the shooting. In addition, the evidence could have bolstered the defense that police failed to investigate other leads by suggesting that the Commonwealth failed to investigate the possibility that someone other than the defendant committed the crime and by supporting a new and compelling third-party culprit defense. Found to be unavailing is the Commonwealth's contention that a felony murder theory could have been the basis for convicting defendant even if the proffer had been utilized by trial counsel. The court explained: "The Commonwealth's theory at trial was that the defendant was the lone shooter. The prosecutor neither presented evidence of a joint venture nor requested instructions on felony-murder. Thus, what otherwise might have happened if the case had been tried differently is purely speculative."

Greene v. State*, 889 S.E.2d 636 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was indicted for armed robbery and kidnapping, defense counsel was ineffective for failing to (1) object to the prosecution's use of a prior conviction for "strongarm robbery" to impeach petitioner's testimony as unfairly prejudicial and (2) request a limiting instruction be given to the jury clarifying that the prior conviction could only be considered for credibility purposes. In post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel could not remember why he failed to argue the inadmissibility of the prior conviction or seek a limiting instruction, despite having done so in other cases. The appeals court observed that even if trial counsel believed the trial court was inclined to allow the prior conviction impeachment, a defense attorney cannot merely acquiesce to its use. Absent an objection or request to perform the balancing test required under state law, the appellate court could not know whether the trial court would have admitted the prior conviction. Because the prior conviction was for a similar offense and there was no limiting instruction, the circumstances were “highly prejudicial.” The appellate court disagreed with respondent’s contention that the overwhelming evidence overcame any deficient performance. The only evidence was the testimony of petitioner and the victim, both of whom provided “at least arguable explanations” for what occurred.

People v. Urbanski*, 17 N.W.3d 430 (Mich. App. 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective where defendant was convicted of operating his vehicle while intoxicated (OWI) and trial counsel had failed to: (1) object when the prosecutor made an improper argument concerning defendant’s blood alcohol content (BAC); (2) object to erroneous instructions; and (3) request an instruction on the presumption applicable to defendant’s BAC result. Defendant had been arrested for fleeing and eluding the police when he failed to initially pull over for speeding. During the traffic stop, the arresting officer suspected that defendant was intoxicated based on defendant’s bloodshot eyes, slurred speech, and the odor of intoxicants. A blood sample taken from defendant some two hours after his arrest, however, revealed a BAC of .064, which was below the unlawful alcohol level of .08 that is strictly prohibited. Under state law, a driver’s BAC is presumed to be the same at the time of the testing as it was at the time the driver operated the vehicle. No evidence was presented at trial to rebut this presumption, e.g., through testimony about rates of absorption. Nevertheless, the prosecutor argued to the jury not only that defendant was under the influence of alcohol, a permissible argument, but also to infer that defendant’s BAC was higher when he was driving than it was later when in custody. No objection was made to the impermissible argument nor to instructions to the jury that allowed conviction for OWI based on either theory – driving while intoxicated and/or driving with a BAC at .08 or higher. And defense counsel requested no instruction regarding the legal presumption applicable to the BAC results. “[T]he combination of these three errors denied defendant his right to a fair trial and that there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of defendant’s trial would have been different but for these mistakes.”

State v. Carranza*, 533 P.3d 850 (Utah App. 2023). Trial counsel performed deficiently in kidnapping case by failing to timely contact a key witness identified by defendant, who counsel ultimately declined to have testify. Trial counsel learned of the witness, at the latest, twelve days before trial. Because of trial counsel’s delay in preparing the necessary paperwork, his investigator did not contact the witness until the second day of trial. According to trial counsel, it was during a lunch break on the second day that he communicated by phone with the witness. Based on trial counsel’s account of the call, the conversation consisted of little more than the witness stating that he worked a lot and that he did not remember defendant being at the house. (The house at issue is where the alleged victim claimed he was held against his will.) Had trial counsel initiated the contact with the witness even a little earlier, trial counsel could have oriented the witness to the specific time frame and the witness would likely have recounted the details he shared at the post-trial evidentiary hearing, including that defendant and the alleged victim were present together, that the alleged victim did not appear afraid, and that at one point the alleged victim left the premises without defendant and later returned. After learning these details, trial counsel could have developed a superior trial strategy. Trial counsel had not been “in a position to make a reasonable strategic choice” about his approach to mounting a defense “without first conducting a full investigation of the merits of the case.” Defendant was prejudiced by counsel’s delayed investigation. The testimony of the alleged victim was key to the prosecution’s case. There was a “reasonable probability that [the alleged victim’s] credibility before the jury would have been compromised” had defendant’s witness been called. “[W]ith Witness’s testimony providing a contradictory version of events, the entire evidentiary landscape of the case shifts. This fundamental shift undermines . . . confidence in the outcome of the trial.”

State v. Pullman*, 527 P.3d 1126 (Utah App. 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective in theft case for failing to call key witnesses and enter into evidence an important document. The two counts of theft defendant was convicted of concerned a vehicle belonging to her father, but sold to an acquaintance, and property belonging to the acquaintance that was allegedly in the vehicle when defendant had a friend repossess it for lack of payment of the balance owed. According to defendant, her father had asked her to get the car back for him after the acquaintance stopped making payments, something the father denied at trial. Although trial counsel was aware of a witness who could corroborate defendant’s account, trial counsel failed to contact the witness and to call her as a witness. This was deficient performance. Also deficient was trial counsel’s failure to interview the person who had purchased the vehicle from defendant’s father after defendant repossessed it. Again, trial counsel had been aware of the buyer but did not contact him to learn of the details of the transaction. Had counsel done so, he would also have discovered that the buyer’s wife had helpful testimony. Counsel was further deficient in failing to investigate the vehicle’s ownership history. Had counsel obtained a copy of the car’s title, he would have had evidence supporting defendant’s assertion that she repossessed the car at her father’s request given that her father alone gained from selling the car to the buyer. Had the missing evidence been presented it was reasonably likely that the jury could have discounted the testimony of defendant’s father and acquitted defendant of theft of the car. Additionally, it was reasonably likely that the jury would have acquitted defendant for theft of the items in the car had it heard the missing testimony. Although none of the three witnesses could have provided any relevant information about whether defendant took personal items from the car before storing it at the buyer’s home, defendant’s “overall credibility would have been strengthened by the corroboration these witnesses provided regarding her repossession of the car.” This was “significant because the jury’s assessment of the charge for theft of personal items depended entirely on its assessment of [defendant’s] and [the a]cquaintance’s respective credibility.”

State v. Eddington*, 525 P.3d 920 (Utah App. 2023). In sexual assault case where defendant claimed that all contacts with the alleged victim were consensual, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to cross-examine the alleged victim about specific descriptions of the encounter that defendant gave to police in an interview and in a pretextual call from the alleged victim that was taped. Counsel was similarly deficient in failing to question the alleged victims about other aspects of the sexual encounter that counsel had been told of by defendant that had the alleged victim directing much of the activity. At the post-trial hearing, the alleged victim admitted to much of what defendant claimed had occurred but explained that her actions were done to please defendant because she was scared and to redirect him to less painful activities. “Because the evidence was highly probative with respect to the issues of consent and [defendant’s] intent, and especially in light of the trial court’s erroneous decision not to allow cross-examination about [the alleged victim’s] sexual history after the State opened the door, it was unreasonable for Counsel not to highlight the evidence or seek to question [the alleged victim] during cross-examination to undercut her credibility.” On this record, there is a reasonable probability that having heard the alleged victim’s corroboration of many of the details of defendant’s account, the jury would have had a reasonable doubt regarding defendant’s intent with respect to consent.

2022: Commonwealth v. Robinson, 278 A.3d 336 (Pa. Super. 2022). In case of aggravated assault on a police officer, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to secure and present expert testimony on eyewitness identification. Five months prior to petitioner’s trial, the state supreme court reversed Pennsylvania’s evidentiary prohibition on expert testimony on eyewitness identification and ruled that such testimony was admissible at the discretion of the trial court. At the time of petitioner’s trial, the expert witness who testified at the post-conviction hearing was available and willing to appear as a defense expert had she been retained. Trial counsel had a duty to know of the recent change in law that rendered expert testimony likely admissible in a case such as this which depended primarily on eyewitness identification. Although trial counsel testified in the post-conviction proceeding that his strategy was to concede that petitioner was present at the scene and argue that the officer mistook petitioner’s cell phone for a gun, thus rendering an eyewitness identification expert unnecessary, the record showed that trial counsel did in fact present a misidentification defense both through his cross-examination of witnesses and in his argument. The post-conviction court’s conclusion that the decision not to present an expert on eyewitness identification was unreasonable was supported by the record. Prejudice was established from trial counsel’s deficiency in part by several questions from the jury indicating that identity was in fact a key issue in the case. The expert’s testimony “would have informed the jurors of factors implicated in this case, commonly misunderstood by lay persons, that would cast the accuracy of the identification into doubt.”

State v. Lambert*, 278 A.3d 71 (Del. Super. 2022). In case involving convictions for possessing a firearm and ammunition by a person prohibited from having those items, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to offer any defense at all during the bench trial and remaining silent. Prior to trial, defense counsel had unsuccessfully moved to suppress the key evidence against petitioner. Because Delaware does not allow for a conditional guilty plea to permit appellate review of a denied suppression motion, trial counsel took the case to trial but without any argument or questioning of witnesses. This was deficient performance as it amounted to the functional equivalent of a guilty plea without petitioner being apprised of and questioned by the trial court about the knowing and voluntary relinquishment of his rights. To the extent that defense counsel attempted to engage in a “stipulated trial,” this was deficient because, in contrast to other such trials, petitioner received no benefit from the procedure, there was no evidence that he was informed of and agreed to defense counsel’s decision to remain silent during the trial, and the trial judge did not conduct an appropriate colloquy about the procedure given defense counsel’s failure to inform the trial judge of his intention to offer no defense. Regarding prejudice, under the Delaware Supreme Court's interpretation of Cronic, petitioner was excused from demonstrating prejudice because defense counsel's failure to advocate for his client during a critical stage of the proceedings caused a constructive complete denial of counsel.

People v. Lewis*, 211 N.E.3d 375 (Ill. 2022), affirming 176 N.E.3d 896 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Where defendant was convicted of involuntary sexual servitude of a minor, traveling to meet a minor, and grooming, trial counsel was ineffective in presenting his entrapment defense where he failed to (1) object to the trial court's responses to two jury notes regarding the legal definition of "predisposed," (2) object to the prosecutor's closing argument mischaracterizing the entrapment defense and the parties' relevant burdens of proof, and (3) present defendant's lack of a criminal record to the jury. "Counsel's three errors prejudiced defendant and rendered the jury's deliberations and verdict unreliable under Strickland."

People v. Pippen*, 974 N.W.2d 241 (Mich. 2022). In murder case that relied heavily on testimony of prosecution witness McDuffie, defendant was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient failure to investigate and call witness Hudson who was interviewed by a private investigator hired by defendant's family and who would have contradicted McDuffie. McDuffie claimed to have been with defendant and Hudson the night of the shooting and witnessed defendant kill the victim. Hudson informed the defense investigator that McDuffie was lying. The lower appellate court had denied relief on the claim after concluding that defendant failed to establish prejudice. It found that Hudson was unnecessary to impeach McDuffie given that the prosecution was permitted to treat McDuffie as a hostile witness after he initially claimed he was not sure whether he remembered being with defendant that night or witnessing the shooting. (After being shown his police statement, McDuffie implicated defendant in the shooting.) Additionally, according to the lower court, Hudson would not have been a credible witness because he could not recall certain details concerning defendant's arrest and because of his criminal record. "[T]hese findings misunderstand the trial proceedings and the value of Hudson's testimony." Although the dissent made much of the fact that defendant was found in possession of the murder weapon when he was arrested three months after the murder, notably McDuffie testified that he knew that the firearm had belonged to two different individuals and he did not know when the firearm had changed hands. Thus, McDuffie's alleged eyewitness account of the shooting was critical to the jury's verdict. His testimony was impeached by various inconsistencies that could fairly be attributed to the passage of time or trauma. "Similarly, Hudson's inability to recall details from that night would not have rendered his proposed testimony completely incredible." And even assuming Hudson could have been impeached with his past criminal history, this history consisted of theft offenses that are minimally probative on the issue of credibility. "[T]here is a reasonable probability that, had defense counsel called Hudson as a witness, the jury would have believed that defendant did not shoot and kill the victim, which would be consistent with McDuffie's initial trial testimony."

Johnson v. State*, 2022 WL 261959 (Tenn. Crim. App. Jan. 28, 2022). In robbery-murder case where insanity was the defense, trial counsel was ineffective in his handling of the critical defense expert on the issue of petitioner's mental state at the time of the killing. Prior to retaining the defense expert, trial counsel had received from petitioner a consistent account of the crime that supported the insanity defense. In a “draft” report provided by the expert to defense counsel after the expert’s initial evaluation of petitioner, it recounted a dramatically different rendition of the events with petitioner claiming that he knew who the victim was and that he understood what he was doing at the time he killed her. After trial counsel informed the expert that this was not what he had been told by petitioner, the expert met again with petitioner. The expert then produced a report that was provided to the prosecutor pre-trial. In this report, petitioner reverted to what he’d earlier told defense counsel -- that he believed he was in danger and that he killed the victim believing she was someone else there to attack him. (When defense counsel asked petitioner why he had initially told the expert a different account, petitioner explained that he lied to the expert because what he told defense counsel made him look like a monster and that other inmates had warned him that insanity defenses never prevailed and he needed to not appear to be a crazy monster.) The second report made no mention of the narrative petitioner had first provided to the expert. Nor did the subsequent addendums submitted by the expert reference the contents of the draft report. Shortly before the defense began its case, defense counsel was ordered to provide the defense expert’s notes to the prosecution. The belated revelation of the “draft” report with the contradictory narrative severely undermined the expert’s credibility at trial. Trial counsel performed deficiently by failing to mitigate the damage at an earlier time. Although the expert did ultimately address the omission in his testimony, trial counsel could have bolstered the expert’s credibility by having the expert include a reference to petitioner’s changed account in the pre-trial and subsequent reports and there provide his professional opinion as to why petitioner’s first narrative of events to the expert was untruthful. Trial counsel’s failure to do so allowed the prosecution to aggressively challenge the expert’s opinion. Because insanity was petitioner’s sole defense and because, as the State pointed out in its closing argument, the defense expert’s credibility was vital to that defense, the damage done to the expert’s credibility as a result of trial counsel’s deficient performance undermined confidence in the outcome of the case.

2021: People v. Smothers, 281 Cal.Rptr.3d 409 (Cal.App. 2021). In case involving a 1983 murder where DNA evidence developed decades later from blood at the victim’s residence was found to match the defendant, who had been dating the victim around the time of her murder, trial counsel was ineffective in presenting evidence that DNA from an unknown third party was found under the victim’s broken fingernail but failing to identify the third party and showing the absence of any evidence connecting him to the defendant. (At the time of trial, there was also no evidence connecting the third party, who claimed to have been in the Army Reserves in another state in 1983, to California or to the victim.) The prosecutor relied on alternative theories at trial, including an uncharged conspiracy. The key prosecution witness supporting the conspiracy theory was a man who claimed defendant had attempted to get him and/or other local friends to kill the victim. This witness made no mention of the existence of a clandestine hitman from out of state. Based on the evidence the jury heard, it likely concluded that defendant was finally able to locate some local acquaintance to help him kill the victim. (The jury found defendant guilty of murder but found the sentencing enhancement that he had wielded a dangerous weapon to be not true. The verdict was most consistent with the theory that defendant conspired with a third party to kill the victim and that the third party, based on the DNA evidence, likely was the killer.) Defense counsel’s explanations for his failure to elicit testimony about the third party’s identity were based on misconceptions of the record. First, counsel expressed the belief that he could not reference the third party by name to the jury because he had no good faith basis to place the third party in California at the time of the murder. This was incorrect as the DNA evidence beneath the victim's fingernail was more than adequate to place the third party in California. Second, counsel stated that he did not want to refer to the third party by name because he believed the court would bar him from doing so absent additional evidence showing a further connection to California. This was also mistaken as the trial court never indicated it would take this position and, to the contrary, had granted the defendant's in limine motion, expressly allowing him to present any third party evidence related to the DNA under the fingernail. In finding prejudice from trial counsel's deficient performance, the appellate court stated: "We will never know whether this jury would have reached the same conclusion if they had been told [the third party's] identity and heard there was no known connection between him and [defendant] let alone an agreement between the two to murder [the victim]."

Jones v. United States*, 262 A.3d 1114 (D.C. App. 2021). In case where defendant was convicted of numerous crimes, including assault and burglary, based on her allegedly breaking into the victim's home and attacking him, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to call an expert on eyewitness identification. At trial, there were two witnesses who identified defendant – the victim and his landlord who had encountered the assailant following the attack. Defense counsel relied on a misidentification defense highlighting the inconsistencies and inaccuracies in the many descriptions given by the two witnesses, as well as the fact that the victim twice failed to identify defendant from a photo array. Counsel explained post-trial that that he did not consider calling an expert in eyewitness identification because he thought the identification evidence was already weak and so "strategically, we didn't think that we needed it." In light of the "wealth of scientific evidence depicting (1) the presence of numerous reliability factors and (2) the common misconceptions of lay people regarding such factors," in a case like this where the government's case hinged primarily on the credibility of eyewitness testimony, professional norms required counsel to explore whether an expert's testimony would be beneficial and calling an expert witness to testify. The failure of counsel to do so amounted to deficient performance. Expert testimony would not have been merely cumulative to the evidence adduced and arguments made by defense counsel. "While trial counsel may have alluded to the existence of some issues surrounding eyewitness reliability after the eyewitnesses had testified, he did not provide the explicit and detailed testimony that an expert would likely offer." On the record of this case, "there is a reasonable probability that scientific testimony from an eyewitness expert, in the context of the other evidence at trial, would have created a reasonable doubt sufficient to forestall conviction."

Johnson v. Premo, 499 P.3d 814 (Or. App. 2021). (2004 trial and sentencing). In capital murder case where the victim was killed in her home in the middle of the night, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and present testimony from a woman who lived across the street and two houses down from the victim whose eyewitness observations were exculpatory. The witness was deposed many years after the offense for post-conviction proceedings. On the night in question, she described viewing a white man drive up and park his van in the victim's driveway. She recognized the white man as someone she had noticed at the victim's home before, "[m]any, many times." Within seconds of the man entering the victim's home, the witness heard shouting and screaming coming from the house from both a male and a female voice. The witness recognized the male voice as belonging to the white man she had noticed numerous times before at the property. The commotion went on and intensified before she heard screaming, then a thud, and then total silence. The white man fled the scene on foot. About 10 to 15 minutes after that, the witness saw a Black man walking down the driveway. She thought it might be a man to whom she previously had been introduced. Petitioner is Black, and the victim had introduced the witness to him. When petitioner's post-conviction team showed her petitioner's photograph approximately 12 years after the murder, the witness said that he did not look like the person whom she had seen that night. According to the witness, on two separate occasions she attempted to tell the police what she had seen but was rebuffed each time. The second time happened when a neighbor brought a detective to her home. The detective cut off the witness when she began recounting her observations, telling her it wasn't necessary and that "A nigger got murdered, and a nigger's going to pay for it." Although the trial investigators spent a total of roughly six hours canvassing the neighborhood and speaking to witnesses, this witness was not interviewed. The post-conviction court did not err in finding that trial counsel was deficient in failing to locate and interview the witness. The importance of speaking to people nearby who had information about the victim was clear. Notably, post-conviction counsel was able to find the witness with minimal effort after learning of her through the neighbor who had brought the detective to the witness's home. (This neighbor's name was included in police reports although the key witness's name was not.) The post-conviction court erred in finding that petitioner failed to establish prejudice. The superintendent had argued that there was no prejudice because the witness's testimony coincided with trial evidence. For example, petitioner's former cellmate had testified that petitioner admitted being present at the victim's home the night of the killing with a white man and another Black man. But the fact that the witness's account supported some of the State's evidence made it potentially more persuasive rather than insignificant. And the witness's account differed in critical ways from that of the former cellmate, providing a narrative that supported an inference that the white man was the actual killer. In addition, the witness's testimony included evidence of racial bias in the police investigation of the murder, and a failure to properly investigate. Finally, had trial counsel known of the witness's account, different strategic decisions may have been made impacting the defense. "Counsel ultimately made choices that allowed evidence that had previously been suppressed to be introduced at trial in support of a defense theory that petitioner was present for the murder, but less culpable than the person who had left a distinct set of shoeprints. (Citation omitted). [The witness's] information could have helped counsel to settle on a defense theory that was not partially inculpatory." On this record, prejudice is established. NOTE: Jesse Johnson was not retried for the offense and was freed in 2023. State v. Dinkel*, 495 P.3d 402 (Kansas 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in defending a middle school counselor on charges of rape of a child under 14 years of age by failing to include a defense that stressed the voluntary act requirement for the charged rapes. Trial counsel presented a defense that the victim actually raped defendant and then blackmailed her to continue having sexual contact. Although defense counsel argued this theory to the jury, this was not the same as arguing the voluntariness issue and requesting an instruction on the actus reus. Defendant's version of events was known to the jury but it was deprived of information on how to properly consider defendant's account when evaluating the charges against her. "The State proved that sexual intercourse occurred at least once during the described time period, that [defendant] was aware of what was happening, and that [the victim] was under 14 years old. Even if the jury believed [defendant's] defenses, the instructions offered no avenue for the jury to find she was not guilty." From the record, it appeared that defense counsel did not know the voluntary act requirement existed or, if he did, he overlooked it and instead essentially asked for jury nullification. Ignorance or mistake did not excuse counsel's missteps. Nor did the absence of prior precedent from the state supreme or appellate courts expressly addressing the voluntary act requirement's application to the crime of rape of a child.

The voluntary act requirement is part of the Kansas Criminal Code and applicable to all Kansas crimes. It may not be routinely argued, but that does not make it reasonable for an attorney to neglect its importance—especially when it provides the only connection between the defense and acquittal. This case may have been novel, but the uniqueness of the factual scenario should have alerted [trial counsel] to the reality that the law and the instructions might be different than they are in most other child rape cases. And if the novelty of the facts did not tip him off, the reality that [trial counsel] was offering the jury no avenue to use [defendant's] proffered defense should have steered him toward the voluntary act requirement. In fact, [trial counsel] appeared to eventually become aware of this issue. In his post-trial motion arguing for acquittal, he seemed to acknowledge the problem when he noted that the jury was never instructed "as to what the actual effect" her defenses would have. This shows that the problem was identifiable, and identifiable by [trial counsel].

Also not dispositive on the question of defense counsel's competence was the fact that neither party—and none of the presiding judges—mentioned the voluntary act requirement until defendant pointed it out in her petition for review. "A reasonable investigation should have revealed the legal basis for the voluntary act defense and corollary jury instruction in this case." As for prejudice, "[t]he failure to give the jury the tools it needed to apply [defendant's] defense against the State's case made it impossible to achieve the fundamental fairness we expect in a criminal trial."

McMullin v. Amsberry*, 485 P.3d 278 (Or. App. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in defending petitioner against charges of sexual abuse of petitioner's adopted adolescent daughter by failing to adequately investigate the significance of the absence of physical evidence of the alleged abuse. The nurse practitioner who examined the complainant found no physical evidence of sexual activity. The nurse practitioner testified, however, that it was not unusual for an adolescent victim of sexual abuse not to show physical evidence of abuse, citing to the "Kellogg Study." Trial counsel did not cross-examine the witness about this assertion or the study and did not call an expert to rebut the testimony. In preparation for trial, defense counsel had anticipated the testimony at issue and consulted with two experts. The first, a former medical examiner, informed trial counsel he could not be helpful after reviewing the nurse practitioner's report. The second expert consulted by trial counsel was a nurse practitioner who defense counsel found to have “some really wacky ideas,” who was “not terribly likeable” and who ultimately did not seem helpful to the defense. After speaking with two defense attorneys with experience in sexual abuse cases, one of whom advised trial counsel of literature contradicting the examining nurse practitioner’s view but also warned trial counsel that aggressive cross-examination on the point could blow up in counsel’s face, defense counsel opted to forgo both a defense expert and cross-examination on the lack of physical corroboration. Instead, trial counsel invited the jurors to look to common sense. Counsel’s tactical decision was not supported by a reasonable investigation. In neither of the expert consultations did trial counsel “actually acquire information about whether the state’s expert witness correctly understood the literature concerning the incidence of normal physical examinations among adolescent victims of sexual abuse.” Nor did the interactions with the experienced defense attorneys provide trial counsel “with the information necessary to enable her to make the required cost-benefit calculation about whether to challenge [the prosecution expert’s] testimony.” Petitioner was prejudiced by the deficient performance. Had counsel conducted an adequate investigation, she could have retained a defense expert or better cross-examined the prosecution expert, or both. Cross-examination or the testimony of an expert such as the one presented in the post-conviction proceedings could have brought to the jury’s attention the flaws in the Kellogg study itself and the fact that the principal author of the Kellogg study actually concluded in another study that “physical findings are really important and they are indicators of sexual trauma, of penetrative sexual trauma.” Cross-examination or testimony from an expert such as [the post-conviction expert] likewise could have brought to the jury’s attention other studies showing that, contrary to the Kellogg study, between 63 and 74 percent of adolescent girls reporting sexual activity showed physical signs. It is more than merely possible that such evidence could have made a difference to the outcome of the case.

The state’s argument that an expert like the one testifying post-conviction would have been subject to vigorous cross-examination failed to defeat the finding of prejudice. “[D]efense experts always will be subject to cross-examination, and the fact that a defense expert’s testimony may not conclusively rebut the prosecution’s case is not dispositive.”

Rodriguez-Olivera v. State*, 328 So.3d 1080 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving allegations of sexual offenses committed on an eleven-year-old where trial counsel failed to object to the admission of highly prejudicial evidence and by failing to move for a mistrial when the jury heard such evidence. The improper evidence concerned an allegation of an uncharged molestation attempt by defendant on the same victim. When it was first mentioned, counsel did object but declined to move for a mistrial and the jury was provided with a curative instruction. The second time it was referenced, counsel objected but did not thereafter request a curative instruction or a mistrial. (The trial court had mistakenly concluded that the second mention of the uncharged incident was a reference to the charged offenses. This was negated by the record.) Even assuming that counsel had a strategic reason for not seeking a mistrial after the uncharged molestation attempt was brought up the first time, there could be no strategic basis for the failure to ask for a curative instruction or mistrial the second time. Because of the highly prejudicial impact of evidence of an uncharged sexual offense, prejudice is found. Also deficient was counsel's failure to take any corrective action after eliciting testimony from the investigating officer that no statement was taken from defendant because his attorney had advised him not to speak to authorities. The detective's comment "was improper because the jury easily could have concluded that [defendant's] prearrest silence, combined with his failure to testify, supported a finding of guilt." Counsel's deficiency was compounded when he highlighted the improper comment in closing argument, stating that "I asked the detective did you speak to all these people, ... and she goes nope; ... he got a lawyer. I'd get a lawyer too." No strategic basis for counsel's act and omission can be discerned given that there was no physical evidence tying defendant to the alleged offenses and the outcome hinged entirely on the jury's perception of the trustworthiness of the complaining child and the defendant. "Without the improper comments on [defendant's] invocation of rights, there is at least a reasonable probability that the trial would have ended with a different result." Counsel was again deficient in failing to object to testimony about hearsay statements of the child that corroborated the accusations the child made during an interview with the Child Protective Team. At a pre-trial hearing, the court had ruled that the only permissible child hearsay was admission of the interview itself. "Given the circumstances of this case—which boiled down to whether the jury believed [the child's] allegations—failure to object to this cumulation of inadmissible hearsay, that served only to corroborate [the child's] testimony, was deficient performance." It was also prejudicial.

Wilson v. State*, 326 So.3d 858 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). In case of sexual battery of a young teenager, post-conviction relief is granted without discussion on ineffective assistance of counsel claim where "[t]he record portrays a pattern of trial counsel errors traversing the proceedings from pretrial to closing argument" and several of the errors in combination were "sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome." Most notable among the deficient acts was trial counsel's failure to call an available expert witness to challenge the State's otherwise unrefuted medical expert testimony concerning the victim's injuries. The failure to call such a witness, which alone constituted deficient performance under the facts of this case, was exacerbated by trial counsel's failure to object to both improper bolstering testimony from the State's medical expert that her abuse report had been peer reviewed by a certified child abuse pediatrician and the prosecutor's closing argument highlighting this bolstering testimony.

Duty v. State*, 322 So.3d 770 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). In robbery with a deadly weapon case, post-conviction relief was granted based on trial counsel's: (1) failure to investigate and present an alibi witness; (2) failure to impeach a witness; and (3) failure to move to suppress an impermissibly suggestive show-up identification. Regarding the alibi, petitioner's employer initially recalled dropping petitioner off near the crime scene between 3 and 4 p.m. Per the 911 call from the victim, the robbery occurred at around 3:30 p.m. When the employer received his phone records after trial, but prior to sentencing, he saw that he received a call from the police concerning petitioner's arrest at approximately 4:30 p.m. He was confident that the call came half an hour after he dropped off petitioner, providing petitioner with an alibi. Notably, an investigator's report in trial counsel's files provided the information needed to solidify the timeline of events had counsel investigated the alibi. In addition, the employer's description of petitioner's attire, what he was carrying, and the money he provided to petitioner would have been inconsistent with the description of the assailant by the victim and the cash that she said was taken from her. Counsel's failure to reasonably investigate the alibi evidence led to the testimony not being presented at trial. Had the testimony been presented to the jury, a reasonable probability exists that the outcome at trial would likely have been different such that confidence in the outcome is undermined. Trial counsel was also ineffective in failing to impeach the interrogating detective who testified that he was never provided "any specific witnesses by name, like full name, address, phone number or anything like that." The videotape of the interrogation, however, showed petitioner repeatedly urging the detective to contact his employer and even providing him with the employer's business card. At the post-conviction hearing, defense counsel explained that he did not impeach the detective with the videotaped interrogation in part because of petitioner's repeated use of profanity in the video, including use of a profane reference regarding the victim. (Trial counsel also claimed that use of the videotaped interrogation was problematic because it implied that an alibi witness was available and yet none was presented. This, as noted above, was the result of counsel's deficient investigation.) "The use of profanity by [petitioner] does not reasonably raise such a concern that the interrogation tape should not have been used, especially considering the limited amount of evidence available to convict [petitioner] of the crime charged." Also deficient was counsel's failure to seek suppression of the show-up identification of petitioner where petitioner was not permitted to appear as he was when detained, i.e., shirtless with a backpack and toolbelt, the same as when his employer dropped him off. The officers had him remove the backpack and toolbelt, items not included in the victim's description of the robber, and had him put on a white t-shirt. Petitioner was surrounded by officers when the victim was brought to make the identification at which time she told the officers that petitioner looked like her assailant. Prior to the show-up identification, the victim had been informed that the police had located someone meeting the description of the perpetrator. After the initial identification, the victim was informed by police that the money taken from her was not recovered from petitioner but that he had drugs on him that likely were purchased with the stolen money before he was detained. (There was no evidence that he in fact possessed drugs and no drug-related charges were ever filed. The money in his possession matched the eight dollars his employer stated he gave petitioner when he dropped him off, minus the cost of beer and cigarettes purchased by petitioner from a convenience store.) At the post-conviction hearing, the victim testified that being told the false information about the drugs gave her confidence in her identification. She also stated that if she had known before trial about the information regarding petitioner's attire when he was detained and his possible alibi, then she likely would not have confidently identified petitioner as the perpetrator at trial. In defending his failure to seek suppression of the show-up identification, trial counsel stated that he was unaware before trial that the victim was told drugs were found on petitioner. Nor was he aware that police had altered petitioner's attire prior to the show-up identification. "Yet had trial counsel questioned the victim appropriately, it is highly likely that this information would have been acquired prior to trial." The lack of adequate questioning did not excuse trial counsel's failure to move to suppress the show-up identification, especially considering that the prosecution's case was founded on the victim's identification. "Because the show-up identification was unduly suggestive, trial counsel's performance was deficient for failing to move for suppression." Finally, petitioner was entitled to relief based on the cumulative effect of the multiple deficiencies. "Trial counsel's errors, taken together, were so egregious that trial counsel did not provide the assistance of counsel guaranteed to [petitioner] by the Sixth Amendment."

People v. Petrie*, 192 N.E.3d 800 (Ill. App. Ct. 2021). In case involving charges of aggravated assault on a child in the defendant's care, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to adequately cross-examine the key prosecution expert on the timing of the infant's injuries where the only issue at trial was what caused the serious injuries to the infant; and (2) failing to adequately present the theory that there was an accidental cause. Trial counsel did advance the theory that the key prosecution expert was incorrect in concluding that the injury must have occurred during the time the infant was in defendant's care, both through a defense expert and other cross-examination of the prosecution witness. But trial counsel's failure to cross-examine the expert on the basis for his opinion or object on the lack of foundation was "so irrational and unreasonable that no reasonably effective defense attorney, facing like circumstances, would pursue such a strategy." And "although defense counsel realized the significance of certain facts, . . . counsel did not demonstrate the understanding of brain injuries in infants necessary to frame a cogent alternate explanation from those facts." Counsel's apparent ignorance led to missed opportunities to point out findings that contradicted the prosecution's own explanations of the infant's injuries. "While we do not require defense attorneys to train themselves as brain surgeons, in a case such as this, counsel must familiarize himself with the relevant scientific evidence and applicable theories to enable him to challenge the prosecution's expert witnesses and advance alternate explanations that are supported by the evidence." Prejudice is established because the judge at the bench trial relied almost entirely on the prosecution expert in finding that defendant caused the injuries. That the defense had an expert offering an opinion contrary to the prosecution expert did not erase the prejudice from counsel's deficient performance. (In assessing the expert testimony, the judge noted that the prosecution expert was board certified in child abuse pediatrics, unlike the defense expert, and that the prosecution expert worked with an advocacy program funded by the Department of Children and Family Services to provide medical examinations in cases of suspected child abuse, but the defense expert did not. Further, the defense expert had an interest that the prosecution witness did not, in that about three-quarters of his income was derived from testifying for the defense in child abuse cases.) Even assuming that the prosecution's expert could have cited to professional literature supporting his opinion and explained why he did not accept the contrary studies discussed by the defense expert, "the very act of requiring him to do so would communicate to the trial court that his opinion was the subject of debate in the medical community. Defense counsel's failure to even suggest that this debate existed was unprofessional error and, taken with the trial court's reliance on [the expert's] unchallenged opinion to find [defendant] guilty, was prejudicial to [defendant]."

State v. Hannah*, 256 A.3d 1035 (N.J. 2021). In case involving the robbery-murder of two drug dealers where defense was that third party Thomas committed the offense with co-defendant LaCue who, after receiving a favorable deal, testified against petitioner, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence linking Thomas to one of the victims and failing to gain admission of testimony by Thomas's mother about inculpatory statements Thomas made to her as well as her observations of Thomas's involvement in drug activities seemingly linked to the murdered drug dealers. (Defense counsel had unsuccessfully sought to admit Thomas's mother's testimony under an erroneous theory of admissibility.) Although this case had a tortuous procedural history that created potential impediments to consideration of the ineffective assistance of counsel claim, state law allowed review in order to rectify a fundamental injustice. There was a factual finding below that counsel was in possession of a police report recounting that investigators found a pager number on a bloody piece of paper in the pocket of victim Salazar, and that when they dialed that pager number just hours after the discovery of the drug dealers' bodies, Thomas returned the call. This information "buttressed [petitioner's] testimony that Thomas was the killer, and it was the pathway toward the admission of Thomas's mother's testimony implicating her son." In addition, the information refuted the prosecutor's remarks during summation that there was "not a stitch, a scintilla, a scintilla, a bit, an ounce, a piece of evidence, that links [Thomas] ... to that murder." The failure of defense counsel to call the officer who wrote the report as a witness cannot be ascribed to a reasonable defense strategy. Also deficient was defense counsel's failure to argue that statements made by Thomas to his mother were admissible as statements against interest. "[T]he failure to point out to the court the applicable rule to support the admission of critical evidence — cannot be ascribed to trial strategy." (The statements made by Thomas to his mother included: (1) on the morning that the police found the bodies of the two drug dealers, Thomas told his mother that he "had beeped the two drug suppliers" and "made arrangements" with them to bring drugs, and that "[h]e was afraid that his number was going to be found in [their] car"; (2) Thomas had earlier schemed to rob petitioner of drugs and money and that he feared petitioner would "find out about it"; (3) Thomas had to get "rid of" petitioner, "to get [petitioner] off his back," and "to have [petitioner] take the weight for the one of the murders that was committed"; (4) Thomas "wanted the police to get [petitioner]," and "that he was setting him up" and he encouraged petitioner to flee; and (5) "he had to find LaCue" and "get a package [of drugs] from him." Additionally, Thomas's mother overheard her son tell his girlfriend, "they had to move [drugs called Gotta Have It] out fast" because "[t]his is what the police was looking for." (The prosecutor's file confirmed that the dead drug suppliers had been peddling a brand of heroin of the same name.) In an earlier decision, the appellate court erred in finding that the statements against interest exception to the hearsay rule had not been met. The prejudice analysis here did not ignore the fact "that counsel's errors were magnified by mistakes made by the trial court and the prosecutor — and perpetuated through various rounds of PCR proceedings." The relative weakness of the case against petitioner was also considered, particularly the credibility issues surrounding co-defendant LaCue who had testified pursuant to a plea agreement that resulted in the dismissal of the murder charges against him, despite his central role in the double homicide, who had possession of the murder weapons and turned them over to the Prosecutor's Office, who gave investigators multiple conflicting statements before he named petitioner as the second shooter, and whose account of petitioner's actions was inconsistent with some of the forensic evidence. Additional elements of the prosecution's case against petitioner were subject to challenge. The evidence that the jury did not hear "lay at the heart of [petitioner's] right to present a complete defense, and indeed, its admission was necessary to ensure the basic fairness of his trial. We conclude that the combined errors in this case constitute a fundamental injustice that denied [petitioner] a fair trial. But for counsel's errors — combined with those made by the trial court and prosecutor — there is a reasonable probability that, had the jury heard the withheld evidence, the outcome of the trial would have been different."

Capital Case*

Commonwealth v. Orner*, 251 A.3d 819 (Pa. Super. 2021). In case involving charges of sexual crimes including rape, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to secure the testimony of a witness who would have supported petitioner's defense that the sexual encounter with the complainant was consensual and also provided a motive for the complainant to have fabricated the charges. On appeal from the lower court's grant of relief, the Commonwealth challenged only the finding of prejudice. The Commonwealth pointed to discrepancies between petitioner's account of what happened on the evening at issue, as well as other witnesses, and that of the witness who trial counsel failed to call. "While the Commonwealth's arguments may have identified minor inconsistencies in [the missing witness's] averments as to ancillary details of the evening in question, these concerns do not undermine the central thesis of her testimony, i.e., that the sexual contact between [petitioner] and [the complainant] was consensual and that her assault accusation was falsified."

Metz v. State*, 2021 WL 58197 (Tenn. Crim. App. Jan. 7, 2021). Defense counsel was ineffective in numerous respects in his defense of petitioner on charges involving the murder of her twenty-three month-old son. Petitioner's co-defendant was her husband, the victim's step-father. He had been charged with murdering and sexually assaulting the victim some three years before charges were brought against petitioner. Petitioner's defense was that the fatal blunt force injuries to the victim occurred during the time petitioner was on a shopping trip and her husband was alone with the child. A radiologist who reviewed a scan of the victim estimated, however, that the injuries could have been inflicted prior to petitioner leaving the home. The prosecution also presented testimony concerning petitioner's alleged flat affect and unusual behavior during the time her son was being treated prior to his death. Among the many deficiencies in trial counsel's performance was his failure to investigate the co-defendant's military record. Trial counsel was aware that the co-defendant had been in the military, and petitioner had even asked trial counsel if he was going to get any military records prior to trial. Additionally, at the post-conviction proceeding, petitioner's "Strickland" expert (i.e., an experienced criminal defense attorney with expertise on the prevailing standard of care) testified that crime scene photographs released in discovery showed the co-defendant's prescription bottles for medicines treating "psychopathic-type conditions." These bottles "were a huge red flag" that would have led a competent attorney to investigate the co-defendant's mental health, which would have led to the military records. Trial counsel had also received information about inappropriate or deviant sexual behavior by the co-defendant. Thus, "[t]rial counsel had ample evidence that [the co-defendant] had mental health issues warranting investigation." Had trial counsel obtained the military records, they would have revealed evidence of the co-defendant's anger and suicidal and homicidal ideations which could have assisted petitioner in her defense theory that it was the co-defendant who inflicted the fatal injuries. In and of themselves, however, the records did not create a reasonable probability of a more favorable verdict. Also deficient was trial counsel's failure to obtain petitioner's mental health records to counter the theory that petitioner's demeanor evidenced her culpability. During his few interviews with petitioner, defense counsel observed that petitioner had a flat affect and was unemotional when discussing the case. Importantly, he also had a letter from a mental health professional indicating petitioner had significant mental health issues and had been through treatment with "therapists and doctors." Although the post-conviction court found no evidence that petitioner herself had informed trial counsel of her mental health issues, "trial counsel's duty to investigate remained in light of the information he did have.” And regarding trial counsel’s claim that the prosecution’s use of petitioner’s unemotional demeanor as evidence of her guilt came “out of the blue,” counsel would have anticipated that strategy had he spoken to the prosecution witnesses prior to trial. Had trial counsel properly investigated petitioner’s mental health problems, he would have discovered that, following the victim’s death, petitioner was involuntarily committed for a suicide attempt and was diagnosed with PTSD, depression, anxiety disorder, panic attacks, dependent personality disorder, and dissociative disorder. Expert testimony was presented at the post-conviction proceeding tying petitioner’s “flat affect” to traumatic events. Such testimony would have directly contradicted the arguments of both the prosecutor and the co-defendant’s counsel that petitioner’s affect and comments were evidence of her guilt. “Because the evidence against Petitioner was not overwhelming, and because Petitioner’s mental health evidence would have answered serious questions regarding her demeanor, we conclude that there was a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different had trial counsel investigated Petitioner’s mental health.” Although a medical record was presented at trial that included a notation that petitioner was “grieving appropriately,” this did not preclude a finding of prejudice, “where the admitted medical record did not specifically explain the unusual observations of other trial witnesses, and where trial counsel did not even interview or call as a witness the author of that medical record.” Another deficiency by trial counsel was his failure to interview and present character witnesses to attest to petitioner’s behavior as a loving and nurturing mother to the victim prior to moving to Tennessee with the co-defendant. (Four of the five character witnesses who testified in the post-conviction proceeding had contacted trial counsel and affirmatively requested to be called as defense witnesses.) Trial counsel’s explanation for the omission --- he did not believe that the character witnesses were relevant and feared that presenting character witnesses for petitioner would have “offended” the jury – was “wholly unreasonable.” No legitimate strategic reason could be found for ignoring important evidence that was handed to him. Prejudice is established from the failure to present the testimony of the character witnesses who contacted trial counsel before trial because the “[s]ignificant evidence of [petitioner’s] long history of good character as a loving, nurturing, attentive mother had a reasonable probability of changing the outcome.” Finally, petitioner is entitled to relief based on the cumulative impact of trial counsel’s deficiencies.

[H]ad the jury been apprised of Petitioner’s mental health issues, including her dissociative disorder; Co-Defendant’s mental health issues, including his suicidal and homicidal ideations; and the numerous character witnesses who testified to how attentive and loving a mother Petitioner was, we believe there is a reasonable probability the outcome of the proceeding would have been different. Thus, we conclude that the accumulation of a myriad of errors prejudiced Petitioner, requiring reversal based on cumulative error.

Weldon v. State*, 870 S.E.2d 183 (S.C. App. 2021). In case where petitioner was convicted of first-degree burglary, armed robbery, grand larceny, kidnapping, and possession of weapon during commission of violent crime, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to present an alibi defense. The key evidence against petitioner was expert testimony that he was a major contributor to a mixed DNA sample taken off a piece of duct tape that had been wrapped around the victim’s head.

Capital Case*

Petitioner was jointly tried with a co-defendant whose fingerprint was found in the victim's stolen vehicle. Although petitioner had denied knowing the co-defendant, it was discovered they had worked in the same wood shop for a few days at the South Carolina Vocational Rehabilitation Center. Prior to trial, petitioner informed defense counsel that he had been at home with his girlfriend, sister, and, later, his mother, around the time of the offense. Trial counsel spoke with petitioner's mother and sister about petitioner's whereabouts and filed a Notice of Alibi. He did not call either witness at trial, however, and relied on an argument that the DNA could have been deposited on the outside of the tape at an unknown time and not during the course of the crime. In post-conviction relief (PCR) proceedings, petitioner's mother and sister testified to petitioner's presence at home with them around the time of the offense, although the mother's account differed from what petitioner had reported to counsel. In denying relief, the PCR court found that even though trial counsel did not recall his specific reasoning for choosing not to call the alibi witnesses, a reasonable strategy could be inferred, i.e., that he did not want conflicting witnesses and thus chose to attack the DNA evidence instead. Trial counsel did offer agreement with some of the strategic suggestions offered by the State in its questioning of trial counsel's decision-making. Nevertheless, trial counsel repeatedly testified he did not know why he chose not to call the witnesses. "Thus, we can find no support in the record for the PCR court's finding that because trial counsel 'articulated, both at the PCR hearing and at the time of trial, a strategic reason for choosing not to call alibi witnesses, his performance cannot be found ineffective.'" And while it was true that there were "minor discrepancies" among the witnesses' testimonies concerning the critical time period, "these discrepancies did not involve credibility issues nor were they necessarily contradictory." Notably, the sister's testimony provided a clear alibi. On this record, the court could "conceive of no valid trial strategy supporting trial counsel's failure to call at least one of the alibi witnesses." As to prejudice, the presence of petitioner's DNA on a single piece of duct tape recovered from the victim did not constitute "overwhelming evidence" such that it precluded a finding of prejudice. "Had even one of Petitioner's alibi witnesses testified, there is a reasonable probability the result at trial would have been different."

2020: *State v. Petric, 333 So.3d 1063 (Ala.Crim.App. 2020) (2009 trial). In case involving the 1990 rape-murder of victim Lim where 2006 DNA testing linked petitioner to the crime, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present a theory of the case, and to adequately investigate and present evidence concerning a 1994 murder in Illinois that the State was permitted to use as bad act evidence even though petitioner had been acquitted of the murder. At trial, defense counsel asserted in opening argument that petitioner and the Alabama victim had consensual sex and that the actual killer was a third party, Hammonds, who had committed a similar murder in Dothan some six months earlier. The post-conviction court's finding that trial counsel failed to promptly hire an investigator after obtaining funding from the trial court was not clearly erroneous. The record supported a finding that it was at least one year after the trial court approved the funding request, and some seven months prior to trial, that the investigator commenced work on the case. The post-conviction court did not err in finding that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate the earlier Dothan murder. Trial counsel had intended to show the similarities between the Dothan murder and the Lim murder through testimony from the lead investigator of the Dothan case at the time it was solved, six years after the killing had occurred. That detective, however, had no firsthand knowledge of the original investigation. Trial counsel's failure to at least have a conversation with the detective earlier in the case left trial counsel ignorant of the limitations in the witness's knowledge at the time trial counsel promised the jury evidence linking Hammonds to the Lim murder. Trial counsel had no reasonable strategic basis for his failure to request the police file concerning the prior murder, something the State did when it learned that the defense intended to implicate Hammond in the Lim murder. By the time the State obtained the file and provided it to defense counsel, there was insufficient time to pursue any leads contained in the file. Regarding a semen stain on a blanket at the Lim homicide that was found by Cellmark testing to match an unknown male, trial counsel simply stipulated to admission of the Cellmark report rather than making any attempt to determine whether the stain came from Hammonds. The State, in contrast, after learning of the defense theory, arranged for a comparison of Hammonds's DNA (a profile of which was contained in the Dothan police file) and the unknown semen stain and discovered that the unknown stain was not from Hammonds. When provided this information after the close of the State's evidence, trial counsel chose not to call the detective from the earlier murder or any other witness. During closing argument, Hammonds was not mentioned by trial counsel at all. The post-conviction court's finding of ineffective assistance of counsel on this record was not clearly erroneous given that trial counsel's investigative failures resulted in abandonment of the defense promised to the jury during opening argument which was prejudicial to petitioner. Regarding the Illinois murder, defense counsel failed to adequately investigate and present the bulk of the evidence used by Illinois trial counsel to obtain a non-guilty verdict for the murder charge. Although evidence was presented that petitioner was acquitted of the Illinois murder, despite being convicted of robbing the victim, the failure to present the "plethora" of available evidence left the jury "to conclude that the state's evidence against [petitioner] in the [Illinois] murder was uncontested."

In re Long*, 476 P.3d 662 (Cal. 2020). Where petitioner was convicted in 2005 of the second degree murder of her boyfriend at a retrial held after the first jury hung 9-3 in favor of acquittal, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate the victim's time of death. The victim had been killed at the home he shared with petitioner. The cause of death was blunt force injuries to his head. At trial, the prosecution relied primarily on the preliminary hearing testimony of a deceased witness, Dills, to establish a timeline of the killing. According to Dills, he dropped petitioner off at the home she shared with the victim at approximately 1:20 or 1:25 a.m. Dills then returned to his own home where he recalled seeing his alarm clock by his bedside at 1:36 a.m. Petitioner disputed this account, testifying that she was dropped off by Dills around 2:00 a.m. at which time she discovered her boyfriend had been attacked and called 911. The prosecutor argued that petitioner arrived home around 1:20 a.m., killed her boyfriend, disposed of the murder weapon, and cleaned herself and the scene before calling 911 at 2:09 a.m. Notably, no physical or other direct evidence connected petitioner to the murder. Prior to trial, defense counsel consulted an accident reconstruction expert on the issue of whether petitioner was capable of causing the victim's injuries. At the habeas hearing, defense counsel claimed that this expert, who had no medical degree or experience in pathology, had revealed to counsel that he also was a time-of-death expert. Although defense counsel spoke with the expert about the time-of-death issue, counsel did not recall whether this expert had viewed the paramedics' or coroner's reports or what was said by the parties. Defense counsel explained that at the time of trial, he was of the belief that no medical expert could offer a time of death that excluded the prosecution's theory of petitioner's window of opportunity for committing the crime. He conceded, however, that if the case were tried at the time of the habeas hearing, he would seek the opinion of an experienced pathologist. Concurring in the opinion of petitioner's Strickland expert, the habeas judge found that the accident reconstructionist was not qualified to provide an expert opinion on time of death, a finding that was supported by substantial evidence. Further, because time of death was of particular importance in this case, trial counsel had a duty to investigate the issue. "[A] competent attorney would have sought the opinion of a time of death expert on what the observations of lividity and rigor mortis in the paramedics' and coroner's reports implied for [the victim's] time of death. At the time of [petitioner's] trials, such observations had long been recognized in forensics literature and case law as indicators capable of informing time of death estimates." As for defense counsel's assumption that an expert could not sufficiently narrow the time of death to exclude the prosecution's theory, defense counsel could recount no training or educational experience that led to this belief. And the defense theory of third party culpability that was presented did not justify the failure to investigate the victim's time of death. An expert opinion that the victim likely died before 1:20 a.m. would have tended to bolster petitioner's defense that another party committed the crime. Further, there was "no reason why competent counsel would not have at least inquired. . . . Without such investigation, [trial counsel] was not in a position to make a reasonable decision as to which defense or defenses to focus on at trial." As for what could have been presented, the habeas court found that "qualified medical opinions" concluding that the victim's death occurred significantly earlier than 1:20 a.m. "were available at the time of trial" in 2005. That the chief forensic pathologist of the Riverside County Sheriff-Coroner's Office testified for the State at the habeas proceeding and opined that the time of death was "as likely" before 1:20 a.m. as after was not dispositive of the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Although the jury, presented with the conflicting expert testimony, could have credited the State's expert, the record established a reasonable probability that a competent attorney would nevertheless have presented the time of death evidence at trial. Even if rejected by the jury, the expert opinion offered in the habeas proceeding was "of enough substance as to pose no serious risk of compromising the overall credibility of the defense." Regarding prejudice, it is established because petitioner's experts could have raised a reasonable doubt about petitioner's guilt. Although there was circumstantial evidence of motive and opportunity implicating petitioner, "the prosecutor offered no confession, no eyewitnesses, no murder weapon identified or recovered, and no bloody clothes or other physical or forensic evidence linking [petitioner] to the crime. Furthermore, the alibis of the other suspects . . . were only weakly corroborated, if at all." On this record, "it is reasonably probable that the presentation of expert testimony as to [the victim's] time of death, along the lines of [the habeas experts's] testimony, would have led one or more jurors to harbor reasonable doubt about [petitioner's] guilt."

Balbirnie v. State*, 468 P.3d 334 (Kansas 2020). In murder case where defendant consistently maintained his innocence, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to admit into evidence a recording of a 911 call in which the caller identified someone other than defendant as the person who stabbed the victim. The victim was stabbed to death in the apartment of Tarissa Brown and Phillip Wallace. Defendant was present at the scene, along with the victim and Brandon Ellsmore. Wallace and Ellsmore admitted to verbally and physically fighting with the victim just before his death. Wallace denied using a weapon. Both Wallace and Ellsmore provided inconsistent account of the events but each placed the victim's death at the hands of defendant. The 911 call was from Brown. In it, she identified Wallace as her fiancé and she later could be heard saying that her fiancé stabbed the victim. Trial counsel admitted at the post-trial hearing that his failure to admit the 911 call was not the result of strategy. Rather, trial counsel had assumed it would be introduced by the prosecution and was not prepared to introduce it himself when he realized the prosecution would not offer it. The failure to admit the evidence, which supported the defense theory and impeached the testimony of other witnesses, fell below an objective standard for reasonably effective representation. Review of the record established prejudice from counsel's omission given: (1) the evidence supporting the verdict was conflicting, and a jury could question the veracity of some or parts of each eyewitness' testimony; (2) although the 911 call did not establish that Wallace inflicted the killing stab, it raised questions about the credibility of those who attributed the stab to defendant; (3) the emotional nature of the call did not obscure its highly probative value; and (4) the other evidence, forensic and statements by defendant, did not remove the potential for a reasonable doubt about defendant's guilt.

In re Gay*, 457 P.3d 502 (Cal. 2020) (1985 trial and sentencing). In case involving the killing of a police officer where petitioner was sentenced to death but previously received habeas relief for the death penalty based on ineffective assistance of trial counsel, habeas relief is granted here for the murder conviction, also due to trial counsel's ineffective assistance. The present claim was raised in a successor state habeas petition. The victim was shot and killed after he pulled over the vehicle driven by co-defendant Cummings's wife for a traffic stop. Also in the vehicle were Cummings and petitioner. Unbeknownst to the officer, the car was stolen and petitioner and Cummings had recently committed a string of robberies. The prosecution's theory was that Cummings fired the initial shot at the victim, handed the gun to petitioner, and petitioner was responsible for the remaining shots. Both petitioner and Cummings claimed that the other was the sole shooter. (The two men were tried together in front of separate juries.) At trial, defense counsel relied largely on the prosecution's witnesses, who collectively provided only limited help to the theory of the defense. The first identified deficiency by trial counsel was his advice to petitioner to confess to the string of robberies committed by the two men. Trial counsel hoped that the admissions would lead to a plea offer and falsely informed petitioner that the statements could not be used against petitioner if no plea agreement was ultimately reached. The confessions allowed petitioner's own words to be used by the prosecution to establish that petitioner and Cummings were crime partners, and that each had an equal motive to avoid capture and arrest by a police officer, and thus equal motive to shoot the victim. Trial counsel also was deficient in failing to conduct a timely investigation into eyewitness testimony as required by prevailing norms evidenced by the 1982 ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, as well as a contemporary treatise, Anthony Amsterdam's Trial Manual for the Defense of Criminal Cases. Rather than pursue leads from police reports and grand jury testimony, counsel sent his investigator to canvas the area near the murder scene some 19 months after the shooting when jury selection was well underway, and opening statements were only a month away. Had counsel conducted a reasonable investigation, he would have discovered two eyewitnesses whose descriptions of the shooter matched Cummings -- an eight-year-old boy and his fourteen-year-old sister. Although there were legitimate reasons why an attorney might have hesitated to call the boy as a witness -- his young age, his anxiety, and the reluctance of his parents regarding his involvement -- it was unreasonable to have failed to even interview him. And, given the importance of eyewitness testimony in this case and the fact that the prosecution also relied in part on testimony from children who had observed the incident, "there is a reasonable probability that competent counsel, having conducted an adequate investigation, would have presented [the boy's] testimony to bolster [petitioner's] case that Cummings was the lone shooter. The uninformed failure to call [the boy] was deficient . . .” Regarding the fourteen-year-old girl, there were also legitimate reasons a competent attorney might have chosen to forgo her testimony -- “her emotional state was heightened by the fact that she was pregnant at the time” and “her contemporaneous description of the shooting contained several discrepancies when compared with the testimony of other witnesses that might have been fodder for impeachment on cross-examination.” Notably, however, inconsistencies did not prevent the prosecution from relying on the testimony of eyewitnesses (even children), or the jury from crediting such testimony. On this record, there is a reasonable probability competent counsel would have called the girl as a defense witness. Trial counsel also performed deficiently in failing to call a sheriff’s deputy about statements made by Cummings in jail that the deputy interpreted as an admission that Cummings alone shot the victim. Such testimony was not merely cumulative of testimony by two other deputies who were called at trial as this was a separate admission and one of the other two statements the jury heard referenced “we” regarding the second round of shots and was therefore not clearly implicating only Cummings as the shooter. Trial counsel was additionally deficient in failing to discover another deputy who Cummings made admissions to. Although the supervising sergeant who was told of the admissions declined to take a formal report in light of similar comments made by Cummings to other jail personnel, a reasonable investigation would have resulted in counsel’s discovery of the incriminating exchange. “Through discovery, [trial counsel] was aware of evidence that Cummings freely confessed to the shooting. The professionally appropriate response to this information would have been to contact each peace officer mentioned as having had contact with Cummings—including [the supervising sergeant]—to ask about any confessions they had witnessed or knew of and to solicit evidence that Cummings, alone, killed [the victim].” In assessing prejudice, counsel’s failures were considered in the broader context of “an attorney-client relationship poisoned at its root by fraud.” (Trial counsel had lied to petitioner and to the court in order to secure appointment in the case.) Additionally, during defense counsel’s representation of petitioner, counsel was subject to an open embezzlement investigation by the same district attorney’s office that was prosecuting petitioner. There was no record that this was disclosed to either petitioner or the trial court. Collectively, “the circumstances surrounding [trial counsel’s] representation of [petitioner] reinforce [the] conclusion that [petitioner] did not receive the benefit of the assistance of competent counsel loyal foremost to his interests.” Considered together, trial counsel’s many failings critically undermine faith in the jury’s guilt phase verdict. The evidence identifying petitioner as a robbery partner with Cummings was not strong absent petitioner’s confession, a confession that became the centerpiece of the prosecution’s argument that petitioner also shot the victim and that the killing was premeditated. Although petitioner had additional reasons to escape law enforcement detection that the prosecutor could have used, “the argument would have been considerably weaker had [petitioner] not confessed to his role in the lengthy series of armed robberies of which the jury would later convict him. It is unsurprising, then, that the prosecution chose to place principal reliance on [petitioner’s] admission to committing the series of charged robberies with Cummings as the basis for its theory that [petitioner] and Cummings agreed to shoot their way out rather than allow themselves to be captured.” The testimony from the two children identifying Cummings as the shooter would not only have directly supported the defense theory, but also helped to explain why other eyewitnesses mistakenly believed petitioner shot the victim. (The children saw the car return to the scene after the shooting and observed the other man –petitioner, by inference–retrieve the gun left by the victim.) As for the two deputy sheriff’s officers, “[t]he testimony of peace officers to confessions that implicated Cummings and exonerated [petitioner] in the murder of a police officer is among the most compelling evidence [trial counsel] could have had at his disposal, had he only investigated and developed it.”

People v. Zaheer*, 268 Cal.Rptr.3d 548 (Cal.App. 2020). In sexual battery by restraint retrial following a vote of 11-1 for acquittal on the felony charges at the initial trial, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to establish where the incident actually occurred in order to undermine the victim’s account of the offense and, therefore, her credibility. In both trials, the victim testified in some detail about how defendant locked her inside the car by pressing a button on the driver’s side door. The defense responded to this testimony by presenting evidence that the electronic locking mechanism in defendant’s car had not worked in years. In the second trial, however, defense counsel failed to establish the necessary predicate fact that the victim was in defendant’s car on the night in question. Seizing on this omission, the prosecution suggested in closing argument that defendant may have been driving a company car on the night in question. Deficient performance is established by defense counsel’s “own statements in conjunction with his mistrial and new trial motions that there was no tactical basis for his failure to provide the second jury with evidence establishing that [defendant] was driving his own car on the night in question.” But even without such a concession, “the architecture of the defense case demonstrates that a reasonable lawyer would not have overlooked the issue.” A finding of prejudice is compelled by the votes in the first trial and readbacks in the second. “Given the number of jurors who seemingly disbelieved [the victim] in the first trial, coupled with indicators that her credibility was also debated by the second jury, there is a reasonable chance that at least one juror relied on the prospect of a different car to reconcile his or her doubts about the reliability of [the victim’s] testimony. And while the door lock discrepancy was not the only evidence casting doubt on [the victim’s] credibility, we need not be certain it was the dispositive issue; we need only find there is a reasonable possibility that it swayed at least one juror.”

Tumlin v. State*, 847 S.E.2d 637 (Ga. App. 2020). In child molestation case where defendant was charged with molesting his five-year-old daughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to subpoena a copy of the Dr. Phil television episode about child sexual abuse committed by a father that defendant testified his daughter was watching with her mother a few days before the molestation allegation was leveled against him. Defendant testified that shortly before the accusation, he had arrived home from work and noticed that his wife and the victim were watching Dr. Phil. When he realized what the subject was, he asked his wife if she realized the victim was watching with her. His wife replied negatively and asked the victim to leave the room. Defendant then told his wife that he could not believe she allowed the victim to watch the program given its graphic nature. During the direct examination, defense counsel’s inartful questioning suggested that counsel believed the account was contrived. Defendant’s wife testified that she could not recall watching such a show. Because this case was essentially a credibility contest, trial counsel’s failure to subpoena evidence that would corroborate defendant’s testimony constituted deficient performance. As for prejudice, at trial the victim had no recollection of who her father was, let alone the allegations leading to his arrest. While the State did introduce the child’s forensic interview and testimony from her therapist, its case rested in large part on the testimony of the victim’s mother, who was the initial outcry witness. A reasonable probability exists that the videotape of the episode could have impeached the mother's credibility and corroborated defendant's testimony and its introduction would have affected the result of the trial.

State v. Lane*, 838 S.E.2d 808 (Ga. 2020). In murder-for-hire case where defendant hired the killer (who shot the wrong individual) and the accomplice/actual killer testified against defendant, trial counsel performed deficiently in: (1) failing to cross-examine the lead investigator with evidence that he testified falsely when he claimed that a witness confirmed certain statements made by the testifying accomplice; and (2) failing to object to hearsay and bolstering testimony by the lead investigator, regarding both his unnamed sources and statements by the accomplice. “[N]either trial counsel nor the State offered any reason, let alone an objectively reasonable one, for counsel’s failure to cross-examine [the lead investigator] with evidence that one of the State’s primary witnesses testified falsely on a significant point.” Similarly, no justification was offered for the second failing and that failure to object was unreasonable. In assessing prejudice, the two deficiencies are considered along with an error by the trial court in admitting hearsay testimony about statements made by the accomplice. Notably, the properly admitted evidence corroborating the accomplice was all circumstantial. In contrast, the erroneously admitted hearsay testimony “was clear, powerful, direct evidence confirming [the accomplice’s] basic account that [defendant] agreed to pay him thousands of dollars to kill someone but ultimately did not pay up because [the accomplice] shot the wrong person.” And because of trial counsel’s deficient performance, “the jury also heard [the lead investigator’s] testimony that he had confirmed certain details about the crime, including that the shooting was a murder for hire, from unnamed sources.” Also due to counsel’s deficient performance, the [lead investigator’s] false testimony that [the accomplice’s] now-deceased cousin confirmed that [defendant] initially tried to hire him to kill [the actual target] went unchallenged.” The cumulative effect of the errors establishes a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s deficient performance, the result of the trial would have been different.

Spurgeon v. State*, 298 So.3d 726 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). In manslaughter case where the only issue was whether the cerebral edema that caused the child victim’s death was the result of illness or injury, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present expert testimony to rebut the State’s theory as to the cause of the swelling in the victim’s brain. The petitioner was a licensed childcare provider. The victim, a one-year-old, had been in petitioner’s care for the day. The victim was asleep when picked up by her grandmother. When they arrived home, the grandmother found the victim to be unresponsive and realized that she had vomited. The victim was taken to the hospital where it was discovered that she had cerebral edema as well as subdural hematoma. The treating physicians also discovered that the victim had been having seizures and that she had bilateral retinal hemorrhages and elevated blood sugar levels. The victim died a week later when her family removed her from life support. The State’s initial theory was that this was a case of shaken baby syndrome. At trial, however, the State theorized that the victim’s injuries resulted from her being thrown repeatedly against a soft surface, like a mattress. This repetitive-soft-impact theory was supported by the testimony of several of the State’s medical experts, including Dr. Smith, a board certified child abuse pediatrician, and Dr. Thogmartin, the medical examiner. The defense strategy was to suggest that a metabolic disorder had caused the cerebral edema and subdural hematoma, and that the subdural hematoma predated petitioner’s care of the victim. Among the experts called by the defense was a biomechanics expert whose testimony focused on establishing that it was not possible to produce the amount of force necessary to cause the damage to the victim's brain by shaking, despite the fact that the State was not proceeding with such a theory. At the close of his testimony, the expert was asked about "shaking and impact on a soft surface," to which he briefly opined that impact on a soft surface would not have caused the injuries. On cross-examination, however, the expert conceded that while it would have been possible to conduct the necessary calculations to support his testimony regarding the soft-impact theory, he had not measured the amount of force required to injure a child of the victim's size by repeatedly throwing her head into a soft object. The defense expert's opinion on the soft-impact theory was not even mentioned by trial counsel during closing argument. At the post-conviction hearing, the biomechanics expert testified that trial counsel had told him prior to trial that this was a case of shaken baby syndrome, so he had only performed calculations related to that theory. He explained that after conducting soft-impact calculations posttrial and reviewing the relevant literature, it was apparent that the soft-impact theory of injury was physically impossible. A second biomechanics expert concurred. Trial counsel testified that he had felt it unnecessary to rebut the State's soft-impact theory because, in his opinion, there was no medical or factual support for it. Notably, however, he made no such argument to the jury. Moreover, the testimony regarding the soft-impact theory came from medical experts. And despite trial counsel's belief that there was no medical support for the State's theory, he did not challenge Dr. Smith or the other medical experts on the theory and only asked the State's experts whether they could state with 100% certainty what had happened to the victim. On this record, trial counsel was deficient in failing to present expert testimony that the State's soft-impact theory was not feasible and instead presenting expert testimony to rebut a theory not even relied on by the State. "Trial counsel's failure to adequately investigate and present evidence refuting the actual theory presented by the State undermines confidence in the outcome of this case. The testimony of a biomechanics expert regarding the infeasibility of the soft-impact theory could have created reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors."

People v. Shepard*, 177 N.E.3d 1085 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Where defendant was convicted of unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a necessity defense. Defendant admitted that her purse contained a gun at the time she was arrested, and that she was aware of its presence in her purse, but claimed that an unknown person had placed the weapon there when she left the group she was socializing with to use a nearby restroom. Upon seeing the gun, she was afraid to remove it because placing her fingerprints on it could implicate her in its ownership. When police arrived in response to a tip about the gun, defendant dropped her purse on the ground. A necessity defense has three basic elements: (i) defendant must be "without blame in occasioning or developing the situation" leading to criminal conduct, (ii) defendant must reasonably believe that his or her conduct was necessary to avoid a public or private injury, and (iii) the public or private injury must be greater than the injury caused by the defendant's own conduct. Defendant's testimony was sufficient for raising the defense and there was a reasonable probability of a more favorable result had trial counsel performed effectively.

People v. Othman*, 177 N.E.3d 353 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). In murder case, new trial granted due to the cumulative prejudice from multiple errors, including trial counsel's failure to object to hearsay testimony from the victim's girlfriend that she had heard from friends in the neighborhood that defendant killed the victim. The failure to object “cannot be viewed as a strategic decision under any reasonable circumstance and was prejudicial.”

City of Cleveland v. Holley*, 153 N.E.3d 685 (Ohio App. 2020). In misdemeanor assault case where defendant was convicted at a bench trial, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to introduce text messages between defendant and the victim that supported defendant’s claim that the victim was the initial aggressor, and that defendant was defending herself. When the text messages were presented to the trial court at sentencing, the court observed that it was too bad the text messages were not included at trial but would leave it for the Court of Appeals to decide. The trial court’s statements and the text messages “demonstrate that had [defendant’s] trial counsel introduced the text messages as evidence, the result of the proceeding could have been different.”

In re Ross*, 951 N.W.2d 330 (Mich. 2020). In sexual assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to further investigate and substantiate Ross’s claim that the complainant allowed Ross to use her cellular phone to call his mother after the alleged sexual assault occurred. Although counsel explained at the evidentiary hearing that the phone records initially provided to him by Ross’s mother did not identically match the details of Ross’s account, “counsel was put on notice to investigate the matter further through [Ross’s] assertions regarding the phone calls, [Ross’s] mother’s assertions regarding the phone calls, and the phone records that were received before trial that demonstrated that [Ross’s] mother called the complainant three times on the afternoon in question. Further investigation would have revealed, as it did during the evidentiary hearing, that a call was made from the complainant’s phone to [Ross’s] mother’s phone, prompting the three calls in return.” Because the trial was essentially a credibility contest, “counsel’s failure to investigate an issue that would have bolstered [Ross’s] credibility and revealed an inconsistency in the complainant’s narrative was not—as the Court of Appeals erroneously determined—a strategic decision, but instead a fundamental abdication of his duty to conduct a complete investigation. Had counsel investigated further and the phone call evidence been admitted at trial, it is probable that the result of the proceeding would have been different.”

Rowland v. State*, 605 S.W.3d 125 (Mo. App. 2020). Affirming the grant of post-conviction relief in rape and sodomy case where petitioner claimed the sexual acts were consensual and trial counsel failed to call a witness who could have supported the defense theory. The alleged sexual assault occurred when the complainant, an employee of a property management company, was providing petitioner a tour of a rental property. After the incident, the two left the property together to return to the complainant’s office. During the short drive, petitioner received a phone call from a nurse. Petitioner provided the name of the nurse to defense counsel but defense counsel failed to call her as a witness. She could have testified, as she did at the post-conviction hearing, that she overheard a woman laughing in the background during the call which would have been consistent with petitioner’s description of the complainant’s demeanor after the sexual encounter and contradicted the complainant’s testimony. In finding that trial counsel’s performance was deficient, it was noted that the first jury was unable to reach a verdict, showing that the credibility of the two parties was critical. While defense counsel did attempt to subpoena the nurse for the retrial, he waited until one day before the trial even though he had known of the witness’s existence for three months. Because of this delayed attempt to secure the nurse as a witness, she did not receive the subpoena in time. In concluding that petitioner was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance, the motions court noted that whether the complainant had in fact consented was the key issue, as evidenced by a note from the jury expressly stating that the jurors were initially divided 8-4 over this issue.

People v. Lakhani*, 70 Misc.3d 55 (N.Y. App. Term 2nd Dept. 2020). In prosecution involving a charge of sexually abusing a child, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) bringing out during cross-examination of the prosecution's rebuttal expert witness testimony that effectively bolstered the complainant's testimony; and (2) failing to object to questioning and comment by the prosecutor that served to shift the burden of proof. Prejudice is found irrespective of the proper jury instruction on the burden of proof.

2019: Ex Parte Gissendanner*, 288 So.3d 1011 (Ala. 2019) (2003 trial and sentencing). In capital case where petitioner was convicted of murder during the course of the kidnapping and robbery of the victim, as well as forging a check taken from the victim, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to conduct a sufficient investigation into the charges. The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals applied the wrong standard of review to the disputed facts and failed to give considerable weight to the finding of prejudicial ineffective assistance of counsel by the original trial judge who also presided over the post-conviction proceedings. The prosecution's theory of the case was that petitioner assaulted the victim in her carport, transported her in the trunk of her own car, disposed of her body in a ditch, and covered the body with tree limbs. He then drove around in her car before abandoning it and cashed a forged check from her account. The defense theory was that petitioner was elsewhere at the time the prosecution asserted the murder was committed. According to the defense, petitioner had rented the victim's car from a man named Buster he saw early in the morning after the victim was killed. Buster was looking to buy drugs. Buster gave petitioner a check on the victim's account, asked petitioner to cash it (which petitioner did), and told petitioner that he would use the proceeds to buy drugs from petitioner. In post-conviction proceedings, the trial/post-conviction relief judge found trial counsel deficient for failing to adequately investigate the evidence against petitioner as well as his alibi defense. Inadequacies included: (1) failing to investigate the fingerprint evidence and educate the jury about the absence of any fingerprints from the crime scene tying petitioner to the victim; (2) failing to investigate and counter testimony placing petitioner in the victim's car in the vicinity of her house around the time of the murder; (3) failing to investigate and discredit the prosecution's theory that petitioner transported and disposed of the victim's body and covered it with tree branches; (4) failing to investigate and discredit that prosecution's allegations of forgery; (5) failing to investigate and discredit evidence that tied petitioner to an abandoned trailer where items taken from the victim were discovered; (6) failing to investigate and discredit evidence about the victim's blood being found on a sock linked to petitioner; and (7) failing to investigate witnesses who could have supported petitioner's alibi. In upholding the trial/post-conviction judge's grant of relief, the Alabama Supreme Court observed, inter alia, that petitioner's most plausible defense to the murder charges was an alibi. Although defense counsel argued in his opening statement that petitioner had an alibi, "defense counsel's inadequate pretrial investigation resulted in a lack of information and an inability to present an adequate alibi defense." The state supreme court agreed with the trial/post-conviction judge that "counsel's defense strategy was not based on thorough pretrial investigation or supported by a reasonable professional judgment." As for prejudice, it was clear from the findings of the trial/post-conviction judge “that defense counsel’s deficiencies would have altered the entire evidentiary picture for the jury.” Not only could alibi witnesses have testified to seeing petitioner at a location other than the crime scene during the period of time that the prosecution’s evidence showed the murder was committed, there was also evidence that should have been discovered and presented demonstrating to the jury the lack of any physical evidence tying petitioner to the crime scene. Likewise, defense counsel’s failure to investigate the forgery claim resulted in prejudice.

People v. Hamilton*, 147 N.E.3d 922 (Ill. Ct. App. 2019). In murder prosecution where defendant claimed self-defense, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly elicit state-of-mind testimony from both defendant and the victim’s sister regarding the victim’s past habit of carrying a gun. (After the victim was shot by defendant, no weapon was recovered from his person or nearby.) When the prosecutor objected to a question asked of the victim’s sister about having previously observed her brother with a gun, defense counsel erroneously made a propensity argument instead of framing it as corroborative state-of-mind evidence. Defendant’s mental state at the time of the shooting went to the heart of the defense that was presented, defeating the State’s argument that trial counsel may have made a strategic decision to focus on the events of the day when defendant claimed to have reacted when he observed the victim with his hand in his waistband and a steel object. “[D]efendant’s knowledge that [the victim] had a habit of carrying a gun, coupled with the fact that [the victim] had just violently beat him, may very well have been the reason that . . . defendant believed [the victim] was going to shoot him. Thus, defense counsel should have properly elicited the defendant’s testimony that he knew [the victim] to carry a gun. That would certainly qualify as admissible state-of-mind evidence.” Prejudice is established because, inter alia, there was conflicting evidence about whether defendant approached the victim or vice versa prior to the shooting. On the record of this case, there is a reasonable probability that the jury would have found defendant either not guilty or guilty only of second degree murder had the state-of-mind testimony been admitted and argued.

Urquhart v. State*, 203 A.3d 719 (Del. Supr. 2019). In armed robbery case where petitioner was convicted and sentenced to fifteen years in prison, the Delaware Supreme Court grants post-conviction relief and holds: “a defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel in a serious felony trial requires more than the mere presence of a defense attorney the day of trial.” Following petitioner’s indictment, he was represented by three different public defenders at preliminary court hearings in the five months prior to trial. A fourth public defender was assigned to represent petitioner at trial. Because, however, of other commitments, trial counsel did not meet with petitioner to prepare for trial. On the morning of trial, petitioner for the first time was shown the key evidence against him – surveillance footage and photographs. (The discovery had been mailed to petitioner but it had not been received prior to the trial date.) Petitioner was offered a five-year plea deal that he turned down. Petitioner expressed to the trial court his confusion and frustration about essentially seeing his defense counsel for the first time on the day of trial along with the evidence. Petitioner denied that he was dissatisfied with counsel, but instead maintained he needed help and didn’t understand what was happening. When asked if he wanted to delay the trial, petitioner said he did not. Trial counsel did not ask for a continuance and the trial went forward. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner raised a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel under Cronic rather than Strickland. The lower court denied relief, agreeing with the State that Cronic required that defense counsel be “completely absent” from representation to forgo Strickland’s prejudice requirement. Because trial counsel supposedly met with petitioner once, spoke on the telephone with him twice, and sent him five letters before trial, the lower court found that trial counsel was not completely absent during the pretrial proceedings. Before addressing the merits of the claim, the Delaware Supreme Court rejected the State’s argument that petitioner had waived the claim by informing the trial court that he was not dissatisfied with counsel and did not ask for a delay. The Court explained: “Viewed in the context of [petitioner’s] overall response to the court’s questions —repeated requests for help and clarification—and trial counsel’s failure to speak up and request a continuance for the benefit of his client, we find that [petitioner] did not knowingly and intelligently waive his right to later appeal his trial counsel’s failure to provide effective assistance of counsel.” As to the merits, the Court dissected the actual communication that occurred between petitioner and trial counsel and concluded: “The grim reality is, in the critical pretrial phase when trial counsel must meet with his client to review the evidence, develop strategy, and prepare for trial, that did not occur.” Regarding whether Chronic or Strickland should apply, the Court held:

Under the stark facts in this appeal—no advance discussion with [petitioner] of trial strategy, what witnesses to call, how to respond to the State’s evidence, whether [petitioner] should testify, and no sober conversation with counsel outside the distractions of the morning of trial whether to enter into plea negotiations and accept a plea— [petitioner] should not have to point to any specific event of prejudice and disprove the State’s contention that trial counsel was able to “wing it” enough at trial to satisfy the Sixth Amendment.”

In the alternative, Strickland prejudice was shown as to trial counsel’s deficiency in handling the plea offer.

[W]e think it is obvious that had the objective circumstances—the evidence the State was going to present, the length of time [petitioner] faced if he went to trial and was convicted, and the likelihood of an acquittal—been the subject of professionally adequate consultation between client and counsel, there is a “reasonable probability” that [petitioner] would have accepted the plea.

As for the remedy, although petitioner had asked for a new trial, it was left to the lower court to decide whether a new trial should be ordered, or the State and petitioner agree on another remedy, i.e., reinstating the plea offer.

Washer v. State*, 284 So.3d 1139 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of, inter alia, discharging a firearm from a vehicle, shooting into a dwelling, and five counts of aggravated assault with a firearm, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a self-defense jury instruction and investigate and present GPS data related to the self-defense theory. The alleged victims in the case were petitioner’s estranged wife, daughter, stepson, and stepson’s friend. They testified that petitioner drove to his wife’s home and punctured his stepson’s friend’s car tire with a knife. Petitioner’s stepson then confronted petitioner outside the home and struck petitioner multiple times with an axe handle. At that point, petitioner drove away from the home but returned shortly thereafter and fired multiple gunshots into the home. In contrast to the account of the alleged victims, petitioner denied having punctured the tire and claimed that he fired the shots into the home after he had been assaulted from behind without provocation. At a post-conviction hearing on petitioner's ineffective assistance of counsel allegations, trial counsel testified that he believed that petitioner had a "bad" self-defense case and so opted instead for a defense of diminished capacity. Counsel further offered his belief that a pure self-defense instruction would not be available based on the evidence presented. He did acknowledge, however, that he argued self-defense during his closing argument. He contended that he nevertheless chose not to ask for a self-defense jury instruction because the "instruction for self-defense is awful." He explained that in his experience, it is sometimes the better strategy to simply argue to a jury without the benefit of corresponding jury instructions. The post-conviction court accepted this strategy and also found that, based on the evidence presented, a self-defense instruction could not have been requested in good faith. The appellate court rejected these findings. "We can fathom no sensible, strategic reason for counsel to argue self-defense during [petitioner's] closing argument but opt not to request a self-defense jury instruction." And because no witnesses disputed that petitioner was hit multiple times with an axe handle, and petitioner testified that he fired in self-defense from that attack, petitioner would have been entitled to a self-defense instruction, contrary to the lower court's finding. Thus, defense counsel's "choice not to request the self-defense jury instruction constituted deficient performance, as it was not a reasonable, strategic decision." Regarding the failure to present GPS evidence, it was undisputed that petitioner had requested multiple times that defense counsel investigate the GPS data which petitioner claimed would establish he had not left his wife's home after he was assaulted and later returned. Defense counsel declined to conduct the requested investigation because he disbelieved his client and feared the GPS data could substantiate the wife's statement that petitioner had previously harassed her. The lower court concluded it was reasonable to forgo investigation that defense counsel viewed as unhelpful. The appellate court found defense counsel deficient because without conducting an investigation, counsel could not determine whether or not the GPS evidence was unhelpful. Considered together, the two deficiencies by defense counsel rendered petitioner's trial fundamentally unfair.

Romero v. State*, 276 So.3d 514 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case involving multiple charges of lewd and lascivious molestation/conduct involving a child less than sixteen years old, trial counsel was ineffective in (1) failing to object to a comment by the prosecution in its closing argument that the jury should consider the negative reaction during petitioner's testimony of a witness sitting in the courtroom audience, and (2) agreeing to instruct the jury that it could consider such reactions. The victim was a friend of petitioner's stepdaughter, who asserted that petitioner repeatedly kissed her, massaged her buttocks, and touched her breasts. After she reported what happened to her sister and mother, the mother contacted the police. A call between the victim and petitioner was then recorded during which petitioner asked the victim to forgive him, and said that he did not know what came over him, that it was unintentional, and that what he did had sickened him. Petitioner told the victim that he would be in big trouble if she told anybody what he did. In a police interview, petitioner provided innocent explanations for the contact he had with the victim, stating that he touched her breast accidentally while they wrestled, he had only kissed a "boo boo" of the child, and that while he did give the girl a massage, he did not touch her buttocks. As for the victim's claim that petitioner had her and the stepdaughter "pinky promise" not to tell anybody what happened, petitioner told the police that the pinky promise was because he did not want his wife to know he had been wrestling with the girls, and he admitted he told them that “whatever happens between us stays between us.” At trial, the victim testified against petitioner, as did another minor who testified that while vacationing with petitioner and his family, petitioner had repeatedly touched her buttocks and grabbed her breasts. Petitioner’s wife testified on her husband’s behalf. She told the jury that their family members often give each other massages. She also said that she knew the victim and her daughter were wrestling with her husband on the weekend in question, but denied noticing anything amiss in any way during that weekend. She specifically said she saw nothing in the victim’s demeanor that indicated anything to be concerned about. As for the other girl, petitioner’s wife stated that petitioner had yelled at that girl for something she did which made that girl angry at her husband. Petitioner’s testimony largely tracked his police interview and he denied any inappropriate touching as to the other girl. Regarding the pinky promise, petitioner explained that this was simply part of a frequent family joke that was a parody of the commercial, “What happens in Vegas stays in Vegas.” During closing argument, the prosecutor remarked:

[Petitioner] had already pinky promised with her to not tell anyone, because what happens here stays here, which is not what he says on the stand: it was based on a commercial, you know, the Las Vegas commercial. All my family loves that. Anybody look out in the audience when that was going on and see his wife shaking her head no?

Defense counsel did not object to this reference to petitioner’s wife’s courtroom actions. During deliberations, the jury asked whether it could consider a witness’s behavior in the courtroom even if the witness was not on the stand. Defense counsel and the prosecutor agreed that such off-the-stand behavior could be considered evidence, and the jury was so advised by the trial court. The jury convicted petitioner as charged. He was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison and lifetime sex-offender probation. In post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel did not offer a strategy for his failure to object to the reference to petitioner’s wife’s alleged courtroom behavior or his concession that the jury could consider it. Rather, trial counsel explained that he believed it was permitted. In fact, “a witness’s reaction to another witness’s testimony is not ‘evidence introduced at trial,’ nor is it ‘the manner and demeanor of the witness [while] on the stand.’” (Citation omitted.) In addition, “a prosecutor is not allowed to present his or her private observations to the jury as though they were facts.” Defense counsel therefore performed deficiently both in failing to object and agreeing that courtroom behavior could properly be considered. In assessing prejudice, it is acknowledged that there was ample evidence of guilt. But if petitioner and his wife were believed, that would have supported a different verdict. The prosecutor’s comments impermissibly attacked their credibility. “The fact that the jury asked during deliberations whether it could consider such off-the-stand witness behavior or reaction as evidence certainly suggests that the State’s closing argument and perhaps the wife’s nonverbal conduct were on the jury’s collective mind as it considered [petitioner’s] guilt or innocence.” On this record, prejudice is established.

State v. Ellis*, 273 So.3d 1126 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of two counts of misdemeanor battery and one count of false imprisonment, all as lesser-included offenses of aggravated battery on a pregnant victim, domestic battery by strangulation, and kidnapping, a grant of post-conviction relief is affirmed on claims that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to file a pretrial motion to dismiss based upon pre-arrest delay, and for failing to conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. The alleged criminal incidents occurred May 13, 2011. Although the alleged victim made a police report two days after that, petitioner was not arrested until a year later. The sole witness against petitioner was the alleged victim, with no physical or testimonial corroboration of her account of what occurred. The victim's report and later testimony disclosed numerous material inconsistencies and differing accounts of the alleged criminal incidents. Bank and drug store surveillance videos may have been able to corroborate or disprove some of the victim's descriptions of what occurred but were no longer available at the time petitioner was charged. And yet trial counsel did not file a motion to dismiss based upon the prejudice resulting from the prearrest delay (loss of prospectively-exculpatory video recordings). The State offered no explanation for the charging delay. There was a reasonable probability that the case may have been dismissed based on that delay had defense counsel made a dismissal motion. "Under the test articulated in Rogers v. State, 511 So.2d 526, 531 (Fla. 1987), defense counsel's failure to move for dismissal (based on the delay between the alleged commission of the crime and the defendant's arrest), amounts to a due process violation." Another lapse by defense counsel was the failure to investigate motel records. Had counsel done so, it would have been discovered that neither petitioner nor the victim was at the motel on the date of the criminal acts alleged to have happened there. It was also established that defense counsel did not investigate the victim's alleged pregnancy or petitioner's alibi that he was still at the drug treatment center on the day of the alleged incidents. "Considering the effects of these lapses on [petitioner's] ability to impeach the credibility of the alleged victim (who was the sole witness to provide evidence against [petitioner] at trial), the postconviction court properly concluded that counsel's deficient performance caused prejudice and that there exists a reasonable probability the result of the proceedings would have been different had the lapses not occurred."

Feliciano v. State*, 263 So.3d 99 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). Reversing denial of post-conviction relief based on trial counsel's failure to call witnesses to support the defense in case where petitioner, the mother of the alleged victim, was convicted of lewd or lascivious molestation,. The victim was petitioner's son, who was an adult at the time of trial. He testified that petitioner fondled him while he bathed when he was around ten or eleven years old and open mouthed kissed him on another occasion. Petitioner denied the accusations and suggested her son had a motive to fabricate. Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to call two witnesses who lived with petitioner and her children who had testimony favorable to petitioner. One of the witnesses could have denied the victim's assertion that the witness had observed petitioner engaging in a salacious kiss with the victim. At trial, defense counsel stipulated that the other witness "should be precluded from testifying for violating the witness sequestration rule; the lawyer did not seek a hearing on the rule violation to determine any prejudice to the state, nor did she argue for a lesser sanction." Prejudice is found given that "this was a credibility case, without any other tangible evidence, and the witnesses would have significantly undermined the victim's testimony and provided a counterpoint to the state's case."

Morrison v. State*, 575 S.W.3d 1 (Tex. Ct. App. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in creating detailed billing records that disclosed confidential client communications and attorney work product and then failing to protect strategic defense information from public disclosure during the payment process, thereby allowing the prosecution to acquire and use information from the records against defendant. Defendant's boyfriend, Sims, killed his grandmother. Defendant was not present during the killing but the prosecution's theory at trial was that defendant was guilty of murder under the law of parties because (1) defendant knew, in advance, that Sims intended to rob and either assault or kill his grandmother and (2) she assisted Sims in carrying out that plan. Because defendant was indigent, she received appointed counsel. Her attorney was permitted to request interim billing for himself and his investigator during the course of the proceedings. At some point his unredacted, highly detailed fee requests were filed with the district court. The evidence against defendant was circumstantial. Prior to trial, the prosecution obtained copies of defense counsel's billing records and reviewed them. Utilizing entries from those records, the prosecution pursued a line of questioning of defendant's mother, Misty, suggesting that defendant admitted her involvement in the murder in a letter she wrote to Misty from jail. The State further suggested that defense counsel had retrieved the letter from Misty prior to trial and was refusing to produce it, although there was no proof that any letter containing an admission by defendant ever existed. Defendant was convicted of murder. In finding ineffective assistance by defense counsel, it is noted that counsel breached the ethical duty to keep confidential the communications with his client. The court could "perceive no strategic reason why—under the circumstances of this case—defense counsel would ever disclose the detailed confidential communications included in his billing records." Having learned the week before trial that the prosecution had possession of the information counsel had submitted and intended to use it against defendant at trial, defense counsel failed to take any remedial measures. There was no indication that defense counsel sought to seal the records, filed a motion in limine or a motion to exclude the records and any information obtained from the records, or even objected to the prosecution's use of those billing records when the prosecutor began referring to information contained in them at trial. "Although there is no indication [defendant] waived her attorney-client privilege, defense counsel failed to assert that privilege when he learned that the [prosecution] had possession of the records or when the [prosecutor] actually used them at trial." Defense counsel also failed to ask the trial court to instruct the prosecution to return all copies of the billing records and/or to instruct the prosecutor to refrain from asking any further questions about the alleged letter or any other item derived from the records. Defense counsel further did not ask the trial court for an instruction to the jury to disregard the prosecutor's questions and comments about the letter or defense counsel's duty to produce it. Finally, he did not move for a mistrial based on the prosecutor's interjection of the information from the billing records. "We can perceive of no strategic reason why defense counsel would have offered no attempt to stop the [prosecutor] from using his billing records against [defendant] once he learned they were in the [prosecutor's] possession." Defense counsel also failed to introduce items of evidence available that tended to mitigate the damage caused by the use of his billing records: (1) a letter written by Sims to defendant's parents claiming that it was all his fault and that defendant had nothing to do with the murder; and (2) a statement by Sims at the time of his arrest that he was solely responsible for the murder. "We can perceive no strategic reason why defense counsel would not attempt to offer one or both items for the jury's consideration, especially after the [prosecutor] had speculated before the jury that [defendant] had written a letter admitting her involvement in the murder." In finding prejudice, the court pointed out that defense counsel not only disclosed information that was privileged, he also failed to introduce evidence that was exculpatory. When the [prosecutor's] argument that the billing records established the existence of a letter from [defendant] to her mother wherein she admitted her involvement in the murder—which did not exist—is combined with the fact that the jury did not hear about Sims' oral and written admissions that he was solely responsible for the murder—which did exist—then we find that there is a reasonable probability that, but for defense counsel's deficient performance, the result would have been different.

State v. Santoro*, 446 P.3d 1141 (Mt. 2019). Appellant who was convicted, inter alia, of negligent homicide was denied the effective assistance of counsel by his defense attorney's failure to serve a subpoena upon or otherwise preserve the testimony of a crucial defense witness for trial. The charges stemmed from an altercation at a VFW bar between appellant and his neighbor, Rowell, the victim of the negligent homicide charge. Rowell had made a comment that offended appellant as appellant was exiting the bar after being asked to leave the establishment due to his crude behavior. After he left the building, appellant slammed a beer bottle on the walkway. Rowell, believing appellant had harmed Rowell's vehicle, attempted to leave the bar but was blocked by his wife and friend. When the victim's wife decided sufficient time had passed for appellant to have left, the three left the bar. Once outside, they saw appellant sitting in the driver's seat of his vehicle with the engine running. Rowell approached appellant's vehicle. Either the driver's door was open or Rowell opened it. The two men began yelling at each other. According to appellant, Rowell grabbed him by the neck and began choking him. As appellant began to lose consciousness, he gassed his truck in reverse. (He could not go forward as the bar was in front of the truck.) The reversing truck's open door caught Rowell, who was dragged and pulled under the truck. "[Appellant] felt a bump as he reversed and turned the steering wheel to the right and then put the truck in forward gear and turned to the left and sped away." Appellant maintained a justifiable use of force defense, claiming he was justified in putting the truck in reverse to free himself from Rowell's choking. The prosecution's theory was that appellant drove over Rowell twice, once in reversing and again going forward. To support this theory, the prosecution relied on pictures taken of the scene and the testimony of Rowell's family and friends who were present during the incident. Although each of the witnesses testified to appellant running Rowell over both while backing up and again while going forward, each either admitted this to be inconsistent with what they related to law enforcement immediately after the incident or admitted on cross-examination that they really had not seen Rowell hit when appellant drove forward. The prosecutor argued to the jury that even if appellant was justified in reversing the truck in order to get away from Rowell, he was not justified in running him over the second time. Not called by the prosecutor was Montana Highway Patrol Trooper Garza who had responded to the scene shortly after the incident and was the law enforcement individual responsible for investigation of the scene and reconstruction of the accident. Based on the physical evidence of the scene, his report indicated that Rowell had been dragged under appellant's truck while it was traveling in reverse and did not indicate that Rowell had been run over a second time when appellant pulled forward. During the defense case-in-chief, defense counsel attempted unsuccessfully to admit Garza's accident reconstruction report through another witness, explaining that a subpoena had been obtained for Garza two weeks earlier but Garza was no longer a Montana Highway Patrolman, he had moved out of Montana, and counsel had only located him the evening before. When counsel finally spoke with Garza, Garza related that he was not willing to appear for trial in person or by telephone. In response, the State indicated it had Garza's contact information since he left Montana and trial counsel never requested it. The State further asserted that Garza maintained the very same telephone number he had always had and that he was very easy to find. The appellate record was sufficient to determine that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to secure Garza's presence at trial or otherwise preserve his testimony for trial. The record also supported a finding of prejudice. "It is clear from the record before us that, if presented with Garza's investigation and conclusion that Rowell was struck and killed while [appellant] was driving in reverse, such would lend support to the defense [appellant] presented at trial, while discounting the State's trial theory. As such, [appellant] has demonstrated 'a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different.'"

Martin v. State*, 832 S.E.2d 277 (S.C. 2019). In bank robbery and criminal conspiracy case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to elicit testimony from petitioner's mother concerning the specific timeline of petitioner's purported alibi. At petitioner's trial, his three co-defendants cooperated with authorities and testified against him. Their testimony was the only evidence implicating him. The robbery occurred at 12:20 p.m. on April 23, 2009, in North Augusta, South Carolina. At the time of the robbery, petitioner lived with his mother in Snellville, Georgia, around thirty miles outside of Atlanta. His mother testified that she dropped him off at a bus stop in Atlanta the morning of April 23rd. Although trial counsel's notes from an interview with petitioner's mother indicated she dropped petitioner off around 11:15 a.m., or 11:30 a.m., inexplicably trial counsel failed to elicit this detail. Given the distances involved, if this timing was correct, it would have been impossible for petitioner to be in North Augusta at the time of the robbery. During closing argument, defense counsel attacked the credibility of the co-defendants and noted the absence of any other evidence linking petitioner to the crimes. Although no mention was made of the alibi by defense counsel, the jury asked for a reread of the alibi testimony before convicting petitioner of the charges. The South Carolina Supreme Court first finds, "as a matter of law that Petitioner's trial attorneys were deficient for not eliciting the specific alibi timeline testimony from Petitioner's mother." It then rejects the State's characterization of the evidence against petitioner as "overwhelming."

The only people who placed Petitioner at the robbery were the three codefendants, two of whom conceded they testified in hopes of a favorable deal with the State and two of whom admitted lying to law enforcement during the investigation in an effort to exonerate themselves and their codefendants. Further, the three codefendants all claimed to be good friends with one another, but they hardly knew Petitioner. Additionally, the forensics team was unable to find anything of evidentiary value connecting Petitioner to the crime.

Additionally, the mother's alibi testimony, such that it was, was important enough to the jury that it asked that it be reread during deliberations. "[C]ounsel's failure to present the known and available alibi evidence—the specific drop-off time in Atlanta—undermined confidence in the outcome of Petitioner's trial." (The state supreme court also rejected, without discussion, the finding by the post-conviction court that prejudice could not be established because petitioner's mother was not presented as a witness in the post-conviction proceeding. It simply noted that prejudice was proved by trial counsel's admission that they were aware of the specific timeline given pre-trial by petitioner's mother.)

2018: Farmer v. Premo, 427 P.3d 170 (Or. 2018). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in deciding not to call a defense expert who would have testified that a gun seized from another suspect's residence was "likely" the murder weapon. At trial, witnesses: (1) placed petitioner in the area prior to the murder looking for the victim; (2) identified petitioner as the shooter; and (3) testified that petitioner made several admissions that he had killed the victim. Petitioner contested the credibility and reliability of the prosecution witnesses and proffered evidence that his admissions differed from the forensic evidence. The focus of the defense, however, was on evidence that Baines, a man who resembled petitioner, had committed the murder. This evidence included that the police had information about "word on the street" that Baines was involved in the murder and had been seen on the night of the murder riding a bicycle away from the crime scene. Petitioner also adduced evidence that Baines had access to a gun (a Rohm) that could have been the weapon used in the shooting. Although a forensic firearms examiner with the Oregon State Police prepared a report opining that it could not be determined whether the Rohm had fired the fatal bullet, a defense expert had concluded pretrial that the Rohm was "likely" the murder weapon. At a pretrial hearing, defense counsel explained the Rohm's importance to petitioner's case and her intent to call the defense firearm expert to testify. At trial, the prosecution called the firearm examiner from the Oregon State Police and he reiterated his findings from his earlier report about the Rohm and also opined that evidence that someone had used a .357 revolver to kill the victim would be consistent with his findings. (The prosecution's theory was that petitioner had shot the victim with a .357 revolver.) Defense counsel ultimately did not call the defense expert as a witness. Importantly, the post-conviction court made a factual finding that defense counsel's decision was premised on her failure to appreciate that the defense expert's opinion was significantly different from that of the state's expert. This finding was supported by the record and defeated the state's contention that deficient performance could not be found because of defense counsel's testimony that she decided to forgo calling the expert because of her concern that the expert would not be able to withstand cross-examination about his training and experience.

In this case, the post-conviction court found that defense counsel had two reasons for her decision not to call [the defense expert]: her mistaken understanding that [the defense expert's] testimony would not be stronger than [the state expert's], and her concerns about [the defense expert's] qualifications. The fact that defense counsel misunderstood was an important fact in the cost-benefit analysis. Defense counsel's reservations about [the defense expert's] qualifications may have permitted her to decide that those concerns outweighed the benefit of calling [the defense expert], but she could not make that determination without a reasonably accurate understanding of the benefit she would gain by calling him. [Footnote omitted.] Adequate counsel in this situation would have understood the different nature and greater strength of [the defense expert's] potential testimony as compared to [the state expert's] and would have made a decision about whether to call [the defense expert] after considering that benefit. Given that defense counsel did not have that understanding, the post-conviction court did not err in concluding that she failed to exercise the professional skill and judgment [the Oregon Constitution] requires. [Footnote omitted.]

Prejudice is found irrespective of the state's reliance on evidence in the record showing that the Rohm was inoperable as proof that the case against petitioner was overwhelming.

State v. Lopez*, 410 P.3d 1117 (Wash. 2018). Reinstating the grant of a new trial based on trial counsel's failure to investigate the case as a result of his severe depression. Defendant was convicted by a jury of first degree child molestation, arising out of an allegation by a six-and-a-half year old child who was a passenger on the school bus that defendant drove, that defendant touched her butt and itched and tickled her vagina like he was trying to pinch her. After the verdict but before sentencing, defendant fired his trial lawyer and hired a new attorney, who filed a motion for new trial based on IAC of original counsel. The motion argued that original counsel's severe mental depression, coupled with nearly contemporaneous disbarment, constituted IAC per se, removing the requirement of proving deficient performance or prejudice. Motion counsel also alleged that counsel's failure to investigate and call witnesses that defendant had identified constituted deficient performance. The record indicated that trial counsel failed to appear at court one day without explanation, called in sick at the last minute on the morning of trial another day, and usually showed up late when he did show. He failed to submit briefing requested by the court. The trial judge was alarmed and asked defendant if he wanted a new attorney. Counsel's investigator testified that she had a meeting with counsel months before trial to create a checklist for preparing for the defense, but after this meeting, counsel "checked out." He canceled numerous meetings with her, "with a different excuse every time." He stopped communicating with the investigator altogether, so that she could not communicate important case information to him. The investigator did not document the important case information she obtained in a memo because counsel stopped paying her, and she had worked for two months without payment because counsel did not submit a request for additional funding even though he told the investigator he had. The records showed he did not submit the request for additional funding until the trial ended. The trial court concluded, based on this evidence and its own observations of counsel's performance, that it was clear that if counsel had not been handicapped by his depression, he would have been more effective, and would have done things such as investigating reputation evidence and calling reputation witnesses. It granted the motion for new trial. The Court of Appeals reversed, interpreting the trial court's finding of IAC to be based solely on counsel's failure to call reputation witnesses as to defendant's sexual morality and decency, and such evidence was not admissible under the law of that division. It also interpreted the trial court's finding that counsel's depression had severely handicapped his representation as a per se prejudice finding, and held that defendants have no right to counsel free from mental illness. On petition for review, the Supreme Court of Washington reversed the Court of Appeals' reversal of the granting of the motion for new trial, and reinstated the grant of that motion. Its review of the trial court's factual findings with regard to IAC was for substantial evidence, meaning evidence that is sufficient to persuade a rational, fair-minded person of the truth of the finding. If such is found, the reviewing court would not substitute its own judgment for that of the trial court. The Supreme Court held: (1) there is no presumption of deficient performance when counsel is affected by mental illness, what matters is the effect of the disability on counsel's performance, and the trial court properly analyzed the issues under this focus; (2) the trial court properly found that counsel's performance was deficient and without strategic or tactical explanation after taking into consideration the trial investigator's declaration and testimony, counsel's audio-recorded interview and declaration, a letter by counsel's psychologist, and the court's own observations during trial, including counsel's failure to conduct preparation for trial that he had deemed necessary when he was well; (3) the evidence "supports the trial court's implicit legal conclusion that this adverse effect amounted to prejudice," 410 P.3d at 1128, because the case was not a slam-dunk for the state, and depended solely on the credibility of a six-and-a-half year old's contradictory report, the jury deliberated for over a day, and the trial court found that it was a close case that could have gone the other way.

Edward M. v. Commissioner of Correction*, 201 A.3d. 492 (Conn. Ct. App. 2018). In case where petitioner was convicted of sexual assault in the first degree and risk of injury to a child, based upon petitioner's alleged sexual abuse of his daughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence to corroborate his assertion that he was circumcised, which conflicted with testimony presented by the prosecution. Counsel in petitioner's first habeas proceeding was also ineffective in failing to challenge the omission by trial counsel. In this case, there was no physical evidence of sexual abuse and the state admitted during closing argument that the case was a contest of credibility between petitioner and his daughter. The second habeas court hearing petitioner's case found that petitioner's daughter had described his penis as having skin on it and wrinkles, and she and her mother both testified at trial that he was uncircumcised. Both petitioner and his girlfriend at the time testified that he was circumcised. Trial counsel did not offer available medical records, testimony from a neutral third party or medical witness, or photographs of the petitioner's penis. During deliberations, the jury sent a note asking why such evidence had not been presented. The second habeas court granted relief to petitioner, which the state appealed. Under Connecticut law, "[t]he use of a habeas petition to raise an ineffective assistance of habeas counsel claim, commonly referred to as a habeas on a habeas, was approved by our Supreme Court in Lozada v. Warden, 223 Conn. 834, 613 A.2d 818 (1992)." In that case, the Connecticut Supreme Court had determined that the statutory right to habeas counsel includes an implied requirement that habeas counsel be effective. The state argued that the habeas court improperly determined that evidence of whether petitioner was circumcised at the time of trial, years after the alleged abuse, was relevant and admissible at trial, disregarded trial counsel's tactical decision to present evidence of petitioner's circumcised penis only through testimony, and relied on trial counsel's admission that failing to present the medical evidence was a mistake. The Appellate Court of Connecticut affirmed the habeas court's grant of relief, finding that the photographs and medical evidence of petitioner's circumcised penis at the time of trial met the extremely low standard for relevance, even if they did not affirmatively prove that petitioner was circumcised at the time of the alleged abuse. Trial counsel's failure to present this evidence was not a tactical decision; he admitted that he did not consider taking a photograph or having some appropriate person view the petitioner's circumcised penis and testify. Trial counsel admitted that he was distracted from this issue by other evidence in the case and missed the importance of the medical records. Habeas counsel failed to raise this at petitioner's first habeas trial even though petitioner had included this claim in his pro se petition, and even though trial counsel urged habeas counsel to raise this issue. The failure to present the evidence was prejudicial – given that the circumcision issue was the major point of dispute at the trial, there is a reasonable probability that further evidence of the petitioner's circumcision would have caused a different result. The fact that the jury asked this question, did not receive an answer, and then convicted petitioner is significant.

Fahnley v. State*, 188 A.3d 871 (Me. 2018). Affirming grant of relief in sexual abuse of a minor case where trial counsel failed to present evidence countering the prosecution's case. Petitioner was convicted by a jury of one count of sexual abuse of a minor and acquitted of another count of sexual abuse of a minor and of a charge of gross sexual assault. In a post-conviction review petition, he alleged IAC of trial counsel for counsel's (1) failure to present exculpatory evidence, including medical records and credit card records; (2) failure to present witnesses; and (3) failure to present evidence that he had told petitioner he was going to present, without discussing this with petitioner. The court granted the petition and vacated the conviction of sexual abuse of a minor. The court found that counsel had failed to interview witnesses who could have supported at least a partial alibi, and this constituted a failure to make a reasonable investigation; failed to present potentially exculpatory evidence, including evidence that the alleged victim's family was angry at petitioner because he had stopped financial support to their family, even after counsel told petitioner he was going to present it; and failed to consult with petitioner with regard to overarching defense strategy, abandoning the defense he discussed with petitioner and which petitioner wanted presented. The court also found that petitioner was prejudiced by this deficient performance because witnesses and evidence were available to support his defense that neither he nor the victim were where the victim alleged, and witnesses and evidence that provided a motive for the victim and his family to retaliate against petitioner was not offered. The state appealed the grant of relief. The Supreme Judicial Court of Maine applied a "deferential standard of review to the findings of [the] post-conviction court," noting that in order for the state to prevail, the court "would have to conclude that the record is devoid of any competent evidence to support the court's finding." 188 A.3d at 875. Although the state noted that there was evidence to support some of the tactical decisions of counsel, that was not the guiding standard. The judgment was affirmed.

Robinson v. State*, 428 P.3d 225 (Kan. Ct. App. 2018). In arson-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present sufficient expert testimony to refute the claims of the state's expert. Petitioner was convicted in state court of reckless second-degree murder and aggravated arson after he had first been indicted in federal court but the federal case was dismissed. The government's fire expert testified that the fire was intentionally set on the stairs using an open flame and a flammable liquid. Petitioner told detectives that he could have been smoking crack cocaine in the hall and could have thrown lighted matches on the floor. In state habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged numerous deficiencies by trial counsel. Following a hearing, the habeas court ruled that petitioner's counsel were ineffective for failing to investigate and present sufficient expert testimony to refute the claims of the state's expert, that this failure was prejudicial, and that cumulative trial counsel errors required relief. The Court of Appeals of Kansas affirmed the habeas court's grant of relief, using the standard of review of determining whether the habeas court's findings were supported by substantial competent evidence, whether the findings supported the court's legal conclusions, and applying a de novo standard to the habeas court's conclusions of law. It determined that the habeas court's finding of cumulative errors was insignificant given the expert evidence deficiency. It noted that the district court held that trial counsel performed an insufficient investigation into the use of an arson expert. Arson cases generally rely on expert opinions that a person intentionally started the fire, and therefore, it is incumbent upon defense counsel to counter the cause and origin evidence by exploring the possibility of using its own experts. Counsel here waited until two weeks before trial before consulting with someone who had no expertise in determining the cause and origin of fires, did not offer counsel an opinion about the cause and origins of this fire, and only provided counsel notes for use in cross-examination of the state's expert witness. At the habeas hearing, petitioner established that the state's expert's opinions were vulnerable to attack because they were not based on the actual physical evidence and only on a process of elimination of causes, which is not the product of the scientific method. The appellate court noted that there were vivid contrasts between the preparation of trial counsel and habeas counsel, and between the state trial expert and the habeas defense experts. The trial lawyer did not hire an investigator and did not hire an arson expert, but rather a person who did not point out any flaw in the state's evidence. He did not try to hire someone else because he doesn't "go around trying to find people that are just opinions for hire." The defense "expert" was asked to assist on the case as a consulting expert. He gave trial counsel a timeline and recommended cross-examination questions and had an hour-long conversation with someone on the defense team. He was not a member of arson or fire investigators organizations. The habeas lawyers presented testimony of the federal public defenders who had represented petitioner before his federal case was dismissed. They had consulted with an expert who had written a foundational text on arson investigation and participated in the group that put together the Guide for Fire and Explosion Investigations. Counsel "studied [that guide] and used it in the preparation of his defense." 428 P.3d at 230. They moved to have the guide recognized as a learned treatise so they could use it to help with cross-examination of the state's expert. They had an investigator interview as many witnesses from the scene as possible. They moved for a Daubert hearing on the method the state's expert used to attempt to detect flammable accelerants. They believed the state's expert's methods did not fit with the recommendations of the guide. They also felt that the state's expert's opinion that petitioner did not flick a lit match was based on his personal belief that petitioner was not truthful, and he was not permitted to discuss that because it was outside his area of expertise. A habeas defense expert was a fire investigator who had been a fire fighter for 15 years, obtained certification through an association of fire investigators, and was a member of those organizations. He reviewed the fire investigation report, the report of the dog handler who investigated the case, read testimony from the original trial, and viewed photos and reviewed witness statements. He testified that the state expert's methodology violated the scientific method. There were numerous reasons besides the use of an accelerant why the fire spread rapidly that applied here. The appellate court noted that on appeal, many of the challenges the state raised to the habeas court's findings and conclusion were based on misinterpretations of what the habeas court actually did and found. Counsel's performance was deficient because counsel contacted the "expert" less than two weeks before trial and did not talk to another expert when the first proved unhelpful, not because (as the state contended) counsel did not call his expert to testify nor because he did not ask for a continuance to find an expert. The deficiency was prejudicial because the state expert's opinion could have been impeached, leaving the state with no case that petitioner intentionally started the fire. There was no physical evidence of any chemical accelerants at the scene. The significance of the gas can found at the scene was speculative, and the speed of the fire could have been caused by the structure of the apartment house.

2017: Marr v. State of Idaho, 408 P.3d 31 (Idaho 2017). Petitioner was charged with felony attempted strangulation and domestic battery with a traumatic injury of his wife and he was convicted by a jury on the domestic battery charge. The district court granted his petition for post-conviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial and sentencing. The Court of Appeals reversed. The Supreme Court of Idaho reversed the Court of Appeals, and affirmed the district court order granting petitioner relief on IAC grounds, ruling that trial counsel's failure to investigate petitioner's wife's character for aggression and belligerence when intoxicated and to discover and present evidence about this was prejudicial under the federal Strickland standard. Under Idaho law, a defendant can offer evidence of the victim's pertinent character trait, including the victim's trait for violence, in order to show the victim was the aggressor or that the defendant's force used was necessary for self-protection. Counsel should have, but failed to, investigate and present the testimony of a law enforcement officer who would have said that petitioner's wife had a reputation of being belligerent, difficult, and physically resistant when intoxicated, which corroborated petitioner's contention that he was acting in self-defense when he exercised force against her to protect himself. Counsel admitted at the post-conviction hearing that she missed this evidence (thus she did not make a strategic or tactical decision to exclude it), and she testified that despite being aware of the wife's reputation for being a nasty drunk, counsel did not interview anyone about this. The error was prejudicial because the jury's acquittal of petitioner on the attempted strangulation charge, and the wife's inconsistent testimony, demonstrated that the jury had some doubts about the wife's credibility – it is possible the jury would have acquitted petitioner of both charges had it heard the testimony of the law enforcement officer.

People v. Taylor*, 64 N.Y.S.3d 714 (N.Y. App. Div. 2017). Defendant was convicted of second-degree assault and criminal possession of a weapon arising from a fight during which the victim suffered a “16-inch-wide laceration across his abdomen.” The prosecution's key witness was a cab driver who testified that he saw the incident. This testimony was countered by defendant's testimony that the victim challenged him to a fight and then knocked him to the ground, and he opened his pocket knife to scare the victim but the victim lunged at him. After his convictions were affirmed on appeal, he filed a motion to vacate under state law, setting forth four allegations of IAC by his trial attorneys. Two of these allegations were based on facts demonstrable in the record, and two were based on non-record information. The trial court summarily denied the motion, determining that the claims were barred because they should have been raised on appeal. The Supreme Court, Appellate Division of New York determined that because IAC is a claim that has to be considered cumulatively (state case law provided that “the core . . . inquiry in reviewing ineffective assistance of counsel claims is whether counsel's performance viewed in totality amounts to ‘meaningful representation’”), presenting both record-based and non-record based IAC allegations in a motion to vacate is proper. The appellate court determined that defendant had established ineffective assistance of counsel under state law, finding that “defendant was deprived of a fair trial by less than meaningful representation,” requiring the vacation of his convictions. (1) Counsel's performance was defective because he failed to challenge the cab driver, the prosecution's key witness, with statements he had made in his deposition to the police that were significantly at odds with his testimony. Counsel's failure to do this was all the more unreasonable given counsel's unsuccessful repeated attempts to introduce the cab driver's deposition into evidence, only after the cab driver's testimony was complete. (2) Counsel was ineffective for failing “to clearly articulate and support his request for a justification charge.” He argued that a statute permitted an instruction on both the necessity defense and the ordinary force defense. The court denied instructions on both defenses under that statute, and thus instructed only on the necessity defense. Counsel could have requested an ordinary force instruction under a different statute, and so obtained both instructions. The appellate court determined that, cumulatively, these errors “deprived defendant of meaningful representation” under New York law. [Note that there is no reference to federal IAC law in this opinion, not even Strickland – it is all state IAC law.]

Capital Case*

Barnes v. State*, 218 So.3d 500 (Fla. Ct. App. 5th Dist. 2017). In a case where defendant was convicted of first-degree murder, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that there was insufficient evidence of premeditation to support a first-degree murder conviction. The victim had previously been in a romantic relationship with defendant and continued, unsuccessfully, to help defendant overcome his drug addiction even after they broke up. The victim was shot in her office. Two neighbors placed defendant at the office prior to and immediately after the sound of four rapid gunshots. Although some drawers in the office appeared to have been rummaged through, others did not. There was no evidence that anything was taken from the office. At the close of the prosecution's case, defense counsel moved for an acquittal, arguing there was insufficient evidence that defendant had committed the murder or that he intended the victim's death. The motion was denied. In defendant's testimony, he denied being present at the office and denied involvement in the killing. Defense counsel renewed his motion for judgment of acquittal which was again denied. Defense counsel then stipulated to the jury receiving standard instructions on premeditated first-degree murder, second-degree murder, and manslaughter. The primary evidence supporting an inference of premeditation was the multiple gunshots. But the State presented little, if any, evidence that defendant committed the murder according to a preconceived plan or that he had exhibited, mentioned, or even possessed an intent to kill the victim at any time prior to the actual homicide. Nor was there any evidence that defendant had previously threatened the victim or that he was angry with the victim prior to arriving at her office on the date of the homicide. In fact, the prosecution's theory of the case, provided in closing argument, was that defendant had gone to the victim's office to retrieve the Electronic Balance and Transfer (EBT) card the victim kept for defendant to prevent him from using it for illicit drugs, and when the victim refused to give him the card, defendant got so angry that he shot her and then "freaked out." The State further suggested that defendant's actions were influenced by the fact that he had been using crack cocaine and was "all amped up." "In summary, the most reasonable inference arising from the State's evidence was that in a moment of rage and anger, fueled by the use of crack cocaine, [defendant] shot the victim four times in rapid succession immediately after she refused to give him his EBT card. Accordingly, we conclude that the State's evidence was insufficient to prove premeditation." There was no perceivable strategic basis for trial counsel's failure to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence as to premeditation. The remedy is vacation of the first-degree murder conviction and the entering of judgment for second-degree murder.

Shaw v. State*, 798 S.E.2d 344 (Ga. Ct. App. 2017). In aggravated battery and aggravated assault case involving a confrontation at a Waffle House where defendant claimed self-defense, trial counsel performed deficiently "in either seriously mishandl[ing] an attempt to assert a defense of delusional compulsion or ma[king] an unreasonable decision not to investigate the possibility of asserting that defense." (The aggravated battery conviction was reversed based on instructional error.) Defendant was a member of the United State Army. At the time of trial, defense counsel was aware that defendant likely had PTSD and other disorders that could have affected his behavior at the time of the Waffle House incident and he placed defendant's treating psychiatrist on his witness list weeks before trial. Yet defense counsel had failed to speak with the psychiatrist. The day before trial, the prosecutor spoke with the psychiatrist who recounted defendant's symptoms. The prosecutor complained to the court that the psychiatrist's testimony would lead the jury to conclude that defendant was insane but defense counsel had failed to observe the procedures for raising a defense based on insanity or other mental illness. After the trial court sustained the prosecutor's objection to the mental health evidence, defense counsel claimed that he had decided not to pursue an insanity defense. Nevertheless, defense counsel unsuccessfully attempted to have the psychiatrist's testimony about defendant's mental state admitted. When that failed, defense counsel elicited testimony from defendant, his wife, and his sister about defendant's mental condition and the effect it had on him on the night of the assault. Defense counsel also unsuccessfully attempted to have the court charge the jury on delusional compulsion and argued to the jury that it should acquit defendant because he was "sick." Notably, the record suggested that defense counsel failed to understand the defense of delusional compulsion and failed to conduct any research into asserting such a defense. Even assuming that trial counsel made a strategic decision not to assert an insanity defense, such a decision was legally flawed as it was premised on defense counsel's own conclusion, come to without expert advice, that defendant was not insane. In sum, counsel is found to have performed deficiently because he "knew at the time of trial that [defendant] had been in combat, had psychological disorders, and was seeking treatment from a psychiatrist, yet he relied on his own opinion that [defendant] was not insane, a defense that counsel appears to have only partially understood, without performing additional investigation, in deciding not to pursue a delusional compulsion defense." Regarding prejudice, at the motion for a new trial, defendant had presented testimony from a licensed psychologist with significant experience in evaluating current and former members of the military. After examining defendant, the psychologist diagnosed defendant was having Tourette's syndrome, OCD and PTSD. (While in the military, defendant had also been diagnosed with Tourette's and OCD). The psychologist explained how the conditions could impact defendant's behavior in general, and then went on to opine on how they influenced his actions towards the victim. According to the psychologist, defendant's behavior amounted to a delusional compulsion under the circumstances." This testimony was sufficient to raise a reasonable probability that the jury would have accepted the delusional compulsion defense had it been raised at trial.

Tran v. State*, 798 S.E.2d 71 (Ga. Ct. App. 2017). In case where defendant was convicted of two counts of armed robbery, one count of aggravated sexual battery, and one count of possession of a firearm during the commission of a felony, convictions are reversed based on several instances of deficient performance. The crimes were committed by two men who entered a karaoke club wearing surgical masks and carrying guns. After the robberies and sexual battery, the men left the club. A witness then observed a silver Acura with tinted windows leaving the parking lot. Shortly thereafter, a silver Acura was pulled over by police. The passenger fled and was never located. Defendant was the driver of the vehicle. He told officers a gun was in the car. Also found in the car were items matching those taken from the club. At trial, defendant testified that he had been waiting outside the club for friends when a masked man pointed a gun at him and ordered him to get in the car and drive. The gunman placed objects he was carrying in the car. After the car was pulled over, the gunman took bills from the glove compartment that had defendant's name on them and threatened defendant not to say anything about the incident. The gunman then fled. According to defendant, he had been robbed and threatened previously, which he had reported to police, leading him to purchase a gun. Although defendant raised multiple allegations of deficient performance by trial counsel, only a few are found to be meritorious: (1) failing to raise a hearsay objection to testimony about the absence of a record of defendant having been a crime victim in a certain county; (2) failing to object to statements by the prosecutor that improperly impeached defendant's testimony; and (3) opening the door to damaging testimony that contradicted defendant's testimony that he was unaware who the gunman was. In finding prejudice from counsel's deficiencies, the court weighed the fact that "the jury heard the prosecutor essentially testify that [defendant] would not need an attorney if he was an innocent bystander and then question [defendant] at length about why he never gave the police information that would have cleared him of these charges." Defendant's allegation that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object to those improper comments and questions had been rejected because defense counsel had opened the door to them.

Johnson v. Premo, 399 P.3d 431 (Or. 2017). In capital case involving the death of a fifteen-year-old girl, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present evidence supporting defendant's account that the victim died of a drug overdose rather than strangulation, as theorized by the prosecution, or drowning, as theorized by the defense at trial. The unrefuted evidence in the case was that defendant had sexual intercourse with the victim, the victim had been rendered unconscious by morphine ingestion, there were injuries to her body, including her neck, and defendant threw her off a bridge. The prosecution theory at trial was that defendant had drugged the victim, raped her, strangled her to death, and then threw the body off the bridge. The prosecution presented expert testimony supporting the strangulation theory. The defense theory was that the victim was alive when thrown off the bridge and that she then drowned. The defense presented an expert supporting the drowning theory. According to the defense, this meant defendant had to be acquitted because the actual killing occurred in a different county than the venue where the prosecution alleged the murder took place. Neither the prosecution nor the defense expert believed the morphine in the victim's system was sufficient to have caused her death. In post-conviction proceedings defendant adduced evidence that, early in the investigative process, he had told his defense team that, shortly before her death, the victim had willingly consumed alcohol, marijuana, morphine and other opioids with him. He also indicated that they had engaged in sexual intercourse. According to defendant's account, he fell asleep, awakened at one point to find the victim choking and vomiting, and helped her to the bathroom. He fell asleep again, and when he awoke later, he discovered that she was dead. He then wrapped her in a blanket, put her in his car, drove her to the coast, then threw her off the bridge. Although there was conflicting evidence about whether defendant had told trial counsel he was unsure that the victim was dead when he threw her off the bridge, the post-conviction court made an implicit finding that defendant had told trial counsel that the victim died in the county where he was charged. Thus trial counsel was aware that the venue defense presented was contrary to defendant's account of the crime. Defendant also presented testimony from a retired anesthesiologist and a forensic pathologist that supported the overdose defense. That counsel made a tactical decision to pursue the drowning defense in light of the defense expert's opinion, as well as that of the medical examiner, regarding the impact of the morphine did not insulate trial counsel from a finding of deficient performance. In fact, "that decision was unreasonable because counsel had not undertaken an adequate investigation of the relevant facts that, in turn, would have required hiring a toxicologist to review the forensic evidence." "Notably, the forensic data available to defense counsel tended to confirm important aspects of [defendant's] version of what had occurred — that [the victim] may have had multiple intoxicating substances in her system at the time of her death, and that she had vomited due to morphine ingestion at some time before her death. In sum, all the evidence indicated that drugs had played a significant role in the events that surrounded [the victim's] death." There was no reason for trial counsel to have believed that further inquiry into toxicology would have been fruitless or harmful.

The defense advanced in this case, at best marginally viable in the guilt phase, lacked any tactical value in the penalty phase. In that admittedly very difficult circumstance, and in light of all the information known to defense counsel . . . , we conclude that adequate trial counsel should have sought out additional information concerning the drugs in the victim's system at the time of her death, in order to try to develop a guilt-phase theory that [defendant's] killing of the victim was unintentional, or alternatively, a penalty-phase theory that, even if the killing was intentional, it was not the type of crime for which the death penalty should be imposed.

Given the weakness of the defense presented at trial, both as to the guilt and penalty phases of the trial, prejudice is found.

Butt v. State*, 398 P.3d 1024 (Utah 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving a charge of dealing materials harmful to a minor by failing to raise a First Amendment defense. At issue in this appeal was a drawing that defendant made and sent to his five-year-old daughter while in jail on an unrelated charge. The rudimentary drawing depicted defendant naked and included his nipples, penis, and testicles. He was holding his daughter up with her bottom next to his mouth. A speech bubble from his mouth read: "Oh your butt taste [sic] so good." And a second speech bubble from his daughter's mouth read: "Oouch! Daddy don't Bite so hard Giggle giggle." At trial, defendant explained that he had made an earlier drawing of himself naked because his daughter had asked for it after they had watched a documentary about cave dwellings, with cave drawings depicting naked people. (Defendant had been convicted for this drawing but in the lower court the State had stipulated to dismissal of that conviction.) As to the drawing at issue in this appeal, defendant testified that his daughter likes being tickled. So as part of her bedtime routine he holds his daughter's hands up in the air and nibbles all over her stomach, while she laughs. To escape the tickling, his daughter rolls over from her back to her stomach. At this point, defendant teases her, saying "roll back over or I'm going to bite your butt cheek," to which his daughter responds by rolling back over. The State acknowledged that trial counsel was deficient in not raising a First Amendment defense but argued that defendant suffered no prejudice because the defense lacked merit. The state supreme court disagreed, concluding that the First Amendment defense would have prevailed as the drawing "did not appeal to the prurient interest in sex of his five-year-old daughter." "This decision rests on our independent factual conclusion that the drawing at issue is so rudimentary that taken as a whole — including the context of [defendant's] un rebutted testimony about his routine with his daughter — it does not depict a sexual act. And we likewise conclude that the drawing is not sexually suggestive."

State v. Fields*, 84 N.E.3d 193 (Ohio Ct. App. 2017). In case involving defendant's failure to pay city taxes, trial counsel was ineffective in raising the issue of whether defendant owed taxes at all in a motion to dismiss, rather than at trial, and in failing to raise matters relating to whether defendant willfully failed to pay the taxes. Defendant had been given $55,000 during an appearance on the The Ellen DeGeneres Show in order to assist defendant and her four children who were struggling to get by. The tax form defendant received concerning the money indicated it was “nonemployee compensation.” Defendant listed the $55,000 as income on her tax returns but subsequently was unable to pay the assessed taxes. Defendant was charged by the city with knowingly failing or refusing to pay her taxes. Trial counsel moved to dismiss the charges on the ground that the money had been a gift or charity and was mistakenly listed as income. Therefore, no tax was due. The motion was denied by the trial court. Defendant pleaded no contest in order to preserve the right to appeal the denial of the motion to dismiss. She was found guilty. On appeal, the appellate court found that the motion to dismiss was properly denied as it raised a general issue for trial that was not a proper basis for a motion to dismiss. The appellate court went on:

We are concerned by the procedural history of this case. Fields's motion to dismiss raised an issue that was more properly raised at trial, yet the parties and the trial court proceeded on the motion on its merits. This led to the entry of a no contest plea in an effort to preserve the right to appeal the denial of the motion to dismiss. Issues such as whether Fields actually owed income tax (the issue at the motion to dismiss) and whether her failure to pay was willful (which included whether she had an honest dispute about whether she owed taxes and/or had the ability to pay them) were not presented at trial, which would have been the proper forum for those issues.

Given the record, which included sympathetic statements by the trial court, the appellate court found a reasonable probability that the outcome of this case would have been different had defendant proceeded to trial.

2016: Ibar v. State*, 190 So. 3d 1012 (Fla. 2016). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failure to obtain and present expert testimony from a facial identification expert. There was no physical evidence against the defendant, who steadfastly maintained his innocence and presented an alibi defense. The crux of the state’s case was a grainy video of the murders taken by a video surveillance camera installed in the home of one of the three murder victims. The defendant was identified as one of the perpetrators from photographs distilled from the video. An initial joint trial with a co-defendant, in which the co-defendant presented testimony from a forensic anthropologist, resulted in a hung jury. Following separate trials and convictions, the co-defendant’s case was reversed on appeal and he was acquitted. Each time the co-defendant had the expert testimony. The defendant in his separate trial was convicted without ever retaining a facial identification expert. Counsel conceded deficient conduct and the court agreed. Counsel’s explanation was only that he had “a litany of personal and professional issues that were occurring at the time of trial,” including pneumonia, depression, and other physical ailments, a domestic violence charge, concern over his drug-addicted lover who became pregnant with his child, and child custody disputes. Counsel was hospitalized following conviction, even before sentencing proceeded. Counsel had obtained a second-chair counsel and placed the burden of hiring experts on her. While she believed she had a 12 minute call with a facial identification expert, who was prepared to testify, counsel did not follow through and the expert denied in post-conviction that he had been contacted, although he would have been available for retainer if asked. Prejudice was established. The court considered the similarities with the co-defendant's case. Here, counsel had objected to testimony from police officers that a number of lay witnesses identified the defendant from the photos as substantive evidence. On appeal, the court agreed that there was error but found it to be harmless. "Our harmless error analysis would have undoubtedly been different in this case had the surveillance videotape and images been challenged by a facial identification expert at trial."

State v. Joshua*, 201 So.3d 284 (La. Ct. App. 2016). In a case of aggravated battery with a firearm, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to locate and interview eyewitnesses to the shooting. The victim, Shine, had been speaking with a woman named Rita at the time of the shooting. He identified defendant as the assailant. During his interrogation, defendant admitted being present at the crime scene but denied being the shooter. Although he initially claimed not to have seen the shooter, he later stated that he had but refused to identify him. He provided the police with the names of three eyewitnesses: Rita Reliford, "Jeff" and "Duke." Defendant claimed that these eyewitnesses could verify that he wasn't the shooter. At defendant's trial, an officer testified that no witnesses could be located during a canvas of the crime scene and that Rita Reliford could not be found. Shine testified that he had been talking with Rita when defendant got into a verbal altercation with him and then defendant shot him. Defendant agreed in his testimony that Shine had been talking to Rita. According to defendant, however, he merely told Shine to leave and Shine was shot by "Lil Duke" over a drug debt. In post-conviction proceedings, "Rita" was deposed and she corroborated defendant's account and revealed that her cousin was around that night but she didn't know if he witnessed the shooting. Rita explained that all witnesses fled the scene following the shooting because of drug usage. She also stated that she was still living in the area at the time of defendant's trial and would have been willing to testify for defendant if she had been contacted. She was unaware that defendant had been arrested for the shooting prior to moving to New Jersey. Post-conviction counsel could not locate Rita for purposes of testifying at the post-conviction hearing and the post-conviction court granted the state's objection to admission of her deposition testimony. Rita's cousin did testify about the events of the night. Although he did not see who actually shot Shine, he knew it had not been defendant because defendant was standing next to him when he heard the shot. As with Rita, the cousin stated he was unaware of defendant's arrest for a long time and would have testified that defendant was not the shooter had he been contacted. Although trial counsel had no recollection of the case or any files, evidence was presented that trial counsel never requested an investigator even though that would have been the standard protocol under the circumstances. Defendant testified that he provided trial counsel with the names of eyewitnesses, including Rita and her cousin and had assumed they would be contacted and testify on his behalf. When he learned there were no defense witnesses, he felt forced to testify. During his testimony, he was impeached with prior convictions. When the prosecutor falsely asserted during cross-examination that defendant had pled guilty to aggravated arson, defense counsel failed to move for a mistrial. Following the hearing, relief was denied by the post-conviction court. The appellate court first found error in the lower court's ruling denying admission of Rita's deposition testimony. Such testimony was relevant and post-conviction counsel demonstrated her unavailability at the time of the hearing. On appeal, the state conceded that it could not argue in good faith that defendant received the effective assistance of counsel regarding the investigation and presentation of a defense. The appellate court agreed that both deficient performance and prejudice had been established.

Commonwealth v. Williams, 141 A.3d 440 (Pa. 2016). In triple murder case, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness in not cross-examining the prosecution's expert or calling a defense expert concerning inconsistencies between the key prosecution witness's testimony and the forensic evidence. At trial, the prosecution relied primarily on the testimony of White, a purported eyewitness to two of the murders and an accomplice in all three. White testified that the three victims had arranged to purchase weapons from Williams, the leader of a gang that sold weapons and drugs. Williams had planned to rob the men when they met to receive the guns. When the groups met, Williams and members of the gang, including White, held the victims at gunpoint and demanded their money. After the purchase money was turned over, Williams continued to demand additional money from the three victims. When one of the men admitted he had additional money at another location, he was taken by Williams and two other gang members to retrieve the money. Williams and the gang members returned without the victim. White testified that one of the two gang members who accompanied Williams informed White that Williams had shot the victim in the head. The remaining two victims were then loaded in the back of a stolen van. Williams and another gang member were in the back with the victims and continuing to demand more money. White was in the front passenger seat. White testified that he saw Williams shoot the smallest of the three victims in the face while the victim looked at Williams and the gun. A short time later, the van slowed and this victim was thrown out of the back of the van into the street. White then saw Williams put his gun in the face of the remaining victim. White turned to face front and heard two gunshots and the back of the van open. When he next looked back, the third victim was gone, presumably also thrown out of the van. When the victims were later found by authorities, none were in a street but instead on a sidewalk or in a driveway. And each had sustained gunshot wounds but none had other injuries to their bodies, such as bruises or abrasions. Defense counsel did not ask any of the prosecution's expert witnesses a single question. Counsel for one co-defendant did cross-examine two of these witnesses about the absence of non-gun-related injuries to the victims but the witnesses opined that the lack of additional injuries did not establish that the victims had not fallen. Defense counsel argued to the jury that common sense showed that the location and conditions of the bodies were inconsistent with White's account of what occurred. In post-conviction proceedings, defense counsel conceded he had no strategic reason for failing to consult with or present testimony from a medical or forensic expert in order to highlight the problems with White's testimony. Post-conviction counsel presented testimony from an expert in the field of homicide investigation, crime scene analysis and blood spatter analysis. This expert, who was credited by the post-conviction court, opined that the medical and forensic evidence was inconsistent with White's testimony. In finding that this expert's testimony would have been helpful to defendant at trial, the state supreme court noted in particular the expert's opinion that "the blood flow evidence was [] wholly incompatible with White's testimony that the victims were shot and thrown from a moving van." Additionally, the expert testified that none of the victims sustained gunshot wounds consistent with White's testimony that the victim was looking at the shooter's gun when he was shot. As for prejudice, it was noted that although White was subject to significant impeachment, "the cross-examination of White left his story about the three murders at issue largely unscathed." If the jury believed the post-conviction expert's testimony, coupled with other evidence impeaching White's credibility, it is likely the jury would have acquitted defendant of the three murders. Finally, the record supported the post-conviction court's "factual findings and legal conclusion that appellate counsel had no reasonable basis for failing to raise the claim of trial counsel's ineffectiveness for not calling an expert to testify or cross-examining the Commonwealth's experts regarding the blood flow evidence and gunshot wound evidence." (Appellate counsel testified that he had no independent recollection of the appeal but that confining his claims to those appearing on the record, as occurred in defendant's appeal, was consistent with his practice at the relevant time.) Prejudice is established because there was a substantial likelihood that the outcome of defendant's appeal would have been different if the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim had been raised there.

Landry v. State*, 380 P.3d 25 (Utah Ct. App. 2016). In aggravated arson case, trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to the State's use of testimony about an accelerant-detection canine's alerts at the scene of the fire and on items of defendant's clothing and by failing to consult with an arson expert or call an expert witness to refute the State's arson experts. Further, appellate counsel was objectively deficient in failing to present the meritorious claim of trial counsel ineffectiveness on appeal. The fire at issue occurred in an apartment defendant was in the process of moving out of due to eviction. It broke out five to ten minutes after defendant and his girlfriend left, apparently intending to return. Some of defendant's belongings remained in the apartment and he was supposed to meet the apartment complex manager that evening for a walk-through inspection of the apartment. At trial, the State presented expert testimony supporting the arson theory. One aspect of such testimony involved alerts by an accelerant-detection canine. Trial counsel, who had never tried an arson case before, failed to object to this testimony even though existing case law made it highly unlikely that the State would have been able to overcome a proper objection. In preparation for trial, trial counsel spoke only with a fire marshal who was a witness for the State. Obviously, this expert would not have provided trial counsel with a basis to challenge the expert's own findings. The defense theory was that either the fire started accidentally by a cigarette smoked by the girlfriend contacting alcohol spilled on the floor during a party the night before or that it was started by an unknown individual who a neighbor saw outside the apartment around the time the fire began. Both theories had significant evidentiary problems. As shown by post-conviction expert testimony, had trial counsel consulted with or presented testimony from an independent arson expert, she would have had ammunition to challenge how the arson investigation had been conducted as well as the findings of the State's arson experts. The defense post-conviction expert had criticized numerous aspects of the investigation and concluded that the fire should have been classified as of "undetermined origin." Trial counsel's failure to properly educate herself constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is found because: (1) post-conviction expert testimony revealed substantial errors in the State's arson case; (2) under existing case law, trial counsel likely would have kept out the canine alert testimony; and (3) the jury struggled to reach a verdict in this case. (After the jury announced a deadlock, it was told that if it did not reach a verdict that day, it would have to return to deliberate on an extra unplanned day causing a hardship to at least one juror. The jury reached consensus after that admonition.) Because trial counsel's deficient performance prejudiced defendant, "appellate counsel's failure to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel on appeal was likewise objectively deficient and prejudicial."

McLaughlin v. State*, 789 S.E.2d 247 (Ga. Ct. App. 2016). In aggravated assault and battery case, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to withdraw a statutory speedy trial demand and seek a continuance in order to obtain expert evidence of battered person syndrome (BPS) in support of the justification defense. The victim in this case was defendant's boyfriend. Defendant had been convicted on two prior occasions for harming the victim. Trial counsel, who had represented defendant in the two earlier cases, sought to have the charges in this case dismissed based on a justification defense. After hearing the testimony at the motion to dismiss hearing, trial counsel realized that defendant likely suffered from BPS. Nevertheless, trial counsel neither withdrew the speedy trial demand nor sought a continuance to explore BPS. As a result, trial counsel was unable to present evidence explaining taped jailhouse phone conversations between defendant and the victim in which defendant took responsibility for injuring the victim and which were used to impeach defendant. Nor was the defendant able to present evidence explaining why defendant had failed to report the victim's abusive conduct to the police, why she accepted blame for the situation, or why she continued to express love for the victim. An explanation for her behavior could have countered the testimony by a detective who stated that police look to whether a person attempted to distance his or herself from an alleged abuser in determining the veracity of a domestic violation accusation. At the motion for new trial hearing, an expert was presented who found that defendant had been suffering from BPS at the time of the offense and who explained how defendant's behaviors were consistent with BPS. In finding trial counsel's conduct deficient, it was noted that his failure to seek a continuance in order to retain a BPS expert was not based on strategy but rather on his mistaken belief that it was too late to ask for more time. As for prejudice, defendant's sole defense of justification hinged largely on her own testimony. The prosecution was able to impeach that testimony by playing the jailhouse conversations in which defendant apologized to and expressed her love for the victim and accepted blame for the incident. As the expert testimony at the hearing on defendant's new trial motion demonstrated, evidence of BPS would have explained why defendant accepted blame and why defendant's statements were not inconsistent with her claim of justification. Moreover, evidence of BPS would have entitled defendant to a jury instruction that would have allowed the jury to consider whether, given the nature of her abusive relationship with the victim, defendant reasonably believed that his use of force against her was imminent and that she therefore needed to protect herself.

Fisher v. State*, 788 S.E.2d 757 (Ga. 2016). In malice murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to secure the attendance of a witness who could have countered the testimony of the only witness whose testimony directly identified defendant as the shooter, and in agreeing to a jury instruction that the testimony of a single witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact, without requesting an instruction on the exception that if the witness is an accomplice, his testimony must be properly corroborated. The sole witness identifying defendant as the shooter, Lewis, claimed that he was not involved in the crimes even though he admitted that he drove defendant and the victim to the crime scene, was present during the shooting, and drove defendant away afterwards. According to Lewis, who admitted using drugs with the victim, the shooting occurred over a dispute about drug sale proceeds. (Two other witnesses described men arguing about drugs and money.) Defendant denied being at the crime scene. Prior to trial, defense counsel spoke with Clark, an acquaintance of both defendant and Lewis, who informed defense counsel that Lewis was his drug dealer and that he saw Lewis flashing a revolver while looking for the victim to collect on a debt two or three days before the shooting. (The murder weapon was never recovered but it was determined to have been a revolver.) Although Clark provided defense counsel with his contact information, he never heard back from him. Defense counsel intended to have Clark testify, and he included him on the witness list, and yet he failed to secure his attendance at trial, an omission conceded by the State to be deficient performance. As for the failure to seek an instruction on the accomplice exception to the single witness rule, defense counsel conceded it was an oversight and not a tactical decision. Given Lewis's admission to his involvement with defendant in the events before, during and after the crime, and initial lies he'd told to the police, there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that Lewis was an accomplice and not merely present for the crimes as he claimed on the witness stand. On this record, in light of the importance of Lewis's testimony, it would have been unreasonable not to have requested the accomplice instruction. Regarding prejudice, there was no forensic evidence linking defendant to the victim, the crime scene, or the murder weapon. Neither of the two women who heard men seeking drugs and/or money testified that defendant was there during the shooting. Although one offered a description of the shooter that matched defendant, it was general -- about 5'10", medium complexion, with a low haircut and a New Orleans accent -- which would match innumerable other men in Atlanta as well, except perhaps for the accent. Notably, however, Lewis admitted on cross-examination that although he is from Atlanta, he was known in the community as "N.O.," or New Orleans, because of his voice. "[H]ad Clark testified, the jury could have chosen not to believe what he said about Lewis. But that is exactly the point. Due to the deficient performance of [defendant's] trial counsel, the jurors who found him guilty did not have the opportunity to hear Clark testify or to consider the evidence they did hear with the instruction that if they found Lewis to be an accomplice to the shooting, they must treat him unlike the other witnesses and decide whether his identification of [defendant] was corroborated by other evidence. A jury that heard Clark and was properly instructed might reach the same verdict, but we cannot say that with confidence."

People v. Goods*, 62 N.E.3d 1168 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). In murder case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to assert self-defense and ask for a corresponding instruction or an instruction on second degree murder. The prosecution's theory was that defendant and the co-defendant planned in advance to kill the victim. Through defendant's statements and the argument of defense counsel, there was some evidence of the elements of self-defense, i.e., defendant believed he was in imminent danger from both the victim and the co-defendant. Whether defendant's belief was reasonable was a determination to be made by the jury. Supporting a finding of deficient performance was the fact that defense counsel initially sought to invoke compulsion as an affirmative defense, a defense unavailable for a murder charge under state law. It was only after that defense was precluded by the trial court that defense counsel switched to a theory that defendant shot the victim after he had been killed by the co-defendant. But this theory failed to relieve defendant of liability given that the jury was given an accountability instruction making defendant liable for the co-defendant's actions. In addition, an argument in defense counsel's unsuccessful motion for new trial indicated defense counsel erroneously believed he was not allowed the defense of self-defense. On this record, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to invoke self-defense and failing to seek appropriate instructions. Prejudice is shown in part by the co-defendant's conviction in a separate trial of second degree murder.

Fatumabahirtu v. United States*, 148 A.3d 260 (D.C. Ct. App. 2016). In case involving a conviction for the attempted possession of drug paraphernalia with intent to sell, trial counsel was found ineffective for failing to investigate a mistaken-identification defense. Defendant worked a few days a week as a clerk at a gas station convenience store. One day, an undercover officer came in and asked to buy an “ink pen.” According to the officer, defendant was the clerk and she provided the officer with an ink pen and a copper scouring pad, items commonly used to make crack pipes. A search warrant was executed the following week while defendant was present at the store and glass pens and copper scouring pads were seized. This search formed the basis for the charges against defendant. In coram nobis proceedings, defense counsel conceded that he did not pursue a mistaken-identification defense but instead focused on attacking the government’s evidence that defendant knew or had reason to know that the pen and scouring pad constituted drug paraphernalia. Even assuming defense counsel made a strategic decision to present a single defense rather than combining two possible defenses, he made that decision prior to conducting a reasonable investigation. At trial, defendant testified that she had never seen the undercover officer before, she did not recall ever selling a pen and scouring pad together, and that she never would have combined items to sell if a customer had asked for a single item. Defendant’s account supported an investigation into mistaken identification which would have revealed that another clerk worked at the store every day and better fit the description given by the undercover officer of the clerk who sold him the pen and pad. This clerk also acknowledged in the coram nobis proceeding that she owned and sometimes wore to work the type of attire described by the undercover officer. Defendant, in contrast, denied having and wearing similar items. That defendant had not informed trial counsel that she was not the sales clerk on the day the undercover officer made the purchase leading to the search did not defeat her claim. Given that defendant was present when the search warrant was executed, and that she was especially new to the United States and not fluent in English, it was understandable that she failed to recognize the importance of her absence from the store on the date the undercover officer made the purchase. That defendant could not conclusively prove that the other clerk, and not herself, was working when the purchase occurred did not defeat a finding of prejudice. There was a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different had counsel not performed deficiently.

Commonwealth v. Millien*, 50 N.E.3d 808 (Mass. 2016). Retained counsel was ineffective in assault and battery on a child resulting in death case for failing to seek public funds to retain an expert witness to assist the defense with testimony and cross-examination of the state’s experts. The defendant’s six-month old daughter died in his care. The state’s experts testified that the baby died due to “shaken baby syndrome” and the injuries could not have been caused by the baby falling off a couch onto the floor as the defendant claimed. Counsel had asked the defendant’s father, who had retained him, for the necessary funds but failed to apply to the court for funds when the father refused retainer of an expert. Counsel’s conduct was deficient, “not because he failed to understand that he needed an expert witness to advise him regarding the medical evidence and to offer opinion testimony, but because he failed to seek funds from the court to retain an expert witness for his indigent client.” “Where, as here, the defendant was indigent and the family member who was otherwise furnishing funds for the defense refused to pay for an expert witness, it was manifestly unreasonable for defense counsel not to apply to the judge for the funds needed to retain an expert witness.” Id. at ____ (citing Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1088 (2014)). Prejudice also established. A defense expert would have “called into question whether shaken baby syndrome is a valid and scientifically supported medical diagnosis.” Likewise, a defense expert could have provided “numerous scientific studies supporting the view that shaking alone cannot produce injuries of the type and severity suffered by” the victim in this case and would have “put forth an alternative theory of the cause” of the child’s injuries consistent with the defendant’s statements that the injuries were caused by the baby accidentally falling off the couch. There were also “numerous scientific studies in support of an opinion that accidental short falls can produce injuries of the nature and severity suffered by” the victim in this case. The prejudice was especially clear because, in post-conviction, one of the state’s experts even changed her opinion “that shaking alone” caused the injuries.

State v. Weber*, 373 P.3d 26 (Mont. 2016). Counsel ineffective in felony theft case for failing to adequately prepare and present defense evidence concerning the value of the property stolen. The defendant was a janitor at a high school charged with stealing a tool used to cut metal and steal. The defendant was charged with theft of property in excess of $1,500. Counsel sought to show that the value was less than $1,500, which would have reduced the conviction to a misdemeanor. The prior teacher of the shop class that used the tool had created an inventory of property listed the machine as a 2009 model and valuing it at $1500. The list was provided in discovery. During trial, the state called the new shop teacher, who had been in the job for three weeks at the time of the theft, to testify that the school purchased a new replacement tool for $2,100. Counsel tried to introduce the prior inventory during cross-examination but was denied due to lack of foundation. Counsel then called the defense investigator to try to establish a lesser value. “In the end, Weber’s counsel did not successfully introduce evidence that could support his theory of reduced value of the plasma cutter (other than the fact it was not new) that could reduce Weber’s felony charge to a misdemeanor.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to offer the inventory list as a business record admissible under Montana Rule of Evidence 803(6). Likewise, if counsel had investigated, he would have realized that the inventory was created by the prior teacher, who could have been called to testify and the inventory offered through his testimony. More broadly, counsel’s conduct was deficient in his general failure to establish the value of the used tool, leaving the state’s replacement value more or less unchallenged. Prejudice established as, “barring an acquittal for Weber” the valuation evidence was key to the defense and could have made the difference between a maximum sentence of 10 years and a maximum sentence of six months.

Johnson v. Premo, 370 P.3d 553 (Or. App. Ct. 2016), aff’d, 399 P.3d 431 (Or. 2017). Counsel ineffective in aggravated murder trial for failing to investigate and present expert testimony that the victim’s death was due to a morphine overdose and not strangulation. The victim’s body was found along a beach in Clatsop County. State experts testified that she had high levels of morphine in her blood but she died from strangulation. Substantial evidence, including DNA from semen in the victim’s vagina, connected the defendant to the case. The State’s theory was that the defendant, who had a history of drugging women and then sexually assaulting them, had done so in this case and killed her at his home in Washington County before taking her body and dumping it from a bridge. The defendant told counsel that the victim had died at his home in Washington County from a drug overdose. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because, without investigating this possibility, defense counsel relied on a theory of “defense” that the victim died from drowning in Clatsop County because she was alive when the defendant threw her off the bridge. Counsel presented several experts to say that drowning was a possibility. In other words, the defense was only a “venue defense,” which “was not a reasonable tactical decision deserving of deference” because counsel did not investigate the possibility of a drug overdose despite the defendant telling him that’s what actually happened. Instead, counsel hoped for an acquittal despite admission that the defendant threw the live victim from a bridge killing her by drowning and despite language in the indictment that permitted venue in the defendant’s home county of Washington if the jury could not determine the location of death. Prejudice was established. Two experts testified in post-conviction that the most likely cause of death was a morphine overdose. Even though the jury could still have determined that the defendant was responsible for the victim’s death, the defense could have argued that the defendant was guilty of a lesser offense, such as manslaughter, criminally negligent homicide, or unintentional felony murder. Even if the jury still had convicted the defendant of aggravated murder, unless the jury found that it was “deliberate,” the defendant would not have been eligible for the death penalty.

2015: Starling v. State*, 130 A.3d 316 (Del. 2015). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for: (1) failing to cross-examine an eyewitness about prior exculpatory statements to an investigator; and (2) failing to object to admission of the defendant’s brother’s statement to police, which was likely involuntary. The case involved the shooting of a man and 5-year-old boy in a barbershop. A month later, Gaines, the victim of an unrelated shooting, identified the defendant as his shooter and the barbershop shooter after Gaines had been arrested for violating probation and possession of drugs. Gaines also told the police that he and the defendant’s brother were present after the shooting when the defendant expressed remorse for shooting the child. The defendant’s 23-year-old brother was questioned extensively without any rights warnings and while being denied outside contact. He was threatened with being charged in the barbershop murders and obstruction of justice, which the police admitted, unless he told the police what they already knew, i.e., that the defendant expressed remorse for shooting the child. The defendant’s brother finally acquiesced. An eyewitness from the barbershop, who chased the shooter when he ran from the barbershop, told an investigator after seeing photographs of the two suspects in the newspapers, one of which was the defendant, that neither man “had the same appearance as the shooter.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. First, during trial, counsel intended to cross-examine the eyewitness with this statement but forgot to do so. Afterwards, when he remembered he was unable to locate the witness to recall him to testify. This error was prejudicial. This witness “arguably had the best view of the shooter,” other witnesses had given contradictory descriptions of the shooter, and there was no physical evidence linking the defendant to the crime scene. Second, counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to admission of the defendant’s brother’s statement through a police officer. Under state law, voluntary out-of-court prior statements of a witness who is present and subject to cross-examination is admissible. A threshold determination of voluntariness must be made by the court before admission. Here, because of counsel’s failure to object no such determination was made despite “substantial evidence pointing to the involuntariness” of the statement. Trial counsel did not object because he believed the statement to be admissible. This conduct was unreasonable and prejudicial. These two errors in combination with a Brady violation due to the state’s affirmative misinformation that the charges against Gaines remained pending – when, in fact, they had been dismissed prior to trial – required reversal due to the “cumulative effect of the[] mistakes.”

Commonwealth v. Hampton*, 36 N.E.3d 586 (Mass. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in assault and battery upon correctional officer case for failing to investigate and adequately present defense. The theory of defense was that the officer used excessive force and was the initial aggressor. Nonetheless, counsel failed to interview another inmate who observed a portion of the altercation and would have testified consistent with the defense theory. Counsel simply relied on the information from the prosecution witnesses that no one other than officers witnessed the incident. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on sufficient strategy. Prejudice also established. Despite the trial court's finding that the other inmate was not credible, under the state law analysis required for prejudice, "the question of the witness's credibility should have been left to the jury."

State v. Pierre*, 127 A.3d 1260 (N.J. 2015). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately investigate and corroborate the alibi defense. The defendant was one of several suspects charged in a shooting in Elizabeth, New Jersey, at 3:19 a.m. on March 20, 2004. His defense was that he and one of his codefendants were on their way to visit the defendant's relatives in Florida at that time. During trial, a speeding ticket issued in his name as the driver of his car was admitted into evidence. The ticket had been issued 750 miles away in South Carolina less than four hours before the crime. The defendant's cell phone records showing a call to his girlfriend from South Carolina about three hours before the time of the crime. The state argued that the defendant's brother, who had a similar appearance and the defendant's driver's license and phone, was the driver and caller from South Carolina. While counsel's decision to present an alibi surrounding the speeding ticket was a sound strategic choice, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present corroborating evidence "that could have reinforced that alibi." Counsel failed to interview and present the testimony of the brother and a sister who would have testified that the brother did not know how to drive, had no driver's license at the time, had never taken the defendant's car, and was in New Jersey at the time of the crime. Counsel also failed to offer into evidence the defendant's additional cell phone records showing a number of calls to his girlfriend from Florida in the week after the crime. Finally, counsel failed to interview relatives in Florida and failed to present the testimony of three of them that it was the defendant and not his brother who had visited in March 2004. Prejudice was established. The evidence implicating the defendant at trial was "sparse." The defendant was not identified by any witness in the days and weeks following the crime, although the other three men charged were identified by witnesses. The only witness to identify the defendant from a photo array did not do so until ten months after the crime. Prior to that time she had provided no description of the man whom she identified as the defendant. The only other witness placing the defendant in New Jersey on the night of the crime was an acquaintance of the defendant, who "was a frequent cocaine user at the time of the shooting as well as when she provided her statement to police."

State v. Reeves*, 782 S.E.2d 747 (S.C. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct with a minor and lewd acts case for failing to call a medical expert to challenge the state's medical evidence. The alleged victim testified that the defendant had inappropriately touched her from age four (lewd acts) and "stuck his finger" in her vagina when she was 10-years-old (CSC). About three weeks later, she reported the abuse and was examined by an emergency room doctor, who testified that he observed a "healing scar" on the alleged victim's hymen that was consistent with penetration within 30 days earlier. A month later, the alleged victim was examined by an expert in pediatrics, who found no abnormalities. Retained counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present the testimony of a gynecological expert, even though counsel was aware that the state would rely on evidence of physical trauma. While counsel recalled that "there was a question about money," counsel never sought funding, which may have been available, through the Office of Indigent Defense and never discussed hiring a medical expert with the defendant. This was not "a legitimate trial strategy" excusing counsel's behavior. Prejudice established because a defense expert could have testified, contrary to the state's argument that the injury could only have been caused by abuse, that an injury to the hymen could have been caused by means other than sexual abuse. Likewise, a defense expert could have testified that an injury would have to be substantial to be apparent three weeks later and there was no evidence of substantial injury here.

Garrido v. State*, 162 So. 3d 1069 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in kidnapping and sexual battery case for failing to pursue an alibi defense once the prosecutor disclosed a new range of offense dates after the jury had been sworn. The initial date was November 3 at noon. The defense provided notice of an alibi with four witnesses supporting his defense that he was at work. After the jury was sworn, the prosecutor, over objection, amended the dates of the charge to be between November 5 and November 9 with the alleged time still being around noon on a weekday. Counsel declined a mistrial or continuance, did not investigate or even talk to the alibi witnesses, and presented no evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present an alibi as supervisors and co-workers provided testimony and documentation that the defendant was working on a job in Boca Raton, a more than two hour drive from the alleged crime location, from 8:00-5:00 each day, November 5-9. Counsel's explanation for the failure to present evidence was that he wanted to preserve the error in allowing the dates to be changed. Counsel did not understand that by refusing to accept a mistrial or continuance, "he ended up waiving the very error he would to preserve." Prejudice established.

People v. Lofton*, 42 N.E.3d 885 (Ill. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the use of prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence and for failing to object to inadmissible hearsay. The case involved the shooting of Dowthard on Jefferson Street. Dowthard's sister, an eyewitness, testified that he was shot after laughing at the man who said, "Stick your hands up." She could not identify the shooter that night but described his clothing including the "hoodie" on his head and bandana wrapped around his face, such that she could see only from the bottom of his eyes to the middle of his forehead. A year later, she was shown a photo line-up, and "identified" the defendant "from his body structure, his neck, and his eyes." Another woman, McLaurin, who was Jones' girlfriend and had identified the defendant from a photo array a year after the crime, denied recollection but admitted her signature was on the photo array. The state went through her grand jury testimony question by question. Jones, the defendant's cousin and McLaurin's boyfriend, testified that the defendant had told him on the night of the crime that he was planning to commit a robbery ("hitting some licks") and called a half-hour later saying he "had just shot somebody." A day or two later, Jones was at the home of his sister, Johnson, who was yelling at the defendant who was not responding. The state then went through Jones' grand jury testimony question by question about the substance of the conversation. Jones denied any recollection of his grand jury testimony and denied that the defendant ever confessed to him.

Capital Case*

Jones admitted, however, that he told the prosecutor and an investigator the day before trial that the defendant said he shot someone, but denied that he said the shooting occurred on Jefferson street. Tate, who had lived with the defendant and Johnson at the time of the crime, testified that the morning after the crime, Johnson and the defendant were talking but he did not “catch the conversation.” The state then examined him based on a prior written statement, but he denied that he had ever said that he heard the defendant say “that he had shot the dude from the night before on Jefferson.” Detective Mastroianni testified that he had interviewed Jones a year after the crime and Jones told him that the defendant called after the crime saying he shot someone on Jefferson after the victim laughed at him. The detective also testified that Jones told him the next day he heard the defendant tell Johnson about the robbery and shooting on Jefferson. The detective also testified and produced a written statement of his interview with Tate a year after the crime in which Tate had said that the morning after the crime, he heard the defendant say to Johnson and Jones that he had shot the guy on Jefferson while he was trying to rob him. The written statement was admitted into evidence. Another officer testified about the prior statements of McLaurin generally implicating the defendant and her identification of him from a photo array. Her statements were never reduced to a written statement. The grand jury testimony of McLaurin and Jones was then admitted into evidence by stipulation. In his grand jury testimony, Jones had admitted that the defendant told him he shot a guy on Jefferson Street in a struggle over money, but denied that it was because the guy laughed at him. Finally, the state attorney’s investigator testified that two days before trial, Jones told him that the morning after the crime he heard the defendant talking to Johnson about the shooting and robbery. The investigator did not obtain a written statement and wrote a report only on the morning of his testimony. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the use of Tate’s and Jones’ prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence. The state used Tate’s prior written statement as substantive evidence, in addition to having Detective Mastroianni to give “repetitious testimony” about the statement. The same is true of the portions of Jones’ oral statements recounted by Mastroianni and Lindmark. These statements met no exception under state law allowing their use as substantive evidence. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to a portion of McLaurin’s grand jury testimony. While grand jury testimony is generally admissible, the portions where McLaurin relayed to her what the defendant allegedly said to him was inadmissible hearsay. While the state kept this out during testimony, it went to the jury when defense counsel stipulated to the grand jury testimony going to the jury in “written form.” There was “no strategic reason for counsel’s failures.” Prejudice also established. “Other than hearsay statements involving defendant’s alleged confessions to others, there is very little evidence to tie defendant to Dowthard’s killing.” The only admissible evidence of defendant’s alleged confession was from Jones’ grand jury testimony, which gave the motive as a struggle rather than the victim’s laughter. By admission of the inadmissible evidence, the jury heard “at least half a dozen” other references to the alleged confession, which was not just “duplicative” but prejudicial.

Commonwealth v. Alcide*, 33 N.E.3d 424 (Mass. 2015). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately investigate and present significant evidence supporting the third-party culprit defense and failing to challenge two in-court identifications of the defendant that should have been excluded. The case involved a shooting following an argument between two groups outside of a pub. The murder weapon was not recovered and no forensic evidence identified the defendant as the shooter. The defense was that someone else outside the pub shot the victim. The state’s case relied heavily on the testimony of the defendant's "friends" in his group, who all had close ties to each other. All four of these witnesses testified that the defendant made statements admitting to the shooting and one of them testified that he saw the defendant lift his hand beforehand hearing the gunshot and seeing the victim fall. Two independent eyewitnesses also identified the defendant as the shooter, but they were unable to do so for photo line-ups shortly after the crime and identified the defendant only after seeing his picture in the newspaper following his arrest in the case and/or being shown only a picture of the defendant by the prosecutor shortly before the trial. One of the victim's friends, however, did not identify the defendant as the shooter. He said the shooter ran to a light colored Honda Accord afterwards, which did not match the defendant's vehicle or the vehicle the rest of his group rode in. One of the victim's friends did identify the defendant from a photo lineup as the shooter, but she also said that the shooter dropped a cellphone while running away afterwards. It was undisputed that the cellphone was dropped by Dor, one of the defendant's "friends" and state witnesses that identified him as the shooter. While counsel argued that a third party, probably Dor, was the shooter, counsel presented no additional evidence in support of this theory. The state conceded that counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy. Counsel did not review discovery, examine the state's physical evidence, conduct any independent investigation, or seek exclusion of any of the state's evidence. As a result, significant evidence supporting the third-party culprit defense was not presented at trial and two in-court identifications of the defendant that should have been excluded were admitted in evidence. Specifically, if counsel had adequately prepared, the evidence would have established that one of the victim's friends described the clothing worn by the shooter in a manner consistent with Dor's neighbor, Heidi's, description of the clothing Dor wore that day. This same witness described the shooter as having "short dread locks," which matched Dor and not the defendant, who had a short, "fuzzy head," haircut. Likewise, Dor's girlfriend said to Heidi shortly after the shooting that "her man" was the shooter. Heidi's testimony likely would have been admissible under state law even if Dor's girlfriend would not admit this statement in her own testimony. There was other evidence available that Dor "had both a motive and an intent to engage in violence toward the victim's group of friends" shortly prior to the shooting. This evidence was available through the statements of three friends and neighbors of Dor. At least some of this evidence would have been admissible at trial. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to challenge the identifications of the defendant as the shooter by persons that first identified him from news articles related to the arrest. Under state law, these identifications would have been excluded from evidence if they had been challenged by the defense. Prejudice was established.

People v. Ackley, 870 N.W.2d 858 (Mich. 2015). Counsel ineffective in murder of child case for failing to investigate and present expert testimony concerning the cause of death. The case involved the death of the three-year-old daughter of the defendant's live-in girlfriend, while the child was in his care. The defendant testified that she had been napping alone in her room before he found her lying on the floor next to the bed unresponsive and called emergency services. The state alleged that the defendant killed the child either by blunt force trauma or shaking her and presented expert testimony to that affect. Specifically, the state called five medical experts opining that death was caused "by nonaccidental shaking, blunt force trauma, or a combination of both." Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present contrary evidence to support the defense of an accidental fall, despite the availability of funding for expert assistance. Counsel had contacted one forensic pathologist, Dr. Hunter, who explained that the medical community was sharply divided on this issue almost in a religious manner and that he was not the expert the defense wanted because he was of the wrong religious camp. He did, however, refer counsel to Dr. Shuman, a well-known forensic pathologist, who had conducted substantial research in the area and had the right religious beliefs to support the intended defense. Counsel never contacted Dr. Shuman and never even researched the issue. Instead, he continued consulting Dr. Hunter, who continued to warn “you don’t want me as your defense expert.” If counsel had consulted Dr. Shuman or another expert, he would have been able to present expert testimony that the bruises on the child’s body were consistent with the life-saving measures used that day and that her head injuries were likely caused by an accidental “mild impact” trauma rather than abuse. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as there was no reasonably objective explanation for counsel’s decision to confine his search for expert assistance to an expert who was “a self-proclaimed opponent of the very defense theory counsel was to employ at trial,” who even referred counsel to a more suitable expert. Likewise, counsel did nothing to prepare himself otherwise. These “sparse efforts” did not satisfy Strickland’s “‘duty to make reasonable investigations or to make a reasonable decision that makes particular investigations unnecessary,’ especially in light of the prominent controversy within the medical community” on this topic. Id. at ____ (citations omitted). Two things resulted: “a defense theory without objective, expert testimonial support, and a defense counsel insufficiently equipped to challenge the prosecution’s experts because he possessed only Dr. Hunter’s reluctant and admittedly ill-suited input as his guide.” This was not a case of requiring counsel to “shop for experts,” as counsel did no shopping at all and settled on the first one he encountered despite the importance of the issue and despite that expert’s “specific recommendation to contact a different and more suitable expert.” Hunter’s additional statements that Shuman “would not buy into every story” and was “a man of science” were not reasons to avoid contacting Shuman, but instead were “consistent with scientific integrity.” Prejudice was established. “While we cannot say that a battle of the experts would have ensured the defendant’s acquittal, counsel’s failure to prepare or show up for the battle sufficiently ‘undermine[s our] confidence in the outcome’ of this case to entitle the defendant to relief. Id. at ____ (quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 694).

People v. Cassala*, 15 N.Y.S.3d 479 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015). Counsel was ineffective under state law “meaningful representation” standard in attempted rape case for failing to investigate and challenge the state’s case, based on the alleged victim’s bleeding disorder, and failing to object to the testimony of the defendant’s former spouse concerning his sexual preference for anal intercourse. The charges involved three separate instances where the defendant allegedly forcibly anally assaulted a 15-year-old victim. While the sexual assault nurse examiner (“SANE”) found no physical evidence of assault, she noted in her report that the alleged victim had been diagnosed with a bleeding disorder, “VWD.” The SANE testified at trial that it was not unusual not to find physical evidence and that this was not inconsistent the alleged victim’s testimony. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate despite being aware of the disorder and being unaware of what “VWD” meant. Investigation and consultation with an expert would have revealed that this is Von Willebrand Disease, which would have made the presence of bruising or bleeding during forceful, non-consensual anal intercourse far more likely than in a person without VWD. This would have provided powerful cross-examination evidence for the SANE and the defense could have presented its own powerful expert testimony. These failing “were magnified by the fact that the People's only direct evidence of defendant's guilt was the victim's testimony, making counsel's efforts to undermine her credibility of paramount importance." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the defendant's ex-wife's testimony or to request a limiting instruction related to this evidence. There was a "legitimate question" about whether the prejudicial effect of her testimony substantially outweighed its probative value, especially considering her lack of sexual relations with the defendant for at least several years prior to the alleged assaults. Even if this evidence was admissible, the defendant was entitled to a limiting instruction under state law. Prejudice from this unlimited propensity evidence was clear as the jury asked during deliberations to have read back the evidence of the defendant's "past sex life." Counsel also failed to object to prosecution arguments asking jurors to put themselves in the "victim's shoes" and to advocate or "fight" for her in the deliberations. The "cumulative effect" of counsel's conduct deprived the defendant of "meaningful representation" and required reversal.

People v. Graham*, 11 N.Y.S.3d 242 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015). Counsel ineffective under state law in second degree murder case for failing to investigate a mental defense to charge that the defendant stabbed his former girlfriend to death while she was driving a car, despite awareness of the defendant's psychiatric history, which included several hospitalizations, and despite being authorized by the trial court to obtain an independent psychiatric evaluation. Under state law, a defendant need only show that he was denied "meaningful representation." "[S]ome showing of prejudice" is required, "albeit not necessarily the 'but for' prejudice required under federal law." Here, that standard was met.

Freiburger v. State*, 775 S.E.2d 391 (S.C. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to introduce a letter rebutting the state's ballistics evidence. The case involved a 1961 murder of a taxi driver. Three bullet fragments were recovered from the victim's head, which identified the murder weapon as a .32 caliber revolver. The defendant was arrested carrying a .32. Another potential suspect, Dreher, was also found to possess a .32. Ballistics testing at the time could not conclusively identify either weapon as the murder weapon and no charges were brought. In 2000, the Richland County Sheriff's Department reopened the case. Five ballistics examiners from the South Carolina Law Enforcement Division (SLED), headed by Parnell, reported inconclusive results in which neither weapon could be included or excluded as the murder weapon. The Sheriff's Department hired a private ballistics expert, Cayton, who concluded that Freiburger's gun was the murder weapon. During trial, Parnell testified concerning the inconclusive findings of SLED, but qualified this by saying there was "a remarkable similarity" with Freiburger's revolver but not enough for him to say it was a match. The state also called Stokes, who had been a SLED ballistics examiner from 1954-1981. Stokes testified that Lt. Cate set up the SLED ballistics division and that Stokes had been his "first understudy." According to Stokes, he worked with Lt. Cate on the case and the two of them had excluded the Dreher gun. Finally, Cayton testified that Freiburger's weapon was the murder weapon. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to introduce into evidence a letter from 1961 in which the Chief of SLED stated that Lt. Cate's opinion was that the Dreher gun was the murder weapon. Counsel stated no strategic reason for the failure. Prejudice was established as the state's case "was purely circumstantial, and – other than ballistics – weak." The letter would have contradicted Cayton, upset the "apparent unanimity" of the State's experts, and contradicted Stokes about the results of the 1961 testing. In short, admission of this letter “would have deeply undermined the State’s case.”

Capital Case*

State v. Jones, 352 P.3d 776 (Wash. 2015). Counsel was ineffective in second degree assault case for failing to interview several eyewitnesses clearly identified in the discovery provided by the state and failing to present this testimony. The case involved a street fight involving the defendant, the alleged victim, and three of the alleged victim’s friends. The state’s witnesses, including the alleged victim’s friends involved in the fight, generally identified the defendant as the aggressor and testified that he held a knife. A sole defense witness, Forbes, who was a neutral bystander, testified that it was essentially mutual combat and the defendant drew the knife only to protect himself after the three other men joined the fight. Based on a detective’s testimonial mention of a witness listed in discovery that counsel had failed to interview, counsel sought a mistrial believing inaccurately that this witness’ identity had not been disclosed. The court granted a continuance instead and the witness was then called by the prosecution. This witness, Brown, testified that the alleged victim had been chasing the defendant prior to the altercation. She also never saw a knife and only heard reference to it after the alleged victim’s three friends joined the fray. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview Brown and failing to interview Hamilton, another eyewitness disclosed by the state in the discovery papers. Hamilton would have testified that the alleged victim had tackled the defendant and started beating him before the alleged victim’s friends joined in. He saw the defendant with a knife only after he had been tackled and all four men were assaulting him. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to interview witness Ooveda, who had been listed in an incident report in discovery. The prosecutor interviewed her at the beginning of the trial and informed counsel she might have evidence favorable to the defense, but counsel still did not interview her. In finding no prejudice for failing to call Hamilton, the trial court relied on counsel’s post-trial testimony that when he read the transcript of Hamilton’s 911 call after trial, he did not believe that Hamilton’s testimony would have been helpful. This was error. “Strategic decisions are made before, not after, taking the challenged action” and counsel’s testimony, after the fact, about the helpfulness of the potential testimony was nothing more than “hindsight.” Prejudice was established due to the failure to present Hamilton’s testimony, which would have corroborated Brown’s testimony and bolstered Forbes’ credibility, while also diminishing the credibility of the state’s witnesses. “The failure to interview Brown and Ooveda compounds the prejudice.”

State v. Coleman, 865 N.W.2d 190 (Wis. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault of 13-year-old child on two occasions case for multiple reasons. First, counsel informed the jury during voir dire and the opening statement that the defendant had been previously convicted of a crime and is “not an angel.” This evidence was not admissible because the defendant did not testify. Second, counsel also informed the jury that it was counsel’s decision to make and he had decided the defendant would testify. The defendant did not testify and counsel did not take responsibility for that in the closing. Because counsel conceded that the defendant never indicated an intent to testify, there could be no reasonable strategy to explain this conduct. Third, counsel failed to impeach the alleged victim with statements to three different people that the defendant had ejaculated during the second alleged assault when there was no male DNA on her clothing or bedding. Counsel’s only explanation for failing to present this evidence was that counsel “didn’t want to talk about any sticky, wet substance on a 13-year old girl.” This explanation was not reasonable as these prior statements were relevant and material in light of the lack of DNA evidence. Finally, counsel failed to impeach the alleged victim with her father's prior statements contradicting her trial testimony about events on the day of the first alleged assault. While this last aspect "might be minor," standing alone, "is was not the only misstep." Prejudice established based on the "cumulative effect" of the errors. There was no physical evidence and no witnesses, such that the entire case depended on the credibility of the alleged victim. Counsel's errors bolstered her credibility by failing to impeach her and impugned the defendant's character by providing inadmissible information.

2014: Robinson v. State, 141 So. 3d 656 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to timely subpoena the defendant's girlfriend to testify. This was a "he said, he said" case where the defendant and the alleged victim each claimed that the other was the aggressor. The only other witness to the confrontation was the defendant's girlfriend, who did testify in sentencing. Thus, the record was sufficient to find deficient conduct and prejudice on direct appeal.

Humphrey v. Williams*, 761 S.E.2d 297 (Ga. 2014). Trial counsel was ineffective in child molestation and statutory rape case involving the defendant's stepdaughter and her friend for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence concerning an alleged similar transaction of sexual abuse against his daughter in Florida seven years before. While trial counsel argued that the similar transaction evidence should be excluded, he presented no witnesses and offered no evidence. During trial, the state presented the defendant's daughter, Jessica, as its final witness. She testified that the defendant had gotten into bed with her, put his hand under her shirt, and rubbed her behind over her underwear on one occasion when she was 11 years old. She reported the incident to social services and was placed in a foster home before eventually being sent to the defendant's mother and then returned to the defendant. The defense presented four witnesses to counter her testimony. The defendant's sisters testified that "the State" returned Jessica to the defendant's custody, but the State challenged this in cross-examination alleging that there was no legal process and the defendant's mother simply returned Jessica to him. The defendant's mother testified that Jessica made shifting allegations against the defendant "in the context of a custody battle with Jessica's mother." She testified that the "allegations were investigated and shown to be false." Counsel did not, however, introduce documents from the Florida proceedings which supported the testimony that Jessica's allegations had been found to be false by a Florida court and that the court had, in fact, ordered that she be returned to the defendant's custody. At the close of the evidence, when the trial court asked the defendant if he was satisfied with counsel's performance, the defendant specifically stated that he wanted counsel to call additional witnesses and introduce the Florida records. The court offered to continue the case for a day, but counsel intervened and asked to speak to the defendant. After that, counsel reported (and the defendant agreed) that they did not want a continuance because counsel believed the information was "already in the case sufficiently." The prosecutor's closing argument started with the assertion that "[t]here is not the first bit of evidence that Jessica was not believed by a Florida court." Trial counsel also represented the defendant on direct appeal and again challenged the trial court's admission of the similar transaction evidence unsuccessfully. In state habeas proceedings on the ineffectiveness claims, the Florida court records were presented. These records had been obtained by the defendant's mother from the courthouse in the adjacent county one week after trial. She notified defense counsel but he “said they wouldn’t have any bearing on the case.” The records contradicted Jessica’s testimony at trial. She had previously alleged only that the defendant had kissed her and told her “she would get anything she wanted if she would have sex with him for ten minutes.” After ten months of bi-weekly counseling sessions, a social worker reported to the court reported “conflicting and confusing” allegations by Jessica and concluded with the social worker’s “clinical opinion that . . . no actual abuse occurred.” A school psychologist had also reported in a letter that Jessica “lies easily.” A joint report from a social services attorney and a counselor also reported that Jessica lies. The Florida court returned custody to the defendant and terminated the involvement of social services. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to obtain these records and present them to the trial court to get the similar transaction evidence excluded. Counsel was aware of the Florida court proceedings but made no effort to obtain the records “although any competent lawyer knows that courts produce documents reflecting (and usually explaining) such decisions.” The Florida court records “presented an obvious source of information and evidence for presentation at the similar transaction hearing to try to exclude [Jessica’s] testimony altogether and for impeachment if Jessica was allowed to testify at trial.” Moreover, the records were easily accessible from the neighboring county “as revealed by the fact that Williams—operating pro se and from a Georgia prison—was able to obtain them without difficulty.” Prejudice was established. The failure to present the Florida records “enabled the prosecutor to insinuate falsely on cross-examination” that Jessica had been returned to the defendant’s custody “without any kind of court order to that effect. The prosecutor also “claim[ed] falsely in closing argument that Jessica did not make shifting allegations” and that there was no evidence that she had not been believed by the Florida court. Aside from Jessica’s testimony, the other evidence of guilt was “conflicting.” The significance of Jessica’s testimony in the trial was clear as she testified last for the state and the defense presented four witnesses just to contradict her testimony. “The importance of the similar transaction evidence was also demonstrated by the prosecutor’s repeated references to it in his closing argument—references that the Florida court records show to be untrue in significant part.”

Douglas v. State*, 761 S.E.2d 180 (Ga. Ct. App. 2014). Trial counsel was ineffective in armed robbery, aggravated assault, possession of weapon, carjacking, and misdemeanor obstruction of an officer case for failing to obtain the criminal records of the three alleged victims and impeach them on that basis. The three alleged victims testified that they were in the park together when they were robbed by two armed men of over $1100 in cash, cell phones, and a car. The robbers attempted to leave in the car and were immediately in a car accident. They then split up and ran and the alleged victims chased them joined a witness to the robbery. Ultimately the police were involved and when a police officer spotted the defendant the witness, who had lost sight of the robbers during the chase, identified him as one of the suspects. The defendant attempted to run from the officer but was ultimately subdued and arrested. He had approximately $300 on him, but no weapon or cell phone and none was found along the route of the chase. After the defendant was cuffed and sitting in the police car, the three victims identified him as one of the robbers. The defense theory was misidentification. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to obtain the criminal records of the alleged victims and use the information to impeach them. Counsel admitted the deficiency and the lack of a strategic reason for the failure. Prejudice was established as the identification of the defendant as the robber rested almost entirely on these witnesses. The alleged victims had all been convicted of drug-related offenses and two of them actually had major drug charges pending when they testified. This information would have allowed impeachment of three kinds: (1) impeachment with a prior felony conviction; (2) impeachment regarding the nature of the victims' relationships; and (3) impeachment or possible bias due to pending charges. All convictions vacated, except the misdemeanor obstruction conviction.

People v. Dupree*, 16 N.E.3d 788 (Ill. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in murder and attempted murder case for multiple errors related to a prior consistent statement of a state's witness. The shooting involved a drive-by shooting into a group of people standing outside a house. While not labeled as gangs, the two groups had had conflicts before. Police interrogated Latimer and Haywood, who both initially denied involvement, but then Latimer admitted that he was in the car and identified Dupree as the shooter. The next day, Haywood returned to the police station and told the police that he was driving the car and that Dupree was the shooter. During trial, Latimer admitted being in the car and hearing shots but he testified that he believed the shots were fired towards the car and not out of it. He denied any recollection of telling the police that Dupree was the shooter. Haywood, however, testified consistent with his second statement. Counsel cross-examined Haywood about his initial statement and asked whether his "enhanced memory" had "just come to his mind last week." In rebuttal, the state read questions and answers from his statement the following day, which was consistent with his trial testimony, and repeatedly asked Haywood if that statement was true. Counsel's conduct was deficient in opening the door to this prior consistent statement, which was inadmissible.

A prior consistent statement may not be used on direct examination to enhance the credibility of a witness's testimony. "Moreover, when a witness is impeached by means of a prior inconsistent statement, if a consistent statement does not disprove or explain the making of the inconsistent statement, it is inadmissible." Specifically, a prior consistent statement is not admissible simply because a witness has been impeached with a prior inconsistent statement. However, where there is a charge or inference of recent fabrication, a prior consistent statement is admissible to show that the witness told the same story before the time of the alleged fabrication.

Id. at ____ (citations omitted). Here, counsel opened the door to the prior consistent statement by suggesting that the change in the witness' statements was of "recent vintage," which counsel undoubtedly knew was not true. Then, counsel called a detective to testify about Haywood's prior inconsistent statement. On cross, the state elicited additional testimony about Haywood's prior consistent statement. When the detective was asked if Haywood had identified Dupree as the shooter, counsel objected that the testimony was beyond the scope of direct. After the jury was sent out, the court sustained the objection. When the jury returned, it was not informed of that or given an instruction to disregard the question. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the cross on the basis that the substance of the prior consistent statement was already before the jury. In addition, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to obtain an instruction to at least disregard the question on which the court sustained counsel's objection. During closing arguments, counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the state's repeated assertion of the prior consistent statement as substantive evidence. Finally, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to request a limiting instruction to inform the jury that the prior consistent statement could not be considered as substantive evidence of guilt. Counsel's failures were not based on strategy. Prejudice established.

The reason prior consistent statements are prohibited is because they are likely to unfairly enhance the witness's credibility with the trier of fact simply because the statement has been repeated. "The danger in prior consistent statements is that a jury is likely to attach disproportionate significance to them. People tend to believe that which is repeated most often, regardless of its intrinsic merit, and repetition lends credibility to testimony that it might not otherwise deserve."

Id. at ____ (citations omitted). Here, Haywood was a crucial witness, the prior consistent statement directly related to the question of guilt, and the state's evidence was far from compelling.

Wilson v. State*, 340 P.3d 1213 (Kan. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for multiple reasons. The defendant was convicted based primarily on the testimony of Goodpasture, an alleged eyewitness. Counsel's conduct was deficient in: 1) failing to challenge the state's evidence on the date of the offense when five witnesses had seen the victim alive several days later; 2) failing to challenge Goodpasture's credibility based on inconsistent statements to police; 3) failing to present letters Goodpasture wrote that contradicted his statements to police; and 4) failure to present police recordings of the defendant and another person – made without the defendant's knowledge – which suggested that the defendant did not even know a person Goodpasture said was also present at the murder. Prejudice established based on counsel's "failure to damage the credibility of the State's only eyewitness." The other two errors relating to the date of the offense and the letters, "when taken together," were also prejudicial. In reaching this conclusion, it was not error for the court to consider attorney expert testimony.

While it's true, as the State argues, that many judges have had experience trying criminal cases, many have not. Certainly, most judges have not had the level of experience of Kerns, who had defended 10 murder trials and handled more than 60 jury trials. His testimony helped to place the legal issues of this case into context and thus was admissible.

People v. Douglas*, 852 N.W.2d 587 (Mich. 2014) (affirming 817 N.W.2d 640 (Mich. Ct. App. 2012)). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case involving his three-year-old daughter for failing to object to testimony from a forensic interviewer, a police detective, and a social services caseworker that vouched for the alleged victim's credibility and indicated there was no indication that she had been coached, as the defense alleged. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy. Prejudice established as the prosecution's case "hinged wholly" on the alleged victim's credibility as there was no physical evidence and no independent witness. Reversal was also required due to the trial court's error in admitting inadmissible hearsay from the forensic interview through the testimony of the interviewer and the videotape of the interview.

People v. Ugweches*, 983 N.Y.S.2d 244 (N.Y. App. Div. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in assault on police officer with vehicle case for three reasons, which caused cumulative prejudice in this second trial following a hung jury in the first trial. The primary problem was that counsel, who had not represented the defendant in the first trial, failed to object to hearsay testimony about alleged bystander statements supporting the complainant's version when the prosecution was primarily based on her testimony. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on any strategy, as counsel was not even aware that this hearsay had been excluded in the initial trial. Likewise, counsel failed to subpoena the police officer's medical records or to call the medical expert that had testified in the first trial to establish that the officer's records did not corroborate her testimony that she had sustained physical injury in the assault. Finally, counsel failed to impeach the officer with her prior inconsistent statement to an administrative board concerning whether she had been knocked down. Here, the officer denied making the prior inconsistent statement and that was the end of the matter, but in the first trial counsel had taken proper steps to prove the issue.

Bagwell v. State*, 763 S.E.2d 630 (S.C. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for failing to seek DNA testing of blood found on glass from the crime scene. The case involved an alleged burglary of the alleged victim's apartment. The alleged victim testified that he returned home to find the defendant exiting through the back glass patio door, which was shattered. Afterwards he confronted the defendant outside and punched him, but the defendant's face was already bleeding before the punch. The alleged victim's roommate also testified that the defendant's face was bleeding prior to the fight. The defendant testified that he was asleep in his own apartment in the same complex when he awoke to find the alleged victim beating him and accusing the defendant's roommate of breaking into his apartment. The defendant called the police and then looked outside where he saw the alleged victim beating the defendant's roommate and holding a gun to his head and he went outside. He testified that his face was bleeding after the incident because of the alleged victim's attack. During closing arguments, the state asserted as the "linchpin" of its case that the defendant's face was cut because he ran through the glass door in the alleged victim's apartment and was cut. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to seek DNA testing of blood found on three pieces of glass from the patio door. The testing, conducted in post-conviction, revealed that the blood was not the defendant's blood. "At a minimum, counsel has the duty to interview potential witnesses and to make an independent investigation of the facts and circumstances of the case.' Ard v. Catoe, 642 S.E.2d 590, 597 (S.C. 2007) (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis omitted)." Here, trial counsel's only explanation for the failure was that she believed the State had planned to do DNA testing. This was unreasonable "because criminal defense attorneys have a duty 'to make an independent investigation of the facts and circumstances of the case.' Ard, 642 S.E.2d at 597 (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis omitted). Her duty to test the blood from the glass was especially important here because the test results could have supported Bagwell's claim that he was asleep in his apartment at the time of burglary." Prejudice established. This evidence would have rebutted the state's theory that the defendant's eye was cut when he exited the defendant's apartment through the glass patio door and would have cast doubt on the alleged victim's and his roommate's testimony that the defendant was bleeding before the alleged victim punched him. Likewise, this evidence would have supported the defendant's testimony that he was bleeding when police arrived because the alleged victim assaulted him.

Walker v. State*, 756 S.E.2d 144 (S.C. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in kidnaping and criminal sexual conduct case for failing to interview the defendant's former girlfriend and present her testimony as an alibi witness. The victim testified that her car would not start after she stopped for gas at a convenience store in the early evening of a Saturday. She accepted help from her assailant, who fixed the car and then followed her home to obtain payment because she did not have the money with her. The assailant kidnapped her and took her – blindfolded – to his home where he sexually assaulted her. The following morning he returned her – again blindfolded – to her home around 5:00 a.m. The victim identified the defendant as her assailant from store video surveillance footage. In a videotaped statement, the defendant admitted being at the store but denied the remainder claiming instead that he had gone to a friend’s home after leaving the store and then returned to his girlfriend’s home around 9:30-10:00 p.m. and that he spent the remainder of the night there. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview the girlfriend despite being aware of the statement and having notes that the girlfriend should be interviewed. Five years later when the girlfriend was interviewed, she testified that she had spent every weekend with the defendant before he inexplicably disappeared, which she had not known was due to his arrest in this case. Prejudice established as the post-conviction judge found her to be credible and that there was a reasonable probability that the jury would have believed her alibi testimony.

Ex parte Overton*, 444 S.W.3d 632 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in capital murder case for failing to present medical expert testimony. The defendant was charged in the death of a four-year-old child that she and her husband were in the process of adopting. The child died in the hospital due to brain swelling caused by incredibly high sodium intoxication. The defendant testified that the child was “obsessed with eating” and would become upset whenever he was not permitted to eat whatever he wanted. She had reported his excessive and inappropriate eating behaviors to the adoption supervisor. On the day of his death, the defendant gave the child chili was Zatarain’s seasoning added to it. When he wanted more and became upset, she gave him water with Zatarain’s mixed in to drink in his sippy cup. Twenty minutes or so later he “stumbled to the floor, said he was cold, and threw up.” He then started to shake. The defendant put him in beds with blankets and a heating pad, but was not overly concerned. Later she put him in a warm bath. He then started having breathing problems and sounded congested. His breathing got better when she used a nebulizer on him. When the abnormal breathing returned and the child was moaning and lethargic, the defendant and her husband took him to an urgent care center. On the way, the child stopped breathing and the defendant performed CPR. The urgent care center transferred the child to a hospital and that hospital transferred him on to a Children’s Hospital where he died the next day. The state argued two theories of murder: (1) that the defendant forced the child to consume sodium; and (2) that she failed to obtain medical care for him. A jury poll following conviction revealed that the jury found the defendant guilty based only on the defendant’s failure to obtain medical care. Defense counsel hired a leading expert on hyponatremia, or sodium intoxication, and he gave a deposition during the middle of the criminal trial. He was questioned by the defendant’s counsel in a separate child-custody case. Two of the trial counsel in this case either attended or watched a portion, but advised the lead counsel not to use the deposition because it obtained objectionable material and could not be adequately edited. Counsel also failed to present the expert’s testimony because his testimony had been postponed twice and counsel did not want to ask “for a continuance to accommodate the doctor, who could not travel on the Sabbath.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the two hour deposition “contained much testimony that was favorable to the defense.” The expert described “emotional deprivation syndrome, which is often associated with extreme eating habits.” The victim exhibited many features of this syndrome. This expert also disputed the testimony of the state's expert about the amount of Zatarain's the victim would have had to consume in order for his sodium level to be that high. While the state sought to prove that the defendant had forced the child to consume high levels of sodium, this expert concluded that the Defendant did not poison the child and that the child likely consumed something himself which was the cause of his sodium intoxication. More importantly, this expert concluded that salt poisoning and acute hypernatremia is rapidly lethal, but it would take at least an hour for the child to exhibit symptoms that would cause a reasonable person to believe that he was deathly ill and should be taken to the hospital. Even then by the time it would take to get to the hospital and for testing to be done to determine that the problem was salt poisoning, and the lack of any "specific therapy" or treatment, whether "someone lives or dies, to a large degree, it's luck." In short, the mortality rate is very high. Thus, even if the defendant had called 911 immediately and an ambulance had taken the child directly to the hospital, "it would be exceedingly unlikely for him to live; and, if he did, in all probability or almost certainly there would be irreversible neurological injury." The two primary trial counsel conceded that they did not review the deposition and that they were ineffective for not using the deposition or calling this expert to testify. While the one counsel believed that it would have been difficult to edit around objectionable parts of the deposition containing the prosecution's improper comments, this does not describe "a strategic decision." Moreover, there was no strategic decision not to request a continuance to accommodate the experts travel restrictions. Prejudice was established especially in light of the jury's conviction based on the defendant's alleged failure to obtain adequate medical care.

Ex parte Skelton*, 434 S.W.3d 709 (Tex. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in forgery case for three reasons. The defendant was an attorney charged with forging the will of a deceased client. During trial, the defense conceded that the defendant had cut and pasted the signatures of the decedent and two witnesses onto a writing purporting to be a will and then photocopying the altered document and filing it with the court. The contested point at trial was whether the defendant acted "with the intent to harm or defraud" because the defense contended that the forged will filed accurately represented a will actually executed by the decedent. The signed copy the defendant had kept had been severely damaged in a flood of the office, such that parts of it were illegible. She had simply cut and pasted the signatures from the copy onto a new copy of the will kept on and printed out from the defendant's computer. Both witnesses listed on the forged will testified that they had, in fact, witnessed the decedent sign the will. Counsel's conduct was deficient. First, counsel failed to object when the prosecution elicited testimony from a police investigator that the defendant invoked her right to silence to terminate the interview of her. Second, counsel actually emphasized this testimony during cross-examination. Third, counsel failed to object to the investigator's "expert" testimony about the legal definition of forgery and his opinion that the defendant was guilty. The investigator had no specific training, expertise, or knowledge and his testimony was not helpful to the jury as it amounted only to his opinion of the defendant's guilt. Prejudice established because the testimony about the defendant invoking her rights was inadmissible and damaging to the defendant's credibility before she even testified and her credibility was essential to her defense and counsel's overall strategy. Likewise, the prejudice was enhanced by the prosecution's closing argument, which invited the jury to draw an inference of guilt from the defendant "attempting to cover up her actions by hiring an attorney." Considering the "overall record, . . . counsel's deficient performance permeated Skelton's trial."

State v. Thompson*, 318 P.3d 1221 (Utah Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in forcible sodomy case for failing to object to state's "expert" rebuttal witness and state's improper closing arguments. The defendant, a "long-haul truck driver" from Wisconsin was charged with forcible sodomy of a 16-year old girl. The alleged victim testified that the defendant and his friend spent the night at her house and that the defendant sexually assaulted her between 9:00-9:30 a.m. the following morning. The incident allegedly occurred six years before trial and was not reported until 18 months later. The alleged victim was the only witness called in the state's case-in-chief. The defendant and his friend testified that no assault had occurred and that they were on the road to Las Vegas well before 9:00 a.m. Defense counsel sought admission of the defendant's "commercial truck driver's logs" to corroborate this testimony. The state opposed admission on the ground of late disclosure. The court admitted the log's but allowed the state a lunch break to locate a rebuttal witness. The rebuttal witness was a "transportation specialist" with the Utah Highway Patrol. In his testimony, he relied on "a computer software program called PC*Miler, which uses trucking routes and speed limits to estimate travel times." He presented a report generated by this program and testified, on the basis of this report, that the defendant's testimony about the time necessary for a specific trip "could not be accurate" and that the defendant "cooked the books." Trial counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to inquire about the "expert's) qualifications or his involvement in the preparation of the report. Only a single question was asked by the state on this topic: "What does the program do?" The defense presented the post-conviction testimony of a senior vice president of the company that developed the software. His testimony revealed that the state expert relied on an out-dated version of the software and "default settings" rather than "using the actual speed limits." Even using the out-dated version used by the state expert, the only way he could approximate the numbers relied on by the state's expert was to use a 55-miles per hour speed limit rather than the actual speed limit of 75-miles per hour. Using the correct speed limit on the correct software or the out-dated version, the time required for the trip was consistent the time range logged by the defendant. Likewise, the state's expert conceded in his post-conviction testimony that he did not generate the report he relied on and was not present when it was generated. Thus, the report itself was entirely inadmissible hearsay of the "declarant" who actually wrote the report. The trial court also found that the state's "expert" did not have the qualifications necessary to testify as an expert using the software. Trial counsel was also deficient in failing to object the following improper arguments by the state: (1) the prosecutor personally vouched for the "expert's" credibility; (2) the prosecutor expressed his personal opinion that the defendant's friend was not credible; (3) the prosecutor expressed his opinion that the defendant's body language during his testimony indicated that he was dishonest when there had been no evidence presented to support these arguments; and (4) the prosecutor impermissibly appealed to the jurors' passions and prejudices in arguing that "this is the kind of crime that occurs very often" and asking the jury to "send a message" with its verdict. The court could "conceive of no reasonable trial strategy" for not objecting to the argument about the defendant's body language or the other arguments when credibility of the defendant versus the alleged victim was the primary issue in the case. Prejudice was established based on the "cumulative harm." "[W]hile trial counsel's impromptu cross-examination of [the state's expert] was skillful, it was not a substitute for preventing [the expert] from testifying in the first instance." Likewise, the improper arguments mostly related to the credibility of witnesses, which was the primary issue in the case. The trial court's instructions that counsel's statements were not evidence did not cure the problem, especially because the instructions came before the improper arguments.

State v. Fedoruk*, 339 P.3d 233 (Wash. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel in second-degree murder case was ineffective in failing to investigate a mental-health defense. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate the possibility of a mental health defense. The defendant had a long history of serious mental illness, including a diagnosis of schizophrenia and two prior admissions to a psychiatric hospital. In a competence evaluation following a prior arrest, the defendant had been diagnosed with bipolar disorder with psychotic features. At trial on this prior offense, a court found the defendant not guilty by reason of insanity. In events surrounding the current charge, the defendant engaged in bizarre behaviors and statements. A pretrial competence examiner found major mental illness. Nonetheless, counsel waived an affirmative defense of diminished capacity until the day before jury selection, when counsel sought a continuance in order to pursue an insanity defense. Counsel stated that he had no basis for such a defense prior to speaking with the defendant through an interpreter. Given the defendant's extensive mental health history, counsel's failure to seek to retain a mental health expert until the day before jury selection was deficient conduct. Prejudice was also established.

State v. Jenkins*, 848 N.W.2d 786 (Wis. 2014). Counsel ineffective in intentional homicide case for failing to present testimony of an eyewitness, who did not identify the defendant in a photo array, and would have testified that the defendant was definitely not the shooter and that she had seen him across the street minutes after the shooting. Trial counsel's strategy was to attack the credibility of the victim, who identified the defendant as the shooter, and to provide an alibi for the defendant. Trial counsel had the police report that identified the eyewitness and included information that she had failed to identify the defendant in a photo array. He could not recall interviewing her, but the eyewitness testified that she spoke with defense counsel on multiple occasions but was not asked to testify or subpoenaed for the trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present this witness, who supported the defense strategy and would have impeached the state's witness. Her testimony also would have supported the defendant's version of events and his professed alibi of visiting someone in the area as she saw him across the street outside that friend's home shortly after the shooting. Prejudice was also established. Although her testimony was not necessarily consistent over time and her credibility could be challenged, "the prosecution's key eyewitness, had similar if not more substantial credibility problems."

Cooper v. State*, 319 P.3d 914 (Wyo. 2014). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault with a deadly weapon case for failing to develop and present an expert witness to testify as to how close the victim's vehicle was to the defendant before the defendant started shooting his gun at the vehicle. The defendant and his friends got into an argument with the victim and his friend over a carnival game at a fair. Law enforcement directed all to leave the fair but the two groups encountered each other again later the same day. Although there were some conflicts in the evidence, it was undisputed that the victim drove his car towards the defendant, the defendant then shot into the windshield twice, the car hit the defendant before the defendant shot a third time while he was on the hood of the car, after the victim stopped the car and the defendant fell to the ground the victim of the car and the defendant told him to get the car off him, which the victim refused, and then the defendant fired three more shots with one hitting the victim in the leg. Trial counsel, who was arguing self-defense, was aware that there were discrepancies in witness statements about how far the car was from the defendant when he fired initially, but counsel did not retain an expert. Rather, counsel consulted “trajectory charts” on the internet and made her own calculations that the car was no more than 8 feet away when the first shots were fired. She hoped to present the evidence concerning distance through cross of the state witnesses but this “did not pan out.” The state did not, as counsel assumed, call the evidence technician that conducted the trajectory analysis for the state and the detective on the case simply responded that he did not have any training in trajectory analysis and could not answer any questions about distance. During closing, defense counsel pointed out that the state presented no evidence on the issue and drew an objection when she argued her own calculations, which were not supported by the evidence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. Prejudice established because an accident and crime scene reconstructionist could have testified, based on the defendant’s height and trajectory, that the first bullet was fired only 42 inches from the windshield, meaning that the defendant’s hand and the gun itself were already past the front bumper.

2013: State v. Denz, 306 P.3d 98 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in child abuse and aggravated assault case for failing to consult with an independent medical expert. The defendant was charged with causing injuries to his infant son. He claimed he had accidentally dropped the infant while changing his diaper and the infant landed face-first onto a carpeted floor. The state had three medical experts to testify that the infant’s injuries were inconsistent with the defendant’s explanations and that the infant’s abdominal injuries could only have resulted from intentional blows to his stomach. Counsel interviewed the state’s experts prior to trial, but decided as “strategy” not to retain an expert and to rely instead on cross-examine of the state’s experts to support the defense theory. This conduct was deficient, especially in light of the fact that funding was available to retain an independent medical expert.

Counsel had no medical training or expertise, had limited experience with medical professionals, and could not independently assess whether the state’s witnesses were competent. He also stated “this was the sole child-abuse case that [he had] ever tried and he had not consulted with any other attorneys about the case.

Counsel simply could not make a informed decision to rely solely on cross-examination without consulting an expert. Counsel even acknowledged that there was “no downside” to consulting with an expert prior to trial. In short, “despite its strategic gloss, counsel’s decision not to consult with an expert before settling on a defense strategy cannot qualify as a reasoned decision.” Prejudice established as a forensic pathologist would have testified to the contrary.

State v. Estrada*, 426 S.W.3d 405 (Ark. 2013). Counsel ineffective in rape and sexual abuse case for failing to impeach the alleged victim, failing to investigate and present alibi witnesses, and failing to object to the victim’s testimony about an incident outside the range of the charges. With respect to the rape charge, the 15-year-old alleged victim testified that the defendant, her uncle by marriage, sexually abused her at age 4 and again in 2001 at age 7. In her recorded statements to police about the 2001 incident, she said more than once than her grandparents were asleep downstairs during the incident, despite the fact that her grandmother had died in 2000. With respect to the sex abuse charge, the 18-year-old alleged victim testified that the defendant had abused her in December 1999. Even though the defendant had been charged for abuse between June 1998 and June 1999, counsel failed to object. Counsel also failed to present testimony from the defendant's sisters that he was in Texas with them in December 1999.

Dieudonne v. Commissioner of Correction*, 60 A.3d 385 (Conn. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in interfering with an officer case for failing to investigate and present a defense. The police received an anonymous tip that the defendant was selling drugs on a street corner. According to the officers, the defendant placed a white item in his mouth and attempted to run when they approached. He was wrestled to the ground but no drugs were found. Counsel failed to discover an eyewitness who would have testified that the defendant did not assault the officers or resist arrest. Prejudice established as this would have supported a credible defense that the defendant lacked the specific intent to interfere with an officer and any injuries suffered by the officers were a result of the defendant attempting to regain his ability to breathe as he was being choked by officers. The case was a "close one," even without the defense witness because the jury did acquit the defendant of assaulting one of the officers.

State v. Fitzpatrick, 118 So. 3d 737 (Fla. 2013). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to investigate and challenge the state's forensic evidence of sexual assault and the timing of sexual activity prior to the victim's discovery. On August 18, 1996, at approximately 3:00 a.m., the inebriated victim was found walking on the side of the road, nude and bloody, with her throat slit. At the scene, while in and out of consciousness, she told one of her rescuers and a paramedic, separately, that "Steve" was her attacker. At the hospital, while heavily medicated, when police officers asked directly if "Steve" was her attacker, she shook her head "no." She died thereafter. "Steve" was cleared by DNA, alibi, and other evidence. The DNA from semen in the victim's vagina was matched to the defendant. The state's evidence at trial showed that the defendant, a Pro Pizza delivery man on duty, picked the victim up at a convenience store and gave her a ride to a motel around 7:30-8:00 p.m. Witnesses at the hotel confirmed this and testified that the victim then left the motel with "Howard" around 9:00 p.m. The defendant left work at 11:45 p.m. Thereafter, a witness saw his pizza delivery truck at the motel again and then at Howard's house. Howard and a woman at his home said that the victim left Howard's home with the defendant around midnight. Contrary to these witnesses, the defendant's girlfriend testified that he was home by 12:30 to 1:00 a.m. While the defendant admitted picking the victim up and dropping her off at the motel earlier in the evening, he adamantly denied seeing her again prior to her death. After he was confronted with the DNA evidence during the investigation and during trial, he said that he had had consensual sexual intercourse with the victim on the morning of her death, i.e. between 9:30 and noon on August 17 more than 15 hours before the victim was found with her throat slit. During trial, the state presented two "experts." The first was a registered nurse, who had conducted the "sexual assault victim examination" at the hospital. She testified that: (1) the victim had a penetrating wound on her breast, which was either a stab wound or a bite mark, and a cigarette burn on her leg; (2) based primarily on the amount of fluid present which would have been removed by continued activities, sexual activity occurred a maximum of an hour or two before the victim was found with her throat cut; (3) the victim's "undergarment which was around her waist" when she was found, had not been on after the sexual activity because there was no semen on the garment; and (4) based on coloring of the flesh, sperm in the anal swabs, etc., the sexual activity also included anal intercourse and was most likely forcible rather than consensual. The state also presented “expert” testimony from a lab analyst in the serology/DNA division of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement (FDLE). She testified that: (1) the DNA from the semen in the victim’s vagina matched the defendant; (2) the sexual activity occurred no more than 15 hours prior to the victim being found based on her microscopic evaluation of sperm, which revealed “‘many to some’ heads with tails still intact”; and (3) she conducted both an acid phosphate test and microscopic sperm search of the undergarment and found no semen. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to conduct a reasonable investigation and present expert testimony on “sperm motility,” whether there was sperm on the underwear, and whether the amount of fluid could be used to determine timing. As expert testimony in post-conviction, including forensic pathologist Daniel Spitz, revealed, the state’s testing and testimony on “sperm motility” was flawed. The state’s expert never actually mounted the sperm on “wet mount slides,” which would be required to determine whether sperm was “motile” or not. The state’s expert also was incorrect in assuming that all sperm with a tail was “motile.” Likewise, the evidence showed “intact sperm, meaning a head with a tail, and sperm heads without tails, “which indicate[s] that there was a period of many hours between the deposition of that material and the collection of the evidence.” Generally, the tails began to separate from the heads, 15-18 hours after intercourse. Thus, 15 hours was the minimum amount of time from the intercourse, not the maximum as the state’s expert testified and the time from the intercourse to collection was most likely approximately 24 hours. Additionally, the state’s reliance on the amount of fluid, i.e. “a lot,” to estimate timing within an hour or two was flawed and not even “a scientific statement.” The amount of fluid is not even indicative of sexual contact. Likewise, the amount of fluid would not necessarily be lessened by continued activities. Moreover, additional testing and expert testimony in the post-conviction proceeding established that there were over 100 sperm heads found in 9 of 11 areas of the underwear tested and the sperm matched the defendant. This expert testified that there likely was no testing of the underwear prior to trial or if there was it was done incorrectly because there had been no prior cuttings made from the underwear. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel never sought expert assistance prior to trial, even though counsel was aware of the state’s evidence and theory that the sexual contact occurred only a short time prior to the murder. Counsel’s preparation for this expert and forensic evidence was, at most, a brief, undocumented conversation with a medical examiner and research at a law library. While counsel did find one article from an organization in London allegedly supporting “an extended timeline for the sexual encounter,” he was precluded from offering this into evidence during cross examination of the state’s expert.

While it is counsel’s responsibility to educate themselves about the aspects of a case they do not understand, gaining personal knowledge of a subject does not end counsel’s obligation to his or her client. Counsel must apply the knowledge gained in a way that provides his or her client with evidence and constitutionally adequate legal representation. Here, even if we were to assume that counsel spent hours independently researching the scientific aspects of [the] case, he did not utilize this scientific knowledge in a way that meaningfully benefitted [the defendant] during his trial.

Capital Case*

“Counsel’s unpreparedness” was especially clear from his post-conviction testimony in that he still “did not understand the difference between motile and intact sperm. This fact alone exemplifies the objective unreasonableness of his performance.” With respect to the testing of the underwear, counsel did not retest it because he was “under the impression” that retesting would have produced the same result. This was not a valid “strategy” because retesting would have revealed: (1) no semen, as the state said; (2) the defendant’s semen; or (3) another man’s semen. Thus, retesting could not have harmed the defendant in light of the DNA evidence already matching the defendant to semen from the victim’s vagina and his admission of consensual sex. Prejudice was clear as the state’s case relied primarily on the two trial “experts” and the forensic evidence, which was clear from the prosecutor’s closing arguments which also informed the jury that the credibility of the state’s experts had not been challenged. Clearly, if trial counsel had performed adequately, the state’s case, as well as the credibility of the state’s experts, would have been severely undermined. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to challenge the qualifications and testimony of the nurse expert. As Dr. Spitz testified in post-conviction, forensic nurse examiners are generally not qualified or involved in “interpretation” of the evidence. They simply collect it. Here, the nurse expert’s testimony that there was anal intercourse and that sexual activity was most likely forcible was incorrect and misleading in substantial respects. First, there was no evidence of a stab wound or bite mark on the victim’s breast. It was a nonspecific bruise that could have been caused in many ways. Second, the mark in the victim’s pubic area interpreted by the nurse as a “cigarette burn” was just as consistent with a number of other things, such as syphilis. Third, the nurse found anal intercourse based on coloring and a swab from “deep within” the anus finding the presence of sperm. This did not establish anal intercourse as the fluid could easily have drained from the vagina into the anal cavity. Likewise, the testimony that the swab came from “deep within” the anus was “completely without scientific basis” because once the swab touched the outside of the anus and moved inward, there is no way to tell whether sperm collected came from the outside or “deep within.” Finally, the evidence did not suggest that sexual activity was forced and the nurse lacked the credentials and expertise to even formulate such an opinion. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in completely failing to investigate the qualifications of the state’s “expert” nurse. Counsel never even considered doing so and just assumed that she had been recognized as an expert in the past. The prejudice was clear.

By incorrectly assuming that [the nurse] was qualified to interpret [the] injuries, he failed to prevent [her] from painting a picture in the minds of the jurors of a victim who was vaginally and anally raped, stabbed, burned, and bitten. After [her] bleak characterization of [the] injuries on direct examination, nothing counsel did during his cross-examination . . . erased this horrific picture from the minds of the jurors.

As additional evidence of prejudice, the court pointed out the nurse expert’s testimony was not only summarized in the direct appeal opinion denying relief, but also “directly relied upon as a basis for denying” three claims, which “exemplifies the materiality of that testimony and how ineffective assistance compromises not only the trial, but the entire judicial process.”

Darst v. State*, 746 S.E.2d 865 (Ga. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in aggravated child molestation case for a number of reasons. The defendant was charged with molesting two young girls who he was caring for, along with his girlfriend, as foster parents during on-going custody proceedings. After approximately two and a half years of being in the defendant's care, in September 2004 when the girls were four and seven, the girls' grandparents in Pennsylvania were granted permanent custody but the children were not moved to Pennsylvania until several months later. In October 2004, the four-year-old reported to the defendant's girlfriend that she had been abused by the defendant and "Uncle Billy." The girlfriend did not report this to police but did report it to a therapist seeing the older girl. The therapist reported this to the Department of Family and Children Services, who ordered a psycho-sexual evaluation of the child but did not remove the children or inform police. A month later, the seven-year-old reported to the defendant's girlfriend that she also had been abused. After repeatedly trying to dissuade the girl, who did not recant "[d]espite the intense questioning," the girlfriend also reported this allegation to the therapist. The therapist notified the Department and the police were notified. Both girls essentially refused to talk to the initial police investigator and the female detective brought in after initial efforts failed. A month later, forensic interviews of both children were conducted and both girls again alleged that the defendant had molested them. These interviews were videotaped and admitted in evidence without objection. The defendant denied the allegations in trial testimony. The defense challenged the girls' statements as inconsistent and unbelievable and also suggested that, if the children had been molested, it was by their biological father or their "Uncle Billy." Counsel's conduct was deficient. First, counsel failed to obtain school, therapy, and Department records that "demonstrated that the children's documented behavior during the time" they were in the defendant's foster case "was inconsistent with their allegations" of sexual abuse. Two months after being placed in the defendant's care, the older child reported that she had been sexually abused by her biological father. The records and reports otherwise indicated that, while in the defendant's care, the children made "positive social, developmental, and educational progress" up until the time they were informed they would be moving to Pennsylvania with their grandparents. This information was "clearly favorable to [the] defense theory that, if the children had been molested, it was someone other than [the defendant]." Counsel had no valid strategy for failing to obtain these records because his only "reason" was the desire to argue to the jury that the state had failed to obtain these records. Second, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to consult with an expert and present expert testimony that the children's behavior was inconsistent with having been molested by the defendant. Specially, lay witnesses, including a teacher, saw no problems with the girls' behavior until they were informed of the impending move to Pennsylvania. An expert could have testified, based on this information, that neither girl presented the typical behavioral patterns observed in children who have been sexually abused. Counsel admitted that it "had not occurred to him" to retain an expert. Thus, there was no strategy decision. Third, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to consult an expert and present expert testimony on the subject of the reliability of forensic interviews. Here, in addition to other criticisms, expert testimony was available to challenge the reliability of the forensic interviews in this case, which were not conducted until after the defendant's girlfriend, the therapist, the Department case manager, at least two police investigators, and a "psycho-sexual evaluator" had interviewed the girls. Thus, the girls had been "subjected to repeated, suggestive questioning about the allegations" before the forensic interviews. Again, counsel conceded that there had been no strategy in failing to obtain expert assistance. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to object to hearsay testimony from the Department case worker that the biological father and "Uncle Billy" had undergone "psycho-sexual evaluations" and "no red flags" were raised, while the defendant had been offered a “psycho-sexual evaluation” but never completed it. The caseworker had no personal knowledge of this information “and, if she was relying on a document in the Department records, that document was never admitted at trial.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to this inadmissible hearsay evidence, which “lacked any probative value and should not have been presented for the jury’s consideration.” This failure was especially prejudicial, however, because it “essentially eliminated [the biological father and Uncle Billy] as possible molestation suspects and, as a result, severely undermined one of [the] primary defense theories, a fact the State specifically emphasized in its closing argument.”

Shumway v. State*, 293 P.3d 772 (Kan. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to present testimony of alibi witnesses and other available witnesses that supported the defense theories and contradicted the state’s case. The state’s primary witness was the defendant’s friend who said they had been planning to steal bicycles from the victim’s yard, but instead the defendant killed the victim. He admitted that the police had provided him with details of the crime and showed him crime scene photographs and diagrams. In exchange for his testimony, the witness, who had prior convictions involving false statements and dishonesty, was not charged. The other witnesses for the State were the primary witness’ wife and three jailhouse informants. The defense theory was that the victim had been killed by a drug dealer (Love) in a dispute over drugs and drug money. One of the victim’s neighbors testified that the victim was nervous and that Love had been looking for him on the day of the murder. Counsel filed a notice of alibi but did not present the available alibi witnesses because he believed their credibility was questionable. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because even if they “were bad witnesses, they were the only witnesses” that could establish innocence. Likewise, counsel failed to present testimony from the primary witness’ niece, who would have contradicted the other state witnesses about events on the evening of the murder. In addition, counsel failed to present testimony from a disinterested witness, who would have testified that she was at the victim’s home from about 10:00 p.m. to 2:00 a.m., when the state’s primary witnesses placed the murder between 10:30 p.m. and midnight. The witness was an addict at the victim’s home waiting for delivery of methamphetamine. Counsel also failed to present testimony from a woman who had sold drugs to the victim and Love. The victim still owed her $100. Love was upset on the day of the murder because he said he had given the victim the money, but he paid the $100. Thus, Love was very angry because he believed he had to pay twice for drugs he had never received from the victim. He even made a statement that the victim would be dead by the next die. Finally, counsel failed to call the victim’s friend as a witness. He would have testified that the victim was afraid of Love and had armed himself on the day of his murder because of his fear. Prejudice was established as there was no physical evidence against the defendant, who also had no apparent motive.

State v. Cheatham, 292 P.3d 318 (Kan. 2013). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for introducing the defendant’s prior conviction for voluntary manslaughter and repeatedly referring to the defendant as a “professional drug dealer” and “shooter of people.” The State agreed prior to trial to stipulate that the defendant was a convicted felon for purposes of the criminal possession of a firearm charge in order to avoid having the jury become aware that the prior was voluntary manslaughter. Nonetheless, counsel informed the jury during jury selection that the defendant was a cocaine dealer, who had previously killed another cocaine dealer with a gun when the State’s theory in this case was that the defendant had killed two women in retaliation for stealing drug money from him. During trial, despite his claim of innocence in this case, counsel had the defendant testify in detail about his prior conviction, which opened the door for the state to introduce exhibits, including photographs of the victim who had been shot four times. Counsel gave two contradictory explanations for his actions. First, he said he believed the State would be able to introduce the evidence because it was an aggravating factor in sentencing, which revealed that counsel “was confused or uninformed about the difference between the guilt and penalty phases of a capital murder trial.” Likewise, the State had already agreed not to present this evidence during the trial. Second, he said his strategy was to “tell the truth,” which the court found to be “nonsensical.” Prejudice was clear, as even counsel said in his closing that asking the jury to ignore the defendant’s background in trial deliberations required “superhuman fiction.” Counsel also had a conflict of interest that adversely affected his representation due to a flat fee arrangement.

State v. Rocha*, 836 N.W.2d 774 (Neb. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in first degree sexual assault of a child and four counts of child abuse case for failing to move to sever the sexual assault of a child charge from the child abuse charges or to even request an instruction limiting the jury’s consideration of the evidence of one crime to that particular crime. The alleged victim of sexual assault was also the alleged victim of one count of child abuse. The other three counts of child abuse related to her three brothers. The charges were improperly joined together because (1) the charges were not of the same or similar character; (2) the sexual assault charge was not based on the same act or transaction as the child abuse charges; and (3) the sexual assault charge and the child abuse charges were not connected together or parts of a common scheme or plan. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to request severance, especially because the “evidence of sexual assault, by its nature, was highly volatile and had the potential to fan the jury’s emotions. That risk was exacerbated by the fact that the court did not specifically instruct the jury on the importance of keeping the charges, and evidence related to those charges, separate during its deliberations.” The court could “conceive of no reasonable explanation” or strategy in allowing the joint trial without even requesting a limiting instruction. Prejudice was established.

State v. L.A.*, 76 A.3d 1276 (N.J. Super. App. Div. 2013). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual assault case involving the defendant’s 15-year-old daughter, who lived with her mother while the defendant lived with his wife and son, for failing to call the defendant’s wife and son as exculpatory witnesses. There were three alleged incidents, the first of which was in November 2000 at the defendant’s home when no one else was present in the home. The final alleged incident was in February 2001. The daughter reported the alleged abuse in April 2001. The State’s evidence included evidence that the daughter’s grades suffered and her behavior deteriorated after November 2000. The defendant denied the allegations and testified that his wife and son were home during the alleged incident in November 2000. During trial, defense counsel first interviewed the defendant’s wife and attempted to call her to testify but was precluded from doing so because she was not disclosed as a potential witness until after jury selection. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview the wife and son in advance of trial and failing to call them as witnesses. Prejudice was established because the wife would have testified that the alleged victim had behavioral issues, problems in school, and questionable veracity long before November 2000. Both the wife and son also would have testified that they were home at the time of the alleged incident in November 2000.

Capital Case*

and that no abuse occurred. The prejudice was heightened because the prosecutor highlighted the defendant's testimony and argued that "[s]urely his son and wife would have corroborated [the] defendant's testimony, if [he] had been telling the truth." There was prejudice due to the absence of the exculpatory testimony, the failure to corroborate the defendant's testimony, and the failure to challenge the alleged victim's credibility in general.

People v. Mehmood*, 977 N.Y.S.2d 78 (N.Y. App. Div. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in child sexual abuse case under state law standard for eliciting testimony from state's expert of child sexual abuse accommodation syndrome that "the truthfulness of a child's disclosure of sexual abuse could be analyzed by looking at whether the content is specific and not age-appropriate knowledge." Even though this testimony was inadmissible under state law, "defense counsel inexplicably asked the expert to elaborate, eliciting highly damaging testimony that a child's allegations of oral sexual conduct, sexual contact between males, or reciprocal contact would be "rather unique and idiosyncratic," and more believable than "just a global statement that I was touched." Thus, defense counsel intentionally elicited inadmissible and unduly prejudicial testimony. Defense counsel was also ineffective in failing to object to the prosecutor's improper closing arguments. The prosecutor's improper arguments were, as follows. (1) The prosecutor argued that the defense evidence that the alleged victims had a motive to fabricate the allegations was only "an elaborate attempt to distract [the jury] from the real issues in this case." (2) The prosecutor inaccurately characterized the defendant's request for a clarification of the state's question during cross-examination to assert that "the defendant's denials of the sexual abuse allegations in the indictment were implicit admissions that he had abused the complainants outside the periods of time designated for the charged crimes. (3) "[T]he prosecutor impugned the defendant's right to testify and improperly suggested that he lied on the stand, when she referred to him as "an opportunist" who "took the stand, and ... said what he thought he had to to save himself." (4) "[T]he prosecutor impermissibly vouched for the credibility of a witness based on his position as a law enforcement officer." Reversal was also required on the separate plain error issue of the cumulative effect of the prosecutor's improper arguments.

People v. Canales*, 972 N.Y.S.2d 316 (N.Y. App. Div. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder and possession of a weapon case for failing to object to a videotape presented by the prosecution, failing to give the defendant the opportunity to view the videotape prior to trial or to discuss it with him, and failing to attempt to reconcile the defendant's claim that the shooting was accidental with the videotape evidence showing the defendant chasing someone. The videotape was one of the state's primary pieces of evidence as it shows the defendant, wielding a handgun, chasing another person who enters the screen but falls and tumbles out of view. The prosecutor contended throughout the trial that the person being chased by the defendant was the victim and argued to the jury that the videotape provided evidence of the defendant's intent to kill him. The People also introduced the defendant's confession to the police, in which he claimed that he borrowed the gun from a friend, but asked the friend to remove the clip so that it would not be loaded. He claimed that he only intended to use the gun to scare away a group of people who were threatening his friends, but that someone grabbed his arm and, as he spun around, the gun unexpectedly fired. During deliberations, in response to a jury note asking to see "the video footage of the victim and [the defendant]," the defendant personally addressed the court, stating, "That is not the victim" in the videotape. A colloquy ensued wherein the defendant appears to have declined an offer by the court to reopen his case and give testimony about the videotape. The jury subsequently returned a verdict of guilt on both counts. In post-trial proceedings, the parties stipulated that the person being chased by the defendant in the videotape was not, in fact, the victim. The trial court vacated the murder conviction but nevertheless upheld the defendant's conviction of criminal possession of a weapon. In declining to vacate the defendant's conviction of criminal possession of a weapon in the second degree, the trial court applied the Strickland prejudice standard rather than the more lenient state law standard that required reversal on both counts.

Commonwealth v. Stewart*, 84 A.3d 701 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to meaningfully interview an alibi witness and present her testimony at trial, even though the state's case was built on only one eyewitness and the defendant informed counsel of the witness prior to trial and the defendant testified to the alibi. While trial counsel denied that the defendant told him of the witness and stated that the defendant admitted being present at the crime scene, the trial court found this testimony to be incredible, especially in light of counsel's presentation of the defendant's testimony about the alibi at trial and argument that his testimony was credible. Counsel also stated that he did not believe the alibi witness was credible. "[W]hile trial counsel offered an explanation for why he did not call the witness, he gave no credible answer as to why he conducted no investigation into this case and did not interview the alibi witness."

Commonwealth v. Champney, 65 A.3d 386 (Pa. 2013) (per curiam). Convictions and death sentence vacated after affirmance (due to the court being evenly divided) of the post-conviction court's finding of ineffective assistance of counsel and state misconduct under Brady.

Commonwealth v. Matias*, 63 A.3d 807 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sex abuse of minors case for failing to call an available eyewitness and failing to present photographic evidence. The defendant was charged with molesting his daughter's friend when the alleged victim was 8 and the daughter was 7. The alleged victim, who was 13 at the time of trial, alleged that one incident occurred in the defendant's basement when his daughter was present. She also alleged that a second incident occurred in the basement bathroom. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to interview the defendant's daughter after the alleged victim said for the first time during trial that she was present during an assault. Counsel's decision not to interview her because of her young age and status as the defendant's daughter was simply unreasonable and prejudicial. She would have testified that the defendant was present with the two girls in the basement only once and that he committed no assault on that date. Counsel's conduct was also deficient with respect to the second alleged incident because he failed to investigate properly by "view[ing] the crime scene." He was, therefore, unaware that there was no bathroom in the defendant's basement. The defendant and his wife later gave counsel photographs establishing this fact, but counsel "either misplaced" them or simply "failed to recognize the relevance" of the photographs. The prejudice was clear especially in light of the fact, which was clear from a jury note sent during deliberations, that "the jury obviously had trouble with the inconsistencies and credibility in [the alleged victim's] testimony."

Ex parte Villegas*, 415 S.W. 3d 885 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in capital murder trial for failing to discover and present evidence of possible alternative perpetrators and for failing to discover and present evidence that would have allowed the jury to give effect to the voluntary confession jury instruction submitted in the case.

Frangias v. State*, 413 S.W.3d 212 (Tex. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault case for failing to take the steps necessary to procure and introduce the deposition testimony of a crucial defense witness. The alleged victim testified that the defendant sexually assaulted her when she stayed at his hotel. The defendant testified that he found the alleged victim drunk and on the ground outside of the hotel late in the evening. He and a part-time maintenance worker helped her upstairs to her room but left her there alone. The alleged victim, however, testified that the defendant entered the room and sexually assaulted her. More than three months prior to trial, the maintenance worker provided an affidavit supporting the defendant's statements. Counsel did not call him to testify in Houston, however, because the witness was undergoing chemotherapy in El Paso and his doctor would not permit him to travel. The witness was, however, available to testify via deposition. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial, especially in light of the weakness of the state's evidence.

State v. Campos*, 309 P.3d 1160 (Utah Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder with injury case for (1) failing to request a special mitigation jury instruction for extreme emotional distress; (2) failing to object to a verdict form that misplaced the burden of proof for imperfect self-defense; and (3) failing to object to the prosecutor's improper closing arguments appealing to the jury's sympathies and attacking defense counsel's character. The defendant was charged with shooting an unofficial neighborhood watch volunteer, who was on the lookout for "suspicious" vehicles in the neighborhood. The defendant's 16-year-old daughter and her friend were out walking when the neighborhood watch guy passed in his SUV and told them to be careful going home. Neither girl knew who he was or responded. After they returned to the defendant's house, they got in a car and drove to pick up another friend. As they were driving back towards the defendant's house late at night, the neighborhood watch guy saw the vehicle and mistook them for one of the "suspicious" vehicles he was watching for.

The girls were "freaked out" and "a bit traumatized" when they realized that the same individual who had spoken to them earlier was now following them. One of the girls called [the defendant] to tell him they were being followed and to ask for help.

The defendant took a gun from his home and drove to meet the girls, who had managed to elude the neighborhood watch guy by turning out of the neighborhood onto a major road. After the defendant got the girls to his house, he and his daughter drove around to find the vehicle that had been following the girls. Meanwhile, neighborhood watch guy, who had also armed himself was out still looking for the "suspicious" vehicle. When the two vehicles passed, the defendant blocked the road and got out with his weapon. According to the watch guy, the defendant was pointing his weapon, and demanding to know why the girls were followed. While the neighborhood watch guy attempted to defuse the situation and put down his weapon, the defendant's daughter was screaming hysterically from the defendant's vehicle and the defendant shot him. According to the defendant, on the other hand, he had the weapon in his back pocket and only pulled it out and fired when the watch guy got out pointing his weapon at the defendant and cocked it in response to the defendant asking why the girls were being followed. Under these circumstances, counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on the affirmative defense of extreme emotional distress, which was supported by the evidence. In short, “a rational jury might conclude that Campos was under ‘extremely unusual and overwhelming stress that would cause the average reasonable person under the same circumstances to experience a loss of self-control, and be overborne by intense feelings, such as passion [and] anger.’” This failure was not explained by counsel’s “strategy” of arguing self-defense as the two defenses were not inconsistent. “Campos’s trial counsel could have argued to the jury that if it believed Campos’s version of events, it must acquit him, but if it believed the State’s version of events, it must convict him only of attempted manslaughter, not attempted murder.” Counsel was also ineffective in failing to object to the verdict form’s description of imperfect self-defense, which is available under state law if the defendant “attempted to cause the death of another under a reasonable belief that the circumstances provided a legal justification or excuse for the conduct although the conduct was not legally justifiable or excusable under the existing circumstances.” Once a defendant has produced some evidence of imperfect self-defense, the prosecution is required to disprove imperfect self-defense beyond a reasonable doubt. While the court properly instructed the jury, the verdict form directly contradicted that instruction and placed the burden on the defendant to prove imperfect self-defense beyond a reasonable doubt. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper arguments.

Here, the prosecutor’s comments called attention to matters the jury should not have considered in reaching its verdict. We are most troubled by the prosecutor’s reference to Campos’s “stealing from [the neighborhood watch guy] his ability to run, his ability to bike, his ability to walk his daughter down the aisle.” The statement was a direct appeal to the passions of the jury. It suggested to the jury that it should find Campos guilty out of vengeance or sympathy for the victim rather than based on what the facts and the law required.

The prosecutor also improperly compared the defense’s theory of the case to a “red herring” and suggested that defense counsel was being deceitful. “A prosecutor diverts the jury from its duty to decide the case on the evidence when he is ‘permitted to make unfounded and inflammatory attacks on the opposing advocate.’” Id. at ____ (citing United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1, 9 (1985) (“‘A personal attack by the prosecutor on defense counsel is improper.’” (quoting ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4–7.8 (2d ed.1980))).

The prosecutor’s comments here crossed the line from permissible argument of the evidence to an impermissible attack on defense counsel’s character. The prosecutor argued not only that the claim of self-defense was a distraction, but also that it was a technique or ploy to confuse and distract the jury. That is, the prosecutor argued that defense counsel intended to mislead the jury. Arguing that the evidence does not support the defense theory and that the theory is thus a distraction from the ultimate issue is fundamentally different from arguing that defense counsel is intentionally trying to distract and mislead the jury.

Capital Case*

Prejudice found due to “the cumulative effect of trial counsel’s errors.”

2012: State v. Harrison, 404 S.W.3d 830 (Ark. 2012). Counsel ineffective in capital murder trial for failing to adequately impeach the state witnesses and to present a defense. The defendant was charged with killing a co-worker at an automobile repair shop. Two eyewitnesses and a jailhouse snitch, who had a prior juvenile adjudication for capital murder, testified for the state. The post-conviction court found counsel ineffective for failing to adequately impeach the snitch and present a defense alleging that he was the actual perpetrator. The state appealed but conceded deficient conduct. Thus, the only question was one of prejudice. Deficiency was clear in failing to learn of the prior adjudication. While the case file in juvenile proceedings was sealed, “there is a published opinion of [the] direct appeal issued by the Arkansas Court of Appeals.” Likewise, the defendant told counsel about the adjudication. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to pursue a defense strategy that the snitch committed the crime. Counsel knew the snitch had been stealing cars and was fired by the defendant for stealing money from the auto repair shop. Thus, he had a “motive” for pointing at the defendant. Prejudice was also established. No physical or scientific evidence implicated the defendant. Both eyewitnesses had biases and gave inconsistent statements. One was the defendant’s step-cousin, who was having an adulterous affair with the victim and was angry at the defendant “for his expressed disapproval” of her affair.

Young v. United States*, 56 A.3d 1184 (D.C. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in drug distribution case for failing to investigate and present testimony of narcotics expert witness to challenge police accounts of alleged drug transactions. Police officers testified that they observed the defendant enter a restaurant with another man, overheard the man say he had “50 on me,” and observed the defendant pass a small brown object to the man in exchange for currency. The defendant was arrested by other officers one minute after he left the restaurant. The other man tossed away a “piece of brown-paper” containing 10 ziplock bags containing .87 grams of 28% pure heroin. The defendant denied that he had been in the restaurant and had two alibi witnesses who claimed to have been talking with him outside the restaurant the whole time. There was no forensic evidence linking the defendant to the drugs. He was carrying $72 on him when searched but had no drugs or drug paraphernalia. If counsel had investigated, available expert testimony would have established that the street value of the drugs found was $200 and that a typical street-level transaction would involve 1-3 ziplock bags rather than 10. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. He conceded that he was unfamiliar with the street value of the drugs and that it had not occurred to him to consult with an expert. While he testified that he rarely found narcotics experts to be helpful, he did not say that was the reason for not consulting an expert in this case. “In other words, this was an omission, not a strategic decision.” Prejudice established as the narcotics expert, a former police officer himself, would have cast doubt on the police testimony. “[T]he likely impact on the jury cannot be underestimated.”

Kigozi v. United States*, 55 A.3d 643 (D.C. App. 2012). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with and call an expert witness who could testify about the PCP intoxication of the decedent, whose dying declarations formed the centerpiece of the government’s case. Trial counsel conceded that defendant had explicitly asked that such an expert be retained and that defendant’s initial attorney had intended to consult an expert on PCP. Counsel explained, however, that he believed defendant could not afford the expert's fee and he assumed that the trial court would not have permitted him to consult an expert at court expense because he had been retained by defendant rather than appointed by the court. Given that "[t]he crucial issue at trial was whether [the decedent] was actively under the influence of PCP at the time of the shooting so as to undermine the reliability of his dying declaration," competent counsel would have consulted with an expert. Regarding the question of funding, counsel failed to request money from defendant's family for expert assistance or make a motion in the trial court under the applicable statute. Because defense counsel did not consult with an appropriate expert, he was not in a position to make a cost-benefit analysis of expert testimony on PCP. An expert would not only have been able to opine about the effects of PCP, but also contest the prosecution's testimony about what the test results indicated about the presence of PCP. The lack of investigation into what a PCP expert could offer negated the ability of counsel to make an informed tactical decision about whether to call such an expert. Notably, the expert testimony would not have conflicted with the alibi defense presented at trial. Reasonably competent counsel would have presented PCP expert testimony. As for prejudice, an expert would have been able to testify that the decedent did have PCP in his blood and his brain, contrary to the opinion from the prosecution expert, and that it likely was not an insignificant amount, such that the decedent could have been suffering from the effects of PCP, making him confused, or even causing him to hallucinate, at the time he accused defendant of having shot him. Moreover, the PCP expert's testimony would have been corroborated by (and would have corroborated) the testimony of witnesses who saw and talked to the decedent prior to the shooting and thought that he was acting as if he were under the influence of PCP. "In light of the government's otherwise circumstantial case and the emphasis the prosecutor placed on [the decedent's] repeated identification of [defendant] as the shooter, we conclude that there is a reasonable probability the outcome of this case would have been different" had a PCP expert been called by the defense.

Gaines v. Commissioner of Correction*, 51 A.3d 948 (Conn. 2012) (affirming 7 A.3d 395 (Conn. Ct. App. 2010)). Counsel ineffective in murder and conspiracy case for failing to adequately investigate and present alibi testimony. Two people were killed in a parked car. They were shot with .22 and .45 bullets. Five months after the murders, the 16-year-old defendant was arrested. He informed counsel he was not involved in the murders but he could not remember his whereabouts on the night of the murders. He gave counsel names of two potential witnesses for him, but counsel never interviewed these witnesses. During trial, the defense theory was that the two primary state witnesses were the killers. One of them testified that the defendant had lived with him and admitted that he and another man had committed the murders with weapons the other man had borrowed from the witness. This witness' girlfriend testified that, after the defendant's arrest, he had confessed to her that he had committed the murders for payment. The defendant testified that he sold drugs to pay his rent, the state witness was his "lieutenant," and there had been problems between them. He testified that the "lieutenant's" girlfriend had attempted to get him to admit involvement in the shooting but he did not. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate. If counsel had called the two people, whose names the defendant had provided, he would have discovered an alibi witness. This witness would have testified that the defendant was with her on the evening of the murders assisting her in moving. This witness also could have put counsel in touch with her mother, who also supported the defendant's alibi. The first alibi witness attended the defendant's trial and testified that she told counsel of the defendant's alibi, but she was not called to testify. She said she had not provided the information prior to trial because no one asked her and she did not think anyone would listen to “a parolee.” Counsel should have interviewed the people identified by the defendant as possible witnesses to determine if they “had any useful information,” especially since one of the persons, who turned out to be an alibi witness, was the sister of the lieutenant/state witness, who defense counsel asserted was one of the killers. Prejudice established. The post-conviction court found both alibi witnesses to “be credible and compelling” and also found the defendant’s testimony that he did not recall his whereabouts at the time of the murders to be credible, as he was not arrested until five months after the crimes. Even trial counsel conceded that he believed the alibi witness testimony “might have made a difference in the jury’s verdict.” The state’s case “was not particularly strong, as there were no indifferent eyewitnesses and no forensic evidence tying the petitioner to the crimes.”

Hills v. State*, 78 So. 3d 648 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in child sex abuse case involving two victims for multiple reasons. First, counsel failed to move to sever the cases until after the jury was informed of both crimes. Severance was granted. “Although the trial court tried to salvage a bad situation, the damage was irreparable, as counsel continued to perform ineffectively.” During the testimony, the remaining alleged victim of incidents occurring between November 1997 and November 1998 (when she was 11), but not reported until June 2007 when her sister reported abuse, testified that the sexual encounters occurred about 50 times. Counsel suggested it could have been as many as 200 times. She also testified that the abuse continued until she was 16-17 and defense counsel did not object to the allegation of incidents five years outside the time period actually charged. Counsel then waived objection to the state’s failure to give notice and failed to object to the trial court’s finding that the second alleged victim could testify, even though the charges related to her had been severed. Likewise, counsel did not object to the trial court’s refusal to permit the defense to introduce evidence during the hearing on admissibility of this testimony that the alleged victim had recanted and changed her story. “Because the trial court must determine that clear and convincing evidence supports the claim that the defendant did commit a collateral crime whose admission is sought, a defendant has the right to present evidence on the issue.” Finally, counsel failed to object “when the judge left a position of neutrality in an attempt to salvage the trial mess created by [the] belated motion to sever.” The could made suggestions to the state on how to introduce the second alleged victim’s testimony anyway and obtained a waiver from defense counsel to the lack of the statutorily required notice.

State v. Crapp*, 732 S.E.2d 806 (Ga. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery and kidnapping case for failing to introduce available evidence to corroborate the defendant’s testimony. The victim was forced to drive her kidnapper to a house where he purchased drugs. While she could not identify her attacker, she was able to locate the house again. The occupant identified the defendant and testified against him. The defendant testified that the witness was motivated to lie because the defendant owed him drug money and the witness had him robbed and pistol-whipped by another man who sold drugs for the witness. The defendant had reported the incident and the man was arrested. Charges were dismissed after the defendant ended up in the same jail, was threatened, and then retracted his statement. During cross-examination and argument, the state mocked the testimony and said that there was no report or it would have been admitted. Counsel did not introduce the police report, indictment, or arrest warrant despite these circumstances. Prejudice established as this case was “a pure credibility contest” between the defendant and the witness.

State v. Kamau*, 131 So.3d 871 (La. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to raise numerous valid objections to state’s case. The defendant was charged in an amended indictment with possession with intent to distribute over 200 grams of cocaine. “[T]here is no such crime,” under state law but counsel failed to move to quash the indictment. Subsequently, none of the responsive verdicts presented to the jury included a requirement of finding that the defendant possessed over 200 grams of cocaine. Nevertheless, the verdict forms allowed the jury to convict of possession of over 200 grams of cocaine, which the jury found. Afterwards, the court and counsel agreed that the “200 grams” element should not have been included and that the jury’s verdict was for simple possession only. Nonetheless, the defendant was sentenced to 20 years, with 10 to be served without parole. This was not a proper sentence for simple possession, but counsel failed to object. The result of all of this “was an insolubly ambiguous verdict.” Reversal required.

People v. Trakhtenberg*, 826 N.W.2d 136 (Mich. 2012). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for failing to investigate and present an adequate defense. The defendant was charged with sexually abusing his eight-year-old daughter. Counsel’s alleged strategy was to impeach the child with inconsistent statements about the number of times she was abused and to show that the defendant lacked the requisite intent of sexual gratification. Counsel waived preliminary examination, did not obtain discovery, did not interview any witnesses, failed to consult an expert to testify about the problems with how the child’s statements and testimony were developed, and failed to adequately impeach the state’s witnesses, particularly the defendant’s ex-wife and the child. During trial, counsel presented no defense other than the defendant’s testimony in which he denied abuse but admitted that he had touched the child’s genitals six times to apply medication for yeast infections at his ex-wife’s insistence. If counsel had investigated, counsel would have discovered that the defendant’s ex-wife (the alleged victim’s mother) had made numerous negative comments about the defendant to her daughter and had repeatedly asked her leading and suggestive questions. In addition, before reporting the allegations to the police, she took her daughter to a treatment center for child abuse victims where she underwent a forensic interview by a caseworker who was unaware that the child had spoken to others about the abuse. Counsel was also unaware that the child had testified in a civil trial, consistent with the defendant’s statements that he had touched her while applying medication. Finally, counsel failed to present the testimony of another child, who was the alleged victim’s friend, but testified in the civil trial that the defendant had never behaved inappropriately towards his daughter.

Hibbler v. State*, 115 So. 3d 832 (Miss. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in statutory rape case for multiple reasons. The case involved a 13-year-old victim who had been diagnosed with reactive attachment disorder and borderline intellectual functioning. The defendant was 69 years old. A pediatrician and an OB-GYN determined that the victim’s hymen was still intact but that she tested positive for chlamydia, a sexually transmitted disease. Two months later the defendant was voluntarily tested and did not have chlamydia. During trial, the court allowed the state to ask leading questions of the victim due to her “obvious . . . diminished intellectual functioning.” Counsel relied entirely on the defendant’s lack of chlamydia as a defense. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to interview the victim; the defendant's daughters who were present on the day of the alleged offenses in the defendant's home; the victim's father, teachers, and the unidentified person to whom the victim first reported the offense; or the state's experts, whose testimony caught counsel by surprise. Specifically, the state's experts reported that the victim reported that she had no sexual contact with anyone other than the defendant. The experts also testified that chlamydia could only be contracted with "actual penile penetration of the vagina." Finally, the experts testified that the defendant could have been cured of chlamydia in the two months before he was tested, even if he had not received treatment. Counsel's conduct was deficient in cross-examination of the victim. Counsel asked only three questions and did not elicit information about the 3-day-delay in reporting the incident. Counsel also did not elicit information that the victim had previously accused someone else of raping her because counsel believed, contrary to the state rules of evidence, that he was prohibited from introducing this information. Likewise, counsel did not cross examine the victim about her prior inconsistent statements that the defendant did not rape her. In short, counsel "completely failed the challenge the believability of [the victim's] testimony and, "[i]n effect, . . . conceded it." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to effectively cross-examine the state's expert who testified the defendant could have been cured of chlamydia without treatment, which was contradicted by all the medical journals defense counsel reviewed. Likewise, counsel could have established that symptoms of chlamydia generally do not appear in women until one to three weeks after exposure. Thus, it is unlikely the victim's chlamydia found in a test only three days after the alleged incident could have been caused by the defendant. Prejudice established.

Smith v. State*, 370 S.W.3d 883 (Mo. 2012). Counsel ineffective in robbery case for failing to call the co-defendant to testify as a defense witness. Two men committed the crime. Initially, only the co-defendant was arrested. He pled guilty in September 2007. Subsequently, a pretrial inmate, seeking and obtaining a plea agreement in his own case, told police that the defendant had admitted his involvement. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the co-defendant would have testified, if called, that the defendant was not with him during the crime.

Gregg v. State*, 279 P.3d 396 (Utah 2012). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in rape case for failing to adequately present a defense. The defendant and the victim both testified that they met on an "online dating service." They first met in person around 2:20 a.m. when the alleged victim invited the defendant to her apartment. According to her, they engaged in consensual kissing until 3:20 a.m. when a friend of the victim called. Thereafter, they resumed consensual kissing and "progressed to foreplay." According to the victim, she said no but was raped. According to the defendant, it progressed to consensual sex, which was interrupted by the friend, who was waiting outside with his girlfriend, calling again at 4:07 a.m. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present evidence of the alleged victim's continued activity on the dating site after the alleged rape and in failing to elicit information about the 47 minutes between the calls. In her testimony, she said that she only logged back into the site to pull information about the defendant for the police. In reality, only two days after the alleged rape she had contacted four other men in "cheerful, light-hearted emails" saying she was leaving site to avoid charges but inviting them to contact her privately. These emails would also have undermined her credibility regarding the severe anxiety and panic attacks she claimed to suffer following the alleged rape. Counsel failed to subpoena these records. Likewise, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present evidence of the actual time line of events. While the alleged victim claimed the calls were only minutes apart, the phone records and the police report revealed that, even according to her testimony, there was “nearly an hour of [consensual] sexual foreplay” before intercourse. While counsel did make a vague reference in closing to a 45-minute time period, counsel presented no evidence supporting this argument. Prejudice was also established as consent was the only issue. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness on appeal.

2011: In re Hill, 129 Cal. Rptr. 3d 856 (Cal. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in lewd acts against minor case for failing to obtain forensic examination photos and failing to secure medical expert testimony to contradict state’s expert. The defendant’s stepdaughter alleged 100-200 sexual penetrations over a two year period when she was 12-14 years old. A forensic examination conducted one month after the last alleged event was “normal,” according to the state’s expert. She also had no herpes virus even though the defendant was positive for herpes during the entire time period. After these initial allegations, a friend of the stepdaughter also alleged molestation on one incident. Subsequently, the stepdaughter reported to police and a defense investigator that she lied because she was angry at the defendant for imposing strict rules at home. She told her friend (the other alleged victim) and a Child Protective Service worker that she lied in these recantations, however, because her mother was pressuring her and she was afraid of going into foster care. During trial, the stepdaughter denied that the defendant had raped her or touched her inappropriately. The defense presented the defendant’s denial testimony and character witnesses to his truthfulness and the stepdaughters untruthful character and argued that the stepdaughter was lying. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to obtain colposcopic photos referred to in the examining physician’s report and in failing to adequately consult with an expert. Counsel had attempted to consult with one expert, who had a conflict. Counsel recalled consulting with a second expert but this discussion was “superficial, at best,” as counsel could not recall the basis of the expert’s conclusion that the “no findings” examination was not inconsistent with molestation, but could recall that the expert did not want to assist the defense. Likewise, the expert had not been provided with the colposcopic photos. Adequate consultation would have rendered expert testimony to contradict the state’s expert’s conclusion that a “normal exam” was not inconsistent with the allegations. The defense expert opined that if there had been 100-200 penetrations there would have been changes in the hymen, which would be apparent in the colposcopic photos. Likewise, while the state expert testified that there was only a 4-10 percent chance of a person with herpes infecting an uninfected partner, there was no evidence where these statistics came from. The defense expert concluded that there was a 50% chance of infection with each act of intercourse. As the court put it, statistically there was almost a 100% chance that if the stepdaughter’s allegations were true, she would have become infected with the herpes virus. Prejudice was apparent as the jury even asked for a “readback” of the testimony of the state’s physician during deliberations. While the expert testimony related only to the stepdaughter, the court also found “a ‘spillover’ effect” related to the allegations of the friend. In essence, if the jury rejected the more serious allegations of the stepdaughter, the jury’s determination of the friend’s credibility would also be substantially impacted.

Larry v. State*, 61 So.3d 1205 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in delivery of cocaine within 1,000 feet of a “convenience business” for failing to assert the defense that the business involved was not a “convenience business.” Testimony by the lead investigator for the state established that the gas station had “at least 10,000 feet of retail space.” Under the relevant statutes, a business of “at least 10,000 square feet of retail floor space” is not a “convenience business.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to assert this obvious defense. Prejudice established as the trial court would have been obliged to reduce the charge to the lesser-included offense of delivery of cocaine.

Word v. State*, 708 S.E.2d 623 (Ga. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel in armed robbery case ineffective in failing to object to a police officer’s testimony that he believed the alleged victim. Alleged victim initially said he did not know robber, but then identified the defendant in statements and testimony as the robber. Defense counsel attacked the victim’s credibility during trial, but failed to object to the officer’s testimony bolstering the victim’s credibility and did not probe this in cross. Prejudice established as the alleged victim’s testimony was the only direct evidence against the defendant.

People v. Vega*, 945 N.E.2d 1189 (Ill. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in criminal damage to government property in excess of $500 for failing to timely discover that the actual damage was less than $500 making the defendant guilty only of a lesser-included offense. The defendant damaged a police vehicle. The total repair charges submitted was $502, but this included $33 of sales tax. Under state law, the police department was exempt from paying sales tax. Counsel did not discover this and raise the issue until after trial.

Timms v. State*, 54 So.3d 310 (Miss. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in possession of firearm by a felon case for failing to ensure accurate portrayal of the defendant’s status as a convicted felon. The defendant had been convicted of felony possession of cocaine, but counsel mistakenly believed he had been convicted of possession of a stolen firearm. While he had been arrested on this charge, he was never convicted but counsel failed to object when the State introduced documents showing that the defendant had been charged for this offense. This was compounded by counsel asking the defendant and other witnesses about this non-existence prior conviction. This was especially prejudicial due to the similarity of that charge with the current charge. Likewise, the State introduced documents about the cocaine conviction that showed that he was charged with possession enhanced by possession of a stolen firearm when his plea and conviction was without the firearm enhancement. Counsel should have sought a stipulation as to the defendant’s status prior to trial.

People v. Reid*, 918 N.Y.S.2d 863 (N.Y. 2011). Counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate in larceny and stolen property case. Defendant was charged as an accomplice in a subway pickpocketing heist of an undercover officer. Charges were dismissed against the alleged principal and trial counsel hoped he would testify for the defense. The Defendant informed counsel that he was elsewhere in the city (NYC) at the time of the crimes for meetings related to his job as an independent daycare provider. Even after counsel learned shortly before trial that the principal would not testify, counsel failed to investigate and present paperwork or testimony establishing the defendant’s presence at a city office, and failed to review surveillance tapes and Metro card transactions to establish that the defendant had not been on the subway platform where the crime was committed. Because the state’s case relied on a single eyewitness, counsel “had everything to gain and nothing to lose from undertaking an investigation that would likely have revealed a creditable source of reasonable doubt.” Counsel’s failure was the result of neglect, not strategy.

People v. Bodden*, 918 N.Y.S.2d 141 (N.Y. App. Div. 2011). Counsel ineffective in criminal possession of weapon and reckless endangerment case due to the cumulative effect of counsel’s conduct. Examples included distancing himself from the defendant in jury selection, failing to adequately cross-examine state witnesses, allowing the state to introduce evidence counsel had not even reviewed, stipulating that a lay fact witness was an expert, stipulating to testimony he had not reviewed, failing to adequately examine defense witnesses, interrupting court numerous times and being admonished before jury, making untimely requests for important jury instructions, and arguing only rhetoric in closing arguments when there were serious weaknesses in the state’s case. The representation was so bad that the court noted on the record before sentencing that he was troubled by counsel’s behavior and believed the defendant had a viable appellate claim of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Galloway v. Nooth*, 268 P.3d 736 (Ore. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in arson and attempted murder case for failing to adequately investigate the cause of the fire and present evidence that the fire was not as serious as portrayed by the prosecution. The defendant was pending pretrial on charges of assault and theft. After his second arrest, he was intoxicated and “made boisterous statements and threats” against the prosecutor. The attempted murder victim was the prosecutor on those cases. He awoke to a smoke detector alarm in his home in the early morning hours and discovered a fire in his basement garage. The fire was basically a burning pile of clothing on an area rug on the concrete floor in front of a washer and dryer. Responding police officers put the fire out before firefighters arrived. First, they tried a fire extinguisher and then used a garden hose. Firefighters initially believed that the fire was a result of spontaneous combustion caused by compression of bleach and laundry detergent and they began cleaning up the scene. Another fire, which was ruled as an arson, was set in a nearby park the following night. The defendant was seen by police in the area of both fires. After this, an arson detective inspected the scene at the prosecutor’s house. The remains of the clothing had been rolled up in the area rug and was outside the house. The detective found a burned book of matches in the roll, even though the prosecutor kept no matches in his home. Thus, arson was suspected. At trial, the detective testified that he believed an accelerant was used to start the fire, even though he did not smell one and the crime lab found nothing, “because clothing generally does not readily burn.” He suspected that alcohol was accelerant. The lab would not test for alcohol unless specifically requested because the crime lab used alcohol to clean its equipment. He did not explain why alcohol testing was not requested in this case. Three jailhouse snitches testified that the defendant had made incriminating statements. Counsel argued reasonable doubt in closing, but did not actually present any evidence to support the argument. Counsel asserted that she did not investigate because the defendant confessed to her that he intended to kill the prosecutor. The post-conviction court noted that there was evidence challenging counsel’s credibility, but made no finding on this point because “even assuming that petitioner did make that confession, it does not follow that an investigation would have been fruitless.” If counsel had investigated, she could have presented the evidence that a co-defendant presented if his own trial. Specifically, a firefighter who responded to the house would have testified that the first thing he did when he arrived was to smell the burned pile of laundry. He did not smell anything, accelerant or otherwise. On a scale of one to ten with one being something simple like a toaster fire, he rated the seriousness of the fire as a two. An “accident reconstructionist,” who had worked more than 100 fires, testified that no accelerant had been used. There was no petroleum-based accelerant, which was tested for by the crime lab. He also found no alcohol-based accelerant, which would be apparent after water was used to put out the fire and the arson detective did not report anything consistent with this. In addition, the firefighter would have been able to smell an accelerant if it had been used. This expert videotaped two fires that he set. He used piles of clothing roughly the size of that described in the fire report. He used an alcohol accelerant on one and no accelerant on the other. While the video was played from the jury, the expert commented that neither of the flames rose above 2-3 feet. Neither the fire nor the smoke, in his opinion, posed a threat of serious injury to the occupants of the house. Indeed, the fire would have gone out in its own without ever posing a threat. Prejudice was established because the state’s case on intent to kill rested primarily on the threat posed by the fire.

State v. Charles*, 263 P.3d 469 (Utah Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in murder case for multiple reasons. The defendant’s girlfriend was killed by blunt force trauma and asphyxiation, but was found submerged in the bathtub in the home. The state’s expert believed she died prior to 6:00 a.m. but conceded that it could have been as late as 8:00 a.m. The defendant said that he had left for work around 6:00 a.m. and the victim had to help him get his truck in reverse to get it out of the driveway, due to mechanical difficulties with the truck. While the police concluded there was no evidence of robbery, because a purse, cash, and a Rolex watch had not been taken, a safe was open and empty. The defendant was not charged with the murder until eleven years later. The state presented a mechanical expert to testify the defendant’s truck had no mechanical difficulties at the time of the death, but his report was lost and he was relying on his memory of eleven years earlier. There were holes in his memory and the circumstances and reliability of his testing was also questionable. A jailhouse snitch and distant relative testified that the defendant confessed to him while in pretrial confinement. The defendant testified to his version, including that drugs and money had been stored in the safe found by police to be open and empty. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to subpoena the defendant’s cousin to testify that on the day of her death the victim had called him between 1:00 and 3:00 a.m. and there was a brown car parked in the driveway after the defendant left for work. In addition, on the day of the funeral, he had received an anonymous threatening phone call telling him not to mention the car. Counsel did not subpoena the cousin because he expected the state to call him as a witness. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to present evidence to corroborate the defendant’s story that his girlfriend was alive when he went to work from the defendant’s next-door neighbor and the victim’s grandmother. The grandmother had died prior to trial and counsel sought to introduce her statement through the police officer who had taken her statement, but had failed to give proper notice of intent to present the hearsay evidence under state rules. Likewise, while the neighbor testified during trial, counsel failed to present the neighbor’s testimony, which had been given during a preliminary hearing, to establish that the defendant had been having mechanical problems with his truck in the weeks before the death and that the neighbor had helped him. Both the grandmother and the neighbor would have corroborated the story that he would not have been able to drive his truck to work without his girlfriend’s assistance that morning. Prejudice was cumulative. The state’s case “was not particularly strong” and the trial court had even expressed “misgivings about the verdict” in denying a motion for directed verdict.

2010: State v. Smith*, 85 So. 3d 1063 (Ala. Crim. App. 2010) (sentenced in August 1995). Retained counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present a defense during capital trial and sentencing. The victim, a friend of the defendant’s, had been missing for approximately 10 days when his body was found. He had been shot in the back of the head with a .25 pistol. Based on information from a single state witness, police focused the investigation on the defendant. The witness testified that he and the defendant had discussed robbing the victim initially as a joke but later the defendant was serious about it and the witness said he wanted nothing to do with it. This same witness testified that he had seen the defendant with a .25 pistol. A different witness testified that he had purchased a .25 caliber pistol that the defendant had offered to buy. This gun was later missing and the witness confronted the defendant who denied taking the gun. A third man testified that he saw the defendant and the victim together on a Friday in September. The prosecutor argued, without objection, that this witness had seen the defendant with the victim on September 23, the date on which the victim disappeared. Finally, police testified that the defendant had been interrogated and then confessed after a second interrogation in a tape-recorded statement. The defendant testified that he had an alibi and that he had not seen the victim on Friday, September 23, the last day he was seen alive. Because the circuit court had found ineffective assistance, the court applied the abuse-of-discretion standard. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate. While counsel testified that he had interviewed a “whole list of people” and “everybody we could talk to,” the circuit court found this testimony to be incredible. First, none of the witnesses called to testify in post-conviction proceedings had been interviewed and only the defendant’s mother, who had testified during trial, recalled meeting counsel. The mother never spoke to counsel prior to the morning the trial started and counsel spent no time with her preparing her for her testimony. Second, counsel described his efforts in “broadest generalities” but could provide neither names nor details of his alleged investigation. He produced no witness list nor any interview notes although he claimed he would have made notes and those notes would be in his file. Finally, when counsel did remember speaking to a particular person, what he remembered was trial testimony—“not anything that occurred in his purported pretrial investigation.” While counsel also claimed to have employed others to assist with the investigation, no evidence supported this other than a mere three hours of investigation within the week before trial by a man who had never before and never since performed any investigation in a criminal case. The failure to investigate adequately could not be blamed on the family’s failure to pay all of counsel’s retainer either. The defendant was indigent, but counsel never sought money from the court to pay for a professional investigator. While counsel believed “the Court would not have granted such assistance,” this assertion was not supported by the evidence. If counsel had interviewed the witness, who allegedly saw the defendant with the victim on September 23 and inquired further, he would have testified that it was actually September 16 when he saw the two together. Thus, there would have been no evidence suggesting the defendant had been with the victim on the date of his disappearance. Likewise, counsel failed to adequately investigate whether the primary state witness, who police relied on in focusing on the defendant, was the actual killer, although counsel believed he was. Counsel did not interview the witness’ ex-wife, who had made a statement to police consistent with her husband’s statement. By the time of trial, she was divorced from the witness and would have testified if asked that she and the witness were having financial problems at the time of the murder. Her husband had proposed the idea of robbing the victim to the defendant, who dismissed the idea because the victim was a good friend, who would loan him money any time he needed it. She would have testified further than her husband had purchased a handgun several months before the murder, that he was gone the afternoon the witness disappeared and came home muddy and wet with torn clothing that he disposed of, that he was unusually interested in news accounts of the discovery of the body, and that he had threatened her, prior to police interviewing them, that he would kill her and her parents if she “ever went against him.” She and her husband had been interviewed together and she merely substituted the defendant’s name for her husband’s in the statement and parroted her husband’s statement. The court found this witness to be credible. The court also found deficient conduct for failing to present expert testimony relating to the police procedures used in interviewing this witness with her husband and in interrogating the defendant. The police did not preserve a recording or transcript of the initial interview, which “was highly unusual” and undermined the credibility of the subsequent taped confession. The circuit court also made extensive findings on counsel’s failure to present testimony in the “area of false confessions.” Counsel was also ineffective in failing to adequately present evidence in sentencing. Counsel presented only two witnesses. The circuit court’s findings with respect to both the trial and sentencing phase ineffective assistance of counsel was supported by the record and upheld.

Head v. State*, 35 So. 3d 1008 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Court found trial counsel ineffective in per curiam opinion without “detail[ing] counsel’s deficiencies.”

Henderson v. Hames*, 397 S.E.2d 798 (Ga. 2010). Counsel ineffective in misuse of a firearm while hunting and felony murder case for two reasons. The defendant was charged with malice murder, two counts of felony murder, and the predicate felonies of misuse of a firearm while hunting and aggravated assault following the shooting death of his brother. The jury rejected the state’s argument that the defendant intentionally shot his brother and acquitted on malice murder and aggravated assault. First, counsel was ineffective for failing to challenge the defective indictments. Misuse of a firearm while hunting required both “consciously disregarding a substantial and unjustifiable risk” and “the disregard constitute[d] a gross deviation from the standard of care which a reasonable person would exercise.” The indictment for misuse included only the latter. The indictment for felony murder simply incorporated the indictment for misuse. Thus, the indictments were defective under the plain language of the statute. Second, counsel was ineffective for failing to move for a directed verdict of acquittal at the conclusion of the state’s case because the circumstances known to the defendant would not have led a reasonable person to believe that there was a risk from which bodily injury would probably result. The brothers were hunting on their own land and had agreed to hunt separate areas. The deceased, however, did not stay in his area and was not wearing his “hunter’s orange.” The defendant shot him believing he was a bobcat or wildcat, which had been reported by the neighbors to be in the area.

People v. Baines*, 927 N.E.2d 158 (Ill. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder and armed robbery case for a number of reasons. The victim had been assaulted by three men one of whom he was able to identify and provide a phone number for. Weeks later, he notified police he had seen one of his attackers at a Home Depot and was “100 percent” sure of identity. This man had a videotaped alibi and was quickly cleared by police. Months later, after failing to identify the defendant in a photographic lineup, the victim identified the defendant in a lineup, even though his height did not match initial descriptions to police. Counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to adequately learn the facts behind the victim's misidentification of the man at the Home Depot; (2) failing to establish with clarity during cross-examination of the victim that this man had been exonerated by police; (3) failing to adequately impeach the alleged victim for continuing to maintain in his testimony that the exonerated man was one of the attackers; and (4) failing to adequately prepare the defendant's testimony, which resulted in counsel eliciting damaging admissions and bolstering the state's case. In short, "[d]efense counsel manifested a lack of knowledge about fundamental facts of the case, and a lack of knowledge of basic principles of trial procedure." Counsel's closing argument pointing out the weakness of the victim's identification was insufficient to cure the prejudice. "That was too late. Closing arguments are not evidence, and the jury was free to disregard those comments."

Sea v. State*, 49 So.3d 614 (Miss. 2010). Counsel ineffective in child sex abuse case for introducing evidence of the defendant's two prior criminal convictions—both of which had occurred more than 20 years prior to trial—and for failing to object to the state's introduction into evidence videotapes of damaging forensic interviews of the four alleged victims, who were all less than 10 years old. Counsel's conduct was deficient in introducing the two prior convictions for sexual battery, one of which involved a child under the age of 13 rather than filing a motion to exclude the convictions or at least have the trial court rule on admissibility. The convictions were 25 and 22 years old, well in excess of the ten-year threshold, under state Rule 609 and thus could not be admitted unless the trial court found that the prejudice created by the convictions was substantially outweighed by their probative value. Prejudice found because there was no physical evidence of abuse and "while there were four accusers, their trial testimony came almost entirely from the mouth of the prosecutor, with the children responding 'yes, sir' or 'no, sir.'" In these circumstances, the prior convictions evidence "was incendiary." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the videotaped forensic interviews, which were "comprised almost entirely of leading and suggestive questions" and "were rife with hearsay statements from both the victims and the interviewers."

People v. Okongwu*, 897 N.Y.S.2d 330 (N.Y. App. Div. 2010). Counsel ineffective in child sex abuse case for three reasons, which were the basis of a federal court's grant of relief to a co-defendant tried in a joint trial. First, counsel failed to introduce evidence of a 1988 medical examination of one of the alleged victims, which was consistent with the 1992 examination on which the allegation of abuse was based. Second, counsel failed to obtain experts to refute and discredit the state's experts. Finally, counsel failed to cross-examine the state's expert concerning literature raising doubts about child sexual abuse syndrome.

State v. A.N.J.*, 225 P.3d 956 (Wash. 2010). Counsel ineffective in juvenile case where defendant pleaded guilty to first degree child molestation. Counsel was contracted by the county to provide public defender services for a flat yearly fee, which provided that counsel had to pay experts and investigators from this fee. Under state rules, "it is now unethical for an attorney to sign a public defender contract" of this nature. This contract "created an incentive" for counsel not to investigate. Counsel met with his 12-year old client and his parents for no more than an hour before the plea hearing, did no independent investigation, consulted with no experts, and did not carefully review the plea agreement before advising the defendant and his parents to accept it believing incorrectly that the conviction could be removed from the defendant's record when he turned 18 or 21. Counsel's failure to investigate was not excused by counsel's belief that the defendant was going to confess or even that he was guilty. "[A]t the very least, counsel must reasonably evaluate the evidence against the accused and the likelihood of a conviction if the case proceeds to trial so that the defendant can make a meaningful decision as to whether or not to plead guilty." Counsel also erroneously advised the defendant and his parents about the consequences of the plea by advising them that the conviction could be removed from the defendant's record when he turned 18 or 21. While the court has discretion to relieve the requirement to register as a sex offender, the conviction never goes away. Based on counsel's ineffectiveness, the defendant was entitled to withdraw his guilty plea.

2009: Bryant v. Commissioner of Correction, 964 A.2d 1186 (Conn. 2009). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter case for failing to present four independent witnesses whose testimony would have supported a third party culpability defense and substantially impeached the evidence presented against the petitioner. The testimony of these witnesses "would have worked in concert to create a credible scenario in which the cause of . . . death was a gunshot wound to the head perpetrated by a small group of unidentified Hispanic males driving a white Cadillac or Lincoln, not the actions of the petitioner." Counsel's conduct was deficient and not explained by strategy because the witness' statements were given contemporaneous to the events and "there was no evidence in the record to suggest that any of these witnesses' statements . . . were influenced by the statements made by the other witnesses." Prejudice established. "When reviewed in its totality, the testimony of these neutral witnesses, each of whom the habeas court found to be credible and highly persuasive, creates a plausible, well supported third party culpability defense." The state's evidence, on the other hand, was limited to the eyewitness testimony of two witnesses who were both "subject to substantial impeachment evidence." "[N]ot only was the testimony that linked the petitioner to the attack of dubious credibility, it also was internally inconsistent with respect to significant facts."

Gravitt v. State*, 687 S.E.2d 150 (Ga. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in DUI case for failing to adequately investigate and present testimony of two readily available eyewitnesses, who were riding in the defendant's vehicle at the time of the alleged incident. There was a two car crash allegedly caused by unsafe driving by the defendant, whose vehicle was not involved in the crash. Counsel called no witnesses and argued only that the defendant's actions were not the proximate cause of the accident. Counsel's conduct was deficient in making only minimal attempts to locate the eyewitnesses and waiting until close to trial to subpoena them, even though counsel knew they would be hard to locate. Prejudice established because these witnesses denied that the defendant appeared to be under the influence or was driving recklessly and explained how the accident happened through no fault of the defendant. In rejecting this finding, the trial court erred in measuring the credibility of these witnesses' testimony, "not against the witnesses who testified at the hearing, but against the witnesses who testified at . . . trial." In short, "the trial court judged the credibility of the witnesses had they testified at trial, and that is 'solely a matter to be resolved by the jury.’’ The trial court also failed to consider that the state capitalized on counsel’s error by arguing that these witnesses were not called by the defense because they might testify against the defendant.

People v. Wilson*, 911 N.E.2d 413 (Ill.Ct.App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to make a closing argument and failing to object to the admission of evidence of an unrelated revolver found in close proximity to the defendant at the time of his arrest. The case involved a shooting in the projects that may have been due to ill-will between the occupants of several buildings or areas. The state’s evidence was based entirely on inconsistent witness identification testimony from arguably biased witnesses. There was no confession and no physical evidence connecting the defendant to the shooting. At the close of the evidence, the court informed the jury that the state and defense would have the opportunity to make final arguments, but then was surprised when defense counsel chose not to argue, especially in light of the state’s extensive argument. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and not sound trial strategy in assuming the jury would find “the prosecutor’s argument specious.”

It would be a rare case in which choosing not to make a closing argument in a jury trial would be sound trial strategy. Given the evidence here, this was not such a case.

Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the evidence of the unrelated revolver and failing to point out its irrelevance in closing. Prejudice found.

People v. Bryant*, 907 N.E.2d 862 (Ill. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to call any witnesses in support of the defense theory that the murder was committed by others. Counsel represented two defendants, husband and wife, who allegedly killed a cocaine dealer in their home. They were accused along with two other men, one of whom was not prosecuted in exchange for his testimony. The victim’s blood and driver’s license was discovered in the defendants’ home and the victim’s blood was on the shoe of the other man charged. The only direct evidence that the defendants committed the murder came from the immunized witness, who had made numerous inconsistent statements. In opening statements, defense counsel said the defendants were in their bedroom asleep when the victim was killed by the other men. Counsel repeatedly said the defendants would testify to this. Counsel also told the jury it would hear evidence that the other two men met together prior to arrest to plan their story and that one of them had bragged to others that he had committed the murder. When counsel attempted to elicit this information about the other men in cross-examination of witnesses, however, the state’s objections that it was beyond the scope of direct were sustained and the court instructed the jury to disregard. Each time, the court invited defense counsel to recall the witness in the defense case in chief and defense counsel repeatedly said before the jury that he intended to do so. After the state rested, however, the defense also rested without presenting any evidence. In closing argument, defense counsel repeated his arguments from the opening. There were numerous objections from the state that he was arguing facts not in evidence and repeated admonishments from the judge that arguments were not evidence and that statements not based on evidence should be disregarded. Counsel asserted in a post-trial motions hearing that he did not present any witnesses because he was able to elicit the information on cross-examination. He did not call the defendants to testify because he did not want to subject them to cross or open the way for rebuttal and he believed that he had been able to make all the points he wanted in cross-examination and argument. While counsel's conduct "was a matter of trial strategy as opposed to witness reluctance or unavailability," the strategy was not "sound." Counsel promised the jury it would hear evidence and then "failed to present any evidence whatsoever, and his stated reasons for failing to do so are not reasonable explanations." Counsel did not present any evidence to support the defense theory and the court repeatedly instructed the jury to disregard the improper cross and closing arguments. The court also rejected counsel's reasons for not calling the defendants, despite promising the jury he would, and giving their version in the opening and closing. In essence, "counsel concluded that rather than support the defense theory with evidence that the jury might reject, it was better to not support the theory at all." Counsel also clearly "erroneously believed that he did not need to support his arguments with evidence." Thus, "counsel's chosen strategy was unsound." He was essentially relying on the jury to forgive his promises to present evidence he did not present and to ignore the court's instructions, which is contrary to the "assumption of the law that jurors follow their instructions." Even if the jurors were inclined to believe the defense theory, "they had no choice but to ignore it because they were presented with no evidence to support it." Prejudice found because, "[i]n the absence of overwhelming evidence establishing a defendant's guilt, the failure to present promised evidence that someone other than the defendant is guilty of the offense in question is highly prejudicial." Here, the state's case "hinged on the testimony of an admitted addict and uncharged accomplice whose testimony defense counsel effectively impeached." "[T]he defendants were undoubtedly prejudiced by counsel's conduct."

State v. Overstreet*, 200 P.3d 427 (Kan. 2009). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to present the testimony of two eyewitnesses that corroborated the defendant's assertion that he was not driving the car during the shooting. Counsel was aware from police reports that two witnesses identified someone other than the defendant as the driver. Counsel relied on his belief that the state, who had listed them as potential witnesses, would call them and did not subpoena these witnesses or interview them. When counsel realized his error, counsel was able to subpoena one of them and spoke for him the first time on the day of his testimony, which was more than 8 months after the crime and, by that time, the witness incorrectly believed he had identified the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to interview these eyewitnesses and subpoena them. Counsel's conduct was also unreasonable in "fail[ing] to adequately prepare the one man who eventually did testify." Prejudice established because the jury asked to rehear testimony and asked questions relating to identification during deliberations. "In light of the record, there is a real possibility that but for counsel's deficient performance in this case, the jury would have returned a different verdict."

Fisher v. State, 206 P.3d 607 (Okla. Crim. App. 2009) (direct appeal in 1987). Counsel ineffective in capital retrial and sentencing for numerous reasons including: (1) failing to establish a trust relationship with the defendant, even going so far as to physically threaten the defendant at a pre-trial hearing, which resulted in the defendant's refusal to attend his trial, which counsel did not explain to the jury; (2) counsel's alcohol and cocaine abuse during the representation; (3) failing to examine the eighteen boxes of records delivered to counsel by prior counsel; (4) failing to conduct an independent investigation or to utilize an experienced investigator assigned to him; (5) failing to review the physical evidence prior to trial, which would have revealed that the fingerprint card containing the only physical evidence linking the defendant to the crimes had been lost and had not even been used during the first trial, and failing to challenge the fingerprint evidence; (6) failing to present available evidence that the primary state's witness was the actual killer and failing to impeach the witness with his prior inconsistent statements, criminal record, and flight after his arrest and release; and (7) failing to request instructions on a lesser included offense or the defense of voluntary intoxication. Prejudice established despite the defendant's flight from the state and two incriminating statements because "counsel failed to discover and utilize evidence that would have called into question the validity and import of [the] statements" and the flight. The court also affirmed the PCR court's finding (and the State's concession) of ineffective assistance in sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation.

Garcia v. State*, 308 S.W.3d 62 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual assault case of mentally and physically disabled 53-year-old niece for a number of reasons. First, counsel elicited testimony from the defendant and his wife that opened the door to otherwise inadmissible extraneous offense or "bad acts" evidence of a prior alleged sexual assault, a shooting in the defendant's home, and two prior DUI arrests and then failed to request a limiting instruction on this evidence. Second, counsel failed to object to hearsay testimony from the alleged victim's aunt concerning the victim's statements about the sexual assault to her. The state asserted admissibility under the "outcry" statute. Counsel's conduct was deficient for failing to object because the "outcry" statute applied only to hearsay statements of a child 12 or younger and, thus, "plainly did not apply" in this case. Third, counsel failed to interview the alleged victim or other state witnesses' prior to trial and, thus, was not aware that the initial defense theory (that the alleged victim was a trouble-maker and had been banned from the homes of relatives) would not be supported by the evidence. Finally, counsel incorrectly advised the defendant that the trial judge could award him community supervision, which resulted in the defendant waiving jury sentencing. While the jury could have ordered community supervision, the trial judge was prohibited by state law from ordering this sentencing alternative. Counsel's conduct "[i]n its totality" (or cumulatively) required reversal.

Aldrich v. State*, 296 S.W.3d 225 (Tex.Ct.App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in intoxication manslaughter case where the defendant drove his truck into the wheel-chair bound victim in a crosswalk. Counsel's conduct was deficient for a number of different reasons. (1) Counsel failed to understand basic discovery procedures and believed he did not have to investigate because Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995), "required the State to do all of the investigation in the case and to turn over . . . all reports, statements, and evidence discovered in its investigation." The trial court repeatedly informed counsel of his misinterpretation but he persisted in his beliefs. (2) He failed to adequately convey a 20-year plea offer to the defendant because of his "belief that it would be unethical and would constitute malpractice for him to even discuss the proposed plea bargain" with the defendant. (3) He failed to investigate until just weeks before trial, including refusing to independently test the defendant's blood sample or interview an officer, whom the defendant asserted he had told at the scene that he had been blinded by headlights from an oncoming car. (4) He failed to timely obtain and designate experts, despite his awareness of the need, which resulted in the trial court's exclusion of the expert evidence. The only reason asserted was the defendant's financial problems. “[A] reasonably competent attorney would have several options, including to withdraw from the case” and to have the defendant declared indigent and counsel appointed. Alternatively, counsel could remain “but request investigatory and expert witness fees from the trial court for a now-indigent client.” In short, counsel’s failure “was not a strategic decision, it was an economic decision.” (5) Counsel presented “bizarre” defense theories not supported by the evidence, despite the state’s repeated objections. Counsel alternated between “theories that the accident was a suicide, assisted suicide, or [the victim’s] fault for failing to yield the right-of-way” in her wheelchair. (6) Counsel did not understand the rules of evidence and “had great difficulty questioning witnesses,” “repeatedly made sidebar comments during his questioning,” “repeatedly interjected his own testimony,”—despite repeated warnings from the trial court—and asked over 18 times to have the jury removed so he could question witnesses outside the jury’s presence. (7) Counsel repeatedly made inaccurate statements and arguments. “The totality of defense counsel’s errors pervaded and prejudiced the entire defense.” This was clear because the prosecutor and the trial court repeatedly “felt compelled to assist defense counsel.” Prejudice also established.

Holmes v. State*, 277 S.W.3d 424 (Tex.Ct.App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in misdemeanor assault on wife case where the wife refused to testify for failing to investigate and discover evidence (including the 911 and patrol car tapes), failed to develop a trial strategy, failed to be prepared for trial, and failed to object to admission of the 911 and patrol car tapes, or seek a continuance. Prejudice established during pretrial negotiations, including an offer of 120-days in exchange for a plea after jury selection began, because the defendant was “unable to make an informed decision regarding plea offers.” Prejudice also established during the trial itself.

2008: Vazquez v. Commissioner of Correction, 944 A.2d 429 (Conn. Ct.App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in robbery case for failing to present alibi testimony establishing that the defendant was at home asleep with his girlfriend at the time of the robbery. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because he failed to prepare and present this evidence only because he believed incorrectly that the alleged victim/eyewitness would not show up for trial because she was an illegal alien. Prejudice established because the PCR court found the defendant and his girlfriend to be credible and there was no evidence of any credible impeachment evidence.

Rayshad v. State*, 670 S.E.2d 849 (Ga. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery, assault, and kidnapping case for failing to object to inadmissible, prejudicial evidence. First, counsel failed to object when the state elicited on cross-examination of the defendant that he had entered a guilty plea to a charge of theft by receiving a stolen car. This was error because under state law the charge was dismissed without an adjudication under the First Offender Act and, where there is no adjudication of guilt, could not be used as impeachment evidence on general credibility grounds. Second, counsel erred in not objecting to, and even introducing, out-of-court statements of a co-defendant who did not testify in violation of the right to confrontation. The statements were made to police several days after the crimes were committed and “[p]lainly, . . . were not made during the course of any conspiracy with [the defendant] and therefore were not admissible as declarations of a conspirator.” Finally, counsel erred by not objecting to, and even introducing in evidence out-of-court statements of a second co-defendant, who did not testify. Again, these statements “were not made during the pendency of any criminal project . . . thus were not admissible as declarations of a conspirator.” Prejudice found in light of the case being a credibility contest and notes during deliberations revealing the “jurors’ focus on impermissible hearsay.”

Coney v. State*, 659 S.E.2d 768 (Ga. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault and cocaine possession case for several reasons. First, counsel failed to object to the trial court’s failure to charge on “assault,” which was a necessary element of the aggravated assault. Prejudice established because the charge allowed the jury to convict of aggravated assault even for criminal negligence when the defense was contending that he accidentally shot the police officer in the hand during a struggle. Second, counsel was ineffective for failing to move to suppress evidence that the defendant was under the influence of cocaine, which was obtained in an illegal seizure of blood and urine samples taken while the defendant was hospitalized after being shot by another police officer. Prejudice was established because without this evidence the evidence showed only that crack cocaine was found in the vehicle driven by the defendant, with two passengers in it at the time of the traffic stop, and the vehicle was owned by the defendant’s father and driven by others, as well. Thus, without this evidence, there was no presumption that the cocaine was his and the burden remained with the state.

Anfinson v. State*, 758 N.W.2d 496 (Iowa 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case arising from the drowning death of the defendant’s infant son for failing to investigate and present evidence of the defendant’s postpartum depression in furtherance of claim that the infant’s death was an accident. Counsel was aware from interviews of the defendant’s sisters about the defendant’s behavior (including self-mutilation by plucking leg and pubic hairs) of the probability of postpartum depression, but “categorically rejected any suggestion that this condition be explored in her defense,” including in statements in the media made “without the benefit of a reasonable investigation of [the defendant’s] mental health.” Counsel believed that asserting postpartum depression was tantamount to admitting an intentional killing. Thus, counsel did not request or obtain copies of medical records from the defendant’s post-arrest hospitalization and treatment for depression, suicidal ideation, and panic attacks. He also failed to conduct an investigation which would have divulged the defendant’s prior episodes of depression after she gave birth and consented to the adoption of her first child in 1980, and again following an abortion in 1985. Trial counsel was also dismissive of the opinion of the defendant’s post-arrest/post-hospitalization counselor that the defendant had symptoms consistent with postpartum depression. Retained counsel also rejected the defendant’s father’s request for a mental evaluation at the Menninger Clinic, even though the father offered to pay for the evaluation and the father was paying counsel. Counsel told the family that it would be “fuel for the prosecution.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the evidence of postpartum depression would have supported the accidental death defense to explain three things: (1) why the defendant was distracted enough to leave the infant in the bath to use the telephone; (2) why the defendant acted irrationally in hiding the body in a lake after she discovered his death; and (3) why her affect was flat and emotionless later that day when being questioned by investigators. Instead of investigating and presenting the mental health evidence, counsel simply used the “defense of ‘accidents happen’” without supporting evidence. Counsel “closed not only his ears, but also his eyes as he neglected to obtain medical records evidencing [the defendant’s] mental state.” Even if the court accepted “trial counsel’s assessment that insanity and diminished responsibility defenses are rarely successful, the decision to ignore evidence of . . . compromised mental state was not a reasonable professional judgment excusing an investigation of the extent to which that mental state supported the defense theory of accidental death.” The court found “a reasonable probability that if a reasonable investigation had been undertaken, evidence would have been developed and presented at trial tending to establish [the defendant’s] conduct from the time of [the infant’s] birth until his death was profoundly affected by postpartum depression” and that an expert could have connected the evidence of severe postpartum depression “with her bizarre behavior in furtherance of the accidental death defense.” While the court was “mindful of the deference owed by postconviction courts to counsel’s strategic choices,” the court held that “[d]eference for such choices is not unlimited, however, and it will not be stretched to deny [the defendant] a new trial under the circumstances presented here.”

Coleman v. State*, 256 S.W.3d 151 (Mo. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for failing to present evidence of the defendant’s pre-existing injury in defense. An eyewitness saw a white man kick the front door of her neighbor’s house in and then saw a second man (“well-tanned” or possibly Mexican) “run” from a vehicle into the house. While these men were inside the house and the police were on their way, the vehicle left the scene. The defendant, a light-skinned black man, was arrested outside the victim’s house claiming that he was simply visiting someone in the neighborhood and innocent. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to present testimony and medical records of the defendant’s pre-existing injury that resulted in him having an air brace on his ankle. While counsel asserted that this evidence was not presented because she did not want the jury to infer that he did not run from police officers only because he could not run, this was unreasonable because a police officer had already testified that he could not run, which raised this inference. Prejudice was established because this medical evidence cast doubt on whether the defendant could have been the white kicker or the darker skinned runner.

Wiley v. State*, 199 P.3d 877 (Okla. Crim. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in robbery, burglary, and rape case for numerous reasons. “[R]etained counsel provided little representation, much less the minimal effective assistance required by the Sixth Amendment.”

Due to defense counsel’s obvious unpreparedness, his failure to comply with discovery requirements, to have the DNA independently tested, to know the names of his witnesses, to interview all alibi witnesses, to know the proper sentencing range for one of the charged crimes, and his abrupt conclusion of voir dire, despite advice from the trial judge not to pursue that course of conduct, the prosecution’s case was not subject to meaningful adversarial testing.

Lounds v. State*, 670 S.E.2d 646 (S.C. 2008). Counsel, who was since suspended from the practice of law indefinitely for other reasons, was ineffective in armed robbery and kidnaping trial for failing to adequately investigate and present the defense and for making harmful arguments contradictory to the petitioner’s testimony in closing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel did not speak to petitioner until the morning the trial began and admitted on the record that he had just learned the name of possible defense witnesses, who were not called because they could not be located during the trial and because counsel “believed the witnesses would not add much to petitioner's defense." Even if this could be considered as a strategic reason, it was "not objectively reasonable given the defense theory of the case." In essence, the petitioner testified that he asked the alleged victim for money owed to him due to previous drug dealings and the victim went with him voluntarily to the victim's parent's house to get money. The victim denied knowing the petitioner, owing him money, or every buying or using drugs. The defense witnesses the petitioner sought during trial and who testified in PCR would have testified that the victim did know the petitioner through drug dealing, which "would have added significantly to the credibility of petitioner's case." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in closing argument for asserting that the petitioner had a friend with him for "extra muscle" when the defendant had denied robbery or kidnapping or any attempt to threaten the victim. Prejudice was found on each individual count because the jury necessarily rejected the victim's testimony in acquitting on the armed robbery.

McKnight v. State*, 661 S.E.2d 354 (S.C. 2008). Counsel ineffective for numerous reasons in retrial of homicide by child abuse case involving a full-term stillborn baby with cocaine in its system. The initial autopsy listed three causes of death, one of which was cocaine consumption. The state's theory was that other causes were ruled out and the cocaine use alone caused the death. In an initial trial, the defense presented two experts. The first completely contradicted the state's theory, testified that the cocaine studies the state's experts relied on were outdated, and ruled out cocaine as a cause of death. The second ruled out other causes, but could not rule out cocaine, which the state argued effectively supported the state's theory. The first trial resulted in a mistrial due to jury misconduct after seven hours of deliberations. In the second trial, the same defense counsel did not call the first defense expert because he was unavailable and recalled only the second that supported the state's theory, which resulted in conviction after only 30 minutes of deliberations. Counsel was ineffective both in calling the defense expert that undermined the defense and in failing to call the same (by obtaining a continuance or videotaped testimony) or a different available (and local) expert that supported the defense theory. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to investigate and present the medical evidence that contradicted the state's experts' testimony on the link between cocaine and stillbirth and failing to challenge the state's evidence. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to object to improper instructions that confused the measure of intent required for homicide by child abuse. The court initially charged the required "extreme indifference to human life" and then gave a general charge of criminal intent. While this was proper, in response to a jury question on intent, the court repeated only the general charge which confused the issue further and resulted in conviction only five minutes later. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to introduce the autopsy report into evidence simply because counsel "just forgot" when the report contradicted the state's theory of the case. Prejudice found individually on each of these issues.

Proffit v. State*, 193 P.3d 228 (Wyo. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault case for numerous errors. Counsel failed to object to testimony that the appellant had refused to take a polygraph test, testimony presenting the two officers' opinions that the appellant was guilty, the testimony that the appellant was a victim of molestation as a child (possibly leading to the assumption that, as a result, he had become an offender), the cross-examination of the appellant concerning whether other witnesses were "lying," the court's response to a jury question allowing use of the prior murder conviction evidence as substantive evidence, "and perhaps the most egregious failure, the failure to object to the prosecutor “hearsaying in” the extremely damaging testimony from two prior murder cases. Concerning the latter:

The astounding fact that a prosecutor would engage in a cross-examination and would make a closing argument of this nature is exceeded only by the more astounding fact that defense counsel did not object. In effect, the prosecutor “hearsayed in” the testimony from two murder trials, told the jury that the other juries had convicted the appellant of those crimes, and then told the jury that [the victim] was murdered because he was going to be the witness in the present trial. It is hard to conceive of a more unfairly prejudicial presentation.

Counsel’s “apparent theory of the case makes no sense.” He believed that the earlier convictions were unreliable because the appellant did not testify and that when he did testify, the jury would acquit. “What is wrong with that construct is that the appellant could have testified in this case without opening the door to all the damaging testimony from the earlier cases.” In short:

Garnering trust for one’s client rarely begins by allowing the jury to hear the detailed testimony from two murder trials in which that client was convicted. Neither is the client’s veracity enhanced by allowing law enforcement officers to testify that they believe he is guilty. This is not trial strategy that any reasonable attorney would follow. As Mark Twain observed in evaluating the writings of James Fenimore Cooper, “crass stupidities [should] not be played upon the reader as ‘the craft of the woodsman, the delicate art of the forest[.]’” Mark Twain, Fenimore Cooper’s Literary Offenses, The Portable Mark Twain 543 (Viking Press, 1968).

Id. at 242. Likewise, “[t]here are few rules of cross-examination that could be said to be set in stone, but it is hard to conceive of a situation where sound trial strategy would include asking a law enforcement officer why he believed your client was guilty.” Counsel also failed to demand notice of the State’s intent to present evidence of uncharged misconduct and failed to challenge admissibility prior to trial, which resulted in evidence of: (1) a prior sexual assault on the victim in this case; (2) involvement in a homosexual child pornography ring; and (3) involvement in two murders. “[N]o reasonable attorney in this situation would forfeit the opportunity to prevent the jury from learning about the different instances of uncharged misconduct noted above. While the appellant may have been subject to an attack upon his credibility through introduction of evidence . . . of the fact of the two murder convictions, there was a solid legal basis for defense counsel to attempt to prevent the jury from hearing the details of those crimes, or from hearing about the other alleged misconduct.” Reversal was also required due to the plain error in the state’s improper elicitation of polygraph information and improper cross and argument concerning the “lying” witnesses and the prior conviction evidence.

2007: State v. Barrett, 263 S.W.3d 542 (Ark. 2007). Counsel ineffective in capital murder case (resulting in a life sentence) for failing to adequately present a defense. Counsel’s conduct was deficient for failing to develop any strategy at all; failing to voir dire on “the elements of the State’s case, the burden of proof, the presumption of innocence, or the mental states required for various degrees of murder”; and failing to present any discernible defense. Prejudice found because there was no defense and no distinction in “the various mental states of murder to the jury,” even though the defendant had no prior felonies, was sympathetic, and was believable in his accident theory.

Cosio v. United States*, 927 A.2d 1106 (D.C. 2007). Counsel was ineffective in child sexual abuse and carnal knowledge case for failing to ask the defendant’s coworkers about his interactions with the alleged victim, who was the defendant’s younger half-sister. The alleged victim testified that she had been repeatedly sexually assaulted by the defendant over a seven year period starting when she was seven or eight, but she did not report the abuse until she was fifteen due to her fear of the defendant. The government’s case rested primarily on the alleged victim’s testimony, but also included evidence from a pediatrician that the condition of the child’s hymen was “strongly indicative of sexual abuse.” A defense expert testified in a similar fashion. Three of the defendant’s coworkers also testified that he was a good worker and a law-abiding citizen. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to interview the coworkers concerning their knowledge of the defendant’s relationship with the alleged victim even though counsel received a memo from his investigator that should have led counsel to investigate further rather than choosing to focus only a theory that the child resented the defendant due to discipline within the home, jealousy, and other matters, enough to fabricate charges against him. Reasonable counsel would also have seen the need to investigate the allegations that the alleged victim was afraid of the defendant. Further investigation would have revealed five coworkers with substantial knowledge of the relationship, who would have testified that the alleged victim voluntarily sought out the defendant at work and in other places, was very affectionate with him, and showed no sign of fear of him. Likewise, even in interviewing the coworkers to determine who would testify concerning the defendant’s character, counsel should have asked about any knowledge of the defendant’s relationship with the alleged victim because of the need to anticipate wide-ranging cross-examination. Counsel’s failure is also not explained by counsel’s “resentment” theory because counsel settled on this “theory prematurely, without having thoroughly investigated the relationship.” This “was not the kind of ‘reasonable professional judgment[.]’ that could support the curtailment of further defense investigation.” Prejudice found because the coworkers would have undermined the alleged victim’s testimony of fearing the defendant and the believability of the remainder of her testimony. Likewise, counsel would also have been able to confront the alleged victim in cross-examination with the contradiction between her words and her deeds.

Gibbs v. State*, 652 S.E.2d 591 (Ga. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in child sexual abuse case for failing to investigate and present evidence that the alleged victim had a history of making false allegations of sexual molestation. The defendant, who was the alleged victim’s neighbor, identified three men that the alleged victim had made allegations against and then recanted them. Counsel did not investigate or present this evidence because of his stated belief that it was inadmissible under the rape shield statute. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in that any research was only “cursory” because the Georgia Supreme Court had explicitly held in 1989 that this type of evidence was not precluded under the rape shield statute. Prejudice found because all three men and at least one other corroborating witness would have been available to testify.

Starling v. State*, 646 S.E.2d 695 (Ga. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon for failing to stipulate to the defendant's felon status, eliciting the defendant's testimony on the details of his criminal history, and failing to obtain a jury instruction on the use of the evidence of the defendant's criminal history. Counsel's conduct was deficient because a stipulation would have avoided exposing the jury to information that the defendant had previously been convicted of receiving stolen property, of aggravated assault that involved a gun, and possession of a gun by a first offender. Although counsel requested a limiting instruction at the conclusion of the evidence and the trial court agreed, counsel failed to renew the request the next day when the charges were given but the trial court failed to include the limiting charge. Prejudice found because the defense case rested largely on the defendant's credibility, only a single eyewitness testified that he saw the shooting, and the state emphasized the defendant's criminal history in closing arguments.

People v. Sims*, 869 N.E.2d 1115 (Ill. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in felony murder case for failing to timely give notice of the affirmative defense of compulsion and to seek instruction on the defense. According to the state's evidence, the defendant had been part of an armed robbery of a restaurant. The state's primary witness was a co-defendant who had plead guilty in a cooperation agreement with the state. He testified that the defendant was 15 while the other four participants were adults. After the robbery was discussed but before they entered the car to go to the crime scene, the defendant indicated that he was scared and did not want to participate. A codefendant, who was holding a gun at the time, told him that "he was there when it started, he got to be there when it finished." The state's witness testified that everyone knew "what that meant." During the robbery, the defendant was outside at a pay phone as a lookout and never entered the building. During the robbery, an employee of the store was hit and several shots were fired. The employee who was hit and close by the shooting died 5 ½ hours after the robbery. The state's expert testified that the victim died from cardiac arrest caused by the stress of the robbery. A defense expert disputed this finding. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to give timely notice of a compulsion defense or to, at least, give notice when he learned of this aspect of the codefendant's testimony 1 ½ hours before he testified. Although the court expressed concern about trial by ambush, the court allowed the codefendant's testimony in this regard, but informed counsel that the issue concerning arguments and instructions would be addressed later. During the instruction conference, counsel did not request a compulsion instruction even though there was sufficient evidence to require the instruction on the affirmative defense, which required only a showing that the defendant acted under the threat or menace of imminent infliction of death or great bodily harm. Prejudice found because "this case was close" in light of the issues concerning the cause of death, a co-defendant's prior acquittal on the murder because of that issue, the defendant's age in comparison to his adult codefendants, and his role in the crimes as only a "look out."

Commonwealth v. Bussell, 226 S.W.3d 96 (Ky. 2007). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to adequately investigate and to obtain expert assistance to rebut the state's experts concerning tree bark from a tree near the victim's body and the damaged fender of the defendant's car, automobile paint on the tree, and hair and fiber samples from the car and the victim's home. Prejudice found.

People v. Cyrus*, 848 N.Y.S.2d 67 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007). Counsel ineffective in first-degree robbery case for several reasons. The primary issue was whether the defendant was armed with a box cutter during the offense or was unarmed, which would have been only a misdemeanor petit larceny. Eyewitnesses testified about the box cutter and a box cutter was found on the defendant at the time of arrest just outside the crime scene. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and in opening the door to testimony about a crime scene videotape, when the existence of "taped recordings" had been disclosed by the prosecution. After cross about the tape, officers testified that the original tape was subsequently destroyed but officers had reviewed it and it showed a metal object in the defendant's hand. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to adequately litigate a motion to suppress the defendant's statement when the defendant had been in custody for 17 hours and had been questioned several times before being given his Miranda warnings; he had not slept; he was suffering from heroin withdrawal and told officers that; he was not arraigned for more than 30 hours after his arrest; and the defendant alleged that he had been induced to falsely confess to using a box cutter in order to obtain leniency. While counsel's actions related to suppression may not have been prejudicial alone, it required reversal "when considered along with his error regarding the videotape."

People v. Tykhonov*, 838 N.Y.S.2d 436 (N.Y. Co. Ct. 2007). Counsel ineffective for numerous reasons in driving while intoxicated case. The defendant was convicted based on a car accident. No one saw the accident but an ice fisherman allegedly saw the defendant walking around the vehicle from 200 yards away shortly after hearing the crash and was brought to the scene where he identified the defendant, who was then given field sobriety tests which he failed. Counsel failed to file a motion to suppress the arrest and identification. Counsel also "was not prepared in both the law and the facts and he was unable to employ basic principles of criminal law and procedure." Counsel's conduct was ineffective under the New York State law standard, which is "more favorable to the defendant" than the Strickland standard.

Kincek v. Hall*, 175 P.3d 496 (Ore. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to present expert testimony about the defendant's mental state at the time of the shooting. The defendant and his wife of 25 years separated and he suspected her of having an affair. When he entered her bedroom to find her having phone sex with the other man, an argument ensued and he ultimately shot her in the ankle. Although he had told officers that he had intended to kill her and himself, he testified that he did not intend to kill her and had only accidentally shot her. Defense counsel sought prior to trial to introduce the testimony of a clinical psychologist, who concluded that the defendant was acutely depressed at the time of the shooting and had not intended to shoot his wife. The trial court held that the expert could not testify as to the ultimate issue of petitioner's intent, but would otherwise be permitted to testify. Counsel did not call the expert to testify. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Ard v. Catoe, 642 S.E.2d 590 (S.C. 2007). Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to adequately develop and present gunshot residue evidence. The defendant was charged with killing his pregnant girlfriend, which resulted in the viable fetus dying from a lack of oxygen. The defense theory and the defendant's testimony was that his girlfriend was holding a gun during an argument and that it fired when he grabbed it to take it away from her. The state examiner issued a report that there was no gunshot residue on the victim's hands but testified that several particles were "very interesting, but there was not any or enough material for us to be able to call gunshot residue." Citing to the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty cases, the court held that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to interview the state examiner or to cross-examine him on this point. Counsel's conduct was also deficient because the expert they retained had been the state expert's supervisor at the time the test was done and he reviewed and approved the report. This expert was not an "independent expert" because casting doubt on the state examiner's findings would have implicitly cast doubt on his own oversight of the analysis. Counsel's actions "were unreasonable and clearly deficient, especially given the fact that this was a capital case with an arguable defense to the guilt phase." Prejudice found because interviewing or cross-examining the state expert and hiring an independent expert would have revealed that, although the tests were not conclusive for gun powder, the "interesting" particles contained the three required elements of gunshot residue and the particles were "consistent with gunshot residue and could have come from her handling a weapon." Prejudice was also established because the defense's critical theory relied on this evidence and the state capitalized in argument on the lack of gunshot residue evidence and even called the "defense expert" to testify that he agreed with that finding and that he had been hired by the defense. Finally, the court noted that "the jury apparently did not believe this to be an open-and-shut case of murder" because the jury sought additional instructions on involuntary manslaughter during deliberations.

Dillon v. Weber*, 737 N.W.2d 420 (S.D. 2007). Counsel ineffective in rape and criminal pedophilia case for numerous errors. The defendant was charged with abusing his eight-year-old daughter and four of her friends on two occasions. Counsel failed to object on double jeopardy grounds to charges of rape and pedophilia based on the same acts. Counsel did not investigate a prior allegation of sexual abuse by two of the alleged victim's that the state declined to prosecute against another man. Counsel failed to prepare his expert witnesses (social worker and psychologist) even though the entire case hinged on the credibility of the alleged victim's. Counsel also failed to provide the trial court with a sufficient offer of proof concerning his expert witnesses and did not establish an adequate foundation for some of the testimony counsel sought to present. Counsel also made numerous errors during the trial including failing to impeach the testimony of the mother of two of the alleged victims. She testified they were healthy and normal prior to the alleged sexual assault but their medical records revealed an extensive history including more than 50 emergency room visits. "Possibly the most disturbing trial error" was in the cross-examination of one of the alleged victims. The trial court explained on the record that counsel was taking 40 seconds to a minute between each question leaving complete silence in the courtroom. The court found this "unsettling" and could find "no reasonable explanation for this type of uncomfortable delay during the cross examination of one of the victims." Counsel also elicited from one alleged victim that denied penetration on direct that she had been penetrated. "Based on this cross-examination, it is difficult to determine who [counsel] was representing in this case." Counsel also elicited testimony from a state's witness vouching for the credibility and truthfulness of one of the alleged victims when the trial court had ruled this testimony inadmissible. Counsel, thus, "violated a pretrial order that expressly favored his own client." Counsel also declined to offer video tapes, audio tapes, and transcripts of interviews of the child witnesses/victims even though he repeatedly told the jury that he would. His purported reason was that he felt pressured to get the trial over quickly. "Why [counsel] would feel pressured to make trial decisions based on judicial economy is a mystery, as is his decision to actually give in to this impulse.” Finally, counsel said in closing that in rape cases the burden is on the defendant to disprove it. Although he later correctly stated the burden, he was “sending mixed and confusing signals to the jury about how they were to weigh the evidence.” “When viewed in the totality of the circumstances,” the Court found counsel’s performance deficient and prejudicial. Although the court disavowed reliance on speculation about trial counsel’s mental health, the court noted in a footnote that counsel was diagnosed with bipolar disorder two years after trial and received several months of in-patient treatment. The court observed “that bi-polar disorder is not a sudden onset condition. Instead, it develops over time.” The court, thus, found “reason to be concerned” about counsel’s mental health at the time of trial. “Here, we cannot even be certain that [counsel] was competent in a general sense, let alone competent to provide legal representation in a serious criminal matter.”

State v. Hales, 152 P.3d 321 (Utah 2007). Counsel ineffective in murder of a child victim case for failing to obtain a qualified expert to give an independent interpretation of CT scans of the child victim. The defendant was charged with the murder 14 years after the child was allegedly injured by being violently shaken as a five-month-old infant. The child lived until the age of 12 but was mostly in a persistent vegetative state. The defendant was not charged until two years later. The child had been in the defendant’s care for only 20 to 30 minutes on the alleged date of the crime when he called 911. The state’s case that the injury occurred while the child was in the defendant’s care and that the cause of death was a violent shaking that caused immediate unconsciousness was almost entirely based on a state expert’s interpretation of CT scans of the child’s brain taken after admission to the hospital. Counsel did not seek to have a defense expert to review the CT scans until the morning of trial and then asked a defense-retained pathologist to conduct this review. The pathologist testified that shaking could injure a child’s neck but not the brain and that the most likely cause of death was an alleged near miss car accident in which the child had hit its head several days before followed by a “lengthy ‘lucid interval.’” The pathologist was not permitted to testify concerning the CT scan though because he admitted in voir dire that he was not qualified to interpret the scan and did not do so in his practice. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate. It was clear from the preliminary hearing that the interpretation of the CT scans was critical to the State’s case because there was no witness to the child’s injuries. Counsel’s conduct was not explained by strategy because counsel made the choice to rely only on the pathologist without having conducted the investigation with an expert review of the CT scans. It is also clear from the opinion (although not clearly relied on by the court on this point) that counsel did ask the pathologist to review the scans and sought to introduce his testimony on this point, but counsel had failed to ascertain beforehand his qualification to do so and had not sought review by a defense expert until the morning of trial. The court also noted that, while counsel may sometimes have a valid strategy to rely on cross-examination or other strategy such that a defense expert need not be retained in every instance, “the centrality of this medical evidence to the jury’s determination of . . . guilt or innocence made an expert necessary in this case.” Id. at 341. Prejudice was also established because review of the CT scans by a qualified pediatric neuroradiologist “would likely alter the defense’s theory at trial as well as the entire evidentiary picture presented to the jury.” Id. at 342. Here, a qualified expert could have countered the state expert’s testimony with testimony that the initial CT scans showed changes in cell structures that would not be present until 6 to 12 hours after injury. This testimony alone would have been significant because the child was not in the defendant's care during that time frame. A defense expert also could have countered the state's expert conclusion that the injuries were a result of shaking because nothing in the scans suggested shaking as a cause as opposed to an impact injury or other possible causes. Likewise, a defense expert could have testified that the scans did not support any conclusion of immediate unconsciousness and were not inconsistent with a period of lucidity following the injury. In short, a defense expert could have countered most of the state's expert testimony because the "[t]he scan shows the point to which the injury had progressed—not how it got there."

In re Hubert*, 158 P.3d 1282 (Wash. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in attempted rape case for failing to discover and present the defense that the defendant reasonably believed that the victim was not mentally incapacitated. The defendant had met up with three women out drinking and dancing and had been invited back to the home of two of the women for drinks. He was also invited to spend the night on the couch. He later entered the room of one of the women, who testified that she awoke undressed with the defendant having sex with her. She ended the encounter and left the home for over an hour while he remained in her room. He left after her roommate insisted he leave. The defendant testified that he believed the alleged victim was awake and consenting the entire time. Counsel's conduct was deficient because it is a defense to second degree rape that the defendant reasonably believed the person was not mentally incapacitated. Counsel was also aware that both the defendant and the alleged victim confirmed that he stopped physical advances to the woman when she did insist and that he remained in her room for a substantial time even after she left. Counsel did not pursue this defense simply because he was not aware of the statutory defense. Counsel needed only to review the relevant statutes and pattern jury instructions to learn of the defense. "An attorney's failure to investigate the relevant statutes under which his client is charged cannot be characterized as a legitimate tactic." Id. at 1285. Prejudice found because the defendant was convicted of attempted rape, which required a finding of specific intent to have sexual intercourse with a victim incapable of consent. Here, the jury was unaware that a reasonable belief that the alleged victim had capacity to consent was a defense to this charge.

State ex rel. Humphries v. McBride*, 647 S.E.2d 798 (W. Va. 2007). Counsel ineffective in murder case for numerous reasons. The defendant was convicted of accessory before the fact of murder and conspiracy to commit murder in the bombing death of his wife's ex-husband, which was originally determined to be an accidental death by a bomb the victim built, 22 years before trial. Counsel's conduct was so bad that the state even conceded ineffective assistance of counsel and other reversible errors. (1) Counsel had an actual conflict and should have withdrawn from the case or should have been removed by the court when the state moved to disqualify counsel prior to trial. At that time, counsel admitted that his father and law partner had represented the victim in divorce proceedings from the defendant's wife, which went "to the very heart of the alleged motive" for murder. He stated that he was not involved in that representation and that the defendant waived any potential conflict. The post-conviction evidence, however, established that counsel was likely the last attorney to see the victim before his death, he did work on the divorce case, and he could have been a necessary witness for the defense to refute some of the state's assertions. Because counsel had misrepresented his involvement in the divorce case prior to trial, the court also questioned whether the defendant's waiver was "truly an informed decision" following adequate disclosure. (2)

Capital Case*

Counsel failed to object to testimony that the defendant had consulted with counsel and declined to speak with investigators during the initial investigation of the death, which violated the defendant's Fifth Amendment rights. (3) Counsel failed to offer an FBI report into evidence or to cross-examine an FBI agent with his original report that revealed that all of the components of the bomb were also found in the alleged victim's home, which supported the defense theory that he constructed the bomb himself and accidentally detonated it. (4) Counsel failed to retain a bomb expert or an independent investigator even though the case was very complex. (5) Counsel failed to object to testimony that the defendant's co-defendants had already been convicted even though counsel had sought a change of venue because of the publicity generated by those trials. (6) Counsel failed to object to numerous instances of hearsay testimony even though the state and the trial court were even posing their own objections to counsel's questions eliciting hearsay because "even they feared that [the defendant] was being 'done in' by his defense counsel." Counsel's deficient conduct was not excused by his "strategy" to "put it all out on the table" because "no reasonable attorney would have pursued a like 'strategy.'" Prejudice found due to the "cumulative effect of these errors."

Strandlien v. State*, 156 P.3d 986 (Wyo. 2007). Counsel ineffective in aggravated vehicular homicide case for failing to secure the services of an expert in accident reconstruction. Although the defendant's blood alcohol concentration shortly after arrest was .20, the defense theory was that the impairment was not the proximate cause of the accident. The defendant testified that he was passing the victim's car when, without a turn signal, the victim began turning left. Two state troopers disputed the defendant's theory and testified that the defendant had adequate notice to avoid the collision had he not been impaired. Counsel's conduct in failing to retain an expert was deficient because the exact nature of how the collision occurred was vital to the defense strategy and counsel had notice of the troopers' opinions months before trial. Prejudice established because an independent expert would have supported the defense theory and challenged the validity of the troopers' investigations and conclusions.

2006: Douglas v. State, 937 So. 2d 825 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006). Without any detail or explanation of the case, the court held that counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate appellant's treating physician due to counsel's speculation that the physician's opinions, which counsel was unaware of, would be successfully challenged on cross-examination.

Goldstein v. State*, 640 S.E.2d 599 (Ga. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in child molestation and aggravated sexual battery case for several reasons: (1) failing to cross-examine the alleged victim's mother about her many prior allegations of child molestation extending from childhood into adulthood; and (2) failing to present expert medical testimony to refute the state's experts' opinions. The mother's own family members had provided information concerning her numerous false allegations to defense counsel, but this evidence was not pursued. Likewise, experts were available to contradict the state's expert's medical testimony concerning the elasticity of a prepubescent hymen, which counsel had notice of but did not attempt to rebut. Prejudice found because the state's evidence was far from overwhelming. There was no physical trauma to the alleged victim, no eyewitnesses, and the first witness to report the "crime" had a history of making false accusations of molestation.

Capital Case*

Gibson v. State*, 634 S.E.2d 204 (Ga. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel was ineffective in homicide by vehicle case where the defense theory was that the defendant had a green light before entering the intersection where the accident occurred. Counsel was ineffective in failing to introduce into evidence county records indicating previous problems with the traffic signals at the intersection. The records included a document provided in discovery that showed that just four days prior to this collision there had been a report that the traffic signals were showing green in all four directions at the same time. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to discover additional documents showing similar malfunctions in the year before this accident, which were obtained by appellate counsel. Counsel did not present evidence of the malfunction 4 days before because their request to subpoena the appropriate witness was not made until just before the state rested and the court denied the request. Prejudice established.

Terry v. Jenkins, 627 S.E.2d 7 (Ga. 2006). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to adequately investigate and present defense in case where the victims were abducted from a coin-operated laundry and later murdered. The state's evidence was largely based on immunized testimony and trial counsel attempted to show that other persons were the murderers. Local counsel had no experience in capital cases so lead counsel was appointed. The two appointed counsel miscommunicated on the role of each counsel. Lead counsel assumed local counsel was investigating. Local counsel believed his job was to provide "local flavor" and knowledge, but otherwise just to do as he was told. Lead counsel did not discover until trial that very little investigation had been done. Counsel's files revealed some information pointing to other suspects and the falsity of their alibis but counsel could not recall investigating further and this evidence was not presented. Counsel also failed to seek a continuance in order to investigate when the defendant told counsel only six days before trial that his family had been threatened if the defendant "spoke up." "Had defense counsel investigated its own primary defense," the evidence would have implicated persons other than the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Testerman v. State*, 907 A.2d 294 (Md. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in eluding a uniformed officer and DWI case for failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence of eluding. The charge was based on the defendant's changing seats with the passenger as the arresting officer was getting out of his patrol car. Counsel's conduct was deficient because these actions may have been an attempt to evade arrest, but was not an evasion of the police officer, which was required under the statute for this offense. Prejudice established.

Commonwealth v. Garcia*, 845 N.E.2d 1196 (Mass. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in indecent assault case for failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. The defendant, a former part-time teacher, was charged with sexual acts with three young children at a Learning Center. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to interview any of the government witnesses and inexplicably failed to present evidence from one essential witness, who was a teacher and a babysitter for one of the children. Her statement provided by the state in discovery included information that the child initially denied allegations even though she encouraged him to speak up until his mother became involved, which supported a defense theory of parental influence and pressure. Prejudice found on all three charges because the case against the defendant with respect to the other two children had similar problems in that there was physical evidence or injury and credibility was the sole issue.

Johns v. State, 926 So. 2d 188 (Miss. 2006). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to adequately investigate and present alibi witnesses. The victim testified that he was shot during a 20-minute period by the defendant firing into his car from the defendant's car behind him. The defendant was quickly arrested at his home and no evidence was found connecting him to the crime. The defendant claimed to have been at home with his young daughter at the time of the shooting. The defendant retained counsel he met in a retail store, who had no office, met with his client only at McDonald's or the courthouse, and was indicted four months after this trial for the sale of marijuana in a correctional facility. The defendant and his parents, who retained counsel, all informed counsel of the names and addresses of three alibi witnesses. Counsel never interviewed them and never contacted his client again until the night before trial. The defendant did not realize until the morning of trial that he had no witnesses, but he turned down a plea offer for five to six years because counsel told him the State had no evidence and that he would be able to win. Counsel's conduct was deficient.

The decision not to interview witnesses, particularly your own, cannot be considered an effective strategic choice. When counsel makes choices of which witnesses to use or not to use, those choices must be based on counsel's proper investigation. Counsel's minimum duty is to interview potential witnesses and make an independent investigation of the facts and circumstances of the case.

Prejudice found because the post-conviction testimony of the alibi witnesses was not rebutted by the prosecution and "could very well have changed the outcome of the trial."

People v. Anderson, 813 N.Y.S.2d 725 (N.Y. App. Div. 2006). Counsel ineffective in drug case for announcing that the defense would be that of agency and conceding the defendant's identity as person involved in drug transaction when the officer's out of court identification of the defendant had been suppressed and counsel abandoned the issue of allowing the officer's in-court identification of the defendant.

State v. Gondor, 860 N.E.2d 77 (Ohio 2006). Counsel ineffective in separate murder trials for two defendants. One co-defendant plead guilty and the other two were tried separately and convicted with their former co-defendant as the prosecution's key witness in both cases. During both trials, the state also relied on blood evidence in the back of one co-defendant's truck and evidence that the two co-defendants attempted to create a false alibi. One counsel testified that the prosecutor's file was made available to him but he did not review each page because of his busy trial schedule. He relied just on things pointed out to him that were consistent with the state's theory. The other counsel also testified that the state's file was made available to him. If either counsel had adequately reviewed the state's files, they would have discovered a report from a serologist that the substance found in the back of the truck was not blood and was most likely perspiration. There was also evidence in the file to impeach some of the testimony concerning development of a false alibi by showing that this attempt was after the defendants became suspects rather than just hours after the murder as the state suggested. The state's file also contained a transcript of a prior inconsistent statement by the prosecution's key witness, which also reflected his statement that he would set the other co-defendants up if necessary to help himself. There was also evidence that the witness' mother had attempted to smuggle a knife into the jail for him and the charges were dropped against her as part of his plea agreement. Finally, there was evidence reflecting that others, who had never been charged or convicted, may have been involved in the murder. Both trial counsel denied seeing this information in the state's files, but would have used the information if they had known about it. In addition to the state's open file policy, the post-conviction evidence reflected that both trial counsel had been provided with copies of the relevant information. Trial counsel's conduct in both cases was found to be ineffective for failing to discover and use this evidence during the trials. Prejudice was found due to the "cumulative effect of trial counsels' errors."

Smith v. State*, 144 P.3d 159 (Okla. Crim. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to prepare and present a Battered Woman's Syndrome defense. The defendant called a neighbor and asked him to come to her house where she admitted to shooting her husband and killing him because she said she couldn't take another beating from him. The weapon was located at the scene with a live round jammed in the chamber. She told police that her husband was physically abusive throughout their marriage and his abuse had gotten worse through the years. In the month before the shooting, he had kicked the dog and shot the defendant's cat. His abuse of her escalated. During an episode of physical and mental abuse, she picked up a gun that was lying on a table. With her husband still yelling at her, the defendant, who feared another beating, shot him and then attempted to kill herself but the gun jammed. While counsel presented nine witnesses at trial concerning the victim's abusiveness to the defendant, counsel did not present an expert on Battered Woman's Syndrome and instead relied on a generalized self-defense argument. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to file an application with the court for appointment of an expert when the defendant said that she could not afford to pay for the expert. Prejudice established even though the defendant had been convicted of the lesser offense of second degree murder because, if counsel had obtained an expert, the defendant may have been acquitted.

Nance v. Ozmint, 626 S.E.2d 878 (S.C. 2006). On remand from the U.S. Supreme Court for consideration under Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175 (2004), the court reinstated its opinion finding that trial counsel's failure to investigate, plan, and present a defense in this capital trial constituted "a classic example of a complete breakdown in the adversarial process" and prejudice was presumed for eight reasons. (1) Lead counsel was suffering from numerous health problems, including alcoholism, and was taking numerous medications that impaired his memory and caused other problems. Co-counsel had been practicing law for only 18 months. (2) Counsel sought to show that the defendant was mentally ill and wanted the jury to view him in his unmedicated state and successfully got the judge to order such, but then failed to inform the jail personnel of the court's order so the jury saw "a drug-influenced demeanor" during trial. (3) Counsel pronounced in opening statements that they were appointed and neither of them "wanted to be there." (4) Counsel presented a defense of guilty but mentally ill but failed to qualify their only expert and presented supporting testimony of the defendant's sister only after the expert testified denying him the opportunity to inform the jury of how the sister's testimony supported a finding of mental illness. (5) Counsel presented no evidence of adaptability to confinement in sentencing when they had presented the only bad incident of urine-throwing in confinement during the trial. Evidence was available to establish that the defendant had been selected as an institution's inmate of the year and nominated for the entire state's inmate of the year and testimony was available from a jail administrator and prison minister that the defendant was a "model inmate." (6) Counsel presented "no mitigating social history evidence," even though the evidence would have established physical abuse throughout the defendant's childhood, an alcoholic, abusive father; being "treated with alcohol as a child in lieu of over-the-counter medication"; and growing up "in a family of extreme poverty and physical deprivation." (7) "[D]efense counsel's seven-minute mitigation presentation failed to provide the jury with any insight concerning Petitioner's mental illness," even though he has a family history of schizophrenia, history of hearing voices, and suffered from neurological damage. (8) In closing arguments in sentencing, counsel "failed to plead for Petitioner's life and referred to him as a 'sick' man."

[C]ounsel abandoned his role as defense counsel and in fact helped bolster the case against his client. . . . We again recognize that this type of "consistently inept form of lawyer conduct [is not] acceptable in this state, nor will we employ a prejudice analysis, for '[defense] counsel's ineffectiveness [is] so pervasive as to render a particularized prejudice inquiry unnecessary.'"

Id. (quoting Nance v. Frederick, 596 S.E.2d 62, 67 (S.C. 2004)).

Wiley v. State, 183 S.W.3d 317 (Tenn. 2006). Counsel ineffective in felony murder trial for failing to request an instruction on second degree murder and failing to preserve the issue for appeal and in failing to adequately investigate and assert self-defense. Prejudice was found because the defendant informed counsel that the victim "rushed" him. Although the defendant did not tell counsel that his nose had been bloodied, diligent counsel would have conducted additional investigation. Prejudice found because two bloody towels were evident in crime scene photos and at least one of them had the defendant's blood on it. The victim also had a prior conviction for battery, which would have been admissible under state law even though the defendant was not aware of it to establish that the victim was the initial aggressor.

Ex parte Amezcuita, 223 S.W.3d 363 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to investigate evidence involving the alleged victim's cellular telephone, which was taken and used while she remained in a coma for 10 days after the offense. If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have revealed that the defendant was never in possession of the victim's telephone or that, other than the victim's testimony, he was at her place of business on the day of the assault. There was, however, evidence that another business employee, who was a parolee with a history of violent crime and who had recently been confronted about his harassment of the victim, was at the business on the day of the assault and possessed the victim's telephone shortly after the attack. Prejudice found.

Wright v. State, 223 S.W.3d 36 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in indecency with daughter case for failing to investigate following receipt of notes of the victim's therapy sessions and failing to obtain the assistance of an expert. The defense theory was that the victim had been coached into making false allegations because of a child custody dispute. The victim initially said that the defendant masturbated in front of her. She then began therapy and the therapist's notes indicated that the victim's mother, who had child custody disputes with the defendant, was present for most of the sessions. The therapist initially noted that the child said she accidentally woke up and saw her father and it was her fault. Her statements kept evolving though. The therapist was noting a belief that the defendant had the child to participate in the masturbation months before the child said that he had done so. The prosecutor was also present at one of the "therapy" sessions. Although counsel had never been denied access to the state's file and knew of the therapist at least a month prior to trial, counsel did not obtain the file until just before trial. Counsel did not seek a continuance or obtain expert assistance. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy because counsel did not seek an expert only because he had been told that his expert would not be allowed to interview the child, he did not have time after receiving the notes, he had difficulty reading the notes, and he thought the therapist would be providing him with a report. Prejudice found because an expert could have testified that custody disputes generate a high proportion of false allegations of sexual abuse. In addition, this "therapy" was outside the standard protocol for working with child victims and conducive to false allegations. The expert also could have assisted counsel in preparing cross-examination of the state's witnesses.

Walker v. State*, 195 S.W.3d 250 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in resisting arrest case for several reasons. First, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to ask any questions in voir dire even after six members of the jury venire identified themselves as working or having close relatives who worked in law enforcement and made statements indicating potential prejudice or bias. Counsel used peremptories to remove two of these jurors but otherwise failed to conduct voir dire or challenge these biased jurors for cause. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to conduct an appropriate investigation and to object to inadmissible evidence of extraneous offenses and bad acts that were irrelevant to the trial for resisting arrest. This evidence included evidence of another person at the scene being arrested for possession of drugs, the defendant having previously disturbed the peace by firing an automatic weapon, and a 20-year-old misdemeanor conviction for assault on an officer. Counsel failed to object to this evidence because he was not familiar with the appropriate admissibility standards and also failed to request a limiting instruction. Here, where the defendant's credibility was critical to the defense, counsel should have investigated, filed appropriate discovery, prepared the defendant for his testimony, filed motions in limine to prevent the inadmissible evidence from coming before the jury, and objected and requested a limiting instruction when the evidence did come before the jury. Counsel was also ineffective in sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and opening the door to cross-examination of the defendant about numerous arrests for concealed weapons, criminal mischief, assault, and reckless conduct. Counsel also failed to object to the court's failure to instruct the jury in sentencing that evidence of unadjudicated offenses could not be considered unless the offenses were proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The defendant was prejudiced even though unadjudicated offenses were admissible under state law because the state did not offer any of this evidence or raise the issue until counsel asked the defendant broadly in redirect if he had "any problems with law violations." Prejudice found because evidence of extraneous offenses is inherently prejudicial. The prejudice in sentencing was particularly clear because the state recommended probation only, but the jury sentenced the defendant to 180 days in jail and a $2000 fine in addition to probation.

2005: State v. Hamlet, 913 So. 2d 493 (Ala. Crim. App. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in robbery case for numerous reasons. One counsel was appointed and did not do much in preparation. The other was retained only days before trial but acted as lead counsel without preparation (although he had moved for a continuance). The original counsel did not inform the new counsel of prior inconsistent statements by key state witnesses and sat silently while the new counsel pursued a defense theory that fell apart quickly and required a change in the middle of trial. And, neither counsel advised the defendant of the state's plea offer.

Lee v. State*, 899 So. 2d 348 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in capital sexual battery of child under 12 case for failing to adequately investigate and present a defense. This was a "classic familial sexual abuse situation, with no eyewitnesses, no direct physical evidence of abuse, nor even similar fact evidence." The defendant's 10-year-old stepdaughter alleged abuse on three occasions. The allegations were not made until the defendant left her mother for another woman, her mother was incarcerated, and her step-sister (who had found a letter to the alleged victim's mother stating that the defendant "was doing it with her") urged her to tell her grandmother, with whom she was living although she did not know her well. The only alleged physical evidence was from the testimony of a pediatrician, who testified that the victim's hymen had been torn and formed a scar as it healed. The pediatrician concluded that the hymenal ring was abnormal and indicated repeated penetration. She acknowledged that it was possible that the abnormality was caused by excessive masturbation "but virtually excluded that possibility." The only defense presented (other than the defendant maintaining his innocence) was that the alleged victim's mother had previously caught her masturbating and had been told then that a man (other than the defendant) had showed her how. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Counsel had never tried a capital sexual battery case and did not consider retaining an expert even though counsel could not read the state expert's notes and did not know the meaning of some of the terms used in the notes. Counsel also did not retain an expert because counsel dismissed the pediatrician's opinion because she "was not an expert." Counsel even advised the defendant that "he had a good trial case because there was no physical evidence of abuse." The defendant "had the right to an attorney who understood the ramifications of the pediatrician's testimony." Moreover, counsel's conduct was not excused by the defendant's request that the case not be continued for counsel to investigate because counsel had not done any investigation until two weeks before trial even though the defendant had informed counsel from the beginning that the alleged victim had previously alleged sexual abuse by someone else. Moreover, counsel's erroneous belief that there was no physical evidence of abuse, even though the pediatrician corroborated the alleged victim's testimony, "significantly contributed" to the defendant's decision. By finding that counsel's conduct was excused by the defendant's conduct, "[i]ronically, the circuit court thus held the defendant to a higher standard than his attorney for understanding the significance of the evidence against him."

The trial court made no factual findings or legal conclusions about the fact that the attorney had information about previous allegations available to him almost six months before trial and did nothing about it until the eve of trial, despite knowing that his client had been unable to make bond, had been held in jail since his arrest, and was anxious for his case to be concluded. Thus, when [the defendant] insisted on going to trial, he did so without the benefit of all of the relevant information that a reasonably prompt and thorough investigation by an effective attorney would have revealed. The circuit court erred when it found that [the defendant's] decision to go forward with the trial negated the deficiencies in his counsel's preparation.

If counsel had adequately investigated, counsel could have presented expert testimony that (1) the change in the hymenal ring was not indicative of repeated penetration; (2) the alleged victim's hymen was considered "a normal variance"; and (3) it was inappropriate procedure for the pediatrician to take the child's history while the grandmother was present.

At a minimum, he could have impeached the pediatrician, and the jury would not have been left with the unchallenged impression that the medical evidence corroborated the State's theory that something of a criminal nature happened to the victim. Had the defense attorney gone further and discovered whether the victim had made prior allegations of abuse, either founded or unfounded, that information could have provided valuable impeachment of the victim's testimony. . . . As it stood, defense counsel was left with the very difficult job of attempting to demonstrate that a sympathetic young child, crying on the stand, was lying.

Martin v. Barrett*, 619 S.E.2d 656 (Ga. 2005). Counsel ineffective in aggravated child molestation and cruelty to children case where counsel failed to seek to obtain the records or to request the assistance of an expert despite counsel's knowledge that the defendant had been hospitalized for treatment of mental illness. Prejudice found because the defendant had Bipolar Disorder with psychotic episodes of auditory and visual hallucinations. The defendant "might have been found to be incompetent to stand trial, legally insane at the time of the crimes, or guilty but mentally ill."

People v. Moore*, 824 N.E.2d 1162 (Ill. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in burglary of car case for two reasons. First, counsel failed to object to the prosecutor's improper closing argument urging the jury to convict the defendant in order to prevent their insurance rates from increasing. This was an inflammatory argument that "served no purpose other than to appeal to the jurors' fears, prejudice defendant, and inflame the passions of the jury." Id. at 1165. The argument was also based on "irrelevant speculation" and not on the evidence because there was no mention of auto insurance during the trial. Id. at 1166. Second, counsel elicited incriminating hearsay during cross-examination of two of the state's key witnesses. The witnesses testified that they had seen the defendant burglarize the car and take a camera bag. When the defendant was arrested, however, he did not have the camera bag and it was nowhere near him so the defense was arguing mistaken identity and a reasonable doubt. During cross-examination of these witnesses, however, counsel elicited hearsay information from "members of the crowd" that the defendant dropped the bag during a struggle and a man with the defendant grabbed the bag and took it with him. "The members of the crowd who allegedly provided this information were not named, never testified during trial, and were never cross-examined." Id. at 1170. Counsel's conduct was deficient because this evidence was inadmissible, the trial court informed counsel in the midst of the cross that it was inadmissible (but the court did not exclude it since the state did not object), and any alleged strategy was unreasonable because the hearsay elicited “served to further incriminate” the defendant. Id. at 1171. Prejudice found on each of these issues.

Parish v. State*, 838 N.E.2d 495 (Ind. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder and robbery case for failing to adequately investigate and present a defense and failing to object to an improper Allen charge. The state’s witnesses testified that they were in the victim’s apartment watching a movie. After a knock on the door, intruders entered demanding drugs, money, and guns. After a struggle with the co-defendant the victim was shot in the stomach. The defendant allegedly threatened the witnesses with a gun if they moved. The co-defendant was tried separately. Counsel presented an alibi defense supported by seven witnesses, all family members, during trial. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate because he just “assumed” that the crime did occur in the fashion the state alleged. Id. at 501. In short, counsel “did not make a reasonable decision not to investigate the shooting, which would have uncovered evidence that perhaps the crime did not occur as the State’s eyewitnesses testified at trial.” Id. at 502. If counsel had investigated, he would have discovered two independent witnesses who would have testified that the victim was selling drugs in the parking lot of the building when he was shot. This was also supported by a witness that did not testify for the state during trial but his statement to officers and identification of the defendant was admitted into evidence. This witness testified in post-conviction that he had been coerced by police into identifying the defendant. The state’s crime technician would have testified that no blood was found in the apartment, although there was blood in the car used to transport the victim to a nearby fire station. Likewise, DNA evidence from a hat allegedly belonging to the co-defendant revealed that it was not the co-defendant’s hat. Prejudice found because, at the least, this evidence would have seriously undermined the credibility of the state’s witnesses. “That is, if the eyewitnesses were not telling the truth about where the crime occurred, then that could cast doubt on their account of how the crime occurred and who was involved,” strengthening the alibi defense. In addition, five additional alibi witnesses, one of whom was not a family member, were available but not presented by counsel. This was complicated by the trial court’s Allen charge, which had been modified from the state’s standard charge, in an impermissible fashion and was included in pre-deliberation charges. During deliberations, the jury submitted several questions concerning the state’s primary witnesses, which went unanswered. After 9 hours of deliberations, the jury returned with a verdict of guilt. If counsel had “independently investigated the shooting, presented that evidence, and then objected to the Allen charge, the result of the proceeding would be different.” Id. at 503.

Bolden v. State*, 171 S.W.3d 785 (Mo. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in assault and armed criminal action trial for failing to seek a mental health examination, waiving the issue of competence, and proceeding to trial despite the defendant’s incompetence. Counsel and the court had received letters prior to trial that contained “random numbers and letters that made no sense” and one had feces smeared on it. During pretrial hearings, the defendant “acted erratically and strangely,” including urinating in the courtroom and swinging at counsel. He also testified in a hearing about “a conspiracy regarding activist Louis Farrakhan.” Counsel was also aware that the defendant was unable to understand the plea offer by the State but refused to allow counsel to talk with his family and would not respond to her questions. Instead, the defendant would tell counsel how to kill herself. Counsel requested a mental health examination and the defendant was found to be competent but the doctor warned that there could be deterioration over time. Counsel requested a second examination and the defendant refused to speak with the doctor, but based on a review of the records, the doctor concluded that the defendant should receive an inpatient evaluation. The initial examining doctor agreed that inpatient examination was appropriate. The defendant, however, “announced that he was competent and ready for trial.” Counsel then let the case go forward without requesting further evaluation. During the trial, the defendant’s bizarre behavior continued, including making sexual and threatening statements to witnesses in the presence of the jury. He made a number of bizarre statements in sentencing including that the country would end and that he had done away with emotions and feelings through “astro-rejection, metaphysics, telepathic powers, telekinetics, and psychokinesis.” Counsel had no strategy. She simply waived the competency issue because the defendant wanted her to do so. Prejudice found because “there is a reasonable probability that the result would have been different if an inpatient evaluation had been requested” because the defendant would likely have been able to establish a defense of not guilty by reason of insanity.

Dorsey v. State*, 156 S.W.3d 825 (Mo. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in kidnaping, sodomy, and other offenses case for failing to present evidence of juror misconduct in the motion for new trial and for urging the jury to convict the defendant of forcible sodomy. The victim testified that she was lost and asked the defendant for directions and then was kidnaped and raped. The defendant testified that the alleged victim was looking for drugs and he had consensual sex with her in exchange for cocaine. During deliberations, one of the jurors went to the scene “to investigate the victim’s story about getting lost.” The juror got lost in the same area and told the other jurors about it. The defendant was convicted of forcible sodomy and other offenses that day, but acquitted of a number of other charges. Shortly after the verdict, the judge’s law clerk and an assistant prosecutor learned of the juror’s trip and the information to the other jurors and disclosed it. The officer conducting the pre-sentence investigation (PSI) also disclosed that the juror that had made the trip called the victim’s family after the trial to say that he “totally believed” the victim’s story. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel filed a motion for new trial seven days late and included no evidence or argument other than the letter from the PSI officer. Counsel’s conduct was not excused because counsel did not offer a strategic reason. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the jury misconduct was clear. Once that was established, prejudice was presumed and the state offered insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. While three jurors testified that they were not influenced, nine jurors did not testify and the juror that engaged in misconduct “attempt[ed] to minimize the effect of his own misconduct.” Prejudice was found because “the victim’s credibility was clearly at issue.” If she had not been lost, her credibility was undermined and the defendant’s version was supported. Relief granted despite the trial court’s purported ruling on the merits even though it had no jurisdiction due to the late filing of the motion.

The test is not whether that particular trial judge would have granted relief. The test of merit is not whether the trial judge would have reversed his earlier ruling but rather whether, in the light of applicable law, the contention was a valid one.

In sum:

Capital Case*

Even though there was a verdict of acquittal on many of the charges, we cannot say that there was not a reasonable likelihood of even more acquittals, at least as to charges requiring belief in the use of a weapon. Because we know so little about the dynamics of the jury deliberations and the true effect of the juror misconduct in this case, we have very little basis to say that, had counsel secured a new trial, [the defendant] would have done no better in a second trial. Thus, we feel constrained to say that defense counsel's errors and overall performance were such that we cannot be confident in the trial having achieved a just result. Because we have a definite and firm impression that a mistake was made in ruling on the post-conviction motion, we reverse the motion court's decision.

The court considered counsel's concession of guilt "only in regard to our consideration of counsel's overall performance." While the jury could have found the defendant guilty of forcible sodomy based on his testimony, counsel is expected "to argue the evidence in a way favorable to the client." In addition, the court's instructions required a finding that the defendant "displayed a dangerous instrument" in order to convict and the defendant had not admitted this element here. Finally, where there was obvious concern about the victim's credibility, "it seems less than astute for counsel to concede" guilt on any offense when the defendant had denied guilt. While the court declined finding ineffectiveness based only on this issue, it concluded that the overall performance of counsel undermined confidence in the outcome of the case.

Johnson v. State*, 172 S.W.3d 6 (Tex. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in assault on public servant case where the defendant and her husband had fought, he called 911 asking for an ambulance but then called back saying the defendant did not want an ambulance, and police went to the home anyway. When no one answered the door they kicked the door in and refused to leave when asked to do so insisting on questioning the two individually. The defendant became agitated and fought with officers. Afterwards another officer arrived and was audiotaping events as he talked with the defendant, her minister talked to her, and she talked to an officer that was allegedly assaulted. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, although counsel filed a discovery motion seeking all statements of the defendant, counsel never obtained a ruling on the motion and, thus, was not provided with this tape. When he learned of the tape during the trial, he ignored the defendant's request to personally review the tape, did not seek a continuance or recess, and reviewed the tape just over a lunch recess without the benefit of a transcript. He did not object to admission of a redacted tape that excluded the only arguably exculpatory portion of the tape. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the defense was clearly entitled to receive this tape in discovery but "a discovery request alone, without an order or follow-up in some manner, is a hollow gesture." Moreover, counsel's attempt to redact the tape, without the benefit of a transcript, just over a lunch recess was "difficult and virtually meaningless." Counsel also did not correct and, in fact, agreed with the state's evidence that the redacted tape contained the entire dialogue between the defendant and officers when it did not and the portion excluded was the only arguably exculpatory portion. Prejudice was found because if the defendant had been provided with the tape prior to trial her trial strategy might have changed. She might have considered a plea or been better prepared to testify. Counsel might have considered filing a motion to suppress when counsel otherwise was not even aware that the defendant had not been read her rights prior to the taping. Here, the recording was the “lynchpin of a case that turned on” the defendant’s credibility and she was prejudiced by counsel’s actions.

Hall v. State*, 161 S.W.3d 142 (Tex. App. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in drug trafficking case for numerous reasons. The defendant was a passenger in a car stopped for speeding. The officer asked for consent to search the vehicle and found cocaine in a cooler in the back of the car. The driver pled guilty and testified. State law required an accomplice testimony instruction under these circumstances and precluded conviction on the testimony of an accomplice unless there was other evidence tending to connect the defendant to the crime. Here, because the jury was not properly instructed, the jury was authorized to convict the defendant with no corroborating evidence and the non-accomplice testimony provided only a weak inference of guilt. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the failure to request a proper instruction “relieved the State from proving the portion of its case that would have been the most difficult to prove.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object the state’s cross-examination of the defendant based on inadmissible, unadjudicated offenses that the state referred to as “gang-banging” offenses. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the state’s comment on the defendant’s post-arrest silence in the opening statement and closing argument. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by strategy because the court could not “envision a reason” for counsel’s failures in each respect. The court found prejudice with respect to each deficiency and found that “the combined effects” required reversal.

Keats v. State*, 115 P.3d 1110 (Wyo. 2005). Counsel ineffective in first degree arson case for failing to investigate the possibility of a plea of not guilty by reason of mental illness (NGMI). After the defendant set a fire in his mobile home, his roommate put it out and called police because he was threatening to burn the home down with him in it. After police arrived he vacillated between suicidal, threatening, anger, laughter, and depression. He set several fires that officers and firemen were able to put out, but ultimately set a fire that spread and filled the home with smoke. He was finally subdued but the mobile home was damaged beyond repair. After his arrest, the defendant was involuntarily committed to a mental health unit and found to have a major depressive disorder and reality distortion. He also had symptoms consistent with bipolar disorder. He was later transferred to another mental health facility where he was diagnosed with substance abuse and a bipolar disorder. Counsel was aware of these facts and had also been informed by the defendant’s mother that he had a history of mental health problems and an inability to stabilize his moods. While counsel discussed the possibility of an NGMI plea with the defendant and his mother, his strategy was to argue that the defendant’s specific intent was suicide and not to burn down the house. He believed that NGMI was incompatible with this argument. Prior to trial, the court granted the state’s motion to exclude mental because counsel had not entered an NGMI plea. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because his trial strategy was to make some sort of diminished capacity argument that the defendant was depressed and suicidal when state law did not recognize a diminished capacity defense. Counsel’s belief that the NGMI argument was inconsistent with his theory of the case was also “puzzling” and “not a reasonable decision that made further investigation unnecessary.” “[F]urther investigation was essential” under these facts. Nonetheless, counsel did not obtain the defendant’s medical records, did not consult with a mental health expert, or obtain an opinion about the defendant’s mental state at the time of the crimes. Prejudice was found because the only question during trial was the defendant's intent. Counsel's deficient conduct deprived him "of the only true defense available to him," which had a reasonable likelihood of success.

2004: People v. Callahan, 21 Cal. Rptr. 3d 226 (Cal. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in first degree murder case for three reasons. Following the arrest of four people, who believed that the victim had "ratted" on them, the defendant sought the assistance of two men who were members of "The Skin Head Dogs (SHD), a male white supremacist group," to obtain money to bail one of the arrested persons out. The victim subsequently asked the defendant to assist her in obtaining money to bail out a different arrested person. The defendant met with the victim at the defendant's home. The victim ingested two pills from a prescription drug on the defendant's dresser. In a pretrial statement, the defendant said that the victim took the pills to alleviate withdrawal symptoms of other drugs, even though the defendant warned her that the pills were strong and she would probably pass out. Two witnesses at trial testified, however, that the defendant stated that she deliberately gave the victim the pills to cause her to pass out within a few hours. According to the defendant's pretrial statement, which was admitted in evidence, after the victim took the pills, she and the defendant picked up some stolen electronic equipment that they intended to sell for bail money. They then met up with the SHD men and went to a hotel. By the time they reached the hotel, the victim had passed out. While at the hotel room, the stolen equipment was sold and the SHD exited the room. When the victim woke up, the defendant allowed her to call her mother. While she was on the phone, the SHD men returned to the room. One of them became upset because he feared the victim would report them for stealing the electronic equipment. Although the defendant argued that the victim should be allowed to leave, the SHD men killed the victim by slashing her throat while the defendant was in another room. The defendant assisted in disposing of the body. The state's theory was based on felony murder. While a duress defense would not apply to murder, it would apply to the underlying felonies of robbery and kidnaping, which were necessary to support first degree murder and the punishment of life without parole. Because counsel was aware of this, competent counsel would have sought to refute the testimony of the witnesses who asserted that the defendant deliberately gave the victim pills to cause her to pass out. This would have allowed counsel to portray any robbery and kidnaping as beginning inside the motel room, so that a duress jury instruction would be given, and counsel would have had a factual and legal basis to argue against application of the felony murder rule. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately cross examine the witnesses concerning the defendant's alleged statements concerning the suspicious circumstances under which they came forward, which caused even the prosecutor's investigator to doubt their truthfulness. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to call the defendant to testify since she would have testified that she never met these witnesses until after the victim's death. She would have also testified that she was afraid of being killed if she did not comply with the SHD man's orders. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to present expert testimony in support of a duress defense in that the defendant's fear was reasonable under the circumstances because of the history of the SHD members in being controlling and threatening the defendant previously. The duress defense was also supported by evidence that the defendant suffered from drug addiction and dissociation at the time of the murder, which would have impaired her thinking. Prejudice was found because counsel's actions "effectively" left the defendant with "no defense to the charged crimes," which allowed her conviction on felony murder despite her "concededly peripheral involvement" in the victim's death.

Woods v. Commissioner of Correction*, 857 A.2d 986 (Conn. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to obtain an expert evaluation and to request an extension of time for notifying the state of the intent to present expert testimony in support of a diminished capacity defense. Counsel knew that the defendant was “slow” and was informed by another attorney, after jury selection began, that the defendant may have organic brain damage. Counsel did not seek expert assistance or a continuance because she believed it was “too late” and “felt that the court would have denied such a request.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the court had the discretion to fashion a remedy and a denial of the request would have preserved the record for appeal. Prejudice found because, if counsel had performed adequately, the jury would have heard expert testimony supporting diminished capacity and a lack of intent to commit murder.

Yarbrough v. State*, 871 So. 2d 1026 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in sexual battery case, where the defense asserted consensual intercourse, for failing to properly investigate and secure the testimony of a witness who would have testified that the alleged victim had told her on several occasions that she had a sexual desire for the defendant and hoped that he would leave his wife. Counsel knew about the witness 10 months prior to trial and that she was in jail at that time, but counsel did not attempt to interview her until one month prior to trial when she had moved out of state. Although the witness spoke to counsel by telephone, counsel did not attempt to depose her or subpoena her for trial. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and the defendant was prejudiced.

People v. Briones*, 816 N.E.2d 1120 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in damage to property case for failing to call the defendant to testify after promising the jury that the defendant would testify and failing to object to an erroneous witness identification instruction. Although counsel’s conduct is presumed to be sound trial strategy, when counsel promised that the defendant would testify and then changed his mind, “it was counsel’s responsibility to evidence in the record that she was not deficient, i.e., that the determination was a result of the defendant’s fickleness or of counsel’s sound trial strategy due to unexpected events.” Counsel was also ineffective in accepting an erroneous instruction even though she initially submitted a proper instruction. The court also cited five other areas of deficient conduct and, “in conjunction with” with the other errors, found cumulative prejudice.

People v. McMillin*, 816 N.E.2d 10 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in driving under the influence case for: failing to object to inadmissible hearsay that contradicted the defendant’s statement that another man was driving; failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper argument about missing defense witnesses; failing to object to the prosecutor’s argument expanding the evidence; failing to object to the prosecutor’s argument of prior consistent statements (which were not in evidence) by an officer; introducing the defendant’s prior convictions, including two prior DUI convictions; and failing to object to the prosecutor’s cross-examination concerning a charge for which the defendant was never tried or convicted. Prejudice found based on the “cumulative effect” of counsel’s errors.

People v. Lemke*, 811 N.E.2d 708 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in first-degree murder bench trial for failing to present the possibility of a conviction for involuntary manslaughter. The defendant was charged with the shooting death of his step-son would both were intoxicated and arguing. The defendant asserted that the shooting was accidental and there was sufficient evidence to establish involuntary manslaughter rather than murder. The court found that counsel's deficient conduct could not adequately be explained by an "all-or-nothing" strategy here because the evidence presented by the defendant could not have supported a finding of not guilty. Prejudice found.

Montgomery v. State*, 804 N.E.2d 1217 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in arson and fraud case for failing to subpoena two of the State's expert witnesses when the State did not call the experts to testify. Alternatively, counsel was ineffective in failing to request a continuance in order to obtain the testimony of these witnesses. The defendant was convicted of burning down his own home. His girlfriend said he told her he was going to kill her dog and burn down the house. A police investigator, with no formal fire pattern recognition training, concluded that two fires had been set in the house. No accelerants were found. Two insurance company investigators concluded that the fire had been set, one could not find evidence of a second fire, and the other could not rule out the extension cord as a source of the fire. The state subpoenaed these investigators but did not call them to testify. Defense counsel had not subpoenaed the witnesses and was unable to serve them in time to testify at trial. Counsel did not move to continue the trial though. Counsel read a portion of the second investigator's deposition. Although counsel had also deposed the other investigator, he did not read any portion of that deposition to the jury. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to subpoena these witnesses or, alternatively, in failing to move for a continuance in order to obtain their testimony. Prejudice was found because both of these experts contradicted the opinions of the State's fire expert and were consistent to some extent with the defense expert that the fire was caused by an electric cord and the "second" fire was a natural "drop down fire." Where there was only circumstantial evidence of guilt and a "battle of experts," corroborating expert testimony would have been particularly powerful. The introduction of one of the depositions was an inadequate substitute for live testimony when the only reason for the witness' unavailability was counsel's failure to serve a subpoena.

State v. Davis*, 85 P.3d 1164 (Kan. 2004). Counsel ineffective in kidnaping and attempted rape case for failing to seek a competence evaluation and failing to understand and adequately present a mental state defense. The defendant suffers from schizophrenia and had been committed to psychiatric hospitals 31 times since age 13. His last release was two months prior to the offenses. Following his arrest, he was found to be incompetent and treated in a hospital for six months before competence was restored. He was found competent in May and new counsel was appointed in August. Counsel did not seek a competence evaluation prior to the November bench trial. Counsel was ineffective in failing to seek a competence evaluation because the defendant's letters to him were at times incoherent and clearly revealed confusion about the defense. If counsel had investigated, he would also have discovered that the defendant was not taking his medications after his return to the county jail. He had also reported an increase in hallucinations in the months prior to trial. Counsel was also ineffective in presenting a defense. Kansas has abolished the insanity or diminished capacity defense, but allows a defense that the defendant "lacked the mental state required as an element of the offense charged." During trial, counsel argued insanity and presented an expert that was also not familiar with the state law requirements. Moreover, the expert testified, consistent with his pretrial report, that the defendant's ability to control his behavior was compromised, but he was capable of forming the intent required for the crimes. Thus, because counsel was unfamiliar with the standards and did not adequately prepare his own expert, counsel presented the expert's testimony that "destroy[ed] the very defense he was attempting to establish."

State v. Peterson*, 857 A.2d 1132 (Md. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to prepare and present evidence of battered spouse syndrome. The defendant was charged with killing her husband. A defense expert testified that the defendant was suffering from bipolar disorder with psychotic features, had been physically abused throughout the marriage, and thought she was in imminent danger of being killed. Although counsel had discussed presenting a defense based on battered spouse syndrome and the expert would have testified in support of this defense, counsel did not ask any questions on this topic. Counsel's conduct was deficient because evidence of battered spouse syndrome would have supported a defense of imperfect self-defense, which would have negated the element of malice and reduced the offense to manslaughter. If counsel had adequately developed and presented the evidence, the jury would have learned of more than 20 years of physical and emotional abuse of the defendant by the victim. In the months leading up to the shooting, there was an instance of physical abuse and escalating daily threats to rape and kill the defendant. Counsel was aware of much of this information and presented some of this evidence but argued insanity and imperfect self-defense without presenting the evidence of the syndrome because counsel "did not appreciate" that this evidence was a necessary predicate to the defense of imperfect self-defense. Thus, "[t]he decision not to introduce battered spouse syndrome evidence was not a product of trial strategy; it was a consequence of trial counsel's not being adequately familiar with the law." Prejudice found because, without the evidence of battered spouse syndrome, the trial court refused an instruction on the defense of imperfect self-defense. If the evidence had been presented and the instruction given, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different.

People v. Grant*, 684 N.W.2d 686 (Mich. 2004). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for failing to adequately investigate and substantiate the defendant's primary defense. The defendant was charged with three counts of sexual abuse on his girlfriend's two nieces. The first alleged incident to the older girl resulted in physical injury but was reported at the time as a bicycle accident. A year later, another allegation involving both girls arose and the older girl asserted that her previous injury was due to assault rather than a bicycle accident. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate to seek evidence concerning the accident because counsel was aware of the girl's initial report, the initial doctor's finding that the injury was more consistent with a bicycle accident than abuse, and the defendant's insistence of innocence. Although the defendant provided counsel with a number of potential witnesses, counsel did not adequately pursue the matter. Prejudice established because adequate investigation would have revealed that two cousins of the girls witnessed the bicycle accident and would have testified accordingly. If counsel had been able to establish that the physical injury had been due to the accident, it would have called the credibility of the alleged victims into question and the other allegations involved only a credibility contest between them and the defendant. Thus, the court found a reasonable probability of a different outcome.

2003: State v. Wakisaka, 78 P.3d 317 (Haw. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in a second-degree murder case for failing to object to the prosecution's improper argument commenting on the defendant's failure to testify and in counsel's cross-examination of a police officer during which counsel intentionally solicited the officer's opinion of the defendant's guilt in evidence. Counsel knew that the officer's opinion was that the defendant murdered his wife and, despite the court's warning and the prosecution's objection to the line of questioning, counsel insisted on eliciting the officer's testimony and did not move to strike the officer's testimony even though the court informed counsel that it would in fact strike the testimony if counsel desired. Counsel's stated reason for the questioning was that he wanted to show that the officer was working in conjunction with the victim's daughters to collect evidence and, therefore, the officer was biased. The court found that while this line of questioning may well have been part of counsel's misguided strategy, his conduct was an error reflecting defense counsel's lack of skill or judgment. The court found prejudice because counsel's errors and omissions resulted in "the possible impairment of a potentially meritorious defense" that the victim had in fact committed suicide.

Law v. State*, 797 N.E.2d 1157 (Ind. Ct. App. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in child molesting and sexual misconduct with a minor case for failing to present evidence of the victim's age at the time of the offenses. The victim testified that the defendant began sexually abusing her when she was ten years old and the defendant was charged with multiple counts. One of the elements of a number of the offenses that the defendant was charged with was that the victim was under twelve years old when the crimes occurred. There was a significant difference in sentencing range for a child under twelve and a child over twelve. While the defendant presented a theory that he was not guilty, the court found that defense counsel's failure to present evidence that the victim was over twelve years old at the time of the alleged offenses was deficient in light of the sentencing consequences. The court also found that counsel made no strategic decision to avoid the apparent contradiction in defense theories because counsel had intended to introduce evidence of the victim's age through the defendant's wife and had not obtained other evidence to establish the victim's age because he did not anticipate that the defendant's wife would refuse to give this testimony. While the court found no prejudice with respect to some of the counts, the court did find prejudice with respect to several counts of the conviction and reversed in part.

State v. Thiel*, 665 N.W.2d 305 (Wis. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in sexual exploitation by a therapist case for numerous deficiencies. The alleged victim asserted that she had repeated sexual relations with her psychiatrist and had been to his house more than one hundred times. When she first went to police, she also took a vial of semen that she claimed was the defendant's, but DNA testing revealed that it was not his. She explained that she had hoped to force him to confess with this false evidence. An assistant prosecutor, who had also had a sexual relationship with the alleged victim, testified that she had informed him of the relationship long before she reported it to police. The defendant's ex-wife, who had also been a former patient, and another former patient provided "other acts" evidence in corroboration. The defendant testified and denied the allegations and asserted the defense theory that the alleged victim made the complaint against him because he refused to assist her in filing for government disability benefits. He claimed that she had been to his house only three times when she showed up unannounced, but he had not documented these visits in her chart. The state called the victim's new psychiatrist in rebuttal to say that any contact with patients should be documented, but this was his personal opinion and not a standard of care requirement. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to read police reports and medical notes that had been provided in discovery. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to conduct an independent investigation when they already knew of the lie concerning the semen. Finally, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to file a motion that would have allowed the defense to present relevant evidence of the alleged victim's prior personal and medical history. If counsel had read the discovery documents, counsel would have discovered and been able to use numerous items that would further impeach the alleged victim, including giving the wrong address for the defendant, and even items consistent with the defense theory that her motive was anger at the defendant for not helping the victim to seek disability benefits. They would also have discovered that the statement to the assistant prosecutor used as a prior consistent statement was made only shortly before her report to police, which would have rendered this statement likely inadmissible. If counsel had investigated they would have discovered that the alleged victim had no driver's license during the time she claimed to have driven to the defendant's house 100 times, she had difficulty finding the defendant's house when police asked her to show them, none of the defendant's neighbors recalled seeing her, and she had numerous phone calls with the assistant prosecutor at his home and his work, which was inconsistent with the way that relationship had been portrayed in court. If counsel had filed the motion, the state may not have called the rebuttal witness due to concern that the defense could use his notes to impeach the credibility of the alleged victim further. No strategy could explain the failure to read discovery or to independently investigate when counsel knew the alleged victim had already lied about the semen. Likewise, counsel's purported strategy for not filing the motion prior to trial was based on "an erroneous view of the law" and, therefore, could not be a reasonable strategy. While finding that the deficiencies found did not "individually prejudice[]" the defendant to such a degree as to warrant a new trial, the court concluded "that the cumulative effective" of the deficiencies warranted a new trial, id. at ___, in this case, which "was a classic instance of the 'he-said-she-said' dilemma," id. at _____. While counsel had performed well in most areas of representation, "the proper inquiry for assessing prejudice is not the totality of counsel's performance, but rather the effect of counsel's acts or omissions on the reliability of the trial's outcome." Id. at ____.

B. ONE DEFICIENCY

1. JURY SELECTION

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2006: Virgil v. Dretke, 446 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in causing bodily injury to an elderly person case for failing to challenge for cause two jurors who expressly stated an inability to be fair and impartial. One had close relationships with law-enforcement officers and one was influenced by his mother's mugging. Counsel's failure to challenge these jurors for cause or to remove them with peremptory challenges was deficient and there was no "suggestion of a trial strategy" for counsel's inaction. Prejudice found because both jurors admitted bias. In addition to their own bias, the court could not "know the effect" of their bias on the remaining jurors. Under AEDPA, the state court's decision to the contrary was an unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.

2004: Miller v. Webb, 385 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately question or challenge actually biased juror. During voir dire, a juror stated that she knew the state's key witness, who was the only eyewitness and had also been shot. The juror knew her through the juror's ministry and Bible Study in the local jail. She stated she would be "partial" to the witness and had sympathy for her. While she stated that she "believed" she could be fair, she qualified this by stating, "I do have some feelings about her." Counsel did not follow-up with questions or challenge this juror. Counsel's conduct was deficient and was not justified by strategy because counsel believed the juror would know the witness was unworthy of belief and would know that she was a drug addict and understand that culture. The court held, contrary to the state court, that "the decision whether to seat a biased juror cannot be a discretionary or strategic decision" because it amounts to "a waiver of a defendant's basic Sixth Amendment right to trial by an impartial jury." Under the AEDPA, the state court's finding that counsel's conduct was not deficient was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Even if strategy could justify the decision, counsel's strategy was unreasonable here where the juror clearly did not indicate a disbelief in the witness' credibility or knowledge of her being a drug addict. To the contrary, the juror indicated that she was sympathetic to the witness. Prejudice presumed because the presence of a biased juror cannot be harmless.

Quintero v. Bell*, 368 F.3d 892 (6th Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 544 U.S. 936 (2005). Counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the presence of seven jurors who had served on the juries that convicted his co-conspirators. Prejudice was presumed under Cronic. Bell v. Cone was distinguished "[b]ecause the alleged deficient performance in Cone affected only specified parts of Cone's trial." Here, "allowing seven jurors who had convicted petitioner's co-conspirators to sit in judgment of his case surely amounted to an abandonment of 'meaningful adversarial testing' throughout the proceeding." The Court reinstated its prior opinion, Quintero v. Bell, 256 F.3d 409 (6th Cir. 2001), which had been vacated and remanded for reconsideration in light of Cone.

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Cardenas v. Garrett, 2024 WL 3293813 (D. Nev. July 2, 2024). In sexual assault case, habeas relief granted on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to excuse one of the jurors for presumptive bias after the juror disclosed during trial that he was personally acquainted with the alleged victim. Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, Martinez provided the necessary cause to overcome the default. The alleged victim was the key witness in the prosecution's case and the jury was instructed it could convict petitioner based solely on the alleged victim's uncorroborated testimony if it was believed. During trial, the juror at issue disclosed he and the alleged victim had cordial interactions a few times a month for nearly three years at their mutual place of employment, and that he had seen her there the night before she testified at trial. Reasonable jurists could conclude that these facts presented the type of rare and extraordinary circumstance in which bias must be presumed. Additionally, fairminded jurists could conclude there was no basis to find that trial counsel's failure to seek removal of the juror had a reasonable strategic purpose. Although it was true that the trial court denied defense motions for cause to excuse two prospective jurors who were friends with witnesses, the state anticipated neither witness would be called to testify and trial counsel used peremptory challenges to excuse those prospective jurors. That the first alternate juror who would have replaced the juror at issue had family in law enforcement did not supply an inference that defense counsel made the strategic choice to keep that alternate juror from sitting on the jury. This was because defense counsel had previously had the opportunity to utilize a peremptory challenge on the alternate juror but declined to do so. Additionally, trial counsel waived five peremptory challenges leaving several jurors with family members who were in law enforcement. But even if it was strategic to not seek excusal of the co-worker/juror, it could not be considered sound strategy on this record. Fairminded jurists could conclude trial counsel's failure to move to excuse the juror for presumptive bias was prejudicial under Strickland because the record supports a conclusion that the juror was presumptively biased. And postconviction counsel's failure to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness was deficient performance. As to prejudice, in the context of a Martinez analysis, the question whether postconviction counsel's performance was prejudicial is not based on whether the particular postconviction review court would have rendered a more favorable decision, but whether some reasonable postconviction review court might have done so. Applying that standard, prejudice is established. In finding the underlying claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel to be meritorious, the court reiterated the points made in its Martinez analysis and further observed that because the juror was likely to encounter the alleged victim at their mutual place of employment posttrial, "the case presented the potential for substantial emotional involvement that could adversely affect impartiality because the juror could feel pressure to resolve the credibility determination in [the alleged victim's] favor."

2015: Mitcham v. Davis*, 103 F. Supp. 3d 1091 (N.D. Cal. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital murder case for failing to object in 1984 trial to the state's peremptory strikes of all black jurors on the basis of People v. Wheeler, 583 P.2d 748 (Cal. 1978), which held the use of peremptory challenges to strike venirepersons on the basis of race to be a violation of the California Constitution and the Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury. While this issue had been litigated in state court, the state court denied relief on procedural grounds, which were not sufficient to operate as a bar to federal review. Thus, the federal court's review was de novo. After exclusions for cause and by stipulation, there were 117 qualified prospective jurors, seventeen of whom were black. During selection of the jury, the prosecutor peremptorily struck all five black jurors called and all three black jurors called in alternate selection. As a result, the black defendant with white victims was tried by "eleven Caucasian jurors and one Hispanic-surnamed juror." Under Wheeler, like Batson v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314 (1986), which was decided later, if the defendant objects and establishes a prima facie case of unlawful discrimination, the burden then shifts to the state to show that the peremptory challenges were "not predicated on group bias alone." If the state fails, the remedy is a different venire and jury selection starts anew. If the error is found on appeal, it is deemed prejudicial per se and reversal is required. Counsel, who was later disbarred for misconduct dating back to 1968, was deficient in failing to object on the basis of Wheeler, which had been the law in California for six years at the time of trial. A number of appellate court decisions in those six years had reversed judgments on the basis of Wheeler. An "expert regarding the standard of practice applicable to criminal defense attorneys" testified that by 1984, it was "the regular practice of defense counsel in California . . . to object to improper prosecutorial jury challenges under Wheeler." Not only had the prosecutor struck all eight potential black jurors, he had previously disclosed to defense counsel an intent to strike an additional four black jurors if they were called. Additionally, the prosecutor struck two white jurors "who evidenced potential sympathy for" black people – one was a college professor who had written a book on African American folklore and one was married to a black man. The prosecution had also questioned black jurors about whether they thought the death penalty was enforced disproportionately against minorities without also asking white jurors this question. Likewise, the prosecutor asked black jurors if the criminal justice system treated them differently without also asking white jurors this question. Additionally, the prosecutor asked black jurors if the race of the defendants would affect their ability to be fair or vote for the death penalty without asking white jurors this question, with the lone exception being the college professor who had expressed concern about the "disproportionate" sentencing of poor people and black people. Counsel not only failed to object to the strikes, but he also failed to develop a record of the race of prospective jurors. There could be no tactical reason justifying these failures. Prejudice was also established. The voir dire of three black jurors revealed no evidence of bias and suggested that these jurors would have been favorable to the state. The state could not have claimed a race-neutral reason that they preferred life without parole or equivocated on the death penalty because the prosecutor did not strike four white jurors that fell in this category and were seated on the jury. A number of white alternate jurors also fell in this category. Moreover, the prosecutor's notes indicated that he was keeping track of the black jurors by writing "B" next to their names on the qualified jury list, while not tracking any other race. He also had a rating system on which he rated all but one of 17 qualified black jurors as unacceptable. The other was not rated because he was never called to the jury box. The prosecutor also had notes for potential black juror Combs that listed her race and that: "She has some feelings about death penalty – but could impose it in a given case. I think she would be alright but she does have some reservations about death – Keep if necessary to avoid Wheeler – She would try to be fair." In the absence of any objections by defense counsel, the prosecutor also struck this juror, who was an 18-year veteran of the U.S. postal service. The strike of this juror alone requires reversal. The court also reviewed the strikes of two other potential black jurors, who should have been desirable for the state absent race considerations. Both had family members in law enforcement.

2012: Drain v. Woods, 902 F. Supp. 2d 1006 (E.D. Mich. 2012), aff'd, 595 Fed.Appx. 558 (6th Cir. 2014). Under AEDPA, trial counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the prosecutor's discriminatory use of peremptory challenges and to the trial court's corrective procedures. Even though trial counsel failed to object, the trial court raised the Batson issue sua sponte after the prosecutor used seven of nine peremptory challenges to eliminate black jurors. After the prosecutor voluntarily offered her reasons for the strikes, the court found a Batson violation. Rather than recalling the discriminatorily removed jurors or dismissing the entire panel and starting over, the court simply continued with jury selection and required the prosecutor to seek permission before dismissing any additional black jurors. Trial counsel did not object to this procedure. On direct appeal, the state court found the issue had been waived due to failure to object. In post-conviction, the state court found that no Batson error occurred and thus the trial court's improper procedure for correction of the error was irrelevant. The state court's determination was unreasonable because it found that a prima facie showing of discriminatory intent had not been shown, even though this issue was moot since the prosecutor voluntarily offered explanations for the strikes. Even if the issue was not moot, a prima facie case had been established since the prosecutor used 78 percent of her strikes to exclude black jurors, who comprised only 28 percent of the venire. In short, the state court decision "was contrary to clearly established Supreme Court precedent and was unreasonable." With regard to the state court's conclusions based on the prosecutor's answers, the state court unreasonably concluded that the trial court's findings were not supported by the record. The state court also unreasonably concluded that exclusion of a minority juror based on the same response given by a white juror who was not excused did not violate Batson. In short, the state court's decision was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts and resulted in an unreasonable application of Batson and progeny. Because Batson errors are structural and not subject to harmless error, automatic reversal was required. Counsel's conduct in failing to object to the violations and the trial court's procedure was deficient and prejudicial. The proper procedure was to either discharge the entire panel or to disallow the discriminatory challenges.

c. State Cases

2024: State v. Glass, 251 N.E.3d 1269 (Ohio App. 2024). In drugs/weapons case, trial counsel was ineffective by failing to move to exclude the mother of the state's primary law-enforcement witness from the jury for cause or to excuse her from the jury using a peremptory challenge. "[W]hile counsel — and also the trial court — have broad discretion in determining a juror's ability to be impartial, "the decision whether to seat a biased juror cannot be a discretionary or strategic decision[.]"" (Citations omitted.) The seating of a biased juror who should have been dismissed for cause requires reversal of the conviction. The trial court's voir dire in this case revealed that a prospective juror's son was the prosecution's key law enforcement representative seated at counsel table. Discovery would have shown that the prospective juror's son was the lead investigator on the case at issue. Presumably, therefore, the son would have been the State's main witness and he would have remained in the courtroom throughout the trial. "Under such circumstances, we find that both the law and common sense dictate that [the prospective juror] should have been questioned thoroughly by defense counsel during voir dire to explore and potentially expose any inherent bias that she may have possessed, be that bias conscious or otherwise.” Although the trial court did briefly question the prospective juror on possible bias, it was clear that more in depth questioning by defense counsel was anticipated. “Because [] trial counsel failed to follow up in any way with questioning [the prospective juror] about her ability to be a fair and impartial juror in a trial involving her son’s participation to the extent noted, and because the State asked no such questions during voir dire upon which defense counsel could have relied in assessing any potential actual bias on [the prospective juror’s] part, we find that defense counsel’s failure to conduct such an inquiry was objectively unreasonable pursuant to Strickland.” The limited voir dire that was conducted revealed no actual bias and it was not adequate to ascertain whether bias should be implied due to the relationship between the lead investigator and his mother. (The Ohio Supreme Court had clearly suggested that a particularly close or intimate relationship between a juror and a trial participant may give rise to a presumption of bias, although no test for implied bias currently exists under state law.) Because no valid reason could be discerned as to why trial counsel did not question the juror regarding issues relevant to implied or presumed bias, counsel’s failure to conduct such questioning was objectively unreasonable under Strickland.” Finally, “trial counsel’s deficiencies in this case prejudiced the defense to the point of depriving [defendant] of a fair trial.” Counsel permitted a juror to be seated under circumstances that called the fairness and impartiality of that juror into very real question. Additionally, the integrity of the verdict was deemed questionable “because the presence of the lead investigator’s mother on the panel deciding the case could have readily had an extremely chilling and prejudicial effect on the deliberations of the jury as a whole.”

2022: Miller v. State, 331 So.3d 1268 (Fla. Ct. App. 2022). Petitioner, who was convicted of drug-related charges, was entitled to post-conviction relief on his claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge for cause a juror who stated during voir dire that she believed the failure of a defendant to testify appeared to be an admission of guilt. (In this case, defendant exercised his right not to testify.) Although petitioner affirmatively agreed to the selection of the jurors at the time of trial, at the post-conviction hearing he explained that he was unaware that the juror at issue could have been struck because of her views. Neither co-counsel nor lead counsel testified that it was a strategic decision to keep the juror on the jury. This lack of strategy rendered the failure to strike the admittedly biased juror deficient performance by counsel and the seating of a biased juror was prejudicial. On this record, petitioner’s acceptance of the jury as constituted did not bar relief on the claim.

State v. Carrera*, 517 P.3d 440 (Utah App. 2022). In case involving charges that defendant kidnapped and sexual assaulted his then-fiancée (Betty), trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to challenge a juror who stated during voir dire that she would give more weight to the testimony of a prosecution witness, a police officer who had interacted with petitioner at the time of his arrest, because he was married to her cousin and she trusted him. None of the juror’s answers to the court’s questions suggested that the juror possessed other characteristics or experiences that might have led trial counsel to believe that, despite her clearly stated bias toward a prosecution witness, she would nevertheless have been likely to be a pro-defense juror, or that she would have been impartial despite her statement that she could not be. Given that there was likely to be a dispute between the officer’s account of what occurred and what defendant intended to testify to, a reasonable attorney would not have forgone an objection to the juror. (In fact, although the testimony of the officer was ultimately admitted through a stipulated proffer rather than live testimony, defendant in his testimony denied aspects of the officer's testimony.) Trial counsel also performed deficiently in presenting the jury with portions of Betty's recorded statement that included references to past offenses by defendant that the trial court had previously ruled would be inadmissible. Although this happened by mistake, that did not absolve trial counsel from a finding that his performance was unreasonable. A reasonable attorney would have taken steps to ensure this did not occur, such as editing the video beforehand so that the version of the recording to be used at trial did not even contain the inadmissible portions, or taking steps to better familiarize himself with the audiovisual technology used in the courtroom. Trial counsel was additionally deficient in his performance by helping to elicit, and then not objecting when the prosecution further elicited, statements from a doctor improperly vouching for the veracity of Betty's statements. Although trial counsel began his cross-examination of the doctor with a valid strategic objective—having the doctor acknowledge that he was not making a medical finding that sexual assault occurred but rather was taking Betty's word for it—trial counsel's later question about whether the consistency of Betty's reports caused the doctor to believe her account was not in furtherance of the legitimate strategy and permitted the doctor to opine on Betty's credibility. This latter questioning was unreasonable, as was trial counsel's failure to object to the questioning on redirect by the prosecutor about the doctor's reasons for believing Betty. Finally, trial counsel was deficient in referring to Betty as "the victim" given that defendant denied that the offenses she alleged had actually occurred. Because trial counsel's deficiency with regard to the juror resulted in a presumption of prejudice and required reversal on its own, any prejudice from the other deficiencies is not addressed.

Dean v. Narvaiza*, 502 P.3d 177 (Nev. 2022). Trial counsel was constitutionally ineffective in attempted murder case by carelessly introducing racial animus into the trial through his references to several offensive racial stereotypes during voir dire. After no prospective juror responded to counsel's query if any of them had preconceived ideas about African Americans having "certain attributes," defense counsel "insisted that the prospective jurors must have heard that all African Americans 'like watermelon' or 'have an attribute of violence, that they are sneaky.'" Again, no one on the venire responded. Eventually, a prospective juror rejected counsel's suggestions and asserted that "we're all equal" and that it was "unfair" to make assumptions based on race. Not accepting this "clear disavowal of racial bias," counsel interrogated the prospective juror with more questions about offensive racial stereotypes, including the following: "[Dean] has a propensity for violence because he is black. You have heard that?" Despite receiving no affirmative response, counsel asked if any of the prospective jurors could not evaluate petitioner "as just another guy, not a black guy?" On the record of this case, where petitioner faced charges involving violence, "counsel's conduct went beyond an objectively reasonable inquiry into potential racial bias." At the post-conviction hearing, trial counsel explained that he was attempting to bring out the unconscious racial biases present "in all of us." While the goal was legitimate, the method was not reasonable as demonstrated in part by the angry reaction from the prospective juror to counsel's implication that the prospective juror would consider petitioner's race. Indeed, counsel undercut his stated purpose of challenging the prospective jurors' unconscious feelings about race when he commented "[Dean] has a propensity for violence because he is black” after the prospective juror rejected the idea of making any assumptions based on race. Prejudice is found given: (1) “counsel’s repeated suggestion that African Americans are inherently violent severely compromised [petitioner’s] defense that he did not wield a knife during the altercation and the victims stabbed each other”; (2) “counsel’s suggestion that African Americans are ‘sneaky’ potentially undermined his own client’s credibility, particularly in this case where [petitioner] testified at trial”; and (3) “counsel created an unacceptable risk of infecting the jury’s deliberations because his statements ‘appealed to a powerful racial stereotype—that of black men as violence prone.’” Counsel’s concluding remarks about not evaluating petitioner by his race was not sufficient to have cured the prejudicial effect of counsel’s earlier statements about African Americans. Confidence in the outcome of the trial is further undermined by the trial court’s inaction. “When counsel treads into improper or antagonistic lines of inquiry, it is incumbent on judges to exercise their discretion and reign in such behavior.” The venire may have interpreted “the judge’s silence as normalizing, or even tacitly approving, counsel’s offensive questioning.”

2020: State v. Bates*, 149 N.E.3d 475 (Ohio 2020). In death penalty case involving an African American defendant, trial counsel was ineffective when, during voir dire, counsel failed to question and strike a juror who made racially biased statements on her juror questionnaire. The juror, a white woman, had indicated on the questionnaire that she “sometimes” felt uncomfortable being around “black people.” She also revealed that she strongly agreed with the view that “Blacks” tend to be more violent than other racial or ethnic groups. Although defense counsel broached racial bias in questioning one group of prospective jurors, no questions about race were ever posed by defense counsel to the juror at issue. Defense counsel did not challenge any jurors for cause and, despite having an available peremptory challenge, allowed the juror who had expressed biased attitudes to be empaneled. There was no discernable reason for counsel’s inaction, establishing deficient performance. Prior precedent is overruled to the extent that it held that actual racial bias must be shown by demonstrating bias against a defendant personally. “[A]ctual racial bias may be present without a demonstration of bias against the defendant personally if the juror’s statement rises to a level of generality about a racial or ethnic group that indicates the juror’s inability to be impartial in the particular case before him or her.” Here, the statements made by the juror demonstrate her actual bias against defendant. “Speculation that defense counsel, the prosecution, or the trial judge could have sought . . . reassurance of impartiality from a juror who admitted bias cannot nullify the prejudicial impact of that juror’s participation in the trial.”

2019: Sexton v. State, 2019 WL 6320518 (Tenn. Crim. App. Nov. 25, 2019). In double-murder case where petitioner had at one time been sentenced to death for the crimes, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly question a juror regarding her revelations on the juror questionnaire. The prosecution’s theory of the case was that petitioner killed the victims because of sexual abuse allegations made against him by the daughter of the male victim who was also petitioner’s stepdaughter. In Juror N.S.’s questionnaire, she wrote that she and her sister had been raped by their stepfather and that N.S. was also the victim of domestic abuse. During voir dire, defense counsel did not ask N.S. about what she had revealed in the questionnaire. When asked about this omission during the post-conviction proceeding, co-counsel testified he did not recall that questionnaire response. He stated that he and lead counsel may not have asked her about being the victim of child rape if “there were other things in her questionnaire that made us think that we didn’t need to ask her that question.” He was unable to specify, however, what those “other things” may have been. On cross-examination, co-counsel agreed that N. S. may have been chosen to sit because she knew co-counsel’s mother. Lead counsel testified there was no explanation why Juror N. S. was not excused after disclosing she was raped by her stepfather. However, on cross-examination, lead counsel acknowledged N. S.’s disclosure would be a “factor” to consider instead of the “whole picture.” On this record, the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals finds “nothing in the record demonstrating trial counsel had a strategic reason not to question Juror N. S. about her disclosure.” Therefore, it concludes “trial counsel’s failure to question Juror N. S. about her experiences as a victim of a crime was objectively unreasonable and resulted in deficient performance.” Because juror bias had already been found as to a different juror, the appeals court concluded that petitioner had demonstrated the requisite prejudice.

2017: Wadlow v. State, 518 S.W.3d 872 (Mo. Ct. App. 2017). In statutory sodomy case where the victim was a five year old girl, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to strike a venireperson who indicated that she could not be impartial in this case. When the prosecutor asked the venire panel whether anyone felt they would not be able to be fair and impartial simply due to the nature of the charges of this case, the venireperson in question, Juror3, raised her hand. She explained, “I have a granddaughter that’s four years old and I just truly don’t think that I could do it, to be honest, to be fair about it” She was then asked, “[w]ould you be able to listen to the evidence and make a decision just based on that evidence?” She responded “no.” During his portion of voir dire, defense counsel did not ask any questions directed to Juror 3. Defense counsel did ask the panel if anyone “would find it difficult to find in favor of an older person as opposed to a young child if the evidence so dictated” or “find it impossible to adhere to the law as the Judge reads it to you and meet the standard of beyond a reasonable doubt before you would return a verdict of guilty?” The record did not indicate that Juror 3 responded to either of these questions. Defense counsel did not challenge Juror 3 for cause or use a peremptory challenge to strike her from the jury. At the post-conviction hearing, defense counsel couldn’t recall a strategic basis for failing to strike Juror 3 but he offered that there “certainly could be” reasons to consider Juror 3 “a good potential juror for the defense[,]” but no such reasons were identified. Trial counsel recalled that defendant was with him “during the entire voir dire process[,]” and trial counsel did not recall defendant “expressing an objection to [him] regarding [Juror 3.]” Defendant testified that he did ask defense counsel why he had not objected to Juror 3 but that defense counsel ignored him. The post-conviction court denied the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel on the ground that defendant admitted that he was aware that Juror 3 was on the jury despite her statements and that he was aware that no objection had been made. Defending that ruling, the State first argued that defendant had failed to prove that defense counsel lacked a strategic reason for keeping Juror 3 on the jury. Looking to case law, the appellate counsel observed that an attorney’s inability to recall the reasons for deciding not to strike a juror does not support a finding that the attorney’s decision was a matter of trial strategy where the attorney has reviewed his notes from jury selection and no strategic reason for keeping the juror is apparent from the record. Secondly, the State asserted that Juror 3 was rehabilitated when she remained silent to the questions asked of the panel by defense counsel. Regarding the first question, about any difficulty finding in favor of an older person over a child, the appellate court stated: “Even if we assumed, arguendo, that Juror 3's silence was an unequivocal assurance that she would not find it hard to find in favor of [defendant] because he was older than his child victim, such an assurance would fail to cure the form of Juror 3's expressed bias. Her bias did not rest on the age difference between [defendant] and the victim — it was based instead on her granddaughter's age-based similarity to the victim.” Regarding defense counsel’s second question, the appellate court stated:

Juror 3's silence in response to trial counsel's question to the panel as to whether anyone would “find it impossible to adhere to the law as the Judge reads it to you and meet the standard of beyond a reasonable doubt before you would return a verdict of guilty” can rightly be interpreted as an unequivocal assurance that Juror 3 could follow the law, including its requirement that she find [defendant] guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. But that assurance was also insufficient to cure Juror 3’s bias that she would have a significant difficulty in fairly deciding the factual disputes in the case, a different concern than a difficulty in applying the law to the evidence. Juror 3 informed the parties that she believed she would be unable to listen to the evidence and fairly and impartially evaluate it. As a result, Juror 3’s silence in response to the questions identified by the State did nothing to either remove or attenuate the nature of the bias she had freely admitted.

State v. Courtney*, 415 P.3d 604 (Utah Ct. App. 2017). In case where defendant was on trial for a drug-related charge, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a mistrial during voir dire when a prospective juror made statements that could taint the jury pool against defendant. During jury selection, trial counsel asked the prospective jurors whether any of them knew himself or defendant. One prospective juror responded affirmatively and offered additional unsolicited information: “Due to my years in law enforcement, yes. I have had affiliations with him, especially during the time that I was serving as an agent for the Weber-Morgan Narcotics Strike Force.” Questioning of the prospective jurors continued after that answer. A few minutes later, the trial court asked: “Would any of you have difficulty in affording the defendant his guarantee of being considered innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt or, stated differently, would any of you believe that because the defendant has been charged in this case by the State that there must be some basis for his guilt?” The prospective juror at issue raised her hand, the only one on the panel to do so, but before she could speak, the trial court cut her off and asked both counsel to approach the bench for a discussion out of the potential jurors’ hearing. At the bench conference, the prospective juror’s first answer was brought up as having possibly tainted the jury pool. It was agreed that the prospective juror would be immediately excused on a pretext to avoid the potential of further tainting. It was not until the jury was selected and sworn that a mistrial motion was made by trial counsel. It was denied as untimely. Given this record, there was no conceivable tactical basis for trial counsel to have not asked for a mistrial during jury selection. Defendant was prejudiced by trial counsel’s inaction because the prospective juror’s comments suggested that defendant had repeatedly had some involvement in the types of crimes he was on trial for. This prejudice was not cured by the fact that a detective at trial mentioned that unnamed other agents were familiar with defendant. The prospective juror’s statement, which was not subject to cross-examination, improperly corroborated the detective’s testimony. Absent the prospective juror’s remark, there was a reasonable likelihood that the result of defendant's trial would have been different.

2010: Middleton v. State, 41 So. 3d 357 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately advise the defendant in capital murder prosecution. During trial, the state moved to strike a juror, who had failed to disclose (when asked) that he had a prior felony conviction. The court struck the juror and informed the defendant he could consent to proceeding with 11 jurors or replacing the struck juror with a previously-dismissed alternate juror. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to advise the defendant of the third option—a motion for mistrial—in light of the defendant's absolute right under state law to have a jury of 12. Without this advice, the defendant consented to proceeding with 11 jurors and was convicted of second degree murder. On initial review, the court found counsel's conduct was deficient and remanded for a determination of whether the defendant would have moved for a mistrial if he had been adequately advised. On remand, the court found that he would have moved for a mistrial, but found no prejudice because the defendant could not demonstrate that the "outcome of a new trial would have been any different." This was erroneous because the defendant needed only to demonstrate a reasonable probability that he would have requested a mistrial and that a mistrial would have been granted.

2009: White v. State, 290 S.W.3d 162 (Mo. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel was ineffective in drug and child endangerment case for failing to move to strike a juror who stated that he could not be fair, but ended up serving on the jury. The juror stated and then reiterated during voir dire, based simply on the nature of the charges: "I don't believe I could be fair for the defendant." Later the juror indicated that he did not want to serve as a juror. Nonetheless, counsel did not challenge the juror and he served for the trial. Counsel cited "an oversight and not trial strategy" for the conduct. "Where trial counsel fails to strike a biased venireperson who ultimately serves as a juror, a post-conviction defendant is entitled to a presumption of prejudice."

Here, because there were no follow-up questions to [the jurors] addressing his assertion that he could not be fair, there was not even an opportunity to give an unequivocal assurance of impartiality. Accordingly, neither the State, defense counsel, nor the trial court rehabilitated [him], and he was not qualified to serve as a juror.

Prejudice presumed.

2008: Titel v. State, 981 So. 2d 656 (Fla. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sexual battery and kidnapping case for failing to challenge a clearly biased juror, who stated that there was an incident of incest in his family and that he believed in execution of rapists. Counsel's notes mistakenly attributed these comments to a different juror that counsel did strike. The biased juror, unlike other jurors who reported rapes in their families, was not questioned further about whether he could be fair and was seated even though the defense had one remaining peremptory challenge. Prejudice found because the juror was biased.

Capital Case*

2007: James v. State, 222 S.W.3d 302 (Mo. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in second-degree murder and armed criminal action case for failing to challenge for cause a venireperson who indicated that she would draw a negative inference from a defendant's failure to testify in his own defense. If counsel had objected, the trial court would have been required to strike the juror. Counsel's conduct was not explained by any strategy. Prejudice presumed because the defendant was "tried in violation of his constitutional right to an impartial jury."

State v. Loftin, 922 A.2d 1210 (N.J. 2007). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to adequately address the presence of a possibly racially biased juror, who had predetermined guilt before hearing all the evidence, in the jury panel during the trial although he ultimately served as an alternate and did not deliberate on findings and a separate jury was empaneled under state law for sentencing. The juror, who was white and worked at the post office, admitted making comments early in the trial to other postal workers that he was "going to buy a rope to hang" the defendant, a black man charged with killing a white man. He denied, however, that the comments were intended to be racist or that he had already formed an opinion of guilt. Trial counsel sought to remove the juror, which was denied, but failed to request that the remainder of the jury be questioned to determine whether this juror had made similar comments to other jurors. The trial court ultimately ordered that the juror would serve only as an alternate. Appellate counsel failed to assert error in the trial court's failure to remove the juror and to assert as plain error the court's failure to question the remaining jurors. Under state law, the court found "a decided racial undertone [in the juror's comments] that evokes an era of vigilante and mindless mob justice that reigned during a dark period in American history." Id. at 1219. Likewise, even without racial bias, the juror violated the court's instructions not to discuss the case with others and not to determine guilt prior to deliberations. The court held that prejudice would be presumed and that "even allowing a non-deliberating juror suspected of racial bias to sit on a panel will lead to a presumption that other members of the panel may have been tainted." Id. at 1222. Thus, the court presumed that the biased juror shared his views with fellow jurors and, thus, it did not matter that he did not deliberate. Although trial and appellate counsel's ineffectiveness was asserted under both the state and federal constitutions, the court addressed the merits under only the state constitution but still applying the Strickland standard. Deficient conduct found because the need for the removal of the predisposed juror and a voir dire of the remaining jurors should have been self-evident." Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy. Appellate counsel was also ineffective because failure to assert these issues on appeal deprived the court of the opportunity to address the issue, which would have required reversal on direct appeal.

2006: Anderson v. State*, 196 S.W.3d 28 (Mo. 2006). Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to move to strike, for cause, prospective juror who, during voir dire, indicated he would vote for death unless the defense could convince him otherwise. Counsel's failure was not a decision based on trial strategy and instead occurred because of a note-taking error. Moreover,

No competent defense attorney would intentionally leave someone on the jury who indicated a strong preference for the death penalty and also stated that he would require the defense to convince him that death was not appropriate even though he was aware that the burden of proof remains with the state. Any strategy that would place someone with such a predisposition on the jury is wholly unreasonable.

Prejudice established because this was a structural error.

- 2005: State v. Lamere, 112 P.3d 1005 (Mont. 2005). Counsel in aggravated assault case was ineffective in failing to question a prospective juror on whether she could remain impartial even though her daughter was a paralegal assisting the prosecutor (even in the courtroom during the trial) and someone else in her family was retired from the police force. The juror disclosed this information on her questionnaire but, due to oversight, counsel did not question her about it. When counsel learned of the problem during trial and moved to excuse the juror, the motion was denied. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the juror's relationship to her daughter obviously raised legitimate questions about her impartiality. Because errors in jury selection are "structural errors," prejudice was presumed.
- 2004: State v. Garza, 143 S.W.3d 144 (Tex. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual assault case for failing to challenge a juror for cause or to use a peremptory strike even though the juror (who became foreman) admitted that he would be biased because a family member had been the victim of sexual assault and admitted that he would believe a police officer rather than the defendant simply because it was a police officer. Counsel admitted that he had no strategy and failed to challenge the juror only because he was distracted and simply made a mistake after learning shortly before that his wife had been diagnosed with cancer. Even though there might have been a hypothetical plausible strategy for not challenging the juror, the record here clearly established no strategy. Prejudice found because "one improper juror destroys the integrity of the verdict." Finally, the court rejected the state's argument that the court should consider the fact that the defendant was an experienced criminal defense counsel as a factor in the ineffective assistance claim.
- 2003: Fortson v. State, 587 S.E.2d 39 (Ga. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in a murder case for using a peremptory strike on a juror that had already been excused for cause by the trial court but inexplicably remained on the strike list. Defense used his entire allotment of peremptory strikes. Because Georgia law requires automatic reversal when a defendant is required to use a peremptory strike on a juror that should have been excused for cause, the court found prejudice under Strickland.

2. INDICTMENT

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2020: United States v. Phea, 953 F.3d 838 (5th Cir. 2020). In prostitution of a minor case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an obvious constructive amendment of the superseding indictment. The superseding indictment charged petitioner under a statute that included as an element that petitioner knew that the alleged victim was a minor. The prosecution attempted to abandon the knowledge requirement in its proposed instructions, relying on a subsection of the statute that was not included in the indictment. The jury was instructed under the language in the indictment. With no objection from defense counsel, however, the trial court also instructed the jury under the subsection of the statute that expressly removed the actual knowledge requirement for a finding of guilt. (Under the uncharged subsection, the government did not have to prove actual knowledge if the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe the alleged victim.) By giving this instruction, the trial court “not only eliminated the scienter requirement of actual knowledge, the element [petitioner] was indicted under, but lowered the factual basis required to prove this essential element from what [petitioner] knew to what he had the reasonable opportunity to observe.” Trial counsel’s failure to object constituted deficient performance. In light of record evidence that the alleged victim’s Tagged.com profile said she was 18, her own belief that petitioner believed she was 18, “and her apparent autonomy and willingness/ability to engage in ‘adult’ activities,” there is a reasonable probability a jury would have had reasonable doubt that petitioner knew the alleged victim was under 18.

2019: Jones v. Zatecky, 917 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecution moved to amend the information in a battery case to add a charge of criminal confinement which ultimately accounted for the lion’s share of petitioner’s sentence. At the time of petitioner’s arrest and prosecution, a statute and an Indiana Supreme Court decision provided a strong basis for arguing that the prosecution had missed the deadline for such an amendment. Respondent defended trial counsel’s inaction by arguing that defense attorneys around Indiana routinely ignored both the clear text of the relevant statute and the state supreme court precedent and allowed prosecutors to make untimely amendments. The Seventh Circuit responded: “If that is an accurate account, it is hardly reassuring. For a lawyer to fail to take advantage of a clear avenue of relief for her client is no less concerning because many others made the same error—if anything, it is more so.” “[F]ollowing the crowd is no excuse for depriving a criminal defendant of his constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel.” Further, respondent presented no data backing up the contention that defense attorneys routinely ignored the state supreme court case that supported an argument that the amendment at issue was impermissible. “This was one of those rare cases in which ‘counsel’s performance fell below the constitutional minimum, and that the Indiana appellate court’s conclusion otherwise was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent.’” As to prejudice, “[h]indsight in [petitioner’s] case tells us that his attorney’s silence doomed his appeal.” On direct appeal, the intermediate appellate court agreed that the amendment had violated the relevant statute. But petitioner was denied relief because of his attorney’s failure to object. “In other words, what killed the argument in that court was waiver, not lack of merit.”

- 2005: United States v. Jones, 403 F.3d 604 (8th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in possession of firearm case for failing to challenge indictment as multiplicitous where the indictment included two counts of possessing the same firearm as two different dates. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "a reasonably competent lawyer would be expected to know" that this was one offense because the evidence established that the possession was continuous. Prejudice found even though the sentences given were concurrent because: (1) the additional conviction could increase future sentences or be used to impeach the defendant's credibility in future proceedings; and (2) the defendant had to pay an additional $100 statutory special assessment due to the second conviction.
- 2004: Young v. Dretke, 356 F.3d 616 (5th Cir. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to move to dismiss untimely indictment. Under a state statute effective at the time of the defendant's trial, dismissal was required and re-prosecution was barred. The statute has since been amended to remove the bar to further prosecution following dismissal. The state court found that counsel's conduct was deficient and that if counsel had moved for dismissal, petitioner could not have been tried or convicted. Nonetheless, the state court denied relief finding that under Lockhart v. Fretwell, there was no prejudice because the state court believed that prejudice was to be determined by reference to current law rather than the law at the time of the deficient performance. Because the state court failed to properly distinguish Fretwell and disregarded the interpretation of Fretwell in Williams v. Taylor, the state court's decision was both contrary to and an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent, under the AEDPA. The court distinguished Fretwell because, in Fretwell, the petitioner sought to rely on a judicial decision of a court of appeals, which was not a final statement of law established by the Supreme Court. In this case, however, the defendant sought to rely on a statute, which is a final statement of the law. Because Strickland was controlling rather than the limited exception of Fretwell, petitioner was entitled to relief.

b. State Cases

- 2024: Moore v. White, 907 S.E.2d 902 (Ga. 2024). In case involving, inter alia, a first-degree burglary charge, reversing the denial of habeas relief on claim that appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue on appeal that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failure to challenge the first-degree burglary count in the indictment. The indictment charging the first-degree burglary count alleged only that petitioner committed that crime by entering (without authority and with the intent to commit a felony) a "business." It failed to allege an essential element of the crime: that petitioner entered a "dwelling house" or a building "designed for use as [a] dwelling." The evidence at trial established that the crime occurred in a building that was originally designed as a residential home but was used as a business office by one of the victims for the restaurants he owned. The building contained only office furniture, and no evidence was presented indicating that anyone lived there. The jury instruction on the burglary charge referenced entry into a building or dwelling. No objection was made by trial counsel and appellate counsel did not raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness on appeal. The statutory requirement that the defendant entered or remained within a type of "dwelling" of another person was found in the plain language of the statute. Thus, no reasonably competent lawyer would have failed to file a special demurrer challenging the first-degree burglary count and trial counsel performed deficiently in this omission. Absent trial counsel's failure to file a special demurrer, it is reasonably probable that the result of the trial would have been more favorable to petitioner. Had it been filed, the demurrer should have been granted. If this had occurred, the State would have had the option to amend the first-degree burglary count to allege the essential element that petitioner entered a building “designed for use as the dwelling of another” when he entered the building that was originally designed as a residential home. Alternatively, the State could have charged petitioner with second-degree burglary by entering a building, or the State could have dismissed the charge. The Warden’s concessions in this case concerning the ineffectiveness allegations establish that it is reasonably probable that the State would have elected to charge petitioner with second-degree burglary. (The Warden, represented by the office of the Attorney General, admitted that the evidence at trial “d[id] not satisfy the statutory requirement for the offense of burglary in the first degree,” and that petitioner should have been convicted of and sentenced for second-degree burglary, rather than first-degree burglary.) Because petitioner showed the trial result was prejudiced by trial counsel’s deficient performance, any deficiency in appellate counsel’s failure to raise that ineffectiveness-of-trial-counsel claim prejudiced the appeal. And because there was “no good reason why a competent appellate lawyer would have failed to raise such an obviously meritorious claim under these circumstances,” petitioner established that his appellate counsel was ineffective for not raising the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness.

Jefferson v. State*, 695 S.W.3d 23 (Tex. App. 2024). In case where the prosecutor added two additional counts of sexual offenses to an indictment charging appellate with two counts of sex crimes, trial counsel was ineffective in either failing to object to the improper amendment of the indictment or failing to memorialize his objection. Because the amendment allowed appellant to be convicted for two more crimes than under the initial indictment, there was no conceivable strategic basis for counsel’s omission. And the omission was obviously prejudicial. Because the erroneous convictions on the added counts did not, under a reasonable doubt standard, impact the convictions on the properly charged counts, the remedy was to vacate the convictions only on the improperly added counts.

2020: State v. Canfield, 463 P.3d 755 (Wash. App. 2020). In case where defendant’s original conviction for obstructing a public servant was reversed on appeal, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecutor at the retrial on the original charge added additional charges of making a false or misleading statement and tampering with physical evidence. Because these charges arose from the same behavior underlying the original obstructing charge, they were subject to mandatory joinder and trial counsel should have objected to the amendment. Trial counsel’s failure to object was prejudicial because the defendant received additional punishment for the new charges.

2015: Romine v. State, 162 So. 3d 1102 (Fla. 2015). Counsel in burglary case was ineffective in failing to object to trial on uncharged offense. The defendant was charged with first-degree burglary while armed, but was convicted after a jury trial of burglary with assault. At the conclusion of the state’s case, counsel moved for a judgment of acquittal on burglary while armed because the state failed to present evidence of the existence of a dangerous weapon. The court granted the motion and the trial proceeded. At the conclusion of the defense case, the state requested an instruction on burglary with assault. Counsel argued that the state had failed to present evidence of fear of imminent danger but the victim had testified, without objection from the defense, that he was scared. The court allowed the instruction, which changed the offense level, and the jury convicted of burglary with assault. Counsel's conduct was deficient. While counsel objected to the instruction due to insufficient evidence, counsel failed to object that the jury was being instructed on an offense not charged in the information. Counsel also failed to object to the verdict form. Counsel had also failed to object to the victim's testimony that he was in fear, which was irrelevant to the charge of burglary while armed. Prejudice was established as the defendant was convicted of a first-degree felony when his exposure should have been limited to a second-degree felony due to the judgment of acquittal.

State v. Smith*, 115 A.3d 210 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 2015). Counsel in felony murder case was ineffective in failing to object to the prosecution's entry of nolle prosequi prior to the jury's deliberations. The victim and the defendant had a disagreement over a dog, which the defendant's girlfriend had taken from the victim, who was engaged to the girlfriend's mother. The victim called the defendant's girlfriend and said that if the dog was not returned, she was not going to "live to see tomorrow." The defendant, his girlfriend, and the girlfriend's son went to the victim's home to try "to make peace," but it escalated and the victim was shot and killed. The defendant was charged with first-degree felony murder predicated on first-degree burglary with intent to commit assault and second-degree felony murder predicated on assault. During trial, the state proceeded on the theory of first-degree felony murder. The defense proceeded on the theory that there was no burglary and the defendant had gone to the home only to "mend fences." At the conclusion of the state's case, the state dismissed the second-degree felony murder charge without objection from the defense. Counsel's conduct in failing to object was deficient and prejudicial. "It would be fundamentally unfair to say that the assault was sufficiently connected to the burglary so as to make the crime first-degree felony murder, while at the same time, keeping the jury from having the option of convicting Smith of second-degree felony murder predicated on the very same assault." No rational strategy could explain counsel's actions and counsel could not recall his thought process or whether he had discussed the issue with the defendant.

2013: Lacey v. State, 114 So. 3d 452 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in escape from detention case for failing to recognize that the defendant's escape was governed by statute governing escapes from children's detention facilities and not from the Department of Corrections. The defendant was housed in the Department of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) and escaped from a hospital, while still under DJJ supervision. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the maximum possible sentence was lower under the correct statute

2012: McDuffie v. State, 135 So. 3d 317 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to object to an amended information filed after expiration of the speedy trial rule time. The defendant was initially charged with sale of cocaine, a second-degree felony. After expiration of the 175 days under the state speedy trial rule, the defendant demanded trial. Just days before the trial, the state amended the charge to sale of cocaine within 1000 feet of a school, a first-degree felony. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object. Prejudice established as the defendant was convicted on the greater offense.

Capital Case*

2009: People v. Peyton, 98 Cal. Rptr. 3d 243 (Cal. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in child sexual assault case for failing to object to the filing of an amended information at the close of the prosecution's case, which added a fifth count, when no preliminary hearing had been held on that count or waived by the defendant.

3. MOTIONS AND NOTICE

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Chong v. United States, 112 F.4th 848 (9th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, 145 S.Ct. 1218 (2025). In case involving charges related to distribution of controlled substances and firearm possession, petitioner, who was the owner of the house where contraband was found, was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel by his attorney’s failure to move to suppress the evidence seized from the home on the ground that an officer physically trespassed onto the curtilage. It was that trespass that led to the observations of drugs that supported the search. (A suppression motion was filed and denied on a different basis.) “Here, under any conception of curtilage, one foot from the garage door entrance of a single-family home on a residential street is surely within the curtilage of that home. While the driveway wasn’t enclosed, the officer’s close proximity to the garage door entrance here more than makes up for that.” It was acknowledged that a visitor, seeing a garage door open with someone inside, could approach the home by walking directly up the driveway to the garage. In contrast, there was no “license—implied or otherwise—to sleuth around the homeowner’s garage door at night and startle the occupants by approaching from the side.” Under the common-law trespass test, there was an unreasonable search. This was true as well when applying the reasonable-expectation-of-privacy test. That the garage door was open did not render the search reasonable given that the officer “didn’t walk up from the sidewalk, where he would be spotted immediately and from where guests typically enter the property. Instead, the deputy jumped the side-retaining wall of the house, hugged the front side of the house (likely to keep out-of-sight of anyone in the garage), and suddenly appeared a foot away from the open garage door.” The government’s reliance on good faith and the parole exception were unavailing to justify the search. The government argued that it believed the petitioner’s uncle, who was on parole, was residing at petitioner’s home. But the deputies’ investigation into whether the residence was the uncle’s “was meager, consisting primarily of the federal agents’ assumptions and deputies’ observation of [the uncle] arriving at the home the night of the raid.” Notably, the deputies took no steps to confirm that the uncle resided at the house, such as calling the uncle’s parole officer. On the record in this case, there was insufficient evidence to support an objectively reasonable belief the home was the uncle’s. And a good faith belief by the officer who trespassed that he was standing outside the curtilage did not change the Fourth Amendment analysis. Because the entrance to petitioner’s curtilage was without warrant or an exigency, the Fourth Amendment was violated and the fruit of the poisonous tree applied to all the evidence discovered in the ensuing search. Thus, there was a reasonable probability of a more favorable result had trial counsel raised the curtilage violation in the suppression motion. Counsel’s failure to raise the argument was deficient. The Supreme Court’s seminal curtilage decision, Florida v. Jardines, was issued prior to the hearing on the motion to suppress. “[C]ounsel was thus plainly deficient for failing to raise such an obvious Fourth Amendment objection in the immediate wake of a directly on-point Supreme Court decision.”

2023: Leeds v. Russell, 75 F.4th 1009 (9th Cir. 2023). In murder case where the killing occurred in the garage of the residence petitioner shared with his ex-wife, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that the prosecution’s theory of felony-murder, which was premised on burglary, was legally incorrect. Post-conviction counsel's (PCC) ineffectiveness in failing to raise the claim in state court provided cause under Martinez v. Ryan to overcome the procedural default of the claim. Although at the time of trial, in 2006, the Nevada Supreme Court had not yet definitively decided the legal issue involved in this case—whether one can burglarize their own home--the absence of such precedent did not make trial counsel's failure to raise the issue reasonable. "Because Nevada's burglary statute was susceptible to two interpretations, a reasonable counsel would have argued for the interpretation that would preclude her client from facing a felony-murder charge." When the Nevada Supreme Court decided the issue in petitioner's favor in 2014, concluding that "one cannot burglarize his own home so long as he has an absolute right to enter the home," the Nevada Supreme Court "considered the purposes of common law burglary, the legislative intent of Nevada's burglary statute, and California's approach to the issue." These same arguments were available before 2014 "and it does not take the benefit of hindsight to realize the obvious strength of the approach." Notably, the burglary theory argument was not far-fetched and was supported by Nevada precedent, as well as case law from states with similar burglary statutes.

[Trial] counsel was "obliged to make, or at least to evaluate, an argument that [wa]s sufficiently foreshadowed in existing case law." Bridges v. United States, 991 F.3d 793, 804 (7th Cir. 2021). Because Nevada law could always have reasonably been interpreted to mean a person could not burglarize his own home (as the Nevada Supreme Court concluded in [2014]), competent counsel would have been expected to make that argument.

Regarding prejudice, the State argued the deficiency was harmless under two theories. First, the State asserted that petitioner lacked an unconditional right to enter the home, which actually belonged to his ex-wife, thus supporting a burglary conviction. The district court did not err, however, in finding from the record that petitioner had a right to enter the home as a joint occupant. Second, the State contended that the evidence of premeditation and deliberation, which the jury was instructed on as an alternative basis for the first degree murder verdict, was overwhelming. (The verdict form did not indicate which theory was the basis for the first degree murder conviction. The jury did convict petitioner of burglary.) The appeals court responded: "Because the jury had to reach a unanimous verdict and the evidence towards any single theory was not overwhelming, the district court correctly concluded that a reasonable juror could have believed that [petitioner] acted in the heat-of-passion or that the State had not proved the premeditation theory beyond a reasonable doubt." Regarding PCC's failure to raise the claim before the 2014 state supreme court decision, "[j]ust as trial counsel could have made the burglary theory argument in 2006, PCC could have made the argument in 2013 by relying on a common understanding of the definition of 'burglary,' basic statutory interpretation principles, and the law of other states with similar criminal statutes. The failure to do so was unreasonable." That PCC "filed a 60-page habeas petition that identified many claims of error at the trial level," did "not negate PCC's failure to recognize a potentially dispositive claim." It is reasonably probable that a Nevada court would have granted petitioner's post-conviction petition if PCC had properly asserted the claim at issue.

2022: Hesser v. United States, 40 F.4th 1221 (11th Cir. 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a judgment of acquittal on a tax evasion count following the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief. At issue in this appeal was proof of the third element of the charged crime, "an affirmative act constituting an evasion or attempted evasion of the tax." One possible qualifying act alleged by the Government was petitioner's hiding of gold on his property. Because the Government failed to prove that the gold was actually petitioner's, the Government "left open the very real possibility that [petitioner] committed a mistake of law — that he thought he was doing something criminal that was in fact innocuous — or that he did not even think he was doing something criminal in hiding money for the family trust. And that is not proof beyond a reasonable doubt of an affirmative act, which the Constitution requires for [petitioner's] conviction to stand." The other affirmative act that the Government put in the indictment was that petitioner quitclaimed his house to a newly created trust. But the Government never proved how petitioner doing so would have any effect on his tax liability. On this record, deficient performance and prejudice is established.

2020: Kada v. Barr, 946 F.3d 960 (6th Cir. 2020). BIA abused its discretion in denying Kada's motion to reopen his removal proceedings based on deficient representation by counsel. Kada is a Chaldean Christian from Iraq who immigrated to the United States with his family when he was twelve as Lawful Permanent Residents. Removal proceedings were instituted after Kada was convicted in Michigan of several offenses including assault with a deadly weapon and carrying a concealed weapon. It was undisputed that Kada's attorney was deficient in missing filing deadlines for, inter alia, an application for protection under the Convention Against Torture (CAT), resulting in Kada's deportation to Iraq. The BIA erred by finding no prejudice based on what actually happened to Kada when he was deported, i.e., that he was not detained and mistreated immediately by the Iraqi government upon his arrival. The correct prejudice analysis considers whether his claims, if properly raised by counsel, could have supported a different outcome. Additionally, "[b]y failing to adequately distinguish Kada's case from that of a similarly situated Chaldean Christian facing removal to Iraq, the BIA violated its own policies." And the BIA's finding that Kada demonstrated only that authorities harass and restrict the movement of Christians was contrary to the record and BIA precedent. "Kada included evidence in the record that he is not only likely to be tortured because of his status as an Iraqi Christian, but also because his criminal record and Americanized behavior will be make him a target." Remand is required.

2019: Brewster v. Hetsel, 913 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 2019). In armed robbery case, jury's guilty verdict was impermissibly coerced and, therefore, trial counsel's failure to object and move for a mistrial constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. There were two days of deliberations with two different judges presiding. During the two days, the jury sent 6 notes to the two judges saying it could not reach a verdict. Three times the jury revealed how it was divided – 9-3 guilt, 11-1 guilt, and finally, one holdout that continued to hold out. Throughout the deadlocking the judges gave one formal Allen charge, later two additional admonitions that the jurors had to continue deliberating, and, finally, another long charge that including instructions to keep deliberating. After reading materials were confiscated from the jury room the holdout surrendered. In denying petitioner relief, the state courts recast his claim as an attack on the language of one of the supplemental instructions. Thus, his actual claim was not adjudicated on the merits by the state courts and was entitled to de novo review. Regarding deficient performance, on the facts known to defense counsel "there was no conceivable reason, no reasonable strategy, for sitting silent and seeing how things would turn out. The cards had already been dealt, face up, and it was obvious who had the losing hand.” As for prejudice, the appeals court observed that “[i]t doesn’t matter for prejudice purposes whether the judge at this defendant’s trial would have sustained an objection; what counts is whether the judge would have been required to do so under the applicable law and, if so, whether doing so would have resulted in a reasonable probability of a different result.” Because the answer to both inquiries is yes, petitioner was entitled to habeas relief.

2018: Hendrix v. Palmer, 893 F.3d 906 (6th Cir. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress a statement made by petitioner which was obtained in violation of Miranda. Petitioner was convicted in Michigan state court of felony murder, carjacking, and unlawfully driving away a motor vehicle, and was sentenced to life in prison. Upon arrest, petitioner had spoken briefly with officers, and then refused to speak further until he had the opportunity to consult with an attorney, and signed an advice-of-rights form to this effect. Two days later, when he still had not met with an attorney, an officer gave him another advice-of-rights form and tried to interrogate him again. Petitioner did not sign the form but agreed to speak with the police. The officer testified at trial about statements made by petitioner during that interview. Petitioner raised claims in both state and federal courts under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments that the admission of these statements violated his Miranda rights and that his counsel’s failure to challenge their admission violated his rights to effective assistance of counsel. In federal court, the state agreed that the admission of the statements was erroneous but argued that the error was harmless. The district court granted relief on these claims. With regard to the Fifth Amendment claim, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the district court’s grant of relief, noting both that the State had conceded the statements were improperly admitted and that the “governing law is beyond dispute” under Miranda and Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), which holds that police are not permitted to re-interrogate an accused regarding any offense after the accused has invoked his rights until counsel is present. The admission of the statements had a substantial and injurious effect on petitioner’s defense because the prosecutor referred to them at length during closing argument, emphasizing that petitioner offered no alibi even though he was told that the victim was seriously injured and that his silence was “defining” and indicated, “I did it.” Petitioner’s anxious question about whether he would be charged with murder and his statement that he did not want to say anymore because he didn’t want to get into any more trouble were also damning. Other parts of his statements were “inculpatory because of their incoherence. They smack of nonsense.” 893 F.3d at 921. Regarding the Sixth Amendment claim, the Sixth Circuit ruled that trial counsel’s failure to challenge the admission of the statements was ineffective. Regarding deficient performance, “[t]he meritorious nature of a motion to suppress, under these circumstances, is clear from blackletter law.” 893 F.3d at 922. Counsel had access to all the facts that should have led him to conclude the statements were inadmissible, and there was nothing favorable to petitioner in the statements; on the contrary, they were only harmful. Petitioner was prejudiced by the deficient performance for the same reason he was prejudiced by the admission of the statements. The Michigan Court of Appeals’ decision to the contrary was unreasonable given the nature and effect of the constitutional violation. The Sixth Circuit also held that the prosecutor’s comments on petitioner’s post-Miranda silence violated petitioner’s right to due process under Doyle v. Ohio, and reversed the district court’s denial of relief on that ground.

2016: United States v. Bankston, 820 F.3d 215 (6th Cir. 2016). Counsel ineffective for failing to move to dismiss the charge of making false statements to a judge. The defendant already had charges of mail and wire fraud pending when she wrote a letter to the judge complaining about defense counsel and accusing the government of planting evidence in her home. In a superseding indictment, the government added the false statement charge based solely on the letter. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move to dismiss this charge because 18 U.S.C. § 1001(b), which criminalizes false statements, explicitly provides that it "does not apply to a party to a judicial proceeding ... for statements, representations, writings or documents submitted by such party ... to a judge or magistrate in that proceeding." Prejudice established because if counsel had moved to dismiss this count, there is a reasonable probability the charge would have been dismissed.

Grueninger v. Director, Virginia Department of Corrections*, 813 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2016). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in child sexual abuse case for failing to timely move to suppress the defendant's confession to a police investigator during a re-interview three days after the defendant invoked his right to counsel. The defendant was arrested for sexually abusing his fourteen-year-old daughter. During the initial interrogation, after being read his Miranda rights, he said, "I need an attorney." The interrogation stopped. Three days later, the investigator re-interviewed him without an attorney present, and this time, the defendant confessed. The state court denied relief holding that the defendant had not been "interrogated" under Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), as he only made voluntary statements after being served with additional warrants. This finding was objectively unreasonable under AEDPA as the officer did more than serve warrants. He questioned the defendant about the charges and those questions clearly constitute "interrogation" for Edwards purposes. As the state court did not address the question of prejudice, the court reviewed this issue de novo. Prejudice was established as the defendant's confession was "detailed and deeply disturbing." The independent evidence of guilt, on the other hand, "while substantial, was not so overwhelming" that the court could find no prejudice. While the defendant's daughter testified as to his guilt, "the defense was able to raise questions about the reliability of that testimony."

United States v. Freeman*, 818 F.3d 175 (5th Cir. 2016). Counsel ineffective in conspiracy to possess cocaine and possession with intent to distribute cocaine case for failing to move to dismiss the possession count, added in the superseding indictment, as barred by the statute of limitations. Counsel's conduct was deficient. "Although counsel's affidavit stated that he considered the issue, the record is silent as to the extent of counsel's research. Even minimal research would have revealed . . . a compelling argument" that the possession charge in the superseding indictment was barred by the statute of limitations. Prejudice established as the defendant had to pay a $100 special assessment for the possession conviction and the defendant would not have that conviction otherwise.

2015: United States v. Mercedes-De La Crus, 787 F.3d 61 (1st Cir. 2015). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to timely file a motion to suppress post-arrest statements when the arrest was made without probable cause. Federal agents were conducting surveillance of a remote stretch of coastline in Puerto Rico that was suspected to be an area of drug trafficking activity. It was a large wooded area with trails near a beach and there were five or six "well kept" houses nearby. In this area, there was an abandoned vehicle. When the defendant came out of the woods towards the vehicle, he was immediately arrested. Drugs were found 100 feet from the vehicle and a boat that apparently delivered the drugs was found abandoned in the sand, but the arresting agents did not know of these discoveries at the time of the arrest. The defendant's incriminating statements at the scene and upon his arrival at the Homeland Security Office should have been suppressed. Counsel's conduct in failing to make this motion was deficient and prejudicial as the government's case "was based almost exclusively on these statements."

- 2013: United States v. Liu, 731 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in criminal copyright infringement and trafficking in counterfeit labels case for failing to raise an obvious statute-of-limitations defense on one count, which was not brought in indictment until February 2010. The count alleged criminal conduct between 2001 and 2003. The applicable statute of limitations period was five years. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.
- 2012: Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2012). Counsel in murder case ineffective due to failure to adequately perform in hearing on the competency of the defendant's six-year-old son as a witness in a case that involved the killing of the defendant's four-year-old son. It was undisputed that the child died from asphyxiation by an elastic band that had come loose from a fitted bed sheet and that the six-year-old son was present. The son had maintained since his first interview that his brother wrapped the band around his own neck and that the defendant was not present. The jury never heard this testimony though due to the trial court's finding that the son was not competent to testify. Because the state court did not review the constitutional issue under the Sixth Amendment Compulsory Process Clause, this issue was reviewed de novo. Counsel's conduct was deficient in: (1) failing to interview the child witness and prepare him for his testimony; (2) failing to secure the presence of a witness who would have established that the child's testimony was consistent and credible; and (3) failing to correct the trial court's misapplication of the burden of proof when the trial court placed the burden on the defendant to establish competence when the burden, under state law, was on the state to establish that the child witness was not competent. Prejudice established as the state court's holding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland. In short, the state court relied on the "trial judge's own post hoc rationalization," during motion for new trial proceedings, that a more diligent performance would not have changed his mind. Under Strickland, the assessment of prejudice is an "objective inquiry" in which "courts must consider the effect the evidence would have on an unspecified objectively reasonable decision-maker – not its effect on one particular judge."
- 2011: Tice v. Johnson, 647 F.3d 87 (4th Cir. 2011). Counsel in murder and rape case ineffective for failing to move to suppress the petitioner's confession. The petitioner was one of the "Norfolk Four." The initial suspect in the murder, who lived nearby, was Joseph Dick. After making numerous contradictory statements, Dick testified that he and six other men, including the petitioner and Omar Ballard, participated in the rape and murder. The petitioner also confessed saying that he and five other men (Ballard not included) committed the crimes. The petitioner's statement, however, contained three incontrovertible errors or omissions of fact: (1) while he claimed forced entry, there was no evidence of such; (2) while he said he ejaculated, the only DNA evidence at the scene belonged to Ballard; and (3) while he did not name Ballard as an accomplice, Ballard undeniably was involved. His was the only DNA, he was convicted of severely beating a woman raping a 14-year-old girl in the area within just weeks of this crime, and he plead guilty to the murder and rape and agreed to testify against his codefendants in order to avoid a capital murder charge. The investigatory process “was characterized by grim repetition.” Initially, based on Dick’s statements, Williams was the target. He confessed to the murder stating that he acted alone. After the DNA did not match him, the police went back to Dick who implicated himself. He then implicated Wilson. Then Tice. And then Tice implicated himself and three others, who ultimately had their charges dismissed. No one implicated Ballard and he was not even a suspect until after he wrote a letter while in confinement incriminating himself. He then confessed and admitted that he was the sole actor in the rape and murder. Tice was initially questioned for about an hour before he agreed to and did undergo a polygraph examination. After that three hour examination, Tice’s interrogation continued and the officer took written notes, which included: “He told me he decide[d] not to say any more I told him he would be given time to think about it.” A different officer resumed the questioning 13 minutes later without giving fresh Miranda warnings. Tice then confessed and signed a confession. The state court held that Tice had unambiguously invoked his constitutional right to stop questioning, that his confession would have been suppressed had a motion been made, and that counsel had performed deficiently in failing to so move. The court found no prejudice, however, based on Dick’s testimony. While the case was reviewed under AEDPA, the court first conducted its own independent review as “our perception of how reasonably another court applies the law in a particular case is best informed by conducting our own, independent application so that we may gauge how the two compare.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient as the detective’s notes were in the court record for more than three years prior to the retrial and defense counsel had a copy of the notes in his file. “As with any record of an accused’s statements made in police custody, and especially a statement volunteered without the benefit of a lawyer’s advice, the notes should have been parsed to ascertain not only the havoc the accused might have wreaked upon his own defense, but also any boon he may have unwittingly bestowed.” The duty to investigate does not apply “only to facts yet unknown, as opposed to those already in the litigation file.” A reasonable investigation of counsel’s own file would have revealed the officer’s notes, which should “give pause to even the greenest of criminal defense lawyers.” Counsel could not remember seeing these notes, let alone any strategy not to move to suppress the confession. “One might think that such an important and irrevocable decision concerning trial tactics would have left an indelible imprint upon the memory of the strategist.” Given this, the Court rejected the State’s “invitation to engage in after-the-fact rationalization of a litigation strategy that almost certainly was never contemplated” and concluded that counsel simply overlooked the notes. Due to counsel’s “otherwise laudably effective and competent” representation, the court was reluctant to find deficient conduct based on this “singular instance” of deficient conduct but did so because “[t]he error was of sufficient magnitude” to be “constitutionally deficient within the meaning of Strickland.” The court also found that the motion to suppress would have been granted if filed under Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975). The invocation of the right to cease questioning was “clear and unequivocal” and a “reasonable police officer under the circumstances” would have ceased questioning. Prejudice also found. Dick’s credibility was shaky at best. His story evolved from denying all involvement, to merely being present, to being an actor, back to mere presence, and then adding additional actors including Tice. A reasonable jury would have grave doubts about his veracity. The state court in finding no prejudice

Capital Case*

“misapprehended the Strickland standard” by essentially finding that because Tice still could have been convicted there was no prejudice. The prosecution even recognized the relative weights of the evidence by focusing its arguments on Tice’s confession rather than on the persuasiveness of Dick’s testimony. Moreover, the jury’s questions during deliberations indicated that it was struggling to accord the proper weight to the confession. While it “is generally tricky business to try to divine a jury’s thought processes by considering only its questions and speculating as to the reasons therefor,” the Court found it “safe to say” that the jury did not consider Dick’s testimony to be conclusive evidence of guilt.

2010: Hodgson v. Warren, 622 F.3d 591 (6th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder trial for failing to seek an adjournment when an eyewitness with exculpatory testimony failed to appear after being subpoenaed. The state had 4-5 eyewitnesses implying that petitioner was the shooter but none could say affirmatively that they saw a gun in his hands or saw him fire the shots. The physical evidence, shell casings found away from where petitioner was, was inconsistent with the testimony that petitioner was the shooter. The eyewitness who failed to appear would have testified that she was only a few feet from petitioner at the time of the shooting that she could see his hands, and she could state affirmatively that he did not have a gun. This witness also “had no obvious motive to lie.” Reasonably competent counsel would “do as much as humanly possible” to ensure the jury heard this witness’ testimony. Thus, counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to seek an adjournment to locate this witness. Under AEDPA, the state court’s finding that counsel had a strategic reason for not calling her was unreasonable. Court had refused the prosecution’s request to waive presentation of her testimony, which made clear that counsel “did not make a strategic choice to forgo her testimony.” The state court’s decision was also unreasonable in finding that her testimony would have been cumulative. Prejudice established as this witness if believed would have impeached the government’s eyewitness and undercut the prosecution’s case.

Bellizia v. Florida Dept. of Corrections*, 614 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in heroin trafficking of more than 28 grams case for failing to move for a judgment of acquittal because the state tested and weighed only one of the 32 pellets removed from petitioner’s stomach and simply assumed the remaining pellets were heroin of similar weights (9.1 grams each) to charge petitioner with 28 grams or more in order to apply a 25 year mandatory minimum sentence. Under clear state law, although circumstantial evidence can be used to establish “the identity of a controlled substance, it cannot be used to establish the weight of a controlled substance.” Prejudice established because counsel’s error meant that petitioner faced a mandatory minimum of 25 years rather than three years based on the weight of the one and only pellet that was actually weighed.

2009: Gentry v. Sevier, 597 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in burglary and theft case for failing to move to suppress evidence seized from the defendant and his wheelbarrow. Police were investigating a “suspicious person” report when they encountered the defendant pushing a wheelbarrow with a rain coat partially covering it. Although officers did not have a reasonable suspicion to warrant a Terry stop, they conducted one and patted the defendant down. During the pat-down, a garage door opener was found. By locating the garage the opener worked with and by searching the wheelbarrow officers obtained additional evidence against the defendant. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the Fourth Amendment issues “should have been apparent” to counsel. Moreover, the defendant even filed his own pro se motion to suppress the evidence, but counsel still did not assert the issue. Prejudice established because a motion to suppress was meritorious. The state court unreasonably applied federal law by concluding the evidence was admissible despite the improper Terry stop based on the inevitable discovery doctrine. Because there were no intervening circumstances, all of the evidence obtained during the encounter was inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree.

2007: United States v. Weathers, 493 F.3d 229 (D.C. Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective for failing to challenge multiplicitous counts in case arising out of the defendant’s attempts to arrange for the murder of several witnesses and a prosecutor on pending rape charges. Two of the counts related to the prosecutor. Under the U.S. Code, the defendant was convicted of threatening a federal official. Under D.C. law, he was convicted of threatening to injure a person. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and not explained by strategy. Prejudice found because there was a reasonable possibility that a challenge would have been granted. The conviction under D.C. law was vacated and the case remanded for resentencing.

2004: Clinkscale v. Carter, 375 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder and robbery case (that was a capital case but jury gave life) for failing to timely file notice of an alibi defense, which resulted in the trial court’s exclusion of the evidence. The defendant had informed counsel immediately of his alibi and the defense investigator reported that there were at least three alibi witnesses. Nonetheless, counsel gave only “verbal notice” a few days before trial of a “possible alibi.” Only after the jury was empaneled did counsel file a written notice of alibi identifying the witnesses. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “there is nothing reasonable about failing to file an alibi notice within the time prescribed by the applicable rules when such failure risks wholesale exclusion of the evidence.” Prejudice found because the state’s evidence was weak and the trial amounted to a credibility contest between the alleged victim/witness and the defendant. The exclusion of the alibi witnesses, who would have corroborated the defendant’s testimony, was prejudicial in these circumstances. Although only one of the alibi witnesses provided an affidavit, there is no requirement that a defendant claiming ineffectiveness of counsel in these circumstances “produce an affidavit from the potential alibi witnesses documenting the substance of their anticipated testimony.” Here, the investigator’s notes and affidavit established the facts that the remaining witnesses could have testified to.

Owens v. United States*, 387 F.3d 607 (7th Cir. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in drug case for failing to adequately move to suppress evidence seized pursuant to a search of the defendant’s house. The evidence was seized pursuant to a warrant based on a barebones affidavit, signed by a detective, that stated that an informant had bought some crack from the defendant at the house three months earlier. There was no indication of the quantity of crack or the reliability of the informant. Counsel moved to suppress the evidence because the affidavit did not establish probable cause to believe that a search of the same premises three months later would reveal evidence. The court held that the affidavit was insufficient and the search could not be saved by United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), because the officers that conducted the search could not have reasonably believed that the warrant was supported by probable cause. Although counsel moved to suppress the evidence, counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel argued that the house did not belong to the defendant, which allowed denial of the motion on the grounds that the defendant had no standing to contest the search. The evidence that the house was the defendant's was overwhelming and the lawyer's argument otherwise, which "forfeit[ed] a compelling ground for excluding evidence essential to convict his client was therefore a blunder of the first magnitude." Id. at 608. Prejudice was found because if counsel had acknowledged that it was the defendant's house, the motion to suppress would have been granted and the defendant would have been acquitted. Alternatively, even if the court had denied the motion to suppress, counsel could have still argued that the house was not the defendant's under the rule of Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), which prohibits use of the defendant's suppression hearing testimony during the trial.

The "prejudice" essential to a violation of the Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel is not being convicted though one is innocent, although that is the worst kind; it is being convicted when one would have been acquitted, or at least would have had a good shot at acquittal, had one been competently represented.

Id. at 610. In reaching this conclusion, the court overruled its prior holding in Holman v. Page, 95 F.3d 481 (7th Cir. 1996) (failure to make a Fourth Amendment objection to the admission of evidence cannot amount to ineffective assistance of counsel if the evidence was reliable, so that its admission, even if improper, created no risk that an innocent person would be convicted).

United States v. Hilliard*, 392 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in illegal firearms case for failing to timely file a post-trial motion. Following the defendant's conviction on only one of five charges even though the evidence for all five overlapped, the court informed counsel of concerns about the validity of the jury verdict and reminded counsel to file post-trial motions. Although only allowed seven days to do so under the rules, counsel did not file until 41 days after the verdict and the motion was dismissed as untimely. Counsel's conduct was deficient and was "a classic dereliction" of duty. Prejudice was found because the district court found that the motion would have been granted because "a miscarriage of justice was likely done here."

2003: Joshua v. Dewitt, 341 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2003). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in drug case for failing to move to suppress evidence. The defendant was stopped by a highway patrolman for speeding. The highway patrolman did a license check on the defendant and learned that there was an entry in the station's "read and sign" book, which contained police intelligence information. The entry in the book reported that the defendant was a known drug courier who transported illegal narcotics between several cities. Based on this information, the defendant was detained for approximately forty-two minutes in order to allow time for a drug dog to come to the scene. When the dog arrived, it alerted, and a large quantity of cocaine was found. The defendant's girlfriend then told the police that the drugs belonged to the defendant. Prior to trial, counsel moved to suppress the evidence solely on the basis that the length of the traffic stop alone required suppression. The trial court denied the motion, and the defendant entered a no contest plea. The court found that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move for suppression under United States v. Hensley,

Capital Case*

469 U.S. 221 (1985), which held that reliance on a flyer or bulletin can justify a brief detention but can do so only if the officer who issued the flyer or bulletin had articulable facts supporting reasonable suspicion that the person wanted had committed an offense. The court found a reasonable trial attorney would have raised the Hensley issue at trial. Prejudice was found because the state failed to offer any evidence from the officer who provided the information from the “read and sign” book and because the state had never contended that there was a justifiable basis for the entry. The court likewise found appellate counsel ineffective for failing to raise the issue on appeal under the state plain error rule. Prejudice was found because Hensley bars the admissibility of the evidence seized at the scene of the defendant’s arrest, including both the drugs and his girlfriend’s statement. Without this evidence, there was a substantial probability that the defendant would not have been convicted. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court decision was contrary to clearly established Supreme Court precedent in Hensley.

b. U.S. District Court Cases

- 2024: Castro-Aguirre v. United States, 2024 WL 2784306 (S.D. Ind. May 29, 2024). In case involving multiple convictions related to a drug distribution network, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the conspiracy count on the ground that it constituted a lesser included offense of the continuing criminal enterprise (CCE) count in violation of double jeopardy. (Although the remedy was vacating the conspiracy conviction and the life sentence for that crime, resentencing was unnecessary given that petitioner’s life sentence for the CCE conviction was valid.)
- 2023: United States v. Dasinger, 2023 WL 6196540 (M.D. Fla. September 22, 2023). In drug/firearm possession case with mandatory life sentences due to prior convictions, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate the facts surrounding the search that led to inculpatory evidence/statements. The search at issue took place in a hotel room rented by a third party. Although defense counsel initially made a reasonable decision to forgo investigation into the third party, who defense counsel assumed was cooperating with the government, that decision became unreasonable when the prosecution revealed in its response to the suppression motion that it was relying on the third party’s consent as the basis for the legality of the search. At the hearing on the suppression motion, the prosecution’s evidence of consent was un rebutted. Also deficient were trial counsel’s minimal efforts to locate the third party prior to trial in order to reopen the suppression motion. Trial counsel did unsuccessfully seek to contact the third party through an investigator after the third party called counsel and stated that he had not in fact consented to the search. Such efforts were minimal, however, and a reasonable investigation would have led trial counsel to the witness. At the post-trial hearing, the third party’s denial of consent was found credible over the conflicting testimony of a police officer. And given the falsehoods told to petitioner when the officers entered the hotel room, her own consent could not be viewed as voluntary. Relief is granted because petitioner demonstrated a reasonable probability that the jury’s verdict would change without the fruits of the unlawful search.
- 2019: United States v. Gladden, 394 F.Supp.3d 465 (S.D. N.Y. 2019). In case involving multiple drug-related charges, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress evidence that had been recovered from the Range Rover petitioner had been driving during a drug deal. The Range Rover, which petitioner had borrowed from a friend, was seized days after the drug transaction on the ground that it had been illegally parked. Found in the vehicle was, inter alia, a Boost Mobile printout of a cell phone number, XXX-XXX-XXXX, and an associated walkie-talkie number, 176*734*9, that tied petitioner to the charged drug conspiracy. Evidence presented at the hearing on petitioner's motion to vacate, as well as the trial record, established that if trial counsel had conducted an adequate investigation, he would have concluded that there was a good basis to move to suppress the items seized from the car on the ground that the vehicle was not illegally parked at the time of the seizure. The district court rejected the Government's argument that counsel could not have been expected to file a motion for suppression because petitioner did not affirmatively tell him "how the Government's version of the facts was incorrect" and therefore did not give him a "reason to believe that the Range Rover was improperly seized." There was no indication that trial counsel ever discussed the documents seized from the Range Rover with petitioner, or that he ever asked his client about the circumstances of the seizure. "It was counsel's job to ask those questions, and, more generally, to investigate the circumstances of the seizure." The Government also raised a standing issue that was determined to be forfeited due to not having been raised before the Magistrate Judge. The standing issue was also without merit. That petitioner shared the vehicle with his live-in girlfriend did not extinguish his expectation of privacy. That petitioner had a suspended license also did not interfere with his standing both because he was authorized to use the car and he was not driving it at the time of the seizure. The Government further argued that the seizure was valid because the Range Rover had been used in narcotics trafficking and was therefore forfeitable. But this argument was itself forfeited because it was not raised before the Magistrate Judge. Even addressing the argument on the merits, it failed. "At a minimum, there is a reasonable probability that the Government would not have been able to establish the applicability of the forfeiture exception at a pretrial suppression hearing." As for prejudice, apart from the Boost Mobile printout, the only evidence linking petitioner to the phone numbers found in the car was the testimony of a cooperating co-conspirator who testified against petitioner at trial. While the jury might have credited the witness' testimony even without any corroboration, there were substantial reasons to doubt his credibility, including that the witness himself participated extensively in the narcotics conspiracy and was testifying in exchange for favorable treatment from the Government. Also unavailing was an inevitable discovery argument the Government made concerning another item seized from the Range Rover which linked petitioner to another drug sale. The argument was both forfeited and without merit. The seized evidence made it substantially more likely that the jury would accept the Government's contention that petitioner was involved in the broad conspiracy. Therefore, that there is a reasonable possibility that, but for the admission of the evidence seized from the Range Rover, the outcome of the trial would have been different.

United States v. Frederiksen*, 2019 WL 5395751 (D. Kansas Oct. 22, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of lying to federal agents during an investigation into illegal poker parties, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to timely file a post-trial motion seeking acquittal or a new trial where the prosecution's evidence was insufficient to support a conviction as to two elements of the charged crime; (2) failing to object to the prosecution's misstatement of the law during closing argument; and (4) failing to object to irrelevant and prejudicial evidence concerning other poker games throughout the trial.

Hesser v. United States, 2019 WL 2717271 (M.D. Fla. June 28, 2019), rev'd on other grounds, 40 F.4th 1221 (11th Cir. 2022). In case involving, inter alia, three counts of filing false tax returns with the IRS, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to renew or make a motion for judgment of acquittal at the conclusion of all of the evidence. Petitioner was charged with filing false tax returns in 2005, 2006, and 2007 – Counts One through Three. At the close of the government's case in chief, defense counsel moved for a judgment of acquittal only on Count Three based on the absence of a signature on Form 1040. The motion was denied. After the defense presented its case, defense counsel failed to renew the motion as to Count Three or make a motion for judgment of acquittal on any other count. Petitioner was convicted of the charges. On direct appeal, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions. Although it found that the evidence presented by the prosecution in its case-in-chief was not sufficient to establish the falsity element of the three false tax return counts, it applied the difficult manifest miscarriage of justice standard due to defense counsel's failure to properly raise or renew a motion for judgment of acquittal. Defense counsel's "failure to renew or make a motion for judgment of acquittal at the conclusion of all the evidence constituted deficient performance as to Counts One through Three." Had counsel properly preserved a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence, review would have been de novo and petitioner would have prevailed on appeal. Thus, prejudice was established. Because the grant of relief is based on insufficiency of evidence, double jeopardy prevents petitioner from being re-tried on the three counts.

2018: Pierotti v. Harris, 350 F.Supp.3d 187 (E.D. N.Y. 2018). In case involving multiple charges including two counts of murder where petitioner contended the victims were shot in self-defense, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request and obtain reasonable accommodation for petitioner's hearing disability. Counsel was aware that petitioner had a hearing impairment and that petitioner normally wore two hearing aids but was wearing no hearing aids during the trial. On numerous occasions petitioner told counsel that he could not hear what was going on in the courtroom. Counsel's explaining and summarizing what had happened during the proceedings did not cure the problem. Prejudice is presumed here, because of the undisputed facts of the severity of petitioner's hearing disability; his inability to hear high frequencies (1/3 of the trial witnesses were women, whose voices have higher frequencies); the conditions in the courtroom, including the location of the witnesses in relation to the defense table, the position of the speakers (not facing directly at petitioner), the hard surfaces in the courtroom; and the presence of ambient noise. Petitioner was essentially rendered absent for much of his trial and without the present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding (it is appropriate to presume prejudice when a defendant is denied the right to consult with counsel). These problems rendered his trial fundamentally unfair. That petitioner addressed his inability to hear to his counsel rather than to the trial court was "not surprising," and "when his trial counsel did not raise the issue, Petitioner's reluctance to address the court directly was understandable in view of the judge's somewhat brusque reaction to Petitioner's pro se audibility complaint during the pre-trial proceedings." Relief granted. (Note: This claim was reviewed de novo because it had not been adjudicated on the merits by the state court. Instead, it had been found procedurally defaulted by the state court but the Second Circuit in a prior decision had found that this case fell within the limited category of exceptional cases where the "exorbitant application of a generally sound rule renders the state ground inadequate to stop consideration of a federal question." Pierotti v. Walsh, 834 F.3d 171, 180 (2nd Cir. 2016).)

Mendoza v. Holland*, 2018 WL 540095 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2018). In case where petitioner was convicted in California state court of a total of 11 charges of committing a lewd or lascivious act against three minors under the age of 14, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to raise a claim that petitioner's Miranda rights had been violated. This ineffectiveness provided cause to overcome the procedural default of the Miranda claim in state court. Looking to Visciotti v. Martel, 862 F.3d 749, 768 (9th Cir. 2016), the district court independently determined whether there was IAC and did not defer to the state court's determination of this issue. Petitioner unambiguously invoked his Miranda rights as soon as the detective started talking to him, saying "No way" did he want to discuss anything with the detective. Nevertheless, the interview continued for an hour thereafter. This was not an implied waiver of his Miranda rights; petitioner only answered later questions because the detectives had ignored his response and continued questioning him. The admission of his statements at trial was thus a constitutional violation. In its harmless error analysis, the court did not review petitioner's testimony at trial given that petitioner only testified because of the confession. The direct and graphic statements he gave to the police about two of the three victims had a substantial and injurious effect, because the independent evidence as to petitioner's guilt of those was less strong; with regard to the third victim, there was evidence obtained from a taped pretext call between petitioner and the victim that was damaging, and so his admissions to the police about that victim did not have a prejudicial effect under Brecht. Notably, the prosecution emphasized the confession in closing argument. Both trial and appellate counsel were deficient for failing to present this meritorious Miranda claim. There is a reasonable probability that had trial counsel raised it, the trial court would have suppressed the interview and an acquittal was possible, at least on the charges against two of the victims. There is also a reasonable probability that if appellate counsel raised it on appeal, petitioner would have prevailed then. Thus, cause and prejudice for the procedural default was established. Furthermore, the state superior court's denial of the IAC for failure to raise the Miranda claims involved an unreasonable application of Strickland's prejudice prong, because although the superior court articulated the correct standard (reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different), it then conflated that with a sufficiency of the evidence test. So AEDPA deference to the state court's decision did not apply.

2014: United States v. Wendfeldt, 58 F. Supp. 3d 1124 (D. Nev. 2014), appeal dismissed, 15-15010 (9th Cir. May 5, 2015). Counsel ineffective in plea to drug possession with intent to distribute case for failing to move to suppress the drug evidence due to an unlawful search. A highway patrol trooper stopped the defendant on the interstate because his tires touched the outside line of his lane several times. At the conclusion of the traffic stop, the trooper told the defendant that he was free to leave. As the defendant walked towards his car, however, the trooper asked for consent to search. When the defendant refused, the trooper took his canine from his patrol car and walked around the defendant's car. The dog alerted in the area of the passenger door. Thereafter, the trooper detained the defendant until a search warrant was obtained. Drugs and guns were found in the trunk of the car. The trooper lacked reasonable suspicion to justify the stop because the defendant's tires touched the line, but never crossed it. Even if the trooper acted in good faith, "this did not transform the unlawful traffic stop into a lawful one." The second seizure to use the canine was also unlawful. Counsel's failure to move to suppress was deficient and prejudicial.

2011: United States v. Serrano, 798 F. Supp. 2d 634 (E.D. Pa. 2011). Counsel ineffective in possession with intent to distribute cocaine case for failing to move to suppress the defendant's confession on Miranda grounds. The defendant initially waved down an officer asserting that he had been kidnaped, robbed, and had his car stolen. After a car chase and shootout with the kidnapper, the car was recovered. In the car was a plastic bag containing a white powdery substance. The defendant was taken to the police department. After being left alone for hours in a locked room, he was questioned about the kidnaping and then his involvement in drug activity by different officers. He refused to answer any questions. After several more hours alone, a detective told the defendant that they were not interested in his involvement in drug activity and he could leave if he would just say that he had done a couple of deals with his robbers before and this time they robbed him. The defendant took the detective at his word and signed a statement in line with the detective's outline. He was detained a few more hours and released without being arrested. In all, he had been held in the interrogation room for over 24 hours and he was never informed of his Miranda rights. Counsel negotiated a plea agreement and the defendant was sentenced to 151 months. Counsel stated that he believed a motion to suppress would be unsuccessful because the defendant was not "in custody" in that he was not charged at the time of the confession. Nonetheless, counsel admitted that he did not know the circumstances surrounding the confession and did not inquire about it. Counsel's conduct was deficient as counsel did not inquire about the circumstances. If he had "no reasonably competent attorney could conclude that [the defendant] was not entitled to a Miranda warning." Miranda applies when (1) a defendant is "in custody" and (2) he was subjected to "interrogation." Even though the defendant was not charged with a crime when his confession was made, that does not mean that his interrogation was non-custodial. Factors to be considered in determining whether the defendant was "in custody" include: (1) whether he told he was under arrest or free to leave; (2) the location and physical surroundings of the interrogation; (3) the length of the interrogation; (4) whether officers used coercive tactics, displayed weapons, physically restrained the defendant, etc.; and (5) whether the defendant voluntarily submitted to questioning. Here, the defendant was clearly in custody when he confessed. While it may be true that a motion to suppress may have scuttled ongoing plea negotiations, counsel decided between an agreement to 151 months in prison and moving to suppress the only evidence of guilt, which would have led to an acquittal. "[C]ounsel's decision was not only wrong, but it was uninformed." Prejudice established as there was no other evidence of guilt in the record. A motion to suppress "would have sounded a death knell for the prosecution's case."

2009: Oliva v. Hedgpeth, 600 F. Supp. 2d 1067 (C.D. Cal. 2009), aff'd, 375 Fed.Appx. 697 (9th Cir. 2010). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to move to suppress the pretrial identification of a six-year-old eyewitness. A transcript of the police interview revealed that she was shown a photo lineup without being told that the lineup might not include the shooter. She thus thought that she had to pick one of the photos. After picking one, she was asked leading questions to eliminate that person. After she picked the defendant's photo, she was praised and told that she did an "awesome" job in helping to get "that bad guy" before she had even looked at the other photos. Counsel's only reason for not challenging this evidence was that he did not believe the motion would be successful. This conduct was unreasonable because the identification procedure was clearly suggestive. The state court's decision to the contrary was objectively unreasonable in that its "conclusions unreasonably fly in the face of the undisputed evidence of record." Following a finding of suggestive procedures, the central question is “whether under the ‘totality of the circumstances’ the identification is reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive.” Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188, 199 (1972). Here, the witness had only a “fleeting” view of the shooter and “only a very limited opportunity” to view his face. Her prior description of him fit a number of other people at the scene. She gave inconsistent descriptions of his attire. At trial, she could not identify anyone in the courtroom and even affirmatively stated the shooter was not in the courtroom. Thus, her identification was not reliable and it is reasonably probable the trial court would have excluded the pretrial identification. Without this evidence, it was also reasonably probable that the result of the trial would have been different. The only other real evidence pointing to the defendant was another identification that was not strong and indeed the witness “displayed a notable lack of certainty” in her identification. In addition, even with the child’s pretrial identification in evidence, the jury deliberated for two and a half days and three times requested to rehear the testimony about the witness identifications.

Robinson v. United States*, 638 F. Supp. 2d 764 (E.D. Mich. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy case for failing to file motion for new trial, even though the defendant filed a post-trial motion for judgment of acquittal, and failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence of the drug quantity attributable to the defendant. The defendant, who was from Indiana, was charged with his brother and others of growing a large crop of marijuana in between rows of corn on a rural farm. The government’s only evidence connecting the defendant to the farm was in January of February, which, of course, was not in the growing season. The only other evidence connected the defendant to the operation was the testimony of the defendant’s ex-sister-in-law, whose testimony was not credible in the court’s view. Another woman had also testified that the sister-in-law bragged that she lied at trial to get even with the brothers. Despite a month long trial, the jury deliberated less than four hours before convicting all six defendants. During the trial, the defendant had moved a judgment of acquittal under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 29, which the Court took under advisement. After trial, counsel filed a brief in support of this motion but did not file a motion for new trial under Rule 33. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because, under Rule 29, the court must consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the government. Under Rule 33, the court can consider the credibility of witnesses. Counsel’s conduct was not strategy because he was unaware of Rule 33 or its standards. “A decision based on a misunderstanding of the law is not a strategic decision.” Here, “counsel’s failure to file the motion was not a strategic choice; it was based on ignorance of the law.” Prejudice found because “the present case represents one [of] those extraordinary matters in which a motion for a new trial would have been appropriately considered and granted.” Likewise, counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence of the drug quantity attributable to the defendant. “Again, it does not appear that it could have been a strategic decision to challenge guilt but not the amount for which the [defendant] was to be held accountable.” Prejudice established because “the statutory mandatory minimum sentence in this case was tied directly to the amount of drugs charged.” A successful challenged could have reduced the sentence exposure by half.

Nelson v. Brown*, 673 F. Supp. 2d 85 (E.D.N.Y. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in robbery case for failing to request a remedy for the prosecution’s discovery violation. There were several eyewitnesses to the crime that made contradictory statements about whether the assailant had facial hair or not. One of these eyewitnesses had made handwritten notes shortly after the crime but the state lost these notes and, therefore, did not provide them to the defense in discovery, even though state law required disclosure of “contemporaneous descriptions of a suspect” when identification is an issue. The state’s case depended entirely on eyewitness testimony and the defendant was entitled to a remedy, such as an adverse inference instruction that the witness’ original handwritten description was not consistent with her trial testimony, but counsel failed to seek a remedy. Prejudice established because the state’s case was “remarkably weak” and this was the only alleged eyewitness that provided a consistent account of the robber’s appearance from initial statements through to trial.

2008: Flowers v. United States, 560 F. Supp. 2d 710 (N.D. Ind. 2008). Counsel ineffective in possession with intent to distribute drugs “within 1,000 feet” of a school, playground, or public housing. Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective for not challenging the government’s failure to prove that the defendant’s house was within 1,000 feet of a protected area. At trial, Officer Cameron testified that the residence was within 1,000 feet of “a public park in the South Bend Parks Department.” There was no other evidence on the point even though the statute requires that the government prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the area is: 1) an outdoor facility, which is 2) intended for recreation, 3) open to the public, and 4) includes three or more separate apparatus intended for the recreation of children. Counsel’s conduct was objectively unreasonable and prejudicial for failing to challenge the government’s inadequate proof. The court set aside the conviction on this offense and entered a conviction on the lesser included offense (omitting the “within 1,000 feet” element) and ordered resentencing.

Jones v. Wilder-Tomlinson*, 577 F. Supp. 2d 1064 (N.D. Iowa 2008). Under AEDPA, counsel in drug case ineffective in failing to timely file a motion to suppress evidence flowing from the defendant’s arrest, which lacked probable cause. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the only evidence supporting the arrest was a small, gram scale, but there was no testimony regarding why the scale itself was any different from other food or mail scales and there was no other evidence, other than an officer’s testimony that it was drug paraphernalia, to believe that the scale was being used to weigh drugs. Because the state court did not decide this issue on the merits, de novo review was conducted. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel “either forgot about the deadline or unreasonably assumed that the . . . Court would excuse the untimeliness of her motion.” Prejudice established because “the evidence would have been suppressed had a timely motion to suppress been filed.”

Massillon v. Conway*, 574 F.Supp.2d 381 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). Counsel ineffective in trafficking case for failing to challenge, as the fruit of an illegal arrest, the out-of-court confirmatory identifications and in-court identifications of the defendant by two law enforcement officers. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the prosecution “would not have been able to meet its burden of proving admissibility by clear and convincing evidence.” Prejudice established even if the trial court had excluded only the out-of-court confirmatory identifications because a year had passed with both officers engaged in more than 100 similar “buy-and-bust” operations in that time period. “With or without the in-court identifications, the evidence of petitioner’s guilt, absent the out-of-court confirmatory identifications, is extremely thin.”

2007: United States v. Baker, 492 F.Supp.2d 1167 (D.Neb. 2007). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy and possession of a firearm by a felon case for failing to file a motion for new trial. Following the jury's verdict, the trial court granted a judgment of acquittal on the conspiracy charge and asking for briefing on whether the court should grant of a motion for new trial. Counsel responded only that no new trial could be granted because of double jeopardy. The government appealed and the Eighth Circuit reversed the judgment of acquittal on the conspiracy charge and remanded for sentencing. Counsel's conduct was deficient because Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 29 provides that "if the court enters a judgment of acquittal after a guilty verdict, the court must also conditionally determine whether any motion for a new trial should be granted if the judgment of acquittal is later vacated or reversed." Here counsel did not move for a new trial, even after the court asked both parties to brief the new trial issue and instead advised the court that a new trial would be barred by double jeopardy. Prejudice established because the court would have granted "a motion for new trial or a conditional motion for new trial under Rule 29," especially since the court found that "the evidence at trial was so deficient that it warranted the granting of the motion for judgment of acquittal."

c. State Cases

2024: Matthews v. State, 319 A.3d 891 (Del. 2024). In murder case dependent on circumstantial evidence, trial counsel was prejudicially deficient in failing to move to suppress evidence obtained from petitioner's cellphone. Trial counsel should have objected to the search of petitioner's phone on the ground that the authorities used an unconstitutional general warrant. The relevant case law supporting suppression on this basis existed at the time of trial and counsel's post-trial averment that he saw no basis for moving to suppress showed he lacked a tactical basis for his omission. Additionally, the record did not support the superior court's finding that petitioner consented to the search of his cellphone prior to the police falsely informing him that they already had a warrant. It appeared that what petitioner was consenting to was providing the authorities with his cell phone number. At best, the exchange was ambiguous and ambiguity is resolved in favor of a finding that consent was lacking. The failure to move to suppress based on the absence of consent was also deficient performance by trial counsel. The superior court denied relief on the alternative ground that "even if the consent was defective, the [cellphone] evidence had no bearing on the outcome of the case."⁴ The state supreme court disagreed with this conclusion. The trial record showed that the prosecution relied heavily on the cellphone evidence. Although the superior court believed that the video surveillance evidence, combined with the testimony of petitioner's girlfriend, left no room to doubt that petitioner was the killer, the supreme court was unpersuaded. The video evidence was of poor quality and did not allow for identification of the two people it was capturing or establish what they were doing. Even with the testimony from petitioner's girlfriend about when petitioner and the victim departed her home, that left room for someone other than petitioner to have been the one who shot and killed the victim. The other circumstantial evidence was also weak. Although no murder weapon was recovered, gunshot residue was found on petitioner's coat. However, the residue could not be linked to the killing, no witnesses linked petitioner to the shooting, and the trial testimony of two prosecution witnesses was inconsistent with the prior statements they gave to the police. Notably, the supreme court's objective assessment of the importance of the cellphone evidence was consistent with statements made by the trial court. Further, the record showed the prosecutor’s reliance of the cellphone evidence throughout the trial. “From the start to the end of [petitioner’s] trial, the State repeatedly admitted how important [petitioner’s] cell-phone evidence was to its case, including for purposes of proving plan, motive, and intent.” Illustrative of this reliance were the arguments the prosecutor made in support of the admission of text messages about purchasing a gun and gun-related internet search history. The prosecution underscored how “probative” and “material” that evidence was to its case, “while also acknowledging that it was ‘certainly’ prejudicial.” In fact, the prosecutor argued that the evidence was “need[ed]” because “[n]o gun was recovered” and “[t]here [we]re no eyewitnesses saying the defendant murdered [the victim].” The State could not now “change position and disclaim the importance of the evidence.” Without the evidence derived from petitioner’s cellphone, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of his trial would have been different. Accordingly, petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel’s deficient performance.

State v. Jones*, 258 N.E.3d 626 (Ohio App. 2024). In drug trafficking and possession case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the constitutionality of a consent search and protective sweep of a home. Police, based on an anonymous tip concerning drug activity at a certain residence, surveilled defendant outside that residence in a van driven by defendant’s mother. Officers followed the van after observing what appeared to be a “[h]and-to-hand through the window” with another car and arrested defendant at a gas station. Among the items recovered from defendant were keys to the residence. Officers returned to the residence, unlocked the door and entered. Inside was William Gaston who signed a written consent form to the search hours later. While defense counsel challenged the search on the ground that Gaston lacked the authority to consent to the search, defense counsel “ignored a potentially meritorious claim—that Gaston’s signature on the consent-to-search form was an acquiescence to the police officers who announced that they possessed a search warrant.” (The sequence of events was shown in part through bodycam footage.) A second potentially meritorious ground was also ignored by defense counsel—that officers lacked a reasonable suspicion of danger in the house to warrant a protective sweep. At the suppression hearing, an officer testified that he had no reason to believe that anyone was inside of the house. Moreover, nothing in the bodycam footage gave rise to “a reasonable suspicion of danger” in the house. Trial counsel ignored the clear application of two Supreme Court cases. His failure to raise the meritorious grounds for suppress was contrary to prevailing professional norms. Prejudice was clear given that the warrantless search, or sweep, of the house resulted in the discovery of a safe which contained multiple bags of substances along with personal papers, and led to charges of ten drug-related felonies. (The officers obtained a warrant for opening the safe after discovering it during the initial search. The inevitable discovery exception to the suppression rule was found inapplicable to the facts of this case.)

People v. Page*, 254 N.E.3d 295 (Ill. App. 2024). Appellant’s conviction for being an armed habitual offender is reversed on direct appeal due to trial counsel’s failure to move to suppress appellant’s arrest and the search of a vehicle based on the absence of probable cause. A police officer, Carroll, was monitoring multiple remote police observation device (POD) cameras when he saw a person placing an object in his jacket pocket. Even though the object appeared for only a split second, Carroll testified he believed the object was a firearm magazine. Carroll, along with two other officers all wearing body cameras, went to the location in an unmarked vehicle where Carroll recognized appellant as the person he saw on the POD video. Appellant was standing 10 to 15 feet from a white KIA and a blue Pontiac. Upon the arrival of the officers, appellant threw something into the KIA and fled on foot. Carroll recovered a firearm from the Pontiac, which he claimed was visibly protruding from under a jacket on the passenger's seat, before chasing after appellant. At trial, the prosecution admitted a still photograph from the POD video that showed appellant sitting on a porch with what Carroll described as a black magazine protruding out of his jacket. Carroll was unaware of what was thrown into the KIA. No keys were recovered for the Pontiac and appellant was never seen driving it. It was stipulated that appellant had two prior convictions for drug offenses. No defense was presented at the bench trial. In finding appellant guilty, the trial judge described what she saw in the POD video:

Mr. Page is seen walking onto that porch and taking a seat. The officer who testified in this case through direct examination circled something in the photo that he describes as the handle or magazine portion of the firearm. In the photo, I can't tell what it is. I don't know what it is. It could possibly be the keys in his hands, but what the court did observe in that video is that while Mr. Page was sitting on the porch, his hands move in a manner in which one's hands would move when you're racking a firearm.

In arguing that a motion to suppress would have been futile, the State contended that probable cause to arrest appellant arose from his possession of an extended magazine, not a firearm or standard magazine, which is unlawful in Cook County. Similarly, Carroll had probable cause to search the Pontiac based on appellant putting the extended magazine into that car. The appellate court disagreed, finding that the POD footage, on its own, fell below the minimum for Carroll to have formed probable cause. Although the trial judge concluded appellant's conduct in the footage was consistent with someone possessing a firearm, that was not itself necessarily illegal. Carroll would have needed to be familiar with appellant's criminal history to have suspected his possession of the firearm was illegal and he was not at the relevant time. And Carroll's testimony and the exhibits lacked the particularized information necessary to support probable cause for the search of the Pontiac. The facts in the record support that a motion to suppress had a reasonable probability of success, and trial counsel should have pursued it.

State v. Fields*, 553 P.3d 71 (Wash. App. 2024). In case where appellant was convicted of raping his wife while she slept and was unable to consent, trial counsel was ineffective in agreeing that statements that were made during joint-counseling sessions with a licensed marriage and family therapist, Stenger, were not subject to privilege or the privilege had been waived. The State had filed a motion pretrial to introduce testimony from Stenger, arguing that the sessions were not privileged under a state statute and, alternatively, that appellant had consented to use the records in a prior family law case, waiving any privilege. The defense initially responded that appellant had not waived the privilege and that the privilege prevented Stenger from testifying at trial. The State countered that because the defense had requested and subpoenaed Stenger for records regarding the wife's treatment, appellant had waived the privilege. The State presented no evidence, however, that appellant had actually done so. After conferring with appellant, defense counsel conceded that the statements were not privileged. Counsel had not represented appellant in the family law case but he concluded that the fact that he possessed the records indicated they were in the public sphere. He then went on to state his belief that one party could waive the privilege, an argument that had not been made by the State and was in fact contrary to law. Trial counsel was deficient in conceding that appellant waived the privilege where the State never provided any evidence supporting the assertion of waiver and in failing to research whether one party to the privilege could unilaterally waive it. The State contended on appeal that trial counsel made a strategic decision to waive the privilege in order to bring in testimony from Stenger that would impeach the wife and support the defense theory that the charges were brought in order to humiliate appellant. The appellate court was “not persuaded that agreeing to the admission of the only incriminating statement his client made through an independent third party was a legitimate strategic and tactical way defense counsel could introduce some impeaching evidence against the accuser.” Rather, the appellate court found that trial counsel’s “after-the-fact argument to admit more records was an attempt to salvage what he mistakenly thought was a lost cause in trying to keep [appellant’s] statements in the joint-counseling sessions excluded.” And even without Stenger’s testimony, trial counsel could have pointed out the wife’s delay in reporting the rape allegations. As to prejudice, without Stenger’s testimony about admissions by appellant, “the jury would have been left with what was essentially a ‘he said, she said’ case” hinging entirely upon the credibility of appellant and his wife. There is a reasonable probability that, but for the counsel’s deficient performance, the outcome of the proceedings would have been different.

State v. Nelson, 550 P.3d 495 (Utah App.), petition for cert. granted, 561 P.3d 688 (Utah 2024). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion for directed verdict on charge that appellant failed to stop on command of a law enforcement officer. Appellant and friends were kayaking on a river without life jackets in violation of state law. The charge came as a result of appellant failing to initially comply with orders by the ranger to exit the river. An element of the crime was an intent to avoid arrest. But the evidence showed that appellant and his companions were seeking to evade receiving a ticket. Thus, trial counsel was deficient in failing to move for a directed verdict at the close of the prosecution’s case and appellant suffered prejudice.

State v. Uptain, 541 P.3d 310 (Utah App. 2023), petition for cert granted, 558 P.3d 87 (Utah 2024). In home invasion/assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress the confessions made by appellant during an interrogation occurring while appellant was in custody on unrelated drug charges. After the crime at issue took place, police suspected appellant but had no specific evidence implicating him. Appellant was arrested on outstanding warrants that had no connection to the home invasion. A week or so later, appellant was brought from his cell to the booking area of the jail where a local drug task force agent, with another officer present, interviewed appellant. The agent was aware of the home invasion and that appellant lived in close proximity to the victim, Vicky. The agent informed appellant that they were seeking his assistance in investigating a serious drug problem in the area. Appellant agreed to help. Among other things, they talked about appellant’s plans for pursuing drug treatment when he got out of jail and how he might assist the agent in addressing the drug problem in the area. After receiving a call, the agent pivoted to asking whether appellant knew Vicky. Appellant responded that he did, that he regretted “it,” that he knew he need help, and that he had been waiting for the officers to ask about it. Appellant was then provided Miranda warnings which he waived prior to a confession. The primary evidence against appellant at trial was his jail statements which counsel did not seek to suppress. In assessing the ineffectiveness claim, it is first found that appellant was in custody for purposes of Miranda. Most importantly, in contrast to Howes v. Fields, 565 U.S. 499 (2012), appellant was not informed that he was free to decline to answer questions or end the questioning prior to the Miranda warnings. The pre-Miranda statements were therefore inadmissible, as were the post-Miranda statements given that appellant’s “rights had already been violated to such an extent that they could not be restored by [the agent’s] late-in-time effort.” The fact that the record did not include evidence concerning trial counsel’s actual decision-making process did not foreclose a finding of deficient performance. The known circumstances of the police interview provided a “fulsome record replete with facts that objectively establish Counsel’s deficient performance.” The court declined “the State’s invitation to require positive evidence of Counsel’s decision-making process” as it is “at a loss to think of (1) anything that Counsel could say about his decision-making process or (2) additional facts that he knew about that would justify his choice not to file a motion to suppress in a situation involving a Miranda violation such as this one.” Prejudice was easily established given that the statements by appellant comprised the sole evidence of his guilt.

2023: State v. Tingle, 2023 WL 4247358 (Del. Superior Ct. June 28, 2023)(not reported in Atl. Reporter). Defendant’s conviction for Possession of a Firearm by a Person Prohibited (PFBPP) is vacated due to trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to prevent the prosecution from expressly referencing defendant’s prior conviction for Possession of a Firearm During the Commission of a Felony (PFDCF) on cross-examination of defendant. (Defendant had been charged with PFDCF in this case but was found not guilty of the charge.) Defense counsel did object during the cross-examination but the objection was found to have been waived by defense counsel’s failure to raise the issue when the admissibility of the prior convictions was considered pretrial. Because defendant’s prior conviction was the same, or substantially similar to, the pending charges of PFDCF and PFBPP, “[a] reasonably competent attorney would have made a timely objection and argument concerning the PFDCF conviction during the hearing before the jury entered the courtroom.” In the case at hand, there was no evidence that defendant actually possessed the firearm. Thus, the prosecution had to rely on a theory of constructive possession in order to convict defendant of PFBPP. Although the jury did not convict defendant of the PFDCF charge, mentioning the prior PFDCF conviction was likely to have a prejudicial effect upon the jury when convicting the defendant of PFBPP.

State v. Garner*, 2023 WL 3561414 (Ohio App. May 19, 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds the charge of failure to comply with an order or signal of police officer. When the limitations period is properly calculated, considering defendant’s time in jail, a tolling period for a defense requested pretrial conference, and holidays, it is shown that defendant was brought to trial one day after expiration of the applicable limitations period. “Under these circumstances, we find that trial counsel acted deficiently when he failed to make a motion, at or prior to trial, for dismissal of the failure to comply charge due to the speedy trial violation. The prejudice to [defendant] is apparent.”

State v. Lauer*, 2023 WL 2728418 (Ohio App. March 31, 2023). In criminal mischief case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for an acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s case-in-chief on the ground that defendant had not been identified as the person who committed the charged offense. The sole witness presented by the prosecution was a police officer who had responded to the scene of the alleged offense. During his testimony, the deputy described interactions he had with the victim and “Mr. Lauer” (with no reference to Mr. Lauer’s first name). At no point did the deputy identify Mr. Lauer as the defendant present in the courtroom. Nor did the prosecution present other evidence establishing defendant’s identity as the person who actually committed the offense. At most, the State established in its case-in-chief that defendant shared the same last name as that of the alleged offender, which was insufficient to prove identity. Trial counsel’s deficient performance in failing to move for acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s case-in-chief was prejudicial as there is a reasonable probability that the trial court would have granted the motion.

State v. Uptain*, 541 P.3d 310 (Utah App. 2023), cert. petitions granted, 558 P.3d 87 (Utah Sept. 26, 2024). In home invasion/assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress the confessions made by defendant to officers who questioned defendant, initially without Miranda warnings, while defendant was incarcerated on other charges. In finding that defendant was “in custody” for purposes of Miranda, it is noted that: (1) defendant was taken from his cell to be interviewed in a different room in the booking area; (2) defendant was alone in that room with two detectives and isolated from his peers in the general population; and (3) defendant was not told he was free to decline answering the questions nor to end the questioning prior to when he had already begun to confess to the home invasion. Both the pre-Miranda and post-Miranda statements were subject to suppression. “To allow [defendant’s] post-Miranda statements into evidence would constitute an end run around the warning requirement and do violence to the privilege against self-incrimination.” Although the record did not include an explanation from trial counsel concerning the failure to move to suppress the statements, it was “a fulsome record replete with facts that objectively establish Counsel’s deficient performance.” No “positive evidence” of trial counsel’s decision-making process was required. “Given the facts in the record, we have no trouble concluding that any reasonable attorney would have filed a motion to suppress a confession that was obtained absent the fundamental protection afforded by Miranda warnings.” Prejudice is established as there was no evidence outside of the confession tying defendant to the crime. (Defendant had been the subject of the interview by police simply because he was a known drug addict who had lived nearby where the crime was committed.)

Reese v. State*, 894 S.E.2d 295 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was charged with lynching and murder, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to petitioner wearing shackles on her hands and feet throughout her trial. The post-conviction court had denied relief based on lack of prejudice. First, the post-conviction court found no reason to believe that the jury saw the shackles other than when petitioner walked to and from the witness stand. Second, the co-defendant’s counsel referenced his client’s handcuffs during opening statement to elicit sympathy for his client, which was likely to also elicit sympathy for petitioner. Third, the abundant evidence placing petitioner at the scene of the crime rendered the shackles harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. In reversing the post-conviction court, the appellate court found: (1) it was unclear from the record whether the jury could view petitioner's shackles at other times during the trial; (2) the charges in this case stemmed from petitioner's allegedly violent conduct and "[t]he shackles could have suggested the court was concerned she would experience a violent outburst, or more problematically, their appearance after opening statements [when the jury first observed them on petitioner] could imply [petitioner] exhibited some conduct between opening statements and the beginning of testimony that necessitated shackling"; and (3) while the evidence was uncontroverted that petitioner confronted the victim, the extent and severity of her conduct was in dispute. On this record, petitioner established prejudice from counsel's deficient performance.

Ryals v. State*, 886 S.E.2d 239 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was convicted of operating a motor vehicle in violation of Habitual Traffic Offender Act, defense counsel was ineffective for not objecting to petitioner proceeding to trial dressed in prison attire and for not requesting a continuance to provide proper clothing to petitioner. "Balancing the impact of [petitioner's] forced appearance at his trial in prison clothing visible to the jury against the strength of the State's evidence against him, there is a reasonable probability that, but for trial counsel's failure to object to his appearance at this trial in prison clothing, the result of the proceeding would have been different."

People v. Otto*, 18 N.W.3d 336 (Mich. App. 2023). In case of reckless driving causing death, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss the charges based on the prosecution's novel, expansive reading of the statute at issue that criminalized defendant's decision to drive a vehicle that was not appropriately maintained, thereby creating the risk of potential mechanical failure. (Defendant's brakes failed, leading to the accident that caused a child's death.) Applying statutory interpretation, the court concludes that the Legislature had not criminalized defendant's conduct and, therefore, trial counsel was deficient for failing to move to quash or dismiss the reckless-driving-causing-death charge. Prejudice is established because such a motion would have or should have been successful.

State v. Tripplett*, 232 N.E.3d 304 (Ohio App. 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to merge two of the counts appellant was convicted of -- felonious assault for causing serious physical harm, and felonious assault for causing physical harm by means of a deadly weapon -- where both counts were based on appellant hitting his sister in the mouth with a bottle. Prejudice is established as "[t]here are consequences for each felony conviction a defendant receives; the collateral consequences touch just about every facet of that felon's life -- from his or her ability to secure and maintain housing and employment, opportunities to seal or expunge convictions, ability to receive government assistance, and the right to vote or ability to own a firearm."

Ingalls v. State*, 213 N.E.3d 544 (Ind. App. 2023). In misdemeanor criminal mischief case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to submit a timely request for a jury trial pursuant to petitioner's request, and appellate counsel was ineffective in missing the filing deadline for the appeal, resulting in its dismissal. At petitioner's initial hearing, the case was set for a bench trial. After petitioner expressed his desire for a speedy jury trial, the trial court responded that petitioner's newly appointed counsel would have to file a motion making such a request. This attorney, however, quickly withdrew due to a conflict. Successor counsel did not learn of petitioner's desire for a jury trial until after the filing deadline had passed. His motion was denied as untimely. The record suggested that both initial and successor counsel failed to file the jury trial request because they were unaware that petitioner wanted a jury trial. But it was the inaction by both of his trial attorneys that prompted such ignorance. There was no evidence that initial counsel contacted petitioner about his withdrawal or the appointment of successor counsel. And successor counsel waited more than three weeks after his appointment and two weeks after his appearance to contact petitioner for the first time. By such time, the deadline for filing the jury request had passed. "The failure of trial counsel to discuss [petitioner's] constitutional right to a jury trial or to act to preserve that right before the Criminal Rule 22 deadline constituted deficient performance." Because the deficient performance resulted in the loss of a fundamental right, no showing of prejudice is required. Regarding appellate counsel's clearly deficient performance, "the error was particularly prejudicial here, where the appeal would have revealed that [petitioner] had not properly waived his fundamental right to a jury trial."

2022: State v. Demby, 2022 WL 1538030 (Del. Super. April 29, 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion to suppress the evidence that was obtained by the police during a pat-down search that led to convictions for a number of crimes related to the loaded firearm and heroin found on petitioner's person. The search in this case came after the police received an anonymous tip about drugs being sold from a car that matched the vehicle petitioner was a passenger in. The responding officers first requested the identification of the occupants of the car which was taken by one officer to run checks. When petitioner asked why the officer was checking them, he was informed that the officers were investigating a report of drug dealing. Petitioner and the two other occupants of the car were told to exit the vehicle after the driver, in response to a question about drugs in the vehicle, pointed to a marijuana cigarette and then agreed to a search of the car. Petitioner informed the officer that he was not giving permission to the ensuing pat-down. On this record, trial counsel should have moved to suppress the evidence found on petitioner based on the absence of the reasonable articulable suspicion necessary to conduct an investigatory stop. The anonymous tip lacked an indicia of reliability and was unsupported by independent police corroboration of present or predicted future criminal activity. Nor was this simply a consensual encounter. "The retention and removal of his identification, after [petitioner] was told police were conducting a criminal investigation and when one officer remained next to the car, converted the encounter into a seizure. Therefore, at the moment Officer Dmeza returned to his marked vehicle with [petitioner's] license after communicating an intent on investigating a 911 call concerning drug sales, [petitioner] was detained. This detention constituted a seizure of the vehicle's occupants." And because this was a seizure, reasonable articulable suspicion was required to justify an investigatory stop. Competent counsel would have filed a motion to suppress based on this record and it would have been granted. Because the prosecution would have been compelled to dismiss the charges had the evidence been suppressed, prejudice is established.

People v. Hartfield*, 208 N.E.3d 1223 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). In case involving several charges related to the years long sexual abuse by defendant of his daughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek discharge of the aggravated criminal sexual assault charge (count IV) on statute of limitations grounds. The language used in the indictment, specifying the victim's pregnancy by defendant as the bodily harm referenced in the count, made the pregnancy the starting point for the limitation period even though the State alleged a continuing course of conduct in the preface of the indictment and defendant continued to sexually assault his daughter after the birth of their child. Faced with a pretrial motion to dismiss the indictment on count IV as time-barred, it is highly unlikely the State would have been able to amend or otherwise revive this charge. Under the facts presented, defendant has shown prejudice as required by Strickland.

People v. McClendon*, 205 N.E.3d 853 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective in armed habitual criminal case for failing to argue that police obtained the evidence against him as a result of an illegal seizure where defendant halted his movements in accordance with orders from officers who had drawn weapons pointing at him but lacked a reasonable basis to believe that defendant had committed any crime. The record established that defendant abandoned the gun that was the basis for the charge in response to the illegal seizure, and therefore, if his attorney had argued the issue, the trial court should have suppressed the gun as well as testimony about statements made by defendant admitting possession of the gun.

People v. Redmon*, 196 N.E.3d 1150 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Defendant was entitled to reversal of her conviction for the predatory criminal sexual assault of a child because of trial counsel's deficient performance in failing to file a motion to dismiss on statutory speedy trial grounds. (After a second conviction was reversed for other reasons, the impact of trial counsel's error was considered as part of the reason for finding that defendant was denied a fair trial as to the remaining conviction.)

Baumholser v. State*, 186 N.E.3d 684 (Ind. Ct. App.), transfer denied, 190 N.E.3d 922 (Ind. 2022). In case involving charges of sexual molestation of a child, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss some of the charges on statute of limitations grounds in light of the victim's testimony about when the incidents occurred. Trial counsel could not reasonably have believed that the limitations period was tolled given that the victim expressly denied that defendant had instructed her not to tell anyone and her general fear of defendant did not constitute the fraudulent concealment necessary for tolling. Because the charges would have been dismissed had counsel made the appropriate motion, prejudice is established.

State v. Beames*, 511 P.3d 1226 (Utah App. 2022). In case involving drug-related charges, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek suppression of evidence located as a result of a drug-sniffing dog's search of defendant's vehicle. In order to obtain relief on the claim of ineffectiveness for failure to file a suppression motion, defendant had to establish that the motion was "meritorious." This did not mandate proof that the motion was necessarily guaranteed to succeed, but rather that there was a likelihood it would have been granted. Such a showing was made here. First, there was no probable cause for the dog's initial entry into the car, which was instinctual rather than directed. No probable cause was developed during that first entry that would have supported the second entry of the dog into the vehicle that was orchestrated by its handler. Because the drugs found by the dog supplied the only tangible evidence of defendant's guilt, there could be no discernable tactical reason for trial counsel to not to seek suppression of the evidence. That defendant's boyfriend, who was also in the vehicle, was on parole did not provide a justification for trial counsel's inaction. At the time of the search, the boyfriend's parole status was unknown to the officers. "Based on the objective facts existing at the time of the search, the search could not therefore be justified on the post hoc rationalization that Boyfriend was a parolee." Thus, reasonable counsel would not have forgone a motion to suppress on that basis. Prejudice is established; had trial counsel filed a motion to suppress, there is a reasonable likelihood that the motion would have been granted and there would have been a different outcome in this case.

Tyler v. State*, 876 S.E.2d 132 (S.C. App. 2022). In case where defendant was charged with second-degree sexual exploitation of a minor, criminal solicitation of a minor, contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and disseminating harmful material to a minor, counsel was ineffective for failing to move to sever the charge for second-degree sexual exploitation of a minor. Evidence included a photo of the child and other provocative images on the defendant's computer, and this would only have been admissible for the exploitation charge. The defendant was prejudiced because these circumstances created the risk that the jury would convict him on one set of charges based on evidence admissible only as to the other.

2021: Williams v. State, 874 S.E.2d 478 (Ga. App. 2021). Co-defendants in drug-related case were entitled to new trials due to their respective attorneys' failures to move to suppress the drugs found during an unconstitutional search of the car the co-defendants were in. The car had been pulled over for a traffic stop after a police officer observed the car cross slightly into the center turn lane and the officer believed the driver might be impaired. During the stop, the officer smelled alcohol and the driver explained that the passenger had a mixed drink. After observing a small open liquor bottle in the passenger door cup holder, the officer had the co-defendants exit the vehicle in order to search for additional open containers. The officer testified that a plastic bag with white powder was visible and sticking out of a work glove when he opened the center console. (The powder was later identified as cocaine.) The body camera footage of the search, however, established that this testimony was false, and that instead, the officer had to remove the glove from the console and shift the position of the glove opening in order to look inside the glove before being able to see the bag of cocaine. "As established by the video of the search, as soon as the officer opened the center console it was apparent that no open containers of alcohol were therein because it was stuffed full of random items, and there was no probable cause for the officer to pull the glove from the console and investigate therein because the glove would not have contained an open container of alcohol." Because the cocaine would have been suppressed had trial counsel made the appropriate motions, the co-defendants were denied the effective assistance of counsel.

Absher v. State*, 162 N.E.3d 1141 (Ind. Ct. App. 2021). In case involving three counts of child molestation, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an untimely amendment to the charging information that added two of the counts. Although a decision by the state supreme court applying the relevant statute to charges similar to those at issue here post-dated the trial, trial counsel was nevertheless deficient in failing to object to the amendment based on the clear language of the statute and case law differentiating permissible amendments in form from impermissible substantive amendments. Prejudice is found because relief would have been granted on petitioner's appeal had the error been preserved. This is established by the appellate court's direct appeal decision which found that although the trial court erred in permitting the amendment, the claim of error was unpreserved.

People v. Hughes*, 981 N.W.2d 182 (Mich. App. 2021). On remand from the state supreme court, finding that trial counsel was ineffective in armed robbery prosecution by failing to object on Fourth Amendment grounds to evidence recovered from a search of defendant's cell phone. Although an earlier data extraction had been authorized by a warrant, that warrant was for evidence related to a separate drug-trafficking charge. Trial counsel was not shielded from a finding of deficient performance under the theory that counsel is not required to anticipate future developments of the law. While the state supreme court had decided an issue of first impression prior to the remand, i.e., the constitutionality of the use of the cell phone data in the robbery prosecution, the decision was based on two fundamental sources of relevant law: (a) the Fourth Amendment's "particularity" requirement, which limits an officer's discretion when conducting a search pursuant to a warrant and (b) existing precedent recognizing the extensive privacy interests in cellular data.

Thus, while there was no authority directly addressing the Fourth Amendment question at issue in this case, there were well-established broader principles to draw from and caselaw to analogize—as defendant's appointed appellate counsel did in a timely submitted brief to this Court and as attorneys generally do on a regular basis. Because there was existing precedent that would have strongly supported a motion to suppress, trial counsel's failure to raise the Fourth Amendment challenge cannot be excused for not foreseeing a change in the law.

Prejudice is established by the fact that there were two hung juries on the robbery charge and at the third trial, which resulted in conviction, the prosecutor relied heavily on the cell phone data in opening and closing argument.

People v. Ceasor*, 954 N.W.2d 830 (Mich. 2021). In 2005 shaken baby prosecution, conviction vacated summarily on ineffective assistance of counsel claim where trial counsel failed to request public funds for an expert based on a mistaken belief that the defendant did not qualify for those funds because he had retained counsel. Prejudice is found for the reasons set forth by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Ceasor v. Ocwieja, 655 F. Appx. 263, 286 (6th Cir. 2016): "[N]o amount of cross-examination or lay witness testimony could have rebutted [the prosecution expert's] medical opinions that these injuries were medically consistent with abuse and inconsistent with an accidental fall. Thus, we acknowledge, as the Ackley court did, that in many [shaken baby syndrome] cases 'where there is no victim who can provide an account, no eyewitness, no corroborative physical evidence and no apparent motive to [harm], the expert is the case.'", quoting People v. Ackley, 497 Mich. 381, 397, 870 N.W.2d 858 (2015) (quotation marks and citation omitted).

Burford v. State*, 320 So.3d 502 (Miss. 2021). Defendant's conviction for burglary of a dwelling is reversed where the record on direct appeal showed that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to timely move to suppress defendant's confessions. The video of defendant's confession showed that a peace officer made several threats and promises to her. (There were offers of a lower bond, threats of a higher bond, threats that defendant's kids would be taken away forever and a threat that she would have to serve 25 years in prison.) Indeed, the officer acknowledged during his trial testimony that he had made the threats and promises in an effort to induce defendant's confession. But trial counsel did not object to admission of the confessions pretrial and only argued that the video confession was involuntary after the prosecution sought to admit the inculpatory portion of the video at trial, after the signed confession had already been admitted. "Under the circumstances, defense counsel rendered deficient performance by failing to make a timely motion to suppress the video confession and a subsequent written confession. [Defendant] was prejudiced because a reasonable probability existed that the trial court would have granted a timely motion to suppress the confessions and because the confessions were the primary evidence of [defendant's] guilt of burglary of a dwelling." (Other than the confessions, the State's only evidence of defendant's guilt of burglary was that stolen items were found at the residence she shared with her boyfriend and in a car registered to her relative.) That defendant's trial testimony had inculpatory elements did not defeat the prejudice finding. "Because the thrust of [defendant's] trial testimony was to provide an explanation of what she had said in her confessions, it is reasonably probable that, but for the confessions, [defendant] would not have elected to incriminate herself by testifying."

State v. Tipton*, 497 P.3d 610 (Mt. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge a count of indecent exposure to a minor where the statute upon which the charge was based did not go into effect until after one of the two incidents alleged in the count occurred. Under the correct statute, a ten-year maximum sentence was allowed. As charged, however, defendant was subjected to a maximum sentence of 100 years. "There is no plausible justification for an attorney to allow the ex post facto application of a sentence that places his client in jeopardy of a sentence that is ten times the length of the sentence to which he would otherwise be subjected." Although the jury might have convicted defendant of the count based on the incident that was alleged to have occurred after the new statute went into effect, it was impossible to determine what the jury actually found. Notably, the State spent much of the six days of trial establishing the events surrounding the earlier incident, the jury was instructed that either of the two incidents sufficed for conviction on the count, and, in its closing, the State argued to the jury that if it found that defendant committed only one of the acts that formed the basis for the count, "then it's still guilty." In essence, "[t]he State 'encouraged the jury to consider the very evidence that it now contends could not have contributed to the jury's verdict.'" Prejudice is established.

2020: Booker v. State, 301 So.3d 432 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). In drug possession case, trial counsel was ineffective, as shown on the face of the record, for neglecting to move to suppress the fentanyl found in defendant's backpack following his illegal arrest and the search incident to that arrest. Defendant was arrested for being present in a public park after closing time. The ordinance violation was a fineable offense, not one permitting an arrest. All that state law permitted was detention for the limited purpose of issuing a ticket or summons. In light of existing precedent at the time of trial establishing the illegality of the arrest, trial counsel's neglect in failing to file a motion to suppress amounts to deficient performance. Prejudice is established as the only evidence supporting the charge of possession of a controlled substance is the contraband found in defendant's backpack.

State v. Heath*, 843 S.E.2d 801 (Ga. 2020). In case involving multiple felony charges following a collision between defendant's vehicle and another car after defendant ran a stop sign, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to demur to the fatally defective felony counts in the indictment. The State conceded that had trial counsel properly raised a general demurrer after jeopardy attached, the felony charges would have been dismissed, and that counsel's failure to do so resulted in defendant's convictions and incarceration for crimes set forth in a largely void indictment. The State argued, however, that defendant was not prejudiced because she received sufficient notice of the facts underlying the charges such that she could mount a defense and because the State presented evidence from which the jury found that defendant was guilty of the charges beyond a reasonable doubt. This analysis rested on the "faulty premise that it does not matter if the indictment is invalid in substance so long as the defendant had sufficient notice of the charges. But the lack of notice of the charges or allegations goes to the form of the indictment, which is challenged by a special demurrer, rather than a general demurrer." The State also argued that there was no prejudice because had a general demurrer been granted, the State would have corrected its error and re-indicted defendant with a reasonable probability that defendant would again be convicted. This argument presumed that the general demurrer was raised prior to Double Jeopardy attaching. (A general demurrer may be raised any time, unlike a special demurrer that is waived if not brought before trial.) But setting aside the potential Double Jeopardy issue, "the State's argument for no prejudice suffers from a fundamental flaw: presuming that upon re-indictment, [defendant] would have been convicted after a second trial. However, even assuming that the State could have re-indicted, the Strickland inquiry does not consider the likelihood of a future outcome at a different trial, but rather whether there is a reasonable probability that the result of this trial would have been different."

Pauley v. State*, 842 S.E.2d 499 (Ga. App. 2020). In case involving charges of numerous crimes against three separate women, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to timely argue that four of the five counts in the indictment relating to victim M. W. were barred by the applicable statute of limitation.

People v. Bloxton*, 178 N.E.3d 766 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). In case where defendant was convicted of being a felon in possession of a gun and possession of a defaced firearm, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue when seeking suppression of the evidence that defendant's arrest was illegal because, at the time of arrest, police were unaware of defendant's criminal history. Defendant was outside in a group of people, some of whom were drinking from clear plastic cups. Police approached the group to investigate whether alcohol was being consumed in public. Defendant, who did not have a cup, walked away but was followed by one of the officers who observed a bulge in defendant's front pocket that could have been a gun. Defendant did not comply with the officer's order to stop as the officer followed him. According to the officer, defendant ultimately reached into his pocket, exposing the handle of a gun, and attempted to pull it from his pants. It was after this that defendant was arrested. Trial counsel filed a motion to suppress evidence, arguing the police obtained the weapon through an unlawful search and seizure because (i) defendant was neither involved nor believed to have been involved in the commission of a crime at the time of his arrest and (ii) the police had no reasonable suspicion that he was armed or dangerous. Trial counsel failed to argue, however, that defendant's possession of the weapon alone did not give the police probable cause to arrest because they did not know at the time whether he was legally permitted to carry it.. Had the arrest been quashed, evidence the police obtained, namely the gun and defendant's criminal record, would have been suppressed and the State could not have proven him guilty. No reasonable strategy would justify counsel failing to assert the strongest argument for suppression.

South Euclid v. Schutt*, 154 N.E.3d 1184 (Ohio App. 2020). In misdemeanor theft case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss the charge on speedy trial grounds. Although there may well have been scheduling conflicts or other unavoidable factors that reasonably necessitated the significant delay in the trial, the trial court was required to expressly enumerate the reasons justifying the delay or otherwise provide enough information in the record to affirmatively demonstrate the reasonableness of the continuance. This was not done. Defendant was prejudiced by defense counsel's failure to seek dismissal of the charge.

State v. Brandt*, 460 P.3d 427 (Mt. 2020). Where defendant was charged with multiple offenses related to defendant's Ponzi scheme that defrauded mostly elderly investors, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to defendant's conviction and sentencing for the multiple offenses of embezzlement and fraudulent practices as charged in this case. The charged embezzlement was subsumed in the charged offense of fraudulent practices. Prejudice is shown because, without the error, defendant would have been convicted and sentenced for five rather than six offenses.

McCullough v. State*, 2020 WL 1527237 (Tenn. Crim. App. March 31, 2020). Petitioner received ineffective assistance with regard to the appropriate classification of his criminal littering conviction where the prosecution failed to present evidence that the weight of the item discarded by petitioner was sufficient for the charged crime rather than a lesser one. Post-conviction relief is granted even though the specific claim was not raised in the post-conviction petition. The claim was arguably raised below by the general ineffectiveness allegation and petitioner's testimony at the hearing specifically complained about trial counsel's failure to challenge the littering charge. And even though trial counsel was not asked about her omission during the post-conviction hearing, deficient performance is nevertheless found given the absence of any plausible tactical basis for her inaction.

Boatwright v. State*, 2020 WL 1166267 (Tenn. Crim. App. March 10, 2020). In home invasion case with multiple charges, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence for the especially aggravated robbery count based upon the prosecution's failure to prove that the use of force, which resulted in serious bodily injury, occurred before the taking was complete. Although the defense theory at the trial focused on petitioner's identity, "nothing prevented the defense from challenging the sufficiency of the convicting evidence as a matter of law after the State had rested its case-in-chief in a motion for a judgment of acquittal, after the trial in a motion for a new trial, and on appeal, if necessary." Existing law at the time of trial supported the challenge. Trial counsel was also deficient in failing to challenge the sufficiency of evidence supporting the aggravated robbery count related to a guest in the invaded home. Trial counsel's omission was not premised on strategy but rather on the belief that the guest had constructive possession of the items taken because she was inside the apartment, which was an inaccurate statement of the law.

2019: Madison v. State, 278 So.3d 921 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner was sentenced to twelve years in prison after accepting trial counsel’s advice to plead no contest to violating probation, trial counsel was found ineffective in failing to file a motion to suppress. In 2008, petitioner had pled no contest to one count of robbery with a firearm, three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm and one count of possession of a firearm by a minor in exchange for adjudication of guilt being withheld and a youthful offender sentence of six years of probation. Approximately two years later, petitioner was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon (a knife), resisting an officer without violence, and carrying a simulated firearm (pellet gun). The new charges and several technical violations resulted in the violation of his probation. The circumstances of the arrest were as follows. The arresting officer was dispatched to investigate a complaint of a black male, wearing a black shirt and black pants, with a gun in a high crime neighborhood. The officer observed petitioner, who fit the description, about two blocks from the described location. After exiting his patrol car, the officer drew his firearm and told petitioner to stop. In response to the officer asking if he had any weapons, petitioner admitted that he had a kitchen knife in his pocket. The officer retrieved a three-to-four-inch paring knife and arrested petitioner for carrying a concealed weapon. During the search of handcuffed petitioner, the officer discovered that petitioner had a pellet gun, gloves and a nylon skull cap in his possession. At that point, petitioner pulled away from the officer and ran, resulting in petitioner being tasered and taken into custody. During post-conviction proceedings, the officer confirmed that during his encounter with petitioner, petitioner was not free to leave. The officer also admitted that he never met with the complainant and did not know if the 911 caller provided the dispatcher with any identifying information. Defense counsel testified, inter alia, that she didn’t believe a suppression motion was viable on the facts of this case and that even if she had filed a motion to suppress, it would have been dispositive only as to the new law violations and not the technical violations, and that petitioner would still have lost the six-year youthful offender cap. The appellate court concludes, however, that there is a reasonable probability a suppression motion would have been granted had defense counsel filed one. “The anonymous 911 call, combined with [petitioner’s] mere presence in the general location, did not constitute reasonable suspicion to justify a stop at gunpoint.” Further, the totality of circumstances supports a finding of prejudice.

First, [petitioner] had a viable motion to suppress the evidence relating to all of the substantive new law violations against him. ... Second, at the time that [petitioner] entered the plea, he knew that he faced a maximum life sentence in prison, but the evidence presented at the evidentiary hearing shows there was a reasonable probability that the motion to suppress would have been granted and the evidence the State needed to prove the substantive violations would have been suppressed. If the three new law violations were dismissed, only the technical violations would have remained. The maximum sentence [petitioner] could have received as a youthful offender for the technical violations under section 958.14, Florida Statutes (2010), was six years in prison. [Footnote omitted.] ... Instead, [defense counsel] counseled [petitioner] to plea to all the probation violations in exchange for a twelve-year prison sentence, double what he would have faced had the motion to suppress been granted.

Capital Case*

Based on the totality of the circumstances surrounding [petitioner's] plea, there is an objectively reasonable probability that if he had known that he had a dispositive motion to suppress his substantive violations, he would not have entered a plea.

Squire v. State*, 278 So.3d 153 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective on the face of the appellate record for failing to move for a judgment of acquittal on the issue of whether appellant's discharge of a firearm caused great bodily injury to the victim. The evidence showed that appellant and his brother had fired multiple shots at the victim, who took off and ran away. The victim suffered two gunshots in each leg. A bullet recovered from one of the victim's legs was determined to have come from a revolver. A revolver found at the home shared by appellant and his brother had DNA linking the brother to the gun. Two other firearms were found at the home, a 40-caliber semiautomatic pistol and a 22-caliber semiautomatic pistol, although neither had DNA linking them to appellant. A shell casing found at the scene of the shooting had been fired by the 40-caliber semiautomatic pistol found in appellant's home. Appellant was convicted of attempted first-degree murder and the jury made specific findings that appellant actually possessed a firearm, actually discharged a firearm, and actually inflicted great bodily harm as a result of discharging the firearm. Following the second phase of trial, the jury also found appellant guilty of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. His ultimate sentence was negatively impacted by the great bodily harm finding because that implicated the provisions of Florida's 10/20/Life statute and mandated a 25-year mandatory minimum sentence. On appeal, appellant conceded that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that he actually possessed a firearm and discharged it. He contended, however, that there was insufficient evidence to prove that his personal discharge of the firearm actually caused great bodily harm to the victim. The appellate court agreed and found trial counsel deficient for failing to preserve the sufficiency of evidence issue. "There was no strategic reason for defense counsel to fail to move for a judgment of acquittal on this issue. Contrary to the State's argument that a motion for judgment of acquittal on this issue would have been inconsistent with appellant's misidentification defense, a motion for judgment of acquittal on this issue would not have precluded defense counsel from arguing to the jury that appellant was misidentified as one of the shooters." Prejudice was indisputable on this record. The case was remanded for the trial court to strike the 25-year mandatory minimum sentence and replace it with the 20-year mandatory minimum sentence for discharging a firearm.

State v. Ellis*, 273 So.3d 1126 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of two counts of misdemeanor battery and one count of false imprisonment, all as lesser-included offenses of aggravated battery on a pregnant victim, domestic battery by strangulation, and kidnapping, a grant of post-conviction relief is affirmed on claims that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to file a pretrial motion to dismiss based upon pre-arrest delay, and for failing to conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. The alleged criminal incidents occurred May 13, 2011. Although the alleged victim made a police report two days after that, petitioner was not arrested until a year later. The sole witness against petitioner was the alleged victim, with no physical or testimonial corroboration of her account of what occurred. The victim's report and later testimony disclosed numerous material inconsistencies and differing accounts of the alleged criminal incidents. Bank and drug store surveillance videos may have been able to corroborate or disprove some of the victim's descriptions of what occurred but were no longer available at the time petitioner was charged. And yet trial counsel did not file a motion to dismiss based upon the prejudice resulting from the prearrest delay

(loss of prospectively-exculpatory video recordings). The State offered no explanation for the charging delay. There was a reasonable probability that the case may have been dismissed based on that delay had defense counsel made a dismissal motion. “Under the test articulated in Rogers v. State, 511 So.2d 526, 531 (Fla. 1987), defense counsel’s failure to move for dismissal (based on the delay between the alleged commission of the crime and the defendant’s arrest), amounts to a due process violation.” Another lapse by defense counsel was the failure to investigate motel records. Had counsel done so, it would have been discovered that neither petitioner nor the victim was at the motel on the date of the criminal acts alleged to have happened there. It was also established that defense counsel did not investigate the victim’s alleged pregnancy or petitioner’s alibi that he was still at the drug treatment center on the day of the alleged incidents. “Considering the effects of these lapses on [petitioner’s] ability to impeach the credibility of the alleged victim (who was the sole witness to provide evidence against [petitioner] at trial), the postconviction court properly concluded that counsel’s deficient performance caused prejudice and that there exists a reasonable probability the result of the proceedings would have been different had the lapses not occurred.”

Mims v. State*, 823 S.E.2d 325 (Ga. 2019). In case where defendant was convicted of malice murder and other crimes related to a killing during an armed robbery and also of theft by bringing a stolen vehicle into the state, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to sever the theft charge from the murder-related counts. “There is no argument, much less a showing, that the theft offense and the murder-related offenses were parts of a single scheme or plan or that the offenses were of a similar character. The crimes were committed about a month apart and involved different victims in different states.” Although defendant’s possession of the stolen vehicle was relevant to establish the identity of the murderer. “the fact that the car was stolen or that [defendant] brought the stolen vehicle to Georgia from another state had no bearing on any of the murder-related offenses.” Because the joinder of the offenses was not authorized, trial counsel was therefore deficient for failing to move to sever the theft count. Regarding prejudice, there was overwhelming evidence of defendant’s guilt on the murder-related charges precluding relief on those convictions. Prejudice was found on the theft conviction as the evidence was weak: the victim described a white male as the thief and defendant is a black woman; and the evidence that defendant knew or should have known the vehicle was stolen was not overwhelming. Further, the evidence of defendant’s participation in a gruesome murder was very prejudicial to the jury’s consideration of the theft offense.

People v. Coulibaly*, 101 N.Y.S.3d 318 (N.Y. App. Div. 2019). Defendant was denied the effective assistance of counsel with regard to his speedy trial motion due to counsel’s miscalculation of the relevant time. Had counsel correctly calculated the time, defendant’s speedy trial claim would have been meritorious. Because counsel’s error denied defendant the relief of dismissal to which he was entitled, and constituted ineffective assistance, the court exercises its discretion to dismiss the indictment, rather than ordering further speedy trial proceedings with new counsel.

Mathews v. State*, 2019 WL 7212603 (Tenn. Crim. App. Dec. 27, 2019). In multiple homicide case where death penalty was sought but petitioner received LWOPP, post-conviction relief granted under Cronic standard due to trial counsel’s acts and omissions related to petitioner’s motion for new trial. The issues in the initial new trial motion “were skeletal in nature, without argument or citation to authority.” The motion for new trial proceedings were not pursued for over seven years, during which time trial counsel engaged in unethical behaviors related specially to the petitioner's representation. First, trial counsel met with the trial judge, who was presiding over the new trial motion as well as the pending trial of the co-defendant, and informed him of their belief that the co-defendant was innocent based on their investigation into the case. Second, they allowed counsel for the co-defendant access to an unredacted timeline that included petitioner's account of the crime which demonstrated both his guilt and his cruelty towards the victims. Although trial counsel sought return of the timeline, this was unsuccessful and trial counsel obtained their own legal representation as a result. The trial judge was aware of this document at the time he ultimately ruled on petitioner's new trial motion. The document had been the subject of considerable litigation at the co-defendant's post-trial proceedings which preceded a ruling on petitioner's new trial motion and during which one of petitioner's trial attorneys was called to testify. Petitioner was not informed of any of this during the pendency of the new trial motion. Once the proceedings on the new trial motion were reinitiated, the amended motion again presented skeletal issues lacking argument and citation to legal authority. And a hearing on the motion was waived by trial counsel.

Here, trial counsel entirely failed to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing in the post-trial phase, and there has been a denial of the Petitioner's Sixth Amendment rights that makes the adversary process itself presumptively unreliable. . . . We cannot speculate about what issues might have been raised in the Petitioner's motion for new trial had he had the effective assistance of conflict-free counsel.

Because the presumed prejudice standard of Cronic applies, we hold that the Petitioner is entitled to relief. However, the Petitioner's convictions remain intact. Trial counsels' deficiencies occurred post-trial. Upon remand, the Petitioner is permitted a delayed motion for a new trial and conflict-free counsel during the motion for new trial phase.

State v. Hawkins*, 150 N.E.3d 519 (Ohio Ct. App. 2019). Where appellant was convicted of several felony offenses stemming from a physical altercation with his girlfriend, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss the indictment on statute of limitations grounds. The incident occurred on March 20, 2011, with both parties offering very different descriptions of what happened. Although there was an immediate investigation by the police, no charges were filed against appellant for five years, several months short of the six-year statute of limitation for felony offenses. On the same day as appellant was indicted by a grand jury on eight felony counts, a summons was issued and sent to his residence with an arraignment date set for two weeks later, on December 16, 2016. According to a docket entry on December 18, 2016, appellant appeared not to have received the summons. There was no entry in the case docket for the next 15 months. On April 23, 2018, the entry stated that the December 16, 2016 arraignment was cancelled. An entry the following day stated appellant was arraigned. Apparently, he was arrested on an outstanding warrant sometime before April 24, 2018. Subsequently, appellant waived a jury trial and the trial court found him guilty of all eight counts. Although appellant asked defense counsel to file a motion to dismiss based on the delay in prosecution, defense counsel responded that the case law did not support such a motion. Thus, there appeared to be no tactical basis for not filing a dismissal motion. And such a motion may have been successful as the state bore the burden to show the prosecution was timely commenced. The appellate court's review of the record "shows there is a reasonable probability that the state may not be able to sustain its burden of showing that it exercised reasonable diligence in executing process of the indictment upon [appellant] and that he 'purposely avoided' prosecution." (The record indicated that the sole attempt to serve appellant with the summons was by sending it to his last known address, which was that of his ex-girlfriend. He had moved from that address after the incident to another location in the city and then moved to Georgia two years after that. Appellant asserted that he had been unaware of the criminal charges pending against him.) The remedy is a remand to the trial court to allow appellant the opportunity to file a motion to dismiss and present evidence for his claim of untimely prosecution.

People v. Utley*, 142 N.E.3d 352 (Ill. Ct. App. 2019). In case where appellant was charged with being an armed habitual criminal, with unlawful use of a weapon by a felon for his alleged possession of guns and ammunition, and with possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver for his alleged possession of cocaine and heroin, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion to sever the gun charges from the drug charges. In addition, trial counsel was also ineffective in withdrawing a motion to suppress appellant's statement to police. In order to prove the gun charges, the prosecution was required to introduce evidence of appellant's prior convictions for aggravated battery with a firearm and delivery of a controlled substance, neither of which would have been admissible to prove the possession of a controlled substance offense. Defense counsel's failure to move for severance constituted deficient performance as the appellate court could not discern any possible strategy for counsel's inaction. Given that appellant was facing a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole if he were to be convicted of the drug charge, "counsel was required to take some action to minimize the prejudice to [appellant] that would arise from the introduction of his prior convictions. Counsel here did not do so." Prejudice is also established. Appellant's defense was that the contraband found in the apartment his wife lived in, where he was arrested, did not belong to him and he only confessed because of threats made by the officers to charge his wife and send his children to child protective services. (He also claimed to have invoked his right to counsel which was disregarded.) "Because the jury heard that [appellant] had been previously convicted of aggravated battery with a firearm and unlawful delivery of a controlled substance, crimes that involved the same type items of contraband in this case, the jury may have inferred that the contraband at issue here also belonged to [appellant], rejecting the defense's version of events." And, notably, there were discrepancies in the prosecution's case against appellant "which may have been overlooked by the jury based on their knowledge of his prior criminal record." It was appellant's wife who directed the searching officers to the contraband found in two closets in her home. And only women's items were in the closet where the guns were located. Additionally, there were significant questions surrounding the circumstances of appellant's statement to police, discussed below. "Under the facts here, we find that [appellant] sufficiently showed prejudice arising from counsel's failure to move to sever the charges and that counsel's failure to do so was ineffective." Turning to motion to suppress, appellant offered agreement when defense counsel withdrew the motion and stated that he understood that he would not be able to refile it. The appellate court rejected respondent's argument that this exchange defeated an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. "Defendants are generally entitled to rely on the advice of counsel . . . and cannot be expected to object to all actions of counsel with which they disagree so as to preserve later potential claims of ineffective assistance." Based on the record in this case, the appellate court concluded that appellant rebutted the presumption that counsel's decision to withdraw the suppression motion was proper. No strategic basis could be found for the decision. And "[h]ad counsel not withdrawn the motion to suppress, there is a reasonable probability that it would have been granted." The appellate court found appellant's statement to be questionable because it contradicted the evidence and testimony provided by the officers at trial. In his statement, appellant claimed full responsibility for the contraband found in the closets and maintained that his wife knew nothing about the items. But testimony from the officers established that it was the wife who first directed them to the closet containing drugs and later to the closet containing the guns and ammunition. And while the officers denied threatening to charge appellant's wife, the testimony established that she was also brought to the police station, "which could cause a reasonable finder of fact to believe that the officers were either considering charging her or attempting to use her presence to induce [appellant] to confess."

There was also a question regarding the timing of [appellant's] signing of the typewritten statement. Specifically, both pages of the statement were signed at 1:49 p.m. by [appellant] and both officers. During [one officer's] testimony, he testified that [appellant] would not have signed both pages at the same time but, rather, they would have gone through each page separately. It is unlikely that the officers could have gone through both pages of the statement and had all three individuals sign each page in less than one minute. To the contrary, the time notation on each page of the statement would support [appellant's] claim that he was forced to sign the statement without reviewing, or being able to make changes to, it.

There is a reasonable probability that the suppression motion would have been granted if not withdrawn and a reasonable probability of a different outcome at trial without admission of appellant's statement.

2018: Twigg v. State, 254 So.3d 464 (Fla. Ct. App. 2018). In case involving, inter alia, a charge of battery on an emergency medical care provider, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a judgment of acquittal on that count. The alleged battery involved appellant spitting on a nurse when he was involuntarily hospitalized in an inpatient psychiatric unit. Because the nurse was not a registered nurse, and was not working through the hospital's emergency department, the nurse did not qualify as an emergency care provider. If counsel had moved for a judgment of acquittal, appellant would have been entitled to a reduction of the charge from a felony to a misdemeanor battery.

Woods v. State*, 242 So.3d 47 (Miss. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to file a post-trial motion on behalf of appellant. Appellant was convicted by a jury of second degree murder after being indicted on charges of first degree murder stemming from the shooting of his girlfriend's estranged husband, when the estranged husband showed up drunk at her house after having fired a shotgun into her house several weeks earlier and having been ordered to stay away from her and the home. The court sentenced appellant as a habitual offender to LWOP. On appeal, he argued, inter alia, that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to file any post-trial motion, thereby waiving his right to argue on appeal that the verdict was against the overwhelming weight of the evidence. When considering such a motion, the trial court acts as a thirteenth juror. Under its own precedent, the state supreme court determined that no strategic reason existed for trial counsel not to file a motion for new trial and argue that the verdict was contrary to the overwhelming weight of the evidence. In determining prejudice, the court described the standard for reviewing a lower court's denial of a new trial based on the weight of the evidence: the verdict will only be disturbed when it is so contrary to the overwhelming weight of the evidence that to allow it to stand would sanction an unconscionable injustice. The state supreme court found that standard met here. Appellant's jury was instructed on justifiable homicide and the Castle Doctrine (a state doctrine curtailing the duty to retreat and creating a presumption that the defendant reasonably feared imminent death, great bodily harm, or the commission of a felony upon him from a person who has unlawfully and forcibly entered the immediate premises of a dwelling). There was a great deal of evidence that the estranged husband was warned a number of times not to come to his wife's house, that he came anyway, heavily intoxicated, took his leg brace off to fight appellant, threw his wife down at the edge of her yard, and pulled a gun before appellant shot him in the leg (leading to his death). If the trial court had been presented with a motion for new trial, it would have evaluated the evidence and the applicability of the Castle Doctrine, and based on the evidence at trial, there is a reasonable probability that the trial court "would have found that the overwhelming weight of the evidence showed that [appellant] was in a place where he had a right to be; [the estranged husband] was the immediate provoker and aggressor; and [appellant] was not engaged in unlawful activity. As a result [he] had no duty to retreat." 242 So.3d at 61. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

State v. Gonzales-Bejarano*, 427 P.3d 251 (Utah Ct. App. 2018). In case involving multiple charges, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a directed verdict as to two of the charges. Appellant was convicted by a jury of possession of a stolen motor vehicle, possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, a count of forgery, two counts of unlawful possession of a financial transaction card, and unlawful possession of another's identification documents. The conviction stemmed from an incident during which appellant and his fiancée were stopped in a stolen car, appellant showed false identification documents to the officer, additional identification documents not belonging to appellant or his fiancée were found in the car, and later a package of nearly one pound of methamphetamine was also found in the car. The Court of Appeals of Utah found that defense counsel was ineffective under Strickland for failing to move for a directed verdict as to the two charges of unlawful possession of a financial transaction card. Under the portion of the unlawful possession statute that the state requested the trial court instruct the jury on, the state was required to prove that appellant intended to use fraudulently the financial transaction cards belonging to another in his possession. Appellant argued that the state failed to present any evidence that he intended to use the card fraudulently, and that therefore his counsel should have moved for a directed verdict as to these two charges. Although the state argued on appeal that it only had to prove that appellant acquired the card without the consent of the card holder or that he received it with the intent to use it in violation of another statute – the Fraudulent Use Statute – the state did not seek to have the jury instructed on those portions of the statute. The appellate court could find no direct or circumstantial evidence that appellant intended to use the cards fraudulently. The appellate court vacated the two unlawful possession of a financial transaction card convictions and affirmed the rest.

State v. Asadi-Ousley*, 120 N.E.3d 520 (Ohio Ct. App. 2018). In case involving convictions of two counts of rape, felonious assault, and two counts of kidnapping, based on the sexual assault of a victim more than seven years prior to the trial, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that trial counsel was deficient in not moving to dismiss the charge of felonious assault based on the expiration of the six-year statute of limitations. After the convictions were affirmed on appeal, appellant had applied to the Court of Appeals to reopen the direct appeal in order to raise the argument that his appellate counsel had been ineffective. Although the state conceded the error, it argued that appellant's IAC claim should be rejected on the basis of waiver. The Court of Appeals granted the application and remanded for the trial court to reverse the felonious assault conviction. The court held that this is not a case where appellant pleaded guilty to the offense where the SOL had run (such a plea constitutes a waiver), or where appellant absconded and purposely avoided prosecution. The fact that appellant sought to avoid identification by coming upon the victim from behind did not constitute behavior tolling the SOL. Appellant was prejudiced as a result of his conviction of this crime even though his sentence was ordered to run concurrently with his sentences on the other charges; "a defendant is prejudiced by having more convictions than are authorized by law." (internal quotation omitted). Appellant was denied the effective assistance of appellate counsel by counsel's failure to argue ineffective assistance of trial counsel on this issue. Had trial counsel moved to dismiss the felonious assault charge, the charge would have been dismissed; had appellate counsel raised this issue on appeal, there is a reasonable probability the outcome of the appeal would have been different as to the felonious assault conviction.

2017: Bryant v. State, 800 S.E.2d 537 (Ga. 2017). In a murder case, although defense counsel did make a motion to suppress evidence seized from defendant's home, counsel performed deficiently in failing to expressly challenge the search warrant for lack of particularity. The box on the warrant for listing the items to be seized contained only a detailed description of defendant's house and the vehicles on the property. Although the affiant detective's testimony by cell phone video to the magistrate at the time the affidavit was presented did provide additional particularity as to what items were expected to be seized, this was not incorporated by reference into the warrant itself. Nor was there any evidence that the video or a transcript of the testimony had been provided to defendant at his home. Regarding prejudice, testimony that defendant was the shooter of the victim came from three friends, D.T., D.B., and D.J., who were present with defendant at the time of the shooting. D.T. had an unrelated pending armed robbery charge at the time of trial. A detective testified that during his interview with D.T., D.T. provided conflicting stories stating that he was not present at the time of the shooting, that he did not know who committed the shooting, and at another point claiming that friend D.B. was the shooter before naming defendant as the shooter. At trial, D.T. denied implicating D.B. The detective also testified that he recalled hearing that the group of friends were shooting the gun the day before the murder, and specifically that defendant's brother, who was present at the time of the shooting, had shot the gun. D.B. denied making any such statement to police and D.J. claimed not to have seen the gun prior to the shooting. Although the murder weapon itself was never found, officers recovered .40 caliber shell casings and a .40 caliber bullet at the scene. The only physical evidence implicating defendant was an empty box of .40 caliber bullets seized during the search of his home. This empty box was highlighted during the prosecutor's argument to the jury. The court concludes: "Here, the credibility of the three eyewitnesses was substantially challenged and there was evidence presented that D.B. was the shooter. The only physical evidence connecting [defendant] to the crime was the empty ammunition box, and the State relied heavily on this piece of unconstitutionally obtained evidence in its argument and presentation of its case to the jury. Under these circumstances, we hold that [defendant] has shown a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different had the empty ammunition box been excluded."

Capital Case*

People v. Peck*, 79 N.E.3d 232 (Ill. Ct. App. 2017). In case involving multiple drug-related convictions, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion to suppress defendant's incriminating statements following his request for legal representation. It was undisputed that defendant was in custody and that he invoked his right to counsel after being read his Miranda rights. He later waived his rights and made admissions. Trial counsel explained in post-conviction proceedings that she did not file the suppression motion requested by defendant because in her viewing of the interrogation she concluded that defendant's rights were not violated because defendant reinitiated the conversation with the interrogating officer after having requested an attorney. This conclusion was erroneous given that defendant only reinitiated the interrogation after the police officer informed defendant that defendant's girlfriend was going to be arrested. Such a statement was reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response, constituting an improper continuation of the interrogation. Thus counsel's failure to file the motion "was not the result of a tactical decision, but of a fundamental misjudgment." As for prejudice, "[t]he record demonstrate[d] that defendant's confession had an immense impact on the outcome of his case, and its admission negatively impacted defendant's ability to provide alternative theories and request jury instructions on lesser-included offenses. Additionally, defendant's confession was the State's strongest piece of evidence to establish his intent to deliver. As mentioned by the State in its closing argument, the jury did not have to speculate as to defendant's intent, as he said exactly what he intended to do with the drugs."

People v. Hardimon*, 77 N.E.3d 1184 (Ill. Ct. App. 2017). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to further redact a videotape recording of the police interview of defendant that was played for the jury. The original recording was more than four hours in length. The prosecution had redacted approximately three hours of the videotape, eliminating parts where defendant was not actively interviewed, where defendant was asked about prior Miranda warnings, and where the police referenced information they had received from defendant's companion on the night of the offense. Trial counsel failed to move for the redaction of irrelevant and prejudicial portions remaining in the redacted tape. Defendant during the interview acknowledged being present at the club where the shooting occurred but denied involvement in the shooting. Approximately 20 minutes of the redacted video contained defendant's relevant admissions about his location at the time of the shooting. The remainder of the video, however, consisted of prejudicial statements by the interrogating officers that "(1) described, in detail, a scenario where the defendant shot the victim because he was afraid; (2) attacked the defendant's character and credibility, which included the State's potential use of the words 'liar,' 'cold-blooded killer,' and 'execute,' at trial; (3) served to bolster the testimonies of the officers and other prosecution witnesses; (4) described the contents of the surveillance video, while inaccurately vouching for the clarity of the video; (5) claimed the case would be easily prosecuted; and (6) indicated the defendant hid in his girlfriend's basement when the police came to arrest him, which indicated knowledge of guilt." These comments "served only to impermissibly bolster the State's case and inflame the passions of the jury" while having no probative value. Prejudice from trial counsel's deficient performance is "supported by the totality of the evidence, which failed to directly connect the defendant to the crime. No witness identified the defendant as the shooter, the defendant never admitted to committing the charged offenses, and the physical evidence did not directly connect the defendant to the offense."

State v. Taylor*, 313 So.3d 278 (La. Ct. App. 2017). In rape case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that the retroactive application of a statute to revive defendant's already prescribed forcible rape charge violated the Ex Post Facto Clauses of the state and federal constitutions. The crime occurred in 1994. At that time, there was a six-year statute of limitations for rape. In 2003, Louisiana enacted a statute extending the time limitation for cases where the identity of the offender was established after the expiration of the six-year time limitation through the use of a DNA profile. The statute was expressly retroactive. It wasn't until 2008 that defendant's DNA was matched with DNA taken from the victim. The trial occurred in 2011. In 2015, the Louisiana Supreme Court ruled that application of the 2003 statute to cases which had prescribed before its enactment violated ex post facto principles. Even though defendant's trial preceded that state supreme court ruling, trial counsel was nevertheless ineffective in failing to raise the meritorious ex post facto challenge in light of Stogner v. California, 539 U.S. 607 (2003), and then-existing state law that subscribed to the rule that the state may extend the time limits for instituting prosecution and apply them against a particular defendant, but only if the prior limitation period has not expired and abated the criminal consequences of that individual's conduct.

Wurdemann v. State*, 390 P.3d 439 (Idaho 2017). In case involving numerous felony convictions related to an attack on the victim, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly challenge eyewitness identifications. The video lineup shown to the victim was unduly suggestive in that defendant was the only one of the six participants who met the victim's description of her attacker. An expert in eyewitness identification testified at the post-conviction hearing that this was among the worst lineups he had ever seen. Under the Manson-Biggers balancing test, it was found "due to the fact that it was dark and [the victim] was under the influence of marijuana when the attack occurred, combined with the fact that it had been close to two years between the attack and her identification of [defendant] and the fact that [the victim] had identified various other individuals as her attacker during that two-year interval, we cannot say that the reliability of the identification of [defendant] is sufficient to overcome the blatant suggestiveness of the lineup." Had trial counsel challenged the identification, the motion to suppress should have been granted. Trial counsel's failure to move to suppress the suggestive identification constituted deficient performance because it was based on inadequate preparation and ignorance of the law rather than strategy. The lower court's finding of prejudice is summarily affirmed as the State did not argue it was erroneous.

2016: Monroe v. State, 191 So. 3d 395 (Fla. 2016), receded from on other grounds, Steiger v. State, 328 So.3d 926 (Fla. 2021). Counsel ineffective in sexual battery on a child under 12 years of age by a defendant 18 years of age or older and lewd and lascivious molestation, with the same age requirements, in failing to move for judgment of acquittal due to the state's failure to prove that the defendant was 18 years old or older at the time of the offenses that, according to the alleged victim, happened on only one occasion. Counsel's conduct was "patently unreasonable," especially in light of counsel's vigorous arguments concerning the defendant's age in closing arguments. Prejudice also established as the penalty for sexual battery for a defendant 18 years or older was a mandatory life sentence. If the defendant was under 18, the judge had far greater discretion in sentencing. Here, the trial court had already indicated "obvious hesitation" in imposing a life sentence.

Capital Case*

People v. Booth*, 209 Cal.Rptr.3d 1 (Cal. Ct. App. 2016). In a case involving an apparently gang related deadly shooting in 1992 that was not prosecuted until 2011, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss the case based on precharging delay where an eyewitness who had exonerated defendant in 1992 could not be located in 2011. Although defendant wanted the trial to start sooner rather than later because of a fear that the co-defendants might turn state's evidence in hopes of receiving a deal, this did not justify forgoing a motion to dismiss as the concern was merely theoretical and it was clear that a motion to dismiss would not have delayed the trial in any material sense. Further, the record did not support respondent's argument that trial counsel did not believe delay was worthwhile because the missing witness had credibility issues. Rather, the record established that reasonably competent counsel would have filed a motion to dismiss based on the precharging delay. As to prejudice, the appellate court declined to defer to the lower court's finding that the missing eyewitness lacked credibility. Because the lower court's determination was based on information in the record that the appellate court had equal access to, the appellate court was in an identical position to evaluate credibility. In addition, the lower court's credibility determination was premised in part on an important factual error concerning the missing eyewitness's identification of one of the participants in the shooting incident. The appellate court's own review of the record led it to conclude that the credibility issues were not that significant and that there were other circumstances supporting the truthfulness of the eyewitness's account of the shooting. Thus, "despite all of the possible impeachment [the eyewitness] might have been subjected to had he been available to testify, he still had the potential to be a blockbuster witness for the defense. While it is impossible to know for sure how the jury would have perceived [the eyewitness's] testimony, it is reasonable to conclude [defendant] was substantially and materially prejudiced by [the eyewitness's] absence at his trial." Turning to the timing of the charges against defendant, the alleged lack of investigative resources in 1992 provided a strong justification for the delay. In 2009 there was an influx of grant money to fund cold case homicide investigations that led to the charges in this case. And there was no evidence of police negligence or wrongdoing in the original investigation. Although the delay was justified, the weakness of the case against defendant was considered in determining whether there was a probability of an unfair trial because of the delay. Looking to the record, the court found: "Balancing the prejudice from [the eyewitness's] absence against the state's justification for the precharging delay, and considering the weakness of the prosecution's case against [defendant], we conclude it is at least reasonably probable the trial court would have found the delay violated [defendant's] right to a fair trial" had defense counsel filed the motion to dismiss. As to the proper remedy, it is determined that the case can be retried but with the jury hearing the otherwise hearsay statements from the missing eyewitness.

People v. Rogers*, 200 Cal. Rptr. 3d 355 (Cal. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in case with multiple charges arising out of two hours of false imprisonment and assaults by the defendant on his girlfriend for failing to object to the addition of charges and enhancements after the defendant waived preliminary hearing. The defendant was initially charged with two counts and two enhancements. The defendant waived a preliminary hearing. Four days before trial, a different prosecutor than the one that agreed to the waiver of the preliminary hearing, without objection, added two additional counts and an enhancement. The state conceded, based on established California law that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the addition of the three additional counts because an information cannot be amended after the defendant has waived his right to a preliminary hearing. The court also found that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the addition of an enhancement after the defendant waived his right to a preliminary hearing. "While there is apparently no published case prohibiting an amendment to add a conduct enhancement to an information after a preliminary hearing has been waived," based on previously decided cases, "the writing was clearly on the wall. At the very least, under prevailing professional norms, counsel should have objected to preserve the issue." Prejudice established. The remedy was to strike the counts and the enhancement added after the waiver of the preliminary hearing. Remanded for new sentencing.

People v. Davydov*, 144 A.D.3d 1170 (N.Y. App. Div. 2016). In case where defendant was convicted of aggravated assault in the second degree, the conviction is vacated based on trial counsel's ineffectiveness in failing to seek severance from a co-defendant, defendant's uncle, once it became clear they were pursuing antagonistic defenses and also for failing to request a missing witness charge for an eyewitness who was not called to testify. The theory set forth by the uncle's attorney was that defendant had called his uncle to the crime scene to mediate a dispute between defendant and the victim. The uncle's attorney theorized that the dispute involved defendant's desire to have the victim participate in a fraudulent scheme. According to the uncle's attorney, when the uncle arrived at the scene he observed defendant in an altercation and intervened. The defendant's theory, in contrast, was essentially that the victim was incredible in his account of events, that defendant was actually a friend of the victim and was merely at the scene, and that defendant did not act in concert with the co-defendants in assaulting the victim. Given that the two defenses were irreconcilably in conflict, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to request a severance. Defense counsel also performed deficiently in failing to request a missing witness charge instructing the jury that an unfavorable inference could be drawn from the failure of the prosecution to call a friend and business associate of the victim as a witness. This friend was nearby when the assault occurred and had previously stated that the victim threw the first punch during the initial confrontation. No legitimate strategic reason could be found to support defense counsel's failure to request the charge.

State v. Batchford*, 79 N.E.3d 97 (Ohio Ct. App. 2016). In drug possession/possession of criminal tools case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress statements made by defendant. In light of testimony by the first officer encountering defendant that defendant had invoked his right to counsel during law enforcement's investigation, there were grounds to seek to suppress statements made by defendant later to another officer. Defendant was prejudiced as a result of trial counsel's error, as there was a reasonable probability that had counsel sought suppression of defendant's statements the result of the trial would have been different. The state heavily relied on defendant's statements in proving that he "knowingly possessed" the marijuana. And notably the jury appeared to rely on defendant's statements in finding defendant guilty, as the jury specifically requested it be permitted to rehear the audio recording of defendant's interview during its deliberations.

Kennebrew v. State*, 792 S.E.2d 695 (Ga. 2016). In robbery-murder case, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to seek suppression of evidence found in backpacks seized by officers following defendant's arrest. Defendant had been arrested pursuant to a warrant in his girlfriend's college dorm room. The police seized the backpacks after defendant had been handcuffed and removed from the room. It was not until six days later that the backpacks were opened and shot gun shells and bullets of the type taken from the victim's home were discovered, along with a knife that might have been involved in the killing. These items were severely damaging to defendant's trial defense that he went with the co-defendants to the victim's home for the purpose of selling the victim a PlayStation and then fled the scene after co-defendant Hall unexpectedly went crazy and viciously beat and stabbed the victim to death. The prosecutor emphasized the items in arguing that defendant was not merely present in the victim's home but was an active participant in the robbery-murder. At the hearing on defendant's motion for new trial, defense counsel explained that he had not moved to suppress the backpack evidence because he believed it had been lawfully taken during a search incident to arrest. This exception to the search warrant requirement, however, was clearly inapplicable to the facts of this case. Defense counsel's misunderstanding of the law constituted deficient performance. Also deficient was defendant counsel's failure to object when the prosecutor commented on defendant's pre-arrest silence/failure to come forward after the killing, a clear violation of the state law Mallory rule. Although defense counsel guessed at the post-trial hearing that he had decided to forgo an objection in order to avoid bringing more attention to the issue, this did not justify the omission: "The State's discussion of [defendant's] failure to come forward to the police was not . . . just a passing or equivocal remark that the jury might have overlooked. It was a specific, extended argument aimed directly at demonstrating [defendant's] guilt. Given [defendant's] defense theory, the importance of the State's silence-equals-guilt argument to its case against him, and the obviousness of the Mallory violation, [defense counsel's] failure to object was patently unreasonable and thus deficient performance under Strickland." Because the case against defendant was not overwhelming and he had a plausible explanation for his presence at the crime scene, prejudice is found given the prosecution's reliance on the backpack-related evidence, his improper argument, and notes from the jury seeking to compare the bullets found in the backpack with those found in the possession of co-defendant Hall.

People v. Tayborn*, 49 N.E.3d 983 (Ill.Ct.App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to file a motion to suppress the defendant's custodial statements made in response to police questioning without having received Miranda warnings. The defendant was a passenger in a car stopped because it did not have a registration plate. After the driver was removed from the car and arrested, the defendant was removed from the car while the car was searched incident to the arrest. Police officer testimony was contradictory about whether the defendant was handcuffed then. A search of the car revealed cocaine in the driver's purse. An officer asked the defendant about the cocaine and the defendant admitted that he obtained it in Chicago and was taking it to Iowa. Counsel's conduct was deficient as the trial court found that the defendant was in custody at the time the cocaine was discovered. Even if he had not been then, he certainly would have been when the cocaine was discovered. Prejudice also established because a motion to suppress would have been successful. Without the defendant's statement, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different.

State v. Craft*, 397 P.3d 889 (Utah Ct. App. 2017). In aggravated robbery and aggravated burglary case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a mistrial following a statement by a detective that co-defendants had placed defendant at the scene of the crime. Defendant and two other men were charged with a robbery-burglary. Defendant's trial was severed from his co-defendants so that incriminating admissions by them could not be used against defendant. The key evidence against defendant was an identification of him made by one of the two victims. The reliability of the identification was challenged by the defense. The detective who had prepared a photo lineup for the victim to view was asked by the State how he had selected the photos to include with defendant's photo. The following exchange occurred:

Q. Okay. And the defense counsel mentioned hair, goatee and white skin as the characteristics discussed with [the witness] during his description before the lineup, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Aside from those, are there any other factors other than just the similarity to the defendant that guided you in selecting the lineup photographs?

A. As far as the other two defendants saying he was there.

Q. No. Let me — the — when you were picking the photographs out —

A. Oh.

Defense counsel did not object. Given the significance of the statement to the defense, the appellate court concludes it was likely that a mistrial would have been granted had defense counsel asked for one. There was no conceivable strategic basis for counsel's failure to make the request. Defendant established prejudice given that the witness's description of his assailant was not very detailed, the witness did not have a direct view of his assailant's face, the room was dim, he had recently been assaulted, and he had blood in his eyes. In addition, the defense eyewitness identification expert highlighted the various limitations of eyewitness testimony under the circumstances and also described deficiencies in the photo lineup that could have influenced the jury's view of the reliability of the eyewitness identification. The other evidence in the case was a jail phone call made by defendant to a friend. Although it undercut defendant's defense, it did not unequivocally place defendant at the scene of the crime or include any explicit admissions. His statement that he expected to "do a nickel" could simply have indicated that he feared a conviction for the crime with which he was being charged. His statement that he told his "homeboys" to "leave all the electronics" suggests that he was aware of their intention to commit a crime but does not establish that he was at the house when the crime was committed. Notably, defendant was not found in possession of any stolen property, and neither his DNA nor his fingerprints were found on any of the stolen items. The vehicle where evidence was found belonged to one of the other co-defendants, and there was no evidence connecting defendant to that vehicle.

State v. Ortiz*, 383 P.3d 586 (Wash. Ct. App. 2016). In case involving, inter alia, charges of manufacturing controlled substances, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge a "knock and announce" search that resulted in the discovery of 41 marijuana plants and other evidence of a growing operation. Officers obtained a warrant to search the home of defendant's mother where defendant resided. The officers executed the search warrant at approximately 6:47 a.m. in the morning. An officer knocked on the door three times, announced "police search warrant," waited one to two seconds, and repeated that process twice more. Hearing nothing, the officers breached the door and entered. Once inside, they encountered persons appearing to have just woken up and a juvenile who was still asleep. On the facts of this case, the officers did not wait a reasonable time before forcing entry into the house. It was foreseeable that the occupants of the house would be sleeping and giving them only six to nine seconds to respond violated the knock and announce rule. Trial counsel could not have a tactical reason for not challenging the search on that basis. Prejudice is established because the prosecution would have had insufficient evidence to bring the charges without the fruits of the illegal search.

State v. Bell*, 380 P.3d 11 (Utah Ct. App. 2016). In case where defendant was charged with two counts of aggravated robbery, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a merger of the two counts. Defendant had entered the unlocked car of one of the victims. He was unable to start the car when the owner of the car and her two friends confronted defendant. Defendant then pulled out a knife. Observing the car owner's purse on the floorboard, defendant grabbed it and attempted to flee the scene. Defendant was charged with aggravated robbery as to the car and separately as to the purse. But because the robbery was completed when defendant attempted to take the car and its contents from the victim's immediate presence, the two counts should have merged. On this record, there was no conceivable tactical basis for trial counsel not to have moved for merger.

People v. Kindell*, 23 N.Y.S.3d 65 (N.Y. App. Div. 2016). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for failing to move to reopen the suppression hearing after a trial witness contradicted the suppression hearing testimony of the officer's relied on by the court in denying the suppression motion. Specifically, the court refused to suppress a tool bag and the burglar's tools it contained based on the testimony of two officers that the bag was open at the defendant's feet and the tools were in plain view when they arrived. During trial, however, the building superintendent who chased the defendant, detained him, and flagged down the police, testified that the bag was in the defendant's hand and closed when the police arrived. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

2015: Ayotte v. State, 129 A.3d 285 (Me. 2015). Counsel ineffective in possession of stolen goods case for failing to move to dismiss the indictment on double jeopardy grounds. The defendant plead guilty in Cumberland County to theft by unauthorized taking or transfer as a result of the theft of items from an apartment in Cumberland County on November 29, 2012. A month later, he was indicted in York County for theft by receiving stolen property "for allegedly receiving, retaining, or disposing of some of the same stolen property – silverware – to pawnshops" in York County. Counsel in York County considered the possibility of double jeopardy but concluded that there was no double jeopardy violation. Counsel thus negotiated a plea agreement for a suspended jail sentence and consecutive probation to the Cumberland County sentence. Counsel's conduct was deficient as double jeopardy, under the test of Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), clearly barred the York County prosecution. The Cumberland County theft was a continuing theft, given that the defendant continually exercised authorized control over the stolen silverware until he pawned it in York County. While counsel researched the issue, his conduct was not insulated as "strategy" where he reached "an erroneous conclusion about the state of the law and Ayotte's rights." Prejudice established.

Capital Case*

People v. Harris*, 43 N.E.3d 750 (N.Y. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in burglary in the second degree and petit larceny case for failing to move for dismissal of the larceny charge, which was brought after the passage of the applicable statute of limitations had expired. The defendant entered a home while the alleged victim was asleep. She awoke after the defendant ejaculated on her and he ran taking with him a pair of her earrings. Seven years later, based on the defendant's DNA in the semen, he was charged with burglary and petit larceny. The state argued burglary because of the intent to steal in the home. Defense counsel argued that there was no burglary because the intent was only to masturbate over the victim, which was not at the time a crime under state law. Counsel's conduct in failing to object to the larceny charge, which had a two-year statute of limitations, was deficient and "there could have been no strategic purpose" for failing to object, particularly in light of counsel's arguments in defense of the burglary charge. Prejudice established, such that the larceny charge was dismissed.

Haney v. United States*, 120 A.3d 608 (D.C. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in assault with intent to kill case for failing to move to suppress a videotaped recording of the defendant's statement to police. The trial court found deficient conduct but no prejudice. The recording included a detective making accusations, which the defendant denied "often with profanity." After about one and a half hours, the defendant indicated that he did not want to answer any more questions, but the interrogation continued. During this portion, the defendant made statements that were admitted at trial. In these statements, the defendant referred to the shooting victim as "a bih," said that she was afraid of him, and said that he believed that she had "snitched" on his friend. The appellate court agreed that counsel's conduct was deficient but reviewed only the question of prejudice. The trial court's finding of no prejudice relied on the court's own view of the credibility of witnesses and the weight of the evidence based on an initial mistrial, where the jury could not reach a unanimous verdict, and the retrial. In determining whether there is prejudice under Strickland, however, the focus is on whether there is a reasonable probability of a different result with "reasonable jurors, acting as factfinders." Under this analysis, prejudice was clear. The prosecutor opened her closing argument and closed her rebuttal argument emphasizing the defendant's statement and his alleged motive for the shooting. Although the defendant was acquitted on the obstruction charge that related to the victim's implication of the defendant's friend in a homicide, the appellate court refused to speculate, as the trial court did, that the defendant's statements played no role in the conviction for assault with intent to kill when the victim had significant credibility issues and she was the only witness that identified the defendant as the shooter.

State v. Halverson*, 857 N.W.2d 632 (Iowa 2015). Counsel ineffective in possession of marijuana at a residential facility case for failing to move to dismiss due to the absence of evidence that the residential facility was under management of the Department of Corrections, as was required for the conviction.

State v. Millett*, 356 P.3d 700 (Utah Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in forcible sodomy and attempted rape case for failing to move to suppress the defendant's statements to police on the grounds that the Miranda warnings were inadequate. The defendant who was 18 was charged with crimes against a 14 year old girl. The two had engaged in consensual sexual encounters involving touching each other's genitalia. On one occasion she performed oral sex on him and they attempted vaginal sex before she said it hurt and he stopped. After her mother called the police and he was arrested, he was interviewed. Prior to the interview, he was advised of his right to silence and that anything he said could and would be used against him in a court of law, but he was not advised that he had the right to an attorney and, if he could not afford one, an attorney would be appointed for him. Counsel moved to suppress the resulting statement on the basis of the rules of evidence but did not challenge the constitutionality of admission of the statement. Counsel's conduct was deficient as this was clearly a custodial interrogation conducted after inadequate Miranda warnings. While the state argued that counsel had a strategy to use the statement to argue consent rather than having the defendant testify, the record did not support this because counsel did move to exclude the statement, just on the wrong basis. Counsel's subsequent arguments of consent based on the statement were simply a "reaction" to the admission rather than "a deliberate trial strategy." Prejudice established. In order to convict, the state was required to prove that the defendant had enticed or coerced the victim to submit or participate. The state's theory was that the defendant coerced her by threatening to end the relationship if she did not perform oral sex and have sex with him. While the alleged victim had made statements of this nature prior to trial, she did not testify on direct that she was coerced. Instead, she said they were never really "together" and that it was her decision. During cross and redirect examination, she made conflicting statements. "In light of the equivocal state of the girl's testimony," admission of the defendant's statements and the detective's testimony about the statements was prejudicial as the detective's testimony was the "only unequivocal" evidence that the defendant threatened to end the relationship with the girl in order to entice or coerce her to engage in oral and vaginal sex. If the statements had not been admitted, the detective's testimony also would have been inadmissible.

State v. Maynard*, 351 P.3d 159 (Wash. 2015). Counsel ineffective in criminal mischief case for failing to notice juvenile defendant's impending 18th birthday and request that the juvenile court extend its jurisdiction, which was permitted under state law. As a result, the juvenile court lost jurisdiction after the state had extended a plea offer that the defendant intended to accept and the defendant was required to be tried as an adult. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. The defendant was returned to juvenile court and the state ordered to reinstate the plea offer.

2014: Conley v. State, 433 S.W.3d 234 (Ark. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in delivery of crack cocaine, possession of marijuana, and possession of paraphernalia case for failing to move for directed verdict on the marijuana and paraphernalia charges. The defendant sold crack to an undercover police officer, but was not arrested until several months later. On the day of the arrest, the police also executed a search warrant at the defendant's home, which he shared with someone else, and found a bag of marijuana and a digital scale in the laundry room on top of a cabinet out of view behind a decorative item. The defendant was not at home during the search. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move for a directed verdict and prejudice was established as there was insufficient evidence to support the convictions for possessing the marijuana and the paraphernalia.

Spargo v. State*, 132 So.3d 354 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective for failing, prior to sentencing, to adopt and present the defendant's pro se motions to withdraw his guilty plea to second-degree murder, which had never been formally accepted by the trial court. "Because there was no formal acceptance, and sentence had not yet been pronounced, appellant had a right [under a state criminal rule] to withdraw his plea without any justification for doing so.” Prejudice established.

State v. Ross*, 845 N.W.2d 692 (Iowa 2014). Counsel ineffective in voluntary manslaughter and intimidation with a dangerous weapon with intent case for failing to move for a judgment of acquittal after the verdict on the intimidation charges where the defendant was convicted of five counts when he was guilty of only two under state law. The defendant had an ongoing argument with Milton, who passed the defendant’s home with six other people. After additional argument, the defendant, while standing in the street, fired down the street into the crowd. By most accounts, there were two separate groups of shots separated by as much as 30 seconds. When the initial shots were fired, the group dispersed with Milton going to one side of the street and his uncle going to the other. After the initial round of shooting had stopped, Milton’s uncle attempted to cross the street prompting the defendant to fire again. The uncle was killed. The defendant was charged with seven counts and counsel moved to dismiss six counts prior to trial on the basis that there were not seven “separate independent acts” involved in the shooting. The motion was denied. Counsel also moved for a directed verdict on the basis of insufficient evidence at the end of the state’s case, but did not make a specific objection on seven counts versus one. This motion was renewed at the end of the case. The jury convicted on five counts. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to move for a judgment of acquittal and prejudice established because the defendant was guilty of only two counts of intimidation rather than five as the record supported only two “separate and distinct acts” based on the two separate groupings of shots.

People v. Hall*, 991 N.Y.S.2d 114 (N.Y. App. Div. 2014). Counsel in robbery, drug, and resisting arrest case ineffective for failing to move to sever the robbery charge from the unrelated charges. The alleged robbery occurred over two months prior to the defendant’s arrest at his mother’s home where drugs were found and the resisting arrest charge arose. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial as “the jury could have inferred that the robbery at issue as committed for a drug-related purpose,” which was improper.

People v. Jian Long Shi*, 987 N.Y.S.2d 791 (N.Y. App. Div. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in endangering welfare of child case for failing to move in limine and failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper cross-examination of the defendant about his illegal entry into the country. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial where the case turned on the credibility of the defendant and the 11-year-old alleged victim.

Burcham v. Franke*, 335 P.3d 298 (Or. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in rape, sodomy, sexual abuse, and furnishing alcohol to a minor case for failing to challenge the state’s interpretation of the mental incapacitation statute. The 16-year-old victim attended the birthday party of her friend’s father, where she met the defendant, who was the friend’s 48-year-old uncle. After the party, the defendant invited his niece and the victim to his house where he served them alcohol. The victim became intoxicated and was slurring her words and having trouble walking before she decided to go to bed. The defendant took her into a bedroom, laid her on the bed, and removed her pants and underwear. She attempted to stand but was too “severely intoxicated” to do so. The defendant performed oral sex on her and then attempted penile penetration of her vagina but she felt a sharp pain that “jolted her out of her ‘extremely drunken state’” and she jumped up and ran out of the room screaming for her friend. The friend drove her back to the friend’s house and the next day the friend’s father took the girls to the police station to report the offenses. For three counts of the charges, the state was required to prove that the victim was “incapable of consent by reason of mental incapacitation.” At the relevant time, “mentally incapacitated” required that the person was under the influence of an intoxicating substance “administered to the person without the consent of the person.” Three other counts required a showing that the victim was “physically helpless” and the jury acquitted on those counts. The state’s theory at trial on the “mental incapacitation” counts was that the victim was “legally unable to consent to drink alcohol” due to her age. Counsel was deficient in failing to challenge this theory or the jury instructions. As the post-conviction court held, the state’s interpretation of the statute was “pure ‘silliness.’” The statute clearly meant “factual consent” and said nothing about “legal consent.” Moreover, challenging the state’s interpretation could have been done simply in a motion for directed verdict or for a judgment of acquittal, which would have presented no risk before the jury. Prejudice also established as these three counts would have been dismissed or, at least, preserved for appeal where this Court would have reversed. The remaining convictions of two counts of sexual abuse in the second degree and furnishing alcohol to a minor were affirmed.

Ex parte Cockrell*, 424 S.W.3d 543 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual assault case for failing to seek an interpreter and other accommodations due to the defendant’s deafness. The defendant used hearing aids, but basically could interpret what was said only by reading lips. Nonetheless, counsel did not seek an interpreter, even though he had to “yell” even when the defendant was testifying. Even that, the defendant had to ask clarification questions a number of times. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in that the defendant was “deaf” and automatically entitled to an interpreter under the relevant state statutes. Prejudice established because the defendant could not understand a substantial portion of the trial proceedings and, therefore, could not adequately participate in his defense. The case against the defendant primarily consisted of the testimony of the alleged victim, who was the defendant’s 12-year-old daughter, who had made admittedly false allegations of abuse before.

State v. Hamilton*, 320 P.3d 142 (Wash. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in possession of methamphetamine case for failing to move to suppress the methamphetamine on the grounds that it was obtained through an unlawful search of the defendant’s purse. The defendant had left her husband and their home for approximately 10 days. During her absence, the husband obtained a protective order against her. When she returned to the home, she left her purse on the kitchen counter and the husband observed drug paraphernalia in plain view in the purse and called the police. Officers arrived and told the husband they could not search the house but that he could bring items outside to show them. The husband brought out the purse and opened it so that the officers could see the drug paraphernalia. The officers then searched the purse and discovered a glass pipe that tested positive for methamphetamine. Counsel filed a motion to suppress but argued only that the search of the house was unlawful because the husband was acting as a police agent. Counsel’s failure to move to suppress on the basis of the warrantless search of the purse was deficient and not based on any strategy. Prejudice established as the trial court likely would have suppressed the methamphetamine if the proper basis had been argued.

2013: Lamb v. State, 124 So. 3d 953 (Fla. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery and false imprisonment case for failing to file a motion for new trial, based on the weight of the evidence. The charges arose from the armed robbery of the defendant's nephew and his girlfriend, who was also kidnaped in a car-jacking after the robbery. During trial, the nephew denied that the defendant was one of the masked perpetrators. The girlfriend, on the other hand, testified that one of the perpetrators was called "Chicken," which was the defendant's nickname. She also testified that the men never removed their masks, "but in a seeming contradiction," she also testified that she got a glimpse of their faces. According to police witnesses, the day following the crimes, she identified the defendant, who she knew, in a photo lineup. During trial, the girlfriend admitted picking the defendant in the photo lineup, but "she testified that she was not sure" who the perpetrators were and she could not identify the defendant as one of them. The defense moved for judgment of acquittal. During arguments, the parties agreed "that the entire case turned on" the girlfriend's identification of Lamb." The trial judge characterized it as "one of the weakest in my experience of trying these kinds of cases," but denied the motion, concluding "that there was identification sufficient to go to the jury." Following conviction, trial counsel filed a renewed motion for judgment of acquittal based on the sufficiency of the evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to file a motion for new trial based on the weight of the evidence instead. Counsel testified that he did not file the motion as a matter of strategy because (1) he did not think the judge would reconsider his trial rulings; and (2) success on the motion for acquittal "would end the case, whereas a motion for new trial would merely garner a new trial." This was "not reasonable trial strategy" because "trial counsel's testimony at the evidentiary hearing reflected his misunderstanding of the two motions."

On the one hand, a motion for judgment of acquittal tests the sufficiency of the evidence; a trial court must determine "whether the evidence presented is legally adequate to permit a verdict." On the other hand, a motion for new trial tests the weight of the evidence; a trial court must weigh the evidence and determine credibility just as a juror is required to do. Trial counsel asserted that he forewent moving for a new trial because he did not think the judge would change his mind about rulings made during the trial. But his renewed motion for judgment of acquittal asked the judge to do precisely that in regard to the judge's previous ruling that the State's evidence was sufficient. A motion for new trial would have presented an entirely different question for the judge – based on the weight of the evidence, not its sufficiency.

Prejudice established. "Although the trial judge ultimately concluded that the [highly equivocal identification] testimony was legally sufficient, he struggled with that question, and he characterized the testimony as the weakest identification evidence he had ever seen."

Laurito v. State*, 120 So. 3d 203 (Fla. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated battery and aggravated assault case for failing to file a motion to suppress the defendant's statements to police, which were made after the defendant unequivocally invoked his right to counsel after being given the Miranda warnings. While the State had no difficulty establishing that the crimes were committed when shots were fired from a vehicle in which Laurito was one of three passengers, prejudice was established because the State relied mainly on Laurito's admissions to prove that he was the shooter. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the defendant's immediate response after being read his rights was to ask: "Can I make a phone call so I can get a lawyer?" Counsel moved to suppress the statements as involuntary due to the coercive nature of the interrogation under the totality of the circumstances, but failed to assert invocation of the right to counsel. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "counsel missed or misunderstood the legal significance of [the] request to call a lawyer." Prejudice was established as the "confession would have been suppressed by the trial court if the issue had been raised or, absent a correct ruling at that point, could have been raised as an issue on appeal."

People v. Miller*, 993 N.E.2d 988 (Ill. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in possession of a stolen motor vehicle case for failing to move to suppress the defendant's admission made during custodial interrogation when no Miranda warnings had been given. An officer was attempting to stop the defendant for a traffic violation. After a high speed chase, the defendant crashed and then attempted to flee on foot. After he was detained at gun-point, the officer asked if he was fleeing because the car was stolen and the defendant said yes. Counsel's conduct was deficient as this was clearly custodial interrogation without the benefit of Miranda warnings. Prejudice also clear as the remainder of the trial evidence were "not inconsistent with the defendant's explanation that defendant's employee purchased the vehicle for defendant from [the alleged victim's] husband."

Pace v. State*, 981 N.E.2d 1253 (Ind. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in drug and firearm case for failing to move to bifurcate the trial. The firearm charge was possession by a serious violent felon based on the defendant's prior conviction for felony dealing in cocaine. State law established more than a year before trial allowed for bifurcation so that the jury could first determine whether the defendant was guilty on the drug charge, so that the jury would not be aware at the time of the prior drug conviction. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

State v. Brooks*, 305 P.3d 634 (Kan. 2013). Counsel ineffective in rape and aggravated criminal sodomy case for failing to seek a continuance to obtain evidence to rebut the alleged victim's testimony that the defendant had a unique identifying scar on his penis. Brooks immediately advised his counsel that he had no such scar and that he wanted to testify in rebuttal. Defense counsel advised Brooks against taking the stand and recommended finding another way to establish that Brooks did not have a scar on his penis, but defense counsel failed to follow through on obtaining any such impeachment testimony. Nonetheless, the jury found Brooks guilty of two counts but acquitted him of five counts. On appeal, Brooks submitted medical records from a prison physician who had examined Brooks' penis and detected no visible scars. The Court of Appeals found that counsel's conduct was deficient but found no prejudice. The only issue before the Supreme Court was whether prejudice was established. In finding no prejudice, the lower court questioned the weight that should have been given to the victim's testimony that she observed a scar on Brooks' penis when she allegedly saw it at least 4 years and perhaps 10 years prior to trial. The court found that her “credibility would likely have survived” any impeachment. The Supreme Court found error in the finding that the jury still would have found the alleged victim to be credible.

In doing so, the panel glossed over the credibility issues arising from S.C.’s prior untruthful statements about her sexual activities with others and declared that “her overall credibility was anchored in her expressed anxiety in ‘outing’ her stepdad.” Interestingly, the panel’s credibility calculus did not include any reference to the jury’s acquittal of Brooks on five of the seven counts upon which S.C. testified nor any rumination upon what inference might be drawn therefrom about the jury’s view of S.C.’s credibility.

Given the panel’s stated reasons for finding no prejudice, we discern that it ran afoul of the oft-stated rule that an appellate court will not determine the credibility of witnesses or weigh conflicting evidence.

Id. at 640 (citation omitted). Prejudice was especially clear in light of the State’s reliance on the alleged victim’s testimony and the lack of rebuttal in closing argument: “You heard [S.C.] which is unrefuted describe Mr. Brooks’ genitalia. How it was uncircumcised and how it had a small scar. Unrefuted. How would she know that?”

Thus, not only was Brooks denied the opportunity to attack S.C.’s credibility with her allegedly false testimony, but the failure to cross-examine S.C. permitted the State to bolster the credibility of its complaining witness as being unrefuted. Then, having established the scar testimony as being true because it was unrefuted, the State used the substance of the statement to suggest that the abuse must have occurred because that was the only way that S.C. would have seen the scar on Brooks’ penis. That use of the scar testimony would suggest that the prosecutor considered it to be a weightier part of the State’s case than did the panel.

Id. at 640-41.

State v. Tellegen*, 314 P.3d 902 (Mont. 2013). Trial counsel was ineffective in theft and accountability to burglary case for failing to object to the theft conviction, which was a lesser included offense of the burglary.

People v. Oliveras*, 993 N.E.2d 1241 (N.Y. 2013) (affirming 936 N.Y.S.2d 12 (N.Y. App. Div. 2011)). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately and timely move to suppress the defendant’s statements and to present psychiatric evidence challenging admission of the statements. While counsel did file a timely pretrial motion, it was denied with the trial court noting that counsel failed to produce the defendant’s psychiatric records. Months later, trial counsel filed an untimely motion to present psychiatric evidence, which was denied. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. The defendant confessed after being interrogated for over six and a half hours. The detectives were aware beforehand from the defendant’s mother that he had been hospitalized for mental illness as a child. A pretrial psychiatric examination, conducted on motion of defense counsel, revealed that the defendant has a learning disability and “certain mental health issues,” including auditory hallucinations. When counsel moved to suppress the confessions, he did not supply these records to the court. Counsel did not have a valid strategy: “It simply cannot be said that a total failure to investigate the facts of a case, or review pertinent records, constitutes a trial strategy resulting in meaningful representation.” Prejudice was also clear as “no other evidence directly connected defendant with the murder. The 911 caller’s description of the perpetrator did not match defendant’s ethnicity or attire.”

2012: Pryor v. State, 973 N.E.2d 629 (Ind. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in resisting law enforcement case for failing to timely file demand for jury trial. Under state law, the demand was required to be filed at least ten days prior to the trial date, but the motion was filed only six days prior to the scheduled trial date and was denied due to untimeliness. Prejudice established.

People v. Wright*, 971 N.E.2d 549 (Ill. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel in aggravated criminal sexual assault case ineffective for failing, in the course of a motion to exclude DNA evidence, to inform the trial court of the results of a search of the Illinois database based on 9-loci. The prosecution was based almost entirely on “a cold-case DNA match” eight years after the crime. DNA was recovered from the victim’s underwear and rectal swabs. The underwear was tested using the “standard” 13 loci evaluation. There was not match, but the defendant could not be excluded. The rectal swabs were examined using only 9 loci and the examiner reported “a match” to defendant. Defense counsel moved to exclude the DNA evidence done with only 9 loci. As an alternative, citing an Arizona study, the defense asked that the court order the State to determine how many 9 loci “matches there are in [the State’s] convicted database.” After the motions were denied, the defense proceeded with a consent defense. The court held that the trial court erred in failing to order a DNA database search and in barring the defense from cross-examining the State’s expert about the Arizona study. Likewise, the court found that counsel was ineffective in litigating the DNA suppression motion. “[C]ounsel was asking the trial court to order a database search, that had already been done, and that had been done at the request of the same counsel.” Not only had the search been done, but “the state’s own director of that database had stated [in a deposition in the earlier case] that it was ‘misleading’ to call a nine-loci comparison ‘a match.’” The database search “had revealed that close to 2000 individuals had matched at 9 loci.” If the court had known this, there is a reasonable probability the court would have granted the defense’s motion to exclude the 9-loci analysis.”

State v. Madsen*, 813 N.W.2d 714 (Iowa 2012). Counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to move to suppress the defendant’s statements, which were made only after impermissible leniency promises to him. The defendant was charged with molesting neighborhood boys. During his interrogation, police implied that he would be released and no information would be provided to the news or his employer if came “clean on everything.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial because under the state’s “common law evidentiary test,” the confession was inadmissible because it was obtained while the defendant was “influenced by any threat or promise.” Here, the defendant was threatened with an adverse newspaper story and promised a quick wrap up and release if he confessed.

Ennenga v. State*, 812 N.W.2d 696 (Iowa 2012). Counsel ineffective in eluding officer and drug possession case for failing to move to dismiss the state's untimely trial information. A state rule required dismissal "if an indictment or trial information is not 'found' within forty-five days of the defendant's arrest, unless the State can show good cause for its failure." Here, the trial court timely signed a trial information, but the information was not filed with the clerk of court until 56 days after arrest. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object. No showing of prejudice was required under the state rule. Thus, the charges would have been dismissed if counsel had moved to dismiss.

People v. Delgado*, 956 N.Y.S.2d 579 (N.Y. App. Div. 2012). Counsel ineffective in burglary trial for failing to request a pretrial hearing to limit the scope of the prosecution's cross of the defendant concerning his prior conduct. While evidence was properly admitted concerning the defendant's prior burglary convictions, which were relevant to motive, counsel failed to object to cross of the defendant concerning the underlying facts of the prior burglaries, which were similar to the charged crime.

State v. Canty*, 736 S.E.2d 532 (N.C. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in firearms case for failing to move to suppress the evidence obtained during a traffic stop. The defendant was a passenger in the vehicle but had standing to challenge the stop, which was initiated on the basis of the driver allegedly crossing the fog line, nervousness and failure to make eye contact when the officers drove up, and slowed speed. Counsel's conduct was deficient as these factors fall short of reasonable suspicion. The police video showed that the fog line was not crossed and, thus, there was no traffic violation before the officer initiated the stop. Counsel knew this. The officer's testimony was questionable in that it was "hard to believe" that the officer can determine nervousness while driving beside the car. Likewise, the "slowed speed" did not amount to anything as the vehicle only slowed from 65 mph to 59 mph, which is hardly significant. Even if the officer's testimony was accepted as true, "[n]ervousness, slowing down, and not making eye contact is nothing unusual when passing law enforcement stationed on the side of the highway." Prejudice established as the weapons recovered in the search following the illegal stop was the only evidence against the defendant.

2011: Gordon v. State, 126 So.3d 292 (Fla. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to move for a judgment of acquittal as the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to establish the element of great bodily harm. The defendant struck the victim "one time with a belt, which caused bruises that healed without any medical treatment, and left neither scarring nor any other lasting effects."

State v. Brubaker*, 805 N.W.2d 164 (Iowa 2011). Counsel ineffective in unlawful possession of a prescription drug case for failing to specify, as a ground for directed verdict, the insufficiency of evidence to support the charge. Syringes, a pipe, and an unlabeled prescription pill bottle with 51 yellow pills were found in the defendant's car. A criminalist testified, after simply by comparing the pills with a picture, that the pills were "consistent in appearance" with Clonazepam, a controlled substance for which a prescription is required. "Just because a pill looks like Clonazepam does not mean it is Clonazepam." Indeed, the court found that the pills were similar in size, shape, and consistency to aspirin and a number of other over-the-counter drugs. Likewise, the fact that the pills were in an unlabeled prescription bottle and found with syringes and a pipe was insufficient to establish illegal drug use as the State presented no evidence that Clonazepam could be smoked or injected into the body. While counsel made a broad motion for directed verdict, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move for a directed verdict on these specific grounds. Prejudice was clear as the trial court would have sustained a specific motion.

State v. Brown*, 253 P.3d 859 (Mont. 2011). Counsel ineffective in DUI and other misdemeanor case for failing to move for dismissal due to untimely scheduling of trial following initial mistrial. Under state law, the state was allowed six months after a mistrial on misdemeanor charges to bring case to retrial. While counsel did not object initially when the case was scheduled outside that window, there was no waiver as the defendant had no duty to bring himself to trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient, however, in failing to move to dismiss the charges after the six month period. There was "extreme prejudice"—"a conviction instead of a dismissal."

State v. Barlow*, 17 A.3d 843 (N.J. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 2011). Counsel ineffective for failing to assist the defendant in his motion to withdraw a guilty plea to robbery and, thereby, depriving him of counsel at a crucial stage of the proceedings. A week after the plea hearing the defendant wrote to counsel seeking to withdraw plea. Counsel took no action, but the judge, who also received a letter from the defendant held a hearing. During the hearing, counsel did not pursue the motion for the defendant and, in fact, made statements damaging to his motion and apparently provided his letter to her to the court (which also included damaging statements). The court's decisions were undoubtedly colored by these facts. New motion hearing with new counsel and new judge ordered.

Smith v. State, 357 S.W.3d 322 (Tenn. 2011) (sentenced in 1995). Counsel ineffective in capital murder case for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence supporting his motion to recuse the sentencing judge due to bias. The defendant was initially arrested in 1984 and convicted and sentenced to death in 1985. He was convicted again and sentenced to death in a 1989 retrial. Following vacation of his death sentence, he was again sentenced to death in a 1995 retrial on sentence. The judge on the initial two trials had retired so a new judge was assigned for the third go-round. He sua sponte changed venue and denied a defense motion to recuse himself on the grounds that he had been the prosecuting attorney on a prior conviction of robbery and DUI. Counsel appealed both issues and obtained reversal of the change of venue order but lost on the denial of recusal issue. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present the facts in support of the recusal motion. If counsel had performed adequately the record would have shown that, in 1984 and 1985 while the capital charges were initially pending, the judge was a prosecutor in a different county on the robbery and DUI charges that were pending at the same time. The judge/prosecutor was communicating and cooperating with the capital prosecutor through correspondence and phone calls. Following the robbery and DUI convictions, the judge/prosecutor provided the capital prosecutor with certified copies of the convictions, which were introduced in the capital sentencing proceedings to support the sole aggravating factor. In sentencing on the robbery and DUI case, the judge/prosecutor sought unsuccessfully to elicit testimony of the capital murder conviction. He also sought a sentence consecutive to the murder sentences (one life and one death) because Tennessee had not actually carried out a death sentence. In 1989, which the defendant was pending new trial on the capital murder case, he was charged with introducing contraband into the county jail. The judge/prosecutor presided over this contraband case “less than one year after he had been actively defending” the robbery/DUI convictions. He sentenced the defendant as a “persistent offender based in part on the convictions [he] had obtained as a prosecutor.” Then came the capital resentencing in 1995 with the judge/prosecutor assigned. The sole aggravating factor was that the defendant had been convicted of one or more felonies involving the use or threat of violence. One of the convictions used to establish this aggravator was prosecuted by the judge. After the state’s case, the judge held that the defendant could waive presentation of mitigation and final argument, and “approved the death penalty as thirteenth juror.” “The State does not take issue with th[e] holding” that counsel’s conduct was deficient. The issue is one of prejudice. The court found that “the roles of prosecutor Brown and Judge Brown were too closely connected,” such that “a person of ordinary prudence would have a reasonable basis for questioning Judge Brown’s impartiality.” Under these circumstances, no evidence of actual bias was required.

The justice meted out in this case did not “satisfy the appearance of justice.” The potential injury to the judicial process due to the appearance of impropriety and unfair lack of impartiality by a judge imposing a death sentence is too great to allow the sentence of death to stand.

Ken v. State*, 267 P.3d 567 (Wyo. 2011). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to timely file a motion for new trial. Prejudice established as the trial court would have granted the motion.

2010: Suluki v. State, 691 S.E.2d 622 (Ga. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of weapon case for failing to move to suppress the gun. The police went to a hotel with arrest warrants to arrest two murder suspects and the defendant was in the company of one of them. When he arrived at his room, officers surprised him from within, took him down to the floor, cuffed him, and questioned him about a murder before the gun was located in the back of his waistband. Counsel was ineffective for failing to move to suppress the evidence.

Lewis v. State*, 929 N.E.2d 261 (Ind. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective for failing to timely file request for jury trial in misdemeanor battery case. At the defendant’s initial hearing, he informed the court that he wanted a jury trial. The trial court’s “Case Summary” clearly indicated that fact. Counsel was appointed, thereafter, but counsel should have known from the court paperwork of the defendant’s desires and should have timely filed the motion instead of waiting until the day of the scheduled trial. Because the motion had not been filed 10 days prior to trial, as required under the rules, the motion was denied. Because counsel’s error deprived the defendant of his constitutional right to “trial by jury,” prejudice was presumed.

2009: Thrasher v. State, 684 S.E.2d 318 (Ga. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in driving under the influence of methamphetamine case for failing to move to suppress the chemical test of the defendant's blood sample because the defendant was not read his implied consent rights at the time of his arrest at the scene of the accident as required by state law.

Frazier v. State*, 680 S.E.2d 553 (Ga. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for waiving any objection to the admission of the defendant's videotaped statement taken in violation of Miranda. The defendant was charged with shooting at his business partner, with whom he had a pending lawsuit, from outside the business. After his arrest, while in custody, the defendant repeatedly stated that he did not want to talk and asked for a lawyer. The police ignored him though and got him to sign a Miranda waiver and interrogated him. Counsel specifically waived a pretrial hearing on admissibility and did not object when the state played the videotaped statement in its case-in-chief. On the videotape, the defendant appeared intoxicated and repeatedly used profanity. He initially denied being at the scene but then admitted that he "probably" shot at the building. He repeatedly denied shooting at the victim and said he would be dead if he had. He repeatedly asked if he was dead. The defendant testified during the trial. He admitted firing his gun but testified that he only fired into the air as a warning to possible intruders because he heard "a crash." Shell casings from his gun were found at the scene. Bullets recovered from the building were similar to his gun, but could not be specifically linked to his gun. Counsel testified that he did not object to admission of the videotaped statement because he knew the defendant planned to testify and counsel assumed the entire statement would be admissible for impeachment purposes. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the statement "was simply not admissible during the prosecution's case-in-chief." Prejudice found because "the jury's verdict likely turned on the credibility of the witnesses," including the defendant. "Given the inflammatory nature of [the videotaped] statement, we cannot conclude that its admission did not affect his credibility; certainly, admission of the statement undermines our confidence in the verdict."

State v. Veney*, 977 A.2d 570 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2009). Counsel ineffective in possession of weapon case for failing to move for dismissal of charge prior to plea because the state had previously tried the defendant on another charge arising from the same core set of facts and was, thus, barred from prosecuting this charge, pursuant to the state mandatory joinder rule.

State v. Sutherby*, 204 P.3d 916 (Wash. 2009). Counsel ineffective in failing to move to sever charges for possession of child pornography from charges for child rape and molestation. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on legitimate strategic or tactical reasons. "There is no indication of any possible advantage to the defendant in having a joint trial on all charges, given the State's announced intent to use the pornography counts to show [the defendant's] predisposition to molest children. Even the trial judge appeared to expect a severance motion because he asked at a pretrial hearing if severance was a possibility." Prejudice established because "the trial judge likely would have granted a severance under the relevant considerations, with the result that the outcome at a separate trial on child rape and molestation charges would likely have been different." While the state's evidence was strong on the pornography charges, it was weaker on the rape and molestation charges. Thus, the state consistently argued that the presence of child pornography on the defendant's computers proved he sexually abused his granddaughter and there was no limiting instruction directing the jury that the evidence of one crime could not be used to decide guilt for a separate crime.

Capital Case*

If the charges had been severed, it is “highly likely” that the pornography evidence would have been excluded in a separate trial for rape and molestation.

2008: Sparkman v. State, 281 S.W.3d 277 (Ark. 2008). Counsel ineffective in rape of child case for failing to move to suppress the defendant’s custodial statement taken after the appointment of counsel and, thus, in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in that counsel moved to suppress the statement for other reasons but not on this one which was valid and would have been granted. Prejudice was clear because the only other evidence was a taped interview of the child. On direct appeal, the defendant’s confrontation issue was rejected because the tape was merely cumulative of the defendant’s confession and, therefore, harmless.

People v. Givens*, 892 N.E.2d 1098 (Ill.Ct.App. 2008). Counsel in drug case ineffective in withdrawing motion to quash arrest and suppress evidence motion because the police officers’ warrantless entry into the bedroom occupied by the defendant as an overnight guest of the apartment holder who consented to search of the apartment was not justified by any of the factors supporting a finding of exigency and the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the bedroom. Prejudice found because “the 21 bags of drugs would not have been admitted in evidence.”

2007: McNabb v. State, 967 So. 2d 1086 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in case involving two separate but similar drug offenses for failing to secure a severance of the charges.

Spioch v. State*, 954 So. 2d 47 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in case of four counts of sexual activity with a minor in a custodial relationship, one count of attempt, and 23 counts of lewd and lascivious assault on a minor for failing to adequately move for a judgment of acquittal on 13 counts of lewd and lascivious assault. While counsel did move for acquittal, counsel’s conduct was deficient because “his motion was simply a bare-bones motion” that “did not sufficiently set forth the grounds upon which relief was requested.” Prejudice established because an adequate motion would have led to seven counts being dismissed for lack of evidence to support the conviction, one count being dismissed because the charging document did not allege sufficient elements to define a crime, and five counts being dismissed on double jeopardy grounds because these acts occurred when the sexual activity counts occurred. Acquittal entered on these 13 grounds and remanded for resentencing.

Maymon v. State*, 870 N.E.2d 523, amended on rehearing, 875 N.E.2d 375 (Ind. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for failing to move for severance of charges. The defendant was charged with four burglaries with four separate victims over a period of three months. Two of the burglaries involved thefts while two did not. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because, under state law, the burglaries were not connected together in a single scheme or plan and the defendant was entitled to severance. Prejudice found because the evidence of the two burglaries where thefts occurred would not be admissible at separate trials for the two burglaries where thefts did not occur. Those convictions remanded for new trial on rehearing.

Capital Case*

Alexandre v. State, 927 A.2d 1155 (Me. 2007). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter and kidnaping case for failing to move to dismiss the kidnaping charge based on the statute of limitations. The limitations period was five years, but was extended for six years due to the defendant's absence from the state. Nonetheless, the indictment was not returned until more than 12 years after the date of the alleged offense. Counsel's conduct was deficient and was not explained by counsel's "reason" for not filing the motion, which was that he thought the defendant would be acquitted on that charge. Prejudice found even though the defendant's manslaughter conviction and length of sentence were not affected.

[T]he simple reality that one or two or more simultaneous criminal convictions may result in a longer sentence of incarceration for a defendant's future convictions, create liability under recidivist statutes, impose a stigma, be used for impeachment, or "act as an impediment to clemency, pardon, more lenient conditions of imprisonment, and professional licensing. This is certainly true for a conviction for a crime as serious and socially abhorrent as kidnapping.

Id. at 1168.

Gant v. State, 211 S.W.3d 655 (Mo. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in second-degree trafficking case by eliciting—during cross-examination of the state's witness during the suppression hearing—the evidence that established probable cause for arrest. Drugs and a weapon had been found in a hotel room registered to another person and officers had that man's photo ID. Officers waited nearby and arrested the defendant, who looked nothing like the man in the ID, as he approached the room with a key in his hand. This was all that the state's evidence in the suppression hearing established, which alone was insufficient to establish probable cause. On cross-examination, however, defense counsel elicited the testimony that established probable cause for the arrest. Specifically, a motel employee connected a man fitting the defendant's description to the room and recognized his car and police informants described a man fitting the defendant's description as being connected with drug activity in the area. "Trial counsel's elicitation of evidence that supported the State's case constitutes conduct falling below that of a reasonably competent and diligent attorney." Id. at 660. Prejudice found because the defendant was not charged with the drugs or weapon in the room but was instead charged with possession of drugs found in his pocket in a search incident to arrest. This evidence likely would have been suppressed if counsel had performed adequately. New trial granted.

Yecovenko v. State, 173 P.3d 684 (Mont. 2007). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in sexual abuse and sexual assault case for failing to adequately assert a motion for severance. The sexual assault charges alleged offenses involving the daughters of the defendant's former girlfriend. The sexual abuse charges were based on ten unrelated child pornography pictures. Trial counsel moved to sever but did not provide any specific detail to allege prejudice even after the state noted the deficiency and the court denied on this basis. While appellate counsel asserted error in the denial of the motion, counsel did not assert the ineffectiveness of trial counsel as a basis. Thus, the appellate court also denied on a procedural basis. Trial and appellate counsel's conduct was deficient. Specifically, with respect to appellate counsel: “Presenting new arguments on appeal without justification for doing so, in light of the volume of cases holding that such arguments will not be entertained, falls short of reasonable professional assistance.” Prejudice was found with respect to the sexual assault conviction because the unrelated pictures “were, quite simply, horrific,” such that the trial court had cleared the courtroom and allowed each image to be displayed to the jury for only five seconds.

State v. Miner*, 733 N.W.2d 891 (Neb. 2007). Counsel ineffective in theft by unlawful taking case for failing to assert a double jeopardy bar to prosecution. The defendant was tried and convicted in Holt County for the theft of 62 steers from a Livestock Market in Holt County. Some of these steers (26 to be precise) were sold through a livestock market in Nance County where the defendant had been tried and convicted of theft by receiving stolen property prior to the case in Holt County coming to trial. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “counsel was charged with knowledge of the legal principles with respect to consolidation of theft offenses in Nebraska,” which precluding two theft charges based on “‘one scheme or course of conduct from one person’ on the same day.” Counsel’s conduct was not explained by strategy. Prejudice found because the double defense was meritorious.

State v. Brown, 873 N.E.2d 858 (Ohio 2007). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to request a formal ruling on whether the defendant and the state’s primary witness were actually married. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because there was a spousal privilege under state law and evidence from a marriage license and witnesses that the defendant was married to the witness. Although the witness denied it at trial, she had made contradictory pretrial statements. If counsel had requested a pretrial ruling and the court found that there was a marriage, state law required the court to instruct the witness on the spousal competency and make a finding on the record that she voluntarily chose to testify. Prejudice found because state law holds that failure to do so is reversible plain error. In addition, this was the only eyewitness testimony and the defendant was eligible for the death penalty only because he was convicted of aggravated murder based on a finding of prior calculation and design. Even if the only difference was in the “final sentence, in this case, that difference is monumental—it is the difference between life and death.” Id. at 870. The court also found a Brady violation and considered cumulative prejudice from both because “it might be possible to conclude that [the defendant] was not prejudiced” on the individual claims. Reversal required.

West v. Director of Dept. of Corrections*, 639 S.E.2d 190 (Va. 2007). Counsel ineffective in aggravated involuntary manslaughter, involuntary manslaughter, and DUI case for failing to assert a double jeopardy objection to convictions both for statutory offense of aggravated involuntary manslaughter and common law offence of involuntary manslaughter. While counsel objected to sentencing on both offenses he did not state that his argument rested on constitutional or double jeopardy grounds. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the common law offense does not require proof of a fact different from those required for conviction of the statutory offense. Even though the trial court gave concurrent sentences, prejudice was found because the defendant was convicted of two felonies and given two punishments. The common law conviction and sentence were set aside.

2006: People v. Boyd, 845 N.E.2d 921 (Ill. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in multiple charge case for failing to invoke the defendant's statutory speedy-trial rights with respect to home invasion charges. The defendant was entitled to trial within 120 days from the date he was taken into custody unless his own acts occasioned delay. Here, although all of the charges arose from a single incident, the state filed charges against the defendant on three different dates. While the defendant had agreed to a continuance on initial charges, the home invasion charges were filed after the defendant agreed to continue the initial charges. The speedy-trial clock expired on the home invasion charges prior to trial, but counsel failed to request the discharge.

Morris v. State*, 639 S.E.2d 53 (S.C. 2006). Counsel ineffective in assault and battery with intent to kill trial for failing to request a continuance, which resulted in the defendant being tried in absentia. The defendant showed up on the scheduled trial date, signed a sentencing sheet in anticipation of entering a guilty plea to the lesser-included charge of assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature, and then left the courthouse. He could not be located when his case was called so he was tried in absentia. Counsel's conduct was deficient because she objected to trial in absentia, but failed to move for a continuance in order to enter the guilty plea agreed to with the State. Prejudice found because the refusal of a continuance would have amounted to an abuse of discretion where ABHAN, the crime the defendant agreed to plead guilty too, is a common law misdemeanor punishable by up to ten years in prison, while ABIK, for which he was tried and convicted, is a violent crime felony punishable by up to twenty years in prison.

Compton v. State*, 202 S.W.3d 416 (Tex. Ct.App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in aggravated perjury case for failing to move to dismiss the indictment even though the indictment was filed 75 days after the expiration of the two year statute of limitations period. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he assumed the three year period for all other felonies applied and "[a] modest amount of research . . . would have disclosed an uncontradicted line of recent cases holding that aggravated perjury has a two year limitation period." "Without a firm command of the law governing the case, a lawyer cannot render effective assistance to the defendant." Prejudice found because "undeniable" since the motion to dismiss had merit.

State v. Perez-Avila*, 131 P.3d 864 (Utah Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in DUI and felony automobile homicide case for failing to move to consolidate the charges because under state law the DUI was a lesser included offense of the felony automobile homicide.

State v. Horton*, 146 P.3d 1227 (Wash. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in possession with intent to manufacture and possession of drugs case for failing to move to suppress evidence from a pat-down search. The officer stopped a vehicle for traffic violations and observed materials in the back seat, which led to a valid search warrant for the car. Prior to obtaining the warrant, the officer performed a pat-down search of the defendant, who was a passenger in the car, and found a cigarette pack with a small baggie of methamphetamine inside. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel moved to suppress the evidence due to a pretextual stop but failed to move to suppress on the basis that the pat-down was an illegal search. A valid pat-down search is limited to objects that might be used as weapons, which would not include the cigarette pack or its contents or items subsequently found in the defendants pockets, which included a pill bottle containing ephedrine and a digital scale. Prejudice found.

State v. Meckelson*, 135 P.3d 991 (Wash. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to move to suppress evidence on the basis that the officer's traffic stop was pretextual. While the officer stopped the defendant after the defendant made a right turn without signaling, the officer had begun following the defendant's car for the legally insufficient reason that the defendant had given the officer a "deer-in-the-headlight" look. Counsel's conduct was deficient because it is not enough for the state to show that there was a traffic violation, but rather the question is whether the traffic violation was the real reason for the stop. Prejudice found because there was a reasonable probability the motion to suppress would have been granted.

2005: Thompson v. Commissioner of Correction, 880 A.2d 965 (Conn.Ct.App. 2005). Counsel ineffective for failing to file a motion to dismiss a count of failure to appear because of the delay between the issuance and the execution of the warrant such that the statute of limitations had expired. The defendant was charged with various sexual assault charges in addition to two charges of failure to appear for earlier scheduled court dates. Prejudice found because there is a reasonable probability that the charge would have been dismissed by the trial court because the defendant lived in state the whole time and had been arrested 15 times since the warrant for failure to appear had issued and each time provided his correct address and driver's license number.

People v. Hernandez*, 840 N.E.2d 1254 (Ill. Ct.App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to move to suppress the defendants videotaped statement to an assistant prosecutor, which clearly revealed that the defendant had invoked his right to silence in a clear and unequivocal fashion. Nonetheless, the prosecutor continued the interrogation. Counsel moved to suppress the statement on other grounds, but not this ground and this failure was not explained by strategy. Prejudice found because the statement would have been excluded and the state's case was largely based just on this statement because there was no eyewitness testimony or physical evidence.

State v. Becker*, 110 P.3d 1 (Mont. 2005). Counsel ineffective in drug possession and drug manufacture case for failing to move to dismiss the possession charge as a violation of double jeopardy under the state constitution and statutes. Because the state could not prove manufacture of drugs without first proving possession, state law prohibited conviction on both because the possession was a lesser included offense of the manufacturing charge. Possession charge dismissed and case remanded for resentencing.

People v. Turner*, 840 N.E.2d 123 (N.Y. Ct. App. 2005). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in manslaughter case for failing to assert a statute of limitations defense. The defendant was arrested 16 years after the crime and charged with second degree murder, which has no statute of limitations. During trial, the prosecutor requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of manslaughter. Counsel objected only on the basis of not offering the jury a compromise. The jury convicted only on manslaughter, which had a five year limitations period. Although the statute allows some tolling, the maximum period for tolling is an additional five years. Trial and appellate counsel's conduct was deficient because there was case law from 1914 supporting the argument, which was old but still valid. In addition, while there was some contrary precedent and the law may not have been definitively settled at the time of trial, "[a] reasonable defense lawyer at the time of defendant's trial might have doubted that the statute of limitations argument was a clear winner—but no reasonable defense lawyer could have found it so weak as to be not worth raising." Trial counsel should have asserted the issue. Appellate counsel should have asserted the ineffectiveness of trial counsel on this point.

Commonwealth v. McClellan*, 887 A.2d 291 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2005). Counsel ineffective in third degree murder and conspiracy case for failing to provide, in a timely manner, the identity and opinion of the defense expert, which resulted in the exclusion of the expert's testimony. The defendant's child died only about 15 minutes after the defendant returned from a convenience store where she was caught on the surveillance tape. When she returned home, she and her boyfriend were alone with baby for a few minutes before a friend entered and found the defendant with the child saying something was wrong with him. Paramedics were called, but the child died from extensive, recently inflicted injuries. Appellant and her boyfriend were charged. From the beginning, counsel discussed the need to secure an expert witness in forensic pathology to understand the scientific principles involved and present testimony concerning the timing of the injuries. Counsel initially retained a different expert and fought the court's orders for disclosure before ultimately disclosing this expert's report and allowing a deposition. Even prior to his deposition, counsel had retained a second expert, however, but counsel never disclosed this information until shortly before the conclusion of the trial. The trial court excluded this expert's testimony because of the untimely disclosure. Counsel expressed no strategy for the untimely disclosure. Counsel simply did not expect that the court would exclude the testimony. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "counsel were or should have been aware the trial court required disclosure of their experts' opinions and reports, based in particular on their previous experience" with their first expert. "[C]ounsel's actions exhibited either a lack of knowledge of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, constituting incomplete investigation into the law, or a deliberate attempt to frustrate the Commonwealth's right to learn of the witness, constituting a violation of both the Rules of Professional Conduct and the ABA Standards." Prejudice found because this expert would have testified that, in his opinion, the child's injuries were inflicted during the time period when the defendant was clearly away from home.

2004: United States v. Little, 851 A.2d 1280 (D.C. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to timely move to suppress the defendant's unwarned custodial statement. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the defendant was in custody at the time of his written confession, but he had not been given the Miranda warnings. Thus, the statement should have been suppressed. Although counsel asserted a weak strategic reason and that there was no merit to the motion, counsel had made a motion, during the trial, to suppress the statement, which was denied as untimely. If counsel had adequately investigated, counsel would have also been aware that the issue had merit. There was also a reasonable probability of a different outcome at trial if the statement had been suppressed.

Capital Case*

Bruton v. State*, 875 So. 2d 1255 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in exploitation of an elderly person and third degree grand theft case for failing to move to dismiss the grand theft charge as a lesser included offense. The basic facts were that the defendant wore a nurse's uniform in a hospital, pretending to be a care giver, and stole the victim's diamond ring. Because the two crimes involved one act of taking the same property, convictions on both counts violated double jeopardy. Even though the precedent for this ruling had not been decided at the time of trial, "this is an issue that trial counsel should have recognized."

Collier v. State*, 598 S.E.2d 373 (Ga. Ct. App. 2004), aff'd on other grounds, 612 S.E.2d 281 (Ga. 2005). Counsel ineffective in homicide by vehicle case for failing to move to suppress blood and urine samples taken from the defendant. The defendant ran a red light and collided with another car, killing two people. The defendant refused to consent to blood and urine tests, but police threatened to obtain a search warrant and to forcibly use a catheter to obtain the samples if he did not consent. In the face of the threat, the defendant consented. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the consequences of refusing under state law did not include the possibility of a search warrant and forcible testing. The police, thus, misled the defendant and his consent was coerced and invalid. Prejudice found because the admission of the blood and urine results showing methamphetamine and amphetamine unquestionably harmed the defense.

Vann v. State*, 596 S.E.2d 722 (Ga. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in robbery and assault case for failing to move to sever the charge of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The evidence against the defendant for robbery and assault was based on shaky eyewitness testimony and a codefendant's statement. Because of the weapons charge, the defendant's prior conviction for receiving stolen property was admitted in evidence. Counsel did not move for severance because counsel wanted the jury to know about the prior conviction rather than wondering whether the defendant had prior convictions. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "counsel misunderstood the law concerning admission of bad character evidence." When the State introduced the prior conviction, the defendant's character was undoubtedly placed in evidence, even though the prior conviction was unrelated to the charges for which he was being tried. Prejudice found because even though the prior conviction was admitted only through certified documents referred to only once in the state's closing argument, trial counsel did not request a charge that the jury limit its consideration of the prior conviction to the charges of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Thus, the jurors were free to consider this evidence with respect to character and credibility when the evidence against the defendant was otherwise "far from overwhelming."

People v. Miller*, 806 N.E.2d 759 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in drug possession with intent to deliver plea case for failing to challenge third-party consent to search the defendant's zipped duffle bag where the drugs were found. Counsel moved to suppress the evidence, which was located in a home shared with the third-party in a locked storage cabinet containing some of the third-party's property but for which only the defendant had keys. The third-party consented to police opening the cabinet with a crowbar and drugs were found inside. The motion was denied, without any evidence that the drugs were actually in a zipped duffle bag, which the third-party informed police belonged to the defendant, but the police searched it anyway and found the drugs. Following the denial of the suppression motion, the defendant plead guilty. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present evidence of the zipped duffle bag. Counsel did not do so only because counsel's "mistake of law" in believing it was immaterial since the police had consent to open the storage cabinet. Prejudice found because, but for counsel's errors, the defendant would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial.

Firestone v. State*, 83 P.3d 279 (Nev. 2004). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in leaving the scene of an accident case for failing to challenge multiple convictions arising from one accident involving three victims. State statutes were clear that, "Since there was only accident, and one 'leaving,' the statute allows only one charge of leaving the scene of an accident, regardless of the number of people involved." Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to raise this meritorious issue. Two of the three convictions were vacated and the case was remanded for further proceedings.

State v. Reichenbach*, 101 P.3d 80 (Wash. 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in possession of methamphetamine case for failing to move to suppress the methamphetamine that was involuntarily abandoned in the course of an illegal seizure of the defendant. An informant notified the police on several occasions that the defendant was forcing him to drive to Canada so that the defendant could purchase drugs. On the last of these occasions, the police obtained a search warrant for the informant's car and the defendant's person. After the warrant was obtained, however, the informant notified the police that the defendant had been unable to purchase drugs and that he was not sure whether he would be able to do so. The police then staged an accident to stop the informant's car. With weapons drawn and pointed at the defendant, officers ordered the defendant to raise his hands. Before doing so, the defendant dropped a bag of methamphetamine on the floor next to the passenger seat. The defendant was removed from the car and the drugs were discovered during the search of the car. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move to suppress the drugs because the search warrant was invalid because the information supplied by the informant after the warrant was obtained negated probable cause. Failure to object could not be explained by any legitimate tactic. Moreover, although the informant consented to search of the car, the informant could not consent to seizure of the defendant's person. The defendant was "seized" at gunpoint, however, and his abandonment of the bag of drugs was in response to the unlawful seizure and, thus, involuntary. The seizure of the bag of drugs thus violated the state constitution. Prejudice was found because the conviction was dependent on admission of the bag of drugs.

2003: State v. Johnson, 837 A. 2d 1131 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2003), aff'd on other grounds, 940 A.2d 1185 (N.J. 2008). Counsel ineffective in weapons case for failing to move to suppress a handgun seized from the defendant. The police obtained a warrant to arrest the defendant's half-brother on domestic violence charges. When the police arrived at the defendant's stepfather's home, they asked for permission to enter after advising him they had multiple arrest warrants and they were concerned about the presence of a handgun. The stepfather allowed the police to enter the home to arrest his son. Following the arrest, the police frisked the son and then took him outside to the squad car. The officers went back into the home to begin searching for the gun. The defendant was on the phone in the kitchen and stated that he was just visiting. The police officer frisked him and then asked him to leave until the police finished with their search. The defendant agreed to leave but said he needed to gather his things. He took a DVD box and another small box from a closet and proceeded to leave. The police officer stopped him and questioned him about the contents of the box. After receiving conflicting answers, the officer searched the box and found a loaded handgun inside. Counsel did not move to suppress the handgun because he believed the motion would have lacked merit because the owner of the home had consented to police entry. Counsel's conduct was deficient because it was based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the law. The homeowner's consent may well not have been knowingly and voluntarily given in that the homeowner was confronted with multiple warrants for his son's arrest and may not have been advised of his right to refuse consent. Moreover, the homeowner's permission appeared to be limited to entry for purposes of affecting his son's arrest on the second floor. The police officers far exceeded the scope of this invitation because, by their own admission, they re-entered the premises once the son had been safely secured in the squad car in order to search the home. The search was also outside the scope of the limited area included in a search incident to arrest. A search warrant was, therefore, required. Prejudice found due to the critical significance of the handgun to the prosecution's case. The court ordered that a suppression hearing be conducted. If the court granted suppression, the convictions would be set aside. If the court denied suppression, the judgment of conviction will stand.

4. PROSECUTION EVIDENCE OR ARGUMENT

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Williams v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 112 F.4th 155 (3rd Cir. 2024). In case involving multiple charges, including murder, affirming the district court’s ruling that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the trial judge twice reading to the jury a non-testifying codefendant’s Criminal Information. Prior to petitioner’s trial, the codefendant (Cannon) pleaded guilty to the twenty-count Criminal Information, which included homicide and attempted homicide charges, aggravated assault, robbery, possessing controlled substances with intent to deliver, two firearms charges, flight to avoid arrest, and conspiracy charges related to each. Nine of those charges named petitioner as a coconspirator. Petitioner, who was charged with the same twenty counts, went to trial with a separate codefendant (Harden). During opening statement, defense counsel told the jury that Cannon had already come to court and admitted to killing the victim. At the conclusion of the opening statement, the Commonwealth complained that defense counsel mischaracterized the facts, noting that the homicide charge to which Cannon pleaded guilty to read: “In that the Defendant, acting as a principal and/or accomplice[,] ... did fire a gun at the victim striking him with a bullet.” To cure defense counsel’s misrepresentation, the trial court, without objection from defense counsel, read the jury Cannon’s entire Criminal Information rather than simply the homicide charge, including the specific references to petitioner. In closing argument, defense counsel again brought up the plea, downplaying the principal and/or accomplice verbiage in the Information and highlighting the language about having fired the gun at the victim. The Commonwealth responded to the argument by pointing out there was no admissible evidence establishing that Cannon pulled the trigger. The Commonwealth further called defense counsel’s statements disingenuous and noted that defense counsel referenced only the part on the plea that defense counsel wanted the jury to hear. The Commonwealth continued:

[I]f you are going to ascribe any importance to Rick Cannon pleading guilty as a principal or an accomplice to the homicide and the shooting, then you better ascribe that same importance to this. Rick Cannon pled guilty to Criminal Conspiracy with Akeita Harden and Eddie Williams to commit homicide. So if they want you to ascribe importance to one, you got to follow along with the other.

During its deliberations, the jury requested “the stipulation as to what Rick Cannon pled guilty to.” With the agreement of all counsel, the trial judge reread each count. The jury then found petitioner guilty of all twenty charges, including murder in the first degree. The state post-conviction court’s rejection of the ineffectiveness claim was flawed in many regards. For example, that court’s “determination that a motion to restrict the language of the Criminal Information was not certain to succeed was a clear misapplication of federal law, and counsel’s failure to object on two occasions to the reading of the Criminal Information was objectively unreasonable.” The state court’s decision also hinged on an unreasonable determination of the facts in that it erroneously assumed the only charge that was read to the jury and that was material to the court’s analysis was the first count on the homicide charge. “For defense counsel to allow the other counts to be read without the opportunity to cross-examine Mr. Cannon about Mr. Williams’s involvement in the shootings was objectively unreasonable.” Petitioner satisfied the deficiency prong of Strickland “when his attorney failed to object, request redactions, or request limiting instructions to the trial court’s reading of Mr. Cannon’s entire Criminal Information to the jury.” As to prejudice, assuming this was addressed by the state court, its analysis was contrary to federal law in that it faulted petitioner for failing to show that “an alternative offered a substantially greater prospect for success.” Looking to prejudice de novo, the appeals court observes: (1) in response to defense counsel, the Commonwealth in closing argument encouraged the jury to draw the substantive inference that petitioner was guilty of conspiracy based on Cannon’s admission despite there being insufficient direct evidence of an actual agreement between petitioner and Cannon to commit the homicide; (2) the jury note requesting that the Criminal Information be reread suggested that the jury was influenced by Cannon’s plea during deliberations; and (3) there were serious reliability concerns with much of the Commonwealth’s trial evidence. (The Commonwealth’s primary witness was the surviving victim but he had been shot in the head and could testify only by typing “yes” or “no” into a cell phone. There were concerns not only about his diminished capacity, but his testimony itself was often equivocal.)

Thus, considering the quality and not just the quantity of the Commonwealth’s evidence, the introduction and proliferation of Mr. Cannon’s Criminal Information is much more likely to have had the prejudicial effect of “improperly corroborating the[] less-than-credible [evidence], making it more likely that the jury would set aside their doubts in favor of a conviction.” (Citation omitted.) [¶] Cumulatively, these concerns lead us to believe that Mr. Williams has successfully shown that the reading of Mr. Cannon’s entire and unredacted Criminal Information had a “substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury’s verdict,” Brecht, 507 U.S. at 637, 113 S.Ct. 1710, satisfying Strickland’s prejudice prong.

2020: Stermer v. Warren, 959 F.3d 704 (6th Cir. 2020). In arson-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to prosecutorial misconduct where the prosecutor in closing argument: (1) repeatedly branded petitioner a liar; (2) misrepresented petitioner’s statements; (3) bolstered the credibility of other witnesses; and (4) and called petitioner a “diabolical, scheming, manipulative liar and a murderer.” Trial counsel’s consistent failure to object could not be deemed part of a reasonable strategy. Prejudice is established given that the case against petitioner was relatively weak and the prosecutor’s objectionable comments pervaded his closing argument. (Petitioner was also found to be entitled to habeas relief on the independent claim of prosecutorial misconduct. “Even under the forgiving standard of Darden coupled with AEDPA deference, it was unreasonable for the state court to conclude that the fairness of [petitioner’s] trial was not irreparably harmed by the prosecutor’s closing.”)

2018: Baer v. Neal*, 879 F.3d 769 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 586 U.S. 1045 (2018). In capital case from Indiana, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to improper and confusing penalty phase jury instructions as well as improper prosecutorial statements and the deficient performance was prejudicial as to the death sentence. Petitioner was convicted of two murders, robbery, theft, and attempted rape arising from a murder of a woman and her four-year-old daughter in their home. Petitioner had admitted that he had committed the crimes and sought to plead guilty but mentally ill, but the trial court rejected the plea, finding insufficient evidence of mental illness. At the penalty phase, the defense presented the testimony of Dr. Mark Cunningham, who described petitioner's social history, including prenatal and perinatal difficulties such as his mother's alcohol use and cancer while pregnant, petitioner's childhood in and out of foster care, the murder of his sister, his ADHD, head injuries, and substance abuse. Regarding the penalty phase instructions, trial counsel failed to object to modification of a jury instruction that eliminated intoxication as a basis for finding that the defendant lacked the capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of the law. Counsel also failed to object to the improper definition of intoxication as requiring involuntariness of the intoxication. Because counsel essentially failed to object to the removal of a mitigating factor from the jurors' consideration, the Seventh Circuit found his performance deficient under Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978). The state court's analysis of the jury instructions in isolation rather than in the context of the overall charge was unreasonable because a juror could have understood the complete penalty phase instructions as foreclosing evidence of voluntary intoxication from consideration for all purposes in sentencing. The timing under which the instructions were given was also important; although the instructions were a correct statement of the law with regard to the mens rea of the crime, and the aggravating factors, they were not correct statements of the law with regard to the mitigating factors. But the instructions were given at the penalty phase, and not in conjunction with the aggravating factor instructions, but rather at the end of the charges as a whole. The jurors also were given the general mitigation instruction that there were no limits on what they could consider mitigating much earlier and at a different time from the voluntary intoxication instruction, and language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction does not suffice to absolve the infirmity under Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). "It is unreasonable to assume jurors could catch the nuance that voluntary intoxication can be considered for mitigation, but not as evidence of criminal intent, without any clear instruction." 879 F.3d at 779. Trial counsel's failure to object was deficient, and the state court unreasonably found otherwise. The error was prejudicial because evidence of petitioner's mental health and drug use was the cornerstone both of the defense at guilt phase and also the defense's sole strategy for avoiding a death sentence, and the instruction blocked consideration of this crucial mitigating evidence. It was unreasonable of the state court to conclude otherwise. Regarding statements by the prosecutor, the prosecutor repeatedly made improper and prejudicial comments, and trial counsel and the trial court failed to address them, introducing doubt into the reliability of the results of the penalty phase trial. First, the prosecutor improperly conflated the standards of guilty but mentally ill and the legal defense of insanity. The insanity defense, which requires a finding that defendant has a severely abnormal mental condition that renders him unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct at the time of the offense" is a defense to intent and to guilt, while the guilty but mentally ill issue requires a finding that defendant suffers from an illness that "disturbs thinking, feeling, or behavior, and impairs ability to function" and has effect at the penalty phase but not at the guilt phase because it does not have an effect on his conviction. The prosecutor conflated these terms throughout the trial, starting during voir dire. The state court found that counsel's failure to object was "likely" strategic because counsel testified that he knew the prosecutor was capable of overstating his case and he was planning to correctly state the law to the jury. The Seventh Circuit found this analysis unreasonable, because "hoping the jury would decide that the prosecutor was not credible" is not strategic, especially where the difference between insanity and GBMI was never clarified. Second, the prosecutor repeatedly told the jurors (again beginning during voir dire) that the victims' family members wanted the jury to impose the death penalty. Trial counsel objected only one time to the violations of Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991). The state court acknowledged that the prosecutor's statements were problematic, but erroneously found that the prosecutor told the jury he misspoke – this did not occur. Furthermore, the trial court repeatedly stated that the court was not listening, and “missed numerous opportunities to stop or clarify the prosecutor's statements and his absence was noticeable throughout trial.” 879 F.3d at 786. Third, the prosecutor stated personal opinions and introduced facts not in evidence directing the jurors toward a death penalty verdict. For example, he said that it was possible that Indiana was going to change the law so LWOP would no longer be an option – there was no basis for this speculation. He also compared petitioner's crime to that of others he had personally seen and experienced. Petitioner's counsel did not object. And just because defense counsel argued that petitioner's crime wasn't the worst of the worst did not permit the prosecutor to argue what he did. “[J]ust because defense counsel cracked open the door to these subjects, it did not permit the prosecutor to drive a truck through it. The seditious and specific comments about the prosecutor's own mother, the community's layoffs, and 9/11 were all not hard blows, but beyond the pale foul ones.” 879 F.3d at 787. It was unreasonable for trial counsel not to object. The state court's finding that the prosecutor's improper comments did not cumulatively affect the outcome of the trial was unreasonable – the state court failed to aggregate prejudice even though it claimed to do so. “[I]t is nearly impossible that the comments did not impact the juror's [sic] decision to recommend the death penalty.” 879 F.3d at 788. “[The prosecutor's] misstatements were prolific and harmful to [petitioner's] case, yet [petitioner's] trial counsel failed to object at every opportunity. [The prosecutor's] comments began in voir dire, where his comments conditioned jurors to believe that [petitioner] was a liar, that mental illness was a ‘copout’ and ‘defense,’ that [petitioner] should not receive a GBMI conviction because he appreciated the wrongfulness of his actions (improperly using the insanity defense standard), life without parole was at a high risk of providing release, and the [victims'] family wanted a death sentence. All these comments were made before the jury heard any evidence in [petitioner's] case. Then at the close of penalty phase, [the prosecutor] again injected inflammatory comments and facts not in evidence, including remarks about [the prosecutor's] mother's prostitution, people being laid off to afford the state's pursuit of the death penalty, and [petitioner's] crime being worse than any of the prior 125 murders [the prosecutor] had heard of in his career in law enforcement. . . . Can we be certain that [petitioner] would not have been sentenced to death if given a fair trial and effective counsel? No. But it is ‘reasonably likely’ that without the prosecutor's injection of impermissible statements and incorrect law the jurors would not have recommended death.” 879 F.3d at 788-89.

2015: Zapata v. Vasquez, 788 F.3d 1106 (9th Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to improper prosecutorial arguments in rebuttal. The victim, a first-generation Mexican immigrant, was killed in a gang-infested area of Los Angeles, apparently because he was wearing a basketball jersey with the number 8, for Lakers star Kobe Bryant. The area was controlled by the Outside Posse (OSP), which was part of the Nortenos street gang, whose rival was the Sureños gang known as “Eighth Street.” Thus, according to the state's gang expert, the victim was a “marked man” by wearing the number 8. The Nortenos tend to be established U.S. residents who speak English rather than Spanish. The Sureños, on the other hand, tend to be first-generation Mexican immigrants who speak limited English. As a member of the OSP, the defendant had participated previously in attacks on Eighth Street gang members and Mexican Nationals. The state's case was built mostly on circumstantial evidence and clearly biased witnesses. The only eyewitness to the shooting testified that the shooter was angry and yelling, but could not provide any substance of what was said. Nonetheless, in rebuttal closing arguments – after describing “scrap” and “wetback” in opening statements as derogatory terms like the “N word” for Mexican nationals – the prosecutor asserted several times, including at the end of the rebuttal, that the defendant was yelling, “Fuckin’ scrap. You fuckin’ wetback” at the time of the shooting. Counsel’s conduct in failing to object to these arguments and ask for a curative instruction was deficient and prejudicial. While the state court agreed that the arguments constituted serious prosecutorial misconduct, the state court determination that counsel’s conduct might have been based on a reasonable strategy and that there was no prejudice were unreasonable determinations.

2013: Griffin v. Harrington, 727 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to object in a timely fashion to the unsworn testimony of a recanting jailhouse snitch. The victim was killed during a confrontation in Los Angeles involving rival street gangs during which at least forty bullets were fired from four different firearms. Nine months later, a jailhouse snitch informed police in a recorded statement that Griffin was the shooter. Griffin was arrested and charged based on this information. No other witness claimed to be able to identify Griffin as the shooter. By the time of Griffin’s trial, however, the snitch had decided to change his story. Defense counsel was aware of that fact and that, under state law, the likely consequence of the snitch’s repudiation of his prior statement would be that the prior recorded statement would be admitted “for the truth of the matter,” i.e. as substantive evidence of guilt. When the snitch was called, he simply answered “no” after the clerk read him the oath and asked him to “swear to tell the truth.” Without objection, the trial court then instructed the snitch to testify and allowed the prosecutor to treat him as a hostile witness. “On direct examination by the prosecutor, [the snitch] answered every question, but denied all knowledge of petitioner and the shooting, and also denied having ever identified petitioner to the police.” The next day, the prosecutor sought to admit the prior recorded statement through a detective. Defense counsel objected for the first time that the snitch had not given “sworn testimony” and his in-court statements “could not technically be considered evidence.” Counsel clearly knew at the time of the in-court statements that the snitch was not giving “sworn testimony” and counsel chose not to object at that time.

What [counsel] did not know and what he did not comprehend under settled state law, however, was that by failing timely to object to that testimony in combination with conducting cross-examination, he was waiving any objection he might have had to [the] testimony. The dire consequences of his ignorance on this point was first, that [the] prior inconsistent inculpatory statement then became admissible . . . ; and second, that [the defendant] would be barred on appeal from raising any issue related to [the] [un]sworn testimony. . . .

Thus, by waiting to object until after [the snitch] had been excused as a witness, and until the next day, [counsel] unwittingly sealed his client’s fate, both at the trial and on appeal.

Capital Case*

The Ninth Circuit rejected—as “objectively unreasonable”—the state court’s conclusion that counsel’s “decision not to object in a timely fashion was acceptably tactical” and not deficient conduct.

It is one thing to devise a litigation tactic that fails. That is a common occurrence in the courtroom. It is wholly another matter to devise a tactic without realizing not only that it cannot work, but that it will result in permanently depriving your client of the one opportunity he has to render inadmissible the prosecution’s only direct evidence linking him to the murder with which he is charged. With all respect, the state court’s strained reasoning runs afoul of the Supreme Court’s warning that courts should “not indulge [in] post hoc rationalization for counsel’s decisionmaking that contradicts the available evidence of counsel’s actions.”

Id. at 946 (quoting Harrington v. Richter, 131 S. Ct. 770, 790 (2011) (internal quotation marks omitted)). In short, the state court’s ruling was “beyond any possibility for fairminded disagreement.” Id. (quoting Richter, 131 S. Ct. at 787). Likewise, the state court’s “factual determinations” underlying its conclusions that counsel engaged in reasonable tactics and conduct “were plainly unsupported by the record and thus demonstrably and clearly erroneous.” Counsel’s conduct was also clearly prejudicial: “To add injury to injury, the damaging effect of trial counsel’s waiver at trial has now carried over into his client’s federal habeas proceedings, blocking him from raising substantial federal constitutional issues” related to the violation of his right to confront the witness at trial.

2007: Girts v. Yanai, 501 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 819 (2008). Counsel ineffective in aggravated murder case for failing to object to the prosecutor commenting on the petitioner’s silence three separate times during closing arguments. Prejudice found because trial counsel’s “failure to object exacerbated the prejudicial effect of the prosecutor’s statements.” The court found “a strong likelihood that at least one juror would have changed his mind if the improper and prejudicial statements would not have been made, especially because the prosecutor presented weak and limited evidence at trial.” The IAC also served as cause and prejudice to excuse the procedural default of the prosecutorial misconduct issue, which had been reviewed by the state court only under a plain error analysis. Case reversed on the misconduct issue also.

2005: Hodge v. Hurley, 426 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in child rape case for failing to object to the prosecutor’s “egregiously improper closing argument, the prosecutor commented on the credibility of witnesses, misrepresented the facts of the case, made derogatory remarks about the defendant, and generally tried to convince the jury to convict on the basis of bad character.” The prosecutor’s arguments, among other things, incorrectly informed the jury that they would have to disbelieve all of the victim’s family members to acquit, which was not true since two family members testified to seeing blood in the child’s underwear and abnormal behavior. The jury could have believed this without convicting the defendant. The prosecutor also implied that disagreement between state and defense experts “(who could very well have legitimate professional disagreements) meant that one of those witnesses must be perjuring him or herself.” Id. at 383. With respect to character, the prosecutor argued that the defendant, who was underage, regularly drank alcohol illegally and wanted to live off his family and not work, which was irrelevant and not based on any evidence before the court. The prosecutor also urged the jury to “put [itself] in the place of someone that might run into [the defendant] at night,” which is “a version of the impermissible ‘golden rule argument.’” Id. at 384. Under AEDPA, the state court’s decision was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent. Prejudice found because the result of the trial depended primarily on the jury’s credibility determination between the defendant and the 3 year old child’s mother, who claimed to have seen the rape. In addition, the trial court’s “generic jury instructions . . . were insufficient to dispel any prejudice from these statements.” Id. at 388 n.27.

Martin v. Grosshans*, 424 F.3d. 588 (7th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault case for failing to object to improper testimony and argument. The defendant was an ordained Episcopal priest charged with molesting a boy prior to 1988. The boy first raised the allegation in 1993 and the defendant learned about the allegation in 1994. During the state’s evidence, without objection from counsel, the state presented the testimony of a former prosecutor who had worked with the defendant in 1993 to develop a policy for dealing with allegation of sexual misconduct in the parish. She testified that his focus was greatly on protecting the accused clergymen and not the accusers. Counsel also did not object to testimony from a police officer, who met with the defendant in the presence of his counsel, that the defendant refused to answer questions about the allegations. Finally, counsel did not object or move for a mistrial based on the prosecutor’s argument that the jury should not be swayed by the defense’s strong character witnesses because even Jeffrey Dahmer had character witnesses. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because: (1) the former prosecutor’s testimony was irrelevant and prejudicial because the defendant was not even aware of allegations against him when these conversations occurred in a completely different jurisdiction years after the crimes alleged here and the defendant’s beliefs did not necessarily imply a guilty conscience; (2) the officer’s testimony was an improper comment on the defendant’s right to counsel; and (3) the prosecutor’s argument was inflammatory and improper, especially since this trial occurred in 1995 in Wisconsin when Dahmer’s case was fresh in people’s minds. Under AEDPA, the state court’s decision was contrary to Strickland because it placed the burden on the defendant to prove that, but for counsel’s errors, “the result of the proceeding would have been different. Prejudice was, therefore, considered de novo. “[E]ven if these errors, in isolation, were not sufficiently prejudicial, their cumulative effect prejudiced . . . [the] defense” where “the prosecution’s evidence was not overwhelming.”

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: Rosa v. Slaughter, 2023 WL 2754707 (D. N.J. March 31, 2023) (unpublished), aff’d, 141 F.4th 477 (3rd Cir. 2025). In burglary, robbery and attempted murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to prejudicial other crimes evidence. The trial court had granted the prosecution’s request to present limited evidence of other crimes in order to establish petitioner’s identity as the individual who shot the victim during the burglary in this case. Specifically, the trial court ruled that the prosecution could introduce evidence relating to a burglary occurring the night before the offense at issue, during which a nine millimeter Sig Sauer handgun was stolen and was then used to shoot the victim in this case the following day. The court also allowed the prosecution to introduce evidence relating to an eluding incident that occurred after the offense in this case. In that incident, the nine millimeter Sig Sauer handgun was discarded from a vehicle being pursued by police in which petitioner was a passenger. When witnesses testified regarding these other offenses, however, the prosecutor elicited numerous prejudicial details about those crimes with no objection from defense counsel or a request for a limiting instruction. In denying relief on the claim, the state post-conviction court found no deficient performance because trial counsel had challenged admission of other crimes evidence pre-trial. This was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland. Trial counsel should have been familiar with recent New Jersey Supreme Court precedent and objected to details of the other crimes. Further, based on the recent decision and other precedent, even if the trial court overruled the objection, “prevailing professional norms suggested defense counsel should have requested immediate limiting instructions” when evidence was introduced concerning the other crimes. Also objectively unreasonable was the state post-conviction court’s finding of no prejudice. Rather than ask whether there was a reasonable probability of a more favorable result but for trial counsel’s deficient performance, the state court applied a harmless error analysis. Regarding prejudice, it was notable that the judge who had issued the pretrial ruling about the eluding evidence had expressly warned that if testimony was elicited indicating that petitioner was prepared to shoot a police officer, as happened at the trial, a mistrial would be declared. Had trial counsel moved for a mistrial, there is a reasonable probability it would have been granted. Prejudice was not limited, however, to failure to request a mistrial based on that single instance of improperly admitted evidence.

If counsel had objected to all improper . . . testimony, and even if those objections were overruled, had he sought a limiting instruction when [the other crimes] evidence was permitted, there is a reasonable probability the jury would have followed those instructions. With each request for a limiting instruction, counsel had the opportunity to carefully tailor the instruction to remind the jury it could only consider the evidence to determine whether Petitioner possessed the gun at [the earlier burglary] . . . , and whether Petitioner threw the gun out the window [later] while eluding the police. If the jury was given a limiting instruction when the State introduced [the other crimes] evidence, which seems to have been much of the trial testimony, there was a reasonable probability the outcome of the trial would have been different.

Also objectively unreasonable was the state post-conviction court’s conclusion that the “almost entirely uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, was so strong that any trial error was harmless.” If there was any doubt about the prejudice prong on the record of this case, it was erased by the trial court’s erroneous limiting instruction to the jury which improperly focused on the commission of other crimes. “In the end, counsel’s deficient performance resulted in a trial where it was impossible for the jury to focus on the crimes that Petitioner was being tried for. Because of these errors, Petitioner was ultimately on trial for those alleged prior bad acts, and was denied a fair trial.”

2019: United States v. Frederiksen, 2019 WL 5395751 (D. Kansas Oct. 22, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of lying to federal agents during an investigation into illegal poker parties, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to timely file a post-trial motion seeking acquittal or a new trial where the prosecution's evidence was insufficient to support a conviction as to two elements of the charged crime; (2) failing to object to the prosecution's misstatement of the law during closing argument; and (4) failing to object to irrelevant and prejudicial evidence concerning other poker games throughout the trial.

2017: Bryant v. Thomas, 274 F.Supp.3d 166 (S.D.N.Y. 2017), aff'd, 725 Fed.Appx. 72 (2nd Cir. 2018).

Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to request serological testing of defendant's blood at trial for murder and sexual assault in 1976. Three witnesses said they saw defendant in the area on the day of the crime, but there was conflicting evidence about whether anyone saw him carrying a knife. All witnesses agreed defendant was wearing white pants and a light colored sweatshirt. The victim was found early the next morning in a stairwell where she had been raped and stabbed repeatedly. The crime scene contained a large amount of blood. Police went to defendant's apartment where he was found sleeping in his underwear and asked him to get dressed in the same clothes he had worn the evening before. Defendant put on white pants, a light colored sweatshirt and sneakers. He was interrogated over the course of a day and repeatedly denied any involvement in or knowledge of the crime. Later that evening, Detective William Brent arrived at defendant's interrogation room. Brent later testified that defendant voluntarily confessed to the crime, but defendant alleged he was physically coerced after Brent grabbed him, threw him to the floor and kicked him. Defendant's confession contained several inaccurate facts and details and no blood was found on his clothing. At trial, an expert for the State testified that the victim had type O blood and he did not conduct any tests to determine whether she was a secretor or a non-secretor. A sample taken from the victim's underwear reacted for type O blood from a non-secretor, but the expert was unable to determine whether the typing was from the blood or semen collected on the underwear. In 2010, defendant's new counsel requested blood testing, which determined that defendant has type B blood and is a secretor. At an evidentiary hearing, defendant's expert testified that the presence of a sperm head suggested there was enough semen present in the crime scene sample to type the blood type of the semen donor and that there was a high probability that the victim was a secretor, so the serological evidence excluded defendant. The State's expert disagreed and concluded the new serological evidence was inconclusive and had no weight. Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to consult a serology expert and to test defendant's blood type and secretor status. Trial counsel initially testified that he could not recall anything about defendant's trial. However, after reviewing portions of the record, trial counsel clearly stated that there was no strategic reason for him not to order serology tests and he never considered retaining a serologist. It was not surprising that counsel had no independent recollection of defendant's trial dating back several decades. That does not detract from the clarity of his post-reflection answers given under oath that he had no strategic reason for his failures and his admission that the use of serological evidence was simply not on his "radar" at the time of trial. Trial counsel's failures were objectively unreasonable. He knew that the sample from the victim's underwear had tested positive for type O blood and that the prosecution was going to call a serological expert to testify. A reasonable attorney in these circumstances would have, at a minimum, investigated further. The fact that defendant's blood type is type B would have severely undermined the prosecution's case. For similar reasons, counsel's failure was prejudicial. Even if this evidence did not conclusively exculpate defendant, it would still have been significant. It would have forced the prosecution to make a much less straightforward argument, such as the possibility that there was not enough semen present to accurately test for type B blood. The blood type evidence would have cast doubt on defendant's confession, which he testified was coerced. As such, it would have strongly supported the conclusion that the prosecution had not met its burden in proving guilt. Defendant has established a reasonable probability that absent the errors of his counsel, the outcome of his trial would have been different.

Jordon v. Hepp*, 260 F.Supp.3d 1046 (E.D. Wisc. 2017), appeal dismissed, 2017 WL 6513944 (7th Cir. Aug. 14, 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the prosecution's improper vouching of a witness's credibility. Defendant was convicted of reckless homicide, first-degree endangerment and being a felon in possession of a firearm. A key issue at trial was defendant's confession and his claim that law enforcement officers had misled him into signing the confession. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the detective who took defendant's confession was more credible because she had more to lose, asserting: "Somebody's lying. Who is it? She [the detective] is going to put her whole career and her future on the line for this case? She does this every day. She's investigating homicide cases every day for years. Who has the most to lose based on your verdict in this case? Her or him?" Id. at *2. The Seventh Circuit concluded that defendant's trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to object to a textbook case of improper vouching and defendant suffered prejudice, but remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether trial counsel had a strategic reason for his failure to object. Trial counsel testified that he had no independent recollection of the prosecutor's statements or any decision he may have made about whether to object to those comments. Trial counsel then added that he did recall thinking he did not want to draw the jury's attention to this issue because it was late in the day. Trial counsel also testified that he did not believe the prosecutor's comments rose to the level of vouching at all. Based on this testimony, the district court concluded that trial counsel did not remember the substance of the prosecutor's comments, did not believe the prosecutor's comments constituted vouching, and did not have a strategic reason for failing to object.

2009: Daly v. Burt, 613 F. Supp. 2d 916 (E.D. Mich. 2009). Under AEDPA, the District Court found a Confrontation Clause violation due to admission of nontestifying codefendants' statement and that the state court ruling was an unreasonable application of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004). The District Court also specifically adopted the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation as "the opinion of this Court." The R&R included an alternative finding of ineffective assistance of counsel, in the event the Confrontation Clause issue was found to be procedurally defaulted, for failing to object to the admission of these statements or to move for severance. The defendant was charged with attempted armed robbery and conspiracy to commit armed robbery. Following a tip to the police of a pending robbery at a McDonalds, the defendant was arrested outside the McDonalds with a ski mask and a hammer. One codefendant was with him and another was nearby waiting in a getaway car. Both codefendants confessed in writing that they intended to rob that manager as he was taking a bank deposit to the bank and that the hammer was to be used as a weapon. The defendant made only an oral statement. While a police officer testified that his statement was consistent with the codefendants, the defendant testified that he had intended to break and enter the McDonalds and steal from the safe rather than committing an armed robbery and that this is what he told police. Prior to their joint trial, counsel for one co-defendant moved for a severance or, alternatively, to exclude the statements of the others. The District Court denied the motion. The District Court's finding of admissibility was erroneous under Crawford, which was decided while the case was pending on appeal. Under Crawford, testimonial statements of nontestifying witnesses, including those made while in police custody, are inadmissible. Under pre-Crawford law in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), the statements were also inadmissible because they did not bear "adequate indicia of reliability." Specifically, the codefendants were shifting or stretching the blame while in police custody, which "weighed heavily against finding that there was an adequate indicia of reliability" even though the codefendants also admitted their own guilt. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on sound strategy.

[A] knowledge of the applicable law is essential to providing effective assistance, and considering the extensive Supreme Court case law discussed above, no competent attorney could have failed to recognize the confrontation clause violations that occurred because of the introduction of the out-of court statements of the non-testifying codefendants at the joint trial.

Prejudice established because "the out-of-court statements . . . were extremely persuasive proof" of the attempted armed robbery and the conspiracy, which carries a potential life sentence.

2008: Neri v. Hornbeak, 550 F. Supp. 2d 1143 (C.D. Cal. 2008). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder of her 16-month-old daughter for failing to object to the prosecutor's cross-examination of the defendant in violation of the trial court's previous ruling. In support of a pretrial motion, counsel had presented an unsigned "declaration" of the defendant. Prior to trial, the state requested a signed version. The hearings revealed that counsel had drafted the declaration on the basis of his notes of a discussion with the defendant, who was just learning English, and had shown it to her, but had not had it translated for her. She testified that there were inaccuracies in the declaration and it was corrected through her testimony and changes made to the declaration, which she then signed. The court ruled that she could be impeached if she testified by using her signed declaration or testimony, but not the unsigned declaration. Nonetheless, the prosecutor cross-examined her extensively about inconsistencies from the unsigned declaration without objection from defense counsel. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice was established because the defendant's credibility was a central issue. The major inconsistencies came from the unsigned declaration. Although there were some inconsistencies from her prior testimony and signed declaration, these inconsistencies were relatively minor in comparison and would not have been as harmful to her credibility. Prejudice was also clear because the jury deliberated for four days and nearly deadlocked even without this improper cross-examination.

2006: Wynters v. Poole, 464 F. Supp. 2d 167 (W.D.N.Y. 2006). Under AEDPA review for pro se petitioner, counsel ineffective in first degree rape case for failing to object to the prosecutor's cross-examination of the investigator who interrogated the petitioner. The investigator testified that he requested that the petitioner take a polygraph after he denied guilt and the petitioner terminated the interview and requested counsel. The alleged victim had made numerous inconsistent statements and did not report the rape for more than a year. Appellate counsel asserted that the prosecutor committed misconduct and that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object. The District

Capital Case*

Court construed the pro se pleadings to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness as "cause" and "prejudice" to overcome the procedural default of the state misconduct issue and found that counsel was ineffective. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the prosecutor's misconduct, which "effectively decimated" the petitioner's credibility in a case where his credibility and the alleged victim's credibility was the only real issue. The prosecutor's conduct rendered the trial "fundamentally unfair." The state court's holding to the contrary (on the merits, despite finding a procedural default) was an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent. Id. at 175 (citing Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168, 181-82 (1986)). In addressing this issue, the state court "approved of the way defense counsel handled the situation" and, therefore, summarily dismissed the ineffective assistance claim as "without merit." Because this was an adjudication on the merits, the District Court applied the AEDPA standards to this claim also. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the prosecutor deliberately implicated the petitioner's Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, and conveyed to the jury that it could infer guilt due to the petitioner's failure to submit to the polygraph. Although counsel attempted to mitigate the damage, "there is no evidence that he made an intelligent, tactical decision not to object." Instead, trial counsel "only reinforced the negative evidence elicited on direct examination" by having it repeated rather than objecting and moving for a mistrial or a curative instruction. "While the instance in which a single error will rise to the level of Sixth Amendment ineffectiveness is clearly the exception and not the rule, this case is one of those exceptions." Id. at 181 (quoting Chatom v. White, 858 F.2d 1479, 1486 (11th Cir. 1988)). The state court's summary denial was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

2005: Wade v. White, 368 F. Supp. 2d 695 (E.D. Mich. 2005). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter case for failing to object to evidence regarding the shooting of a key prosecution witness and the state's closing argument concerning this evidence. The victim was killed when he was hit by a stolen car being pursued by police. The witness was a passenger in the car, who, at the scene of the accident, initially identified his friend as the driver, but changed his statement the next day to identify the defendant as the driver. He was later shot numerous times and testified about this, but he did not know of any connection between the shooter and the defendant and no evidence connecting the defendant to the shooting was presented. Nonetheless, the prosecutor focused on this incident in sentencing and strongly implied that there was some connection between the defendant and the shooting. Although this issue had been raised in state court, the state court failed to address this issue so the court's review, under the AEDPA, was de novo. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the evidence of the shooting of the witness was clearly inadmissible and the prosecutor's argument was improper. There could be no reasonable strategy not to object to this testimony and argument. The court found that the state court's finding that the testimony was properly admitted was irrelevant because it was wrong in that no evidence established any connection between the defendant and the shooting of the witness. Prejudice was found because the witness was the key witness identifying the defendant as the driver.

c. State Cases

2023: People v. Currie, 237 N.E.3d 981 (Il. App. 2023). Defendant was prejudiced in case involving charges of sexual assault of a child by trial counsel's failure to object to the prosecution's late disclosure that its expert would opine on why children often delay reporting sexual abuse, why they are reluctant to reveal it, and why they frequently make inconsistent statements concerning the abuse. Although the trial court found a discovery violation, it denied defendant's motion for a new trial. Weighing heavily in its ruling was the absence of a contemporaneous objection by trial counsel. Trial counsel had explained that the lack of objection was the result of her surprise at the prosecution's line of questioning. The appellate court concluded that this explanation did not provide a reasonable trial strategy and, "as such, trial counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness." Prejudice is established given the closeness of the evidence in light of the multiple inconsistent statements made by the alleged victim. The expert's "testimony essentially suggested that the jury should believe [the alleged victim's] initial claims of abuse, not her later denials of abuse. Indeed, the State made this very assertion in closing arguments when it pointed to [the expert's] opinions as explanations for why children are 'reluctant to come in and testify and why they may not want to talk about everything that happens to them.'" At the post-trial hearing, defense counsel indicated that had she received adequate notice of the prosecution expert's opinions, she would have sought her own expert and would have attempted to discredit the prosecution expert's testimony. Additionally, had a timely objection been lodged, a continuance could have been requested in order for counsel to better prepare her cross-examination and her closing argument to respond to the expert testimony. Notably, the trial court's comments suggested it would have granted such a continuance request. Because of the closeness of the evidence in this case, prejudice is established even without affirmative evidence of what defense counsel could have done to counter the testimony had it been properly disclosed prior to trial.

State v. Amboh*, 541 P.3d 299 (Utah App. 2023). Conviction for operating a motor vehicle without insurance is vacated based on defendant's prima facie case that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object on hearsay grounds to the primary evidence on the issue of whether defendant was insured. (The prima facie standard applied to the claim because respondent failed to file a responsive brief.) Because of the importance of the hearsay testimony, competent counsel would have objected. And because the remaining evidence that went to the vehicle's uninsured status was relatively weak, defendant made a prima facie showing of a reasonable probability of a more favorable result if trial counsel had made the hearsay objection.

Felts v. State*, 2023 WL 4349464 (Tenn. Crim. App. July 5, 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective as to four theft charges in failing to object on hearsay grounds to testimony of a police officer on the issue of ownership of the property. At the post-conviction hearing, trial counsel offered no strategy for the omission and admitted that, had he objected to the hearsay testimony, no proof regarding the required element of ownership of the property would have existed for those theft charges.

State v. Bruce*, 224 N.E.3d 715 (Ohio App. 2023). In case involving charges of multiple sexual offenses against his granddaughter by appellant who had cared for his granddaughter on occasions when his ex-wife, the grandmother and primary caretaker of the child, was at work, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the introduction of inadmissible exhibits or testimony. The first category of inadmissible evidence concerned prior bad acts, starting with defendant's potential association with prostitutes. It was highly prejudicial and not relevant to the charges against defendant. Similarly, it was impermissible to elicit testimony about an “inappropriate” sexual comment made by defendant as its only possible purpose was to suggest a propensity on defendant’s part to commit the charged crimes. Regarding defendant’s possession of pornography, defendant conceded that some evidence about this was properly admitted as it related to the charge of exposing pornography to the child. However, testimony about defendant’s collection of foot fetish pornography was not relevant and served only to prejudicially depict defendant as a sex-crazed pervert. And testimony about the money he spent on pay-for-view movies, without being tied to pornography, could only stoke speculation about what he was viewing. Evidence that defendant “groomed” his son, the child’s father, for drug abuse by smoking marijuana with him as an adult had no relevance to the pending charges and impermissibly raised speculation that defendant groomed the child for sexual abuse. Finally, evidence of drug paraphernalia found in defendant’s home was irrelevant to any fact at issue at trial and the State’s contention that it served to establish the “thoroughness” of the investigation was unpersuasive. The next category of evidence was testimony by “experts,” i.e., a social worker, a forensic interviewer, and a school nurse, opining either directly or inferentially on the credibility of the child’s accusations. (The school nurse testified that she didn’t typically see statements like those made by the child and she did not believe a third grader was capable of making it up. However, the record did not show that she had any experience with these types of situations as the revelation from the child came during the first week of the nurse’s first year of being a school nurse and it was her first time reporting abuse as a mandatory reporter.) Also impermissible was testimony by the child’s father about his belief in the truthfulness of his daughter’s accusations and his references to her as a victim. The next category of evidence involved objectionable and prejudicial hearsay, including: (1) a statement allegedly made by a counselor opining that children infrequently lie about sexual abuse; and (2) unredacted police interviews with the child’s grandmother and a family friend that included the detective providing “protracted evaluations of the content and credibility of [the child’s] accusations,” as well as statements about prior bad acts of defendant unrelated to the pending charges. As to prejudice, “the result of defense counsel’s numerous instances of inaction was the introduction of inadmissible and highly prejudicial testimony. The cumulative effect of these errors was to deny [defendant] his right to a fair trial.”

Washington v. State*, 891 S.E.2d 668 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was charged with the armed robbery and kidnapping of an elderly couple, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to (1) object to the prosecutor’s statement during closing argument that implied petitioner had a history of committing similar crimes and (2) accept a curative instruction in response to the prosecutor’s statement. The prosecutor’s closing argument referenced petitioner’s “pattern of robbing old folks, intimidating old folks, kidnapping old folks, holding them up.” Defense counsel moved for a mistrial during a recess after the argument. The trial judge denied the request after finding that the remark referenced the pair of victims in this case but offered to give the jury a curative instruction to eliminate any possible confusion. Defense counsel declined, claiming that he did not want to draw attention to the comments. Contrary to the conclusion of the post-conviction court, the statement at issue could only be reasonably construed as discussing petitioner’s prior record and therefore the statement was outside the record. Defense counsel’s failure to contemporaneously object, which forfeited the issue for appeal, constituted deficient performance. Also deficient was the rejection of the offered curative instruction. Because trial counsel believed the prosecutor's comments were egregious enough that a mistrial would be granted, "counsel should have known that refusing a curative instruction was not a valid trial strategy." In a case where the record did not contain overwhelming evidence of petitioner's guilt, prejudice is established.

2022: State v. Snider, 204 N.E.3d 55 (Ohio App. 2022). In case involving multiple charges related to alleged sexual assaults by defendant on his minor daughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecution's expert testified regarding recantation in child sexual abuse cases and the expert report provided to defense counsel did not discuss recantation. (The complainant had recanted her allegations at one point. She explained at trial that she did so in an attempt to make her brothers happy.) The State's contention that the failure to object could have been strategic was unavailing. "The State essentially emphasizes the actions counsel took to disprove the reasons for recantation given by [the expert], but [the expert's] testimony would not have required refutation if it was not admitted in the first place." Had counsel made a timely objection, it would necessarily have been successful. On the facts of this case, where there no physical evidence to corroborate the complainant's testimony or witnesses to the alleged abuse, testimony from the prosecution expert regarding reasons a child victim may recant was of significant importance in this case and likely had an impact on the jury's determination of guilt.

People v. Taylor*, 193 N.E.3d 864 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Where defendant was charged as an armed habitual criminal, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to stipulate that defendant's two prior convictions were qualifying offenses under the armed habitual criminal statute, which would have prevented the prosecution from putting forth prejudicial evidence and argument concerning defendant's prior criminal conduct. The armed habitual criminal charge was premised on defendant's illegal possession of a firearm. Defendant had been apprehended by police after fleeing from a traffic stop. Objects he was seen discarding as he ran were located following his arrest, a black duffel bag and a plastic bag containing cannabis. The gun at issue was also found by police some distance from where defendant fell after police tasered him. Neither fingerprints nor DNA tied defendant to the gun. On the facts of this case, defendant was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance. "Here, the jury heard that the defendant had been previously convicted of aggravated battery resulting in great bodily harm and unlawful delivery of a controlled substance—the former, a crime jurors could potentially associate with general bad character, and the latter, an act that is often associated with illegal gun use. The jury may also have been more likely to infer that the contraband found belonged to the defendant." Because the State's proof that the defendant was in possession of a handgun was largely circumstantial and was closely balanced, "there was a reasonable probability that, had defense counsel prevented the jury from being informed of the nature of the defendant's prior felony convictions, there may have been a different result."

Jackson v. Franke*, 507 P.3d 222 (Or. 2022). Remanding for further proceedings on deficient performance prong of IAC claim in case where trial counsel failed to raise an objection that was not supported by precedent existing at the time of trial but was subsequently recognized by the overruling of the then-existing precedent. "[A] lawyer's failure to raise an important and ultimately correct legal argument may constitute inadequate assistance of counsel in a particular case even where the argument was not so obviously correct that a lawyer exercising reasonable professional skill and judgment would have been obligated to raise it.” Petitioner’s evidence -- “that some criminal defense attorneys in 2001 viewed the Court of Appeals precedent as vulnerable, were raising the kind of challenge to sexual abuse diagnoses that ultimately succeeded, and were recommending that practice to other criminal defense attorneys” -- created genuine issues of material fact that, if resolved in petitioner’s favor, “could establish that the failure by petitioner’s attorney to raise [the objection at issue] was the product of an unreasonable failure to investigate and familiarize himself with the state of the law to the extent appropriate to the nature and complexity of the case; that, as a result, petitioner’s attorney was not equipped to exercise professional judgment and represent defendant in an informed manner; and, thus, that petitioner was denied the constitutionally adequate and effective representation to which he was entitled.”

Provo City v. Bishop-Garcia, 505 P.3d 81 (Utah App. 2022). In unlawful detention and sexual assault case where it was essentially a question of whether the jury believed the complainant or defendant, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when two prosecution witnesses offered their opinions about the complainant’s truthfulness on the morning of the alleged crimes when she told them her account of what had happened and one of the two, a police officer, also implicitly opined that defendant had not been truthful. The failure to object was objectively unreasonable given: (1) the testimony was clearly inadmissible; and (2) there was ample opportunity to object given that the opinions were offered in response to prosecution questions and not spontaneous assertions. No valid strategic basis for the omission could be discerned. In finding prejudice, it is noted that the prosecution relied on the improper opinion testimony in argument. It is also observed that the testimony by the officer explaining that he arrested defendant after comparing the truthfulness of his statement against that of the complainant followed a description of the officer’s training and his methods for assessing credibility. “The patina of expert testimony further distinguishes the officer’s inadmissible testimony from the type of off-hand remark by a family member that this court has deemed to be harmless.”

Wilson v. Laney, 504 P.3d 666 (Or. App. 2022). In burglary, robbery and assault case where the victims were petitioner’s mother and nephew, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a hearsay objection to testimony from a police officer recounting statements made by the victims. Although some of the statements to the officer by petitioner’s mother could have qualified as prior inconsistent statements, the absence of an objection allowed the jury to improperly consider them as substantive evidence rather than only as impeachment. And because the nephew at trial claimed he essentially lacked memory of the incident, there was no basis for admission of the officer’s testimony about the nephew’s prior statements. In addition, the statements provided to the police officer did not meet the requirements for either the hearsay exception for excited utterances or the exception for statements concerning domestic violence. Had a hearsay objection been made, the statements to the police officer would likely have been excluded. Prejudice is established because without the hearsay statements, the jury would have heard nothing about the nephew’s version of events, and it would have heard a single version of events from petitioner’s mother that was more favorable to petitioner than what she told the police officer.

State v. Quiroz*, 502 P.3d 166 (Mt. 2022). Reversing conviction for sexual intercourse without consent where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to statistical testimony by an expert regarding the infrequency of false sex crime allegations. Case law clearly prohibited the testimony at issue as it constituted an improper comment on the accuser's credibility. Defense counsel's failure to object constituted deficient performance. On the record of this case, there was a reasonable probability that the expert's testimony was prejudicial. Defendant did not deny that he had sex with the complainant but claimed it was consensual. The complainant did not deny that she and defendant were in an ongoing, albeit at times contentious, relationship. Defendant presented evidence and testimony that the complainant had asked him to come over to have sex with her only a day earlier; numerous people saw the two together during the time that the complainant asserted she was being held against her will and none of them perceived anything suspicious; and the complainant's own brother testified that his sister's reputation for honesty was not good in the community. "The evidence against [defendant] was not so overwhelming that there was no reasonable probability the outcome would have been different without [the expert's] credibility-boosting statistical testimony."

2021: People v. Clotfelter, 279 Cal.Rptr.3d 487 (Cal.App. 2021). In case involving convictions for acts done by defendant with intent to commit sexual offenses, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to inadmissible and prejudicial testimony. Defendant was a convicted child molester who was later found to be a sexually violent predator (SVP). While being held as an SVP, defendant voluntarily agreed to surgical castration. Six years after the procedure, he was unconditionally released from the state hospital subject to lifetime registration as an SVP. During a routine sex offender compliance check and search of his residence, an officer found evidence that he had formed relationships with three minor boys and their respective families. This led to the sexual offense charges. Trial counsel performed deficiently when he failed to object to expert testimony that expressly referenced defendant's conduct as "criminal behavior" and then opined that defendant harbored the intent to commit sexual molestation at the time of his actions like he had in the past. (After the expert opined that defendant's prior convictions involved grooming "for the purposes of sexual molestation," she testified that he had acted this way again and for this purpose with the three alleged victims.) That the expert did not utilize the exact words as in the statute or jury instructions did not insulate the testimony from objection as a reasonable juror would have construed it to indicate that the expert believed that defendant's interactions with the boys were motivated by an intent to engage in lewd or lascivious activity with them. Prejudice is established on this record given that defendant's intent was the disputed issue in the case, it was not established by other evidence in the trial, and an expert's statement is likely to carry special weight with a jury. But even assuming that the failure to object to the expert's testimony was not in itself sufficient to justify reversal of the convictions, the combined effect of additional lapses by trial counsel undermines confidence in the jury's verdict. When a psychologist who had examined defendant during his time in a state hospital testified, he opined without objection that a hypothetical person with the exact same history as defendant had "either reoffended or is close to reoffending." A reasonable competent attorney would have objected to this testimony as tantamount to an inadmissible opinion as to defendant's guilt or mental state. When taken together with the previous failure to object, prejudice is found. Trial counsel was also deficient in failing to object to testimony about child sexual abuse accommodation syndrome (CSAAS) and the prosecutor's use of that testimony to support an improper inference that the three alleged victims had in fact been victimized by defendant. Because the alleged victims and their family members denied inappropriate touching or troubling behavior by defendant, the relevance of CSAAS was not apparent. Given the dearth of direct evidence of sexually inappropriate behavior by defendant towards the alleged victims, the failure to object was prejudicial either on its own or in combination with the other deficiencies by counsel. Trial counsel also performed deficiently in failing to object to highly inflammatory testimony related to defendant's prior offenses. "Witnesses testified about the length of [defendant's] sentence (too short), the devastating effect on his victims, and their views of [defendant] as a person. All of this would have been appropriate testimony by victims at a sentencing hearing. But applying the test for admissibility at trial as required by Evidence Code section 1108, the cumulative effect of this testimony was more likely to prejudice the jury and evoke an emotional bias against [defendant] than provide probative value." That defense counsel proceeded on a theory that defendant was a changed man following the earlier crimes did not excuse the failure to object. In sum, there was a reasonable possibility that the combined impact of defense counsel's failure to object to the volume of inflammatory and irrelevant evidence, together with the failure to object to the expert testimony described above, affected the jury's decision to convict defendant of the charged offenses. Numerous other instances where trial counsel deficiently failed to object to irrelevant and prejudicial evidence are considered in finding a reasonable possibility of a more favorable verdict had counsel acted competently.

State v. Ward, 865 S.E.2d 267 (Ga. App. 2021). In child molestation case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the State's derivative use of statements made by defendant during an internal affairs investigation where defendant had been compelled to answer questions. Defendant had been employed by a police department when the minor's allegations were made against him. An internal affairs investigation commenced and defendant was interviewed by Lt. Saulters. Prior to trial, defense counsel obtained a ruling that any statements made by defendant during the investigation were coerced such that they could not be used against him in the criminal trial. At trial, Saulters testified to the fact that an internal affairs investigation had been conducted. After defendant took the stand and denied having molested the minor, Saulters was called in rebuttal and asked: "Without getting into any specifics as to the reason for your opinion, if [defendant] were to testify under oath, would you believe what he had to say?" Saulters responded, "No." Defendant was subsequently convicted of the charges against him. At a post-trial hearing, Saulters acknowledged that he had informed the prosecutors that his opinion of defendant's truthfulness was influenced by his interview during the internal affairs investigation. The record of the post-trial hearing showed that the prosecution failed to meet its burden of proving that it did not make derivative use of defendant's protected statements during the trial. As for prejudice, Saulters's rebuttal testimony went directly to the central issue of defendant's credibility. The jurors heard that Saulters was a high-ranking police officer who had investigated these claims against defendant, making him a compelling witness. In addition, at the post-trial hearing the prosecutors did not testify clearly as to how the protected statements may or may not have influenced their trial preparation. "Thus, the State did not carry its burden of showing that other parts of [defendant's] trial were not inappropriately influenced by his protected statements." As for trial counsel's performance, although the derivative use violation was uncommon, it "was not an unsettled question of law absolving trial counsel of the responsibility to raise this issue." Because there was a reasonable probability that the State's derivative use contributed to the verdict in defendant's trial, defendant was prejudiced by counsel's failure to raise the issue.

Harris v. State*, 857 S.E.2d 815 (Ga. App. 2021). Shoplifting conviction reversed where trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to hearsay. Rather than call an employee from the store where the items were stolen, the State relied on testimony from police officers about their conversations with the store manager in order to establish the elements of theft by shoplifting. No reason for offered by trial counsel for failing to object and the omission was both deficient and prejudicial.

State v. Hart*, 966 N.W.2d 304 (Iowa Ct. App. 2021). In case involving charges for eluding police with excessive speed and criminal mischief where defendant testified on his own behalf, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object under state law when the prosecution called defendant as a witness during its case in rebuttal. Even assuming that defense counsel wanted defendant to respond to the prosecution's rebuttal case, that could have been achieved by calling defendant in surrebuttal. "[T]here could be no provident trial strategy in permitting the State to call [defendant] as a witness." Confidence in the outcome of the trial was undermined by counsel's deficient performance because of the testimony provided by defendant when he was called in rebuttal by the State. The evidence against defendant was not overwhelming. The prosecution was relying in large part on a claim that defendant had been sending threatening text messages that could be interpreted as admitting he was near the location where the chase began, coupled with evidence connecting defendant to the location and ownership of the vehicles involved in the chase and afterward. The evidence linking defendant to the text messages was weak, however, until defendant's testimony in the prosecution's rebuttal case. Defendant's testimony not only established that defendant was the sender of the text messages, he also provided a motive for the threats and undermined his own credibility by contradicting his direct examination testimony.

People v. Hawkins*, 959 N.W.2d 179 (Mich. 2021). In child sexual assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to testimony from a police detective that "improperly vouched for the complainant's credibility and improperly commented on the defendant's guilt." Because there were no third-party witnesses or physical evidence supporting the allegations, this case came down to a credibility contest between defendant and the complainant. "On the facts of this case, and given the nature of the detective's testimony, there is a reasonable probability that the wrongful admission of the testimony affected the outcome of the trial."

State v. Vasquez*, 494 P.3d 424 (Wash. 2021). Counsel was ineffective for failing to object. In case where defendant was convicted of maintaining a dwelling for controlled substances, possessing methamphetamine, and possession of drug paraphernalia, counsel objected only once during trial, resulting in the jury considering highly prejudicial, inadmissible evidence. Specifically, counsel failed to object to prior convictions, threats to witnesses, hearsay statements regarding the defendant's alleged drug sales, and police profile testimony. Given the evidence that would have been excluded in addition to the effect of the evidence on the jury's decision, counsel's performance fell below the objective standard of reasonableness and resulted in prejudice to the defendant. The court noted that prior instances of selling drugs are inadmissible and highly prejudicial when a person is charged with similar drug violations. Evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted ran contrary to the picture of a low-level drug user that counsel was trying to paint. Further, the court determined that counsel failed to object to testimony that the defendant had sold drugs in the past with no information demonstrating the acts “probably occurred.” The court held that the failure to object to this inadmissible evidence was not a reasonable trial strategy. The court also decided that counsel’s failure to object to testimony about threats to witnesses was not reasonable and did not advance trial strategy. Finally, the court noted the police profile testimony that drugs were found in the defendant’s room constituted inadmissible hearsay. The court stated that counsel should have objected, that counsel further failed the defendant by repeating the points made during the police profile testimony during cross-examination, and that counsel was deficient in not objecting to highly prejudicial testimony about the defendant possessing a certain type of vest that the State noted was common to drug dealers. Ultimately, the court determined that the cumulative effect of counsel’s subpar performance likely affected the outcome of the case.

McMullin v. Amsberry*, 485 P.3d 278 (Or. App. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in defending petitioner against charges of sexual abuse of petitioner’s adopted adolescent daughter by failing to adequately investigate the significance of the absence of physical evidence of the alleged abuse. The nurse practitioner who examined the complainant found no physical evidence of sexual activity. The nurse practitioner testified, however, that it was not unusual for an adolescent victim of sexual abuse not to show physical evidence of abuse, citing to the “Kellogg Study.” Trial counsel did not cross-examine the witness about this assertion or the study and did not call an expert to rebut the testimony. In preparation for trial, defense counsel had anticipated the testimony at issue and consulted with two experts. The first, a former medical examiner, informed trial counsel he could not be helpful after reviewing the nurse practitioner’s report. The second expert consulted by trial counsel was a nurse practitioner who defense counsel found to have “some really wacky ideas,” who was “not terribly likeable” and who ultimately did not seem helpful to the defense. After speaking with two defense attorneys with experience in sexual abuse cases, one of whom advised trial counsel of literature contradicting the examining nurse practitioner’s view but also warned trial counsel that aggressive cross-examination on the point could blow up in counsel’s face, defense counsel opted to forgo both a defense expert and cross-examination on the lack of physical corroboration. Instead, trial counsel invited the jurors to look to common sense. Counsel’s tactical decision was not supported by a reasonable investigation. In neither of the expert consultations did trial counsel “actually acquire information about whether the state’s expert witness correctly understood the literature concerning the incidence of normal physical examinations among adolescent victims of sexual abuse.” Nor did the interactions with the experienced defense attorneys provide trial counsel “with the information necessary to enable her to make the required cost-benefit calculation about whether to challenge [the prosecution expert’s] testimony.” Petitioner was prejudiced by the deficient performance. Had counsel conducted an adequate investigation, she could have retained a defense expert or better cross-examined the prosecution expert, or both. Cross-examination of the testimony of an expert such as the one presented in the post-conviction proceedings could have brought to the jury’s attention the flaws in the Kellogg study itself and the fact that the principal author of the Kellogg study actually concluded in another study that “physical findings are really important and they are indicators of sexual trauma, of penetrative sexual trauma.” Cross-examination or testimony from an expert such as [the post-conviction expert] likewise could have brought to the jury’s attention other studies showing that, contrary to the Kellogg study, between 63 and 74 percent of adolescent girls reporting sexual activity showed physical signs. It is more than merely possible that such evidence could have made a difference to the outcome of the case.

The state’s argument that an expert like the one testifying post-conviction would have been subject to vigorous cross-examination failed to defeat the finding of prejudice. “[D]efense experts always will be subject to cross-examination, and the fact that a defense expert’s testimony may not conclusively rebut the prosecution’s case is not dispositive.”

2020: Botto v. State, 307 So.3d 1006 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). In case where petitioner was convicted of the lewd or lascivious molestation of an eight-year-old boy, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecution played part of the child’s videotaped interview where the child mentioned the uncharged allegation that petitioner also performed oral sex on him. The error was presumed to be harmful. In addition, trial counsel compounded the prejudice when she repeatedly urged the jury to watch the videotape again to see the supposedly inconsistent claims made by the victim in that tape regarding the oral sex compared to what he said during the trial.

Howard v. State*, 288 So.3d 1239 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020), disapproved on procedural grounds, Steiger v. State, 328 So.3d 926 (Fla. 2021). In double murder case, convictions reversed based on trial counsel’s failure to object when the State improperly presented evidence of defendant’s prearrest, pre-Miranda silence and argued that it proved his guilt. At trial, the prosecution’s theory of the case was that defendant retrieved the gun from his home and shot the two men, one of whom was his neighbor, after long simmering tensions between the neighbors about a truck had boiled over. Defendant’s account of the events differed dramatically. He said that the neighbor, J.C., brought the gun and instigated the confrontation. J.C. was enraged with defendant because J.C. was involved in an extramarital affair and believed that defendant was going to disclose the affair to J.C.’s wife. During the confrontation, J.C. placed the gun to defendant’s head. The other victim, C.S., told J.C. to put the gun away. While J.C. was distracted, defendant went for J.C.’s gun. As the two men struggled, the gun went off, shooting C.S. in the head. Defendant then wrestled the gun away and shot J.C. in self-defense as J.C. was charging at him. When police responded to the scene, defendant was sitting in a chair in front of J.C.’s home. During opening statements, the prosecutor told the jury that when the police approached defendant and asked what had happened, defendant remained silent. Defense counsel objected that the statement was an impermissible comment on his constitutional right to remain silent. The prosecutor responded that it was not impermissible because defendant, at that time, had been neither arrested nor given Miranda warnings. The court asked the parties to present authorities on the issue and told the State not to address defendant’s prearrest silence until it had ruled. But the trial court neither received the authorities it asked for nor ruled on the objection. The State’s first witness was an officer who encountered defendant at the crime scene and testified that defendant appeared “very detached and emotionless.” The officer attempted to learn what had happened from defendant but defendant “only would indicate that he wasn’t shot” and otherwise “refused to answer any questions.” When asked by the prosecutor whether defendant had told the officer “that he had been engaged in a struggle for his life and that he had acted in self-defense,” the officer said no. After the officer inspected and exited J.C.’s home, defendant told him that “they were going to shoot me too, or they would shoot me too, something to that effect” but otherwise “refused” to answer any questions. During closing argument, the State heavily emphasized the officer’s testimony about defendant’s prearrest silence. Under state law, the pre-arrest, pre-Miranda silence of defendant was inadmissible as substantive evidence which is what it was used for. But even assuming that it was intended to impeach defendant, despite the prosecutor’s failure to ask defendant about it during cross-examination, defendant’s earlier silence was not inconsistent with his trial testimony and thus not proper impeachment. The officer did not testify to what he asked defendant, other than whether defendant had been shot and what defendant understood to have happened. Defendant told the officer that he had not been shot and something to the effect of “they would have shot me too,” which is consistent with the idea that he shot the victims out of fear for his own safety. As for his refusal to answer other questions, it was unknown what he was asked. That trial counsel was ineffective in failing to preserve a proper objection was obvious from the face of the record given that the relevant case law existed at the time of trial. The possibility that trial counsel chose not to object in order to avoid creating an impression that the defense was hiding something was belied by counsel’s initial objection during opening statement and numerous other objections he made throughout the trial. Although a close call, the record “indisputably demonstrates that [defendant] was prejudiced by his counsel’s failures here.” Defendant’s prearrest, pre-Miranda silence was a major component of the State’s case. Although the State had other evidence that undermined defendant’s self-defense theory, the most problematic for him being his own statements while in police custody, defendant offered an explanation for those statements that a jury might credit. In addition, this was a case where the State had no eyewitnesses and the physical evidence did not clearly refute defendant’s self-defense theory.

Jackson v. State*, 840 S.E.2d 609 (Ga. App. 2020). Defendant was entitled to reversal of his convictions for armed robbery and possession of a firearm during the commission of a felony where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek redaction of defendant’s videotaped police interview to eliminate trial counsel’s own expressions of disbelief about defendant’s account of the crime – that he was coerced into committing the crime by the codefendant. On this record, “it is obvious that no reasonable attorney would have failed to seek redaction of her comments from the videotape and that a trial court would have abused its discretion in failing to authorize such a redaction.” And while the State submitted evidence sufficient to disprove the coercion defense asserted by defendant in the video, defendant did present evidence at trial of a subsequent altercation between himself and the codefendant during which the codefendant stated that defendant should be dead. “Given the damaging nature of counsel’s unredacted comments used to great effect by the State in its closing argument and the fact that the credibility of witnesses and questions of coercion are for the jury, we conclude that a reasonable probability exists that the outcome would have been different but for counsel’s deficient performance.”

Debelbot v. State*, 839 S.E.2d 513 (Ga. 2020). Husband and wife codefendants were each denied the effective assistance of counsel in their joint trial for murdering their infant child where their trial attorneys failed to object to a gross misstatement of the law by the prosecuting attorney. After stating that reasonable doubt does not require proof to a mathematical certainty, the prosecutor continued: “Which means we don’t have to prove that ninety percent. You don’t have to be ninety percent sure. You don’t have to be eighty percent sure. You don’t have to be fifty-one percent sure.” There is no good reason why reasonably competent counsel would not object to such an egregious misstatement of the law. Under the unique circumstances of this case, the failure to object was prejudicial. There was unrebutted expert testimony that the child died as a result of the criminal infliction of blunt force trauma as well as compelling evidence that both parents had essentially equal opportunities—and no one else had any opportunity at all—to inflict that trauma. But evidence of collusion between the parents was relatively weak. “[I]n the absence of evidence suggesting that the trauma was inflicted specifically by one or the other, and irrespective of whether [the parents] colluded, the logical probability that either of them inflicted the fatal trauma would be 50 percent. A 50 percent probability of guilt does not . . . authorize a jury to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.” The prosecution’s incorrect argument that something less than a 51 percent probability of guilt would suffice was prejudicial notwithstanding the standard instruction on reasonable doubt given by the trial court.

People v. Britt*, 172 N.E.3d 194 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Conviction for violating a protection order is reversed where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the introduction of defendant’s domestic battery conviction in the State’s case-in-chief. This deficiency was prejudicial even though defendant was convicted at a bench trial. The presumption that the court considered only competent evidence in reaching its ruling was rebutted by the court’s statements during the pronouncement of guilt that showed that it considered defendant’s domestic battery conviction in determining his guilt. “Because this case turned on the credibility of the witnesses and the court used defendant’s domestic battery conviction to find [the victim] more credible and to find him less credible, there is a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different if the conviction had not been introduced.”

State v. Miner*, 164 N.E.3d 512 (Ohio App. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving abuse of a dog where counsel failed to object to the playing of a police officer’s body camera footage which contained hearsay statements by the defendant’s cousin that defendant punched the dog. Although the record indicated that an objection would likely have been overruled by the trial court, it also demonstrated that the trial court was likely to have given a limiting instruction that would have prevented the jury from considering the cousin’s statements as substantive evidence. At trial, the cousin explained that her reports of defendant’s actions were based on what she’d been told, not on personal observations. There was also evidence of the dog backing away from defendant and appearing to have a limp. Such evidence did not suffice to overcome the prejudice from the hearsay. Without the cousin’s video statement as substantive evidence, there was a reasonable probability the outcome of the trial would have been different.

People v. Moore*, 161 N.E.3d 125 (Ill. 2020). Conviction for unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon reversed where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to stipulate to defendant’s felon status, thereby allowing the jury to learn that defendant’s prior conviction was for murder. The record clearly showed that defense counsel’s failure to stipulate to defendant’s felon status “was not based on any legitimate trial strategy but, rather, on a misapprehension of the law that was shared by the prosecutor and the trial judge.” Prejudice is established given that the evidence was closely balanced, creating a reasonable probability that the prior murder conviction evidence tipped the scales against defendant. The case essentially involved a credibility contest between a police officer who claimed that defendant admitted the weapon was in the car during a traffic stop and the version presented by defendant and his witness, Sherry Walls, who both asserted that Ms. Walls owned the weapon and accidentally left it in defendant’s car unbeknownst to him when she borrowed his car. “Because the evidence was closely balanced, we believe that informing the jurors that defendant was previously convicted of murder made [the police officer’s] version more plausible and tipped the scales against defendant.”

2019: State v. Crow, 438 P.3d 541 (Wash. Ct. App. 2019). Where the defense to a charge of possession of a stolen gun was that defendant was unaware that the gun was stolen, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to testimony by law enforcement officers concerning the probability that a firearm possessed by a convicted felon, which defendant was, is a stolen gun. The impermissible “profile” testimony included assertions that: (1) someone disqualified from obtaining a gun legally will obtain a firearm by stealing it or buying it unlawfully on the street; (2) illegally obtained firearms are typically stolen during burglaries and vehicle prowls (the gun at issue here came from a burglarized vehicle); (3) a person who knows he possesses a stolen firearm commonly discards the gun and flees when approached by a law enforcement officer (as did defendant); (4) the majority of disqualified people apprehended with a firearm have a stolen firearm; and (5) most or a high percentage of firearms in the hands of a disqualified person are stolen firearms. “The Yakima Police Department officers answered questions in the context of their knowledge based on ‘training and experience.’ Thus, the State used the imprimatur of expertise and law enforcement to group [defendant] with other guilty persons.” Because of a question by defense counsel about how one should know a gun is stolen, defendant waived his right to challenge the testimony from law enforcement officers that a disqualified person will obtain a firearm by stealing it or buying it unlawfully on the street. Defendant did not, however, “open the door to the further testimony of the law enforcement officers. The additional testimony about conduct of persons possessing a gun and percentages of stolen guns on disqualified persons clarified nothing with regard to a person’s knowledge of the status of a firearm and thus remained inadmissible profile evidence.” On this record, “no reasonable trial strategy explains defense counsel’s failure to object to profile evidence.” In addition, the question to an officer about how one would know a gun was stolen “served no legitimate purpose in the defense of [defendant]. Instead, the answer to the question allowed the jury to convict [defendant] solely on the basis of his fitting a profile. [Defendant’s] counsel could have more effectively argued the lack of knowledge without an officer’s expert inadmissible opinion as to reasons why one should conclude a gun to be stolen.” Finally, “[t]he nature of the evidence alone without further analysis compels a conclusion that the law enforcement officers’ testimony prejudiced [defendant].”

People v. Julian*, 246 Cal.Rptr.3d 517 (Cal. Ct. App. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving multiple charges of sexual offenses against a child in failing to object to inadmissible statistical evidence from the prosecution’s expert that went beyond the permissible scope of child sexual abuse accommodation syndrome (CSAAS) evidence. CSAAS dispels myths people have about the reactions children have to sexual abuse. After the prosecution expert explained the myths to the jury, the People introduced a new issue—the statistical percentage of false allegations by child sexual abuse victims. According to the expert's testimony, false allegations occur in only 1-8% of the cases and are extremely rare. Trial counsel not only failed to object to the statistical evidence testimony, his cross-examination of the expert reinforced the expert's direct testimony. There is no justification for trial counsel's failure to object to the statistical evidence on false allegations. "It was inadmissible and it improperly suggested [defendant] was guilty based on statistical probabilities that were irrelevant to this case." The inadmissible evidence was highly prejudicial because this case was heavily contested with strong defense evidence: defendant denied the child's claims and cooperated with police; the children's nanny never saw defendant touch the alleged victim or her three young sisters "inappropriately" and she said none of the girls ever complained that defendant engaged in such conduct; although there was testimony child molesters frequently possess child pornography, the police found no evidence that defendant possessed such material; the prosecution investigator monitored more than 100 of defendant's jail phone calls and could not recall one where defendant ever requested anyone to destroy evidence; sister 1 testified defendant did not touch her inappropriately, she did not see him touch the alleged victim in that manner, and she did not recall the alleged victim ever saying defendant did something to make her "feel uncomfortable"; the other two sisters did not see defendant inappropriately touch any of the girls and one of them believed the alleged victim was lying when told of the allegations; there was no sexual assault response team (SART) examination of the alleged victim to corroborate her claims and no eyewitnesses; the alleged victim had difficulty remembering certain facts, gave some tentative responses, and some of her testimony was introduced with leading questions; and there were serious conflicts between the alleged victim's trial testimony and a prior interview. Although the impermissible statistic evidence may not be prejudicial where it occurs in a slight passing reference by the expert, "here the jury was bombarded with it" and the prosecutor asked the jury during argument to rely on the evidence. Trial counsel also performed deficiently and prejudiced defendant by asking a detective whether he believed the alleged child victim had been truthful with him, to which the detective responded, "Yes, Sir."

Brewer v. State*, 924 N.W.2d 87 (N.D. 2019). In case where petitioner was charged with and convicted of two counts of Gross Sexual Imposition involving two minors, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to renew an objection to admission of an interview of one of the minors in which an incident involving petitioner that was unrelated to the charged crimes was discussed. In response to a pretrial motion to exclude evidence of the interview, the trial court ruled that the evidence was admissible to prove motive, intent, plan, absence of mistake or lack of accident. When the State offered a recording of the interview into evidence at trial, defense counsel failed to renew the objection. Petitioner raised a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on trial counsel's inaction. The trial judge presided in the post-conviction proceeding and stated it was likely that he would have granted the motion to exclude if it had been renewed in light of the evidence that had been presented at trial. Trial counsel explained that he did not renew the motion because he "felt that [he] had adequately formed a record in the hearing on the motion itself [and] did not need to raise it." According to the state supreme court, "[t]his statement admits a legal error that is below an objective standard of reasonableness." And even beyond the intentional failure to object, trial counsel stated affirmatively "no objection" when the State offered the interview. "We conclude failing to object at trial because of reliance on the record made in a pretrial motion is a basic legal error that satisfies Strickland's prong one" As to prejudice, admission of the interview “impl[ied] a propensity for sexual contact with minors,” and perhaps particularly with the minor involved in the interview. The absence of an objection precluded the trial court from conducting the requisite three-step analysis for determining admissibility. Prejudice is established regardless of whether the objection would have been sustained or overruled. If sustained, the evidence would not have been admitted. If overruled, the issue would have been preserved for appeal. “Because we have repeatedly expressed grave concern where prior bad acts evidence has been admitted without the required analysis by the district court, if it had been preserved, this issue would have had sufficient merit on direct appeal to undermine our confidence in the outcome. . . . Although the admissibility of the interview and the appropriateness of a limiting jury instruction are left for the district court’s determination in the context of any subsequent retrial, we conclude Brewer satisfied the prejudice requirement of Strickland’s second prong.” The argument that prejudice should only be found as to the one victim is rejected.

State v. Marden, 212 A.3d 407 (N.H. 2019). In aggravated felonious sexual assault case, trial counsel was ineffective under the State Constitution in failing to object when the testimony by the State’s expert witness, a physician specializing in the care of abused or neglected children, ran afoul of the general prohibition against offering expert testimony to prove that a particular child has been sexually abused. The complainant and appellant were in his vehicle in a parking garage outside the victim’s workplace apparently having sex when her supervisor knocked on the car window. Appellant was ordered to leave the property. The complainant was upset when she returned to the store where she worked. She told her supervisor that she had been raped and she feared losing her job. Appellant maintained that the encounter was consensual. At the time of the incident, the complainant was 17 years old and appellant was 20 years old. They had been in a personal relationship for several months earlier in the year. During trial, the State’s expert witness informed the jury that she had testified “[s]everal dozen times” as an expert “[p]rincipally in the area of child abuse.” When the State moved to qualify her as an expert, defense counsel did not object and the trial court granted the motion. The witness recounted her evaluation of the complainant three weeks after the incident while the expert was clinically affiliated with the Child Advocacy and Protection Program at Dartmouth-Hitchcock. The expert described the complainant telling her about vaginal irritation she was suffering from. The State then asked the expert: “What other symptoms of significance did she mention to you during your conversation with her?” Defense counsel did not object to the question. The expert then went on to recount in detail the behavioral and emotional symptoms the complainant said she was experiencing following the alleged assault. Trial counsel was deficient in failing to object to the question about the complainant’s symptoms because the expert was then permitted to improperly link such symptoms the complainant was experiencing to the sexual assault at issue. Although the expert did not explicitly draw such a link, because the jury knew that the witness was an expert on child abuse and she had recounted the complainant’s reported symptoms of significance, the jury could have inferred that she made that link. Indeed, there was “no discernible purpose for [the witness] to have been recognized as an expert other than to invite the jury to infer that she had formed the expert opinion that [appellant] had assaulted the complainant.” The state supreme court rejects the State’s argument that appellant suffered no prejudice because, according to the State, the expert’s testimony was merely cumulative of testimony by the complainant’s co-workers about the complainant’s emotional state following the alleged assault. The witness’ testimony “and the inferences that could be drawn from it — that she believed that the complainant had been sexually assaulted — were not cumulative of the other demeanor evidence because [the witness], unlike the other trial witnesses, was recognized as an expert.” Because appellant established ineffective assistance of counsel under the State Constitution, the New Hampshire Supreme Court does not address whether the Federal Constitution was also violated.

Chappell v. State*, 837 S.E.2d 496 (S.C. Ct. App. 2019). In case involving conviction for criminal sexual conduct with a minor and lewd act on a child, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the State’s expert gave improper bolstering testimony. Petitioner was the boyfriend of the nine-year-old victim’s grandmother. The victim testified that petitioner touched her privates and made her touch his. The jury also saw a video of a forensic interview in which the victim described the abuse and identified petitioner as the perpetrator. Over defense counsel’s objection, the State was permitted to present testimony from an expert who had not interviewed the victim or seen the video. She was qualified to testify as an expert in child sexual abuse and treatment. On direct examination, she explained why children in general might not report sexual abuse immediately. She continued, without objection, to testify that children do not often lie about sexual abuse. The appellate court agrees with petitioner that this testimony constituted improper bolstering of the child victim. That the expert had not herself interviewed the victim did not defeat the claim of bolstering. “[A] comment on the credibility of a class of persons to which the victim belongs is a comment on the credibility of the victim.” Unavailing is the State’s argument that trial counsel could not be faulted for failing to object because at the time of the 2012 trial the appellate court had not yet considered an improper bolstering case involving an independent expert. But as the State conceded at oral argument, when such a case was decided in 2015 “the court did not establish a new legal principle or change the existing law.” Rather, the court “applied the existing law to a new set of facts. Accordingly, we find the law at the time of [petitioner’s] trial indicated an independent expert, like any other witness, may not testify whether another witness is telling the truth.” As for prejudice, “[b]ecause the outcome hinged on the victim’s credibility, we find there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of [petitioner’s] trial would have been different had trial counsel objected when [the State’s expert] improperly bolstered the victim’s credibility.” Indeed, South Carolina courts “have found improper bolstering testimony was prejudicial in every South Carolina case in which the State presented no physical evidence of the defendant’s guilt or relied solely on the victim’s testimony to establish the details of the crime.”

Felder v. State*, 832 S.E.2d 591 (S.C. 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of murder and possession of firearm during the commission of a violent crime, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek redaction of the portion of the summary of petitioner’s statement to police that mentioned a pending lynching charge. The murder occurred when a vehicle stopped, a man stepped out of the car and shot the victim, and the man returned to the car and drove away. Eyewitnesses could not identify petitioner as the shooter in a lineup. The strongest evidence against him was a hat found at the shooting scene with petitioner’s fingerprint and DNA evidence on it. During trial, defense counsel had several opportunities to lodge an objection to admission of the lynching charge reference but failed to do so constituting deficient performance. In assessing prejudice, the state supreme court began by observing:

The reference to the lynching charge was indisputably propensity evidence that served no purpose other than to prejudice Felder. In this case, the risks associated with propensity evidence were heightened due to the specific crime—lynching. The word “lynching” is extremely problematic in itself. It immediately evokes a visceral reaction and a grim mental image. The lynching reference could reasonably cause a juror to presume Felder was a violent person and deserving of a guilty verdict.

Because petitioner did not take the stand, “it is reasonable to believe the jury focused—at least to some extent—on the summary because it provided Felder’s version of events.” Additionally, the statement itself was admitted into evidence as an exhibit and a copy was provided to the jury for its consideration during deliberations. Regarding the strength of the State’s case, the case against petitioner was largely circumstantial. The strongest evidence against him was the hat found at the crime scene. Two eyewitnesses had stated that the shooter wore a hat and the victim did not. But in addition to petitioner’s fingerprint and DNA on the hat, there was an unidentified fingerprint on the hat as well as DNA belonging to someone else. Ultimately, the evidence only showed that petitioner possessed the hat at some point in time. The evidence linking petitioner’s car to the shooting was also weak. Two eyewitnesses were not certain that it was the same car they had seen at the shooting and the door handles of petitioner’s car did not match the description of another witness. The two eyewitnesses stated that the assailant’s car had tinted windows while petitioner’s car did not have tinted windows, although two officers testified it appeared that tint had been removed from the windows of petitioner’s car. Finally, there was no blood or DNA from the victim found in petitioner’s car. “After weighing trial counsel’s error against the strength of the State’s case, we conclude the error creates a reasonable probability that the outcome of Felder’s trial would have been different had trial counsel acted to exclude the reference to the lynching charge.”

State v. Fuchs*, 2019 WL 5295573 (Ohio Ct. App. Oct. 18, 2019). In case where appellant was charged with violating a civil stalking protective order and his defense was alibi, defense counsel was ineffective for stipulating to the admission of evidence associated with appellant’s prior conviction for violating the same protective order. The protective order was obtained by the husband of a woman appellant had previously been romantically involved with and it covered the husband, Gary Belcher, and his family. At the trial for the second violation, the defense stipulated that a valid protective order existed on the date of the alleged second violation and that appellant had previously violated that order. The defense did not object to the admission of documents proving the already stipulated to fact of the prior violation, and even stipulated to their authenticity. These documents included the magistrate’s decision granting the request for the protective order. In it, the magistrate found that Fuchs had threatened to “cut” Gary Belcher during a threatening telephone call; that “[t]elecommunications harassment charges [were] pending” against Fuchs as a result of an earlier incident of telephone harassment; that Fuchs had threatened to kill Belcher and was arrested while driving in Belcher’s neighborhood with a gun in his vehicle, “a case [that] likewise [was] pending”; and that Fuchs and Belcher had “got[ten] into a fistfight” in January 2016. The order itself stated Fuchs had “knowingly engaged in a pattern of conduct that caused [Belcher] to believe that [Fuchs] [would] cause physical harm * * *.”

Capital Case*

During the trial, the prosecution called only three witnesses: Gary Belcher's wife, a neighbor, and a police officer. Only Belcher's wife testified to seeing appellant on the day of the alleged violation, driving his pickup truck in her neighborhood. The neighbor testified to seeing a pickup truck matching some of the characteristics of appellant's pickup truck but the neighbor denied that he had seen the driver, and when he was shown photographs of appellant's truck, he could not confirm that the truck he saw was the same vehicle. The police officer did not witness any of the events in question. Appellant called two witnesses. His first witness testified that he only was acquainted with appellant through a mutual friend and at the time in question the witness, the mutual friend, and appellant had been kayaking. Appellant's other witness was his mother who testified that appellant's truck was inoperable on the date of the alleged violation. On this record there is a reasonable probability of a different outcome had the exhibit with the magistrate's opinion not been admitted. The court is unpersuaded by the State's argument that counsel may have made a strategic decision to allow admission of the magistrate's opinion given that there was a footnote in that opinion casting doubt on Mrs. Belcher's truthfulness as a witness. The court points out that defense counsel "made no reference to that portion of the magistrate's decision in his opening or closing statement, and he made no attempt to impeach Belcher's testimony on the basis of the footnote during cross-examination."

State v. Brewer*, 2019 WL 3287823 (Ohio Ct. App. July 22, 2019). In cruelty against animal case based on alleged abuse by appellant of his dog, appellant was denied of a fundamentally fair trial by the cumulative impact of trial counsel's multiple failures to lodge appropriate objections. Prior to trial, defense counsel moved to preclude admission of evidence of appellant's criminal history and any prior bad acts, particularly veterinary visits. The trial court declined to rule in advance, waiting instead to hear what evidence was offered before making any ruling. During trial, defense counsel did not object to anything, including statements by a county humane agent about her investigation into the mistreatment allegation which were "scarcely relevant" to the actual alleged abuse. The absence of an objection on hearsay and/or relevance/prejudice grounds allowed the prosecution to introduce out-of-court statements that the agent and her supervisor "were afraid of Brewer, the dog had suffered prior injury under suspicious circumstances (which Brewer was neglectful about treating), Brewer's son loved the dog, and Brewer's mother, family friends, and Willowick police officers all knew and had concerns about Brewer's anger issues." Similarly, defense counsel failed to object when the agent was asked whether she was aware that appellant was involved in other criminal incidents. The agent's acknowledgment that she knew of other criminal matters was "of doubtful relevance and create[d] the impression that animal cruelty may be the least of Brewer's criminal activity." And although the agent had not been qualified as an expert, without objection she was asked about any correlation between domestic violence and animal cruelty. Hearsay records of other bad acts found by the agent were then used to show that appellant was known to be suspected of domestic violence. The State's contention that defense counsel may have declined to object in order to avoid drawing unnecessary attention to damaging testimony is unpersuasive on the facts of the case. "Here, trial counsel's failure to raise a single objection during the course of the trial cannot be reconciled with reasonable trial strategy or tactical choice."

Cartwright v. Caldwell*, 825 S.E.2d 168 (Ga. 2019). Reversing denial of habeas relief in case involving murder and other crimes committed in connection with the killing where appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to present the evidence required to substantiate a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. On direct appeal, petitioner claimed that his trial counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to challenge Detective Tyner's testimony that petitioner had not mentioned his alibi during his post-arrest police interview. Petitioner contended that during a preliminary hearing, Detective Spicer, the lead investigator in the case, testified that Detective Tyner told him that petitioner had mentioned his alibi during the interview. The claim was rejected for lack of prejudice given petitioner's failure at the motion for new trial hearing to call Detective Spicer as a witness or introduce a transcript of the detective's preliminary hearing testimony. In habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged that appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to present the Spicer evidence at the new trial hearing. In support, he introduced the relevant preliminary hearing transcript, as well as an affidavit from Detective Spicer reiterating that Detective Tyner had told him of petitioner providing an alibi and stating that neither trial nor appellate counsel ever contacted him. The habeas court denied the claim on the ground that petitioner did not establish prejudice given that he presented, albeit unsuccessfully, his alibi defense at trial through other witnesses. The Georgia Supreme Court first addressed the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim. Trial counsel never claimed to have had a strategic basis for not presenting Detective Spicer's account and the Georgia Supreme Court found that it appeared from the record that "trial counsel simply whiffed on this issue." It further noted that "[a]lthough the scope of cross-examination will rarely support a claim of deficient performance, no reasonably competent defense attorney would have decided to forgo presenting this evidence to cast doubt on the credibility of the State and one of its key witnesses and to bolster [petitioner's] alibi defense." As to prejudice, the Georgia Supreme Court finds that the habeas court's reliance on the alibi witnesses petitioner presented at trial to have "misse[d] the point for which the defense would have offered Detective Spicer's testimony. The detective's testimony would have been relatively insignificant to bolster the credibility of the five witnesses who testified that [petitioner] was at his family's apartment on the night of the shooting—but it was critical to rebut the State's vociferous assertion that [petitioner] invented that alibi after his post-arrest interview." Notably, "[t]he prosecutor had Detective Tyner testify repeatedly and definitively that [petitioner] had not mentioned his alibi in any way during the interview" and "the prosecutor then relied on that 'undisputed evidence' during closing argument to assert repeatedly that petitioner invented his alibi defense after the interview and then convinced his alibi witnesses to testify on his behalf" The invented alibi narrative was "particularly significant in light of the nature of the evidence against [petitioner]. There was no physical evidence linking him to the shooting, and although the State presented four witnesses who said that they saw [petitioner] shoot [the victim], the defense substantially impeached each of them." The Georgia Supreme Court concluded: "Given the less than overwhelming evidence of [defendant's] guilt, his affirmative defense of alibi supported by multiple witnesses, and the importance of Detective Tyner's testimony to the State's efforts to disprove that defense, we conclude that trial counsel's failure to introduce Detective Spicer's contrary testimony had a reasonable probability of affecting the outcome of the trial." Having found the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim meritorious, the only issue left was whether appellate counsel performed deficiently at the habeas hearing. The state supreme court found: "No reasonable attorney would have failed to present the readily available evidence from Detective Spicer, which was essential to proving trial counsel's ineffectiveness."

2018: Parmer v. State, 545 S.W.3d 724 (Tex. Ct. App. 2018). In attempted capital murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the inclusion during the guilt/innocence phase, of appellant's medical records, which contained evidence of several extraneous offenses and prior bad acts. The incident from which the charge stemmed was one in which appellant shot a police officer in the face when that officer and a number of others reported to appellant's girlfriend's distress call at night that appellant was acting strangely and shooting a gun. When the officers cut the power to appellant's property, appellant ran inside and grabbed a shotgun. The officer who was shot had shined a flashlight into a window of the house. To prove its case, the state had to establish that appellant knew the person he shot was a police officer, and the state presented evidence that the officers announced themselves and appellant would have been able to hear them. Appellant presented only argument that he did not intentionally or knowingly attempt to cause the officer's death and only intended to get people off his property when he shot the weapon. With regard to deficient performance, the medical records, while containing helpful information about appellant's serious mental illness that supported his girlfriend's report that he was acting strangely, they also contained numerous, detailed references to appellant's extraneous offenses, prior bad acts, and unpopular attitudes, and these were admitted without objection. These included such acts as taking a rifle to work and frightening people, being uncooperative with police, having a substance abuse problem and being narcissistic, destroying several bedrooms and a bathroom, and having a gambling debt. They also included statements he made about being prejudiced and a member of the KKK. The danger of including all this information was that appellant might have been convicted on an implied charge of having a propensity to commit crimes generally. These prior bad acts and attitudes were inadmissible because they were irrelevant to the issue of whether appellant intentionally or knowingly attempted to cause the death of a person he knew to be a peace officer. Because this evidence was inadmissible, no reasonable trial strategy could have supported counsel's choice not to object to its admission. With regard to prejudice, the court found "probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome where the effect of the error permeated the entire case and went to the heart of counsel's only defense issue." The only defense strategy was to challenge the intent requirement. Counsel presented no evidence and made no opening statement, and only argued in closing that there was no intent to kill the officer and just an attempt to get the officers off his property. The state called attention to the extraneous offenses in the medical records during closing argument, without any objection by defense counsel. During deliberations, the jury asked to see appellant's medical records. "[T]he totality of counsel's representation raises concern," and the court noted this was relevant for the purposes of determining prejudice. If the jury had only the admissible portions of appellant's mental health history, those portions, along with the evidence that appellant was acting strangely on the day of the incident, wasn't making any sense whatsoever, and that appellant said he wanted people to get off his property, could have negated the mens rea element of the crime. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Robinson v. State*, 428 P.3d 225 (Kan. Ct. App. 2018). In arson-murder case, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present sufficient expert testimony to refute the claims of the state's expert. Petitioner was convicted in state court of reckless second-degree murder and aggravated arson after he had first been indicted in federal court but the federal case was dismissed. The government's fire expert testified that the fire was intentionally set on the stairs using an open flame and a flammable liquid. Petitioner told detectives that he could have been smoking crack cocaine in the hall and could have thrown lighted matches on the floor. In state habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged numerous deficiencies by trial counsel. Following a hearing, the habeas court ruled that petitioner's counsel were ineffective for failing to investigate and present sufficient expert testimony to refute the claims of the state's expert, that this failure was prejudicial, and that cumulative trial counsel errors required relief. The Court of Appeals of Kansas affirmed the habeas court's grant of relief, using the standard of review of determining whether the habeas court's findings were supported by substantial competent evidence, whether the findings supported the court's legal conclusions, and applying a de novo standard to the habeas court's conclusions of law. It determined that the habeas court's finding of cumulative errors was insignificant given the expert evidence deficiency. It noted that the district court held that trial counsel performed an insufficient investigation into the use of an arson expert. Arson cases generally rely on expert opinions that a person intentionally started the fire, and therefore, it is incumbent upon defense counsel to counter the cause and origin evidence by exploring the possibility of using its own experts. Counsel here waited until two weeks before trial before consulting with someone who had no expertise in determining the cause and origin of fires, did not offer counsel an opinion about the cause and origins of this fire, and only provided counsel notes for use in cross-examination of the state's expert witness. At the habeas hearing, petitioner established that the state's expert's opinions were vulnerable to attack because they were not based on the actual physical evidence and only on a process of elimination of causes, which is not the product of the scientific method. The appellate court noted that there were vivid contrasts between the preparation of trial counsel and habeas counsel, and between the state trial expert and the habeas defense experts. The trial lawyer did not hire an investigator and did not hire an arson expert, but rather a person who did not point out any flaw in the state's evidence. He did not try to hire someone else because he doesn't "go around trying to find people that are just opinions for hire." The defense "expert" was asked to assist on the case as a consulting expert. He gave trial counsel a timeline and recommended cross-examination questions and had an hour-long conversation with someone on the defense team. He was not a member of arson or fire investigators organizations. The habeas lawyers presented testimony of the federal public defenders who had represented petitioner before his federal case was dismissed. They had consulted with an expert who had written a foundational text on arson investigation and participated in the group that put together the Guide for Fire and Explosion Investigations. Counsel "studied [that guide] and used it in the preparation of his defense." 428 P.3d at 230. They moved to have the guide recognized as a learned treatise so they could use it to help with cross-examination of the state's expert. They had an investigator interview as many witnesses from the scene as possible. They moved for a Daubert hearing on the method the state's expert used to attempt to detect flammable accelerants. They believed the state's expert's methods did not fit with the recommendations of the guide. They also felt that the state's expert's opinion that petitioner did not flick a lit match was based on his personal belief that petitioner was not truthful, and he was not permitted to discuss that because it was outside his area of expertise. A habeas defense expert was a fire investigator who had been a fire fighter for 15 years, obtained certification through an association of fire investigators, and was a member of those organizations. He reviewed the fire investigation report, the report of the dog handler who investigated the case, read testimony from the original trial, and viewed photos and reviewed witness statements. He testified that the state expert's methodology violated the scientific method. There were numerous reasons besides the use of an accelerant why the fire spread rapidly that applied here. The appellate court noted that on appeal, many of the challenges the state raised to the habeas court's findings and conclusion were based on misinterpretations of what the habeas court actually did and found. Counsel's performance was deficient because counsel contacted the “expert” less than two weeks before trial and did not talk to another expert when the first proved unhelpful, not because (as the state contended) counsel did not call his expert to testify nor because he did not ask for a continuance to find an expert. The deficiency was prejudicial because the state expert’s opinion could have been impeached, leaving the state with no case that petitioner intentionally started the fire. There was no physical evidence of any chemical accelerants at the scene. The significance of the gas can found at the scene was speculative, and the speed of the fire could have been caused by the structure of the apartment house.

Capital Case*

2017: Tran v. State, 798 S.E.2d 71 (Ga. Ct. App. 2017). In case where defendant was convicted of two counts of armed robbery, one count of aggravated sexual battery, and one count of possession of a firearm during the commission of a felony, convictions are reversed based on several instances of deficient performance. The crimes were committed by two men who entered a karaoke club wearing surgical masks and carrying guns. After the robberies and sexual battery, the men left the club. A witness then observed a silver Acura with tinted windows leaving the parking lot. Shortly thereafter, a silver Acura was pulled over by police. The passenger fled and was never located. Defendant was the driver of the vehicle. He told officers a gun was in the car. Also found in the car were items matching those taken from the club. At trial, defendant testified that he had been waiting outside the club for friends when a masked man pointed a gun at him and ordered him to get in the car and drive. The gunman placed objects he was carrying in the car. After the car was pulled over, the gunman took bills from the glove compartment that had defendant’s name on them and threatened defendant not to say anything about the incident. The gunman then fled. According to defendant, he had been robbed and threatened previously, which he had reported to police, leading him to purchase a gun. Although defendant raised multiple allegations of deficient performance by trial counsel, only a few are found to be meritorious: (1) failing to raise a hearsay objection to testimony about the absence of a record of defendant having been a crime victim in a certain county; (2) failing to object to statements by the prosecutor that improperly impeached defendant’s testimony; and (3) opening the door to damaging testimony that contradicted defendant’s testimony that he was unaware who the gunman was. In finding prejudice from counsel’s deficiencies, the court weighed the fact that “the jury heard the prosecutor essentially testify that [defendant] would not need an attorney if he was an innocent bystander and then question [defendant] at length about why he never gave the police information that would have cleared him of these charges.” Defendant’s allegation that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object to those improper comments and questions had been rejected because defense counsel had opened the door to them.

Entwisle v. State*, 796 S.E.2d 743 (Ga. Ct. App. 2017). In case where defendant was convicted of numerous charges, including computer invasion of privacy, counsel was found ineffective as to the computer charge for failing to object to hearsay testimony by the victim about someone using her stolen computer to access her financial information. Because the hearsay testimony was the only evidence to offered to prove the elements of the offense, prejudice is found.

Humphrey v. State*, 73 N.E.3d 677 (Ind. 2017). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to use of a witness’s prior unsworn statement as substantive evidence and failing to request appropriate instructions on how the statement could be considered by the jury. The murder occurred during an attempted drug deal. According to a friend of the murder victim, he and the victim had been driving around in the friend's truck searching for drugs. When they spotted three men who appeared to be dealers, they pulled up near them. One of the men approached the truck and the victim asked him to get in to discuss a drug purchase. As the friend drove, words were spoken between the victim and the dealer who then drew a gun. The victim grabbed the gun and it went off. The dealer jumped out of the moving car and ran away. The victim had been struck in the abdomen and ultimately died from the wound. The victim's friend could only give a vague description of the dealer. A man named Smith testified that he had been with defendant and a man named Brooks on the night of the murder. He observed a truck stop and defendant going to greet it, indicating to Smith that defendant thought the occupants wanted to buy drugs. Although Smith heard the door of the truck open and close, he didn't see defendant get in the truck and he heard no gunshot. He did hear the truck peel out and then defendant returned, telling Smith that the "dude" tried to "gank him" or "git him." Smith had seen defendant with a gun before but not on that night. Brooks, the third man allegedly present that night, gave police an unsworn statement about the events when Brooks was in jail on an unrelated charge. Brooks identified defendant in a photo lineup and stated that defendant went out to a truck, Brooks heard a "noise," and defendant returned stating that he had shot one of the men. At trial, however, Brooks denied being with defendant and Smith on the night of the shooting and claimed that his statement had been fabricated due to police pressure. The statement was admitted to impeach his in-court repudiation. As for trial counsel's failure to object to admission of the unsworn statement on hearsay grounds and to request a limiting instruction, the State argued that defense counsel could reasonably have decided not to further highlight the statement. But this supposed strategic justification for the omission was belied by the record which showed trial counsel's repeated references to the unsworn statement throughout the remainder of the trial, including defense counsel reading out loud the portion of the statement where Brooks identified defendant as the shooter. Trial counsel even expressly asked the jurors during closing argument to consider the out-of-court statement in determining defendant's guilt or innocence. The State's other argument – that trial counsel had a secondary strategy of wanting the Brooks statement admitted in order to sow reasonable doubt – was similarly unpersuasive. First, trial counsel had unsuccessfully objected to admission of the statement on other grounds (lack of foundation). Second, this argument contradicted the primary argument that trial counsel allowed the statement's admission in order to avoid further focus on it. "It defies credulity to say on the one hand that defense counsel strategically elected not to mount a hearsay objection or request a limiting instruction to refrain from drawing attention to Brooks' unsworn statement, but insist on the other hand that counsel wanted to 'use it to show the inconsistencies in the State's key witnesses.'" On this record, the deference normally accorded to trial counsel's acts or omissions was inappropriate and counsel's failure to lodge a hearsay objection to admission of the statement constituted deficient performance. Counsel also performed deficiently in failing to request an admonition or limiting instruction precluding the unsworn statement from being used as substantive evidence rather than only as impeachment evidence. Also deficient was defense counsel's failure to object to a jury instruction that expressly told the jury that it could consider the out-of-court statement in determining defendant's guilt. (The pattern instruction given to the jury had been rendered an incorrect statement of the law by a recent state supreme court ruling.) As to prejudice, the court observed: "[E]vidence improperly considered by the jury for want of a limiting instruction is no less prejudicial than evidence presented which should have never been introduced in the first instance. Both permit the jury to improperly determine guilt based information that should not be considered. Even if Brooks' unsworn statement was properly admitted for impeachment purposes, counsel failed to limit the use of that statement to his client's detriment." On the record before it, the court concluded there was a reasonable probability of a more favorable verdict had counsel not acted deficiently.

Alne v. Nooth*, 406 P.3d 109 (Or. Ct. App. 2017). In case involving charges of multiple sexual offenses, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to testimony by a prosecution witness commenting on the credibility of the complainant. The complainant, a five-year-old girl at the time of the alleged offense, told her father that defendant had committed several sexual acts on her. The girl was interviewed by a licensed social worker with extensive experience with child abuse evaluations. At trial, the social worker was asked about the girl's statements about sexual abuse and whether a non-abused child at her age would have been able to manufacture the descriptions she provided. The social worker responded, in part: "From my training and experience, I thought again that she provided information that was from a child's point of view, and it just seemed like a genuine statement." Defendant's counsel did not object to this testimony. Other evidence at trial included that the complainant had been brought in to be examined for sexual abuse on three prior occasions unrelated to defendant. There was also testimony that the complainant may have, at some time prior to her allegations of abuse by defendant, witnessed her parents engaging in sexual activity and may have seen pornographic videos playing on two occasions. Additionally, the defense brought an expert to testify about the memories of young children and how they may be affected and influenced by what they have seen. In affirming the grant of relief, the appellate court agreed with the lower court that the social worker's testimony about the complainant's statement seeming "genuine" was clearly impermissible vouching for the complainant. Trial counsel failed to exercise reasonable professional skill and judgment by not lodging an objection. Regarding prejudice, there was no physical evidence of sexual abuse and the credibility of the complainant was critical. The social worker's testimony that the complainant's statements were genuine could have tended to affect the outcome of the trial. Defendant was therefore prejudiced by trial counsel's failure to object to the vouching testimony.

Briggs v. State*, 806 S.E.2d 713 (S.C. 2017). In case involving charges of sexual crimes against a child, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the forensic interviewer gave opinion testimony that she believed the alleged victim's accusations to be true and then eliciting further bolstering testimony on cross-examination. On direct examination the forensic interviewer's testimony that her "role" was to determine whether the child knows the difference between the truth and a lie and that her "purpose" was "finding out if something happened" or "to figure out what has occurred" clearly conveyed to the jury that she believed the victim. Trial counsel conceded he had no strategic reason for not objecting to this vouching testimony and his failure to object constituted deficient performance. During cross-examination, trial counsel asked the forensic interviewer an open-ended question that included "how can you as an expert determine if she's telling the truth . . ." Such a question "was sure to solicit an answer that directly bolstered the victim's credibility" and the answer provided met expectations "and placed squarely before the jury her opinion that the victim was telling the truth." This questioning constituted deficient performance. Given the importance of the victim's credibility and the absence of physical evidence, prejudice is found irrespective of some incriminating remarks by defendant. The most damaging testimony against defendant, which came from two jailhouse informants, was dismissed as unreliable.

2016: Kennebrew v. State, 792 S.E.2d 695 (Ga. 2016). In robbery-murder case, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to seek suppression of evidence found in backpacks seized by officers following defendant's arrest, as well as failing to object to improper comments by the prosecutor. Defendant had been arrested pursuant to a warrant in his girlfriend's college dorm room. The police seized the backpacks after defendant had been handcuffed and removed from the room. It was not until six days later that the backpacks were opened and shot gun shells and bullets of the type taken from the victim's home were discovered, along with a knife that might have been involved in the killing. These items were severely damaging to defendant's trial defense that he went with the co-defendants to the victim's home for the purpose of selling the victim a PlayStation and then fled the scene after co-defendant Hall unexpectedly went crazy and viciously beat and stabbed the victim to death. The prosecutor emphasized the items in arguing that defendant was not merely present in the victim's home but was an active participant in the robbery-murder. At the hearing on defendant's motion for new trial, defense counsel explained that he had not moved to suppress the backpack evidence because he believed it had been lawfully taken during a search incident to arrest. This exception to the search warrant requirement, however, was clearly inapplicable to the facts of this case. Defense counsel's misunderstanding of the law constituted deficient performance. Also deficient was defendant counsel's failure to object when the prosecutor commented on defendant's pre-arrest silence/failure to come forward after the killing, a clear violation of the state law Mallory rule. Although defense counsel guessed at the post-trial hearing that he had decided to forgo an objection in order to avoid bringing more attention to the issue, this did not justify the omission: "The State's discussion of [defendant's] failure to come forward to the police was not . . . just a passing or equivocal remark that the jury might have overlooked. It was a specific, extended argument aimed directly at demonstrating [defendant's] guilt. Given [defendant's] defense theory, the importance of the State's silence-equals-guilt argument to its case against him, and the obviousness of the Mallory violation, [defense counsel's] failure to object was patently unreasonable and thus deficient performance under Strickland." Because the case against defendant was not overwhelming and he had a plausible explanation for his presence at the crime scene, prejudice is found given the prosecution's reliance on the backpack-related evidence, his improper argument, and notes from the jury seeking to compare the bullets found in the backpack with those found in the possession of co-defendant Hall.

Christian v. State*, 502 S.W.3d 702 (Mo. Ct. App. 2016). In forgery case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecutor introduced evidence that defendant had invoked his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent in a deposition he gave in a related civil suit. The prosecution's theory of the case was that defendant had forged the victim's signature on a deed transferring the victim's property to defendant and another party. During the prosecution's case-in-chief, the victim was asked whether he had gotten the property back. The victim responded that he had, through a civil bench trial. Also during the case-in-chief, the prosecutor read portions of defendant's deposition in the civil suit which referenced the pending criminal case. These excerpts included defendant's assertion of his Fifth Amendment rights on numerous occasions. Trial counsel did not object during the reading of the deposition but moved for a mistrial the following day. He commented that he had been surprised when the prosecution read the invocations but thought it better to approach the issue outside the presence of the jury. The prosecutor pointed out, however, that trial counsel had a copy of the deposition, which he had attended, and the prosecutor had omitted reading one part of the deposition at trial counsel's request. The prosecutor stated he would not further reference the invocations. The mistrial motion was denied but no admonitions were given to the jury about what it had heard about defendant invoking his Fifth Amendment rights. At the post-conviction hearing, trial counsel testified that his lack of contemporaneous objection was due to his shock and surprise by the prosecutor's use of the deposition. The post-conviction court denied relief. In reversing the post-conviction court's ruling the appellate court rejected the State's argument that no deficient performance was possible because there was no case establishing that use of an invocation of the Fifth Amendment in a related civil case was impermissible. The appellate court, applying the basic principles of Fifth Amendment jurisprudence, concluded that reasonably competent counsel would have objected to the prosecutor's use of the invocations. The fact that defendant ultimately chose to testify did not render the constitutional violation harmless.

Taylor v. State*, 788 S.E.2d 97 (Ga. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in vehicular homicide and traffic offenses case for failing to object to hearsay testimony of a police officer that the defendant was driving without a license and operating a vehicle without a current registration. The officer testified that this information came from a computer check or from another police officer's report. Either would be hearsay. Under Georgia law, "[w]hen an officer testifies about the results of a computer check of a registration tag or driver's license, the testimony is hearsay," unless the information was "obtained from a terminal lawfully connected to the Georgia Crime Information Center." Here, the state offered no such proof. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as this hearsay testimony was the only evidence supporting the misdemeanor convictions of driving without a license and operating a vehicle without a current registration.

People v. Shaw*, 892 N.W.2d 15 (Mich. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for failing to object to hearsay testimony of five witnesses concerning the alleged victim's statements to them about the crimes and failing to present evidence of an alternative source of the victim's injuries. In essence, when the alleged victim was 23 years old, she reported that the defendant, her stepfather, sexually molested her between the ages of 8 and 16. Three family members, a pediatrician, and a police detective testified concerning her statements to them about the crimes. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to this testimony. The state conceded the family member testimony was improper, but argued the statements to the pediatrician were admissible because they were statements made for the purposes of medical treatment. As the examination was conducted seven years after the last incident of alleged abuse and was for purposes of investigation, rather than gynecological treatment, Michigan Rule of Evidence 803(4) did not apply. Failure to object to the detective's testimony was even worse, as she recounted the alleged victim's statements to her but also the alleged victim's statements to the pediatrician and testified extensively about how she "confirmed" and "corroborated" the alleged victim's statements with investigation. Thus, the detective also vouched for the alleged victim's credibility. Prejudice established as the state's entire case "turned largely on the complainant's credibility." By failing to object, the jury heard her version of events six times rather than once. And, with regards to the pediatrician and detective, “the hearsay was offered with what amounted to an official stamp of approval” as both of these witnesses testified that they believed the alleged victim. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient and prejudicial in failing to investigate and present evidence that the complainant was sexually active with her live-in boyfriend beginning at age 19. Counsel did not do so because he believed the evidence was barred by the rape shield law. That law does not, however, prevent admission of other instances of sexual activity “to show the origin of a physical condition” offered by the prosecution to prove an element of the crime. Here, the pediatrician had testified to “hymenal changes” and a “chronic anal fissure” that were consistent with the complainant’s description of the alleged abuse, but also could be consistent with consensual vaginal and anal intercourse the complainant had with her boyfriend.

Baranovich v. Brockamp*, 379 P.3d 702 (Or. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in burglary and theft case under both the Sixth Amendment and the Oregon Constitution for failing to object to hearsay evidence identifying the defendant as the perpetrator of the burglary and commenting on petitioner’s character. On the day of the burglary and theft at the home of Rosabal and Alvarez, a neighbor saw a car drive by the house and thought the woman in the passenger seat looked “slightly familiar.” Later when Rosabal and Alvarez returned home, the neighbor discussed the possible identity of the woman with Alvarez. Alvarez showed the neighbor pictures of the defendant from his cell phone. The neighbor testified that he told Alvarez that the defendant “may have been” the woman in the car. Alvarez testified, however, that the neighbor “had identified” the defendant as the perpetrator. Rosabal testified that he had gone to the defendant’s house to confront her. She was not home, but her brother told Rosabal that she “was a really bad person, and he hopes she gets in trouble, and she does a lot of things like this.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the hearsay evidence in the testimony of both Alvarez and Rosabal. Prejudice also established, particularly with respect to the hearsay testimony that the defendant’s “own brother [thought] that she is a chronic thief who needs punishment.” “[E]ither alone or ‘certainly in combination,’” the errors were prejudicial.

Tappeiner v. State*, 785 S.E.2d 471 (S.C. 2016). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct with a minor case for failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper arguments vouching for the child victim’s credibility, mischaracterizing a rape counselor’s testimony, and appealing to the jurors’ emotions. The defendant was accused of sexually abusing her 13-year-old neighbor on a night when he and his sister stayed with the defendant and her husband. The alleged victim testified that the defendant sexually assaulted him after the others went to bed and that he had screamed for help but no one heard him. A school resource officer who had interviewed the alleged victim also testified, including statements that he believed the alleged victim. An expert in forensic interviewing from a local rape crisis center interviewed the alleged victim but testified only in response to hypothetical questions “as to why child victims of sex crimes may delay reporting the abuse.” Defense counsel called only the defendant’s husband as a witness. He testified that his wife had gone to bed at the same time as he did and remained there all night. He also testified that he was a light sleeper and he and the family dog would have reacted if there had been screaming. He also testified that the alleged victim was asleep in the living room when he awoke and behaving normally while having breakfast with him. In closing arguments, the prosecutor reminded the jury that the resource officer believed the boy, asserted that the expert testified that she believed the boy, and also asked the jurors if they would be comfortable with the defendant babysitting their children or grandchildren. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the prosecution's improper arguments. Not only was it impermissible for witnesses to testify that they believed the victim, but the prosecutor misrepresented the evidence by asserting that the expert had done so when she had not even testified that she had interviewed the boy. The prosecutor's appeal to the jurors' emotions was also improper. Prejudice also established as the state's evidence depended almost entirely on the boy's credibility.

People v. Lucious*, 63 N.E.3d 211 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). In case where defendant was convicted at a bench trial of aggravated robbery, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to evidence of a statement by the co-defendant which was used by the trial court to find an element of the crime in defendant's case. Defendant and the co-defendant accosted a woman in an alley and took two backpacks from her. They both confessed to the robbery. The victim testified that defendant put a gun to her head, leading to a charge of armed robbery, as well as aggravated robbery. In his confession, defendant denied having a gun but stated he had a cell phone. In the co-defendant's confession, he stated that he told the victim, "Don't make him [i.e., defendant] shoot you." The co-defendant also stated he didn't know why he said that given that defendant only had a cell phone. When defendant and the co-defendant were arrested shortly after the robbery, neither had a gun or a cell phone with them. After the prosecution presented its case, the court granted defendant's motion for a directed verdict on the armed robbery charge. Neither defendant testified. Trial counsel argued that the evidence did not establish an aggravated robbery as that required that the defendant indicate to the victim, either verbally or through his actions, that he was armed with a firearm or other deadly weapon. Based on the statement of the co-defendant, which the court found accountable to defendant, the court concluded the defendants were attempting to make the victim believe they had a gun and convicted both defendants of aggravated robbery. Trial counsel's failure to object to the use of the co-defendant's statement against defendant was deficient performance as it violated defendant's confrontation rights. As to prejudice, it was reasonable to infer, as the State did in summation, that defendant had pressed a cell phone to the victim's head making her believe it was a gun. Nevertheless, the direct evidence of a threat to shoot having been made was far stronger proof of the element of the crime, establishing prejudice from trial counsel's failure to object.

Landry v. State*, 380 P.3d 25 (Utah Ct. App. 2016). In aggravated arson case, trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to the State's use of testimony about an accelerant-detection canine's alerts at the scene of the fire and on items of defendant's clothing and by failing to consult with an arson expert or call an expert witness to refute the State's arson experts. Further, appellate counsel was objectively deficient in failing to present the meritorious claim of trial counsel ineffectiveness on appeal. The fire at issue occurred in an apartment defendant was in the process of moving out of due to eviction. It broke out five to ten minutes after defendant and his girlfriend left, apparently intending to return. Some of defendant's belongings remained in the apartment and he was supposed to meet the apartment complex manager that evening for a walk-through inspection of the apartment. At trial, the State presented expert testimony supporting the arson theory. One aspect of such testimony involved alerts by an accelerant-detection canine. Trial counsel, who had never tried an arson case before, failed to object to this testimony even though existing case law made it highly unlikely that the State would have been able to overcome a proper objection. In preparation for trial, trial counsel spoke only with a fire marshal who was a witness for the State. Obviously, this expert would not have provided trial counsel with a basis to challenge the expert's own findings. The defense theory was that either the fire started accidentally by a cigarette smoked by the girlfriend contacting alcohol spilled on the floor during a party the night before or that it was started by an unknown individual who a neighbor saw outside the apartment around the time the fire began. Both theories had significant evidentiary problems. As shown by post-conviction expert testimony, had trial counsel consulted with or presented testimony from an independent arson expert, she would have had ammunition to challenge how the arson investigation had been conducted as well as the findings of the State's arson experts. The defense post-conviction expert had criticized numerous aspects of the investigation and concluded that the fire should have been classified as of "undetermined origin." Trial counsel's failure to properly educate herself constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is found because: (1) post-conviction expert testimony revealed substantial errors in the State's arson case; (2) under existing case law, trial counsel likely would have kept out the canine alert testimony; and (3) the jury struggled to reach a verdict in this case. (After the jury announced a deadlock, it was told that if it did not reach a verdict that day, it would have to return to deliberate on an extra unplanned day causing a hardship to at least one juror. The jury reached consensus after that admonition.) Because trial counsel's deficient performance prejudiced defendant, "appellate counsel's failure to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel on appeal was likewise objectively deficient and prejudicial."

Commonwealth v. Williams, 141 A.3d 440 (Pa. 2016). In triple murder case, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness in not cross-examining the prosecution's expert or calling a defense expert concerning inconsistencies between the key prosecution witness's testimony and the forensic evidence. At trial, the prosecution relied primarily on the testimony of White, a purported eyewitness to two of the murders and an accomplice in all three. White testified that the three victims had arranged to purchase weapons from Williams, the leader of a gang that sold weapons and drugs. Williams had planned to rob the men when they met to receive the guns. When the groups met, Williams and members of the gang, including White, held the victims at gunpoint and demanded their money. After the purchase money was turned over, Williams continued to demand additional money from the three victims. When one of the men admitted he had additional money at another location, he was taken by Williams and two other gang members to retrieve the money. Williams and the gang members returned without the victim. White testified that one of the two gang members who accompanied Williams informed White that Williams had shot the victim in the head. The remaining two victims were then loaded in the back of a stolen van. Williams and another gang member were in the back with the victims and continuing to demand more money. White was in the front passenger seat. White testified that he saw Williams shoot the smallest of the three victims in the face while the victim looked at Williams and the gun. A short time later, the van slowed and this victim was thrown out of the back of the van into the street. White then saw Williams put his gun in the face of the remaining victim. White turned to face front and heard two gunshots and the back of the van open. When he next looked back, the third victim was gone, presumably also thrown out of the van. When the victims were later found by authorities, none were in a street but instead on a sidewalk or in a driveway. And each had sustained gunshots wounds but none had other injuries to their bodies, such as bruises or abrasions. Defense counsel did not ask any of the prosecution's expert witnesses a single question. Counsel for one co-defendant did cross-examine two of these witnesses about the absence of non-gun-related injuries to the victims but the witnesses opined that the lack of additional injuries did not establish that the victims had not fallen. Defense counsel argued to the jury that common sense showed that the location and conditions of the bodies were inconsistent with White's account of what occurred. In post-conviction proceedings, defense counsel conceded he had no strategic reason for failing to consult with or present testimony from a medical or forensic expert in order to highlight the problems with White's testimony. Post-conviction counsel presented testimony from an expert in the field of homicide investigation, crime scene analysis and blood spatter analysis. This expert, who was credited by the post-conviction court, opined that the medical and forensic evidence was inconsistent with White's testimony. In finding that this expert's testimony would have been helpful to defendant at trial, the state supreme court noted in particular the expert's opinion that "the blood flow evidence was [] wholly incompatible with White's testimony that the victims were shot and thrown from a moving van." Additionally, the expert testified that none of the victims sustained gunshot wounds consistent with White's testimony that the victim was looking at the shooter's gun when he was shot. As for prejudice, it was noted that although White was subject to significant impeachment, "the cross-examination of White left his story about the three murders at issue largely unscathed." If the jury believed the post-conviction expert's testimony, coupled with other evidence impeaching White's credibility, it is likely the jury would have acquitted defendant of the three murders. Finally, the record supported the post-conviction court's "factual findings and legal conclusion that appellate counsel had no reasonable basis for failing to raise the claim of trial counsel's ineffectiveness for not calling an expert to testify or cross-examining the Commonwealth's experts regarding the blood flow evidence and gunshot wound evidence." (Appellate counsel testified that he had no independent recollection of the appeal but that confining his claims to those appearing on the record, as occurred in defendant's appeal, was consistent with his practice at the relevant time.) Prejudice is established because there was a substantial likelihood that the outcome of defendant's appeal would have been different if the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim had been raised there.

2015: State v. Johnson, 57 N.E.3d 76 (Ohio Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in failing to object to the prosecutor's closing argument asking the jury to consider hearsay statements admitted for a limited purpose as substantive evidence of guilt. The defendant was convicted of assault for firing shots into a car occupied by his girlfriend and two other women. One of those women (Starks) did not testify but the state was permitted to introduce her statements during the investigation through a police officer over the defendant's objection. Prior to the testimony, the court instructed the jury that the testimony could be considered only for the limited purpose of describing the ongoing investigation. The officer testified that Starks said the defendant and his girlfriend were arguing and after the girlfriend got in the car and they were living, the defendant fired shots into the car. The cautionary instruction was not repeated in the final instructions. Following the defense closing asserting that no one testified that the defendant had a gun, the state argued in closing that Starks identified the defendant as the shooter. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to this argument because use of Starks' hearsay statements as probative evidence of guilt violated the defendant's right to confrontation. Prejudice established because without evidence identifying the defendant as the shooter, the state's case was weak and based entirely on inference as no gun was recovered and the shell casings in the parking lot near where the defendant was standing did not match the bullets removed from the car. The prejudice was enhanced because the improper arguments came in the state's rebuttal when the defense had no opportunity to respond. "As the last argument heard by the jury prior to deliberations, there is a substantial likelihood that its impact was prejudicial."

Oatney v. Premo, 369 P.3d 387 (Or. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in capital murder trial for failing to move to suppress the testimony and out-of-court statements of the codefendant which were used in violation of a use and derivative use immunity agreement between the state and petitioner. The victim disappeared after leaving home purportedly to meet with petitioner. Petitioner was questioned but denied seeing the victim for three weeks. A week or so later the victim's badly decomposed body was found. Petitioner retained counsel and informed counsel he was innocent but knew who had committed the crime. Counsel arranged a recorded interview of petitioner by the prosecutor and detectives. At the beginning of the interview, throughout the interview, and at the end of the interview, the prosecutor "promised petitioner that 'anything you say during the course of this interview' and 'any information that we derive from what you tell us' 'cannot ever be used against you.'" Petitioner then made a statement that, while he was away from his apartment, his associate, Johnston, kidnaped the victim, sexually assaulted, and murdered her in petitioner's apartment. When petitioner returned, he helped clean up and dispose of the body because he feared being charged. Johnston was in custody on unrelated charges and had been interviewed several times about the murder, but he denied any knowledge. After petitioner's taped statement was played for Johnston, he became angry and then implicated petitioner. Over the next two days, he made additional statements ultimately admitting that both he and petitioner had sexually assaulted the victim and murdered her. Johnston and petitioner were jointly charged. In pretrial proceedings, counsel argued that petitioner's statements and Johnston's statements were inadmissible against petitioner due to the immunity agreement. Johnston subsequently entered into a plea agreement in which he agreed to plead guilty and testify against petitioner in exchange for a life sentence. Trial counsel continued to argue that petitioner's statements were inadmissible under the agreement but inexplicably did not move to suppress Johnston's statements and testimony. The prosecutor conceded that petitioner's statements were inadmissible. During trial, Johnston testified consistent with his statements. Petitioner also testified consistent with his statement. The only physical evidence of significance was the victim's blood in petitioner's apartment. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move to suppress Johnston's testimony and prior statements. While counsel testified that he believed these statements were admissible, this "subjective belief, apparently belatedly arrived at," was unreasonable in light of the plain language of the agreement and counsel's earlier challenges to the statements. Likewise, while the state argued that the agreement was premised on petitioner's statements being true, this was inconsistent with the plain language of the agreement and was never argued before by the prosecutor who made the agreement and conceded that the agreement precluded use of petitioner's prior statements. While the state also argued that Johnston's statements were not derivative because they were from an independent source and would have inevitably been discovered, those arguments were also rejected. The record was clear that Johnston had consistently denied knowledge of the crimes and confessed only after petitioner's recorded statement was played for him. Prejudice was "readily" found, as the state made no argument otherwise and Johnston's statements and testimony were the only direct evidence against petitioner.

Floyd v. State*, 159 So. 3d 987 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in shooting case for failing to object to the prosecutor's comments on the defendant's exercise of his post-arrest right to remain silent. These comments were made while cross-examining the defendant, who was arguing self-defense. Counsel's explanation of "not wanting to annoy the jury or give the appearance of attempting to hide something from the jury" was unreasonable because could did make other objections during the state's cross of the defendant.

State v. Sims*, 769 S.E.2d 62 (Ga. 2015). Counsel ineffective in felony murder case for failing to object to the prosecutor's opening statement comments concerning the defendant's silence prior to arrest. Counsel's failure to object "was an oversight unrelated to any strategy." Prejudice established. The sole defense was justification, but these comments tainted the trial from the beginning leaving the impression of guilt from the defendant's failure to contact the police of his own accord following the shooting.

State v. Pruett*, 31 N.E.3d 197 (Ohio Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in theft case for failing to object to police officers' statements, which bolstered victims' testimony. The case arose from alleged fraudulent fuel purchases made on the account of a painting company, who had an account at a gas station. The defendant was an employee of the gas station allegedly creating false fuel purchases and pocketing the cash. The owners of the businesses compared paperwork and concluded that the defendant was the guilty party. This information was taken to the police who brought charges. During trial, a detective was asked, without objection, whether he had any reason to doubt that the defendant signed the tickets. Another officer testified, without objection, that he verified the information provided. The defendant was never asked to provide a handwriting exemplar to determine whether he wrote the disputed tickets and neither officer conducted any investigation beyond speaking with the alleged victims and the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the officers' testimony "attesting to the veracity of witnesses." Prejudice established, as there was no actual accounting of the business records, which were not admitted in evidence, and no independent investigation by the police.

People v. Coleman*, 25 N.E.3d 82 (Ill. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in unlawful delivery of a controlled substance case for stipulating to the existence of over 900 grams of cocaine, even though the police field tested only 1 bag, containing only 63 or 64 grams, prior to commingling this evidence with powder contained in 14 other bags before sending it to the lab. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial with respect to quantity. Remanded for resentencing on the lesser included offense of possession of "15 grams or more but less than 100 grams."

Taylor v. State*, 167 So. 3d 1143 (Miss. 2015). Counsel ineffective in receiving stolen property case for failing to object to the introduction of the defendant's past felony convictions. The police were investigating a stolen "skid steer" used by the owner of a tree service when they discovered photos of an identical "skid steer" on the defendant's phone while he was under arrest for an unrelated crime. The tree service owner, who had previously identified someone else as the person he bought the equipment from, then identified the defendant as the culprit. Prior to trial, counsel moved to exclude evidence of the defendant's past criminal record, but the ruling was delayed until trial. Just prior to the defendant's testimony, counsel withdrew the motion as the defendant had decided to testify and would admit that he was a convicted felon. During his direct testimony, he admitted that he had previously been convicted on a drug charge. On cross, the state elicited testimony of seven or eight prior felony convictions of house burglary, vehicle theft, grand larceny, and other offenses. Defense counsel made no objection. Counsel's conduct was deficient, lacking in strategy, and prejudicial, as the evidence admitted was, under the state evidentiary rules, "clearly more prejudicial than probative in a case that largely turned on the respective credibility of Taylor and the State's main witness." The defendant's admission of his felon status should have been the only evidence admitted concerning the defendant's prior criminal history.

State v. Vandyke*, 863 N.W.2d 626 (Wis. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in reckless homicide by delivery of controlled substance case for failing to object to the introduction of a lab report containing the victim's blood and urine tests results, which was testimonial for confrontation clause purposes. The only evidence that the victim died of a heroin overdose came from this report, when neither the author of the report nor anyone else from the lab was produced as a witness. While counsel allegedly wanted this report in evidence in order to argue that a different drug killed the victim, this was unreasonable. If the objection were successful, such argument would be unnecessary because the state could not prove its case. If the argument were unsuccessful, counsel's argument could still have been made. Prejudice established. NOTE: Review in the Wisconsin Supreme Court was not sought in this case. In a later case, the Wisconsin Supreme Court expressly overruled the holding here that the lab report at issue was testimonial for purposes of the Confrontation Clause. State v. Mattox, 890 N.W.2d 256 (Wisc. 2017).

2014: People v. Centeno, 338 P.3d 938 (Cal. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in lewd acts case for failing to object to the prosecutor's arguments using a hypothetical to explain the burden of proof and other statements that diluted the state's burden of proof. Specifically, the prosecutor used a diagram showing the boundaries of California and urged the jury to convict based on a "reasonable" view of the evidence, which risked misleading the jury.

The use of an iconic image like the shape of California or the Statue of Liberty, unrelated to the facts of the case, is a flawed way to demonstrate the process of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. These types of images necessarily draw on the jurors' own knowledge rather than evidence presented at trial. They are immediately recognizable and irrefutable. Additionally, such demonstrations trivialize the deliberative process, essentially turning it into a game that encourages the jurors to guess or jump to a conclusion.

Id. at 947. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object. Prejudice established as "this was a very close case" dependent almost entirely on the 10-year-old alleged victim's testimony, the credibility of which was repeatedly called into question.

Hutchins v. State*, 756 S.E.2d 347 (Ga. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in manufacture of methamphetamine and allowing child to remain present where methamphetamine was being manufactured case for failing to object to uncharged misconduct and bad character evidence. The defendant and her 3-year-old daughter lived with the defendant's mother and stepfather for 6 months.

Capital Case*

During this time, police received a tip from a confidential informant that methamphetamine was being manufactured and sold from the property. Police made two “controlled buys” from the defendant’s stepfather at the home. A search of the home revealed methamphetamine ingredients, supplies, and a “recipe” but all in common areas of the home or in the parents’ bedroom. Thus, the court of appeals held that there was insufficient evidence to support the manufacturing charge because the only evidence linking the defendant to any of the relevant evidence “was her awareness of and proximity to” it. The evidence was sufficient to support the charge of allowing her child to be present around the manufacture, though it was all circumstantial. Defense counsel’s conduct was deficient, however, in failing to object to testimony from the lead police detective that the defendant had been involved in a suspected illegal “pill ring,” in which participants obtained doctor’s prescriptions for oxycodone and Oxycontin and then sold the pills on the street. The defendant allegedly transported participants to the doctor appointments. The investigator also testified without objection that he believed the defendant was lying when she denied knowledge of drug manufacture and sale from her home and claimed awareness only that her mother had manufactured methamphetamine in the past. During cross-examination of the defendant, the prosecutor questioned her extensively about the details and her involvement in the pill ring based on information from a confidential informant and from the police. While counsel did object to the cross-examination, the court overruled the objection because the evidence about the alleged “pill ring” had already been admitted. “[T]rial counsel offered no strategic basis for admitting the evidence; rather she testified that she did not think the evidence was harmful.” Prejudice was established as the prosecutor relied on this evidence to establish the defendant’s propensity for drug crimes and her intimate knowledge of the drug trade, which severely undermined her credibility on key issues in the trial.

State v. Collins*, 91 A.3d 1208 (N.H. 2014). Counsel ineffective under the state constitution in aggravated sexual assault case involving the defendant’s 14-year-old daughter for failing to object to improper expert testimony from the daughter’s therapist that her behaviors “fit perfectly” with those of sexual abuse victims and that her disclosure, which “came out of the blue . . . added to its credibility.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient as this testimony was clearly improper. Prejudice established as the case turned primarily on the daughter’s credibility, which was improperly bolstered by the expert based on his “forty-two years of experience.”

People v. Jian Long Shi*, 987 N.Y.S.2d 791 (N.Y. App. Div. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in endangering welfare of child case for failing to move in limine and failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper cross-examination of the defendant about his illegal entry into the country. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial where the case turned on the credibility of the defendant and the 11-year-old alleged victim.

Ex parte Bryant*, 448 S.W.3d 29 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to evidence that several state witnesses had been given polygraph tests prior to changing their statements from favorable to the defendant to harmful to him. On the night of the murder, the victim’s children told police they saw three men at the time of the shooting: Kenneth, Mitchell, and Tom, but were initially unable to identify Tom. A year later, Kenneth and Mitchell were indicted. Kenneth was killed in a car accident and the charges were dismissed against Mitchell. Nineteen years after the crime, when a new Sheriff took office, the case was reopened.

Capital Case*

A jailhouse snitch implicated Mitchell, who initially denied involvement. After being told that he failed a polygraph, however, he admitted involvement as a get-away driver and implicated Bryant as the shooter. One of the victim's children also changed his statement to implicate Bryant. Finally, Bryant's live-in girlfriend, Janie, was questioned. After she was told that she failed a polygraph, she also signed a written statement implicating Bryant. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to repeated references to Janie's and Mitchell's polygraph tests and the results, which the state used to argue that they were untruthful until confronted with these results. Thereafter, according to the state, they were truthful in implicating Bryant. Prejudice established.

State v. Doutre*, 335 P.3d 366 (Utah 2014). Counsel ineffective in attempted kidnaping case for failing to object to the testimony of a detective, who was testifying as an expert witness. The state's case was based on the testimony of three young girls, who testified that they were out sledding. One girl separated from the group to walk towards a nearby house where her mother was visiting a friend. She testified that she was approached by a man who grabbed her hand and told her that her mother was by his truck. The other girls began yelling and the man fled. Based on their descriptions of the truck and the man's clothing, police arrested the defendant who lived in a nearby apartment. The state's case "hinged on whether the jury believed the girls' account – that Defendant ran down the hill, attempted to kidnap the girl, and then ran away in a different direction – or Defendant's explanation – that he saw a girl fall in the mud, walked a few feet over to help her, and then left." During trial, the detective in question was appointed by the court to guide the jury during a jury view of the scene. Afterwards he testified about his investigation in general but also gave expert testimony about footprints in the snow. He claimed to have found footprints in the melting snow five days after the attempted kidnaping that he testified were from an adult who was running down the hill, which was consistent with the girls' story. The state emphasized this testimony in closing arguments. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to this testimony for four different reasons: (1) the detective had served as the escort and narrator during the jury view; (2) the state failed to give prior notice of this expert testimony; and (3) the detective was not qualified to give expert testimony and his methods were unreliable. With respect to the jury view, the detective "explained the location of events that supported the State's theory of the case, even though he had served as the court-appointed guide who was supposed to impartially point out landmarks for the benefit of the jurors during the jury view. All of this had the probable effect of bolstering his credibility." With respect to notice, the defendant was entitled to 30 days' notice, but the state gave only three business days' notice before trial. With respect to the "expert" testimony, the detective testified that he was a 4-year veteran of the search and rescue team with training in tracking people, which was "questionable qualification" from the start, but it was immediately apparent that his testimony was not "(1) reliable, (2) based on sufficient facts or data, or (3) reliably applied to the facts of the case." He did not even examine the unsecured scene until several days later when others could have walked through the area and, at minimum, the snow had melted a great deal. Prejudice established.

2013: Williams v. State, 983 N.E.2d 661 (Ind. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in burglary and firearms case for failing to object to a "breathhtaking" "deluge" of prior criminal acts used by the State to argue the defendant's propensity to commit the crimes. The state's case was based on the burglary victim's testimony that he saw the defendant in his house with a gun. He could not identify the defendant's face, but identified him by his jacket and boots. An accomplice, testifying with immunity, identified the defendant as the burglar, but did not mention a gun. No gun was found at the time of arrest either. The defendant testified that he went to the home as a confidential informant to purchase drugs and guns for the police. On cross, the state elicited testimony and admitted evidence that the defendant had been charged and convicted of possession of cocaine and a firearm and placed on home detention. While on home detention, his was found to be in possession of drugs and guns and had tested positive for marijuana use. A detective confirmed his role as a confidential informant but denied that he was acting as such in this case. The detective also testified that the defendant admitted to him that he had committed previous unspecified burglaries, robberies, and gun-trafficking offenses. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the state's witnesses had credibility problems.

Commonwealth v. Robertson*, 431 S.W.3d 430 (Ky. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sodomy and sexual assault case for complete failure to provide representation during juvenile transfer hearing and for failing to object to the prosecution's improper argument on the defendant's failure to testify during trial. The defendant was charged with sexually molesting two young boys that he babysat when he was 16-17 years old. He was charged in August 1995 when he was six weeks shy of his eighteenth birthday. At the juvenile transfer hearing, counsel provided essentially no representation resulting in a presumption of prejudice under Cronic. Nonetheless, given the defendant's age at the time of this opinion state law provided no remedy. Juvenile court jurisdiction ends at age 21. The defendant is now in his thirties. "To send [him] back before a juvenile court would be to ask the juvenile court to operate under the fiction that he could still benefit from a trial as a juvenile." The defendant was entitled to a new trial, however, due to counsel's ineffectiveness during trial. The defendant did not testify. During the prosecution's closing argument, the prosecutor informed the jury that sex abuse cases generally come down to a child's word against an adult's, but that this case was "as good as it gets. Additionally, he argued "this defendant cannot give you any reason why these children would make this up" and that the testimony of the two children was "un-refuted" when the defendant was the only person that could refute the testimony. Counsel's failure to object to these three comments was deficient conduct.

[E]ach constituted at least an indirect reference to [the defendant's] failure to testify. Even if each, if taken in isolation, might be permitted (which we do not concede), the cumulative effect of all three was prejudicial to [the defendant] and violated his Fifth Amendment right. The Commonwealth's comments were not general, they were specific; and they were not benign, they were prejudicial. They thrice reminded the jury that [the defendant] himself had offered no testimony in response to the allegations against him. This constitutes prosecutorial misconduct and impermissible evidence, both of which, if objected to, would likely have been cause for a mistrial or, at the very least, excluded from the jury's consideration.

Prejudice was especially clear in light of the "weak nature of the prosecution's case."

Coleman v. State*, 75 A.3d 916 (Md. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to a detective's testimony about approximately 30 instances where the petitioner remained silent in the face of police questioning/accusation while the petitioner was in custody and after he had been issued Miranda warnings. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel "was not properly informed of the law, whether by neglect or ignorance." Prejudice was established by the numerous instances. Id. at ____ (citing Williams v. Zahradnick, 632 F.2d 353, 363 n. 13 (4th Cir.1980) ("One reference is less damaging than four; a lengthy colloquy is more prejudicial than a brief one")). Prejudice was enhanced by the detective's "editorializing" commentary which made "it appear as though Coleman might have been searching for an answer that would not hurt him." Id. at ____ (citing Alston v. Garrison, 720 F.2d 812, 816 (4th Cir.1983) (noting that evidence of a defendant's post-Miranda silence "plants in the mind of the jury the dark suspicion that the defendant had something to hide, and that any alibi which is subsequently proffered is pure fabrication")). Prejudice was not diminished by the fact that the defendant ultimately answered all of the detective's questions at some point over the course of the very lengthy interrogation because "it is the silence itself, and any inferences drawn from it, that is harmful to Coleman, and these harmful inferences are what the principles underlying Miranda strive to protect." Also factoring into prejudice was that the State's primary evidence of guilt came from "co-defendants that testified as a result of plea agreements with the State" and Coleman's theory of the case was accessory-after-the-fact, which made Coleman's version of the events and his credibility an essential factor for his defense. "[W]e would be naive if we failed to recognize that most laymen view an assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege as a badge of guilt." Id. at ____ (quoting Walker v. United States, 404 F.2d 900, 903 (5th Cir.1968)).

Vail v. State*, 738 S.E.2d 503 (S.C. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct with a minor case for failing to object to hearsay testimony about the alleged sexual relationship between the 13-year-old girl and her teacher and coach at her church school. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to testimony from the alleged victim's sister, father, and friend about her statements to them about the relationship and testimony from the school principal that there had been rumors of the defendant engaging in inappropriate behavior without another student. While counsel's strategy was to show that the alleged victim was "obsessed" with the defendant, the detailed accounts of the alleged relationship went well beyond this and the rumor about the other student certainly had no "place amidst his articulated strategies." "The only purpose these testimonies served was to corroborate and bolster Victim's story and to evoke an emotional response from the jury, which was improper." Prejudice established as there were no eyewitnesses and no physical evidence as the alleged victim's hymen was fully intact despite six to nine alleged instances of sexual intercourse.

State v. Larrabee*, 321 P.3d 1136 (Utah 2013). Trial counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual abuse of a child and dealing in material harmful to a minor case for failing to object to the state's improper closing argument. The defendant was charged with abusing his step-granddaughter. He and his wife were court-ordered guardians. Following his divorce, he was given court-ordered visitation, during which the abuse was alleged to have occurred. During trial, the state sought to introduce evidence that the defendant had sexually molested the alleged victim's mother, who was his stepdaughter, but the trial court ruled her testimony inadmissible due to unreliability and instructed the witness and counsel not to refer to these allegations in front of the jury or a mistrial would be granted. Nonetheless, during closing arguments, the prosecutor did refer to the allegations that the defendant had sexually abused the alleged victim's mother. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object and move for a mistrial or, at the very least, to request a curative instruction. This was not based on any alleged strategy to avoid highlighting the issue by objection. “Allegations of past sexual abuse of a child do not pass by unnoticed, particularly within the context of a criminal trial for that very crime. They shout their presence.” Moreover, “the prosecutor’s violation of the judge’s order was so brazen and the accusation so obviously inflammatory that it had already been brightly highlighted by its very nature.” Prejudice also established as the prosecutor’s comments “went to the heart of what the jury was being asked to decide: whether Defendant’s testimony was credible.”

2012: State v. Moore, 733 S.E.2d 418 (Ga. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in rape case for failing to object to improper state evidence and argument concerning the defendant’s pre-arrest silence. The state elicited evidence and argument that police called the defendant when he became a suspect asking to interview him. He declined at that time saying he was going out of state to see his son. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as state law precluded reliance on pre-arrest silence even where the defendant had not received Miranda warnings and testified in his own defense. Prejudice established as the only real issue at trial was whether the sex was consensual, and the evidence of guilt was not overwhelming.

People v. Moore*, 964 N.E.2d 1276 (Ill. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the admission of other crimes evidence on interrogation videos. The defendant was interrogated on video over a period of two days with the actual questioning lasting 8-9 hours. Most of the defendant’s statements were denials of the various allegations against him. During direct examination of a detective, several excerpts from the videos were shown to the jury. Afterwards, the court ruled that the jury would be allowed to watch the entire video and that it would be made available to them. The video contained detailed discussions of the defendant’s prior crimes and past wrongs. Specifically, the defendant was questioned about a prior incident of domestic violence to which he plead guilty. In the video, the police indicated that they interviewed the woman involved, and she claimed that the defendant punched her and broke her jaw after finding her with another man. The defendant responded that he learned that she had been hurt when she was granted an order of protection against him. Likewise, on the video, a detective refers to the defendant’s “history of robberies,” as well as his “prior history as a drug dealer and membership in the Vice Lords street gang.” Counsel’s conduct in failing to object to this information being provided to the jury was deficient. Prejudice established, because the trial court “would have excluded the irrelevant, unfairly prejudicial other crimes evidence.” While the state argued that it was unlikely the jury watched the video, as deliberations lasted less than 6 hours, the Court rejected this. Most of the video showed the defendant in the room alone and the jury likely would have watched only the interrogation portions. Even if the jury did not watch all of the interrogation portions, “most of the unfairly prejudicial material appear[ed] in the first hours of the video.”

People v. Watson*, 965 N.E.2d 474 (Ill. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in residential burglary case for failing to challenge partial-profile DNA comparisons. Hairs were recovered from the window that was the point of entry. The state’s expert testified that his “laboratory types 13 loci on the DNA to create a profile.” The hair sample allowed him to obtain information only on 7 of the 13 loci. Based on this, he was unable to exclude the defendant. He also testified that only 1 in 103 million (about 1/3 of the population of the U.S.) white men would meet this 7 loci profile. Defense counsel asked only three questions of the expert in cross, but argued in closing that the DNA was not a “perfect match” since there were only 7 of 13 loci. The state, on the other hand, argued in closing that the DNA was “a match” and that only 3 people in the U.S. would have that profile. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to challenge the DNA evidence. She failed to challenge the meaning or significance of the partial-profile comparison, even though “one legal scholar” has explained that matching on less than 13 loci will exclude a suspect. Likewise, counsel did not highlight that the state’s expert said only that the defendant could not be excluded, not that he was a match. This error was compounded by counsel’s failure to challenge the statistical significance of the partial match. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as studies have been conducted in at least three states that suggest the statistical testimony here was overblown. Likewise, many “[l]egal scholars and scientists” dispute the legal significance testimony. In short, “it is clear that counsel’s challenge to this evidence was virtually nonexistent, and quite possibly counsel simply did not understand the evidence.” Prejudice established as this was “the only evidence linking defendant to the crime.”

Herrington v. State*, 102 So. 3d 1241 (Miss. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault and possession of weapon by a felon case for allowing the defendant’s prior convictions to be admitted as evidence. Even though the defendant stipulated that he was a convicted felon, two prior sentencing orders were admitted into evidence, which revealed three prior drug convictions. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to this evidence, which supported the state’s motive theory, contradicted the defendant’s testimony, and allowed the jury to infer the defendant “was lying” in his testimony. Prejudice established.

People v. McArthur*, 956 N.Y.S.2d 71 (N.Y. App. Div. 2012). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the prosecutor’s comments about the defendant’s post-arrest silence and demeanor as evidence of consciousness of guilt. Likewise, counsel elicited testimony concerning an unrelated shooting shortly before this crime and just two blocks away, even after the trial court warned that this would open the door to the prosecutor presenting evidence that the defendant had pled guilty in connection with that shooting. Counsel failed to even request a limiting instruction related to this evidence. Prejudice established due to “[t]he cumulative effect” of the errors.

People v. Fisher*, 944 N.Y.S.2d 453 (N.Y. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in sex offense case for failing to object to improper argument encouraging “inferences of guilt based on facts not in evidence.” The prosecutor argued, without a basis in evidence, that the alleged victims had said the same thing over and over to police, social workers, doctors, and the grand jury. Likewise, the prosecutor essentially testified in arguing that the alleged victims’ contemporaneous misbehavior at school was proof of the crimes. Finally, the prosecutor made a “less than frank minimization” argument concerning a benefit to a jailhouse snitch, who was confined on a parole violation and testified that the defendant confessed to him. The defense cross-examined the snitch about the prosecutor’s agreement to write a letter to the parole board on his behalf. The prosecutor argued in closing that she was not the parole board and did not “control” the snitch’s fate. While this was technically true, this argument was also “materially misleading; the prosecutor was plainly in a position, if not to control, at least to influence the outcome of [the snitch’s] parole violation hearing.” Finally, the prosecutor admonished the jury that their acceptance of the truth of the testimony of the child witnesses was essential to the administration of justice. “[D]efense counsel’s failure to object to any, let alone all, of the prosecutor's egregiously improper departures during summation, particularly in the highly charged, potentially outcome determinative context in which they occurred, deprived defendant of the right to effective assistance of counsel." No possible strategy could explain this.

2011: People v. Fillyaw, 948 N.E.2d 1116 (Ill. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to admission, as substantive evidence, of a written statement by a state witness that was given to a detective pretrial and included alleged inculpatory statements by the defendant to the witness. The witness testified during trial but maintained that the entire prior statement was false. Counsel's conduct was deficient.

The constitutional guarantee of effective assistance of counsel requires a criminal defense attorney to use the applicable rules of evidence to shield his client from a trial based upon unreliable evidence.

Counsel's conduct was also prejudicial.

State v. Washington*, 72 So. 3d 422 (La. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in possession of cocaine with intent to distribute case for failing to move for mistrial or to request a jury admonishment after the trial court sustained counsel's objection to the prosecution's improper closing argument on the defendant's post-Miranda silence. Counsel had elicited testimony of the defendant's silence in cross-examination of a police officer and the state had properly explored this in redirect. The prosecution's argument crossed the line, however, "by asking the jurors to speculate what they would have done if wrongly accused of possessing drugs. With these remarks, the prosecutor was openly using the defendant's silence as substantive evidence of the defendant's guilt." While counsel objected and the court sustained the objection, counsel did not request mistrial or admonishment. Prejudice established as the state's case against the defendant was circumstantial. While the cocaine was in his home, it was in plain view on top of a television where four young men were playing video games when officers searched the home and found the drugs. In addition, while drugs were found in a bedroom, there was no proof that the bedroom belonged to the defendant, who was not the sole resident of the house. At minimum, an admonishment from the court would have lessened the impact of the improper argument on the jury.

State v. Gieser*, 248 P.3d 300 (Mont. 2011). Counsel ineffective in driving under the influence case for failing to object to admission of horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) evidence that was not supported by expert testimony and breath tests done on "un-certified apparatus." State law allowed HGN evidence only with a showing that the test was properly administered by the officer and supported by expert testimony. State law also required that breath test instruments be regularly inspected and calibrated. Prejudice established as the HGN and breath test evidence had "an appearance of precision and scientific reliability" and the breath test numbers from the machine could be used to infer intoxication under state law.

State v. Thompson*, 20 A.3d 242 (N.H. 2011). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual assault on child case for failing repeatedly to object to hearsay testimony of the child's babysitter, the child's mother, and a police officer about the child's out-of-court statements, even though counsel was aware the child had recanted her statements prior to trial and told the jury this in opening. This hearsay was the only substantive evidence of guilt as the child denied in her trial testimony, even with leading questions and coaxing by the prosecutor, that the defendant had touched her. Counsel did object at times, but counsel's "erratic and inconsistent decisions . . . clearly fall below the constitutional bar." Counsel's behavior was "completely irrational" and could "only be attributed to a lack of understanding of the rules of evidence or extreme carelessness." Prejudice established as counsel allowed a legally insufficient case to go to the jury. The court relied exclusively on the hearsay in denying the motion for directed verdict. "The inaction was so fundamental and flawed that the State was able to prove the case only because of defense counsel's failure."

2010: Purvis v. State, 43 So. 3d 734 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the commingling of the contents of packages of suspected cocaine in trafficking of more than 400 grams case. Officers seized 27 small packets of white powder, a bag of white powder, and a bag of rock-like substance. The two bags were separately tested for cocaine and weighed 10.78 grams. The small packets were commingled 4-7 bags at a time in five different measures without testing the contents of each bag before commingling. The total weight of the substance from these bags was over 600 grams. The failure to test each bag was notable because officers had also found a large bag of benzocaine, which is not a controlled substance. In any event, the evidence was insufficient to establish that there were 400 grams of cocaine, as each individual packet contained approximately 14-28 grams and the court could be sure only that 5 of the packets contained cocaine.

Higgins v. State*, 698 S.E.2d 335 (Ga. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in rape and sodomy case for failing to object to the state's admission of an "unredacted juvenile disposition order . . . that the state used to prove a similar transaction." Counsel had raised the need for redaction of the sentence and obtained the state's agreement to redact prior to trial. Nonetheless, the order was not redacted and included information about the "need for protection" of the community, "sex offender treatment," and the like, for the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient and there was no strategic reason not to object. Prejudice established as "this case was not overwhelming because evidence was introduced that the encounter may have been consensual."

People v. Sanchez*, 935 N.E.2d 1099 (Ill. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in bench trial of drug case for failing to object to admission of the defendant's prior drug conviction that was more than 10 years old to impeach him. Although the defendant's release from parole was only 9 years prior to trial, state law calculates the period from the date of the prior conviction "or of the release of the witness from confinement, whichever is the later date." The defendant's release from confinement was more than 10 years prior to trial. There was no valid strategic reason for the failure to object. Either counsel failed to investigate the details of the prior conviction or was aware of those details and misapprehended the law. Under either scenario, counsel was ineffective. Prejudice established as this was a credibility contest between the defendant and police officers and the trial court twice expressly relied on the prior conviction in weighing the defendant's credibility.

Capital Case*

Smith v. State*, 689 S.E.2d 629 (S.C. 2010). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct with minor case for failing to object to improper hearsay from a “forensic interviewer” corroborating the alleged victim and asserting her statements were “believable” and that she had no reason “not to be truthful.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient, as corroborative witness testimony, under SCRE Rule 801(d)(1) is limited to time and place of the alleged assault. The testimony here far exceeded that and there was no valid strategy by counsel to allow this. Prejudice established as the case “hinged” on the alleged victim’s credibility, there was otherwise an absence of overwhelming evidence of guilt, and the state relied heavily on this improper testimony in closing arguments.

State v. King*, 248 P.3d 984 (Utah Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in attempted forcible sexual abuse case for failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper statements in closing argument urging the jury to consider matters not in evidence. The defendant was accused of inappropriately touching his daughter’s friend during a “tickle fight” with both girls during a sleep over at his home. The alleged victim testified the touching lasted for “two to three minutes.” The daughter testified she saw no inappropriate touching during the “tickle fight.” After making the allegations, an acquaintance of the alleged victim who testified for the defense, overheard her say, “I am so glad that nobody found out that I lied.” During closing arguments, the prosecutor suggested, without evidentiary basis, that the reason for this statement was that she was only expressing concern that people would think she was a liar. Likewise, without evidentiary basis, the prosecutor argued the incident lasted just “a few seconds” during which the defendant’s daughter had been looking away or distracted. While counsel can argue inferences, the prosecutor “went much further in ‘spinning’ the evidence to suit his purposes” and encouraged the jury to consider matters not in evidence. Likewise, the defense counsel, rather than objecting, basically agreed that “the encounter ‘was probably fairly quick,’ arguably conceding that the sexual touching actually occurred.” Cumulative prejudice established, in combination with the “plain error” in the prosecution’s misconduct, as the evidence of guilt was “scant” and relied almost exclusively on the alleged victim.

State v. Banks*, 790 N.W.2d 526 (Wis. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of firearm and resisting or obstructing an officer case for failing to object to testimony and argument implying guilt based on the defendant’s refusal to consent to DNA testing prior to the state obtaining a search warrant. The defendant and two other men were in a van that the police attempted to stop due to an expired license plate. All three men jumped and ran. A gun was found in the area. The driver of the van testified that the defendant had been in the backseat and the driver was not aware of there being a gun in the van. The front seat passenger of the van testified that the defendant had the gun in the van but threw it in the lap of the passenger during the attempted stop. The passenger then dropped the gun as he attempted to run. Both the driver and front seat passenger had at least five prior criminal convictions. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to testify by two officers and subsequent argument in closing that the defendant had twice refused to consent to DNA testing and that he did so “because his DNA might have been on that gun, and because he was the one that tossed the gun from the back of the van to the front into [the State witness’s] lap.”

[I]t is a violation of the defendant’s right to due process for a prosecutor to comment on a defendant’s failure to consent to a warrantless search. It has long been a tenet of federal jurisprudence that a defendant's invocation of a constitutional right cannot be used to imply guilt.

Id. at 533-34 (citations omitted). Prejudice established because the court could not "say with any confidence that the jury's verdict was untainted by the inadmissible evidence. . . . Consequently, there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's deficient performance, the result at trial would have been different." Id. at 535.

2009: State v. Shanklin, 925 N.E.2d 161 (Ohio Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in grand theft case for failing to object to numerous instances of inadmissible hearsay by detectives. In essence, the defendant borrowed money from the alleged victim using a purchase order as collateral. Charges were brought when the defendant's "payment" checks were bounced for insufficient funds. During trial, without objection, detectives testified, based on information received only through third parties who did not testify at trial, that the purchase order was invalid and fictitious. This testimony was not only inadmissible hearsay, but, in one instance, left the jury with the impression that one third party admitted the purchase order was phony, when the transcript of the officer's phone interview with that third party revealed that the third party said the purchase order was okay. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the state's whole case was based on the argument that the purchase order was "a sham."

Holman v. State*, 674 S.E.2d 171 (S.C. 2009). Trial counsel ineffective in case involving multiple charges arising from a shooting incident due to counsel's failure to object to admission of handgun found in defendant's apartment that had no relevance to the offenses for which the defendant was charged. "[T]he failure to object to this clearly inadmissible evidence was ineffective assistance of counsel" not explained by a valid trial strategy. Prejudice established.

2008: Antunes-Salgado v. State, 987 So. 2d 222 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in cocaine trafficking and conspiracy case for stipulating to the admissibility of the postarrest and post-Miranda statements of co-defendants through the police officer who took their statements. Each of the statements "minimized the respective declarant's involvement in the offenses and shifted the bulk of the involvement to [the defendant]." The statements were not admissible as being in furtherance of the conspiracy, statements against interest to the extent the statements inculcated the defendant, nonhearsay "verbal acts" (showing the effect of a statement on the defendant), or under any hearsay exception. The statements were inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), which specifically holds that statements made during police interrogations are testimonial and therefore inadmissible. Prejudice found because, without these statements, the state could not establish the "agreement" element of the conspiracy charge, which was established solely through the inadmissible hearsay statements. Prejudice also found on trafficking charge when the evidence was disputed at trial. No strategy could excuse the ineffectiveness because "counsel conceded the admissibility of inadmissible statements that ultimately convicted his client without having researched the admissibility issue. Generally, important legal concessions are made after, not before, the applicable law is researched."

Cobb v. State*, 658 S.E.2d 750 (Ga. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to improper hearsay testimony from a state firearms examiner. The examiner testified that bullets and casings found at the crime scene were from a .45 caliber pistol. A holster had been found in a search of the defendant's apartment. The expert testified that she called the manufacturer, gave the model number, and was told the holster was a Colt .45 pistol. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to object to this testimony until the state attempted to elicit the testimony a second time. Prejudice was established because the testimony bolstered the only eyewitness, who was a crack addict with inconsistencies in her testimony, and the state's evidence was not overwhelming as evidenced by two prior hung juries.

State v. Reynolds*, 746 N.W.2d 837 (Iowa 2008). Counsel was ineffective in counterfeit money orders case for failing to object to hearsay testimony. An employee of the bank that cashed the money orders testified, without objection, that she received emails from the Federal Reserve indicating the money orders were counterfeit. While counsel objected successfully to admission of those emails, counsel failed to object to this testimony, which was inadmissible as offered under the Business Records exception.

Crawford v. State*, 256 S.W.3d 150 (Mo. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to consistently object to the state's repeated cross-examination of the defendant about the veracity of other witnesses.

Wood v. State*, 260 S.W.3d 146 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in DWI trial for failing to object to admission of evidence of a prior DWI conviction. Prejudice found because the evidence of guilt was not overwhelming.

2007: Sims v. State*, 967 So. 2d 148 (Fla. 2007). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to object to evidence of a "canine-alert" to drugs in a car that had been driven by the defendant at the time of the murder. The defendant had been stopped by an officer on suspicion of driving a stolen vehicle, which the defendant had borrowed but had failed to return. During the stop, the defendant shot and killed the officer. The defendant abandoned the car, which was subsequently searched. Although there was a "canine-alert" for drugs, no drugs were found in the car and there was no evidence the defendant had ever used drugs or been involved in the sale of them. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to this "canine-alert" evidence or an officer's testimony that "the dog would alert to the scent of narcotics after the drugs had been removed." Counsel objected only when the defendant's parole officer was called to testify that parole would have been revoked if the defendant had been found in possession of drugs. The court overruled this objection. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to move to strike the "canine-alert" evidence that laid the foundation for this testimony. All of this evidence supported the state's theory that the officer was killed because the defendant possessed drugs and was attempting to avoid a return to prison for violation of parole. Counsel admitted that there was no strategic reason for the failure to object and that he knew before trial that the state intended to offer this evidence, which was irrelevant since the defendant did not own the vehicle and no drugs were actually found in the car. Prejudice found because this evidence was essential to the state's motive theory and the state repeatedly relied on it in closing arguments.

People v. Davis*, 879 N.E.2d 996 (Ill. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately challenge and rebut "lip print" identification testimony alleging that the defendant's lip prints were on duct tape found at the crime scene. Counsel's conduct was deficient because this was the only physical evidence against the defendant and counsel knew it should be challenged. Counsel informed the defendant's family, who did not have additional funds to retain an expert, but did not attempt to retain an expert from his retainer fees or attempt to establish the defendant's indigence and get a court-appointed expert. The court found other bases, including court's extremely ill health prior to and during trial and failing to challenge the inconsistent eyewitness testimony, and found that "the cumulative effect of his errors was prejudicial."

People v. Hoerer*, 872 N.E.2d 572 (Ill. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in drug and involuntary manslaughter case for stipulating to the admission of the defendant's testimony from a co-defendant's trial admitting that he entered into plea negotiations with the state. Counsel's conduct was deficient because a state rule of evidence prohibited this testimony. Prejudice established because, under state law, admission of this evidence is "considered so devastating and prejudicial to a defendant that it constitutes reversible error absent a contemporaneous objection from trial counsel and even in the fact of overwhelming evidence of guilt." Id. at 578.

State v. Butcher*, 866 N.E.2d 13 (Ohio Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in rape and kidnapping case for failing to adequately object to hearsay testimony. The defendant was charged with raping two sisters in the same room at the same time. One sister was five and the other was six. Almost two months after the alleged incident the sister's reported the alleged abuse and the identity of the abuser, the boyfriend of the aunt of one of the girls, to their grandmother, who relayed the information to the mother. During trial, counsel objected to the grandmother's testimony concerning statements the girls had made to her but the trial court improperly admitted this testimony. During the mother's testimony, which included double hearsay of what the girls said to the grandmother, who told her, counsel failed to object, however. Counsel also failed to timely object to improper hearsay testimony of the state's medical expert. The mother had taken the girls to a private doctor initially for treatment. On the advice of Child Services, the mother then took the children for examination at the "Child Advocacy Center" where they were physically examined and interviewed in depth by the doctor. The Detective on the case did not interview the children and deferred to the doctor's interview. Prior to trial, counsel had filed a motion in limine to exclude the doctor's testimony about statements of the children because these were not made for the purpose of medical treatment. The court conditionally granted this motion unless a hearsay exception was established. When the doctor's testimony and report, which also included the hearsay statements, was offered, however, counsel failed to object. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the mother's double-hearsay testimony, which was based on the grandmother's statements that counsel had objected to, and in failing to object to the Doctor's testimony and report because "[t]he granting of a motion in limine alone will not preserve error for review." It was also clear here that the doctor was "a 'manufactured witness'" that "assume[d] the role of a police investigator" and testified to hearsay statements "under the guise that they were given for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment." For example, the doctor testified that the identity of the perpetrator was important medically due to concerns about sexually transmitted diseases, but clearly was not concerned about that since the girls were not tested for STD. Considering both the court's error and the IAC, the court found the denial of a fair trial because four different adults (grandmother, mother, doctor, and detective) testified and the doctor's report also concluded that the defendant was the perpetrator based on inadmissible hearsay. Although the girls also testified,

Capital Case*

The prejudice arises when numerous adults repeat the girls' stories in court. If a statement is repeated often enough, it is more believable. Additionally, the repetition has the effect of the adults' vouching for the veracity of the statements.

Prejudice was also clear because portions of the girls' testimony were suspect because inconsistent with each other and one girl could not even identify the defendant in the courtroom and the medical evidence was equivocal because it was "consistent with" but not "diagnostic of" abuse.

Fuller v. State*, 224 S.W.3d 823 (Tex. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault of a child and indecency with a child case for failing to object to improper testimony from four witnesses "bolstering" the 15-year-old alleged victim's truthfulness and credibility. The child's teacher testified in the state's case-in-chief that she was a credible and truthful person. This testimony was improper because the relevant rule of evidence allowed testimony concerning the victim's character for truthfulness only after her character had been attacked. The defense cross-examination of her does not "open the door" to character for truthfulness evidence. Likewise, "a defense theory of fabrication (as opposed to recent fabrication) which generally denies the charges against a defendant is not the equivalent of an attack on the victim's general character for truthfulness so as to warrant the admission of character testimony." The alleged victim's mother, an expert in child sexual assault investigations, and a forensic interviewer also testified that they believed the alleged victim's allegations against the defendant. This testimony was improper and inadmissible. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to this evidence because "counsel's conduct in allowing the State unfettered and unchecked bolstering of the victim was so outrageous that no competent attorney would have engaged in it." The failure to object was not explained by strategy or tactics. "Where counsel's strategy is premised on an incorrect understanding of the law, we need not defer to that as a reasonable strategy." Prejudice found because the alleged victim's credibility was the only real issue at trial and the repeated objectionable testimony was also "emphasized . . . to the jury during [the state's] closing argument."

State v. Hendrickson*, 158 P.3d 1257 (Wash. Ct. App. 2007), aff'd on other grounds, 198 P.3d 1029 (Wash. 2009). Counsel ineffective in second-degree identity theft case for failing to object to hearsay testimony from a Social Security Administration special agent that the owner of the social security card stated that his card had been lost and that no one had permission to use it. These statements were not admissible as business or government records and were "testimonial" and barred under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004). Counsel's conduct was deficient and not explained by strategy. Prejudice found because this was the only evidence that the defendant did not have a valid reason to possess this card. Thus, absent counsel's error, there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would have been acquitted on this charge.

2006: McIntosh v. State, 941 So. 2d 1 (Fla. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to object to the improper use of demonstrative evidence and improper prosecutorial questioning and argument. The defense theory was that the defendant stabbed the victim in the neck with a pocketknife in self-defense. The stab wound was less than 3/4 inch across but left the victim partially paralyzed. Counsel was ineffective in failing to object when, during cross examination of the defendant, the prosecutor pulled out his own knife to demonstrate his theory that the defendant could not have pulled out his knife during the struggle and had come prepared to fight. Although the defendant had used an ordinary pocketknife, the prosecutor pulled out a knife that was 8 to 10 inches long, which was 3 times larger than what the defendant had used. Counsel did not object even though this knife was not in evidence and the prosecutor had given no notice of his intent to use it. Counsel also failed to address this issue when the jury returned from deliberations and asked, “What happened to the knife? And what are its dimensions?” Counsel did not request an instruction to clarify that the knife used by the prosecutor was not in evidence and was not intended to replicate the knife the defendant used, which was also not in evidence. Instead, counsel said nothing when the court instructed that “you’ve heard all of the evidence you’re going to hear and seen all of the evidence you’re going to see.” Prejudice established because the evidence of self-defense was fairly strong and the jury’s question revealed that the jury was influenced by the prosecutor’s improper actions. Counsel also failed to object to the prosecutor’s “completely improper” question to the defendant about whether he believed one of the defense witnesses, whose testimony was mostly helpful to the defendant, but included some bad information, which the defendant denied. This error was compounded when the prosecutor repeatedly restated in his closing arguments that the defendant called his own witness a liar, again without objection. While this error alone may not have been sufficiently prejudicial to require reversal, when “added to” the other error there was cumulative prejudice.

State v. Milne*, 921 So. 2d 792 (Fla. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in sexual battery and false imprisonment case for failing to request a mistrial due to the prosecutor’s unsupported allegations during closing arguments. The defendant had told police at the time of arrest, consistent with his trial testimony, that he had consensual sex with the victim. The state had successfully excluded evidence of the prior consistent statements from evidence with a motion in limine. During arguments, however, the prosecutor implied that the defendant had tailored his trial testimony after hearing all the other witnesses testify.

Rose v. State*, 846 N.E.2d 363 (Ind. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in child molestation case for failing to object to the treating physician’s opinion that the victim’s allegations were truthful. Prejudice found in light of the inconclusive physical evidence in the case.

Bowman v. State*, 710 N.W.2d 200 (Iowa 2006). Counsel ineffective in kidnaping and assault case for failing to object to the prosecutor’s repeated cross-examination questions asking the defendant if the state’s witnesses fabricated their testimony. These questions were prohibited under clear state law. The defendant was prejudiced because the case depended on witness credibility to such a great extent that counsel presented two expert witnesses to testify concerning the impaired credibility of the state’s intoxicated witnesses.

State v. Roberson*, 924 So. 2d 1201 (La. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in robbery case for failing to object to admission in evidence of the defendant’s letter to the prosecution and cross-examination concerning the defendant’s pretrial offer to plead guilty to a lesser included offense. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel was unaware of the state law making this information clearly inadmissible. Prejudice found.

2004: Joncamlae v. State, 598 S.E.2d 923 (Ga. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to object to tainted in-court identifications of the defendant by the two victims. Defense counsel learned only during the testimony of the victims that they had been shown a photo line-up, including the defendant's picture, the day before trial. Counsel conceded that her conduct was deficient because she was "in shock" at that point and failed to object or move for mistrial. Prejudice found because the witnesses "were not absolutely certain of their in-court identifications, and did not have excellent views of the defendants at the time of the attacks." One witness even admitted outright his reliance on the photograph of the defendant he had seen in the prosecutor's office.

Collier v. State*, 596 S.E.2d 795 (Ga. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to object to the prosecutor's improper comments during closing argument. The defendant was charged in connection with several unrelated bar fights that he initiated. During the trial, evidence was admitted concerning two similar incidents, one of which resulted in a guilty plea to terroristic threats. The defendant claimed self-defense or defense of others with respect to all four incidents. During the closing argument, the prosecutor, without objection, commented that he had taken part in a negotiated plea with respect to defendant's prior conviction for terroristic threats and was now asking for the jury's "forgiveness" for making the deal, which involved no confinement time, and that the jury should ensure confinement to protect the community from future danger. The prosecutor's arguments were impermissible use of similar transaction evidence and argument on future dangerousness, which was irrelevant to guilt or innocence. Counsel did not object solely because of his policy not to object in closing argument absent "blatant" error because objection just draws attention to the argument. The court rejected this as a "reasonable trial tactic" because of numerous state cases rejecting these same arguments as improper. Prejudice found, "not because the jury would have reached a different verdict, but because the case would never have been submitted to it for deliberation if defense counsel had moved for a mistrial."

People v. Jura*, 817 N.E.2d 968 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in use of weapon by felon case for failing to object to the admission of hearsay portions of a radio call and to the prosecution's use of that evidence. Three police officers testified and included hearsay statements identifying the suspect in initial radio calls about the incident. They further testified that the defendant matched these initial descriptions and the state relied on this testimony in closing argument, without objection, even though the court had sustained an objection to the testimony about the match. Prejudice found because the trial amounted to a credibility contest between the three officers and the defendant but the improper hearsay was repeatedly used by the state in argument and evidence as substantive evidence from a "concerned citizen" that made the radio call but never testified at trial.

People v. Young*, 807 N.E.2d 1125 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in first degree murder case involving a shooting at a backyard barbecue where the defense was self-defense because counsel failed to object to the prosecutor's improper questions to the defendant and argument. The prosecutor improperly questioned the defendant concerning the veracity of other witnesses, confused the jury about the state's burden of proof, cross-examined the defendant about his post-arrest silence and prior bad acts, improperly vouched for witnesses and injected his own opinions in the proceedings. Counsel was also ineffective for admitting during cross-examine that he lacked the expertise to adequately cross-examine the state's pathologist, but failing to ask for a continuance that would likely have been granted. The cross of the expert actually bolstered the testimony of the expert. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to order gunshot residue tests of the victim's clothing, which the state had declined to order. The court declined to address whether each instance of deficient conduct would require reversal on its own because "[t]he process was tainted by the prosecution such that the arguable failures of the defense acting in concert therewith denied this defendant a fair trial.

Peterson v. State*, 149 S.W.3d 583 (Mo. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in second degree murder case for failing to object to the prosecutor's improper rebuttal closing argument that suggested that the state had more than one eyewitness implicating the defendant, although only one eyewitness testified. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the prosecutor's argument was not supported by the evidence. Prejudice was found because "a prosecutor's assertions of personal knowledge . . . are apt to carry much weight against the accused when they should carry none. . . ." The improper arguments were "especially troublesome" in this case because there was no physical evidence implicating the defendant and the only eyewitness was a convicted felon with credibility problems.

Roberts v. State*, 602 S.E.2d 768 (S.C. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately impeach a jailhouse snitch, who testified that he was 10 feet away in the cell next to the defendant in pretrial confinement and the defendant confessed to him. While counsel discussed with the defendant that the conversation was impossible due to the layout of the cells, counsel did not question the snitch about this or present any evidence on the issue. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, if counsel had adequately prepared and presented the evidence, the evidence would have established that the snitches' cell was 35-100 feet from the defendant and the cell block was extremely noisy. Any conversation between the snitch and the defendant would have been heard by numerous guards and inmates because the defendant would have had to yell to be heard over the noise. Although a "close case," prejudice found because the snitch was a key witness and the state's remaining evidence consisted almost entirely of testimony of a codefendant who had made four contradictory statements, including implicating a clearly innocent man in three of those statements. The jury had also asked "who was on trial" during deliberations.

Vaughn v. State*, 607 S.E.2d 72 (S.C. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in drug case for failing to object to the prosecutor's closing argument stating what uncalled witnesses would have testified to. The state presented only the testimony of the arresting officer to support a finding that the defendant possessed drugs. In response to defense counsel's argument that there had been another officer in the car at the scene who did not testify, the prosecutor argued that the other officer would have testified consistently if called to testify. Although the prosecutor was entitled to "some response" to the defense argument, the prosecutor's argument was unfair. Prejudice was found because the state's evidence was limited to the arresting officer. Moreover, during deliberations, the jury asked to see the "testimony" of the officer who was not called to testify.

Capital Case*

Sessums v. State*, 129 S.W.3d 242 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in indecency with a child case for failing to object to inadmissible expert testimony that improperly commented on the alleged victim's truthfulness. The evidence at trial showed that the alleged victim's mother found the five-year-old boy performing oral sex on her husband's stepfather. Child Protective Services (CPS) investigated. During interviews of the victim, he stated that he was also sexually abused by the Defendant, who was his paternal grandfather. At trial, the State's evidence consisted of testimony of four expert witnesses and the testimony of the victim's step-grandfather, who said the victim had told him his bottom was sore because the Defendant had been "playing with it." Each of the experts testified about the alleged victim's statements to them and were then asked to explain and then to comment directly on the factors they used in determining if this child was telling the truth. This testimony was inadmissible. Counsel's conduct was deficient "in failing to object to [this] clearly and unquestionably objectionable testimony of the most outrageous and destructive type. There is no conceivable strategy or tactic that would justify allowing this testimony in front of a jury." Prejudice found because the entire trial hinged on statements of the alleged victim, who did not even testify, and the state specifically argued in closing that the child must be truthful because he had convinced these four experts.

2003: Orr v. State, 584 S.E.2d 720 (Ga. Ct. App. 2003). Counsel ineffective in statutory rape case for failing to object to police officer's testimony that impermissibly bolstered the credibility of the alleged victim where credibility was a major issue on the element of penetration.

State v. Graves*, 668 N.W.2d 860 (Iowa 2003). Counsel was ineffective in manufacturing and possession of marijuana case for failing to object to the prosecutor asking the defendant whether a police officer was lying, failing to object to the prosecutor's argument in which he accused the defendant of calling the officer a liar, and failing to object in the prosecutor's rebuttal argument when he repeatedly characterized the defendant as lying. In addition, the prosecutor improperly called the defense argument a "smokescreen," improperly asserted that the police officer had no motivation to lie because he would keep his job regardless of the outcome of the case, argued that he personally did not leave cash at other people's homes, and inaccurately declared that if the jury believed the police officer it would have to find the defendant guilty. The court found that all of these arguments were improper and that counsel could not reasonably have concluded that failing to object was sound trial strategy. Prejudice was found because the police officer's and the defendant's credibility were the primary issue in the case, and the state's case was relatively weak and circumstantial outside of the credibility issue

5. IMPEACHING WITNESS

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2013: Grant v. Lockett, 709 F.3d 224 (3rd Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to investigate and impeach the state’s key witness—the only one who identified the defendant as the shooter—with prior drug convictions and the fact that he was on parole at the time of his testimony. The state court did not address the issue of whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, but even if it had “such a determination would be an unreasonable application of Strickland.” With respect to prejudice, the state court rejected the claims because the defendant had not presented evidence that the key witness had a special deal or was treated favorably by the prosecution in exchange for his testimony. There is simply “no requirement” that the defendant make this showing “before the witness’s subjective motivation for bias becomes relevant. Thus, the state court made unreasonably applied Strickland and Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974). Under Davis, evidence that the defendant was on parole was relevant to show that the witness “might have been subject to undue pressure from the police and made his identifications under fear of possible probation revocation.” Id. at ____ (quoting Davis, 415 U.S. at 311). Prejudice was clear as the state’s entire case rested on this witness, who was contradicted by the physical evidence and at least two other eyewitnesses who said the defendant was not the shooter. The state’s closing argument even made clear that the state would not have even been able to charge the defendant without this witness.

Peoples v. Lafler*, 734 F.3d 503 (6th Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to impeach the only two witnesses tying the defendant to the murder with their known false testimony. The victim, “a drug dealer,” was shot and killed outside of his Detroit home. Three months later, the defendant was arrested with Cornelius Harris and another man in a stolen Jaguar, after a high-speed car chase ended in a crash. After the crash, police found a nine millimeter Sig Sauer pistol – the murder weapon – on the driver’s side floorboard of the Jaguar. During the murder trial, Harris and the other man “testified to two key facts: 1) that Peoples was the driver of the stolen Jaguar and had thus been sitting closest to the murder weapon, which Peoples owned; and 2) that Peoples told them about how he killed” the victim. The prosecution knew that, at least a portion of this testimony was false. Specifically, according to a police report written by an officer who witnessed the crash, the driver of the Jaguar was Harris. Moreover, Harris was the only one of the three who was charged and convicted for the crimes of fleeing in the third degree, which requires “being the driver,” and unlawfully driving away in a motor vehicle. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to use these facts during trial. “Failure to impeach the credibility of key witnesses with known false testimony is an egregious error in a criminal case.”

Although the entire defense theory was that the two witnesses conspired to point the finger at Peoples, trial counsel did not use the only hard evidence at his disposal to prove that the two witnesses not only lied, but told the same lie. And he failed to do so despite the fact that Peoples himself found the evidence and told him how to use it.

Capital Case*

The state court's decision rejecting this claim was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland. Before trial, Peoples mailed defense counsel a copy of the police report, indictment, and criminal docket sheet showing that Harris was the driver of the Jaguar. Nonetheless, counsel made no attempt to impeach Harris or the other witness with this information. Counsel also failed to present testimony from (1) the officer who wrote the police report naming Harris as the driver of the Jaguar; and (2) another officer who observed the car crash and could testify that Harris was the driver of the Jaguar. While counsel claimed a strategy to "try to limit testimony regarding the car chase," this was not "a protected strategic decision when there is no conceivable way that this decision could help the defense." Moreover, detailed evidence concerning the chase, the arrests, and the "various convictions arising out of the incident" had already been presented. Prejudice established because the state's case "hinged on the credibility of Harris" and the other man. Impeachment with evidence that Harris was driving the car would have done more than undermine the theory that Peoples sat closest to the gun. It would have shown that Harris and Powell told at least one lie – the same lie. All counsel had to do was ask one more question on cross-examination to completely undermine the credibility of these witnesses. . . . Moreover, impeachment would not have been a new and novel theory at trial. Trial counsel's entire defense strategy was to cast doubt on the credibility of Harris and Powell by suggesting that they cooked up their stories while sharing a jail cell. Impeachment on the issue of who drove the Jaguar would have been entirely consistent with and a significant boost to this theory.

Moreover, the defense could have "provided solid evidence that Harris and Powell had coordinated their stories, because both of them gave the same false testimony. We can think of no better way to attack the credibility of these witnesses than by proving that they testified to the same lie." Prejudice was clear in light of the events at trial, the weaknesses of the government's case, and the fact that the jury announced that it was deadlocked and only returned a guilty verdict after being given an Allen charge. "[B]y announcing that they were deadlocked two hours before reaching a verdict, the jury signaled that it was not persuaded that Harris and Powell were credible." "If counsel had done as Peoples asked and impeached the testimony that Peoples was the driver of the Jaguar, "there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have struck a different balance.'" (quoting Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 523–28).

2008: Brown v. Smith, 551 F.3d 424 (6th Cir. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sexual molestation of teenage daughter case for failing to investigate and obtain daughter's counseling records. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the state's case depended almost entirely on the daughter's credibility and counsel knew that the counselor, who saw the daughter both before and after the alleged assault, did not believe her. Counsel's alleged belief that the counselor would not have been a credible witness did not excuse the conduct.

[O]ur quarrel is not with trial counsels' decision to forego calling [the counselor] as a witness per se, but rather with the lack of any reasonable, timely investigation into what she might have offered the defense. Without ever seeking in camera review of the counseling records, . . . counsel could not reasonably have determined what value, if any, those records might have been to his defense, and could not properly have weighed the potential benefit of calling [the counselor] to the stand (whatever her perceived credibility) against the potential risk. Moreover, even if [the counselor] were never called as a witness, defense counsel could still have used the counseling records to impeach the daughter on cross-examination. But by the time defense counsel met directly with [the counselor] (for two to three minutes on the third day of trial), the daughter had already testified, and the opportunity to impeach her testimony directly had passed.

Prejudice established because the records also revealed inconsistencies in the daughter's statements to the counselor and her trial testimony. The court reviewed the issue de novo rather than under AEDPA's standards because the state court did not adjudicate this claim on the merits because the state court did not have the daughter's records before it through no fault of the defendant who had requested hearings and discovery and been denied until federal court.

2006: Higgins v. Renico, 470 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2006) (affirming Higgins v. Renico, 362 F. Supp. 2d 904 (E.D. Mich. 2005)). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to cross-examine the key prosecution witness because of lack of preparation. The defendant and the state's witness were the only people present when the victim was shot. The defendant made a statement, which was admitted in evidence that the state's witness shot the victim. The witness, who said that the defendant was the shooter, did not show up for his scheduled testimony during trial and his preliminary hearing testimony was read into the record. Two days later, the witness showed up and testified. Counsel informed the court that he had been provided with the witness' two prior statements several days before but had not reviewed the statements or prepared for cross-examination. The court recessed for 30 minutes, but counsel informed the court that he still was not prepared. The court would not delay longer and counsel asked no questions on cross-examination. The state court made a conclusory finding that there was no prejudice but did not address the issue of deficient conduct so this issue was reviewed de novo. Counsel's conduct in failing to adequately prepare for cross-examination was deficient and not justified by strategy. Prejudice was found because the witness at issue was the only witness that directly implicated the defendant as the shooter. There was no cross even though the witness (1) had a strong interest in the jury's finding since he was the only other person present at the time of the shooting; (2) had made two prior statements with inconsistencies; and (3) had gunshot residue on his hands after the shooting. In addition, the failure to challenge the testimony left the impression that the defense accepted the testimony. Likewise, the witness testified that he had not shown up earlier in the trial because he had been threatened by "people" and the failure to cross-examine left the impression that the threats came from the defendant when there was no evidence to support that inference. Finally, the preliminary cross-examination testimony was inadequate because counsel had been conducting only non-confrontational discovery at that time. In its AEDPA analysis, citing Strickland, the court held that the state court's finding of no prejudice was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent.

Reynoso v. Giurbino*, 462 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2006). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to cross-examine state witnesses about their motivation for testifying. The crime went unsolved for two years and then a jail house snitch, after seeing advertisements about a $25,000 reward on television, contacted police saying the defendant had confessed to him shortly after the crime. After another year, with the reward still being advertised on television and in newspapers, the police reinterviewed a witness interviewed the night of the murder and another witness, who allegedly saw the defendant near the scene the night of the murder, contacted the police. Although there was no physical evidence, both of these witnesses also identified the defendant. During trial, counsel cross-examined the snitch about his motivation in seeking the reward ($10,000 of which he ultimately collected). Although counsel cross-examined the other two witnesses on other matters concerning credibility, counsel did not cross-examine them about the reward motivation. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate or to question the witnesses on this matter because counsel knew about the reward. Prejudice was found because, if counsel had asked, she would have learned that both witnesses were aware of the reward and had asked police about it. Thus, they "may have had a motive to lie." (Both witnesses did ultimately collect $7,500 each). Prejudice was also clear because the prosecutor emphasized in closing that these witnesses had no bias and "that neither had any reason or motive to lie." Under AEDPA, the state court's decision was an unreasonable application of federal law. Id. at ____ (citing Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 405-06 (2000)).

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: Green v. Cueva, 2023 WL 7026995 (E.D. Ca. Oct. 25, 2023). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in seeking the admission of an exculpatory hearsay statement under an unhelpful hearsay exception and overlooking a superior one. The victim was a woman petitioner had an on-again, off-again relationship with. Petitioner arrived at her home unannounced hoping to rekindle their relationship but found the victim in bed with another man, Lee Williams. The victim ended up being killed from a shotgun wound. Both petitioner and Williams left the victim's home after the shooting. Williams, who had wrapped the shotgun in clothes and slid it into an adjoining bathroom before leaving, told two people shortly thereafter that petitioner had shot the victim. Petitioner turned himself in to police and was charged with murder. At his initial trial, he told the jury that the gun went off accidentally while he and Williams struggled over it after Williams pulled it out from underneath the bed. Williams did not testify and the jury could not reach a verdict. At petitioner's retrial, Williams again was not called as a witness. His statements following the shooting were admitted, however, under the spontaneous statement exception to the hearsay rule. Petitioner's prior account of an accidental shooting was read into the record. Defense counsel attempted to corroborate petitioner's version of events with a hearsay statement made by Williams to an investigator that embraced the accidental discharge explanation. Defense counsel unsuccessfully argued that the statement constituted a declaration against interest. Defense counsel did not argue, pursuant to a different statute, that if hearsay statements have been admitted, then other hearsay statements by the same person are also admissible to attack that person's credibility. Petitioner was convicted of first-degree murder. On appeal, the state court did not decide whether trial counsel performed deficiently, instead finding no prejudice to petitioner. The state court relied on the absence of clear evidence in the record as to what precisely Williams had said to the investigator or the circumstances under which the statements were made. That decision was unreasonably wrong and premised on three errors. First, the state court unreasonably assumed Williams's statements to the investigator were contradictory or otherwise unreliable even though there was "[n]othing in the record suggest[ing] there was any confusion about Williams's basic story." And even assuming that Williams's statements to the investigator had been contradictory or unclear, the state court erred in holding that uncertainty against petitioner. "If Williams's statements contradicted themselves, those contradictions would have undermined his credibility, and with it his claim that [petitioner] 'shot her.'" Second, the exclusion of Williams's statements to the investigator deprived petitioner of some of the most persuasive evidence he had to offer and it was unreasonable for the state court to ignore how fundamental that deprivation was, relying instead on its own uncertainty about the evidence. Third, the state court "irrationally turned the Strickland test on itself." In assessing prejudice, it relied on the sparseness of the evidence even though the record was sparse because of trial counsel's failure to properly develop it. "By requiring more clarity, the [state court] both punished [petitioner] for his attorney's alleged error and underscored, indirectly, the breadth of that error. Not only did counsel fail to recognize a crucial evidentiary rule. He failed to explain how and why Williams's statements fit that rule." Although it is a petitioner's burden to show what a missing witness would have said when complaining of counsel's failure to present such evidence, in this case "there was no uncertainty about whether Williams was a real person, about the thrust of his excluded statements, or about why their admission would have aided [petitioner's] defense." As to the first prong of Strickland, trial counsel's performance is evaluated de novo because it was not addressed in the state court decision. Petitioner's trial counsel "overlooked an evidentiary rule, and as a result, the jury did not hear evidence at the heart of his case." Trial counsel's performance fell below the objective professional standard.

2019: Jones v. Gavin, 395 F.Supp.3d 440 (E.D. Pa. 2019). In murder case, petitioner's trial attorney was ineffective in failing to impeach two Commonwealth eyewitnesses who identified petitioner as the shooter of the victim. Although the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under both the inadequate state rule doctrine and Martinez v. Ryan. (Petitioner had affirmatively sought to raise the ineffectiveness claim in state court through pro se filings because his post-conviction counsel failed to include it in the post-conviction proceeding. A recent rule precluding merits review of the pro se claim under such circumstances was applied retroactively to petitioner. See section VIII.B. for discussion of the Martinez analysis.) At trial, the Commonwealth presented testimony from two men who had been in the car with the victim when the victim was shot. Witness Rucker testified that there were three males on the corner before the shooting, and Khalil Rippy, whom he knew from school, was one of them. Rucker testified that petitioner, the only defendant on trial, and another male came out of the alley immediately before the shooting. Rucker stated that petitioner was the shooter and that he had picked petitioner's photograph from an array at the police station. On cross-examination, Rucker testified that he did not recall what petitioner or anyone else was wearing. He claimed not to remember talking to the police at the scene. In fact, he had been interviewed at the crime scene at which time he reported that one of the men involved in the shooting had worn a yellow jumpsuit. This was not brought out at trial. Witness Lyles testified that Edward Thomas was one of the three males on the corner before the shooting and petitioner was not there when the eyewitnesses and the victim first arrived at the scene. He identified petitioner and Thomas as the two males who later came out of the alley moments before the shooting. He testified that petitioner pulled a gun and started firing. He did not recall what the shooter was wearing. Nor did he remember having told the police at the scene that the shooter was wearing a yellow jumpsuit. Lyles further testified that at the police station he gave a statement identifying petitioner as the shooter. Portions of that statement were read into the record, including the portion where he stated that petitioner had been wearing a dark blue hoody. On cross-examination, Lyles eventually recalled speaking with police at the crime scene but claimed not to remember telling the officer that one of the men was in a yellow jumpsuit. Although defense counsel had a police report indicating Lyles had in fact mentioned the yellow jumpsuit, counsel did not confront Lyles with his prior statement. Instead, trial counsel simply asked if the officer would be lying if the officer testified that Lyles had stated the shooter wore a yellow jumpsuit. The significance of the yellow jumpsuit was demonstrated through the testimony of witness Riggins who looked out of a window after hearing screaming and observed four men running from the crime scene: petitioner, who Riggins knew, Rippey, Thomas, and an unknown man who was wearing a yellow jumpsuit. Despite the importance of the yellow jumpsuit, trial counsel did not call the two officers who took statements from Lyles and Rucker at the scene in which both indicated that the shooter wore a yellow jumpsuit. There was no reasonable strategic basis for this omission. Trial counsel explained that he did not call the officers because: (1) counsel thought that he had already impeached the witnesses' testimony and had introduced the statements they made at the crime scene; and (2) calling police officers is dangerous. As to the first reason, it was simply not true. And trial counsel's attempted defense of his inaction revealed his misapprehension of the actual evidence at trial. As for counsel's apparent fear of dishonesty from police officers, this concern was not real given that the officers had memorialized the witnesses' statements in their reports. Thus, "[t]hey could not have credibly retracted them." In addition, trial counsel had called two other police officers at trial thereby establishing that the post-trial reason he gave for not calling the officers at issue was not in fact his motivation at the time of trial. Given that the prior statements of Lyles and Rucker cast doubt on their identification of petitioner as the shooter, petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance.

2017: United States v. Cross, 249 F.Supp.3d 339 (D.D.C. 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to use a chart suggesting the quantity of heroin attributable to defendant was under one kilogram in this prosecution for conspiracy to distribute over one kilogram of heroin. The government offered testimony from defendant's supplier, Mouloukou Toure, who told the jury that he sold defendant 1.2 to 1.3 kilograms for further distribution. Trial counsel performed deficiently by failing to use a chart created by law enforcement detailing the quantities of heroin that the FBI recovered from the alleged co-conspirators. It was undisputed that Toure imported 4,800 grams of heroin from a Toronto-based supplier and that this was Toure's first and only heroin supplier. The FBI recovered 623.4 grams of heroin in controlled buys from Toure, seized 944.3 grams from Toure's stash house and located 1,984.4 grams in a third co-conspirator's stash house that Toure testified he provided for distribution. When those amounts are added to the amounts Toure testified he distributed to a fourth co-conspirator, that leaves only approximately 400 grams for defendant – significantly less than the 1.2 or 1.3 kilograms to which Toure testified. Trial counsel's strategy was to show that defendant had a simple buyer/supplier relationship with Toure, but was not involved in a wider, international conspiracy to distribute large amounts of heroin. Counsel had no recollection of why she failed to use the drug quantity chart, but acknowledged that it would have supported her theory of the case and undermined an element of the charged offense. Counsel's performance was deficient, and there is no sound trial strategy that would have justified not using the chart, which trial counsel acknowledged she received prior to trial. Defendant suffered prejudice because the chart would have discredited Toure, the prosecution's key witness who provided the only evidence as to the one-kilogram drug amount, which was an essential element of defendant's conviction. Thus, there is a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict as to the essential drug amount element would have been different if the chart had been put into play.

2010: Schoenauer v. United States, 759 F.Supp.2d 1090 (S.D. Iowa 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy case for failing to investigate and present impeachment evidence. The government presented expert testimony from an ATF auditor to establish the petitioner's wealth exceeded his income during the relevant time period. While he earned $262,000, according to the government, he had available 2.9 million. While the defendant had requested that counsel obtain discovery and investigate to rebut this testimony, counsel believed this was a "side issue" and that this was a drug case, not a tax case." Thus, counsel did not move to exclude this testimony or investigate even though the defendant had been investigated by the IRS, who had seized all of his financial records. The defendant, who was an accountant, informed counsel the IRS found no unexplained income. At trial, there was no "direct evidence" of the defendant participating in the conspiracy. Thus, his conviction was primarily because of this "unexplained income" testimony. If counsel had investigated, a special agent with the IRS, would have testified that he had investigated a five year period at the prosecution's request looking for criminal violations and found none. He also would have testified explicitly that he found no evidence of unreported or unexplainable funds. The court noted in a footnote that the defense had not asserted a Brady claim due to the government's failure to disclose this information. Nonetheless, the court was "troubled" by the government's actions and, on rehearing, dismissed the indictment citing the impracticalities of retrial due to the passage of time and the "significant expense" to the defendant in defending himself the first time.

2004: Harris v. Senkowski, 298 F. Supp. 2d 320 (E.D.N.Y. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in second degree robbery case for failing to challenge the testimony of the robbery victim with her prior inconsistent description of the robber. Only thirty minutes after the robbery, the victim described her assailant as a black male standing 5'4" tall and weighing 130 pounds. The next evening, the victim, who was Asian, rode around the neighborhood with police officers and identified the defendant, who was then arrested. The defendant was 6' tall and 220 pounds. Prior to trial, counsel moved to suppress the identification as being unduly suggestive, but counsel never addressed the victim's prior description and the motion was denied. During the trial, the victim and the police officer that drove her around were the only state's witness. Counsel did not cross-examine the victim concerning her prior description of the defendant even though his sole argument in defense was mistaken identification. The defendant never squarely claimed that trial counsel was ineffective on this basis in state court and, therefore, the state courts never ruled on the issue. The government explicitly waived any procedural or exhaustion issues though. Analyzing the case under pre-AEDPA standards, the court found that counsel's conduct was deficient and that "[a] more compelling example of ineffective representation is difficult to fathom." While counsel alleged strategic reasons for his failure, the court found that each reason was "ludicrous." Even if counsel chose not to cross-examine the victim for an alleged strategy, counsel still could have offered the complaint report into evidence as a business record or called the police officer that took the complaint as a witness.

Capital Case*

Prejudice found because the government's case rose or fell on the strength of the victim's testimony, but the jury never heard about her prior, strikingly inconsistent identification in the case.

c. State Cases

2023: Smith v. Chandler, 888 S.E.2d 171 (Ga. 2023). In child molestation case, appellate counsel was ineffective at the new trial stage and on appeal by failing to raise and prove a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failing to impeach the alleged victim's testimony with evidence that she had made prior inconsistent statements about the alleged abuse. The alleged victim, N.C., was the oldest daughter of petitioner's live-in girlfriend. N.C. was 14 years old when she informed her mother that petitioner had been "touching on" her for years. At petitioner's trial, N.C. testified that petitioner had licked her vagina and breasts and put something inside her vagina when he was on top of her. According to N.C.'s medical records, however, she made statements at the hospital that she had "only [been] touched" by petitioner, that "no sexual penetration occurred," and that she denied there was "any oral contact." Although trial counsel briefly cross-examined N.C. at trial, trial counsel did not ask her a single question about her statements at the hospital as reflected in the medical records. In the state habeas proceeding, trial counsel explained that the defense strategy was to show that N.C. was lying and that her accusations were made because she did not like petitioner.

Impeaching N.C. with her own prior statements and denials as reflected in the medical records would have strongly supported the defense strategy by putting evidence before the jury that she had been significantly inconsistent in her allegations of abuse, information that the jury did not otherwise have. Although the scope of cross-examination will rarely support a claim of deficient performance, under these circumstances, no reasonably competent defense attorney would have decided against presenting this impeachment evidence to cast doubt on the credibility of the State's key witness.

Because the entire case was built on N.C.'s statements about her alleged abuse, and on N.C.'s credibility, prejudice is established. Although the jury heard evidence that N.C. was sometimes untruthful, "it did not hear that, according to her medical records, she had been significantly inconsistent in the very allegations of abuse that formed the basis for the charges against petitioner." The warden's contention that prejudice was not shown because petitioner failed to show how N.C. would have responded to the impeachment is rejected.

Whatever N.C. might have testified on cross-examination could not have had the effect of erasing that evidence entirely: even if she could have cast doubt on or contested the accuracy of the statements, they remained the only evidence of her denying the allegations at issue and thus were still of substantial importance to a defense grounded in trying to discredit N.C. Under these circumstances, calling N.C. to testify at the habeas hearing was not necessary to establish prejudice.

Capital Case*

Having shown that trial counsel provided ineffective assistance, petitioner further established that any deficiency in appellate counsel's failure to raise and prove that ineffectiveness-of-trial-counsel claim prejudiced petitioner's appeal. And deficiency by appellate counsel is shown by the record. The trial counsel ineffectiveness claim was clearly stronger than what appellate counsel did raise. No reasonable appellate attorney would have omitted the meritorious trial counsel ineffectiveness claim.

2022: Jaynes v. Cain, 511 P.3d 58 (Or. App. 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective as to five counts in case involving numerous alleged sexual crimes against minor victims where trial counsel failed to impeach a jailhouse snitch with his requests to authorities for assistance with custody of his children. In finding no deficient performance, the lower court had erroneously agreed with trial counsel's assessment that no impeachment was possible because the snitch did not receive any benefit. "[A] witness's potential bias is not limited to instances where the witness actually receives a tangible benefit in exchange for testimony. A witness can have bias resulting from benefits he may subjectively expect or hope to receive, whether or not those perceived benefits are grounded in reality." Here, the snitch's statements to police showed that he subjectively hoped that he would receive a benefit related to his custody issues for his testimony against petitioner. And given the timing of the statements, i.e., following his plea and sentencing, "it appears that [the snitch] did not believe that possible benefits from providing testimony against petitioner were limited by his previously-negotiated plea and sentence." As for respondent's contention that by impeaching the snitch, counsel could have risked providing the snitch an opportunity to testify that he came forward out of a "moral obligation," this could not be considered as a defense for trial counsel's inaction where trial counsel did not offer that as an explanation for his conduct. "To consider that trial counsel had any risks in mind despite there being no evidence of those risks in his testimony would constitute impermissible post hoc rationalization." Because the snitch's testimony and credibility were central to the trial court's guilty verdicts on the five counts, evidence suggesting that the snitch came forward out of self-interest "may well have affected the weight given to [the snitch's] testimony by the trial court. Ultimately, it is more than a mere possibility that it would have made a difference to the trial court's guilty verdict on those counts."

State v. Salazar*, 509 P.3d 198 (Utah App. 2022). In sexual assault case where the complainant's credibility was the critical issue, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to present voice messages between defendant and the complainant some months after the alleged assault that contradicted the complainant's testimony that she would not have contacted defendant after what had happened. The State contended that trial counsel made a reasonable decision to forgo presentation of the messages because of the threat made by the prosecution at trial that they would counter with testimony from a rape-myth expert to explain the complainant's counterintuitive behavior. But this threat was related to the messages being used by the defense to suggest that the complainant's behavior was indicative of the sexual encounter having been consensual, not that they undermined her credibility. Trial counsel could have made clear to the court and the jury that the defense did not in any way contend that the messages showed that the complainant consented to the sexual encounter, thereby foreclosing any relevance of a rape-myth expert, while hammering home the argument that the messages showed the complainant was not a credible witness. But even if the State called a rape-myth expert, "the jury would have recognized that there was no logical connection between the expert's testimony and the reason the evidence was being presented. Thus, reasonable counsel would have pressed forward and presented this critical credibility evidence." As to prejudice, the complainant had acknowledged exchanging some messages with defendant after the alleged offense. However, those messages were shortly after the sexual encounter, not the ones occurring many months afterwards at a time when the complainant was adamant that she would not have been in deliberate contact with defendant. At trial, the complainant was the lead witness and yet was unable to recall almost anything about the incident. Because "the State's prospects for a conviction primarily rested on her testimony, . . . every sound challenge to her credibility, which was already on shaky ground, significantly increased the chances that the jury would find her incredible as a witness, undercutting the State's ability to demonstrate [defendant's] guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." Had trial counsel further undercut the complainant's credibility by introducing the messages at issue, "there is a reasonable probability that ... the result of the proceeding would have been different."

2021: Hodges v. State, 249 A.3d 132 (Me. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving charges of sexual assault against a minor by introducing into evidence the entire transcript and recording of the alleged victim's police interview. Trial counsel's stated goal was to establish the inconsistency between the alleged victim's earlier statements and her trial testimony. It was not, however, reasonable strategy to place the entire interview into evidence in order to accomplish that goal. The alleged victim's description of the assaults to the detective was, overall, consistent with her trial testimony. Thus, while the interview provided "fodder for trial counsel to impeach the alleged victim's credibility through cross-examination, the record provides no possible basis for trial counsel to conclude that it was also necessary for the jury to read and listen to the entire interview." Not only was the interview largely consistent with the alleged victim's trial testimony, it also contained "an array of additional, otherwise inadmissible evidence that could only have been prejudicial to [the] defense," e.g., references to inappropriate incidents by petitioner with other students that resulted in petitioner's job loss, mention of petitioner's supposed mental health struggles, and comments about a recording that had been specifically excluded from evidence by the trial court. Because the State's case hinged entirely on the alleged victim's testimony, effectively bolstering her credibility through introduction of the complete interview, which "also gratuitously exposed the jury to a panoply of severely prejudicial evidence," was an error that undermines confidence in the outcome.

2020: Watson v. State, 230 A.3d 6 (Me. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving charges of sexual assault by petitioner against his minor daughter where trial counsel had the entire video recording of the daughter's police interview played for the jury and a transcript of the interview admitted into evidence and available for the jury during deliberations. The video showed the daughter describing, consistent with her testimony at trial, the two incidents of sexual abuse that she alleged had occurred. In addition, the interviewing detective "was shown telling the victim that she had done the right thing by reporting the incidents, that 'the grownups' would make sure the victim was safe, and that [petitioner] should have known better." Also on the video was the daughter stating, "So, I won't get taken away from my grandparents?" During argument to the jury, both sides agreed the case came down to the question of who was more credible, petitioner or his daughter, as there was no corroborative evidence of the abuse in the form of medical evidence, eyewitness testimony, or DNA or forensic evidence. The record showed that trial counsel's strategy was to undermine the victim's credibility by showing that she fabricated the allegations in order for her to remain in her grandparents' care. Efforts by counsel to discredit the interview as incomplete or inadequate were part of this same strategy. Although it may well have been a sound strategy to argue that the victim had a motive to fabricate because of the custody issue and that the detective's interview was too short, these issues could have been raised and argued without playing the entire video interview. The decision to play the video for the jury was not reasonable strategy. And because the case was essentially a credibility contest, providing the jury with a consistent account of the victim's allegations was prejudicial.

2016: Ex Parte Saenz, 491 S.W.3d 819 (Tex. Crim. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to impeach Gonzalez, the State's primary witness, with a prior inconsistent statement. The defendant was charged with shooting four people, including Gonzalez, in a drive-by shooting. One of those shot died. The state's theory was that the defendant, who was a member of Suicidal Barrio, a Corpus Christi gang, did the shooting in retaliation against the La Quarenta gang for a prior assault against Pimentel, who was allegedly associated with Suicidal Barrio. One day after the shooting, Gonzalez was interviewed at the hospital by the police. When asked if he would recognize the shooter if he saw him again, Gonzalez said no. Nonetheless, during trial, Gonzalez identified the defendant as the shooter and a police officer testified that Gonzalez identified the defendant out of a photo array of six people. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to impeach Gonzalez with his prior inconsistent statement. Counsel conceded that this failure was not a strategy as he was challenging Gonzalez's identification and had intended to use the prior inconsistent statement. Prejudice was also established, as Gonzalez was the only person to identify the defendant as the shooter and the State stressed this fact in closing arguments. Gonzalez's credibility "would have been severely crippled by his prior inconsistent statement denying his ability to identify the shooter." While the state also relied on statements the defendant had made to a friend on the night of the shooting, her belief that the defendant was involved in the shooting based on what he said was "largely speculative." Cell phone records that placed the defendant in the general vicinity of the crime allowed a range of approximately a quarter mile only. Likewise, while the State relied on a jailhouse snitch, who testified that the defendant confessed to being the shooter, this testimony was "questionable," as the snitch "had a criminal history, a motive to falsify his statements, and his description of the offense was inconsistent with the other evidence." His testimony was also contradicted by another witness, who testified that he heard the snitch say that the defendant denied being the shooter but the snitch intended to lie in court and say that he confessed. Finally, the evidence that the defendant had a motive based on the prior attack on Pimentel was "insubstantial," as Pimentel was not associated with Suicidal Barrio and denied knowing the defendant.

Hannon v. State*, 491 S.W.3d 234 (Mo. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in sodomy of a child case for failing to obtain the child's school records which would have contradicted the child's testimony. The child testified that he was molested by the defendant the day before his mother overdosed on drugs and his grandmother took custody of him. The day was named in the indictment and the state's arguments as October 3, 2005. The child testified that he was out of school sick that day and it was during that time that he was molested. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to obtain the child's school records, which reflected that he was in school on the day in question. While counsel testified that he had been informed by the school that the child was out sick all that week, the trial court rejected this testimony finding that counsel lacked credibility. Prejudice was established.

Rutland v. State*, 785 S.E.2d 350 (S.C. 2016). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to cross-examine the state's "key" witness with prior inconsistent statements to the police and to newspaper reporters. The defendant was involved with the deceased's estranged wife. On the day of the shooting, the defendant and his girlfriend were at a pet grooming business to inquire about purchasing the business. The deceased came in and was shot and killed by the defendant. The only other person present besides the defendant's girlfriend was an employee of the business, Kestner. Kestner initially told law enforcement that the deceased was armed when he entered the business and pulled a gun before he was shot and killed. She made a similar statement to a newspaper reporter. At trial, however, she testified that the deceased had nothing in his hands when he entered the business, except a pack of cigarettes. She said she never saw him with a gun, but after the shooting there was a second gun lying on the floor. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to question her about the prior inconsistent statements to law enforcement and the newspaper reporter. Counsel conceded knowledge of these prior statements and an "oversight" in failing to cross-examine on this basis. While the post-conviction court found that counsel's conduct was deficient, the court found no prejudice because the defendant failed to produce extrinsic evidence of the prior inconsistent statements in the post-conviction hearing. This finding was not supported by the evidence in the record as the defendant produced the prior statement to law enforcement, as well as affidavits from individuals attesting to having heard the witness say that the deceased was armed at the time of the shooting. Prejudice established because, if trial counsel had adequately cross-examined the witness, the evidence would have demonstrated that "all three witnesses to the incident attested at some juncture the victim was armed at the time of the shooting." Additionally, the prosecutor relied on the witness' testimony in closing arguments, which "highlights trial counsel's deficient performance." Likewise, the jury sent out several relevant questions during deliberations indicating that "the jury was focusing on whether the victim was armed" and that the jury was having difficulty reaching a unanimous verdict.

2012: State v. Hollin, 970 N.E.2d 147 (Ind. 2012). Counsel ineffective in conspiracy to commit burglary case for failing to present evidence to impeach the alleged accomplice's testimony. The defendant and the accomplice were arrested after a report of suspicious activity. Both made tape recorded statements. The accomplice claimed that they had entered the home to use the telephone but then stole money from the bedroom while inside. He did not implicate the defendant in a plan to burglarize the home and said the defendant learned of the theft only after they left the home. The accomplice entered a plea agreement to felony theft with the burglary charge being dismissed and the felony charge being reduced to misdemeanor if he completed probation. The accomplice also pled guilty to a theft charge that was already pending at the time of this arrest and was given a suspended sentence. While in pretrial confinement, after being arrested for an additional felony and having petitions filed to revoke his suspended sentences, the accomplice claimed for the first time that he and the defendant had agreed in advance to break into homes and commit burglaries. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately impeach the accomplice. The jury was aware that the accomplice had pled guilty and was in jail for the same incident as charged in this case, but the jury was not aware that the accomplice had faced a possible 23 year sentence, but ultimately pled in a manner that involved only a misdemeanor theft conviction and no jail time if he succeeded on probation. Thus, the jury had no idea that the only person to actually take money in these crimes got this result while the defendant still faced felony charges and up to 23 years confinement. A Brady violation was also found as the state failed to disclose much of this information prior to trial.

2011: People v. Armstrong, 806 N.W.2d 676 (Mich. 2011). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for failing to introduce phone records to undermine the complainant's credibility. The complainant testified that she met with the defendant three times and was raped on the last two occasions. She testified unequivocally that she did not communicate with the defendant following the third meeting. Defense counsel confronted her with the defendant's cell phone records that revealed incoming calls from her adoptive mother's phone and she admitted making one or two calls to the defendant just days after the second alleged rape. When counsel confronted her with additional records allegedly revealing hundreds of incoming calls from her cell phone, the complainant unequivocally denied that she had called the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to introduce the phone records. Counsel attempted to do so, but the state's objection to lack of foundation was sustained. Counsel made no further effort to introduce the records. The court instructed the jury to disregard evidence not introduced. Counsel's conduct was not excused by any strategy, as counsel had simply failed to subpoena the custodian of the records due to a mistaken belief that the business records exception to the hearsay did not require a custodian to testify. Prejudice established, despite significant evidence from the complainant's grandmother, mother, and stepfather that she had falsely accused her stepfather of rape in the past and was a compulsive liar. The omitted records would have provided strong proof that "the complainant lied to this jury" about "the alleged rapes in this case." Aside from showing that she lied about contacting the defendant after the alleged rapes, these records cast serious doubt on the substance of her allegations because if she was brutally raped as she testified "then one must question why she reached out to defendant through text messages and phone calls" afterwards. Likewise, even though the jury heard the testimony about the cell phone records, the court instructed the jury to disregard the evidence. In addition, the complainant only acknowledged making a fraction of the numerous calls and the state argued that the defendant or defense counsel might have fabricated the records.

2008: Millam v. State, 745 N.W.2d 719 (Iowa 2008). Counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to present evidence of the alleged victim's prior, false accusation of sexual abuse. The alleged victim was the daughter of the defendant's girlfriend and she had previously alleged sexual abuse by her mother's previous boyfriend but then recanted the accusation. Counsel made no attempt to present this evidence even though there was no physical evidence and no witnesses other than the alleged victim. Counsel believed the evidence was inadmissible under the rape-shield law which excluded evidence of "past sexual behavior" of the victim. The Iowa court had held, prior to the enactment of the rape-shield law, that prior false allegations were not inadmissible under general relevance considerations but had not addressed the issue under the statute at the time of the defendant's trial. The court subsequently held that prior false allegations are not "sexual behavior" prohibited by the statute and this evidence is admissible if the defendant making a showing that the alleged victim made the statements and the statements were false, based on a preponderance of the evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "the test to determine whether counsel is required to raise an issue" is based on "a normally competent attorney." "This test does not require an attorney to be clairvoyant, but rather to research the relevant legal issues and determine whether, given the circumstances of the particular case, the issue is 'worth raising.'" Here counsel conducted no research. If he had researched, he would have found "that many jurisdictions had concluded that prior false claims of sexual abuse were not protected by their rape-shield laws." In addition, the plain wording of the statute was clear because "it refers to sexual behavior, and quite simply, claims of sexual abuse are not sexual behavior." Prejudice was clear in that this evidence "could have greatly impugned" the alleged victim's credibility. This was especially so since "her own mother doubted her claims . . . due to her prior false claims."

Miller v. State*, 665 S.E.2d 596 (S.C. 2008). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to cross-examine the defendant's girlfriend, a state witness, regarding the similarities of three armed robberies she and the defendant's nephew were charged with. Specifically, the girlfriend's car was used in each robbery, a similar handgun was used, and the victim's description of the assailant more closely matched the nephew than the defendant. Prejudice established because the defense argued mistaken identity and third-party guilt, which was the primary defense. In addition, the girlfriend's credibility was "questionable at best" because she had initially implicated the defendant in an armed robbery, in which she and the nephew were charged, before she learned he could not have committed the crime because he was in jail at the time.

2006: J.J. v. State, 858 N.E.2d 244 (Ind. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in burglary and theft case for failing to inform the jury that the defendant's alleged accomplice had been granted use immunity. Prejudice found because the witness' testimony was of great consequence to the jury's consideration of the case and the prosecutor commented that the witness had "cooked himself" by his testimony that he had participated in the crime with the defendant, implying that the witness was credible because he would suffer for his own admission when the prosecutor knew he would not.

2005: Thompson v. Commonwealth, 177 S.W.3d 782 (Ky. 2005). Counsel ineffective in reckless homicide and persistent felony offender case for failing to challenge the accident reconstruction testimony of the investigating officer. The case involved the death of an eight-year-old child that ran into the street chasing a puppy and was hit by the defendant's motorcycle. Testing revealed alcohol in the defendant's blood, along with traces of marijuana, pain reliever, and anti-depressant medication. The investigating officer used an English study based on the running speed of eight-year-olds, distance, and the defendant's estimated speed and concluded that the defendant should have been able to stop with 26 feet to spare. Even without a defense expert, counsel should have realized that the officer made a mathematical error and his own formula would have revealed that the defendant could not have stopped his motorcycle until 40 feet after the point of impact. Counsel did not retain his own expert because the defendant consistently told him that he never saw the child before the impact. Thus, counsel believed the possible braking distance was irrelevant. Counsel's conduct was deficient because his only defense was that the accident was unavoidable and counsel knew that the prosecution would rely on the officer's testimony that it was avoidable with normal reaction times. It was unreasonable to fail to attempt to challenge this testimony because “jurors are undoubtedly greatly influenced by the testimony of someone deemed an ‘expert.’ This is especially true if the only countervailing testimony comes from the defendant, the sole person with a strong motive to lie (if the truth would deem him guilty of the crime charged).” In addition, the expert’s testimony was so clearly erroneous in this case that “a non-mathematical expert discovered it on simple review of the calculations.” Prejudice found because if counsel had performed adequately, the expert would have had to admit that the defendant “could not have stopped” in time.

2004: Black v. State*, 151 S.W.3d 49 (Mo. 2004). Counsel ineffective in capital trial for failing to impeach three state witnesses with prior inconsistent statements that supported the defense theory that the killing was committed in self-defense rather than as the result of deliberation. The case involved a black victim and a white defendant in a road fight that “grew out of [the defendant’s] race-based reaction to the victim’s behavior toward [the defendant’s girlfriend].” Counsel failed to cross-examination one eyewitness with his prior statement, omitted at trial, that he saw the victim get out of his vehicle and hit the defendant with a beer bottle. Another eyewitness was not crossed on his prior statement that the two men both got out and exchanged blows, which was at odds with his trial testimony. Finally, another eyewitness was not crossed with evidence the victim was yelling and exited his vehicle without injury, even though she testified at trial that the victim remained in his vehicle. Counsel also failed to cross-examine a state witness concerning inconsistent statements about how alcohol the victim had prior to the altercation. Prejudice established because “counsel’s failures went to the key issue of deliberation” as evidenced by the jury’s request for additional instructions defining “cool reflection” in the first-degree murder verdict form. Reversal required even though each of the state witnesses did not testify in post-conviction. “[A] movant is not required to reenact how a hypothetical trial would have proceeded had particular evidence been utilized, but to show that counsel knew of the evidence and was ineffective in failing to use it, to movant’s prejudice.”

6. ELICITING DAMAGING EVIDENCE AND MAKING DAMAGING ARGUMENT

a. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: Rice v. McGinley, 2023 WL 8188442 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 27, 2023), adopting F&Rs, 2023 WL 8199553 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 23, 2023). In case involving four counts of attempted murder, trial counsel was ineffective in stipulating to evidence that provided a motive for the shootings. (Although the claim was unexhausted and procedurally defaulted, the Commonwealth waived these defenses and conceded both deficient performance and prejudice.) The evidence against petitioner was relatively thin. No weapon was ever recovered and only one of the four victims was able to identify petitioner. This witness admitted that she had last seen petitioner some four years prior to the offense and the witness testified that petitioner ran away after firing the shots. Defense evidence, however, indicated that petitioner's medical condition at the relevant time rendered it unlikely that he could have stood up straight, let alone run from the crime scene. In an effort to bolster its case, the prosecution unsuccessfully sought a pretrial ruling allowing it to introduce evidence that one of the four victims was a suspect in the prior shooting of petitioner. (It was this shooting that left petitioner with the severe injuries that were ultimately discussed at trial as impairing his mobility.) Despite the adverse ruling, on the morning of trial defense counsel agreed to a stipulation that a detective could identify one of the victims as a suspect in the shooting of petitioner. Although trial counsel was deceased by the time of post-conviction proceedings, and so unable to explain her decision, there appeared to be no conceivable strategic reason for trial counsel to have stipulated to a motive for her client. Counsel's decision to do so was deficient performance. As to prejudice, this is shown by considering the weakness of the case against petitioner and the fact that his co-defendant, for which no motive evidence was admitted, was acquitted in the joint trial with petitioner.

United States ex rel. Logan v. Williams*, 2023 WL 4297606 (N.D. Ill. June 30, 2023). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective by promising alibi witnesses in opening statement and then not calling them during trial. (A federal evidentiary hearing was held on the claim after the district court found that the state court decision was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the post-conviction hearing.) During opening statement, defense counsel told the jury that the evidence would show that petitioner was not in Chicago, where the murder occurred, but rather was in Milwaukee on the date of the killing. Prior to trial, lead counsel had spoken to petitioner's aunts about petitioner's presence in Milwaukee but was not comfortable with the alibi defense. At the time of opening statement, lead counsel was reasonably certain that he would not call the alibi witnesses but would instead base the defense on: (1) a victim of the shooting who was expected to testify that petitioner was not the shooter; and (2) the recantation by another witness of her grand jury testimony identifying petitioner as the shooter. Defense counsel explained that they decided to mention the potential alibi in opening statement largely to placate petitioner. During trial, the aunts were not called to testify about the alibi and petitioner did not take the stand. Defense counsel's explanation for the decision not to present the alibi witnesses relied on the pretrial considerations, as well trial developments such as the recanting witness placing petitioner at her house in the early morning of the day after the shooting, and the alibi witnesses telling lead counsel during trial that they did not want to testify. In addition, defense counsel claimed that he feared the alibi evidence would open the door for the prosecution to present evidence regarding the circumstances of petitioner's arrest. Lead counsel's claim that the aunts stated that they did not want to testify is found not to be credible in light of the evidence presented post-trial and the trial record. Similarly, lead counsel's belated reliance on the recanting witness's placement of petitioner at her home as a reason for abandoning the alibi witnesses is found not to be credible. Finally, the assertion by lead counsel that he feared that introducing the alibi testimony could allow evidence of the circumstances of petitioner's arrest to be introduced by the prosecution in rebuttal is found to have been "made up." Because defense counsel's reasons for not calling the alibi witnesses was not in fact a response to unexpected trial developments, the failure to fulfill the promise made in opening statement to present an alibi defense was objectively unreasonable. Even assuming that a broken promise like the one given to the jury in this case could be cured in closing argument, that was not the case here where defense counsel's explanation for choosing not to call the witnesses implied that their credibility was questionable. Additionally, "the fact that counsel was able to describe a plausible reasonable-doubt defense does not mean that it was not objectively unreasonable for counsel to promise in opening statement an alibi defense that they knew prior to trial they did not intend to present." Regarding prejudice, "given the weakness of the prosecution's case against [petitioner], there is a reasonable probability that the trial would have come out differently absent trial counsel's broken promise." Notably, the prosecution's case heavily relied on only one eyewitness, the witness who recanted at trial her prior testimony identifying petitioner as the perpetrator. The prejudicial effect on the jury from the absence of the alibi witnesses was enhanced in this case because the prosecution emphasized the broken promise in its closing argument.

Lazar v. Attorney General of Pennsylvania*, 659 F.Supp.3d 599 (E.D. Pa. 2023). In murder case, after reopening habeas proceedings following a successful Rule 60(b) motion, the district court grants relief on three claims including a claim that trial counsel had been ineffective by incorrectly stipulating that petitioner had not taken methadone in the month preceding his confession, when he had actually taken methadone the day immediately prior. The timing was important as it related to the issue of whether petitioner's statement to police was unreliable due to methadone withdrawal, which required treatment when petitioner was taken to the hospital at the end of his 30-plus-hour interrogation. The state court had agreed with petitioner that his attorney had performed deficiently but found no prejudice. In reaching this conclusion, the state court first looked to petitioner's confession and stated, "[a]t best, [the jury] would have heard from competing experts that the [petitioner] was experiencing an unknown quantum of withdrawal symptoms during the taking of his statements." The district court, in contrast, found it "difficult to conclude that there is no 'reasonable probability' that 'the result of the proceeding would have been different' had the jury known of [petitioner's] state during the interrogation and heard from an expert on the impacts of methadone withdrawal." Putting aside the confession, the state court had also relied on the "overwhelming evidence" of guilt provided by five witnesses who testified against petitioner. But this reliance "overstate[d] the record because of the witnesses' various credibility problems," e.g., one of the witnesses had a theft conviction and only contacted the police after getting into a dispute with petitioner; two witnesses had felony proceedings pending during petitioner's trial; and the other two witnesses recanted or changed their story on the stand.

Capital Case*

During the initial federal habeas proceedings, petitioner had further argued that the state court's prejudice analysis was flawed for failing to consider the existence of an alternative suspect. The Commonwealth countered that other suspects had turned out to be dead-ends and habeas relief was denied after applying deference to the state court's ruling. The falsity of the Commonwealth's representations provided the basis for the Rule 60(b) relief.

Now, with a record free of distortions and the ability to properly appraise all of [petitioner's] arguments, I find that the state court's ruling of no prejudice, which failed to consider the reliability of [petitioner's] withdrawal-tainted confession, the credibility issues of the Commonwealth's witnesses, and the presence of alternative suspects, cannot be said to have been based on a reasonable application of the law to the facts under § 2254(d)(1).

Applying de novo review, the district court finds that deficient performance and prejudice have been established and petitioner is entitled to habeas relief on the claim.

2017: Emerson-Bey v. Attorney General of Maryland, 2017 WL 3279461 (D. Md., July 31, 2017).

Trial counsel was ineffective for eliciting damaging and inadmissible information at trial which also resulted in a violation of defendant's Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine witnesses against him. Defendant was charged with murder in connection with the shooting death of his estranged wife. The state's case was entirely circumstantial; defendant had motive and opportunity, there was no sign of forced entry at the victim's home, and defendant's palm print was found in the home. However, defendant had been inside the home for non-incriminating reasons and he and the victim sometimes exchanged friendly calls and texts. Following the murder, Phyllis Mason (also known as Leteara Thompson) was arrested on unrelated charges. During an interview with police, Mason said she was getting high in an alley with her friend, Tiffany Jenkins, on the night of the murder. Mason identified defendant in a photo array as the man she saw fleeing the home after the shooting. Tiffany Jenkins was also interviewed by police and stated that she was in the alley during the day (not at midnight when the shooting occurred) but claimed she also heard shots and saw a man fleeing a home. However, Jenkins was unable to identify defendant. Prior to trial, Mason died and Jenkins could not be located. There was no dispute that Mason's identification was inadmissible and the prosecutor agreed not to introduce it. And yet, during cross-examination of a police detective, trial counsel asked whether police had canvassed the neighborhood and whether any witnesses had indicated defendant was near the victim's home at the time of the crime. The detective responded "yes" and then counsel asked the detective to name the witness. The detective answered, "Veronica Jenkins, James, Tiffany Jenkins. She had several different names." In a misguided attempt to correct this blunder, trial counsel then asked a series of confusing follow up questions that incorrectly suggested that two different witnesses had identified defendant as the man they saw fleeing the house immediately after the shooting. After a lunch break, trial counsel continued questioning the detective to establish that Phyllis Mason was one of the names involved and that she gave a statement after she was arrested and under the influence of drugs and alcohol. Trial counsel did not move for a mistrial or move to strike any of the detective's testimony. Trial counsel performed deficiently in eliciting the damaging information and then compounded the error due to his failure to appreciate other avenues for attempting to cure his mistake, i.e., by objecting, moving to strike, or moving for a mistrial or new trial. The evidence of defendant's guilt was neither abundant nor overwhelming, but was instead entirely circumstantial. If the identification evidence had not been erroneously introduced by trial counsel, there is a reasonable probability that the jury would have had a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt and the outcome of his trial would have been different. Moreover, trial counsel's inept handling of the detective's cross-examination also violated defendant's right to confrontation because Mason's identification was testimonial and defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine her. This error was not harmless because the identification was the only direct evidence of defendant's involvement in the crime and the only evidence that placed him at the crime scene at the time of the crime. The identification testimony was not cumulative, nor was it corroborated by any other evidence. No cross-examination was permitted as the witness did not testify, and the overall strength of the prosecution's case was weak.

2009: Ramos v. Lawler, 615 F. Supp. 2d 347 (M.D. Pa. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in conspiracy to commit murder case for eliciting testimony from the victim that the co-defendant had pled guilty to conspiracy to commit murder. Counsel's conduct was deficient because this evidence in no way negated the defendant's culpability and was damaging. "[T]he prosecutor relied extensively, almost exclusively, on the [evidence of the co-defendant's guilty plea] during his closing argument." Prejudice established even though the trial court instructed that the substance of the guilty plea could not be used as evidence of guilt.

[T]here is a presumption that a jury will obey a jury instruction. However, this is only a presumption and can be rebutted by record evidence and the circumstances of the case.

Here, there was prejudice because there was very little, if any, evidence of a conspiracy to commit murder, although there was of conspiracy to assault and assault. The jury's guilty verdict on the conspiracy to commit murder charge "indicates that it necessarily and improperly considered [the] guilty plea as substantive evidence" of the defendant's guilt. The state court's decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established law.

b. State Cases

2024: State v. J.J.S., 246 N.E.3d 1169 (Ohio App. 2024). Trial counsel was ineffective in case involving a charge of gross sexual imposition on an eight-year-old girl for opening the door to the prosecution's pervasive presentation of highly prejudicial propensity evidence that would otherwise have been excluded from trial. The alleged incident occurred at a sleepover birthday party hosted by appellant's adult daughter. No physical evidence or eyewitnesses corroborated the account of the victim (B.M.) of the unlawful sexual contact. The prosecution's primary evidence was the live testimony of B.M. (12 years old at the time of trial), testimony from other witnesses about B.M.'s disclosure shortly after the incident occurred, and B.M.'s video-recorded forensic interview with a licensed social worker three days after the birthday party. During defense counsel's opening statement, counsel brought up, for the first time, allegations made by appellant's adult stepdaughters about sexual abuse that occurred approximately 30 years earlier and for which appellant had never been criminally prosecuted. (The purpose of the revelation appears to have been to provide a reason for certain witnesses believing and embellishing on B.M.'s account. Defense counsel did not suggest that B.W. made her accusation after learning about the alleged abuse of appellant's stepdaughters.) Immediately following defense counsel's opening statement, the prosecution successfully argued it should be permitted to introduce evidence regarding the allegations of appellant's stepdaughters because the defense had opened the door to prior bad acts. Although on appeal the state posited that defense counsel had a reasoned strategy in making the revelation during opening argument, the contents of the bench conference discussing the issue refuted that, showing instead that defense counsel had been confused about the evidence the prosecution intended to present. (In the video-recorded forensic interview, B.M. referenced being told that appellant had touched his own girls when they were young. Prior to defense counsel's opening statement, the prosecution had intended to redact those comments in the video to be presented to the jury.) Because defense counsel essentially accused the stepdaughters of concocting a story about being abused by appellant after hearing of B.M.'s accusation, the trial court permitted the prosecutor to counter that assertion with evidence of disclosures by them long before the B.M. incident. Defense counsel's erroneous representation about the stepdaughters was either based on faulty memory or ignorance of the actual facts. On the facts and circumstances of this case, deficient performance is found, as is prejudice. "[B]ecause of defense counsel's error during his opening statements regarding otherwise impermissible propensity evidence, the state was permitted to present a copious amount of highly prejudicial other-acts evidence with the effect of bolstering the credibility of B.M.'s testimony. . . . [I]t is reasonably probable the other-acts testimony regarding appellant's alleged prior sexual abuse of his stepdaughters for several years, beginning when they were as young as five, affected the outcome of the case." Compounding the prejudice, defense counsel "did not object to the state's unfettered presentation of other-acts evidence and did not request a limiting instruction in connection with that evidence."

Reece v. State*, 2024 WL 2939089 (Tenn. Crim.App. June 11, 2024). In case involving multiple charges of assault and weapons violations stemming from an altercation between petitioner and his estranged girlfriend and her family, trial counsel was ineffective in the cross-examination of the estranged girlfriend's mother (Mrs. Solomon), which resulted in the admission of evidence related to petitioner's threatening conduct during a trial recess. The conduct at issue was a statement by petitioner that he was going to "F'ing kill you," made apparently to the estranged girlfriend's father (Mr. Solomon) after petitioner followed his estranged girlfriend's sister (Kallie) as she walked to the restroom. Although the trial court found the statement was material to the petitioner's intent as to the charged offenses, it found that the probative value did not substantially outweigh the danger of unfair prejudice. The next witness called by the prosecution after the trial court's ruling was Mrs. Solomon. During her cross-examination, trial counsel asked about Mr. Solomon's reputation for violence. A bench conference was held following an objection by the prosecutor. The theory of relevance supporting the testimony was self-defense. The trial court explained that if this line of questioning was pursued, it would open the door to evidence about the mid-trial threat. After consulting with petitioner, trial counsel informed the court that she intended to go ahead with raising Mr. Solomon's reputation as to violent behavior. During the cross-examination, incidents of violent acts by Mr. Solomon were elicited, as well as the fact that Mrs. Solomon had a protection order against her husband set aside because she wanted his assistance protecting her family against petitioner. Testimony was then presented from Mr. Solomon and another witness about the threat by petitioner during the court recess. At the defense's request, a courthouse security recording capturing part of the incident was shown to the jury. In post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel explained her rationale for questioning Mrs. Solomon about her husband's prior violence—wanting to discredit Mrs. Solomon and to show Mrs. Solomon had a history of making false allegations and of coaching Kallie in the past to make false statements—but conceded that the benefit was not worth the negative impact of evidence about petitioner's mid-trial threat. Trial counsel also admitted that she “rolled with” the trial court's reliance on self-defense as the basis for allowing the questioning about Mr. Solomon's reputation for violence even though that was not the defense that was actually pursued. Although the post-conviction court found that trial counsel made a strategic decision to open the door to the threats by petitioner, the appellate court could not fathom why questions about Mr. Solomon's character for violence were necessary to achieve the goal of impeaching Mrs. Solomon and Kallie with prior false allegations. At the end of the day, “Mr. Solomon's character or reputation for violence was irrelevant to the defense and unnecessary to challenge Mrs. Solomon's and Kallie's credibility.” Thus, the record preponderated against the post-conviction court's determination that trial counsel made a reasonable strategic decision based upon informed choices and adequate preparation. Because credibility was a critical issue in this case with a dispute between witnesses as to whether or not petitioner possessed a firearm, and given the similarity in the substance of the petitioner's threats during the offenses and during the trial recess, prejudice was established.

2023: Geary v. Blewett, 541 P.3d 893 (Or. App. 2023). In case involving charges of sex crimes against two children, M and V, trial counsel was ineffective for eliciting, failing to object to, and failing to move to strike vouching testimony from the investigating officer. M had denied abuse when questioned by the child health care team. In an interview with the investigating officer immediately thereafter, M disclosed sexual abuse by petitioner. Defense counsel sought to demonstrate that M's accusations were the by-product of improper investigative techniques. In cross-examination, defense counsel asked the officer why she did not rely on the earlier interview, suggesting that the officer did not believe M's denials. This line of questioning resulted in the officer testifying she “knew” that “certain things occurred with M” because of V's statements and that she “knew that things had occurred” because of M's demeanor and answers she gave to the child health care team. The investigating officer was essentially stating that she knew abuse had occurred because she believed M and V. The lower court had denied relief, concluding that defense counsel was pursuing a valid strategy when eliciting this testimony. The stated strategy, however, could have been achieved without allowing the officer to indirectly vouch for the credibility of the two children. The record was devoid of evidence from which the lower court could have concluded that introducing the vouching was a strategic choice or otherwise needed for counsel's trial strategy. “In fact, in response to questioning at the post-conviction trial, defense counsel explained that he ‘opened the door’ to the officer's testimony but that it ‘wasn't [his] intent to elicit the vouching.’” “[W]e do not question the reasonableness of counsel's trial strategy itself but determine that counsel did not exercise reasonable professional skill and judgment when he elicited vouching testimony and then failed to take curative steps to address it.” As to prejudice, the childrens' credibility was critically important in petitioner's criminal trial. Counsel's failures allowed the inadmissible vouching testimony to be part of the jury's consideration. "Counsel's deficient performance therefore had a tendency to affect the verdict."

2020: Smithey v. State, 310 So.3d 1104 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). Trial counsel performed deficiently in defending petitioner, who was charged with murdering her estranged husband, by presenting her 911 call thereby opening the door to admission of her previously suppressed statement that her stab wound was self-inflicted after she shot the victim, which was contrary to her claim in the 911 call that her husband had assaulted her with a knife during the course of a sexual assault and that she shot him in self-defense. The affidavit and testimony from trial counsel established that the decision to admit the 911 call was not strategic or reasonable. Even assuming that defense counsel was aware that petitioner referenced her husband stabbing her during the 911 call, a point of some dispute, "at the very least, an effort should have been made to obtain a ruling as to whether the admission of the 911 call would open the door to the presentation of the suppressed statements before going down that ill-advised path. The defense had utilized that procedure with other evidence during the course of the trial." Regarding prejudice, the admission completely contradicted the testimony of petitioner's sole expert, thereby undermining the credibility of counsel, and eviscerated the self-defense claim. The critical nature of petitioner's admission to having self-inflicted her wounds was illustrated by the State's closing argument, telling the jury petitioner "was not justified and she knew it. And that's exactly why she cut herself, she inflicted those injuries to herself, and that's exactly why, we submit to you, that we've proven our case to you beyond a reasonable doubt...." On this record, there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, the result of petitioner's trial would have been different.

Botto v. State*, 307 So.3d 1006 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). In case where petitioner was convicted of the lewd or lascivious molestation of an eight-year-old boy, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the prosecution played part of the child's videotaped interview where the child mentioned the uncharged allegation that petitioner also performed oral sex on him. The error was presumed to be harmful. In addition, trial counsel compounded the prejudice when she repeatedly urged the jury to watch the videotape again to see the supposedly inconsistent claims made by the victim in that tape regarding the oral sex compared to what he said during the trial.

People v. Sanders*, 182 N.E.3d 151 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). In case where defendant was convicted of aggravated battery, unlawful possession of a stolen motor vehicle and the lesser-included criminal trespass to a vehicle, but acquitted of attempted first degree murder, aggravated discharge of a firearm, and unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon, trial counsel was ineffective for introducing race into the closing argument to the jury. Defendant, a black man, was starting a new job as a truck driver and was traveling from Arkansas to the company's headquarters in Addison, Illinois. He first rode with a company truck driver to a gas station in Gilman, Illinois where he was told he would be driven the rest of the way in another truck. The driver of the second truck was not in the vehicle when defendant got in. The driver, who was white but did not speak English, had not been informed of the arrangement and was surprised to find defendant in his truck moving items from the passenger area. A physical altercation ensued during which the driver was shot. At trial, it was disputed who initially drew the gun. After the driver was shot, defendant fled the scene in the truck. Although race was never posited as a factor in the incident, defense counsel nevertheless based a large majority of the closing argument on defendant's race. Counsel described the likely fears defendant felt being "a black man in a white community," that were not based on evidence presented at trial. There was no statistical analysis concerning neighborhood diversity effects or racial issues. Defense counsel further incorporated his own personal prejudice into the closing arguments. Attempting to associate the jurors with his beliefs, counsel asked, "Wouldn't you call the police? There's a black guy in there." These actions fall outside the bounds of sound trial strategy, and, therefore show deficient performance by counsel. As for prejudice, counsel described in great detail the supposed intimidating appearance of his client, even going so far as to refer to defendant as a "[b]ig black guy, kind of big" and followed this by saying, "I would be afraid." Defense counsel called defendant "a big scary black guy" and discussed the natural fears that would take place. "The aggregate of this sort of language could only create prejudicial effects, even if it was used as well-intentioned trial strategy. By emphasizing the defendant's race and the fear he would feel in the victim's shoes, based on no more than his personal views and not any evidence presented at trial, defense counsel created a prejudicial lens for the jury against [defendant]." Defendant was entitled to a new trial.

2019: State v. Crow, 438 P.3d 541 (Wash. Ct. App. 2019). Where the defense to a charge of possession of a stolen gun was that defendant was unaware that the gun was stolen, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to testimony by law enforcement officers concerning the probability that a firearm possessed by a convicted felon, which defendant was, is a stolen gun. The impermissible "profile" testimony included assertions that: (1) someone disqualified from obtaining a gun legally will obtain a firearm by stealing it or buying it unlawfully on the street; (2) illegally obtained firearms are typically stolen during burglaries and vehicle prowls (the gun at issue here came from a burglarized vehicle); (3) a person who knows he possesses a stolen firearm commonly discards the gun and flees when approached by a law enforcement officer (as did defendant); (4) the majority of disqualified people apprehended with a firearm have a stolen firearm; and (5) most or a high percentage of firearms in the hands of a disqualified person are stolen firearms. "The Yakima Police Department officers answered questions in the context of their knowledge based on 'training and experience.' Thus, the State used the imprimatur of expertise and law enforcement to group [defendant] with other guilty persons." Because of a question by defense counsel about how one should know a gun is stolen, defendant waived his right to challenge the testimony from law enforcement officers that a disqualified person will obtain a firearm by stealing it or buying it unlawfully on the street. Defendant did not, however, "open the door to the further testimony of the law enforcement officers. The additional testimony about conduct of persons possessing a gun and percentages of stolen guns on disqualified persons clarified nothing with regard to a person's knowledge of the status of a firearm and thus remained inadmissible profile evidence." On this record, "no reasonable trial strategy explains defense counsel's failure to object to profile evidence." In addition, the question to an officer about how one would know a gun was stolen "served no legitimate purpose in the defense of [defendant]. Instead, the answer to the question allowed the jury to convict [defendant] solely on the basis of his fitting a profile. [Defendant's] counsel could have more effectively argued the lack of knowledge without an officer's expert inadmissible opinion as to reasons why one should conclude a gun to be stolen." Finally, "[t]he nature of the evidence alone without further analysis compels a conclusion that the law enforcement officers' testimony prejudiced [defendant]."

- 2013: People v. Barnes, 965 N.Y.S.2d 488 (N.Y. App. Div. 2013). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to investigate prior to trial, which resulted in counsel advancing an unsupported theory of defense during trial. The defendant was arrested in a “buy and bust” operation where he was arrested just moments after a sell drugs in a Ziploc bag to an undercover officer by other officers. At the time of his arrest, he had five Ziploc bags containing drugs, but did not possess the pre-recorded buy money used by the undercover officer to pay for the drugs. Counsel’s prior argument during trial was that the purple Ziploc bag of drugs sold to the officer did not match the Ziploc bags found on the defendant. During closing arguments, counsel sought permission to open the heat-sealed evidence bags to display the evidence to the jury, but the court denied the motion. “Counsel then urged the jurors to examine the evidence themselves.” During deliberations, the jury asked to do exactly that and the court unsealed the evidence, which revealed that “all the bags did match.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient for failing to examine this evidence pretrial. Prejudice was also clear as the defense counsel committed “self-sabotage” and “undermined his own credibility” and his error went to “the heart” of the defense. The error also undermined the defendant’s credibility as he testified based on the understanding from counsel that the bags did not match. Even with this blunder, the jury requested to rehear some of the evidence, requested additional instructions, and announced deadlock resulting in an Allen charge before finally reaching a verdict.
- 2011: State v. Fowers, 265 P.3d 832 (Utah Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in criminal solicitation case involving two teenage boys for eliciting testimony about the defendant’s 25-year-old conviction for sodomy on a child after the trial court had ruled the evidence would be excluded. Counsel apparently believed that the defendant could be cross-examined about the prior if he testified and had advised the defendant not to testify. The defendant did testify and counsel elicited information about the prior in direct. The defendant admitted contact with the boys but denied solicitation. Prejudice was established. Without the evidence of the prior, the jury might have been more inclined to believe the defendant rather than the boys, who were both residents of a juvenile detention facility and attended the same alternative high school. Thus, “unlike multiple victims who are strangers to one another, the boys here had an opportunity to collaborate on their version of events.” Moreover, the jury acquitted with respect to one of the alleged victims in this “classic credibility contest.” The prior “may have influenced [the jury] to convict [the defendant] on at least one of the charges.
- 2007: People v. Bailey, 872 N.E.2d 420 (Ill.Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in bench trial for possession of crack with intent to distribute for eliciting damaging evidence in cross-examination. A police officer testified that he observed an “unknown person” yelling “Rocks” to passing cars. When cars stopped, he would direct them to an alley where the defendant would exchange money for drugs. The officer witnessed four such transactions in about 35 minutes before arresting the defendant who had cash and drugs on him. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because during cross counsel elicited further information that the officer witnessed the defendant provide money to the “unknown person” several times and included that information in his case report, which counsel either had not read or did not think about. Counsel’s lack of knowledge of the report, failure to move to strike the officer’s initial non-responsive answer, and “digging the hole deeper” with further questioning was not explicable by any valid trial strategy. Prejudice found because this was “key” evidence in the case and the trial court clearly relied on it and said so.

Capital Case*

Robertson v. State*, 214 S.W.3d 665 (Tex. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in aggravated assault case for eliciting testimony from the defendant that he was incarcerated on two convictions and that he was in possession of a knife at the time of the previous arrests. Prejudice found because this testimony opened the door for the state to elicit testimony on cross-examination that the defendant had two prior drug convictions with “deadly weapon findings on both charges.” The state used this evidence in argument to undermine the defendant’s credibility in arguing self-defense.

2006: Glancy v. State, 941 So. 2d 1201 (Fla. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in burglary with a sexual battery case for eliciting damaging character evidence against the defendant. Specifically, counsel’s conduct was deficient for eliciting testimony from the alleged victim that she did not like the defendant because he gave her minor children pot, booze, and cigarettes and because she believed that he had been breaking into her house for two years, stealing her underwear, and leaving “dirty magazines” behind. Counsel also elicited testimony from her son that the alleged victim did not like the defendant because he had been “in and out of prison.” Prejudice found.

Bowers v. State*, 929 So. 2d 1199 (Fla. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in burglary and grand theft case for questioning the defendant concerning his prior criminal convictions and eliciting numerous details that the State would not have been entitled to elicit since the state's examination would have been limited to the number of felony convictions or convictions for misdemeanors involving dishonesty or false statement. Prejudice found because there was no physical evidence and the trial hinged on credibility issues. By eliciting information concerning prior convictions for burglary and grand theft, trial counsel impugned his client's credibility in front of the jury. While counsel's strategy to be completely candid with the jury so that the defendant's testimony would be more believable, "counsel's execution of the strategy defeated the intent" because the information was presented in such a manner, due to counsel's failure to properly prepare with the defendant, that it appeared the defendant was trying to withhold some information. Thus, the court held "that counsel's strategy to bolster his client's credibility with candor was 'patently unreasonable.'"

2005: Whitaker v. State, 622 S.E.2d 916 (Ga. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for introducing an unredacted copy of previous convictions for two of the state's key witnesses that also showed that the defendant had been charged with the same crimes (possession of tools for the commission of a crime, criminal trespass, and burglary). Counsel's conduct was deficient and not explained simply by counsel's strategy to impeach the witnesses. Counsel "did not offer any explanation for failing to redact the exhibits, which she knew implicated her client in other crimes." Prejudice found because the state's case rested primarily on the testimony of these two alleged accomplices. The evidence showing that the defendant had been previously charged along with these witnesses was especially damaging because it "may have caused the jury to give additional credence to the testimony of the state's star witnesses."

People v. Orta*, 836 N.E.2d 811 (Ill.Ct.App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in bench trial for possession of drugs with intent to deliver drugs case for eliciting testimony from police officers that enabled the State to prove an essential element of the charge. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel elicited information that a prior "control transaction" in which the defendant sold drugs to an informant, over the state's objection. Counsel also elicited testimony that there were a lot of male clothes in the apartment (when the defendant's argument was that he had no control or possession) and the drugs were found in a shaving bag, along with money, a scale, and the defendant's mail, which the state later attempted to move into evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient. "A person charged with a crime has the right to expect his lawyer's questions to prosecution witnesses will not help the State prove its accusations." Prejudice found primarily because counsel elicited testimony about the prior "control transaction" with the state objecting and the trial court trying to discourage counsel from presenting this evidence. Counsel's reason for offering this evidence was because he was attacking the officer's credibility. The court rejected this as a valid strategy. This evidence was prejudicial because the court relied on it in finding an intent to deliver. The evidence about the clothes was also prejudicial because the court relied on it in finding constructive possession. Without all of the evidence elicited by the defense counsel the state's case for possession was solely that the defendant had keys to the apartment where the drugs were found.

2004: *State v. Davis, 872 So. 2d 250 (Fla. 2004). Counsel ineffective in capital case for his statements during voir dire expressing racial animus and admitting his own racial prejudice where the Defendant, an African-American male who was 22 at the time, was accused of stabbing to death a 73-year-old white woman, but there was no apparent racial motivation for the crime. During voir dire counsel stated, “Sometimes I just don’t like black people. Sometimes black people make me mad just because they’re black.” In closing in sentencing, counsel reminded the jurors that none had expressed the same feelings and that they promised not to consider race. Counsel’s strategy in making the comments was to get the jurors to “drop the mask” and acknowledge hidden feelings about race. The court found that “an explicit expression of racial prejudice can[not] be considered a legitimate tactical approach. Whether or not counsel is in fact a racist, his expressions of prejudice against African-Americans cannot be tolerated.” Prejudice was found because “the expressions of racial animus voiced by trial counsel” would have “unnecessarily tended either to alienate jurors who did not share his animus against African Americans . . . or to legitimize racial prejudice without accomplishing counsel’s stated objective of bringing latent bias out into the open.” Counsel’s expressions of racial bias also may have affected his performance in both the guilt and penalty phases of trial. In the guilt phase, trial counsel rested without presenting a case, rather than present two African-American witnesses whose testimony would have implicated others in the murder because another white witness would contradict their testimony and counsel found the white witness to be more credible. The trial court also found counsel to be ineffective in sentencing for failing to obtain records and witnesses and never visiting the Defendant’s family or neighborhood.

People v. Morris, 807 N.E.2d 377, overruled on other grounds, 813 N.E.2d 93 (Ill. 2004). Counsel ineffective in capital case for discussing in great detail an unrelated murder committed by the defendant in opening, even though the trial court had previously agreed to exclude all evidence of the unrelated murder from trial. Defendant was charged, along with several codefendants, with the robbery and murder in Chicago of someone believed to be a drug dealer. Several days before, the defendant had killed a man in a drug-deal gone bad scenario. In opening counsel conceded the defendant’s participation in the charged crimes and discussed the unrelated murder in great detail. The defendant subsequently testified with respect to his involvement in both murders and the state offered evidence on both. In closing argument, the State repeatedly reminded the jury of the unrelated murder. Counsel conceded guilt in opening because her strategy was to minimize the defendant’s culpability and essentially plead for jury nullification. While this was a proper strategy, in light of the significant evidence against the defendant, the problem in this case is that counsel also conceded guilt to an unrelated murder that had been excluded from the state’s case prior to trial. Counsel did so because she misunderstood the court’s pretrial ruling to allow the state to use this evidence in rebuttal. Likewise, the defendant’s acquiescence was immaterial because it was undoubtedly based on the same misunderstanding. Thus, counsel’s actions “were not the product of an informed, strategic choice. Rather, these actions were the product of a mistaken belief that the trial court had ruled evidence of the [unrelated] murder admissible at trial when, in fact, the trial court had ruled just the opposite.” Prejudice was found because of the “severe repercussions at trial.” First, counsel’s jury nullification strategy was dependent on the jury sympathizing with the defendant to some extent. This strategy was completely destroyed by evidence of the defendant’s guilt of the unrelated murder committed just 36 hours before the charged offense. Thus, counsel’s actions “eviscerated the minimal trial strategy that was available to her.” “Counsel’s deficiencies in this case are distinguishable from typical trial error ‘not [in] degree but [in] kind.’ Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685, ----, 122 S.Ct. 1843, 1851, 152 L.Ed.2d 914, 928 (2002). For in all practical effect, as a result of defense counsel’s actions, defendant stood before the jury throughout the trial with no defensive strategy whatsoever.”

State v. Barr*, 814 N.E.2d 79 (Ohio Ct. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in fleeing and eluding case for opening the door in cross-examination of a police officer to admission of the defendant’s statements that had previously been suppressed as involuntary. Prejudice found because without the statements there was no evidence the defendant knew he was being followed by police.

2003: Emilio v. State, 588 S.E.2d 797 (Ga. Ct. App. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in drug trafficking case for admitting evidence of bad character. The defendant and his girlfriend had been arrested following a traffic stop for drugs found in the car. The girlfriend, who had been driving, pled guilty to a lesser offense and testified at the defendant’s trial. During cross-examination of her, counsel offered into evidence a letter the girlfriend had written the defendant, which revealed that the girlfriend had asked the defendant to commit a crime, but also included a statement that the defendant was wanted in five different states. Counsel was ineffective for failing to redact the damaging portions of the letter or to even inform the jury that the defendant was not actually wanted in five states. Counsel’s conduct was prejudicial because the bad character evidence created a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different since the evidence of the defendant’s guilt was not overwhelming.

7. CONCEDING GUILT/CONTRADICTING CLIENT

a. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: United States v. Schaffer, 731 F.Supp.3d 382 (N.D. N.Y. 2024). In case involving charges of production, receipt, and possession of child pornography, defendant's general agreement to defense counsel's strategy of using the receipt and possession charges strategically to create the best circumstances for a potential compromise verdict to avoid conviction on the production charges did not permit defense counsel to unilaterally concede defendant's guilt of the receipt and possession charges during closing argument. Because defense counsel's concession violated defendant's Sixth Amendment right to autonomy, he is entitled to a new trial, not just reversal of the convictions that were the subject of the concession.

b. State Cases

2024: Floyd v. State, 898 S.E.2d 431 (Ga. 2024). In felony-murder case where murder conviction was predicated on petitioner's possession of a firearm by a felon, trial counsel was ineffective in his handling of the interplay between self-defense and felonious firearm possession. At trial, petitioner contended that he acted in self-defense, and he was acquitted of malice murder, felony-murder predicated on attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault, and two counts of aggravated assault. Although petitioner had not been indicted for felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, on the first day of the trial the State requested that the jury be charged on that theory as a lesser-included offense of malice murder, and the trial court so instructed the jury. Petitioner's sole defense was that he was acting in self-defense when he shot the victim. Trial counsel did not request a jury instruction under the statute that provided that self-defense was an absolute defense to various statutes criminalizing the carrying and possession of firearms, including the one prohibiting the possession of firearms by a convicted felon. (At petitioner's motion for new trial hearing, trial counsel conceded that he was unfamiliar with that statute at the time of trial.) Instead, during closing arguments, trial counsel told the jury that petitioner was guilty of felon-in-possession and that self-defense did not apply to the felon-in-possession count. Trial counsel failed to explain that, under the law, petitioner was justified in possessing the gun at the time he shot the victim if petitioner was acting in self-defense. Instead, trial counsel argued that self-defense applied to felony-murder if predicated on the attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault charges. At the start of its second full day of deliberations, the jury sent the court two questions. The first was: "Can [Appellant], as a convicted felon [sic] with a weapon, be justified to use a weapon (gun) to defend himself if he fears for his life?" After conferring with counsel, the trial court responded on the jury note: "Yes if he reasonably fears for his life." The second question was:

In the eyes of Georgia law what has precedence [sic]:

— self defense (at all costs)

— felon [sic] in possession of a weapon defending himself

Capital Case*

The trial court wrote in answer to that question, “That is an issue for you to decide.” Trial counsel did not object to that response, telling the trial court it was “correct.” The note with the responses was provided to the jury, which returned with its verdicts later that afternoon. Deficient performance is shown by trial counsel’s ignorance of the law which led to his failure to request a charge on the relevant statute, his failure to argue that self-defense applied to felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, and his agreement with the trial court’s response to the jury’s second question. “[N]o reasonable attorney would have agreed with the trial court’s response to the jury’s second question, which at best was a non-answer, and at worst, authorized the jury to convict on felony murder based on felon-in-possession even if it believed [petitioner’s] claim of self-defense.” Prejudice is established on the record of this case. Although the jury had been instructed that “[t]he fact that a person’s conduct is justified is a defense to prosecution for any crime based on that conduct,” the jury’s confusion was evident by its question of whether petitioner, as a convicted felon, could be justified to use a gun in self-defense. Petitioner met his burden of showing that but for the cumulative effect of counsel’s deficiencies, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different.

People v. Guerra*, 231 A.D.3d 852 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 2024). In case involving multiple counts of promoting a sexual performance by a child and possessing a sexual performance by a child, trial counsel was ineffective in signing, and permitting the jury to consider, a stipulation containing definitions of the charged crimes that eliminated the requisite mens rea element. All of the charges stemmed from videos and images affiliated with defendant’s laptop computer. In order to keep the actual videos from being viewed by the jury, defense counsel entered into the stipulation concerning the elements of the charged crimes which admitted to the content of the videos at issue. A reasonable reading of the language included in the stipulation was that possession alone was sufficient to meet the statutory requirements of the charged crimes, thereby eliminating the mens rea element. Although the trial court’s initial instruction to the jury included the accurate mental state language, the jury was read the stipulated language at the close of the People’s case. The focus of the defense was potential access by others in the household to the laptop. During deliberations, the jury requested a copy of the stipulation. Defense counsel objected and asked that the language in the stipulation be modified. This request was denied in light of defense counsel’s prior agreement to the stipulation. Thereafter, the jury sent a note asking if it was “bound by the parties[’] stipulation.” Defense counsel requested that the court either modify the stipulation or give the jury an appropriate instruction advising them of the required mens rea element of the charged crimes. Defense counsel contended that she had not intended to enter into a stipulation with strict liability if it was found that defendant owned the laptop, that he knew the images were there and that they depicted child sexual abuse. If that was how the stipulation was interpreted, defense counsel asserted she was “duty bound to ask for a mistrial based on ineffective assistance of counsel.” The mistrial motion was denied and defendant was convicted of the charged offenses. Defense counsel first erred by entering into a stipulation eliminating mens rea that undermined the defense theory that, although defendant owned the laptop, someone else in his high-occupancy house may have been responsible for the videos or images being placed on the laptop or being trafficked using the laptop. This error was compounded by defense counsel’s failure to object to its admission into evidence and its presentation to the jury at the close of the People’s case. The error was then further compounded by defense counsel’s failure to object to the disputed language in the stipulation until after the jury began its deliberations. Defendant was entitled to a new trial.

- 2018: People v. Miramontes, 116 N.E.3d 199 (Ill. Ct. App. 2018). In drug possession case, trial counsel was ineffective in stipulating to the weight of the drugs found in appellant's possession. Appellant was convicted at a bench trial of possession of between 400 and 900 grams of methamphetamine and sentenced to nine years in prison. On appeal, he argued that his conviction should be reduced to the lowest class of possessory offenses for methamphetamine because the state failed to prove that he possessed that specified amount of meth, and that his defense counsel was ineffective for stipulating to the weight of methamphetamine. Officers had commingled the substances they recovered – the substances had been in three bags and officers put them all in a single bag. The examining chemist weighed and tested the substance in the bag and measured it at 415 grams of a substance containing methamphetamine. Appellant argued that “the nonhomogenous substance recovered by police, which was originally in three separate bags, was commingled into one bag prior to testing, making it ‘impossible to know whether each of the bags contained methamphetamine, or whether the officers mixed what was mostly a legal substance with a small amount of methamphetamine to create 415 grams of a “substance containing methamphetamine.”” The Appellate Court found that while it was clear that defense counsel's strategy was to challenge whether appellant knowingly possessed the methamphetamine, that strategy did not require counsel to stipulate to the weight of the substance – the knowledge element is entirely separate from the weight element. Counsel could have challenged both elements. Counsel rendered deficient performance by failing to require the state to prove an important element of its case; there was no reasonable trial strategy that supported the stipulation. The deficient performance was prejudicial; exactly how much of the 415 grams of nonhomogenous substance contained methamphetamine is unknown; if counsel had not stipulated, and the chemist had testified that he or she did not know how much was methamphetamine, it is reasonably likely that there would have been a different outcome. No evidentiary hearing is necessary to determine this. The proper remedy is not to reduce the sentence, but to grant appellant a new trial.
- 2011: Benitez-Saldana v. State, 67 So.3d 320 (Fla. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in robbery and burglary with assault or battery for conceding that the defendant was guilty on both charges. Counsel informed the court prior to trial that he would concede theft, consistent with the defendant's statement to police. During cross-examination and argument, however, counsel conceded facts sufficient to establish both charges. Thus, while counsel argued the defendant was not guilty of the charged crimes, he made factual assertions that amounted to admissions to the charges. These admissions “were unintentional and not a matter of trial strategy.” Even assuming counsel was attempting to convince the jury to misapply the law, this was not a reasonable strategy when the jury could have acquitted if it believed the defendant's statement. Prejudice found as “this case boiled down to a credibility contest” and the state's case was not overwhelming.
- 2010: State v. Maready, 695 S.E.2d 771 (N.C. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was per se ineffective in murder case for conceding guilt of involuntary manslaughter in closing arguments. Because North Carolina courts require the defendant's explicit consent prior to any concession of guilt, even after Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175 (2004), reversal was required. The record did not reflect that “Defendant was asked if he consented to these admissions, or that Defendant had given informed and voluntary consent to these admissions of his guilt.”

Capital Case*

2009: *Cooke v. State, 977 A.2d 803 (Del. Supr. Ct. 2009). Prejudice was presumed, on direct appeal, due to ineffective assistance of counsel and the trial court's failure to intervene when defense counsel pursued a guilty but mentally ill verdict over the objection of the defendant and while the defendant was arguing and testifying that he was innocent and not mentally ill. The trial court was informed of the conflict more than a year prior to trial. The defendant repeatedly objected to counsel's theory. The state moved in limine to preclude defense counsel from presenting the defense over the defendant's objections. Nonetheless, the trial court did not inquire and made no real effort to resolve the conflict. From defense counsel's opening statement focusing entirely on pursuit of a GBMI verdict, the stage was set for chaos. Throughout the state's case, there were repeated outbursts by the defendant in the jury's presence and in the jury's absence, all related to his objections to the GBMI defense. The defendant was removed from the courtroom at times. During some of those times, he was not even allowed to watch the proceedings. During other times, he was in a holding cell watching the proceedings by television. Some of the removals from the courtroom were requested by defense counsel. During the defense case, counsel presented evidence that the defendant confessed to a mental health expert, although the defendant in his own testimony denied making the statement. Defense counsel did not question the defendant during his testimony. He was instead allowed to testify on direct without anyone questioning him. In his testimony, he informed the jury that he disagreed with defense counsel, that he was innocent, and that he was not mentally ill. The defendant was excluded from the courtroom during the state's rebuttal, summations, and the charge, but watched by television. Defense counsel argued that the defendant's denials of mental illness was proof of it and argued that the defendant was guilty despite his testimony that he was innocent. After conviction, defense counsel continued to assert the defendant's guilt in sentencing, but argued that his mental illness was mitigating. The court held that the trial court violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights by permitting defense counsel's arguments and by failing to inquire into the issue and to resolve it. "[C]ounsel cannot undermine the defendant's right to make . . . personal and fundamental decisions by ignoring the defendant's choice and arguing affirmatively against the defendant's chosen objective." Here, counsel's actions infringed the defendant's right to plead not guilty and negated the defendant's right to testify in his own defense. Counsel refused to call him, although they believed his claims of innocence were due to mental illness rather than perjury. They also presented evidence of his confession to a mental health expert without obtaining the defendant's waiver of the psychotherapist-patient privilege. Counsel also deprived the defendant of his right to an impartial jury because counsel stated from the opening that he was guilty but mentally ill. The jury's impartiality was also likely affected by the defendant's frequent outbursts and his absences from the courtroom when these were caused by defense counsel's actions. The effect on the jury is also "apparent" from counsel's argument directly contradicting the defendant's testimony and asserting his guilt despite his not guilty plea and claims of innocence. The impartiality of the jury was also compromised in sentencing because counsel conceded the presence of the aggravating factors that made the defendant death eligible. This situation was not comparable to that in Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175 (2004) because the defendant here did not acquiesce silently to counsel's actions. Here, the defendant adamantly objected repeatedly to counsel's actions prior to and during trial. Thus, this was not a situation where the standard from Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984) was applicable. This was a case to be reviewed under United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984). There was a breakdown in the adversarial system in this case in two ways.

Capital Case*

First, counsel did not “assist” the defendant in obtaining his objective of a not guilty verdict. Second:

[C]ounsel not only failed to subject the prosecution’s case to meaningful adversarial testing, but also undermined the due process requirement that the State prove [the defendant’s] guilt—and his eligibility for the death penalty—beyond a reasonable doubt. . . . [O]n the issue of his guilt and his eligibility for a death sentence—the elements of capital murder—[the] defense attorneys’ alignment with the prosecutors was complete.

Counsel’s conduct “was inherently prejudicial and does not require a separate showing of prejudice.” Reversal was also required due to the trial court’s failure to inquire into the propriety of the representation. In essence, the trial court failed to protect the defendant’s right to a fair trial “by failing to intervene and provide a remedy for this error, notwithstanding [the defendant’s] explicit requests.” “In this instance, the trial judge’s obligation to ensure that the defendant receives a fair trial required the trial judge to instruct counsel not to pursue a verdict of guilty but mentally ill against [the defendant’s] wishes.”

2004: In re Welfare of B.R.C., 675 N.W.2d 348 (Minn. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in juvenile damaging property case where counsel conceded the juvenile’s guilt of shooting at a pickup truck and the record failed to show that the juvenile consented in this strategy. The court declined to assume acquiescence. “Given a juvenile’s lack of maturity, we believe that a juvenile defendant’s consent should be express and placed on the record before a concession of guilt can be made.” Counsel’s concession was inconsistent with the juvenile’s prior statements to police and the statements of his accomplices. Counsel’s references to admissions in the juvenile’s withdrawn guilty plea were improper, because evidence regarding a withdrawn guilty plea may not be admitted in a criminal trial under state law. Counsel apparently made the concession in an attempt to convince the court to find the juvenile guilty of a misdemeanor and avoid a felony conviction. “While it may be a reasonable trial strategy to concede an adult defendant’s guilt to a lesser-included offense in the hope of persuading the fact finder to acquit him or her of the greater charge, juvenile dispositions are not necessarily tied to a misdemeanor/felony distinction. Thus, the strategy of appellant’s attorney was not reasonable in this juvenile proceeding.” Counsel also incorrectly assumed that by conceding guilt to a misdemeanor, the juvenile could not be held accountable for the entire amount of restitution.

State v. Matthews, 591 S.E.2d 535 (N.C. 2004). Prejudice presumed in capital trial where defense counsel conceded the defendant’s guilt to second degree murder without the defendant’s consent, which must be established by “more than implicit consent based on an overall trial strategy and the defendant’s intelligence.”

People v. Washington*, 785 N.Y.S.2d 885 (N.Y. County Ct. 2004). Counsel ineffective in robbery case for conceding guilt to a lesser included offense where the defendant did not consent and objected during the trial to counsel’s strategy. While counsel’s strategy was sound, “an attorney cannot concede guilt at trial . . . without consent of the accused” because this is the equivalent of a guilty plea which “must be entered voluntarily by the defendant.” While the court acknowledged that most courts reviewing this issue require a showing of prejudice under Strickland and that such an analysis might result in affirmance, the court held that New York courts have declined to follow Strickland because “the state constitution has been interpreted to set a higher standard of effectiveness for criminal attorneys than the federal constitution.” Here, counsel’s concession not only denied the effective assistance of counsel but also denied the defendant a fair trial because the state was not required to prove identification.

8. INSTRUCTIONS

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2020: Tyson v. Superintendent Houtzdale SCI, 976 F.3d 382 (3rd Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S.Ct. 1737 (2021). In double-murder case where petitioner was convicted of first-degree murder as an accomplice, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to jury instructions that permitted the jury to find petitioner guilty without the requisite intent to kill. The evidence at trial showed that petitioner provided the actual killer, Powell, with his gun and Powell exited the vehicle petitioner was driving and shot the two victims. (Petitioner, Powell, and a third man, George, had been following the victims after petitioner told his friends that the victims had pulled a gun on him.) Looking to the instructions as a whole, no language could be found that would lead the jury to connect the requisite intent to kill to the role of an accomplice. Because the instructions eradicated the prosecution's burden to prove the mens rea element of an intentional killing, it plainly violated petitioner's due process rights and trial counsel acted unreasonably in failing to object. This failure "was particularly glaring given that the prosecutor's closing argument contained the same erroneous interpretation of Pennsylvania law" as the instructions, with the prosecutor telling the jury that "whoever was involved in this shooting is a murderer. Either the shooter, or any helper, who under Pennsylvania law, is an accomplice." This blatant misstatement of the law increased the likelihood that the instructions would be interpreted in a manner to eliminate the mens rea element. The state court's ruling that the instructions did not warrant an objection by trial counsel was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Regarding prejudice, a deferential lens is applied pursuant to AEDPA despite the state courts not having ruled on this prong of Strickland. In characterizing the evidence, the state courts correctly recognized petitioner's intent to kill could be proven through circumstantial evidence. The courts ignored, however, circumstantial evidence that could have supported the opposite conclusion. Notably, trial counsel argued that the prosecution's evidence failed to establish intent to kill in an unsuccessful motion for judgment of acquittal on the first-degree murder charge. This made counsel's failure to object to the instruction, "which did not require the jury to find any agreement to kill," inexplicable. "Had counsel requested the court include the mens rea element of accomplice liability in its instruction, there is a substantial probability that the jury could have found that [petitioner] lacked the intent to kill. [Citation omitted.] Because the deficient instruction hindered the jury's assessment of important circumstantial evidence, it would be unreasonable to conclude that [petitioner] was not prejudiced by counsel's failure to object."

2018: Baer v. Neal*, 879 F.3d 769 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 586 U.S. 1045 (2018). In capital case from Indiana, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to improper and confusing penalty phase jury instructions as well as improper prosecutorial statements and the deficient performance was prejudicial as to the death sentence. Petitioner was convicted of two murders, robbery, theft, and attempted rape arising from a murder of a woman and her four-year-old daughter in their home. Petitioner had admitted that he had committed the crimes and sought to plead guilty but mentally ill, but the trial court rejected the plea, finding insufficient evidence of mental illness. At the penalty phase, the defense presented the testimony of Dr. Mark Cunningham, who described petitioner's social history, including prenatal and perinatal difficulties such as his mother's alcohol use and cancer while pregnant, petitioner's childhood in and out of foster care, the murder of his sister, his ADHD, head injuries, and substance abuse. Regarding the penalty phase instructions, trial counsel failed to object to modification of a jury instruction that eliminated intoxication as a basis for finding that the defendant lacked the capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of the law. Counsel also failed to object to the improper definition of intoxication as requiring involuntariness of the intoxication. Because counsel essentially failed to object to the removal of a mitigating factor from the jurors' consideration, the Seventh Circuit found his performance deficient under Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978). The state court's analysis of the jury instructions in isolation rather than in the context of the overall charge was unreasonable because a juror could have understood the complete penalty phase instructions as foreclosing evidence of voluntary intoxication from consideration for all purposes in sentencing. The timing under which the instructions were given was also important; although the instructions were a correct statement of the law with regard to the mens rea of the crime, and the aggravating factors, they were not correct statements of the law with regard to the mitigating factors. But the instructions were given at the penalty phase, and not in conjunction with the aggravating factor instructions, but rather at the end of the charges as a whole. The jurors also were given the general mitigation instruction that there were no limits on what they could consider mitigating much earlier and at a different time from the voluntary intoxication instruction, and language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction does not suffice to absolve the infirmity under Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). "It is unreasonable to assume jurors could catch the nuance that voluntary intoxication can be considered for mitigation, but not as evidence of criminal intent, without any clear instruction." 879 F.3d at 779. Trial counsel's failure to object was deficient, and the state court unreasonably found otherwise. The error was prejudicial because evidence of petitioner's mental health and drug use was the cornerstone both of the defense at guilt phase and also the defense's sole strategy for avoiding a death sentence, and the instruction blocked consideration of this crucial mitigating evidence. It was unreasonable of the state court to conclude otherwise. Regarding statements by the prosecutor, the prosecutor repeatedly made improper and prejudicial comments, and trial counsel and the trial court failed to address them, introducing doubt into the reliability of the results of the penalty phase trial. First, the prosecutor improperly conflated the standards of guilty but mentally ill and the legal defense of insanity. The insanity defense, which requires a finding that defendant has a severely abnormal mental condition that renders him unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct at the time of the offense" is a defense to intent and to guilt, while the guilty but mentally ill issue requires a finding that defendant suffers from an illness that "disturbs thinking, feeling, or behavior, and impairs ability to function" and has effect at the penalty phase but not at the guilt phase because it does not have an effect on his conviction. The prosecutor conflated these terms throughout the trial, starting during voir dire. The state court found that counsel's failure to object was "likely" strategic because counsel testified that he knew the prosecutor was capable of overstating his case and he was planning to correctly state the law to the jury. The Seventh Circuit found this analysis unreasonable, because "hoping the jury would decide that the prosecutor was not credible" is not strategic, especially where the difference between insanity and GBMI was never clarified. Second, the prosecutor repeatedly told the jurors (again beginning during voir dire) that the victims' family members wanted the jury to impose the death penalty. Trial counsel objected only one time to the violations of Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991). The state court acknowledged that the prosecutor's statements were problematic, but erroneously found that the prosecutor told the jury he misspoke – this did not occur. Furthermore, the trial court repeatedly stated that the court was not listening, and “missed numerous opportunities to stop or clarify the prosecutor’s statements and his absence was noticeable throughout trial.” 879 F.3d at 786. Third, the prosecutor stated personal opinions and introduced facts not in evidence directing the jurors toward a death penalty verdict. For example, he said that it was possible that Indiana was going to change the law so LWOP would no longer be an option – there was no basis for this speculation. He also compared petitioner’s crime to that of others he had personally seen and experienced. Petitioner’s counsel did not object. And just because defense counsel argued that petitioner’s crime wasn’t the worst of the worst did not permit the prosecutor to argue what he did. “[J]ust because defense counsel cracked open the door to these subjects, it did not permit the prosecutor to drive a truck through it. The seditious and specific comments about the prosecutor’s own mother, the community’s layoffs, and 9/11 were all not hard blows, but beyond the pale foul ones.” 879 F.3d at 787. It was unreasonable for trial counsel not to object. The state court’s finding that the prosecutor’s improper comments did not cumulatively affect the outcome of the trial was unreasonable – the state court failed to aggregate prejudice even though it claimed to do so. “[I]t is nearly impossible that the comments did not impact the juror’s [sic] decision to recommend the death penalty.” 879 F.3d at 788. “[The prosecutor’s] misstatements were prolific and harmful to [petitioner’s] case, yet [petitioner’s] trial counsel failed to object at every opportunity. [The prosecutor’s] comments began in voir dire, where his comments conditioned jurors to believe that [petitioner] was a liar, that mental illness was a ‘copout’ and ‘defense,’ that [petitioner] should not receive a GBMI conviction because he appreciated the wrongfulness of his actions (improperly using the insanity defense standard), life without parole was at a high risk of providing release, and the [victims’] family wanted a death sentence. All these comments were made before the jury heard any evidence in [petitioner’s] case. Then at the close of penalty phase, [the prosecutor] again injected inflammatory comments and facts not in evidence, including remarks about [the prosecutor’s] mother’s prostitution, people being laid off to afford the state’s pursuit of the death penalty, and [petitioner’s] crime being worse than any of the prior 125 murders [the prosecutor] had heard of in his career in law enforcement. . . . Can we be certain that [petitioner] would not have been sentenced to death if given a fair trial and effective counsel? No. But it is ‘reasonably likely’ that without the prosecutor’s injection of impermissible statements and incorrect law the jurors would not have recommended death.” 879 F.3d at 788-89.

2017: Bey v. Superintendent, Greene SCI, 856 F.3d 230 (3rd Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 583 U.S. 1098 (2018). The Third Circuit granted relief in this Pennsylvania non-capital murder case, finding that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to an erroneous jury instruction on eyewitness testimony, and that state post-conviction counsel’s inadequate failure to assert that claim in state court constituted “cause” to overcome the resulting procedural default. Petitioner was charged with the shootings of two people, one fatal and one non-fatal. The “key witness” at his trial was a police officer, whose “certain and unequivocal” eyewitness identification of petitioner was the prosecution’s strongest evidence. 856 F.3d at 233. The claim addressed by the Third Circuit arose when the trial court agreed to give a “Kloiber charge” concerning eyewitness testimony, then – without objection from trial counsel – gave a version of the charge that was “critically inconsistent with” state law. Id. at 234. “A proper charge under Kloiber,” the Third Circuit explained, “informs the jury that it has the ultimate discretion of deciding whether to credit positive eyewitness testimony. Instead, the trial court’s instruction essentially required the jury to accept positive eyewitness testimony as true by directing that ‘testimony as to the identification may not be received with caution.’” 856 F.3d at 238 (emphasis by the court); see also id. at 239-40 (“The charge removed the discretion that the jury could otherwise have exercised that may have raised a reasonable doubt in the mind of one or more jurors about the identity of the shooter.”). When petitioner later sought state post-conviction relief, his post-conviction counsel alleged that trial counsel had been ineffective for failing to object to three other aspects of the charge, but not the “may not” language targeted in the federal habeas petition that followed. On appeal from the denial of federal habeas relief, the Third Circuit accepted and agreed with petitioner’s concession that the “specific ineffective assistance claim” he advanced was procedurally defaulted notwithstanding the state court’s adjudication of three other claims based on the same defective jury charge. The court then examined the merits of the ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim to determine whether it was “substantial,” such that post-conviction counsel’s failure to raise it constituted “cause” under Martinez v. Ryan, and if so, whether it required a grant of habeas relief. Both inquiries were resolved in petitioner’s favor. After explaining that “the faulty Kloiber instruction deprived [petitioner] of his due process right to have the prosecution prove every element beyond a reasonable doubt,” 856 F.3d at 241, the Third Circuit held that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to object: “Clearly, this instruction could be reasonably understood as requiring the jury to accept an eyewitness’s identification of [petitioner] as the shooter. Indeed, that was what the jurors were told. We can think of no strategic reason for defense counsel not to object to a charge that raises such due process concerns.” Id. With regard to prejudice, the court rejected the state’s contention that the prosecution had presented an “overwhelming case,” explaining that, “[a]t [petitioner’s] first trial, nearly identical evidence resulted in a hung jury,” and that two jury questions at petitioner’s second trial (which yielded the judgment at issue here) indicated that the officer’s eyewitness “testimony may well have been a source of concern.” Id. at 243. Because the erroneous charge left the jury with “no room ... to conclude that [the officer], though certain, was wrong,” the court added, “the prosecution was unconstitutionally relieved of its burden of proving [petitioner] was the shooter beyond a reasonable doubt,” and petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel’s failure to object. Id. Finally, returning to the question of “cause” under Martinez, the Third Circuit concluded that petitioner had made the requisite showing. See 856 F.3d at 244.

2015: Crace v. Herzog, 798 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in felony attempted second-degree assault case for failing to request an instruction on the misdemeanor lesser-included offense of unlawful display of a weapon. The defendant, who had consumed a great deal of drugs and alcohol, was hallucinating and believed that someone was out to kill him. He was running down the street with a sword at night and screaming for help. When he spotted an officer, he ran towards him seeking protection. When the officer pulled his weapon and ordered him to stop, the defendant dropped the sword but continued running towards the officer because he was afraid. He stopped seven feet from the officer and got down on the ground. The Washington Court of Appeals found deficient conduct and prejudice, but the Washington Supreme Court reversed, without deciding whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, because the court found no prejudice. In doing so, the state court assumed the jury would have reached the same verdict even if it had been instructed on the lesser-included-offense because the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict reached. By doing so, the state court “in essence converted Strickland’s prejudice inquiry into a sufficiency-of-the-evidence question.” “This approach to Strickland is not merely wrong, but ‘objectively unreasonable’ under AEDPA.” This issue was thus entitled to de novo review. The defendant was entitled to the lesser-included offense instruction because there was evidence to support an inference that the defendant displayed the sword without any intent to create reasonable fear or apprehension of bodily injury, which is the specific intent required for assault and attempted assault. The defense presented lay and expert testimony in support of a diminished capacity defense. Prejudice was clear, because with proper instruction, “a jury could rationally choose to convict Crace only of unlawful display of a weapon.” Because the Washington Supreme Court did not address whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, that question was also reviewed de novo. Where counsel admitted that he did not consider the issue, the “failure to request the instruction was neither strategic nor deliberate.” Failure to consider the issue was deficient performance. Even if counsel had considered the issue and then failed to request the instruction, counsel’s actions would still be “manifestly unreasonable.”

Lee v. Clarke*, 781 F.3d 114 (4th Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in second degree murder case for failing to request a manslaughter and heat of passion instruction. The state court decision to the contrary was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law set forth in Strickland. The victim died of multiple stab wounds to the chest. The state’s evidence included a history of disputes between the defendant and the alleged victim. A state witness testified that the decedent approached the defendant “ready to fight” and struck the defendant multiple times. As they were fighting the witness heard the decedent yell that the defendant had stabbed him. The decedent then ran up the road holding his chest with the defendant following attacking from behind until two of the decedent’s friends intervened. The defendant said “I’m gonna kill him” before running away. Following the state case, counsel moved to strike the first degree murder charge due to lack of premeditation and to proceed only on second degree murder or manslaughter. The court denied both motions. The defendant testified, along with his friend who was present. The defendant testified that the decedent attacked him and had him on the ground before he pulled out his pocket knife and stabbed the decedent. The friend did not see the stabbing but first saw the two men getting up off the ground and the decedent running away saying he had been stabbed. The defendant then got up and left. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the court’s charge, which included second degree murder and manslaughter but did not include the “full model instruction” from the “Virginia Model Jury Instructions” on heat of passion. Counsel did, however, in closing arguments attempt to distinguish between malice and heat of passion. The jury sent out three notes during deliberations asking for clarification on premeditation and indicating a hung jury. The court repeated the initial instructions and gave an Allen charge without objection by defense counsel. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to request the appropriate instructions. The state did not contest this and the state court did not address this aspect in its analysis. The court analyzed it, nonetheless, and found counsel’s conduct deficient. With respect to prejudice, “the undisputed testimony that [the decedent struck the defendant] first demonstrates that the state habeas court’s Strickland analysis fails to perceive the prejudice created by the lack of a definitional heat of passion instruction.” The defendant was given an instruction on manslaughter, but not an instruction defining heat of passion. While the state argued no prejudice based on defense counsel’s argument, “it is well established that ‘arguments of counsel generally carry less weight with a jury than . . . instructions from the court.’” Id. at 125 (quoting Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370, 384 (1990)).

Capital Case*

A court issued jury instruction carries the command and force of law in a way that a statement by counsel cannot, and thus prejudice that arises from a flawed or omitted jury instruction is not cured by mere argument.

Additionally, counsel's argument did not actually include the language of the model instruction or attempt to define heat of passion. Prejudice established.

2010: United States v. Luck, 611 F.3d 183 (4th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to request an "informant instruction," when the government's evidence consisted only of the investigating officer and two paid informants. One of the informants approached police offering assistance because "she wanted to reduce her exposure for a robbery charge she was facing." The other approached police to benefit the first informant, who was the mother of his child, and to "earn money." While a buy in which the first informant was wired was conducted, the image and sound quality was too poor to record events. The officer also did not do a thorough search of the informant prior to the "buy." A search warrant of the defendant's house revealed scales and baggies commonly used to package narcotics, but no drugs. Without deciding "whether and when an informant instruction is required," the court held that "on these facts . . . counsel erred in failing to request an informant instruction." "This case presents the classic case of a professional informant paid for his services," with "little corroborating evidence." "[A] reasonable lawyer would have been concerned that the uncorroborated testimony of paid informants could have been 'manufactured . . . out of whole cloth' for the benefit of the informant alone. Because "counsel's defense strategy seem[ed] to be focused on discrediting the government's witnesses," there was no indication counsel's failure to request the instruction was strategy. Prejudice established, even though the court gave "general instructions" on witness credibility. "[T]he informant instruction is sui generis; it alerts jurors to the potentially unique problems that inhere where an individual is paid to inculcate a defendant."

2005: Cox v. Donnelly, 432 F.3d 388 (2nd Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in second degree murder case for failing to object to an erroneous jury instruction that impermissibly shifted to the defendant the burden of proving that he did not intend "the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." The failure was due to counsel's "ignorance of the law on point." Under AEDPA, the state court holding was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

2004: Reagan v. Norris, 365 F.3d 616 (8th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in first-degree murder case for failing to object to the trial court's instructions that failed to include an essential element of the crime – that the defendant "knowingly" caused the death. Counsel conceded that the failure to object was not strategic. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the jury could have believed every aspect of the defense case (that the death was accidental) and still convicted of first-degree murder under the erroneous instructions.

b. U.S. District Court Case

2023: Vando v. Clark, 652 F.Supp.3d 509 (E.D. Pa. 2023). In case where petitioner was convicted of third-degree murder in gang-related killing, district court accepts the findings and recommendations by the magistrate judge and grants relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an erroneous reasonable doubt instruction. In explaining the concept of reasonable doubt to the jury, the trial court's instructions included a hypothetical involving the decision-making process one would go through when faced with a loved one suffering from a life-threatening condition who has surgery recommended for treatment. (Similar versions of this hypothetical have been found constitutionally infirm by some federal district courts but not others.) The instruction at issue here "essentially told the jury . . . to assume that 'the only appropriate protocol for that life-threatening condition was surgery.'" Thus, under this scenario, the only reasonable hope for the loved one was surgery and so the family member would likely take action notwithstanding substantial doubts that the procedure would actually save the loved one's life. The inclusion of this hypothetical rendered the reasonable doubt instruction unconstitutional. In finding to the contrary, the state court unreasonably applied clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court. Once the state court acknowledged that the trial court's analogy was "at best ambiguous," the unconstitutionality of the instruction was established as there was no way of knowing whether the jury in fact applied the correct law. Also flawed was the state court's conclusion that trial counsel did not perform deficiently in failing to object because no binding precedent existed at the time of trial condemning the hypothetical. In light of Cage and Sullivan, where the Supreme Court held that "grave uncertainty" and "moral uncertainty" deserved no place in a reasonable doubt instruction, the failure of trial counsel to object was ineffective. In finding prejudice, it is noted that no eyewitness saw petitioner in possession of the murder weapon on the night of the incident or shoot the victim. And although evidence showed that petitioner led the victim out the back door of the bar after a confrontation began between the victim and petitioner's fellow gang members, that petitioner then punched the victim (causing him to fall to the ground), and petitioner thereafter bragged about his involvement in the homicide to his fellow inmates and other gang members, there was no physical evidence linking petitioner to the actual shooting. "Given the lack of physical evidence or witness testimony suggesting that Petitioner knew or intended the victim to be shot combined with the confusing jury instruction," there is a reasonable likelihood that petitioner would have been acquitted or the jury hung (as a prior jury had) if a constitutional reasonable doubt instruction had been given to the jury. Note: Although the Commonwealth had conceded that the writ should be granted, the district court concluded that it had an independent duty to determine whether a constitutional violation had occurred.

Benjamin v. Kelly*, 2023 WL 405027 (D. Or. Jan. 24, 2023). Petitioner was entitled to relief from his manslaughter conviction due to ineffective assistance by his trial counsel in: (1) failing to object to the trial court's response to a jury question about the manslaughter instruction; (2) failing to object to the instruction limiting the use of the three spontaneous confessions by the person petitioner claimed had actually stabbed the victim, causing his death; and (3) withdrawing a request for an instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. The case involved a violent encounter between four people: the victim, petitioner, Harris, and Harris's stepson. According to Harris and her stepson, petitioner stabbed the victim as the victim had the stepson pinned to the ground. The defense theory, on the other hand, was that it was Harris who stabbed the victim. Harris was impeached by her confessions to third parties, two of which occurred the day of the incident. At the prosecution's request, however, and without objection, the jury was instructed that Harris's confessions could not be considered as substantive evidence of her guilt. Before the case went to the jury, defense counsel withdrew the request for an instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. The jury returned a guilty verdict of Manslaughter in the First Degree, acquitting petitioner of murder. The first identified deficiency by trial counsel concerned the trial court's response to a question by the jurors during deliberations about what constituted causation for manslaughter. It appeared that the jury was confused about whether it necessary that petitioner himself was the person who stabbed the victim in order to convict him of manslaughter or whether his participation in the group melee was "aiding and abetting" conduct that would suffice. The trial court responded: "You should rely on your own reading of the instructions provided. Remember that you should—that you should view the instructions as a whole. The other instructions may provide context for your question." Trial counsel's failure to object to this response or propose a different answer was deficient given that state law mandated that petitioner's own conduct, and not participation in a group activity, was necessary for conviction of manslaughter. In addition, the referral to other instructions, which included discussion of aider and abettor liability but failed to clarify that such liability was inapplicable to manslaughter, compounded the likely confusion about the law. That the jury made a finding during the sentencing enhancement portion of the trial that petitioner had personally used a weapon during the offense did not establish an absence of prejudice. Petitioner had struck the victim with a large umbrella during the encounter and the jury's finding could have related to that instead of the knife that killed the victim. On the record of this case, there is a reasonable probability the jury's answer to whether petitioner committed Manslaughter in the First Degree would have been different had trial counsel acted competently. Post-conviction counsel was ineffective under Martinez in failing to raise the claim, providing cause to overcome the procedural default. The next deficiency concerned trial counsel's failure to object to the instruction that limited consideration of Harris's three confessions to impeachment. This limitation was contrary to state law, under which the confessions satisfied a hearsay exception and could be considered as substantive evidence. In rejecting respondent's contention that the limitation was not prejudicial, it is noted, inter alia, that substantive consideration of Harris's confessions would have explained why her stepson's alleged bias in pointing to petitioner as the actual assailant mattered: without the substantive evidence, there was no motive for him to lie. Lastly, trial counsel was ineffective in withdrawing the requested instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. "[T]rial counsel left Petitioner in an 'unenviable' position in terms of substantive arguments, and then removed his best hope in terms of a lesser-included crime on which to be convicted, Manslaughter II. It was reasonably probable that the jury would have convicted Petitioner of Manslaughter II if given the chance and thus this error was prejudicial."

2021: Jardin v. Secretary, Department of Corrections, 543 F.Supp.3d 1241 (M.D. Fla. 2021). In robbery-murder case where petitioner claimed he had only agreed to participate in a drug buy when his co-defendants, without his knowledge, committed the robbery and murders, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction on the independent act defense. (Under the independent act defense, a defendant is not guilty of crimes committed by co-defendants that were outside the common design of the agreed upon crime and unforeseeable.) The state post-conviction court's rejection of the claim was premised on an unreasonable determination of the facts in that it erroneously believed the instruction was inapplicable unless petitioner had conceded guilt to one or more of the charged crimes, e.g., robbery or burglary. Because petitioner's only defense was that the robbery, burglary, and murders were outside the scope of the agreement to purchase drugs and not a foreseeable consequence of the agreement to purchase drugs, trial counsel performed deficiently by not requesting the instruction. Prejudice is established given that no direct un rebutted evidence suggested that petitioner personally killed the victims or stole from them and the prosecution's circumstantial evidence was equally consistent with both petitioner's guilt and his innocence. The instruction that was given on principal liability exacerbated the prejudice resulting from trial counsel's deficient performance by permitting the jurors to conclude that petitioner's agreement with the co-defendants to purchase drugs rendered him liable for all of their subsequent acts. And while trial counsel attempted to argue the independent act defense to the jury, the argument lacked the necessary and crucial validation of a theory-of-defense instruction. Without the independent act instruction, the jury could not apply the law on an independent act defense to the evidence.

Chamberlain v. Clarke*, 2021 WL 4487606 (W.D. Va. Sept. 30, 2021). In attempted capital murder of a police officer case, granting habeas relief on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for "failure to object to a crucial but defective jury instruction" regarding the elements of attempted capital murder. (Although the claim was untimely under the AEDPA statute of limitations, and procedurally defaulted in state court, the ineffective assistance by state habeas counsel provided the basis for both equitable tolling and cause to overcome the default.) The instructions provided to the jury failed to include an element of the charged crime: that petitioner's actions were "willful, deliberate and premeditated." The failure "to object to an instruction that omits an essential element of the crime falls below an objective standard of reasonableness, especially when the erroneous instruction materially lightens the government's burden of proof." As for prejudice, on the record of this case, [a]lthough the evidence may have been sufficient to support a finding that [petitioner's] actions were willful, deliberate, and premeditated, the jury was never instructed on "willful, deliberate, and premeditated" as an element, and how that is a higher mens rea than malice. But the jury was instructed on the definition of malice. (Citation omitted.) From the evidence, the jury could also reasonably have concluded that [petitioner's] conduct, while malicious, lacked premeditation. The jury could have found that [petitioner's] original intent was to escape apprehension and that he impulsively determined to shoot the weapon when the officer drew his gun. Only by speculating, and taking that issue away from the jury, can one conclude as a matter of law that the shooting was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. Nor do references to premeditation in the closing arguments of counsel remove the taint of a jury not properly instructed on an essential factual element of the crime.

The state habeas court's rejection of the claim was unsupportable for multiple reasons. First, it misconstrued the prior decision of the appellate court as holding that "the jury instructions as a whole adequately covered the elements of attempted capital murder," when in fact the appellate court had found the challenge to the instruction waived and it instead applied a sufficiency of the evidence analysis. Second, the state habeas court deferred to a discussion of “specific intent,” which was not the basis for petitioner’s challenge of the jury instruction. Third, it concluded, contrary to law, that counsel had sound tactical reasons for agreeing to the instruction. “There is no conceivable strategic reason for a defense lawyer to forgo a challenge to a prejudicial jury instruction; a mistake of law is deficient performance.” (Citation omitted.) The “strategic reason” provided by trial counsel was that he thought “intended to” would be better for his client than “premeditated.” But attempted capital murder requires both specific intent and premeditation. “It is not logical to suggest that his client would fare better if the government only had to prove one of those elements.” Finally, the assertion that the evidence was sufficient to find “willful, deliberate premeditation” does not resolve the constitutional error created by the failure to instruct the jury on all elements. To the extent that any of the state habeas court’s findings could be considered determinations of fact instead of law, “the same reasoning applies. Because [petitioner] had the right to have the jury decide his guilt or innocence regarding each element, it is an unreasonable determination of facts for the court to make the determination as a matter of law without submitting the facts to the jury along with proper instructions of law.”

2020: Brown v. Brown, 471 F.Supp.3d 866 (S.D. Ind. 2020), appeal and cross-appeal dismissed, 7 F.4th 666 (7th Cir. 2021). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a limiting instruction regarding a witness’s recounting of incriminating statements made by petitioner’s codefendant. Although the statement did not directly reference petitioner, it nevertheless implicated him when considered in conjunction with the witness’s testimony about petitioner’s independent admissions. The procedural default of the claim was excused by post-conviction counsel’s failure to raise it, an omission that post-conviction counsel conceded was not based on strategy. The record also showed that trial counsel had no valid strategic basis for failing to seek a limiting instruction. Prejudice is established because the bulk of the evidence against petitioner was circumstantial and inconclusive and the most serious evidence against him “was a reluctant one-word admission from a witness who said he overheard [petitioner] confess,” and this “witness’s credibility was marred by his admission that he was interested in reward money and that his cooperation in the case was motivated by a hope that it would keep his brother out of jail.”

2019: Alvarado v. Wetzel, 2019 WL 3037148 (E.D. Pa. July 10, 2019). In robbery-murder case where petitioner was the get-away driver and tried as an accomplice, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on due process grounds to the trial judge’s written response to a question from the jury during deliberations concerning accomplice liability that suggested that the jury could convict petitioner on an accomplice liability theory based on the actus reus element alone without any finding that she had the mens rea, or intent element, necessary for accomplice liability. Post-conviction counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise the trial ineffectiveness claim premised on a due process violation. Petitioner and her boyfriend purchased Xanax from a person in a park that was well-known for illegal prescription drug sales. They shared the drugs with a childhood friend of petitioner who accepted a ride in the vehicle driven by petitioner. At some point, petitioner’s boyfriend pulled out a gun from under the front passenger seat where he was sitting and showed it to petitioner and her friend. The three later decided to return to the park to obtain more Xanax. After petitioner parked the vehicle, the childhood friend suggested that petitioner’s boyfriend try to “get a play,” meaning to get more pills than were paid for. As her boyfriend walked away from the car, petitioner called him back and told him, “Cuz, you know, you know what to do. You know, if they don’t give you a play, just pull that shit out.” The childhood friend took that to be a suggestion to use the gun which upset her and caused her to yell at petitioner. The boyfriend then left the vehicle and went to the park where he pulled the gun on the drug dealer and took a bottle of Xanax the man was holding. As the boyfriend returned to the car, the drug dealer shouted, “He robbed me,” which was repeated by others in the crowd, including the victim, who along with others followed the boyfriend to the car. After the boyfriend entered the front passenger side of the vehicle, the victim attempted to look in the driver’s side window. The boyfriend reached over and shot the victim, after which he fired two or three more shots into the park. As they drove away, petitioner exclaimed, “That’s why he loves me. That’s why we ride or die.” Petitioner was tried jointly with her boyfriend. The judge instructed the jury four times concerning accomplice liability, three of the times after questions from the jury. The final instruction was in response to a written question from the jury: “Does aiding after a crime in itself constitute accomplice liability?” After discussing the question with counsel, the trial court sent the jury a written answer to the effect that “it could.” Following petitioner’s conviction for robbery and second degree murder, trial counsel represented her on direct appeal and raised a single issue: “Did the trial court commit legal error by instructing the jury that she could be convicted under the accomplice theory solely by aiding after the crime had been committed?” Petitioner’s judgment and sentence were affirmed with the appellate court finding that the instruction complied with state law. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner unsuccessfully argued that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object to the trial court’s written response to the final jury question. In the federal habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged that her due process rights were violated by the supplemental instruction and that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on this basis. Because petitioner’s state counsel had relied only on state law on appeal and in state post-conviction proceedings, the claims were unexhausted. And because no available state remedy remained open, they were deemed procedurally defaulted. The default was overcome for the trial ineffectiveness claim based on post-conviction counsel’s ineffectiveness. Although post-conviction counsel did challenge trial counsel’s performance under state law, post-conviction counsel overlooked the “significant and obvious” due process implications of the written supplemental jury instruction and trial counsel’s failure to object on that ground. No strategic reason for the omission of the due process argument could be discerned. “Having shown that she presents a substantial claim of ineffectiveness of trial counsel and that her postconviction counsel’s performance was deficient for allowing the default of that claim, [petitioner] has shown that the procedural default of her ineffective assistance of counsel claim may be excused under Martinez.” Turning to the merits, which is reviewed de novo, the district court first found that under Pennsylvania law petitioner could be convicted of second degree murder if the jury found that a homicide occurred while she was acting as an accomplice to a robbery. Accomplice liability required a specific mens rea element: the intent to promote or facilitate commission of the offense. The trial court’s initial instruction on accomplice liability conformed closely to the standard instruction on the issue. The following two supplemental instructions given by the trial court also comported with state law. But the provision of the correct instructions did not negate the harm from the final written answer to the jury inquiry. “The challenged supplemental instruction was a two-word response to the jury’s specific question and was delivered in writing. This concise but ambiguous written instruction likely stood out more to the jury than the previous verbal instructions that correctly explained the mens rea for accomplice liability.” As the Supreme Court recognized in Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U.S. 607, 612 (1946), a specific instruction on a key issue likely carries greater weight with a jury than a previous generalized instruction. “Reviewing the written answer to the jury’s question in the context of the trial record, there is “a reasonable likelihood” that the jury applied the instruction in a way that relieved the State of its burden of proving’ that [petitioner] acted with the intent to promote or facilitate the robbery.” While the prosecution in argument relied heavily on the childhood friend’s account of petitioner’s statements before and after the robbery to establish the requisite mens rea, her credibility was significantly challenged by petitioner and the record suggested that the jury may indeed have discounted the friend’s testimony. Notably, the jury acquitted petitioner of the charge of conspiracy to commit robbery even though conspiracy and accomplice liability have the same intent requirement under Pennsylvania law. The supplemental written instruction violated due process and the record provided no basis to discern a tactical reason for trial counsel not objecting on this ground. Longstanding Supreme Court precedent made clear that the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every element necessary to constitute a crime and that a jury instruction that relieves the government of its burden of proving every element beyond a reasonable doubt violates due process. Thus, deficient performance was established. As for prejudice:

Capital Case*

The Court concludes that the error of [petitioner’s] trial counsel in this case in failing to object to the due process violation undermines confidence in the outcome. Given the government’s primary reliance on [petitioner’s] statements in the car, both before and after the shooting, and the jury’s apparent lack of confidence in [the friend’s] testimony and obvious confusion concerning accomplice liability, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different had [petitioner’s] trial counsel objected to the trial court’s written response and had the jury been properly instructed on accomplice liability. [Petitioner] has demonstrated prejudice from her counsel’s deficient performance and therefore has established ineffective assistance of her trial counsel under Strickland.

Vonville v. Kerestes*, 2019 WL 1040747 (M.D. Pa. March 5, 2019), appeal dismissed, 2019 WL 4668042 (3rd Cir. Aug. 13, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of third degree murder, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to a jury instruction allowing the jurors to infer guilt from petitioner’s failure to testify. Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under Martinez due to the ineffectiveness of post-conviction counsel in failing to raise the claim. (See subsection VIII.B. for a full summary of the Martinez analysis.) The failure to object to a jury instruction that is expressly forbidden by Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), was clearly substandard under the first prong of Strickland. The district court was unpersuaded by the Commonwealth’s argument that it was inconceivable that the trial court in fact incorrectly instructed the jury, reading the instruction in the context of other contemporaneous instructions and given the trial court’s extensive experience. Under these circumstances, the Commonwealth argued, the transcript must have been the result of a typographical or scrivener’s error. The district court responded that experience does not render one immune from error and that having given the correct instruction in other cases did not establish that the judge provided a correct one in the case at hand. Also unpersuasive was the argument that because trial, appellate and post-conviction counsel were experienced, the failure by any of them to raise the issue pointed again to a scrivener’s error. But experience alone does not render a claim of ineffective assistance incredible. The district court further rejected the Commonwealth’s request to hold a hearing at which trial counsel and the prosecutors could provide their recollections of the actual jury charge. (The trial judge was deceased.) Notably, the Commonwealth made no proffer that any of the parties would testify that the correct instruction had been given. In addition, although the Commonwealth took the position early on in the habeas proceedings that a typographical error explained the erroneous instruction, it never asked for a hearing on that assertion until after the Magistrate Judge recommended a grant of relief on the claim. The request for a hearing was therefore waived. Finally, no hearing was warranted because the transcript was certified as accurate by the stenographer and signed and approved by the trial judge. “This is essentially the testimony of the court reporter and the trial judge that the jury was, in fact, instructed that they ‘may infer any inference of guilt from the fact that he did not testify in his own defense.’” Having overcome the default, the merits of the claim was addressed. The deficiency by trial counsel was easily shown. As for prejudice, the key issue in this case was petitioner’s mental state at the time he killed the victim, as shown by the closing arguments. But because trial counsel failed to provide proper notice, the defense was barred from presenting any evidence at trial as to petitioner’s state of mind at the time of the crime.

This failure was then compounded and magnified when, after [petitioner] exercised his Fifth Amendment right, trial counsel allowed to go unchecked the trial judge’s comment to the jury that they could infer guilt because [petitioner] did not testify. Thus, not only did trial counsel’s own professional errors preclude her from offering any testimony of [petitioner’s] mental state during the commission of the offense, she then failed to act when the trial judge instructed the jury that they could infer criminal intent from her client’s silence at trial. On these facts, [petitioner] has “show[n] that but for counsel’s unprofessional errors there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceeding would have been different.”

Gray v. Tice*, 2019 WL 824045 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 21, 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the jury instructions on counts of retaliation against witnesses that failed to define a key competent of the charged crime. Petitioner, a prison inmate, was charged, inter alia, with retaliation against witnesses. Petitioner had written threatening letters to witnesses involved in another inmate’s trial. The statute related to witness retaliation provided:

A person commits an offense if he harms another by any unlawful act or engages in a course of conduct or repeatedly commits acts which threaten another in retaliation for anything lawfully done in the capacity of witness, victim or a party in a civil matter.

Pennsylvania courts have interpreted this statute to allow for a conviction of retaliation if the Commonwealth proves the defendant engaged in any one of the following three scenarios for a retaliatory purpose: (1) “the defendant harmed another by any unlawful act”; (2) the defendant “engag[ed] in a course of conduct which threatened another”; or (3) “the defendant repeatedly committed acts which threaten another.” For the first scenario, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has found it requires a showing that (1) the defendant caused harm; and (2) such harm resulted from an unlawful act. Importantly, the element of harm cannot be established merely by showing that an unlawful act was committed. Rather, the Commonwealth must prove that the victim suffered a specific and identifiable harm as a result of the threat, not just that the victim suffered “feelings of concern and intimidation[,]” which “are feelings that one would expect to accompany any threat that was made.” (Citation omitted.) The trial court did not instruct on the second two scenarios after defense counsel successfully argued that the evidence did not support them. In giving the instruction on the first scenario, however, the trial court failed to define “harm” in accordance with state supreme court precedent. This failure was compounded when the trial court grouped the “harm” and “unlawful act” elements together and instructed the jury that the Commonwealth had to prove only two elements in order for it to convict petitioner on the witness retaliation count: (1) that he harmed the victim by an unlawful act; and (2) that he did so in retaliation. But under state law, the jury had to find three elements to convict petitioner of the offense: (1) that he harmed the victim, as defined by the state supreme court; (2) by an unlawful act; and (3) that he did so in retaliation. After giving the flawed instruction, the trial court asked defense counsel whether he had any objections or additions. Trial counsel replied that he had none. Petitioner was convicted of three counts of witness retaliation based on the three letters he had written. In post-conviction proceedings, the post-conviction court concluded that trial counsel was deficient in failing to object to the lack of a definition of harm in the instructions but held that petitioner did not establish prejudice. In so ruling, the post-conviction court found that “trial counsel’s repeated emphasis of the harm requirement during cross-examination and in closing arguments” “sufficiently alerted the jury to the harm element of the offense[.]” The district court held that this finding was objectively unreasonable. First, it is the trial court that tells the jury the correct law to apply, a point the trial court reiterated to the jury. Second, defense counsel also argued to the jury why the evidence did not support a finding of the second and third scenarios which the jury was never instructed on. This could only have further confused the jury as to what elements the jury needed to find in order to convict on witness retaliation. Third, there could be no dispute that the evidence was insufficient to convict petitioner under the first scenario. Relief is granted as to the witness retaliation convictions.

2017: Brooks v. Gilmore, 2017 WL 3475475 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 11, 2017), appeal dismissed, 2018 WL 1304895 (3rd Cir. 2018). Petitioner was convicted by a jury in Pennsylvania state court of first degree murder and was sentenced to life without parole. The prosecution’s key witness, and the “lynchpin of the case,” was a sole eyewitness who identified two other individuals from a lineup before selecting petitioner, and named petitioner only because the cops kept bothering him. The witness was high on Xanax and alcohol at the time of the crime. At the time of trial, the witness was under court supervision and had two open cases. Charges of carjacking, robbery, and weapons offenses that were pending against him were dismissed for lack of prosecution just after he gave the police a statement implicating petitioner. Petitioner’s conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal and his state post-conviction petition was denied without a hearing. In federal habeas pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254, petitioner alleged that he was deprived the right to effective assistance of counsel because his trial lawyer failed to object to a jury instruction improperly defining reasonable doubt. After providing the standard jury instruction on reasonable doubt, the court instructed the jury:

It’s helpful to think about reasonable doubt in this manner. Let’s say, and I know that each one of you does have someone that you love very much, a spouse, a significant other, a child, a grandchild. Each one of you has someone in your life who’s absolutely precious to you. If you were told by your precious one’s physician that they had a life-threatening condition and that the only known protocol or the best protocol for that condition was an experimental surgery, you're very likely going to ask for a second opinion. You may even ask for a third opinion. You're probably going to research the condition, research the protocol. What's the surgery about? How does it work? You're going to do everything you can to get as much information as you can. You're going to call everybody you know in medicine: What do you know? What have you heard? Tell me where to go. But at some point the question will be called. If you go forward, it's not because you have moved beyond all doubt. There are no guarantees. If you go forward, it is because you have moved beyond all reasonable doubt.

The court held that this “emotionally charged metaphor” violated petitioner’s due process rights because the jurors could interpret it to allow conviction based on any degree of proof below the reasonable doubt standard, under Cage v. Louisiana, 498 U.S. 39, 41 (1991). Because “any person of decency and morals would strive to put aside doubt when faced with a single life-saving option for a loved one,” this instruction diminished the prosecution’s burden of proof, creating strong motivation to put aside doubt. The initially accurate instruction on the standard of proof did not render the charge as a whole acceptable because the jury was instructed to consider the court’s example as a proper exposition of the standard, and it was not. Counsel’s failure to object was deficient because reasonable doubt is such a fundamental principle and the nature of the court’s hypothetical was so instinctively problematic. Any reasonable attorney “would have focused sharp attention as soon as the judge deviated from the standard instruction.” The deficiency was prejudicial because the error in defining reasonable doubt was structural under Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275 (1993) (holding that without the reasonable doubt standard, a criminal trial cannot reliably serve its function). Prejudice was therefore presumed. But even if prejudice was not presumed, prejudice was established because there was not overwhelming evidence of guilt in this case. The state court’s denial of the claim was both an unreasonable determination of fact (that the instruction was a mere example rather than a “lengthy and emotionally charged illustration antithetical to the concept purportedly being explained”) and an unreasonable failure to recognize the due process principles in Cage and Sullivan.

2015: Ruiz v. United States, 146 F. Supp. 3d 726 (D. Md. 2015). Counsel ineffective in drugs and possession of a machine gun case for failing to request an instruction that conviction of the machine gun count required proof that the defendant knew the weapon was a machine gun. The defendant was “a first-time non-violent offender,” who participated in a drug trafficking ring led by another. Because of the machine gun charge, the defendant, “a minor participant in the drug conspiracy, was sentenced to 480 months, which was greater than the combined total sentence for all of his co-conspirators and the “undisputed ringleader.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to request a mens rea instruction because “bedrock principles of Anglo-American jurisprudence” and the Supreme Court’s interpretation of a similar automatic weapon offense required proof that the defendant knew the features of the weapon. Prejudice established. There was no direct evidence that the defendant knew the weapon was a machine gun, and the circumstantial evidence was minimal, at best, as forensic evidence showed the weapon had never been fired and the co-conspirators referred to the weapon as a “rifle” of “semi-automatic,” while a machine gun is “automatic.” There simply was no evidence that the defendant knew the weapon was a machine gun. If this issue had been raised, a reasonable jury would have found the defendant not guilty or the court would have granted a motion to dismiss. Conviction vacated and sentence reduced to 120 months.

2005: Baker v. Horn*, 383 F. Supp. 2d 720 (E.D. Pa. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in capital trial for failing to object to the trial court’s instructions that permitted the jury to convict the petitioner of first degree murder under an accomplice liability theory without finding that the petitioner himself possessed the specific intent to kill, which was a required element under Pennsylvania law. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the state law was clearly established at the time of trial. Prejudice was found even though the jury could have convicted the petitioner either as a principal or as an accomplice because the verdict sheet did not reveal which theory the jury used and the evidence was contradictory concerning the identity of the shooter. Although AEDPA applied, the state court had not addressed the merits of this claim and the court reviewed the issues de novo.

c. State Cases

2024: Richardson v. United States, 318 A.3d 490 (D.C. App. 2024). In case where petitioner was acquitted of first-degree theft of a vehicle but convicted of unauthorized use of a vehicle (UUV), trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an entrapment instruction regarding the UUV charge. The vehicle at issue was a police “bait car”—an unmarked vehicle left running by police in a high crime area to attract car thieves. Petitioner worked odd jobs at the convenience store where the police left the car. He testified that he was not trying to steal the car but was instead driving it to the police station in the hopes of receiving a reward. The jury apparently credited his account as shown by the acquittal on the count that required an intent to steal. At the post-conviction proceeding, trial counsel explained that he did not request an entrapment instruction because: (1) he believed the evidence did not support it; and (2) pressing an entrapment defense would have implicitly conceded petitioner’s guilt, at least if he had not been entrapped. As for the first justification, ample evidence supported the instruction. And the second proffered reason failed as trial counsel had not presented any defense to the UUV charge, essentially conceding it. Thus, “the entrapment instruction was all upside.” Also unavailing was respondent’s argument on appeal that trial counsel’s decision to forgo an entrapment instruction was justified on the ground that an entrapment defense would have undermined his defense to the more serious theft charge. Trial counsel’s testimony showed that he mistakenly believed that he had mounted a defense to the UUV charge, undermining the assertion that he made a tactical decision to concede guilt on that charge. And even if respondent was correct that trial counsel made a strategic decision to concede the UUV charge to bolster the theft defense, that strategy “would not have made any sense because bypassing an entrapment defense had no tendency to strengthen the defense to the theft charge.” As to prejudice, the evidence of government inducement was plainly established here. If the jury had been instructed on entrapment it likely would have had to confront whether the government had proven beyond a reasonable doubt that petitioner had a “predisposition to commit the crime.” The jury’s acquittal on the theft count provided some reason to believe that there was a reasonable probability that the omission of an entrapment instruction had a prejudicial effect. In addition, petitioner “also presented strong evidence that the jurors in his case in fact did not believe he was predisposed to committing the charged crimes.” This evidence was from a post-trial news article about the case where one juror stated that the jury “didn’t see [petitioner] as a car thief,” and another juror opined that the jurors thought “the police department should not be in the business of inviting people to commit a crime.” That petitioner had a robbery conviction from eight years earlier was “hardly dispositive evidence that [petitioner] was predisposed to steal a car.” Notably, that conviction was introduced as impeachment against petitioner when he testified, and yet jurors still acquitted him of first-degree theft. Although the prior conviction could have been used as substantive evidence of a predisposition to commit a crime if an entrapment defense had been raised, this amounted to a “pretty thin distinction.”

Floyd v. State*, 898 S.E.2d 431 (Ga. 2024). In felony-murder case where murder conviction was predicated on petitioner’s possession of a firearm by a felon, trial counsel was ineffective in his handling of the interplay between self-defense and felonious firearm possession. At trial, petitioner contended that he acted in self-defense, and he was acquitted of malice murder, felony-murder predicated on attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault, and two counts of aggravated assault. Although petitioner had not been indicted for felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, on the first day of the trial the State requested that the jury be charged on that theory as a lesser-included offense of malice murder, and the trial court so instructed the jury. Petitioner’s sole defense was that he was acting in self-defense when he shot the victim. Trial counsel did not request a jury instruction under the statute that provided that self-defense was an absolute defense to various statutes criminalizing the carrying and possession of firearms, including the one prohibiting the possession of firearms by a convicted felon. (At petitioner’s motion for new trial hearing, trial counsel conceded that he was unfamiliar with that statute at the time of trial.) Instead, during closing arguments, trial counsel told the jury that petitioner was guilty of felon-in-possession and that self-defense did not apply to the felon-in-possession count. Trial counsel failed to explain that, under the law, petitioner was justified in possessing the gun at the time he shot the victim if petitioner was acting in self-defense. Instead, trial counsel argued that self-defense applied to felony-murder if predicated on the attempted armed robbery and aggravated assault charges. At the start of its second full day of deliberations, the jury sent the court two questions. The first was: “Can [Appellant], as a convicted fellow [sic] with a weapon, be justified to use a weapon (gun) to defend himself if he fears for his life?” After conferring with counsel, the trial court responded on the jury note: “Yes if he reasonably fears for his life.” The second question was:

- In the eyes of Georgia law what has precedence [sic]:
- self defense (at all costs)
- fellow [sic] in possession of a weapon defending himself

The trial court wrote in answer to that question, “That is an issue for you to decide.” Trial counsel did not object to that response, telling the trial court it was “correct.” The note with the responses was provided to the jury, which returned with its verdicts later that afternoon. Deficient performance is shown by trial counsel’s ignorance of the law which led to his failure to request a charge on the relevant statute, his failure to argue that self-defense applied to felony-murder based on felon-in-possession, and his agreement with the trial court’s response to the jury’s second question. “[N]o reasonable attorney would have agreed with the trial court’s response to the jury’s second question, which at best was a non-answer, and at worst, authorized the jury to convict on felony murder based on felon-in-possession even if it believed [petitioner's] claim of self-defense." Prejudice is established on the record of this case. Although the jury had been instructed that "[t]he fact that a person's conduct is justified is a defense to prosecution for any crime based on that conduct," the jury's confusion was evident by its question of whether petitioner, as a convicted felon, could be justified to use a gun in self-defense. Petitioner met his burden of showing that but for the cumulative effect of counsel's deficiencies, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different.

People v. Kilgore*, ___ N.W.3d ___, 2024 WL 4508783 (Mich. App. Oct. 16, 2024). Although defense counsel was successful in defending defendant against the charges of first- and second-degree murder, defense counsel was nevertheless ineffective in failing to ask the trial court to instruct the jury on self-defense and defense-of-others with respect to the charge of felony-firearm predicated on murder, a count defendant was convicted of. (He was also convicted of carrying a concealed weapon—"CCW".) Defendant killed the former boyfriend of defendant's girlfriend. The victim had been harassing and threatening his ex-girlfriend and was following the defendant and the girlfriend in his vehicle when defendant stopped his car and shot at the victim's vehicle. The victim was struck and died from the injuries. In the instructions, the jury was told that self-defense was not applicable to the CCW charge. Defense counsel conceded defendant's guilt on that charge. The jury was instructed that the felony-firearm charge required the prosecutor to prove that defendant committed the crime of murder, although it was not necessary that defendant actually be convicted of murder. Further, the prosecutor had to prove that defendant knowingly carried or possessed a firearm while committing that crime. On defense counsel's request, the jury was instructed on self-defense and defense-of-others as it related to the murder charges. The trial court did not specifically mention felony-firearm during the instructions on self-defense and defense-of-others. In closing argument, defense counsel urged the jury to find defendant "not guilty on the charges involving homicide." On appeal, the record was supplemented with an affidavit from defense counsel explaining that his "failure to request a self-defense instruction on the felony firearm charge was not a matter of trial strategy; rather, it was a matter of focusing on the murder charges." Because instructions on self-defense and defense-of-others would have been crucial to the defense on the felony-firearm charge, "defense counsel's failure to request the instructions was objectively unreasonable." There is a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different had counsel requested the instructions. Notably, the jury acquitted defendant of murder, but, at the same time, convicted him of a charge predicated on him having committed a murder. Although inconsistent verdicts standing alone are insufficient to call into question the validity of a conviction, "when, as here, there is an error in the jury instructions that appear to (i) provide a defense for the charge on which the jury acquitted but (ii) foreclose the same defense on the related charge on which the jury convicted, the probability that the conviction resulted from jury confusion rather than jury choice is too high to ignore." That defense counsel argued that the defense applied to the "homicide" charges was not enough to refute the finding of prejudice on the record of this case.

State v. Wilson*, 237 N.E.3d 179 (Ohio 2024). Trial counsel was ineffective in conceding that defendant was not entitled to a self-defense instruction as to the charges of attempted murder and felonious assault where trial counsel mistakenly believed that self-defense required defendant to have intended to harm or kill the victim. The charges stemmed from a verbal altercation between defendant and the victim at a gas station while both men were sitting in different vehicles next to each other. According to defendant, the victim said “I’ll smoke you out here,” and pointed a gun at defendant. At that point, defendant grabbed a gun he knew was in the vehicle and fired near the victim’s truck. Defendant explained that he had no intention of hitting the victim but instead was attempting to get the victim to back off. Although defense counsel initially pursued a self-defense theory, counsel abandoned that theory at the suggestion of the trial court. The jury found defendant guilty of felonious assault with two firearm specifications but not guilty of attempted murder. “Because [defendant], through his testimony that he fired a shot to scare or repel [the victim], produced evidence that tended to support the claim that he acted in self-defense, . . . he was entitled to a self-defense jury instruction and [] his trial counsel was ineffective by not requesting that instruction.” Neither the statute governing self-defense nor the relevant case law included a requirement that the person asserting self-defense had intended harm to the person that force was used against. Defense counsel’s failure to request an instruction on the only defense supported by defendant’s testimony constituted deficient performance. And given the conflicting evidence, prejudice is established.

State v. Baugh*, 556 P.3d 35 (Utah 2024). Affirming the lower court’s ruling that trial counsel was ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to request jury instructions that would have properly instructed the jury on its duty under the Utah Constitution to be unanimous as to every element of each convicted count. Appellant was charged with two counts of aggravated sexual abuse of his minor daughter, one occurring on or about 2012 and the other on or about 2014. In her testimony, appellant’s daughter described three incidents that happened between 2012 and 2014. Two of the three took place while appellant was still living in the family home. The third happened after he moved to a new location at some point in 2014. Appellant denied any of the three incidents occurred. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jurors that the two counts charged could be fulfilled with any two of the incidents described by the daughter. Defense counsel did not object to this statement. The jury was provided only with a general unanimity instruction, simply telling it that “every single juror must agree with the verdict before the Defendant can be found guilty or not.” Defense counsel did not request a more specific unanimity instruction. The jury acquitted appellant of the 2012 count and convicted him of the 2014 count. Although the law in Utah was somewhat unsettled at the time of appellant’s trial as to when special unanimity instructions were required, the caselaw was clear that the jury must be unanimous as to each element of each count of the crime of sexual abuse. In practice, this meant that the jury must unanimously agree on which incident of touching satisfied each count. “The circumstances of [appellant’s] case created an unacceptable risk of a non-unanimous verdict, and a reasonable attorney would have recognized that risk.” Notably, there were no circumstances that mitigated the risk of a non-unanimous verdict given that the evidence for each of the instances of touching was fairly equal in persuasive force. In light of the opportunities for jury confusion on this record, “no reasonable attorney would have failed to request more specific unanimity instructions.” Turning to prejudice, it is observed that “the jury received evidence of the alleged instances of touching based only on location but was expected to connect these instances of touching to counts distinguished only by date.” Because appellant lived in both the family home and the new residence in 2014, the jury’s guilty verdict on the 2014 count didn’t resolve the risk that some jurors convicted based on an act that took place at the family home while others convicted based on an act that occurred at the second location. The State’s reliance on appellant’s “confessions” did not negate prejudice given their equivocal nature and appellant’s explanation that he was attempting to validate his daughter’s feelings. (The allegations of abuse and supposed admissions by appellant came several years after the reported incidents were said to have taken place.) There was a reasonable probability of a more favorable verdict had counsel not performed deficiently.

State v. MacLeod, 546 P.3d 366 (Utah App.), petition for cert. denied, 558 P.3d 87 (Utah 2024). Reversing appellant’s conviction for two counts of forcible sexual abuse because of trial counsel’s deficient performance in failing to request adequate instructions on the constitutional unanimity requirement. The verdict form specified that one count of forcible sexual abuse was for illegal “touching of the breast,” and the second was for illegal “touching of the buttocks.” But the jury heard testimony that appellant touched the victim’s breasts and buttocks without her consent at the grocery store and on the basketball court, and that he touched her buttocks again without consent in her bedroom. None of the jury instructions specifically “link[ed] an alleged criminal act to a charge” or “inform[ed] the jury that it must unanimously agree that the same alleged criminal act has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt.” Contrary to the State’s argument on appeal, competent counsel would not have concluded that the prosecution’s argument cured any inadequacy in the instructions. “[T]he prosecutor’s closing argument did not clearly identify for the jury which alleged touch it was limited to considering for each of the forcible sexual abuse counts. Accordingly, Counsel performed deficiently in failing to request that the jury receive sufficient unanimity instructions.” For the same reason, the prosecutor’s argument did not negate a finding of prejudice. Further, the evidence supporting the two forcible sexual abuse convictions was not so overwhelming that the reviewing court could conclude that the jury must have unanimously agreed on the same act as the basis for its conviction on those counts.

State v. Ames, 546 P.3d 356 (Utah App.), petition for cert. denied, 550 P.3d 993 (Utah 2024). Reversing conviction for one of three dangerous weapon-related convictions because of trial counsel’s deficient performance in failing to request an instruction defining an element of that crime. Appellant, who is schizophrenic and was off his medications at the time of the charged offenses, lived in a basement unit of a duplex with his mother and nephew. His mother called authorities after appellant began exhibiting strange and threatening behavior. His mother suspected appellant was using drugs which proved to be accurate and was the basis of additional convictions not at issue here. The three counts of possession of a dangerous weapon as a restricted person involved an axe, a chain and padlock, and a turkey hook. According to appellant’s mother, appellant had brought the axe into the unit a few days before appellant’s arrest because he said he needed it for protection. On the day appellant’s mother phoned authorities, appellant had been throwing the chain around threatening to crack someone’s head open. At another point that day, appellant was swinging around the turkey hook. In the instructions to the jury, a “dangerous weapon” was defined as “an object that in the manner of its use or intended use is capable of causing death or serious bodily injury.” There was no instruction, however, informing the jury what the term “serious bodily injury” meant. Under state law, there is a hierarchy of certain offenses that depends on the gradations of harm. “Serious bodily injury” sits at the highest tier, followed by “substantial bodily injury,” followed by “bodily injury.” These different categories of injury “are not subject to analysis using ordinary meaning. Rather, the Utah Legislature has assigned each a technical legal meaning that requires further explanation.” It was objectively unreasonable for counsel not to request an instruction on the meaning of “serious bodily injury.” Without an instruction, jurors could plausibly have thought that the term included injuries that fell far short of what was required –an injury that causes serious permanent disfigurement, protracted loss or impairment of the function of any bodily member or organ, or the creation of a substantial risk of death. Prejudice is found, however, only as to the count involving the turkey hook.

State v. Granere*, 543 P.3d 177 (Utah App.), petition for cert. denied, 558 P.3d 87 (Utah 2024). Reversing convictions for rape of a child and aggravated sexual abuse of a child due to trial counsel’s deficient failure to request a unanimity instruction. Because the prosecution presented evidence of only one incident of object rape, appellant’s conviction on that count is affirmed. The jury, in contrast, heard testimony of more than one alleged act that supported the rape of a child and the aggravated sexual abuse of a child charges. As to those two convictions, counsel performed deficiently by not requesting a proper unanimity instruction. Given that the evidence supporting those counts was not overwhelming, and the prosecution’s argument did not narrow for the jury the specific acts needed to be established for conviction, appellant was prejudiced.

2023: People v. Yeager, 999 N.W.2d 490 (Mich. 2023). In murder trial, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on voluntary manslaughter. Defendant was charged with the murder of her boyfriend. The defense theory was self-defense and trial counsel explained post-trial that he did not request an instruction on voluntary manslaughter because it would be inconsistent with the chosen defense in that manslaughter involved an intentional killing. But “[m]urder as mitigated by self-defense and voluntary manslaughter are not distinguished by the element of intent because both contemplate an intentional action.” Thus, trial counsel’s decision to forego requesting a voluntary manslaughter instruction was premised on a legally incorrect analysis. And the facts of the case demonstrated that the voluntary manslaughter instruction would have been supported by the evidence presented. According to the trial testimony, defendant’s shooting of her boyfriend “was the culmination of a series of events during which [the boyfriend] physically assaulted defendant, took her car and used it to attempt to run her over, and repeatedly threatened to kill defendant and . . . the neighbor who assisted her. Defendant testified that she feared for her life.” On this record, trial counsel’s failure to request a voluntary manslaughter instruction was deficient and prejudicial. That defendant’s jury can be given the option of second-degree murder but chose to convict defendant of first-degree murder did not preclude a finding of prejudice. “[T]he voluntary manslaughter instruction would have assisted the jury in considering defendant’s state of mind at the time of the shooting in a manner not contemplated by instructions on first- and second-degree murder alone. . . . In the absence of instruction on the particular state of mind required for voluntary manslaughter, we cannot definitively conclude whether the jury would have determined that defendant’s actions were provoked by inflamed passions or emotional excitement.”

Capital Case*

People v. Debellis*, 225 N.E.3d 859 (NY Ct. App. 2023). In case involving firearm-related charges, trial counsel was ineffective under state law in failing to request a charge on the only defense supported by the trial testimony, instead seeking (and failing to obtain) a charge foreclosed by the trial testimony. During his testimony, defendant admitted to facts establishing that he was not in lawful possession of the firearm found in the vehicle he had been driving. He claimed, however, that he was taking the weapon to the police as part of a gun buyback program. What defendant testified to was consistent with what defense counsel told the jury in opening statement. Defense counsel asked for a jury charge of temporary and lawful possession, which was refused on the ground that defendant's admissions precluded a finding that the weapon possession was "temporary" under the relevant statute. Defense counsel did not request a charge for voluntary surrender and instead apparently relied on jury nullification in argument. "No reasonable strategy could have supported counsel's failure to request a jury charge on the statutory voluntary surrender defense while at the same time pursuing a meritless temporary and lawful possession defense." Regarding prejudice, if the voluntary surrender defense was unlikely to succeed, defendant could have difficulty meeting the federal standard. Under the New York standard, however, defendant established ineffective assistance of counsel. "[W]hen attorney error deprives a defendant of a jury charge on the only defense supported by the evidence, it cannot be said that the defendant received a fair trial."

Onyiego v. State*, 2023 WL 2326336 (Tenn. Crim. App. March 2, 2023). Petitioner was denied effective assistance of counsel as to one of two related aggravated rape charges where trial counsel failed to discuss with petitioner his ability to waive the statute of limitations as to the lesser-included offenses of rape, sexual battery, and misdemeanor assault, resulting in the jury not being given the option of convicting on a lesser offense. (As to the second aggravated rape conviction, prejudice is not established from counsel's deficiency. On the record of this case, even if trial counsel had requested instructions on lesser-included offenses of aggravated rape causing bodily injury, no reasonable jury would have found petitioner guilty of the lesser-included offense.)

Greene v. State*, 889 S.E.2d 636 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was indicted for armed robbery and kidnapping, defense counsel was ineffective for failing to (1) object to the prosecution's use of a prior conviction for "strongarm robbery" to impeach petitioner's testimony as unfairly prejudicial and (2) request a limiting instruction be given to the jury clarifying that the prior conviction could only be considered for credibility purposes. In post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel could not remember why he failed to argue the inadmissibility of the prior conviction or seek a limiting instruction, despite having done so in other cases. The appeals court observed that even if trial counsel believed the trial court was inclined to allow the prior conviction impeachment, a defense attorney cannot merely acquiesce to its use. Absent an objection or request to perform the balancing test required under state law, the appellate court could not know whether the trial court would have admitted the prior conviction. Because the prior conviction was for a similar offense and there was no limiting instruction, the circumstances were "highly prejudicial." The appellate court disagreed with respondent's contention that the overwhelming evidence overcame any deficient performance. The only evidence was the testimony of petitioner and the victim, both of whom provided "at least arguable explanations" for what occurred.

State v. Alvarado*, 538 P.3d 633 (Utah App. 2023). A conviction for failure to stop at the command of a police officer is reversed due to defense counsel’s deficient performance in failing to request an adverse inference jury instruction due to the officer’s failure to activate his body-worn camera. The law allowing such an instruction was passed after the offense but prior to the trial. Reasonably competent counsel would have understood its applicability at the time of trial. And it was likely that the trial court would have agreed that: (1) defendant established by a preponderance of the evidence that the patrol officer at least recklessly disregarded the requirement to turn on his body-worn camera when he failed to turn it on as he activated his patrol vehicle lights and attempted to initiate a traffic stop; and (2) an adverse inference jury instruction would be reasonably likely to have an impact on the jury’s decision. Although the officer testified that a person matching defendant’s general description had exited the driver’s side of the vehicle prior to fleeing on foot, the defense called a witness who stated that defendant exited the passenger side of the car. As for a statement allegedly made by defendant that indicated he had been the driver, the remark could have been attributed to drunken bravado. Had the adverse inference instruction been given to the jury, there is a reasonable probability that the jury would have weighed the competing testimony differently and acquitted defendant on the fleeing by vehicle charge.

2022: Ray v. State, 280 A.3d 627 (Del. 2022). Petitioner was entitled to post-conviction relief as to his felony-murder and related gun charge convictions as a result of trial counsels’ failure to object to an instruction that failed to embody an accurate statement of the law or to raise the error on direct appeal. None of the key actors in petitioner’s trial—not the trial judge, not the prosecutors, and not the defense lawyers—noticed that the instruction was outdated and no one compared the felony-murder instruction to the felony-murder count in the indictment or the text of the applicable felony-murder statute. Reasonably competent defense counsel would have spotted the error in the instruction. In addition, because the instruction introduced a theory of criminal liability, i.e., accomplice liability, that ran contrary to the defense’s theory of the case and was, according to the trial judge, unsupported by the record evidence, trial counsel’s failure to object to the instruction was objectively unreasonable. The failure of counsel to raise the issue on appeal could not have been the product of a considered judgment about its merit. “Because the instruction was so obviously incorrect and this issue was clearly stronger than those [petitioner’s] counsel actually presented on appeal,” the presumption that counsel was effective on appeal was overcome. Prejudice is found because the language of the erroneous instruction failed to clarify that the murder must have facilitated commission of the underlying felony (robbery), or “help[ed] to move the felony forward.” In addition, the instruction allowed the jury to convict petitioner if it found his accomplice had caused the death of the victim but the trial judge declined to provide the jury with complete accomplice liability instructions. (The co-defendant, who testified against petitioner, had been designated by the trial judge as an accomplice when the trial judge instructed the jury on consideration of accomplice testimony.)

State v. Morris*, 2022 WL 984390 (Del. Super. March 31, 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective as to home invasion conviction for failing to request a lesser-included offense instruction. Petitioner was charged with multiple crimes occurring on different occasions related to assaults on and improper contact with the victim. The first incident resulted in a no-contact order which the petitioner violated by going to the victim’s apartment, kicking the door and demanding entry. This second encounter is what the home invasion conviction was premised on. Trial counsel's admitted oversight in failing to request a lesser-included offense instruction was deficient performance. Counsel had not adopted an all-or-nothing defense to the crime but instead asked for a lesser-included offense instruction for one of the other charges and had argued that the evidence did not support the victim's account of petitioner's entry into the apartment. In finding prejudice, it is noted that the jury's verdicts on the various counts indicated that it believed petitioner was present at the victim's apartment but were not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt about the severity of petitioner's acts at or inside the apartment. Based on the record evidence, a rational jury could have acquitted petitioner of the charge of home invasion and convicted him on the lesser-included offenses of burglary second degree or criminal trespass first or third Degree, offenses carrying significantly less incarceration.

People v. Ogilvie*, 989 N.W.2d 250 (Mich. App. 2022). Trial counsel was ineffective where defendant was convicted of felonious assault and possession of a firearm during the commission of a felony and trial counsel had failed to object to improper instructions regarding the principles applicable to defendant's claim of self-defense. The case involved a confrontation between defendant and his neighbor that occurred on defendant's front lawn. It was undisputed that defendant pulled his handgun and pointed it at the neighbor. According to defendant, he did so only after the neighbor physically and verbally threatened and assaulted him, refused to leave, and placed defendant in fear of his and his son's personal safety by making a gesture defendant construed as reaching for a weapon. The jury was erroneously instructed on use of deadly force instead of the appropriate instruction on use of nondeadly force. Additionally, the jury was improperly instructed regarding the duty to retreat, tying it to deadly force instead of nondeadly force. Trial counsel conceded that his failure to request appropriate instructions was not strategic. Prejudice is found on this record. "The jury was essentially asked to decide only whether defendant reasonably believed [his neighbor] was reaching for a weapon. Had the jury been properly instructed, it would have been asked to resolve an issue much more favorable to the defense: whether defendant reasonably believed that pointing his gun at [the neighbor] was necessary to protect himself or his son from the imminent unlawful use of nondeadly force by [the neighbor]." There is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different.

People v. Leffew*, 975 N.W.2d 896 (Mich. 2022). Where husband and wife were convicted of different degrees of home invasion and the husband was also convicted of felonious assault, trial counsel were ineffective in failing to request an instruction on the defense of others. Defendants Micheline and Jeremiah Leffew were living with Jeremiah's mother, Donna Knezevich, and her partner of more than 25 years, Lisa Seibert. After a fight between Knezevich and Seibert, Seibert left and stayed with Michael Porter. Knezevich and Seibert then reconciled over the telephone and the Leffews and Knezevich went to Porter's home to pick up Seibert. What happened at Porter's home was disputed. Micheline and Jeremiah testified that Porter was physically preventing Seibert from leaving and, in response to her cries for help, they broke into the home where an altercation occurred between themselves and Porter. Porter's account had Micheline and Jeremiah as the aggressors and no restraint or harm by him on Seibert. Seibert's testimony was similar to Porter's version of events but she was impeached by her earlier statements that conformed more to what the Leffews claimed had occurred. Although defense counsel argued that Micheline's and Jeremiah's intrusion into Porter's home was justified because of their reasonable fear that Seibert was in imminent danger, counsels' failure to request a defense-of-others instruction resulted in the jury not being told that the law allowed Jeremiah's and Micheline's defense. Rejecting the contrary view of the lower appellate court and looking to common law, the Michigan Supreme Court ruled that the affirmative defense of defense of others applied to nonassaultive crimes and that trial counsel acted unreasonably in failing to request appropriate instructions on that defense both as to the home invasion and felonious assault charges. On the record of this case, prejudice is established as to all convictions.

State v. Garcia-Lorenzo*, 517 P.3d 424 (Utah App. 2022). In sexual abuse of a child case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek a jury instruction that specifically directed the jurors that they needed to unanimously agree upon which acts formed the basis for each criminal charge. Petitioner was charged with only two crimes, but the prosecution presented evidence of four physical acts that could potentially have amounted to criminal behavior. The State's argument that its closing argument negated any prejudice as to the sodomy count was unpersuasive. "Our review of the State's closing argument reveals that the prosecutor fell short of sufficiently and clearly instructing the jury regarding which act corresponded with the sodomy count." With regard to the aggravated sexual abuse count, there existed a reasonable basis in the evidence for jurors to disagree on whether all of the alleged acts of aggravated sexual abuse occurred. Additionally, one of the acts alleged could have qualified as either sodomy or aggravated sexual abuse. On this record, there is at least a reasonable probability that the absence of a specific jury unanimity instruction made a difference in the outcome of the case.

2021: McCullough v. State, 327 So.3d 955 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in case where petitioner shot his sister's fiancée after an argument and trial counsel consented to a jury instruction that legally negated petitioner's only theory of the case – self-defense. The victim and petitioner's sister claimed that petitioner shot the victim after the two men had been in a physical altercation but had shaken hands before petitioner pulled out the gun. Petitioner's account in a police interview and in his trial testimony had the victim as the aggressor who was shot by petitioner to protect himself. The forcible-felony self-defense instruction that trial counsel consented to was inapplicable to the case at hand because petitioner was not charged with any forcible felony other than the shooting and it effectively precluded the jury from finding that petitioner acted in self-defense. (The instruction at issue precludes an assertion of self-defense when a defendant "is attempting to commit, committing, or escaping after the commission of a forcible felony.") Prejudice is found because "[s]elf-defense was [petitioner's] only trial strategy, and the parties' differing accounts of the incident were both plausible. In addition, and contrary to the State's characterization of it, the limited forensic evidence supported both [petitioner's] and the State's theories."

Claudio-Martinez v. State*, 324 So.3d 45 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). Defendant who was convicted of aggravated battery with a deadly weapon was entitled to a new trial due to defense counsel's failure to obtain a jury instruction on the justifiable use of nondeadly force. The victim was stabbed after defendant, according to his trial testimony, came to the defense of his cousin who was being beaten with a broomstick by the victim. When the jury instructions were discussed after the defense rested, the trial court announced that it had included the standard instruction related to the justifiable use of deadly force. There was no mention of the justifiable use of nondeadly force, and defense counsel did not request an instruction on the justifiable use of nondeadly force. In fact, when the prosecutor during closing argument began giving an explanation of the justifiable use of nondeadly force, defense counsel objected and a sidebar conference was held whereby everyone agreed that the jury instructions included only an instruction on deadly force. Again, defense counsel did not request an instruction on the justifiable use of nondeadly force. “On the face of this record it is clear that [defendant] was entitled to this instruction and that the failure to request it prejudiced him.” The victim was stabbed in the back, near his shoulder blade. This did not constitute deadly force as a matter of law leaving it a question for the jury. And because the use of deadly force is permitted in a narrower set of circumstances than the use of nondeadly force, defendant was prejudiced by the missing instruction.

People v. Bruemmer*, 192 N.E.3d 823 (Ill. App. Ct. 2021). Defendant’s conviction for criminal abuse or neglect of an elderly person, her father, is reversed where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on the statutory good faith exception to the charged crime. During opening statements trial counsel informed the jury that the evidence would show defendant did the best she could to care for her father despite difficult circumstances. Trial counsel then elicited evidence that defendant made a good faith effort to provide for her father’s care but through no fault of her own she was unable to provide such care. Based on the evidence presented, “a jury instruction on the good faith exception was necessary to a fair determination in this case” and “it was objectively unreasonable for defense counsel to forgo requesting a good faith instruction.” Notably, in post-trial comments, the trial court essentially described defendant’s conduct as falling within the “good faith” exemption. The good faith exception would have given the jury another lens through which it could view the evidence, but the jury did not know it had that lens available. The jury not being instructed on an exception that would remove defendant’s criminal liability rendered the proceeding fundamentally unfair.

Washington v. State*, 177 N.E.3d 498 (Ind. Ct. App. 2021). In robbery-murder case, trial counsel rendered constitutionally deficient performance when he failed to object to an erroneous jury instruction that stated the jury could disregard mitigating evidence of sudden heat if it found petitioner guilty of murder. Trial counsel was further ineffective when he tendered an instruction, accepted by the trial court, that erroneously stated that the State had the burden of proving the existence of sudden heat beyond a reasonable doubt as an element of voluntary manslaughter, rather than that the State had the burden of disproving the existence of sudden heat beyond a reasonable doubt. The killing in this case occurred at the victim’s home after petitioner demanded payment for a drug debt and the victim refused. When the victim attempted to physically force petitioner out of his apartment, a struggle ensued during which petitioner pulled out a knife and slashed the victim’s throat repeatedly, including after the victim was on the ground. Petitioner then took money from the victim before fleeing. That the jury rejected petitioner’s self-defense claim did not negate prejudice from counsel’s deficient performance as there was sufficient evidence for the jury to have found that the killing occurred under a sudden heat and so a properly instructed jury could have found petitioner guilty of voluntary manslaughter instead of murder.

Wallace v. State*, 257 A.3d 1129 (Md. App. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an instruction on second degree murder that erroneously allowed the jury to reach a guilty verdict with a less demanding finding of intent— i.e. a finding of intent to inflict serious bodily harm as opposed to a finding of intent to kill. Given that the jury acquitted petitioner on the charge of attempted first degree murder, which like attempted second degree murder also required an intent to kill, prejudice is found from counsel’s deficiency. Petitioner’s remaining convictions for related crimes were unsullied by the erroneous instruction.

Commonwealth v. Montalvo, 244 A.3d 359 (Pa. 2021). In capital murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the trial court mistakenly instructed the jury that it had to convict petitioner if it concluded that the Commonwealth had failed to meet its burden of proving petitioner’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The Commonwealth’s contention that the incorrect language may have actually been the result of a typographical error by the court reporter rather than a misstatement by the trial court was rejected on the ground that the Commonwealth failed to avail itself of the record correction process at the appropriate time. Also unpersuasive was the Commonwealth’s contention that the legal principle at issue is so well known to the public that the jury must have applied the correct standard when convicting petitioner. This is because “a jury member’s prior or extraneous knowledge regarding critical legal precepts is irrelevant.” Nor did the fact that the trial court properly articulated the beyond a reasonable doubt standard during voir dire suffice to ensure that the jury was accurately instructed. Notably, the trial court had provided a second erroneous instruction along the same vein, which the trial court termed a “Freudian slip” after being corrected by defense counsel. (The trial court had stated: “if you find that the Defendant was not involved in this, you should find him guilty of all those charges.”) “[T]he trial court’s second erroneous instruction to the jury, and the trial judge’s purported correction of the misstatement when brought to its attention by trial counsel, could only have served to prejudice [petitioner] even further.” This is because, by “characterizing her own erroneous instruction to the jury as a ‘Freudian slip,’ the trial judge conveyed to the jury her belief that [petitioner] was guilty.” This second misstatement and correction fully supported the lower court’s finding that petitioner was entitled to relief. POST-SCRIPT: The homicide charges against Noel Montalvo were subsequently dropped and he pleaded guilty to tampering with evidence. Noel Montalvo Exonerated Twenty Years After Pennsylvania Sent Him to Death Row | Death Penalty Information Center

State v. Eyre*, 500 P.3d 776 (Utah 2021). In aggravated robbery case where defendant was tried as an accomplice, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an erroneous mens rea instruction. Defendant was charged with aiding in the robbery of two persons, one of whom shot and killed the actual robber. Defendant denied having agreed to participate in the robbery. While the evidence was conflicting about his actions at the time, the two victims both indicated that defendant did not directly participate in the botched robbery or show a weapon. He did engage in conduct that was part of the actual robber’s plan for feigning a dead battery in order to lure the victims into position for the robbery of their persons and vehicle. In order for defendant to be convicted of the charged crime, the jury had to find that defendant both intended that aggravated robbery be committed and that he intentionally aided the commission of the aggravated robbery. The challenged instruction to the jury, however, was devoid of an explanation as to the mens rea requirement of the underlying offense. Although two additional instructions more clearly defined the dual mens rea requirements under an accomplice liability theory, they did not cure the erroneous instruction but rather instilled more confusion by contradicting it. On the facts of this case, where the defense hinged on a lack of intentionality as to the robbery, the failure to object to the erroneous instruction constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is found in light of the evidence from which the jury could reasonably have concluded that defendant did not harbor the intent to commit the robbery, but rather was attempting to buy time or appease the actual robber when he acted as he did.

State v. Mendoza*, 496 P.3d 275 (Utah App. 2021). In obstruction of justice case, trial counsel was ineffective by failing to object to an instruction that did not specify that the jurors had to unanimously agree on which of the several listed acts had actually been committed by defendant or to request a special verdict form that would have required the jury to indicate the act they unanimously agreed had been committed by defendant. No objectively competent attorney would have failed to request a clarifying instruction. In assessing prejudice, it was noted that the prosecutor did not focus on a single act that would satisfy the actus reus element. This decreased the reviewing court’s confidence that the jurors unanimously agreed that defendant had committed a specific act. Additionally, none of the facts presented in this case obviously fell within any of the enumerated alternative elements. Thus, any presumption that the jury would have voted on any particular element or elements is simply speculation. “[H]ad the jury been required to deliberate regarding the specific act that satisfied the statutory element, we believe there exists a reasonable probability that the proceeding’s outcome would have differed”

State v. Secrease*, 493 P.3d 335 (Mt. 2021). In DUI case which included a charge of obstructing a peace officer for defendant’s refusal to permit the drawing of his blood after a warrant was obtained, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to instructions on the obstruction charge that effectively reduced the State’s burden of proof. (The jury was told only that defendant had to be aware of his conduct and did not explain the requirement that defendant also needed to be aware of the result of his conduct—that refusing the blood test after the peace officer had obtained a search warrant was obstructing, hindering, or impairing the enforcement of the criminal law.) There could be no plausible justification for counsel’s failure to request appropriate instructions. Prejudice is found despite the fact that the prosecutor’s argument to the jury correctly described what the jury needed to find in order to convict defendant of the obstruction count. “It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury on the law, and that duty cannot be delegated to counsel.” Additionally, in this case the jury showed confusion on the results-based nature of the obstruction charge in a note to the court and, in response to that confusion, they were referred back to the incorrect conduct-based instruction. There is a reasonable probability of a different verdict had the jury been properly instructed.

2020: State v. Grunwald, 478 P.3d 1 (Utah 2020). In aggravated murder case involving the killing of a police officer, defendant, who was charged as an accomplice, was denied the effective assistance of counsel by the failure of her attorney to object to flawed instructions on accomplice liability.

Capital Case*

Defendant's vehicle was stopped at the side of the road with hazard lights on. She was in the driver's seat and her boyfriend was in the passenger seat when the victim stopped to assist. Because defendant's boyfriend had an outstanding warrant, he provided the officer with false names when the officer was checking their identities. The defendant's boyfriend ultimately shot and killed the victim and the defendant drove off. Defendant claimed that while the officer was checking the second false name her boyfriend had given the officer, her boyfriend put a gun to her head and threatened her and her family. He then demanded that she put her foot on the brake, and, after she complied with this demand, he shifted the vehicle into drive. After her boyfriend commenced shooting at the officer, defendant began driving only after her boyfriend yelled "go, go, go" at her. Defendant testified she did not know her boyfriend intended to kill the victim. According to her, even after her boyfriend had shot his gun, she assumed he had merely attempted to disable the police car. Defendant did admit, however, that she twice heard her boyfriend say that he was going to "buck [the victim] in the fucking head." But she testified that she did not know what this statement meant and that her boyfriend refused to clarify his meaning when she asked him to do so. On appeal, the lower appellate court agreed with defendant that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to object to the accomplice instructions because they impermissibly: (1) permitted conviction based on a finding of recklessness, a less culpable mental state than is required by statute, (2) permitted conviction based on intentional aid that was not directly connected to the murder, and (3) permitted conviction based on a finding that defendant knew that the principal actor's conduct was reasonably certain to result in aggravated murder, rather than on the finding that she knowingly committed the actus reus to help the principal actor in committing the murder. It found, however, that defendant failed to establish the requisite prejudice. The Utah Supreme Court disagreed. "[W]e conclude there is a reasonable probability at least one member of the jury based his or her conviction on an accepted version of events that would have been insufficient to sustain a conviction had the instruction been given correctly." A significant factor in the decision was the absence of any direct evidence contradicting defendant's testimony. (Her boyfriend, the principle actor, was shot and killed after an extended police chase.) The majority criticizes the dissent for disregarding the defendant's testimony and resting its conclusion on what appear to be a number of assumptions about what defendant was thinking at the time of the murder and the effect certain evidence, particularly defendant's testimony, would have on a jury. The majority responds:

[A]s an appellate court, we are not well-positioned to make the type of unequivocal credibility determinations upon which [the dissent's] conclusion rests. Although a jury could possibly react to the evidence in the way [the dissent] assumes it would, we conclude, after considering the totality of the evidence, that there is a reasonable probability it could react differently. For this reason, the three errors in the jury instruction have undermined our confidence in the guilty verdict. [Footnotes omitted].

Maksymowska v. State*, 310 So.3d 1053 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on prescription defense where defendant was charged and convicted of, inter alia, two counts of drug possession. After defendant was pulled over by police, she consented to a search of her purse. The officer found oxycodone and clonazepam. Defendant explained that the pills belonged to her grandmother. After the guilt verdict, but before sentencing, defense counsel informed the trial court that he had failed to request a jury instruction on the prescription defense because he was unaware that holding a controlled substance as an agent for a person who had a prescription was an affirmative defense to the possession charges. Defendant was nevertheless sentenced on the drug convictions and defense counsel's motion for judgment of acquittal notwithstanding the verdict and for new trial were denied. "[Defendant's] sole defense was that she was holding the pills for her ailing grandmother. By neglecting to request an instruction that was central to [defendant's] case, trial counsel deprived her of her only defense. Hence, it is clear on the face of the record that counsel's performance was deficient and that [defendant] was prejudiced by his failure to request the prescription defense."

Capital Case*

Slack v. State*, 841 S.E.2d 231 (Ga. App. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on the statute of limitation with regard to the child-cruelty charge where the indictment did not include any tolling language as to that count. The fact that it was undisputed at trial that the victim's age at the time of the alleged offense met the tolling requirement did not save the flawed indictment which rendered proof of age inadmissible. "Because the State did not allege a basis for tolling [of the child-cruelty charge], because the State could thus not meet its burden [footnote omitted] of proving that the crime occurred within the statute of limitation, and because the trial court did not properly instruct the jury on the State's burden in this regard, trial counsel's performance was deficient." Without tolling, an instruction on the statute of limitation was authorized and there is a reasonable probability of a different outcome had the instruction been given.

People v. Sperry*, 179 N.E.3d 860 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel as to a charge of aggravated battery where trial counsel acquiesced with the State to withhold an instruction defining the term "knowingly," an element of the battery charge, after the jury sent a note asking for clarification of its meaning. The victim had testified that defendant intentionally shot him. In contrast, defendant claimed that the gun went off accidentally. The jurors asked: "Does 'knowingly discharged a firearm,' mean he intended to discharge the gun on purpose or he knew a gun was discharged?" Had trial counsel requested that the court provide instruction to the jury on the proper definition of "knowingly," counsel could have precluded jury confusion leading to an aggravated battery conviction even though it found that the weapon did discharge accidentally.

State v. Davis*, 951 N.W.2d 8 (Iowa 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in murder case by failing to object that the marshaling instruction for the first-degree murder charge failed to cross-reference the defendant's insanity defense. Without such a cross-reference, which was included in all nine of the marshaling instructions for lesser included offenses, the jury was allowed to conclude the insanity defense did not apply to first-degree murder. No tactical basis could be discerned to justify trial counsel's failure to object, particularly given that counsel had unsuccessfully requested an instruction that properly included the cross-reference. In finding that defendant suffered the requisite prejudice, the strength of his insanity defense was considered, which included testimony by two medical experts, as well as the prosecutor's argument that told the jury that its work was done after it considered the elements of first-degree murder.

State v. Winbush*, 2020 WL 1466307 (Tenn. Crim. App. March 24, 2020). In drug case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to jury instructions on an offense different from the one charged. Defendant was prejudiced because he was convicted for offenses that were not in the jury instructions.

2019: State v. Alires, 455 P.3d 636 (Utah Ct. App. 2019). In case where appellant was charged with six counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child -- two counts for conduct toward his youngest daughter and four counts for conduct toward one of his daughter's friends -- and appellant was convicted of one count for each victim and acquitted of the remaining four counts, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction requiring the jury to reach a unanimous verdict with respect to each act for which he was convicted. The charges stemmed from an incident when the friend and another girl were staying over at appellant's home for his daughter's eleventh birthday. Appellant was interacting with the girls in an attempt to lighten the mood after appellant and his wife had gotten into a loud argument that was overheard by the girls. The friend gave vague testimony about appellant touching her butt while they were dancing but "trying to make it look like it wasn't happening." After appellant sat between the friend and his daughter on the couch, the friend testified that when appellant tickled his daughter, "it looked like he was touching like in her inner thigh, and like moved up to her crotch area." According to the friend, "it was really not tickling, it was more like grabbing and groping [sic]." When appellant announced he was then going to tickle the friend, she replied, "[P]lease don't." Appellant nevertheless started tickling near her "ribcage and then touched [her] breast area" and then he "started tickling [her] inner thighs and did the same thing that he did to [the daughter]." The friend testified, "[H]e slid his hand up to my vagina and started like grabbing, and like groping [sic], I guess" for "[p]robably about seven to 10 seconds." Although the daughter and the friend reported that some touching had occurred to a school counselor, the daughter and the other friend testified at trial that nothing inappropriate happened. The daughter explained that she only confirmed to the school counselor what her friend had told her. The jury was instructed that four of the six charged counts were for conduct perpetrated against the friend and two of the counts were for conduct perpetrated against the daughter, although the conduct at issue was not specified. During closing argument, the prosecutor explained that, based on the friend's testimony, the jury could "ascertain six counts of touching of [the friend]" and that the State was "charging four" of those touches. Regarding appellant's daughter, the prosecutor cited the friend's testimony that she saw appellant touch his daughter on her "inner thigh" and "on her vagina." The prosecutor explained that "any one of those touchings qualifies for each of the counts. One for one. One touch for one count. And . . . it has to be just on the vagina, just on the butt, or just on the breast. It can be any combination." During deliberations, the jury sent a note asking: "Can we please have a clarification on how the counts work? We don't understand how to weigh each count when they are all the same. Not sure what they mean." Even after this question, trial counsel did not request a specific unanimity instruction. Instead, with consent from both parties, the court referred the jury to instructions it had already received. Following appellant's conviction of one count each as to the friend and daughter, trial counsel filed a motion to arrest judgment and for a new trial arguing, inter alia, that the jury instructions were "fatally erroneous in failing to require the jury to find a unanimous verdict." The motions were denied. In finding trial counsel ineffective, the appellate court observed that "[w]here neither the charges nor the elements instructions link each count to a particular act, instructing the jury that it must agree as to which criminal acts occurred is critical to ensuring unanimity on each element of each crime.” Trial counsel’s failure to request a unanimity instruction was objectively unreasonable. This was true even though no prior Utah appellate decisions had applied the Unanimous Verdict Clause to a case where a defendant was charged with multiple counts of the same crime. Trial counsel is not “categorically excused from failure to raise an argument not supported by existing legal precedent.” In any event, a state supreme court decision involving a single count of sexual abuse established that jurors must be unanimous as to the particular act or acts that form the basis for a sexual abuse conviction. “[I]t should have been readily apparent” that although that case “involved a prosecution in which the defendant was charged with and convicted of a single count of sexual abuse that could have been based on any one of a number of separate acts, its holding applies with equal force to a case such as this where a defendant is charged with multiple counts of sexual abuse, each of which could have been based on any one of a number of separate acts.” In finding prejudice, the appellate court noted that the evidence was conflicting both as to which acts occurred and as to appellant’s intent. Given the conflicting evidence, there is a reasonable probability that the jury did not unanimously agree that the same two acts occurred. In addition, the jury’s question showed that the absence of a proper unanimity instruction had a palpable impact on the jury deliberations and undermined confidence in the jury’s verdict.

State v. Resh*, 448 P.3d 1100 (Mt. 2019). In case involving one charge of sexual intercourse without consent and one charge of sexual assault, both stemming from the same incident involving appellant and his fourteen-year-old stepdaughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an instruction that a person under the age of sixteen is incapable of consent as a matter of law which did not differentiate between the two charged offenses. Although the instruction was correct for the sexual intercourse charge, there can be no consent as a matter of law for sexual assault only if the victim is less than fourteen years old. Deficient performance is found because the record provided no plausible justification for defense counsel’s failure to object to an incorrect jury instruction that misstated an element of one of the charged offenses. Under the correct law, the State had the burden of proving the sexual contact was without consent. Regarding prejudice, the Montana Supreme Court found that trial counsel’s deficiency undermined confidence in the verdict.

The State argues that the evidence against Resh was overwhelming. But the instruction allowed the jury to convict Resh solely on evidence of [the victim’s] age. Had trial counsel offered and argued a separate sexual assault “without consent” instruction, the jury would have been required to consider all the testimony, and the result may have been different. Because the jury could have convicted Resh without even considering the witnesses’ credibility, there is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome of the trial. The second prong of Strickland is satisfied, and prejudice is apparent.

Baynum v. State*, 211 A.3d 1075 (Del. Supr. 2019). In case involving multiple convictions arising from petitioner breaking into his estranged wife’s residence and physically accosting her and her new romantic partner, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to ask the trial court to instruct the jury to consider the charge of offensive touching as a lesser-included offense of third-degree assault in connection with petitioner’s attack on his estranged wife’s partner.

Capital Case*

Not only would a conviction of the lesser charge have provided [petitioner] with the possibility of a lighter sentence, but to the extent it would have been based on the absence of physical injury, the corresponding acquittal of the more serious third-degree assault charge would have undermined the State’s prosecution of the first-degree burglary charges, which also had a physical-injury component.

The lower court correctly found that trial counsel’s failure to request the lesser-included offense instruction was deficient. It erred, however, in finding petitioner had failed to establish prejudice. The lower court had reasoned: (1) the jury found petitioner guilty of first-degree burglary when second-degree burglary was offered as a lesser-included offense, rendering a guilty finding on the third-degree assault charge the only possible consistent outcome; and (2) petitioner had not shown that the trial judge would have given him a lesser sentence. The reasoning on the first point was at odds with itself. Looking at it the other way, because the jury did not have the option to consider offensive touching—an offense that does not require injury—the jury likewise might have felt compelled to ignore the option of second-degree burglary, an offense that likewise does not require injury. In other words, if there was a “substantial risk” (as the [lower court] found) that the jury was willing to find [petitioner] guilty of third-degree assault despite no proven injury [rather than acquit him entirely], then it seems that there also was a “substantial risk” that the jury was willing to find [petitioner] guilty of first-degree burglary despite no proven injury in order to maintain a consistent overall verdict.

As to what sentence petitioner might have received: (1) if petitioner would have been found guilty of a lesser offense, that is enough to change the outcome of the case, which is what Strickland requires; and (2) the lower court’s finding that petitioner failed to demonstrate a reasonable probability of a lesser sentence was in conflict with its reasoning that, if the jury had found petitioner guilty of offensive touching instead of third-degree assault, “the logical corollary is that [petitioner] would have been convicted of Burglary Second, not Burglary First.” Second-degree burglary has a less severe sentencing range than first-degree burglary.

State v. Shortall*, 205 A.3d 985 (Md. 2019), affirming 183 A.3d 820 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to instructions that incorrectly increased the number of counts that petitioner could be convicted of. Petitioner was convicted of five misdemeanor counts of failing to comply with a state regulation for disposing of sewage in a manner which may cause pollution of the ground surface and five misdemeanor counts of failure to comply with a state regulation for disposing of sewage without an approved permit. The charges and convictions arose when environmental health department personnel noted that human waste and toilet paper had been discharged outside from a pipe leading from petitioner’s building. The number of counts reflected the number of times inspectors visited the site and observed the sewage before the pipe was finally capped. Under the relevant statute, “[e]ach day on which a violation occurs is a separate violation under this subsection.” The day before trial, the prosecution distributed its requested instructions which including one involving a continuing violation theory which stated that “every day on which a violation is still present constitutes a separate offense until the date the violation is corrected.” After the prosecution rested its case, defense counsel moved for judgment of acquittal on all counts.

Capital Case*

During argument on the motion, the trial court asked the prosecutor what proof there was that any waste was deposited at the site after the initial inspection. The prosecutor responded that it was a continuing violation offense. The acquittal motion was denied. When instructing the jury, the trial court included the continuing violation instruction proffered by the prosecution with no objection by the defense. In argument, the prosecution asserted that the jury could charge petitioner for every day that the water had not been turned off. Defense counsel countered that this argument was “somewhat offensive” because the inspectors spoke of observing the same waste in four visits to the site following the initial inspection. Petitioner was convicted on all counts. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner alleged that the failure to object to the continuing violation instruction constituted deficient performance. Trial counsel testified that no exception was made to the instruction because counsel agreed with the prosecution’s interpretation of the statute after reviewing the authorities it cited. The post-conviction court denied relief, observing that there was no controlling Maryland authority as to whether the continuing violation doctrine applies in cases involving environmental crimes. The Court of Special Appeals reversed, finding that the challenged instruction was an incorrect statement of law and that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to lodge an objection. These findings are upheld. First, the plain language of the statute established that the prosecution’s instruction was legally incorrect. And as for trial counsel, the “failure to except to that instruction and thereby preserve appellate review based on the plain language of the statute and regulations fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.” Regarding the case law the prosecution claimed supported its interpretation of the statute, “[r]easonably competent counsel . . . would have had no difficulty in showing the lack of relevance of those authorities.” Also upheld is the Court of Special Appeals’ finding that petitioner was prejudiced as to his convictions for eight of the ten counts. And the fact that the counts were merged for sentencing does not change that – petitioner still has ten convictions on his criminal record, and that was prejudicial to him. The Court rejects the State’s argument that it should be permitted to retry petitioner on the eight counts under a proper interpretation of the statute, explaining: “Rather than try the case on eight of the offenses on the theory alleged in the charging document, the State convinced the trial court that the disposal of waste which was observed [during the initial inspection], legally could continue as eight additional violations until the pipe was capped. The prosecution does not get a second chance to prove its case by a different theory.”

Copeland v. State*, 277 So.3d 1137 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). In case where appellant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon resulting from a “road rage” incident, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to request a jury instruction for the justifiable use of nondeadly force. Appellant and another driver, Twigg, had an encounter on the highway during which appellant pulled out a handgun while the parties were driving. Twigg testified that appellant pointed the gun at him and threatened to kill him. Appellant denied making any threats, testifying that he only pulled his gun out to deter Twigg from pursuing him. Both parties stopped in the road at which point, according to Twigg, appellant approached Twigg’s car, still holding the gun. Twigg ducked down in his car and when he looked up, appellant had retreated to his motorcycle and no longer had the gun in his hand. Twigg testified that he then attempted to exit his vehicle but that appellant ran back towards him, pinning Twigg between the driver’s door and car frame, causing damage to his car window. Appellant denied Twigg’s accusation and stated that he merely approached the car. Appellant’s defense at trial was that he only displayed the loaded handgun because he was in fear of his life due to Twigg’s aggressive actions towards him. At defense counsel’s request, the jury was instructed on the justifiable use of deadly force in self-defense, which provides that a person is justified in using deadly force if he or she reasonably believes that such force is necessary to prevent imminent death or great bodily harm to himself or to prevent the commission of a forcible felony. No request was made for an instruction on the justifiable use of nondeadly force, which states that nondeadly force may be used when and to the extent a person reasonably believes that such conduct or force is necessary to defend himself or another against the imminent use of unlawful force. But under the facts of the case, appellant was entitled to a nondeadly force self-defense jury instruction. “Counsel’s failure to request this instruction is significant because a defendant’s use of deadly force is justifiable in much narrower circumstances (to prevent imminent death or great bodily harm or the commission of a forcible felony) than the use of nondeadly force (the preventing of imminent use of unlawful force).” Trial counsel can be found to have performed deficiently solely on the appellate record because no strategic reason could be gleaned for counsel’s failure to request the nondeadly force instruction that was, “from an evidentiary standpoint, both easier to establish and factually justified in this case where [appellant’s] own trial testimony was that he simply displayed his firearm.” In finding prejudice, it was noted that the prosecutor was able to argue that Twigg’s alleged conduct did not meet the criteria necessary to invoke deadly force. Additionally, defense counsel essentially argued to the jury that appellant had used what amounted to nondeadly force (drawing a gun), and that this force was entirely justified. But without the nondeadly force instruction, the jury had no ability to give effect to this argument. Because of trial counsel’s deficient performance, “the jury was left with no choice but to decide [appellant’s] fate without the benefit of a proper instruction to evaluate his best, and arguably only, defense.”

State v. Thomas*, 139 N.E.3d 1253 (Ohio Ct. App. 2019). In murder case where appellant unsuccessfully raised self-defense, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction on the “castle doctrine,” which explained that appellant had no duty to retreat. Appellant along with others was visiting the apartment of a woman appellant had an “on again, off again” relationship with. During the evening, appellant and another guest, Dixon, got into an argument. Dixon left and returned sometime later with her boyfriend, Brack. Both Brack and appellant were armed. At trial, it was disputed who initiated the shooting that left Brack and another person in the apartment dead. The jury was instructed on the three elements of self-defense: (1) that the defendant was not at fault in creating the situation giving rise to the affray; (2) that the defendant had a bona fide belief that he was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm and that his only means of escape from such danger was in the use of such force; and (3) that the defendant did not violate any duty to retreat or avoid the danger. The jury was also instructed that the defendant “is presumed to have acted in self-defense when using defensive force that was intended to cause death or great bodily harm to another if the person against whom the defensive force was used had entered, unlawfully and without privilege to do so, the residence occupied by the Defendant.” Such instruction was inapplicable under the circumstances as there was no claim that Brack, who came with an invited guest, had entered the apartment unlawfully. The jury was not instructed pursuant to the castle doctrine which was more properly applicable to the facts of this case. Under this doctrine, a person who lawfully is in someone’s residence has no duty to retreat before using force in self-defense. Because appellant was an invited guest at the time of the party and often lived in the apartment for days at a time, “a castle doctrine instruction should have been given under these circumstances.” Given the conflicting evidence, it was highly possible that the jury rejected appellant’s claim of self-defense because it incorrectly believed he was under a duty to retreat. On this record, there was no strategic basis for

State v. Reid*, 135 N.E.3d 517 (Ohio Ct. App. 2019). Reversing murder conviction due to trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to request a jury instruction on the “castle doctrine.” Defendant stabbed her boyfriend who died from his injuries. The stabbing occurred at defendant’s apartment. Defendant was charged with murder. At trial, defendant argued she had acted in self-defense. Supporting the prosecution’s murder theory were the victim’s brother, the victim’s nephew, and the wife of the victim’s nephew. They, however, had earlier provided inconsistent statements about what they witnessed when interviewed by the police. Questions were also raised about the brother’s memory, how much he had had to drink on the day of the offense, and whether or not he suffered from slight dementia. Evidence was presented establishing that prior to the stabbing, defendant made a 911 call requesting assistance because the victim was assaulting her and would not leave her apartment. The officers arrived after the victim had been stabbed. In her statement to police, which was video recorded and played to the jury, defendant described the events leading up to the stabbing. She corroborated the victim’s brother’s claim that he disarmed her at one point after the victim kicked her and she had retrieved a large knife. When the victim kicked her again, she ran back to the kitchen and grabbed a smaller knife. Defendant told police that she had only intended to scare the victim but she must have hit him with the knife. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that defendant could have left the apartment after calling 911 and waited for the police to arrive. Defense counsel countered that defendant had no duty to retreat from her own apartment when faced with deadly force or fear of harm and that the jury would be instructed on that point. Defense counsel stated that this was known as the “castle doctrine.” No instruction on the castle doctrine was given to the jury, however. Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to request such an instruction. “In the absence of the castle-doctrine instruction, which counsel had stated would be given, the jury reasonably would have believed that [defendant] in fact did have a duty to retreat.” On this record, prejudice is found.

Swanson v. State*, 829 S.E.2d 312 (Ga. 2019). In felony murder case with sale of marijuana as the predicate felony, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury charge on use of force in defense of habitation. The relevant facts are as follows. Appellant agreed through an intermediary to meet the victim at an apartment complex to sell him marijuana. Appellant drove to the complex with other occupants in his vehicle, parked his car and waited for the victim. The victim arrived shortly thereafter and approached appellant’s car on foot. At some point during the encounter, the victim pulled out a firearm. Appellant then pulled out his own gun and shot the victim two times, killing him. Appellant retrieved the bag of marijuana which was laying on the ground before driving off. In his trial testimony, appellant stated that the victim had reached into his vehicle and snatched the bag of marijuana while pointing the gun at appellant. The victim did not leave at that point, however. He continued to point the gun at appellant and stated he wanted more stuff. Appellant retrieved his gun and shot when the victim looked away for a second. One of the occupants of the car testified that she thought the victim grabbed the marijuana that was in the car but was not sure of that detail. Defense counsel’s request for an instruction on use of force in defense of self or others was granted. Under that theory, however, use of force could not be justified if the force at issue was used in the course of committing a felony. Here, appellant had admitted in his testimony to committing a felony, rendering the defense unavailable to appellant. What defense counsel did not do was to request an instruction on use of force in defense of habitation. Under Georgia law, a motor vehicle can constitute a habitation. Importantly, that defense does not include a provision disallowing it if the force was used during commission of a felony. On this record, the Georgia Supreme Court concludes there was sufficient evidence to justify a defense of habitation instruction and a reasonable attorney would have requested it. Defense counsel's explanation for failing to do so was his ignorance of the law including a motor vehicle in the definition of habitation. Defense counsel's performance was deficient. As for prejudice, it is noted that the prosecutor's closing argument both emphasized the inapplicability of the chosen defense because of appellant's commission of a felony and essentially conceded that if a justification defense that was not precluded by law were available, then appellant would have had a strong defense at trial. "This supports the notion that there is a reasonable probability the jury would have returned a different verdict had it been instructed on defense of habitation." In addition, "the record shows that the jury was paying close attention to the defense on which it was instructed, and that it carefully considered whether it could apply that defense in [appellant's] case." This was shown by the jury's question of whether it was bound by the provision of Georgia law stating that a person cannot claim self-defense while committing a felony. Prejudice is established.

2018: Calhoun v. State of Kansas, 426 P.3d 519 (Kan. Ct. App. 2018). In case involving charges of multiple offenses allegedly committed by movant and three others, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the instruction that the jury could convict movant of the aiding and abetting specific intent crimes if it found that the specific intent crimes were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the intended crime of aggravated robbery. Appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise the trial IAC claim on direct appeal. Movant was convicted by a jury of aggravated kidnapping, aggravated criminal sodomy, attempted voluntary manslaughter, aggravated burglary, criminal threat, two counts of aggravated robbery, and two counts of aggravated battery. The charges arose from an incident in which movant and three others broke into a family's home, demanded money, pointed a gun at and threatened to kill a baby who was present, kicked, stomped on, and shot the father, and raped, sodomized, beat the mother and forced her to perform oral sex. Movant testified that he was at the house, that he and the others planned to rob the father who had sold him marijuana in the past, and that he participated in the robbery. He denied that he had committed any of the violent crimes against the mother, father, and baby. A minor who participated in the crimes testified that movant actively participated in the sexual assaults of the mother and punched the father in the head. After movant's convictions were affirmed on direct appeal, he filed a motion raising numerous claims, including ineffective assistance by trial and appellate counsel. The motion was denied and he appealed. The appellate court pointed out that Kansas state law (State v. Overstreet, 200 P.3d 427 (2009)) requires that in order to be convicted of a specific intent crime under an aiding and abetting theory, the defendant must have the same specific intent as the principal. Thus, when a defendant is charged with specific intent crimes under an aiding and abetting theory, the jury must be given the "same mental culpability" instruction, rather than the "foreseeability" instruction, which is only applicable to aiding and abetting general intent crimes. Here, trial counsel failed to object to the instruction that the jury could convict movant of the aiding and abetting specific intent crimes (aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat) if it found that the specific intent crimes were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the intended crime (aggravated robbery). Appellate counsel also failed to raise the trial IAC claim on direct appeal. Both trial and appellate counsel's performance was deficient in this way, and both were prejudicial, given that "the prosecutor's entire rebuttal during closing arguments hinged on telling the jury that they could convict [movant] of all of the crimes charged because they were reasonably foreseeable consequences of the intended robbery," 426 P.3d at 531, that the jury asked questions about the reasonable foreseeability portion of the aiding and abetting instructions, and that the jury acquitted movant of rape and three counts of aggravated criminal sodomy (indicating that it did not believe he aided and abetted all of the crimes). [NOTE: Jurors had provided statements indicating that half the jurors believed he was guilty of all, and half the jurors believed he was guilty of none, one of the jurors had a planned vacation, and they decided to convict of some and acquit of some. The appellate court ruled that it was precluded from considering these statements, but it appears nevertheless that they may have had some effect on the court.] There was a real possibility that the jury would not have found movant guilty of aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat if it had been properly instructed. Under Kansas law, if a movant makes more than conclusory contentions and an evidentiary basis supports movant's claims, the movant is entitled to an evidentiary hearing. In addition, when ineffective assistance of counsel and prejudice is readily apparent from the motion, files, and records of the movant's case, the appellate court has exercised its de novo review and reversed the defendant's conviction and remanded for a new trial without first remanding for an evidentiary hearing. Here, the court decided that this was such a case. The court thus reversed his aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat charges and remanded for a new trial.

State v. Classen*, 422 P.3d 489 (Wash. Ct. App. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an inferior degree offense instruction as to one of the many crimes appellant was charged with. The offenses were based on an event during which a woman, who was driving with her infant son, offered to give appellant a ride, and once he was in the car he refused to get out, beat the woman, sexually assaulted her, and directed her where to drive. He was arrested after the woman and her son escaped from the car, he struck one bystander who was attempting to assist the woman, and other bystanders caught and subdued him. In the information, appellant was charged with second degree assault as to the bystander. He argued on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective as to that charge for failing to request an inferior degree offense instruction for the lesser crime of fourth degree assault. Here, appellant was entitled to such an instruction as it was an inferior degree of the charged offense, and there was evidence that appellant committed only the inferior degree offense. The evidence was that appellant slapped the bystander and then immediately ran away. Viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to appellant, the jury could have found that appellant was not intending to kidnap the bystander or the first victim at the time he slapped her, and intended instead only to harm her. It was clear from the closing argument that trial counsel's failure to request an inferior degree instruction was not a reasonable strategy, because the only statement counsel made about the assault on the bystander was that appellant was "guilty of assault. . . What kind of assault is it? That's the question." Counsel obviously was not pursuing an all or nothing approach to this charge (i.e., that appellant was innocent of the charge), so there was no legitimate reason to fail to request the instruction. Appellant was prejudiced by this failure, because in order to convict him of second degree assault, the jury had to find that appellant committed the assault with the intent to commit a felony – here, the evidence that appellant intended to kidnap either the first or second victim at the time he slapped the second victim was very weak. The Court of Appeals of Washington remanded for a new trial on the assault charge.

2017: White v. Delaware, 173 A.3d 78 (Del. 2017). Petitioner was convicted of first degree reckless endangering and his conviction was affirmed on appeal. He then filed a petition for post-conviction relief, alleging that his counsel was ineffective for failing to request an instruction on the lesser included offense of second degree reckless endangering. The post-conviction court denied relief. The Supreme Court of Delaware reversed the denial of relief, finding that counsel's performance was deficient because counsel did not understand the elements of either first or second degree reckless endangering. First degree required proof of a substantial risk of death, while second degree required proof of a substantial risk of injury, but counsel thought that first degree required proof either of risk of death or risk of serious physical injury (and did not read the statute). Asking for the instruction would have been consistent with trial counsel's strategy – to show that petitioner fired a gun but did not create a substantial risk of death. The evidence in this case, that petitioner was not pointing his gun at anyone in particular but instead behind himself, that there were few people on the street, that the shots went far away from the two people who were there and did not penetrate any residence, could have supported second degree reckless endangering.

Kruse v. State*, 222 So.3d 13 (Fla. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 2017), disapproved on procedural grounds, Steiger v. State, 328 So.3d 926 (Fla. 2021). In a case involving a charge of felony battery on an elderly person with prior conviction, resulting in a conviction of the lesser included offense of felony battery with prior conviction, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to request a self-defense jury instruction. Regarding deficient performance, it was noted that defense counsel elicited testimony from defendant asserting that the victim was the aggressor who first made physical contact and “tried to push” defendant out of the yard. Defense counsel also elicited from a third-party witness that the victim was the first to make physical contact. In addition, defense counsel made arguments during closing that could have reasonably comported with a theory of self-defense. Yet defense counsel inexplicably failed to request an instruction on self-defense. That defense counsel may have reasonably assumed the jury would be skeptical of the defense given that defendant was some twenty years younger than the feeble victim who was punched in the face and had his jaw broken, that didn't explain the failure to request an instruction that coincided with the testimony and argument. As to prejudice, it was observed, inter alia, that the jury expressly asked the court during deliberations whether there was an affirmative defense available in this case, indicating the jury would have seriously considered the possibility that defendant acted in self-defense if that option were available under the instructions.

Hardman v. State*, 217 So.3d 107 (Fla. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 2017). In a case where defendant was convicted of two counts of grand theft, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on good faith. The two transactions at issue involved the exchange of money for promissory notes. Defendant considered the monies loans; the victims (Krenzel and the Diehls) considered the monies an investment. Defendant initially made interest payments to both parties and ultimately attempted to deed property to the Diehls but they deeded it back. When defendant used the monies for personal expenses and failed to repay them, charges were filed. Defendant's recorded statement, which was admitted at trial, indicated that he borrowed $20,000 from Krenzel, promised a percentage back but failed to follow through, an outcome he had not intended. Defendant admitted owing about 1.3 million dollars in bad investments. He was trying to come up with the money. At trial, defense counsel emphasized the theory that the monies were loans and that defendant had attempted to repay them but had invested poorly. In moving for a judgment of acquittal, defense counsel argued that the prosecution had failed to prove defendant's intent to permanently deprive the victims of the money. The motion was granted on security fraud charges but not on those of grand theft. Because the evidence in the record supported a good faith defense, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to request specific instructions on that defense. And given the absence of an instruction on the law applicable to defendant's only defense, there was prejudice.

Burns v. State*, 803 S.E.2d 79 (Ga. Ct. App. 2017). In a case where defendant was convicted, inter alia, of aggravated assault, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction regarding the requirement that accomplice testimony be corroborated. Defendant and the co-defendant had been attempting to sell the victim a stolen car. Following a dispute between the parties, one of the defendants shot the victim. There was conflicting testimony by the victim and eyewitnesses regarding who the shooter was. The co-defendant testified that defendant had been the shooter. The jury was charged: "[t]he testimony of a single witness, if believed, is sufficient to establish a fact. Generally there is no legal requirement of corroboration of a witness provided that you find ... the evidence to be sufficient." Defense counsel raised no objection to the instruction nor requested that an accomplice-corroboration instruction be given. Defendant and the co-defendant were acquitted of numerous charges but both were convicted of theft by receiving stolen property. Defendant alone was convicted of aggravated assault. It was conceded on appeal that defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to request the accomplice instruction. In assessing prejudice, it was first noted that the co-defendant's acquittal of the aggravated assault charge established that defendant had not been convicted on the basis of having been a party to the assault. Second, it was observed that the fact that some evidence corroborated the co-defendant's account did not foreclose a finding of prejudice. "[T]he question is not whether there was sufficient corroboration of the accomplice testimony to allow the jury to rely on that testimony when determining the defendant's guilt. Rather ... the question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the absence of an instruction on the necessity for corroboration of accomplice testimony undermines confidence in the outcome of trial." Prejudice is found because: (1) the co-defendant's identification of defendant as the sole shooter was contradicted by testimony of an eyewitness who affirmatively identified the co-defendant as the shooter; (2) eyewitness description of the clothing worn by the shooter matched clothing the co-defendant was wearing at the time of the crime; (3) an eyewitness testified that the shooter had been seated in the front passenger seat of the car and the co-defendant had admitted that he had been in the front passenger seat, and (4) although the victim stated that both defendants shot him, his testimony indicated that defendant never left the car, implying it was the co-defendant who pursued the victim and delivered the shot that injured him. On this record, the outcome of the trial was likely affected by the absence of an accomplice-corroboration instruction.

Humphrey v. State*, 73 N.E.3d 677 (Ind. 2017). In murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to use of a witness's prior unsworn statement as substantive evidence and failing to request appropriate instructions on how the statement could be considered by the jury. The murder occurred during an attempted drug deal. According to a friend of the murder victim, he and the victim had been driving around in the friend's truck searching for drugs. When they spotted three men who appeared to be dealers, they pulled up near them. One of the men approached the truck and the victim asked him to get in to discuss a drug purchase. As the friend drove, words were spoken between the victim and the dealer who then drew a gun. The victim grabbed the gun and it went off. The dealer jumped out of the moving car and ran away. The victim had been struck in the abdomen and ultimately died from the wound. The victim's friend could only give a vague description of the dealer. A man named Smith testified that he had been with defendant and a man named Brooks on the night of the murder. He observed a truck stop and defendant going to greet it, indicating to Smith that defendant thought the occupants wanted to buy drugs. Although Smith heard the door of the truck open and close, he didn't see defendant get in the truck and he heard no gunshot. He did hear the truck peel out and then defendant returned, telling Smith that the "dude" tried to "gank him" or "git him." Smith had seen defendant with a gun before but not on that night. Brooks, the third man allegedly present that night, gave police an unsworn statement about the events when Brooks was in jail on an unrelated charge. Brooks identified defendant in a photo lineup and stated that defendant went out to a truck, Brooks heard a "noise," and defendant returned stating that he had shot one of the men. At trial, however, Brooks denied being with defendant and Smith on the night of the shooting and claimed that his statement had been fabricated due to police pressure. The statement was admitted to impeach his in-court repudiation. As for trial counsel's failure to object to admission of the unsworn statement on hearsay grounds and to request a limiting instruction, the State argued that defense counsel could reasonably have decided not to further highlight the statement. But this supposed strategic justification for the omission was belied by the record which showed trial counsel's repeated references to the unsworn statement throughout the remainder of the trial, including defense counsel reading out loud the portion of the statement where Brooks identified defendant as the shooter. Trial counsel even expressly asked the jurors during closing argument to consider the out-of-court statement in determining defendant's guilt or innocence. The State's other argument – that trial counsel had a secondary strategy of wanting the Brooks statement admitted in order to sow reasonable doubt – was similarly unpersuasive. First, trial counsel had unsuccessfully objected to admission of the statement on other grounds (lack of foundation). Second, this argument contradicted the primary argument that trial counsel allowed the statement's admission in order to avoid further focus on it. "It defies credulity to say on the one hand that defense counsel strategically elected not to mount a hearsay objection or request a limiting instruction to refrain from drawing attention to Brooks' unsworn statement, but insist on the other hand that counsel wanted to 'use it to show the inconsistencies in the State's key witnesses.'" On this record, the deference normally accorded to trial counsel's acts or omissions was inappropriate and counsel's failure to lodge a hearsay objection to admission of the statement constituted deficient performance. Counsel also performed deficiently in failing to request an admonition or limiting instruction precluding the unsworn statement from being used as substantive evidence rather than only as impeachment evidence. Also deficient was defense counsel's failure to object to a jury instruction that expressly told the jury that it could consider the out-of-court statement in determining defendant's guilt. (The pattern instruction given to the jury had been rendered an incorrect statement of the law by a recent state supreme court ruling.) As to prejudice, the court observed: "[E]vidence improperly considered by the jury for want of a limiting instruction is no less prejudicial than evidence presented which should have never been introduced in the first instance. Both permit the jury to improperly determine guilt based information that should not be considered. Even if Brooks' unsworn statement was properly admitted for impeachment purposes, counsel failed to limit the use of that statement to his client's detriment." On the record before it, the court concluded there was a reasonable probability of a more favorable verdict had counsel not acted deficiently.

State v. Virgil*, 895 N.W.2d 873 (Iowa 2017). In domestic assault abuse case, third offense, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction defining "household member." The marshaling instruction required the State to prove the assault occurred “between family or household members who resided together at the time of the incident or persons who have been family or household members residing together within the past year but not residing together at the time of the incident.” If that element was not proven, the instructions permitted the jury to convict defendant of simple assault. The central issue at trial was whether defendant and the victim had been cohabitating. The first trial resulted in a hung jury. At the retrial, the jury asked during deliberations to define “Reside + Domestic.” Without objection by defense counsel, the jury was told to refer to the ordinary meaning of the words. Defendant was convicted of the charge. There was no argument made that defense counsel had a strategic basis for failing to request the uniform instruction either before or after the jury submitted its questions. At issue was whether defendant was prejudiced by counsel’s omission. Evidence at trial showed that during defendant’s eight-month relationship with the victim, he spent three or four nights a week at her rented home. He was not on the lease or the utilities and did not pay any rent or household expenses. When he stayed over, he and the victim shared meals. Defendant kept a cell phone and a garbage bag with some clothes at the victim’s home but no other possessions. The rest of his belongings were at his uncle or cousin’s home, where he stayed three or four nights a week. He did not have a key to the victim’s home but could come and go as he pleased. He was not allowed to have guests. He did not receive mail or phone calls at the victim’s home, but she believed he gave his family her address as his own.. On most days, he provided child care to the victim’s children. Although the victim claimed she and defendant were not living together, she acknowledged saying that to avoid jeopardizing her section 8 housing subsidy, which prohibits nonfamily cohabitants. Defendant and the victim had begun their relationship in late 2013. The first assault occurred in May 2014, after which the victim told defendant he was no longer welcome in her home and the relationship ended in June. Defendant assaulted the victim again in August 2014. The assault at issue here occurred in October 2014, with defendant first accosting the victim on the street and telling her he had nowhere to go. When the victim reached her doorway, defendant pushed her inside and assaulted her. On this record, the jury could have found either way on the cohabitation issue, thereby establishing prejudice from defense counsel’s failure to request a uniform instruction that defined “household members” and “cohabitating.” (The instruction defined “family or household members” as persons cohabiting with each other, and then explained: “‘Cohabiting’ does not require a sexual relationship, but does require more than dwelling or living together in the same place. To determine if the defendant and (victim) were cohabiting at the time of the alleged offense, you may consider whether they had sexual relations while sharing the same living quarters; they shared income or expenses; they jointly used or owned property together; they held themselves out as husband and wife; the continuity and length of their relationship, and any other facts shown by the evidence bearing on their relationship with each other.”)

State v. Brown*, 96 N.E.3d 1128 (Ohio Ct. App. 2017). In felonious assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction on self-defense. At trial, the victim and defendant’s girlfriend testified that defendant attacked the victim after finding the victim in defendant’s girlfriend’s home. Defendant, in contrast, testified that he had no intention of getting into a physical altercation with the victim. It was only after the victim tackled him, nearly causing defendant to fall down a steep flight of stairs, that defendant fought back. Trial counsel requested an instruction on the lesser offense of aggravated assault but it was denied. Trial counsel then unsuccessfully argued to the jury that the prosecution had failed to establish each element of felonious assault. Because defendant was at the least a visiting guest at the time of the incident, he had no duty to retreat prior to using force in self-defense. In order to warrant a jury instruction on self-defense, D only needed to submit evidence demonstrating that he was not at fault in creating the situation giving rise to the altercation with the victim, and that he had an honest belief that he was in imminent danger of bodily harm, i.e., that he acted out of fear of bodily harm. Defendant's testimony made the requisite showing for the self-defense instruction. Because of that, trial counsel's failure to request the instruction fell below an objective standard of reasonable representation. Prejudice is established despite the State's claim that defendant's self-serving testimony would not have been credited in light of the testimony of his girlfriend and the victim. Notably, there were significant credibility issues with both the testimony of the victim and the girlfriend. "Given the testimony and the various credibility issues, we find that there is a reasonable probability that the jury might have accepted Brown's version of events and concluded that Brown acted in self-defense when he fought with [the victim]. In other words, there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's failure to request the self-defense instruction, the out-come of trial would have been different, thus prejudicing Brown."

Commonwealth v. Domek*, 167 A.3d 761 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2017). In case involving a conviction for aggravated assault against a corrections officer ("CO"), trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an erroneous jury charge which permitted the jury to return a guilty verdict upon a finding that defendant acted recklessly. Under state law, aggravated assault required that the defendant acted intentionally or knowingly in causing the bodily injury. Regarding prejudice, it was noted that defendant had also been charged with assault by a prison on the same CO. That crime required the jury to find that "it was the intended conscious goal or purpose to cause serious bodily injury." Defendant was acquitted of that count. This demonstrated that the aggravated assault conviction might well have been premised on a finding of recklessness. Upon review of the record, the court could not conclude that the evidence tending to show that defendant intentionally or knowingly injured the CO was so overwhelming as to overcome the prejudice caused by the erroneous jury instruction. The testimony offered by the Commonwealth tended to show that defendant merely fell backwards onto the CO while he was being restrained by two other officers.

In re Sharrow*, 175 A.3d 1236 (Vt. 2017). In case where defendant was convicted of attempted second-degree murder, defendant was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance in failing to object to jury instructions that did not require that the State prove the absence of passion or provocation in order to convict for attempted second-degree murder and did not include attempted voluntary manslaughter as a lesser offense. Defendant and the complainant in this case had been involved in a volatile relationship with allegations of abusive behavior by defendant leading to police involvement on a number of occasions. On the night at issue, complainant stated that defendant came to her apartment to visit. At some point he became angry and assaulted her. When neighbors heard her screams and came to her aid, complainant left with them to call the police and defendant left the premises. Later that night, defendant reentered the apartment through a window and threatened to kill complainant for calling the police earlier. He punched her and began to strangle her. He retrieved one or more knives from the kitchen and continued the assault. The neighbors again heard screams and called the police. Defendant was arrested at the apartment. Complainant had multiple knife wounds to her head, neck, arm, and back, most of which were superficial but at least one of which was potentially life threatening. Defendant told a starkly different version of events. He testified that complainant drank often and was frequently abusive while drunk. On prior occasions she had sprayed him with mace, and a couple of weeks before the incident at issue complainant hit defendant over the head with a cutting board. Defendant admitted entering through the window on the night in question but claimed he did not intend to kill complainant. According to defendant, he found complainant shaking, upset, and holding a knife with the blade up. Because of the earlier cutting board incident, and because he "didn't want to get stuck with the knife," he grabbed hold of complainant's wrist. The two struggled violently as he tried to get her to drop the knife. Defendant claimed that the knife remained in complainant's hand throughout the struggle, and that he did not realize she had been cut by the knife during the struggle. He eventually succeeded in getting complainant to drop the knife. As he was leaving, defendant grabbed a butterfly knife that was on the kitchen counter so complainant couldn't use it on him. He testified that he never touched her with that knife. Police arrested defendant on the porch as he left complainant's apartment. He had the butterfly knife hidden in his sleeve and a small cut between the fingers of his right hand. The State argued that defendant had stabbed complainant in a premeditated and deliberate attempt to kill complainant. Trial counsel argued self-defense. The trial court instructed the jury on attempted first-degree murder, attempted second-degree murder, and aggravated assault, as well as self-defense. The trial court concluded that the evidence did not support instructions on attempted voluntary manslaughter and on the burden on the State to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had not acted out of passion or provocation in order to convict on attempted second-degree murder. Trial counsel did not object to the instructions. The post-conviction court found that there had been sufficient evidence to justify the omitted instructions and trial counsel's failure to object was deficient performance. That finding was not challenged on appeal. At issue was the lower court's finding of prejudice. The jury clearly disbelieved defendant's story of self-defense and concluded that he intentionally attempted to kill complainant by stabbing her. The omitted jury instructions would not have affected the jury's conclusion on these points. Nevertheless, three reasons supported the lower court's finding. "First, the error in this case removed from the jury's consideration an essential element of the second-degree murder charge. Second, the existence of that element was supported by substantial evidence. Third, the State's burden of proof on this element was high. The fact that, to acquit of attempted second-degree murder and convict [defendant] of voluntary manslaughter, the jury would have had to credit portions of [defendant's] testimony while rejecting most of it does not undermine our conclusion." "[J]uries routinely accept and reject portions of testimony in determining what actually happened. This is sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome of the trial."

2016: Dumas v. State, 786 S.E.2d 508 (Ga. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in rape and child molestation case for failing to ask for a curative jury instruction following improper comments by the state concerning the defendant's post-arrest silence. During the defendant's testimony, the state questioned him six times about his post-arrest silence. Each time counsel objected and the court sustained the objections. Counsel failed, however, to object or request a curative instruction or mistrial when the prosecutor also commented on the defendant's post-arrest silence in closing arguments. This conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the evidence of guilt was "not overwhelming." The alleged victim waited 10 years to report the alleged abuse and the state's case was built entirely on her testimony and her family's testimony about changes in her behavior.

Mellerio v. Nooth*, 379 P.3d 560 (Or. Ct. App. 2016). Trial counsel was ineffective as to two counts of coercion for failing to request a jury concurrence instruction. Defendant was charged with kidnapping, assaulting, menacing and coercing two woman. The coercion at issue here involved threats to each of the women to abstain from certain conduct - reporting defendant's conduct to a couple they met in the course of the offenses, and calling the authorities following the offenses. One count went to one victim, the second to the other victim. Because the counts implicated "multiple factual scenarios," jurors could return a verdict of guilt on either count without actually having agreed on the same predicate occurrence of coercion. Trial counsel's failure to request a jury concurrence instruction with respect to the two counts constituted a failure to exercise reasonable professional skill and judgment. (Trial counsel explained that such an instruction had not been requested because counsel did not believe, mistakenly as it turns out, that there had been multiple factual scenarios present for the counts at issue.) Prejudice is found because, on the record presented, some jurors could have found persuasive the victim's testimony about coercion as to revealing defendant's conduct to the couple while disbelieving alleged coercion as to police nondisclosure. Other jurors could have found the obverse.

Cusumano v. State*, 494 S.W.3d 652 (Mo. Ct. App. 2016). In rape and sodomy case, defense counsel was ineffective in submitting lesser included offense instructions that waived the statute of limitations bar to defendant's ultimate convictions in this case, solely to support an untenable and largely unintelligible defense theory unsupported by Missouri law. Defendant was charged with three class A felonies. Defense counsel sought to have the charges dismissed on statute of limitations grounds despite the fact that Missouri law unambiguously provided that class A felonies were not subject to a statute of limitations. When that failed, defense counsel offered jury instructions on lesser included, unclassified felonies of forcible rape and sodomy. The instructions were given and the jury convicted defendant of the lesser included offenses. Defense counsel then renewed his prior motion to dismiss the class A felonies, arguing that the court had been retroactively deprived of its jurisdiction over prosecution of defendant on the class A felony charges because his convictions of the lesser included offenses were time-barred and, most critically, demonstrated that there was no evidence of the aggravating facts required to prove the class A felony versions of the crimes. Not only was this convoluted argument unsupported by the law, by submitting the instructions on the lesser included offenses, counsel waived defendant's statute of limitations objections to the time-barred offenses of which defendant was ultimately convicted. That defendant had not been convicted of the class A felonies did not establish that there was insufficient evidence to have charged him with those crimes. Thus the trial court had not lacked jurisdiction. Defense counsel's explanation for his strategy was premised on his mistaken belief that the class A felonies were subject to a statute of limitations and that his actions would somehow have preserved that non-existent affirmative defense. The motions court clearly erred in finding that defense counsel submitted the lesser included offenses instructions in order to give the jury an opportunity to render compromise verdicts which carried lesser sentences. Defense counsel had expressly stated that the lower sentence would not really matter and it was clear that his decision was based on his erroneous understanding of the law. As to prejudice, it was "a certainty that but for counsel's unreasonable submission of those instructions, the result in this case would have been different (i.e., [defendant] would not have been convicted of standard forcible rape and forcible sodomy)."

Hoerber v. State*, 488 S.W.3d 648 (Mo. 2016). Counsel ineffective in statutory sodomy case for failing to object to "verdict directors" (instructions on specific elements the state must prove in order to convict) that were so broad that the defendant could have been convicted in violation of his right to a unanimous verdict. Missouri law requires that the verdict must be definite and certain as to the crime committed. Here, the two “verdict directors” failed to identify a specific act or incident of abuse despite testimony at trial regarding multiple incidents of sexual molestation. Thus, the jurors could have convicted the defendant without unanimous agreement as to the specific acts on which the guilty verdict was based. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial as “one juror could have found Mr. Hoeber guilty of an act that occurred in the kitchen, while another juror could have found him guilty of an act that occurred in the bathroom.”

Marty v. State*, 210 So.3d 121 (Fla. Ct. App. 2nd Dist. 2016). In a case where defendant was convicted of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, trial counsel “was ineffective for neglecting to request a jury instruction on the justifiable use of nondeadly force, the only self-defense instruction supportable by the undisputed facts presented at trial. Instead, [trial] counsel requested a self-defense instruction on the justifiable use of deadly force, which is applicable in a narrower set of circumstances as compared to nondeadly force.” There was no apparent strategic reason to make the burden of proving self-defense more difficult, “especially because self-defense was essential to [defendant’s] theory of defense at trial.” The incident leading to the charge and conviction concerned an altercation between defendant and one of his neighbors. Although the accounts of what exactly occurred differed, there was no question that defendant did not fire his gun at the victim. And even if defendant had, as the victim contended, pointed his gun at her, this was, as a matter of law, the use of nondeadly force. Defense counsel’s deficient performance was prejudicial because it was reasonably probable that the jury believed that defendant was entitled to use some form of self-defense against the neighbor, but not to the extent of deadly force.

Gibson v. State*, 786 S.E.2d 121 (S.C. 2016). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the court’s omission of permissive inference language in the jury instruction on malice and the use of a deadly weapon. The evidence showed that there was a fight between two groups at a bar. Afterwards, the defendant’s brother called him for a ride. After the defendant arrived at the bar, there was a physical altercation between the two groups in the parking lot. Several gunshots were heard and the victim died from a single shot to the back of his shoulder. The defendant told police that he pointed his weapon at someone he thought was going to hit his brother but he only fired the weapon into the air three to four times as he drove away. The malice instruction included that “[i]nferred malice may also arise when the dead is done with deadly weapon.” Nowhere in the charge did the court include the permissive inference language approved in State v. Elmore, 308 S.E.2d 781 (S.C. 1983):

The law says if one intentionally kills another with a deadly weapon, the implication of malice may arise. If facts, [sic] are proved beyond a reasonable doubt, sufficient to raise an inference of malice to your satisfaction, this inference would be simply an evidentiary fact to be taken into consideration by you, the jury, along with other evidence in the case, and you may give it such weight as you determine it should receive.

Capital Case*

Because the court's charge in this case did not include the Elmore language, the charge was erroneous and counsel was deficient in failing to object. Prejudice was also established as there was little evidence of malice in this case other than the use of a deadly weapon.

People v. Goods*, 62 N.E.3d 1168 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). In murder case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to assert self-defense and ask for a corresponding instruction or an instruction on second degree murder. The prosecution's theory was that defendant and the co-defendant planned in advance to kill the victim. Through defendant's statements and the argument of defense counsel, there was some evidence of the elements of self-defense, i.e., defendant believed he was in imminent danger from both the victim and the co-defendant. Whether defendant's belief was reasonable was a determination to be made by the jury. Supporting a finding of deficient performance was the fact that defense counsel initially sought to invoke compulsion as an affirmative defense, a defense unavailable for a murder charge under state law. It was only after that defense was precluded by the trial court that defense counsel switched to a theory that defendant shot the victim after he had been killed by the co-defendant. But this theory failed to relieve defendant of liability given that the jury was given an accountability instruction making defendant liable for the co-defendant's actions. In addition, an argument in defense counsel's unsuccessful motion for new trial indicated defense counsel erroneously believed he was not allowed the defense of self-defense. On this record, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to invoke self-defense and failing to seek appropriate instructions. Prejudice is shown in part by the co-defendant's conviction in a separate trial of second degree murder.

People v. Zambrano*, 64 N.E.3d 639 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). In murder case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to submit an accomplice witness instruction. The victim was the boyfriend of co-defendant Sanchez's ex-girlfriend. The ex-girlfriend testified that someone buzzed her apartment late one night and the victim got up to answer the door. She heard the victim and Sanchez speaking before a gunshot. When she entered the living room, the victim was lifeless on the floor. Outdoor surveillance footage showed defendant, Sanchez, witness Lopez and a fourth person arriving in a car at the building next door to where the murder occurred. Sanchez was seen exiting the car and walking towards the building. Defendant also exited the car and removed something from under the hood. Then he, followed shortly by Lopez, walked toward the building. Not long after, Lopez ran back and reentered the car, followed by defendant who placed something under the hood before getting back in the car. Sanchez was seen running to the car seconds later. He entered it and the car departed from the scene. When Lopez was called by the prosecution at defendant's trial, his attorney informed the court that Lopez would invoke his Fifth Amendment rights. Lopez's attorney and defendant's attorney argued that Lopez had incriminated himself at Sanchez's earlier trial. The trial court rejected the prosecutor's argument that Lopez's mere presence at the crime scene was not enough to support criminal charges, leading the prosecutor to confer use immunity on Lopez. In his testimony, Lopez stated that defendant had a gun and that defendant and co-defendant Sanchez walked up to the third floor where the victim was shot while Lopez waited on a landing in the stairwell. Five minutes later he heard a bang. Defense counsel impeached Lopez with inconsistencies in the police statement and his attempt to portray defendant and Sanchez as the bad guys and himself as completely innocent. He was also examined on bias based on pending criminal charges and favorable dispositions he had received on other charges following his testimony in Sanchez's trial. Lopez maintained that he had no deal with the State. Defense counsel argued to the jury that the only evidence indicating defendant participated in the murder was Lopez's testimony which was not credible. But defense counsel failed to seek an instruction on accomplice witnesses. This was deficient performance as the "evidence at trial and the reasonable inferences that can be drawn from the evidence establish probable cause that Lopez acted as an accomplice." The videos showed Lopez exiting the car with defendant and Sanchez, with defendant retrieving something from under the hood of the car. Lopez admitted entering the apartment building with them. The video shows that he returned to the car at the same time as defendant and with the same sense of urgency. "At no time did Lopez separate himself from the criminal activity, and by his own admission, he participated in it. The grant of use immunity to Lopez is further support of his role as an accomplice. There would be no need to immunize Lopez if he was not implicated in the shooting and involved in some fashion as an accomplice." There was no viable strategy for counsel's failure to submit the accomplice-witness instruction. "Counsel's failure to submit an instruction on accomplice testimony prejudiced [defendant] by depriving the jury of critical information it needed to evaluate Lopez's testimony."

Fisher v. State*, 788 S.E.2d 757 (Ga. 2016). In malice murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to secure the attendance of a witness who could have countered the testimony of the only witness whose testimony directly identified defendant as the shooter, and in agreeing to a jury instruction that the testimony of a single witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact, without requesting an instruction on the exception that if the witness is an accomplice, his testimony must be properly corroborated. The sole witness identifying defendant as the shooter, Lewis, claimed that he was not involved in the crimes even though he admitted that he drove defendant and the victim to the crime scene, was present during the shooting, and drove defendant away afterwards. According to Lewis, who admitted using drugs with the victim, the shooting occurred over a dispute about drug sale proceeds. (Two other witnesses described men arguing about drugs and money.) Defendant denied being at the crime scene. Prior to trial, defense counsel spoke with Clark, an acquaintance of both defendant and Lewis, who informed defense counsel that Lewis was his drug dealer and that he saw Lewis flashing a revolver while looking for the victim to collect on a debt two or three days before the shooting. (The murder weapon was never recovered but it was determined to have been a revolver.) Although Clark provided defense counsel with his contact information, he never heard back from him. Defense counsel intended to have Clark testify, and he included him on the witness list, and yet he failed to secure his attendance at trial, an omission conceded by the State to be deficient performance. As for the failure to seek an instruction on the accomplice exception to the single witness rule, defense counsel conceded it was an oversight and not a tactical decision. Given Lewis's admission to his involvement with defendant in the events before, during and after the crime, and initial lies he'd told to the police, there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that Lewis was an accomplice and not merely present for the crimes as he claimed on the witness stand. On this record, in light of the importance of Lewis's testimony, it would have been unreasonable not to have requested the accomplice instruction. Regarding prejudice, there was no forensic evidence linking defendant to the victim, the crime scene, or the murder weapon. Neither of the two women who heard men seeking drugs and/or money testified that defendant was there during the shooting. Although one offered a description of the shooter that matched defendant, it was general -- about 5'10", medium complexion, with a low haircut and a New Orleans accent – which would match innumerable other men in Atlanta as well, except perhaps for the accent. Notably, however, Lewis admitted on cross-examination that although he is from Atlanta, he was known in the community as “N.O.,” or New Orleans, because of his voice. “[H]ad Clark testified, the jury could have chosen not to believe what he said about Lewis. But that is exactly the point. Due to the deficient performance of [defendant’s] trial counsel, the jurors who found him guilty did not have the opportunity to hear Clark testify or to consider the evidence they did hear with the instruction that if they found Lewis to be an accomplice to the shooting, they must treat him unlike the other witnesses and decide whether his identification of [defendant] was corroborated by other evidence. A jury that heard Clark and was properly instructed might reach the same verdict, but we cannot say that with confidence.”

People v. Davydov*, 43 N.Y.S.3d 74 (N.Y. App. Div. 2016). In case where defendant was convicted of aggravated assault in the second degree, the conviction is vacated based on trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to seek severance from a co-defendant, defendant’s uncle, once it became clear they were pursuing antagonistic defenses and also for failing to request a missing witness charge for an eyewitness who was not called to testify. The theory set forth by the uncle’s attorney was that defendant had called his uncle to the crime scene to mediate a dispute between defendant and the victim. The uncle’s attorney theorized that the dispute involved defendant’s desire to have the victim participate in a fraudulent scheme. According to the uncle’s attorney, when the uncle arrived at the scene he observed defendant in an altercation and intervened. The defendant’s theory, in contrast, was essentially that the victim was incredible in his account of events, that defendant was actually a friend of the victim and was merely at the scene, and that defendant did not act in concert with the co-defendants in assaulting the victim. Given that the two defenses were irreconcilably in conflict, defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to request a severance. Defense counsel also performed deficiently in failing to request a missing witness charge instructing the jury that an unfavorable inference could be drawn from the failure of the prosecution to call a friend and business associate of the victim as a witness. This friend was nearby when the assault occurred and had previously stated that the victim threw the first punch during the initial confrontation. No legitimate strategic reason could be found to support defense counsel’s failure to request the charge.

2015: State v. Revish, 185 So.3d 8 (La.Ct.App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in second degree murder case for failing to object to the trial court’s instruction that self- defense was not available as a defense if the jury determined that the homicide occurred as a result of drug activity. The defendant, who had drugs for sale, was riding around with two other men doing some drug dealing. He shot both when the car was stopped because he believed that he was about to be killed. State law at the time provided that a homicide is justifiable when committed in self- defense by one who reasonably believes that he is in imminent danger of losing his life or receiving great bodily harm and that the killing is necessary to save himself from that danger. La. R.S. 14:20(A)(1). In an unrelated portion of the self-defense statute, a homicide is justifiable in a motor vehicle when the person reasonably believes that the use of deadly force is necessary to prevent entry of an intruder or to compel the intruder to leave, except when the person committing the homicide is engaged, at the time of the homicide, in drug activity. La. R.S. 14:20(A)(4). The trial court erred in its instruction because the plain language of the statute made the drug activity exception applicable only to paragraph 4 of the statute and not paragraph 1, which was the provision applicable to the defendant. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the instruction. Prejudice established because, “[e]ven if the jury had fully believed defendant’s version of the facts, . . . the erroneous jury instruction would have categorically denied defendant from availing himself of a claim of self-defense.”

State v. Liti*, 355 P.3d 1078 (Utah Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter case for failing to object to the trial court’s inadequate instruction on the elements of manslaughter. Under state law, “[a] defendant, who ‘recklessly causes the death of another’ is guilty of manslaughter.” Recklessness requires both that the defendant is “aware of but consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk” and that “[t]he risk must be of such a nature and degree that its disregard constitutes a gross deviation from the standard of care that an ordinary person would exercise under all the circumstances.” The trial court failed to include the “gross deviation” instruction. Counsel’s conduct in failing to object was deficient and prejudicial.

Workman v. State*, 771 S.E.2d 636 (S.C. 2015). Counsel in assault and battery case was ineffective in failing to object to unconstitutionally coercive Allen charge, which instructed the minority to reconsider their opinions without instructing the majority jurors to consider the positions of the minority jurors. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial.
