State v. Barela*, 349 P.3d 676 (Utah 2015). Counsel ineffective in rape case for failing to object to an erroneous mens rea requirement in the court’s instructions on the elements of the offense. In essence, the court’s instruction implied that the defendant was guilty if the state established that he “intentionally or knowingly” had intercourse with the alleged victim, when, in fact, the state also had to prove that the defendant “intentionally or knowingly” had such intercourse “without . . . consent.” Prejudice was established in this case because even in the alleged victim’s account, “she never explicitly (in words) or openly (in physical resistance) rebuffed [the defendant’s] advances. Instead [she] testified that she ‘froze’ – neither actively participating in sex nor speaking any words.”

2014: People v. Hussain, 179 Cal. Rptr. 3d 679 (Cal. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in grand theft of automobile arising from an improper lien sale for failing to request a jury instruction on a claim of right defense. The Defendant, who was born in the Fiji Islands, moved to the United States in 2000. He owned a car report shop in 2006. Under state law, a lien sale is permitted based on a possessory lien for services and permits a licensed repair facility to sell a car to recoup repair costs and other expenses. The defendant, who only went to school through the sixth grade and learned to speak English but could not read or write English, consulted with the former office manager for a towing company, who advised him about how to do a possessory lien. She completed the paperwork for him, including the required notices, one of which was returned by the post office because she accidentally transposed numbers in an address and zip code. Without consulting with her further, the defendant submitted the paperwork to the DMV where the clerk did not notice the error and instead transferred title to the defendant, who sold the vehicle in question. “A claim-of-right defense provides that a defendant’s good faith belief, even if mistakenly held, that he has a right or claim to property he takes from another negates the felonious intent necessary for conviction of theft or robbery.” Counsel relied on claim of right in his closing arguments but failed to request an instruction on that defense. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and could not be based on strategy. Prejudice was also established because the jury clearly did not reject the defendant's testimony in its entirety. Specifically, in addition to the grand theft charge, the defendant was charged with running a chop shop, theft by false pretenses, and perjury. The jury acquitted him of these other charges based on his testimony.

Capital Case*

Morgan v. State*, 146 So. 3d 508 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in sexual battery of child case for failing to object to erroneous verdict form and instructions. The defendant had been convicted of battering his daughter, who was under the age of 12. There were three counts covering different time periods, which all alleged battery by penetration. Although contact of the defendant's mouth with the victim's vagina also violates the statute, this was not included in the Information. The trial court's instructions, however, specifically allowed conviction for contact of the defendant's mouth with the victim's vagina and the verdict form specifically asked for findings on whether there was penetration or whether there was contact of the defendant's mouth with the victim's vagina. The jury did not find penetration and convicted on each count solely on the basis of contact of the defendant's mouth with the victim's vagina. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel did not object to the verdict form or the instructions and affirmatively agreed with both. Prejudice established because the defendant was "convicted of uncharged offenses."

People v. Falco*, 17 N.E.3d 671 (Ill. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel in possession of firearm with defaced identification marks case ineffective for failing to request a jury instruction on mental state. Specifically, counsel failed to request an instruction that possession of the weapon had to be knowing and intentional where the defendant denied knowledge that the weapon was in the trunk of his car, which was stopped with another person driving. The defendant, whose driver's license was suspended, was a passenger. The defendant testified that the driver had asked to borrow his car. The defendant agreed but informed the driver the car was having steering issues. The driver told the defendant his cousin could fix the car. They were returning from a visit to the cousin's house when they were stopped and the weapon was found. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because knowledge "was clearly an issue critical" to the defense.

State v. Chafee*, 332 P.3d 240 (Mont. 2014). Counsel ineffective in accountability for arson and theft case for failing to request a "mere presence" instruction. The victims found their car burning and observed a vehicle drive away. An hour later, the vehicle, driven by the defendant, was stopped. She testified that the passenger in her vehicle told her to pull over near the victims' vehicle. He then busted a window in the vehicle and stole items from it before setting the vehicle on fire and telling her to drive away. Defense counsel also argued in closing that she was "merely present" and did not participate in the crimes. Counsel was deficient, however, in failing to request an instruction on "mere presence," which would have informed the jury that "mere presence" and knowledge of the crime, without participation, were insufficient for conviction. "The prosecutor was able to capitalize on this omission" in closing arguments by arguing that mere presence was sufficient for conviction. "Under these circumstances, there was no plausible justification for the failure of defense counsel to offer the 'mere presence' jury instruction." Prejudice established.

People v. Collins*, 990 N.Y.S.2d 565 (N.Y. App. Div. 2014). Under New York standard for ineffective assistance, counsel was ineffective in robbery in the first degree, grand larceny, and possession of stolen property case where the defendant only pretended to have a gun during the robbery for failing to request an instruction on the affirmative defense that the object that appeared to be a firearm was not a loaded weapon from which a shot, capable of producing death or other serious physical injury, could be discharged. While normally the remedy would be a new trial, Collins sought only that his robbery conviction be reduced to second degree. The People conceded that counsel's conduct was deficient and that this remedy was appropriate.

State v. Lewis*, 337 P.3d 1053 (Utah 2014). Counsel ineffective in sexual abuse of child case for failing to object to flawed jury instructions. The defendant was charged with two counts based on alleged abuse of two sisters, ages 13 and 11, during the same night. The 13-year-old testified that the defendant touched her breast and vagina over her clothing. The 11-year-old testified that she awoke to find the defendant trying to remove her pants. The defendant completely denied the allegations of the 11-year-old and denied the allegations of the 13-year-old, but admitted that he told her she was pretty, prompted her to lift her shirt, and poked her stomach teasingly with his finger. The defendant was acquitted of the charge related to the 11-year-old but convicted on the charge related to the 13-year-old. The applicable statute allowed for conviction if the defendant “touches the anus, buttocks, or genitalia of any child, the breast of a female child, or otherwise takes indecent liberties with a child.” While counsel objected to other inapplicable or vague parts of the proposed instructions, counsel failed to object to “indecent liberties” language or failing to object that “indecent liberties” be defined. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as the “indecent liberties” provision was not alleged in this case. Moreover, “indecent liberties” had been interpreted by the Utah Supreme Court to mean activities of the “same magnitude or gravity as that specifically described in the statute.” Here, without this definition, the jurors could reasonably assume that the “catch-all [indecent liberties] phrase covered actions that are less serious than the specifically prohibited conduct – including actions that are merely socially or morally reprehensible or that strike us, subjectively, as being indecent in the sense of being totally inappropriate.” Here, while the defendant’s actions, admitted in his own testimony, might be “indecent” in this lay person’s view, they were not “indecent” under the appropriate interpretation of the statute. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the jurors could have completely disregarded the testimony of the 13-year-old while finding the defendant’s testimony to be credible and yet convicted him erroneously of taking an “indecent liberty.”

2013: Holloway v. Commissioner of Correction, 77 A.3d 777 (Conn. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in possession of narcotics with intent to sell within 1500 feet of a public housing project case for failing to object to the trial court’s failure to adequately instruct the jury that it could not find the defendant guilty under state law unless the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt, as an essential element of that offense, that he possessed narcotics with the intent to sell them at a specific location, which location happened to be within 1500 feet of a public housing project. In this case, however, the sole focus of the trial judge’s charge to the jury with respect to the location where the prohibited activity must have occurred was on the element of possession. The court omitted all reference to or explanation of the intended-location-of-sale element of the offense. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the evidence was by no means clear and uncontested, much less overwhelming, that the defendant was engaged or about to engage in a drug sale at the time of his arrest within 1500 feet of a public housing project. He was not caught in the act of selling drugs and was not found in possession of other implements of the drug sales trade. Indeed, it was suggested by police officers who testified that, if a drug transaction was in progress at the time of arrest, it was more likely one where the defendant was the buyer rather than the seller.

Washington v. State*, 113 So. 3d 1028 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder case (reduced to manslaughter by jury's verdict) for failing to request an addition to the justifiable homicide instruction of include aggravated assault and aggravated battery as felonies that the defendant would have been justified to resist. The defendant shot the victim five times in front of a crowd of patrons at a restaurant. His sole defense was that he was acting in self-defense. The jury was instructed only that the defendant could act in self-defense in response to death or grievous bodily harm. The failure to request the additional instruction, consistent with state law, was deficient and prejudicial "because it is far more likely that the victim was attempting to scare or shoot at [the defendant] rather than to rob or kill him in front of a crowd."

Byrd v. State*, 752 S.E.2d 84 (Ga. Ct. App. 2013). Trial counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to object to instruction that a firearm is a deadly weapon as a matter of law, which removed from the jury's province an element of the offense, i.e., that the defendant used a deadly weapon.

People v. Kidd*, 997 N.E.2d 634 (Ill. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel was ineffective for failing to proffer the entire pattern jury instruction regarding delivery in drug-induced homicide case where the defendant's girlfriend died after inhaling cocaine with the defendant. The Defendant told police that he and the victim had used cocaine the day before her death. When he awoke the next morning, he found her dead. While she had frequently used cocaine in the past, over the last year, she normally did not use cocaine but she asked him to get her some because she was upset that her cat died. The autopsy revealed that she had also consumed Xanax and morphine and she died from hypoxia (deficiency of oxygen reaching body tissues) caused by "cocaine and opiate intoxication." A defense expert on pharmacy and pharmacology testified that the cocaine did not contribute to the cause of death, but that the level of morphine in her blood was a "highly toxic level" that was "lethal." "The effect of the [therapeutic level of the] Xanax enhance[d] the toxicity of the morphine." She had consumed the morphine sometime after the defendant had gone to bed. The State never alleged that the defendant delivered either Xanax or morphine to the victim. During trial, there was a jury question, however, of who actually "possessed" the cocaine and whether the defendant had made a "delivery" of cocaine to the victim or whether the defendant and the victim bought the cocaine together. If so, there was no delivery. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to request complete and proper instructions on delivery.

Roberson v. State*, 982 N.E.2d 452 (Ind. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to erroneous jury instructions on sudden heat and voluntary manslaughter. Under state law, in order to establish voluntary manslaughter, the state was required to prove all the elements of murder and disprove sudden heat when there is any appreciable evidence of such. Thus, the trial court's instruction on manslaughter placing the burden on the state to prove sudden heat was "erroneous as a matter of law." Likewise, the murder instruction failing to require the state to disprove sudden heat suffered a fatal flaw. Finally, the trial court erroneously instructed the jury that it could only consider manslaughter instead of murder if it first found the defendant not guilty of murder because the jury was required to simultaneously determine whether the defendant was guilty of murder or voluntary manslaughter. Prejudice established as the evidence of sudden heat in the case “was not inconsiderable.”

McTiller v. State*, 113 So. 3d 1284 (Miss. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to object to jury instruction or offer additional instruction on accident. The trial court’s instruction on accident lacked all the elements required by state law in that the instruction did not mention “accident, misfortune, the heat of passion, or any sudden and sufficient provocation.”

State v. Barnes*, 994 N.E.2d 925 (Ohio Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in resisting arrest and vandalism case for failing to request an instruction on necessity, which was presented as a defense to vandalism. On a warm, sunny evening in September 2011 at approximately 6:30 p.m., a police officer in Portage County responded to a domestic disturbance call was attempting to question the alleged victim. The defendant, “appearing both agitated and inebriated,” kept interrupting and would not calm down. The officer attempted to handcuff him but he resisted. When he was forced to the ground, his “face was planted in dog excrement” and he continued resisting until the officer pepper sprayed the side of his face. The defendant “was placed into the cruiser with the excrement and pepper spray still on his face.” After driving to the police station and parking in the garage, with the garage door closed, the car windows up except for a slight crack, and the car engine off, the officer left the defendant in the car while he went inside to write his report. The initial officers apparently went off duty at 7:00 p.m. and a new officer took over. The new officer observed the defendant in the car in the garage yelling, but left to take a nearby call. After about 45 minutes of sitting in the hot car, handcuffed and with pepper spray and dog excrement still on his face, the defendant broke out the cruiser window with his foot because he was hyperventilating and afraid he would asphyxiate. While trial counsel presented this evidence “arguing that [the defendant] had no choice but to kick out the window in order to breathe,” counsel did not actually assert the defense of necessity or request the appropriate jury instruction. Clearly, there was no strategy for this failure as counsel “attempted to raise the defense.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial. “Without the instruction on the defense of necessity, there is nothing in the jury instructions as given that could have permitted the jury to find [the defendant] not guilty” on the vandalism charge/ Vandalism charge reversed and remanded for new trial.

Villa v. State*, 417 S.W.3d 455 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013). Trial counsel was ineffective in indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault case for failing to request a jury instruction on the medical-care defense to the aggravated sexual assault, even though the issue was raised and discussed throughout the trial. The defendant was alleged to have penetrated the vagina with his finger. Penetration was defined as contact that “could reasonably be regarded by ordinary English speakers as more intrusive than contact with [the victim’s] outer vaginal lips.” Additionally, penetration could include the “pushing aside and reaching beneath a natural fold of skin into an area of the body not usually exposed to view, even in nakedness.” Here, the real dispute at trial was the “degree of penetration committed” by the defendant, who admitted to touching the child—with others present in the room—“for the sole purpose of applying diaper-rash medication” but confessed that his finger may have penetrated the vagina. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and there was “no imaginable strategic motivation for trial counsel’s failure to request a medical-care defensive instruction.” Prejudice was clear as the jury acquitted on the indecency charge indicating that the jury found no intent by defendant to arouse or gratify his sexual desires.

State v. Ekstrom*, 316 P.3d 435 (Utah Ct. App. 2013). Trial counsel was ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to object to the trial court’s failure to instruct on the statutory definition of “serious bodily injury,” which is “the type of injury a dangerous weapon must be capable of inflicting,” when the state’s case was based on the theory that the defendant had used a dangerous weapon or force likely to produce serious bodily injury. While a witness testified that the defendant struck the victim, the witness was uncertain about the object used but believed it was a pipe and no pipe or other weapon was ever found and there was no evidence that even if it was a pipe that it was made of metal.

2012: Brooks v. State, 40 A.3d 346 (Del. Supr. Ct. 2012). Counsel in conspiracy on drug and weapon case and other charges was ineffective in failing to request an instruction on accomplice testimony. While there was independent corroborating evidence on the other charges, the conspiracy conviction “included an element entirely reliant upon accomplice testimony.” There could be no reasonable strategy for this, as “the defense gains nothing by failing to request a cautionary instruction, aside perhaps from a later chance at a claim for ineffective assistance of counsel.”

Capiro v. State*, 97 So. 3d 298 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in grand theft case for failing to request an instruction of the good faith defense. The case involved a loan from the victims to the defendant who was starting a commercial mortgage lending company. The defendant used the loan to pay personal expenses. The defendant testified at trial that he believed the loan was a personal loan to him without any restriction on use. Under state law, “a good faith belief in one’s right to possession of property is a defense to the charge of theft.” Counsel referred to this defense in his opening and closing arguments but was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on the defense.

In re Wilson*, 279 P.3d 990 (Wash. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in felony murder case for requesting a defective pattern instruction on accomplice liability. The instruction requested was that “[a] person is an accomplice in the commission of a crime if, with knowledge that it will promote or facilitate the commission of a crime,” he does certain acts. The reference to “a crime” rather than “the crime” is erroneous because in order to be an accomplice, “a person must have knowledge that he or she was promoting or facilitating the crime charged.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient despite this being a pattern instruction. Prejudice established, especially in light of the prosecutor’s misstatement of law in closing that the defendant was guilty of the crimes committed by the principal because he had in mind “a crime,” even if it was not the same crime the principal had in mind.

Capital Case*

People v. Gallagher*, 980 N.E.2d 140 (Ill. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in residential burglary case for failing to request a jury instruction on the lesser included offense of criminal trespass to a residence. The defendant walked into the victim's hotel room in the middle of the night. While the defendant claimed he thought the room was empty and he was looking for a bathroom, the alleged victim claimed that the defendant stole $40. The victim did not claim that money was stolen at the time of the arrest and this information was not included in the police reports. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the defendant admitted entry into the room, but the jury initially deadlocked on the burglary charge.

2011: State v. Soboroff, 798 N.W.2d 1 (Iowa 2011). Counsel ineffective in threat to contaminate a water supply case for failing to request instructions that defined "true threat." The defendant was convicted based on internet postings of a slide show referring to putting 500 pounds of Thorazine in the city water tower with pictures of the tower. Conviction required a showing of "true threat," i.e., a threat that a reasonable person of ordinary intelligence would have understood as such. While there was some evidence that the threats were real, there was also evidence from which the jury could have concluded the statements were not real threats. For example, the state's own expert testified it would be nearly impossible to obtain 500 pounds of Thorazine, the defendant did not disseminate the threats other than on his own website, and, although double-edged, the defendant was known generally as an unstable person. If the jury had been adequately advised on the "reasonable person" standard, there is a reasonable probability the outcome of the trial would have been different.

Blunt v. State*, 55 So.3d 207 (Miss. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in murder case for requesting an erroneous self-defense instruction that had been condemned by the Mississippi Supreme Court ten years prior to trial. Prejudice established as the misstatement of law on the instruction essentially left the defendant with no instruction on his theory of defense.

Bailey v. State*, 709 S.E.2d 671 (S.C. 2011). Counsel ineffective in homicide by child abuse case for failing to object to supplemental jury instructions that allowed the jury to convict the defendant based on an act that was not alleged in the indictment. The indictment alleged "infliction of physical injuries" by the defendant. During deliberations, the jury sent out notes asking whether the defendant had to have "caused" the death as a result of "neglect and abuse." During the discussion with court, the foreperson informed the court that the jury could see "neglect" but no evidence that the defendant had struck the child. The judge gave supplemental instructions allowing the jury to convict for "abuse or neglect" that was a proximate cause of the harm. Nine minutes later the jury returned a guilty verdict. "[T]he trial judge's instructions improperly 'enlarged' the indictment. The indictment alleged a specific 'act' by the defendant, while the charge allowed conviction for an 'omission' or neglect. This was a material variance or a constructive amendment to the indictment.

State v. Thomas*, 796 N.W.2d 706 (S.D. 2011). Counsel ineffective in reckless burning case for failing to request appropriate instructions on accomplice testimony. At trial, the only direct evidence of guilt was from two accomplices who had made prior inconsistent statements and had entered into plea agreements requiring their testimony. At the very least, counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction allowed under state law that accomplice testimony should be examined "with great care and caution.” Likewise, counsel was ineffective in failing to request instructions that state law required corroboration of accomplice testimony and one accomplice could corroborate the other and that the remaining circumstantial evidence merely showing the circumstances and commission of the offense was not sufficient corroboration. Prejudice established.

State v. Sellers, 248 P.3d 70 (Utah Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in child sexual abuse case for failing to object to erroneous voluntary intoxication instructions. The crime charged required two intent elements for conviction: a general intent to touch and a specific intent to cause pain or to arouse or gratify sexual desires. Voluntary intoxication was raised as an affirmative defense to the specific intent element. While the court gave a voluntary intoxication instruction, the instructions failed to inform the jury that the State had the burden of disproving the defense beyond a reasonable doubt. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and there could not be any reasonable trial strategy for the deficiency. Prejudice found.

2010: Smith v. State, 991 A.2d 1169 (Del. 2010). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to request a specific instruction on the credibility of accomplice testimony. The state’s case rested almost entirely on the testimony of an accomplice, who had actually fired the bullet that killed the victim, and another eyewitness and their testimony was conflicting, internally inconsistent, and arguably inconsistent with prior statements. Under state law, the defendant was entitled, upon request, to a specific accomplice testimony instruction. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to request the instruction. Prejudice established even though a general credibility of witnesses instruction was given.

Sloss v. State, 45 So. 3d 66 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Trial counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to object to the inclusion of a forcible felony jury instruction, which informed the jury that the use of force likely to cause death or great bodily harm is not justifiable if the defendant was committing an aggravated battery. This instruction is appropriate only if the defendant “is charged with an independent forcible felony in addition to the offense for which he claims self-defense. When an instruction is read in the absence of a charge of an independent forcible felony, it essentially negates the defendant’s theory of self-defense.” Prejudice found as the evidence of guilt was “hardly overwhelming” and essentially amounted to a “swearing contest” between the defendant on one side and the alleged victim and his nephew on the other side.

People v. Wheeler, 929 N.E.2d 99 (Ill. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in murder trial for failing to request an accomplice-witness instruction. The state’s key witness was a friend of the victim, a convicted felon, and an admitted accomplice testifying in exchange for a deal. No physical evidence linked the defendant to the crimes. Prejudice established, because the only other witness connecting the defendant to the crimes with a jailhouse snitch, who had been promised help with parole in exchange for his testimony.

Taylor v. State, 922 N.E.2d 710 (Ind. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in felony-murder case for failing to object to the trial court’s instructions that did not include the elements of the underlying felony (robbery). While the lower court had found the error harmless based on the trial evidence,

Capital Case*

“[h]armless-error analysis has no place where, as here, an essential instruction on the underlying offense is missing entirely.”

Hatcher v. Commonwealth*, 310 S.W.3d 691 (Ky. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to the trial court’s failure to provide a separate self-protection instruction, failure to define self-protection, failure to provide an imperfect self-defense instruction, failure to define extreme emotional disturbance, and failure to instruct on the lesser-included offense of second degree manslaughter. The court noted, “[i]n all fairness to defense counsel,” that counsel “had already been in court for nearly 13 hours by the time the court asked him to state his objections to the instructions.”

State v. Johnston*, 237 P.3d 70 (Mont. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in obstructing a peace officer case for failing to object to charge that eliminated the crucial “knowing” element. Officers were responding to reports of gunshots during winter weather conditions. After stopping their vehicle, due to bad road conditions, they observed the defendant walking towards them. He informed them his car was stuck in the snow and other individuals and cars were further up the “snowy mountain road” having problems. The officers spent 30-40 minutes “attempting to assess the matter,” before taking the defendant and the two others in his car to the police station. Based on the defendant’s a search and rescue team was sent out looking for another man, who was not located. Due to the defendant’s “various statements to police,” he was charged with misdemeanor obstructing a peace officer. The offense requires that the person “knowingly obstructs, impairs, or hinders . . . the performance of a governmental function.” Under state law, the court must also instruct on the meaning of “knowingly,” which, depending on context, is awareness “of the person’s own conduct” or awareness “that it is highly probable that the result will be caused by the person’s conduct.” Here, the court instructed only on awareness of his “own conduct” and the state argued repeatedly that the defendant was guilty because he was aware of his own conduct, as he admitted in his testimony that he made false statements to the officers. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as “knowing” in this context required awareness that “it is highly probable that his conduct will obstruct, impair or hinder the officers’ performance of their governmental function.” To hold otherwise would only an obstruction conviction by “merely proving that a person gave a dishonest answer in response to an officer’s question,” and “the statute clearly requires more.” There was no plausible justification for failing to object to the court’s inadequate instructions. Counsel “had nothing to lose” and “failed to use the law to strike at the heart of the State’s case.” Id. at ____ (quoting State v. Kough, 97 P.3d 1095, ____ (Mont. 2004)).

2009: Spicer v. State, 22 So. 3d 706 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for imposing the burden of proving self-defense on the defendant through argument and requested instructions. Under state law, once a defendant has made a prima facie showing of self-defense, the burden is on the state to prove that the defendant did not act in self-defense. Counsel “was obviously unaware of the law on this point” and repeatedly argued in closing that the defendant had the burden of proof. Counsel also requested an outdated jury instruction, which had been replaced by an amended instruction nine months prior to trial, on this same point. “[C]ounsel’s burden-shifting error caused a breakdown in the adversary process.”

State v. Smith*, 223 P.3d 1262 (Wash. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in first-degree animal cruelty case for failing to request a jury instruction on lesser-included offense. Where there was evidence that the llama may have died from a parasite rather than starvation, the evidence supported a rational inference that the defendant committed only a second degree offense by failing to seek appropriate medical attention for the animal. Counsel’s “all or nothing strategy was not a legitimate trial tactic.”

State v. Kylo*, 215 P.3d 177 (Wash. 2009). Counsel ineffective in assault case for proposing an erroneous “act on appearances” self-defense instruction that lowered the state’s burden of proof. While the law required only that the defendant reasonably apprehend that he is about to be injured, the jury was instructed that he must reasonably apprehend that he was in actual danger of great bodily harm. “Failing to research or apply relevant law was deficient performance.” Prejudice also established as the instruction and counsel’s argument in closing misstated the law.

State v. Powell*, 206 P.3d 703 (Wash. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in second degree rape case, based on sexual intercourse with another person who was incapable of consent by reason of being physically helpless or mentally incapacitated, for failing to request instruction on the statutory affirmative defense of “reasonable belief” that the person had capacity to consent. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and not based on a reasonable trial tactic because even the alleged victim’s version of events was that she had blacked out from drug and alcohol use, woke up with the defendant (who she did not know previously), having sex with her, and then willingly participated in it because she was afraid. There was no indication that she told the defendant she was afraid or not a willing participant. In addition, independent state witnesses, who mostly agreed she appeared intoxicated, did not believe she appeared too drunk or otherwise incapacitated to make decisions. Prejudice established because, without the instruction, the jury had no way of acquitting the defendant even if it accepted his testimony and the defense argument that he reasonably believed the alleged victim was not mentally incapacitated or physically helpless. In short, “[t]he absence of this instruction essentially nullified [the] defense.” Id. at 711.

2008: Michel v. State, 989 So. 2d 679 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in simple battery case for failing to request an instruction on justifiable use of non-deadly force, which negated the defendant’s self-defense argument.

Stoute v. State*, 987 So. 2d 748 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to object to forcible felony instruction, which was not applicable and deprived him of his theory of self- defense. This instruction is only appropriate when the accused is charged with at least two criminal acts, the act for which the accused is claiming self- defense and a separate forcible felony. Here, the defendant was charged with one crime, the shooting, and no other forcible felony. The state supreme court reached this conclusion in an opinion issued after this trial, but “[i]t does not follow . . . [that] it constituted a change in the law.” The decision was based on a statute and the court had not previously construed the statute in a contrary manner. Thus, counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

People v. Gonzalez*, 895 N.E.2d 982 (Ill. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to object when the jury was not adequately instructed on the state's burden to disprove the affirmative defense, a reasonable belief that the victim was 17 years of age or older. The relationship began when the victim was 14 and the defendant 23, but there was conflicting evidence on whether she ever told the defendant her age. The charges arose when the 16-year-old victim became pregnant with the defendant's child. The trial court held that the evidence was sufficient to support the affirmative defense and agreed to give the necessary instruction. In the instructions, however, the court did not define "reasonable belief" and did not instruct on the State's burden to disprove the affirmative defense. Counsel's conduct was deficient. "Where defense counsel argues a theory of the case, such as an affirmative defense, but then fails to ensure that the jury is properly instructed on that theory, that failure cannot be called trial strategy." Prejudice found.

Tisdale v. State*, 662 S.E.2d 410 (S.C. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to request charges on involuntary manslaughter and accident. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the defendant's testimony supported the involuntary manslaughter charge by providing evidence of a struggle over a weapon and supported an accident charge because of an accidental discharge of a gun with the defendant lawfully armed for self-defense.

Lowry v. State*, 657 S.E.2d 760 (S.C. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to object to a burden-shifting instruction on malice. The court initially gave proper instructions but because of the state's concern that the court had failed to instruct on felony murder, the court gave a supplemental instruction. While the initial charge contained permissive language allowing the inference of malice from participation in a felony, the supplemental charge created a presumption of malice from participation in a felony and shifted the burden of proof to the defendant. This charge was improper, was not alleviated by the early proper charge, and was especially problematic as "the last thing the jurors heard before beginning deliberations." Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object. Prejudice also established because the error was not "harmless" beyond a reasonable doubt. There was "little direct probative evidence of malice" in the defendant's statements and other evidence was questionable or minimal, such that "the only undisputed relevant facts . . . are that Petitioner was near the scene of the crime at the time it occurred, but was neither the gunman, nor in the getaway car."

2007: Nickens v. State, 981 So. 2d 1165 (Ala. Crim. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in theft of property case for failing to request an instruction defining the term "deprive" and failing to object when the trial court failed to give this instruction when the defense theory was that the defendant used the vehicle to escape from police but did not intend to permanently deprive the owner of the property, did not damage it, and merely abandoned it not far from the scene of the theft.

Berdecia v. State*, 971 So. 2d 846 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter and battery case for requesting an erroneous charge on manslaughter. The defendant was on trial with a codefendant. They had fought with two other men and the co-defendant shot and killed one of them. Both were charged with second degree murder. The co-defendant was convicted, but the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offense of manslaughter. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel requested a charge that repeatedly informed the jury that the defendant could be convicted based on his acts and intentions “and/or” his co-defendant’s acts and intentions. State law held that “and/or” instructions can result in fundamental error. Prejudice was established because the jury could have convicted the defendant based solely on the acts and intentions of the co-defendant even if the jurors thought the defendant was innocent with regard to the death.

Aversano v. State*, 966 So. 2d 493 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in grant theft case for failing to seek instruction on good faith defense or advice of counsel defense. Following several major impacts in the area, the defendant allowed a third-party to temporarily store restaurant equipment in her garage. There was no agreement on length of time. Subsequently, she notified the third-party to remove the equipment. She contacted an attorney and followed his advice to send a registered letter and then hire a process server notifying the third-party that she would dispose of the equipment if not picked up by a stated deadline. The deadline passed and she sold the equipment to an auctioneer. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel called the prior attorney to testify but failed to request an instruction of either the good faith or the advice of counsel defense, both of which were available under state law. “[I]s patently unreasonable to fail to request an instruction that provides a legal defense to undisputed facts.” Prejudice established because omission of these instructions “essentially deprived her of a defense.”

Stiers v. State*, 229 S.W.3d 257 (Mo. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in forcible restraint case for failing to request a self-defense instruction. The defendant was charged with two counts of forcible sodomy, two counts of armed criminal action, and felonious restraint following an altercation with his girlfriend. He was acquitted on all charges other than felonious restraint. Their testimony and evidence of her injuries was basically the entire case. The defendant’s testimony alleged that the altercation began when she attempted to steal property from him and he defended with non-deadly force, which was permitted under state law. The altercation that elevated when she grabbed a knife and he then defended himself with deadly force. Under state law, he was entitled to a self-defense finding if he reasonably believed that deadly force was necessary to protect himself from serious physical injury. Counsel was ineffective in failing to request the self-defense instruction. Prejudice found because, without the self-defense instruction, the jury was obligated to convict if the defendant forcibly restrained the alleged victim and, in so doing, exposed her to risk of serious physical injury, regardless of the reason.

State v. Eyre*, 179 P.3d 792 (Utah 2007). Counsel ineffective in tax evasion case for failing to object to instructions that did not require the jury to find the existence of a tax deficiency, which was a necessary element of the crime. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the defense argued that the defendant did not file his taxes because he did not believe he owed any taxes, but counsel failed to object to the court’s failure to give the necessary charge.

2006: Mathis v. State, 941 So. 2d 1 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery on a fellow inmate case for failing to request a jury instruction on the justifiable use of non-deadly force where the defense argued that the victim was the aggressor and the defendant was acting only in self-defense.

Tillman v. Massey*, 637 S.E.2d 720 (Ga. 2006). Counsel ineffective in malice murder case for failing to object to an erroneous instruction on the presumption of innocence in the court's final charge. The court instructed the jury that the presumption protects only the innocent, which implies that the jury's assessment of guilt is separate and distinct from the prosecution's burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, thereby eviscerating the presumption of innocence. Prejudice found even though a correct charge on the presumption of innocence was given in preliminary instructions.

People v. Pollards*, 854 N.E.2d 705 (Ill. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in stolen motor vehicle case for failing to request jury instructions on definitions of stolen property and theft. Prejudice found because the defendant's intent was an issue in the case.

Vaughn v. State*, 202 S.W.3d 106 (Tenn. 2006). Counsel ineffective in murder and other offenses case for failing to object to the court's erroneous jury instruction regarding the defendant's release eligibility dates. The trial court informed the jury that, if convicted of murder, the defendant would not be eligible for parole for 25 years, but a new statute had been passed so that the defendant actually would not have been eligible for parole for 51 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient at trial because he was unaware of the new provision. After trial counsel learned of the new provision but still did not assert the issue. While there were two conflicting provisions in the statutes, such that it may not have been clear at the time whether it was 25 or 51 years, "this conflict in the provisions, far from excusing counsel from raising the issue, should have brought to their attention the very need to raise the issue." Even after the Attorney General issued an opinion clarifying that it was 51 years, counsel still did not raise the issue as plain error in the direct appeal which was still pending. Trial and appellate counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice established because "prejudice occurs when a defendant receives a sentence greater than the range of punishment contemplated by the jury." If the jury had been properly instructed, it was reasonably likely the jury would have convicted the defendants of a lesser offense.

State v. Pittman*, 166 P.3d 730 (Wash. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in attempted residential burglary case for failing to request a lesser included offense instruction on first degree attempted criminal trespass, which was supported by the evidence.

2005: State v. Dabney, 908 So. 2d 60 (La. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to object to a modified Allen charge to a deadlocked jury. The jury announced a guilty verdict but polling revealed an 8 to 4 vote when at least 10 votes were needed for a conviction. When the jury asked what happened if they could not agree, the court gave a modified Allen charge, without objection. Counsel's conduct was deficient because Louisiana law prohibited an Allen charge and approved only of following ABA Standards in this situation. Prejudice was found because the charge given was confusing, coerced jurors to reach a verdict, and coerced jurors in the minority to conform their views to the majority. Two jurors changed their votes within 35 minutes, which suggested that they "surrendered their beliefs in order to achieve a verdict."

Capital Case*

2004: Benham v. State, 591 S.E.2d 824 (Ga. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to request an instruction on the use of force in defense of a habitation. The defendant and the alleged victim had a history of animosity because the victim's husband had fathered children with both women. The victim confronted the defendant while the defendant was sitting in her car with her three young children talking to friends. Following a heated conversation, the victim admittedly threw the first blow. The women fought with the victim standing outside the car reaching in and the defendant inside her car. The defendant had attempted to drive away but her path was blocked by onlookers in the street. Ultimately, the defendant grabbed a box cutter from the car console and slashed the victim. Counsel argued self-defense but did not request an instruction on defense of habitation. Under state law, deadly force is permitted to prevent or terminate the unlawful entry into or attack upon a habitation, including a motor vehicle, if the entry is made or attempted in a violent and tumultuous manner and there is a reasonable belief that the entry is made for the purpose of assault or personal violence therein. The uncontradicted evidence at trial clearly would have authorized such a charge because the victim threw the first punch and eyewitnesses testified that it took two attempts for onlookers to restrain the victim from continuing the attack. Counsel stated that her strategy was to present self-defense as the best defense because she wanted the jury to believe that the defendant was in fear for her safety and the safety of her children and not just that she was protecting her vehicle. The court held this was not a reasonable strategy because counsel failed to appreciate that the defense of habitation may have justified the use of deadly force. "In failing to adequately research and understand the defenses available to [the] client, defense counsel rendered assistance that fell below the minimum standard set forth in Strickland." Prejudice found because it was reasonably probable that the jury would have accepted the substantial evidence that the victim unlawfully entered the defendant's car in a violent and tumultuous manner for the purpose of offering personal violence to the occupants.

State v. Kougl*, 97 P.3d 1095 (Mont. 2004). Counsel ineffective in operation of unlawful methamphetamine lab case for failing to request jury instructions on accomplice testimony. Although the prosecutor and counsel both informed the jury that accomplice testimony should be viewed with suspicion, counsel did not request instructions that accomplice testimony should be viewed with distrust and that it must be corroborated. In direct appeal, counsel's conduct was found to be deficient because there was no plausible reason not to request the instructions. Prejudice found because the state's case was built almost entirely on accomplice testimony with little corroboration. In addition, although counsel informed the jury to view accomplice testimony with suspicion, "hearing this from counsel, . . . is not the same as hearing it from the court."

2003: Patterson v. State, 110 S.W.3d 896 (Mo. Ct. App. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in second-degree robbery case for failing to present the trial court with a properly worded instruction for the lesser included offense of felony stealing. Under state law, second degree robbery required the forcible stealing of property, whereas the lesser included offense of stealing did not include the element of force. Counsel argued the lack of force and requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of stealing but proposed a stealing instruction that improperly included the "forcibly stole" language, which materially misstated the elements of stealing. Counsel did not have a reasonable trial strategy for proposing the incorrect instruction and counsel even argued that the jury could find that there was no use or threat of use of physical force. “Counsel clearly made a strategic decision to have the jury instructed on the lesser-included offense of stealing but then failed to execute that strategy when he submitted instructions to the court that did not properly track the language” of the lesser-included offense. Id. at 903. The court found prejudice because the lesser included offense instruction was warranted by the evidence, where the witnesses never saw a weapon and a juror could reasonably find that the defendant did not actually use physical force or threaten immediate physical harm to anyone during the theft. Where doubt exists over whether a lesser included offense should be instructed, the court should give the instruction. Even assuming that the state’s argument was correct that the defendant must also prove a reasonable possibility that he would not have been convicted of the greater offense had the lesser-included instruction been given, the court found prejudice where “the evidence of either an explicit or an implicit threat of physical force in the stealing was not overwhelming.”

9. FAILURE TO CHALLENGE COMPETENCE

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2013: Newman v. Harrington, 726 F.3d 921 (7th Cir. 2013) (affirming United States ex rel. Newman v. Rednour, 917 F. Supp. 2d 765 (N.D. Ill. 2012)). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to investigate the mentally retarded defendant's competence and failing to seek a competence hearing. The defendant's mother provided counsel with a "two-inch-thick stack" of records reflecting that the 16-year-old defendant went to a "special school," was found disabled by the Social Security Administration due to mental retardation, and had an IQ of 62. The state court did not determine whether counsel's conduct was deficient but rejected this claim due to a finding of no prejudice. The state conceded that the district court properly evaluated whether counsel's conduct was deficient de novo and that counsel's conduct was deficient. With respect to prejudice, the state court unreasonably applied Strickland by deeming an expert report of incompetence as "irrelevant" because it came after trial and because a state expert believed Newman was malingering.

It would be unreasonable to think that Newman began faking symptoms of mental retardation before he was 11-years-old, leading to the creation of documentation 2- inches thick reflecting his mental deficits just to "use his manufactured retardation to confuse the justice system."

In short, the expert opinion ignored by the state court "was well-supported and relevant. It was consistent with the numerous reports from psychological and educational experts over many years (about a decade) leading up to trial and after." The state court's decision was also based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the state-court record. Specifically, the state court unreasonably determined that Newman was nothing "other than academically challenged and a slow learner." "This factual determination is quite troubling," as it ignored the expert report and "most of the other evidence in the record." "Indeed, the state court ignored the clear and convincing weight of the evidence, resulting in a decision based on an unreasonable determination of the facts." The state court also unreasonably determined that Newman "at all times ... responded appropriately to questioning by the trial court."

First, the evidence establishes that "yes, sir" and "no, sir" were the extent of Newman's responses to the trial court's questioning. He never gave more than a two-word answer and his simplistic answers do not suffice to show that he understood the questions regarding his defense rights. And Newman's responses to the trial court's questioning were not at all times appropriate. During one colloquy the trial judge asked Newman if he understood his constitutional rights to testify and not to testify, and asked "knowing all of this . . . what is your wish?" Newman responded, "No, sir." This nonresponsive answer lends support to the conclusion that Newman was unable to understand the proceedings against him and assist in his defense.

Capital Case*

In sum, the state court's denial of Newman's petition was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented. "[T]here is a reasonable probability that Newman would have been found unfit had a hearing been held."

2009: Hummel v. Rosemeyer, 564 F.3d 290 (3rd Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 558 U.S. 1063 (2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for stipulating the defendant was competent to stand trial and failing to challenge competence. The defendant was charged with shooting and killing his wife because of her affair with another man. Shortly after shooting her, the defendant shot himself in the head and, thereafter, was "missing a portion of his brain." Id. at 291. Counsel was appointed and was informed by the defendant's parents, who were his legal guardians, that he was not competent. The parents requested evaluation by a psychiatrist and even gave counsel a list of possible experts. Rather than a psychiatrist, the defendant was examined by a psychologist retained by the prosecutor and a psychologist retained by the defense. The state's expert reported the defendant had an I.Q. of 65, which placed him in the mentally retarded range of intelligence. Due to the head trauma, he had only limited cognitive skills and deficits in short-term memory. This expert was unable to state to a reasonable degree of certainty that the defendant was competent but noted that at best understood things only in a concrete, simplified fashion and it would be necessary during trial to continually make sure he was understanding the proceedings. The defense psychologist reached similar conclusions in finding the defendant "marginally competent" but recommending frequent breaks in the trial for counsel to explain things to the defendant. Without seeking any additional evaluation or even meeting with the defendant himself, counsel stipulated that the defendant was competent. Counsel met with the defendant only briefly prior to the preliminary hearing and never saw him again until the day jury selection began. Counsel never talked to the defendant about his version of events but asserted a provocation defense. He convinced the defendant and his father that the defendant should not testify. Counsel had concerns about the defendant's ability to focus during the trial and even had to request a recess when the defendant was sleeping at the defense table. During the state's closing argument, the defendant woke up and shouted "[t]ell them about the blowjobs." The defendant's father took him out of the courtroom so he was not present for the rest of closing arguments. He was also absent during the jury instructions because counsel could not wake him. Following trial, counsel moved for a new trial based on concerns about competence but did not present any medical evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient in stipulating to competence based on the psychologist's reports.

We must ask whether either of these reports presented such an unqualified affirmation of [the defendant's] competency to stand trial so as to lead a reasonable attorney under these circumstances to stipulate that [the defendant] was competent. The answer is self-evident. Neither does. The reports from the psychologists were hardly ringing endorsements of [the defendant's] competency. There is little reason to believe that testimony from a psychiatrist would not have been enough to tip the scales, and it was unreasonable for [the defendant's] counsel not to pursue this further.

Id. at 301. "[A] reasonable attorney would not have stipulated to his client's competency without insisting on more information and further proceedings." Under the state statutes, counsel could have sought a court-order evaluation of competence, which would have been “conducted by at least one psychiatrist.” Prejudice found. The state court’s decision was rejected as an unreasonable application of Strickland and as contrary to clearly established United States Supreme Court law in that rather than the appropriate standard of “reasonable probability” the state court used “the more stringent requirement of “show” in finding no prejudice.

2005: Burt v. Uchtman*, 422 F.3d 557 (7th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in capital murder case (where the death sentence was later commuted by Governor Ryan) for failing to request a competence evaluation when the defendant plead guilty without any concessions and against the advice of counsel near the end of the state’s case-in-chief. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel was aware that the defendant had been consistently medicated with anti-depressants and psychotropic drugs while in pretrial confinement. The only competence examination was conducted eight months prior to trial by an expert who did not even review the defendant’s prison mental health records. A defense psychologist examined the defendant in connection to a motion to suppress statements and found a borderline IQ, neurological impairments, and severe depression. During jury selection, the defense requested a continuance, which was denied, because the defendant was having difficulty sleeping and expressing his inability to assist counsel. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel were aware of the defendant’s medications, his frequent mood swings and that the defendant did not appear to comprehend legal advice. The state court had not addressed this prong of the Strickland test. The court found prejudice because there was “a reasonable probability that [the defendant] would have been found incompetent at the time he pleaded guilty if his attorneys had requested a competency hearing” because the only competence evaluation was 8 months prior to trial, failed to consider the effects of heavy medications, and could not have accounted for the repeated changes in prescriptions in the time after that evaluation until trial. Under AEDPA, the state court “unreasonably applied Strickland to the facts” because it “ignored a wealth of evidence.” [The court also held that the trial court should have sua sponte ordered a competence evaluation.]

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2019: Schmid v. McCauley, 385 F.Supp.3d 710 (S.D. Ind. 2019), appeal dismissed, 19-2128 (7th Cir. Aug. 30, 2019). In case where petitioner was found guilty but mentally ill of murder and related charges in an Indiana state court, habeas relief is granted on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on trial counsel’s failure to request a competency hearing before trial despite counsel’s inability to communicate effectively with petitioner about her case due to her mental state. Petitioner had initially been found incompetent to stand trial. A second round of competency evaluations resulted in findings of competence by the examiners. Eight months elapsed between this second round of competency evaluations and trial. During this time, petitioner was transferred several times to a hospital for evaluations and to have her medications adjusted due to fluctuations in her mood and behavior. Prior to and during trial, petitioner was administered numerous psychiatric medications on a daily basis. Before trial began, a new judge was assigned to the case. He made a nunc pro tunc finding of competence based on the reports from eight months earlier. The defense at trial focused on petitioner’s severe mental illness. The trial judge was told during a side bar that petitioner continued to suffer from hallucinations but second counsel informed the court that she would alert it if petitioner’s competence was in question. When the prosecutor requested a ruling on petitioner's competence the following day, the trial court found no reason to rule petitioner was incompetent after counsel stipulated that petitioner was communicating with counsel, although second counsel noted that she had been concerned about petitioner's blank stares and auditory hallucinations. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner's claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to raise her incompetence was denied. The rejection of the claim by the state courts was unreasonable as to both prongs of the Strickland test. Regarding deficient performance, the state courts relied only on the post-conviction testimony of two public defenders who opined that petitioner had been able to assist counsel. But one of these public defenders had withdrawn from the case prior to trial and the other had taken a supporting role to the new lead counsel. The public defender who had remained on the case as second counsel, while opining that petitioner was able to assist counsel, also testified that petitioner "was fairly psychotic at times" and that she "would talk about voices and things like that and the biggest issue comes in to making sure that she is dealing in reality and not responding to voices." Completely ignored by the state courts was the post-conviction testimony of lead trial counsel, who stated that he did not bother discussing a preliminary plea offer with petitioner before trial because she would have given him a "blank stare." He further testified, "I think she could understand what you're saying but she was heavily medicated and it-I don't know almost like being immobilized." The testimony by trial counsel, particularly taking into account the prior incompetence finding, established the existence of a bona fide doubt as to petitioner's competence to stand trial that required counsel to raise the issue. The state court's finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court precedent as well as a decision based on an unreasonable determination of the facts. As for prejudice, it was unreasonable for the state courts to have relied on the evaluations that were conducted eight months before trial given that petitioner's medications were adjusted multiple times in the interim and petitioner's mental illness left her prone to psychotic episodes triggered by stressful situations. In light of the evidence raising a bona fide doubt as to petitioner's competence, there was a reasonable probability that petitioner would have been found incompetent had counsel requested a competency hearing.

c. State Cases

2022: People v. Corbett, 219 N.E.3d 1127 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Defense counsel representing a defendant who had been declared unfit for trial in two other pending cases, and been subjected to ultimately unsuccessful involuntary inpatient treatment in those cases over a period of seven years, performed deficiently in simply deferring to the court on the question of whether defendant could be restored to fitness within one year after he was found unfit to proceed in the combined hearing involving all three cases. (Defendant had been found restored to competency in the prior cases but never for long enough to actually proceed to trial.) Although the State's expert opined that competency could be restored within a year, trial counsel failed to ask the expert why she believed that defendant was likely to attain fitness if treated. This prevented a fair determination of the issue, "especially given the number of times defendant's restoration efforts had failed and the cumulative time defendant had spent in custody attempting to achieve restoration." Defendant's own comments concerning his mental condition and the time already spent in custody "should have alerted defense counsel to consider, independently assess, and put information before the court on the issue of whether there was a substantial probability that defendant would, in fact, attain fitness within one year.” Regarding defendant’s refusal to cooperate with evaluations, such refusal may be admissible as evidence of his mental condition. Further, a defendant’s perpetual refusal to cooperate may be relevant to the question of whether there is a substantial likelihood that he will attain fitness within one year. Had defense counsel attempted to test the reliability of the expert’s evaluative process, there was a reasonable probability that the results of the proceedings would have been different. Indeed, the record showed that the expert’s opinion “was ripe for challenge.” (She had met with defendant only a handful of times over several years, never spending more than an hour with him, had never treated him, and had been unable to conduct a formal evaluation.)

Capital Case*

2017: Ramirez v. State, 795 S.E.2d 841 (S.C. 2017). In case involving numerous felony charges against a sixteen-year-old severely mentally retarded defendant, plea counsel was ineffective for failing to request an independent competency evaluation prior to the guilty plea. Defendant was initially found competent after a short forensic interview with an employee of the Department of Mental Health who also considered a limited number of documents primarily related to the charged crimes and defendant’s juvenile criminal history. Plea counsel then requested that a psychological examination of defendant be conducted because plea counsel was concerned that defendant did not fully understand the gravity of the offenses or the charges he faced. (Defendant had informed the first examiner that he believed he was only facing a few years in the Department of Juvenile Justice. In fact, he was being tried as an adult and faced a sentence of fifteen years to life without parole in the Department of Corrections.) The second examiner met with defendant numerous times for extended periods. He also based his conclusions on a number of psychological tests, defendant’s medical records, and collateral interviews conducted with defendant’s family to obtain historical information defendant may not have been able to accurately convey due to his intellectual limitations. The expert diagnosed defendant with an adjustment disorder with mixed disturbance of emotions and conduct, severe mental retardation, and a Global Assessment of Functioning (GAF) score of thirty-five out of one hundred. The expert did not, however, opine as to defendant’s competency to stand trial. Defendant ultimately pleaded guilty but mentally ill and the reports of the two experts were submitted on the issue of whether defendant was mentally ill at the time of the offenses. The plea was accepted and defendant was sentenced to concurrent twenty-year terms for all charges, except the lewd act on a minor for which the circuit judge imposed a consecutive fifteen year sentence suspended upon five years’ probation for mental health counseling. In post-conviction proceedings, plea counsel conceded he should have moved to have defendant’s competency reevaluated after comparing the two reports. Given the second report, and plea counsel’s own interactions with defendant, the failure to seek a reevaluation constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is found based on plea counsel’s testimony and the second report. These “clearly established a reasonable, if not strong, likelihood that [defendant] was incompetent to plead guilty.”

2009: Mast v. State, 914 N.E.2d 851 (Ind. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in failing to ensure that psychiatrists’ reports were given to the court and a competence hearing conducted prior to the defendant’s guilty plea to rape and sentence to 30 years. Initial counsel gave notice of a defense or mental disease or defect and the court appointed two doctors to examine competency and sanity issues. With substitute counsel, the defendant entered a guilty plea without obtaining the reports.

Capital Case*

The first doctor's report was received by the clerk's office on the day of the plea. It stated that he was unable to form an opinion about competency and that he requested repeated interviews and an in-patient evaluation. It was not clear whether the trial court had this report at the time of the plea. The second doctor's report, submitted four days after the plea, explicitly stated the doctor's "doubt[s]" that the defendant was competent. Counsel's conduct was deficient in advising the defendant to plead guilty without awaiting the results of the competency evaluations. Prejudice established as "there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of the case would have been different had the trial court been aware of the psychiatrists' reports."

2008: Coker v. State, 978 So. 2d 809 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective prior to plea for failing to obtain a competence hearing. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the trial court gave oral authorization for an evaluation, but counsel never presented a written order and failed to otherwise follow-up. Prejudice established because the defendant may well have been incompetent at the time of his plea. Remanded for a competence determination.

2004: People v. Shanklin, 814 N.E.2d 139 (Ill. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder plea for failing to request a hearing on the defendant's competence or fitness or, alternatively, asking the trial court to question the defendant carefully as to the plea he entered and the consequences. Following the defendant's guilty plea, a presentence report disclosed that the defendant had been hospitalized three times for mental-health problems as a teenager. In addition, he was mildly mentally retarded and had significant problems retaining and receiving verbal information.

When confronted by a defendant, who may be mentally retarded, the trial court and both prosecution and defense may not simply rely on affirmative answers to rote questions to conclude the defendant understands the proceedings and the consequences of his plea.

Id. at 143.

It is incumbent on the attorney representing a mentally retarded defendant to make that fact known to the trial court and for the trial court to proceed with care in accepting a plea.

Id. at 144. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Matthews v. State*, 596 S.E.2d 49 (S.C. 2004). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery, carjacking, and accessory after the fact to murder plea for failing to request a competence hearing prior to the defendant's plea. The defendant had learning disabilities and took special education classes in school. Just one year before the crimes, the defendant had been in a near fatal car accident that caused significant frontal lobe, neurological damage.

10. FAILURE TO PRESERVE THE RECORD FOR APPEAL

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2003: Davis v. Secretary, Dept. of Corrections, 341 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in murder case in failing to adequately preserve a Batson claim for appellate review. While counsel did object, counsel failed to renew the motion before accepting the jury, which was required in order to preserve the issue for appeal. Because counsel's negligence affected only the appeal, the relevant focus in assessing prejudice was the appeal. Because the state court had already recognized that the Batson claim was meritorious, the court found that there was a reasonable probability that the state court would have granted reversal on appeal. This claim had been raised in state post-conviction, but the state court failed to resolve the merits of the claim. Thus, the court found that this case fell outside of § 2254(d)(1) requirement of deference to the state court decision.

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: United States v. Otuonye, 2023 WL 4457003 (D. Kansas July 11, 2023). In case involving convictions for illicitly prescribing controlled medications in conspiracy with a doctor, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to a jury instruction related to the requisite mens rea for two of the counts. Although the Tenth Circuit had not definitively ruled on the issue at the time of trial, the instruction given by the trial court that permitted conviction without a subjective mental state was "contrary to the weight of most circuits and Supreme Court authority" Indeed, defense counsel had unsuccessfully asked for an instruction that expressly required a finding that defendant harbored a subjective intent as an element of the charged offenses. Defense counsel's subsequent failure to object to the instruction by the trial court "bore no relationship to any possible defense strategy" and was "unreasonable and outside the scope of effective assistance of counsel." Prejudice is shown by what happened in the case of defendant's coconspirator, the doctor. The identical instruction was given in his trial, but over the objection of defense counsel. Although the coconspirator's claim of error was rejected by the Tenth Circuit under precedent that post-dated the trial, the Supreme Court ultimately reversed the precedent. The coconspirator's certiorari petition was then granted and, on remand to the Tenth Circuit, the convictions at issue were reversed because of the erroneous instruction. "While it is not certain that Defendant would have appealed the issue to the Tenth Circuit and the Supreme Court and had his convictions vacated after Ruan, the fact remains that his coconspirator did exactly that with perfect success. . . . Therefore, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different had defense counsel preserved the issue by objecting to Jury Instruction 16."

2019: Alvarado v. Wetzel, 2019 WL 3037148 (E.D. Pa. July 10, 2019). In robbery-murder case where petitioner was the get-away driver and tried as an accomplice, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on due process grounds to the trial judge's written response to a question from the jury during deliberations concerning accomplice liability that suggested that the jury could convict petitioner on an accomplice liability theory based on the actus reus element alone without any finding that she had the mens rea, or intent element, necessary for accomplice liability. Post-conviction counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise the trial ineffectiveness claim premised on a due process violation. Petitioner and her boyfriend purchased Xanax from a person in a park that was well-known for illegal prescription drug sales. They shared the drugs with a childhood friend of petitioner who accepted a ride in the vehicle driven by petitioner. At some point, petitioner's boyfriend pulled out a gun from under the front passenger seat where he was sitting and showed it to petitioner and her friend. The three later decided to return to the park to obtain more Xanax. After petitioner parked the vehicle, the childhood friend suggested that petitioner's boyfriend try to "get a play," meaning to get more pills than were paid for. As her boyfriend walked away from the car, petitioner called him back and told him, "Cuz, you know, you know what to do. You know, if they don't give you a play, just pull that shit out." The childhood friend took that to be a suggestion to use the gun which upset her and caused her to yell at petitioner. The boyfriend then left the vehicle and went to the park where he pulled the gun on the drug dealer and took a bottle of Xanax the man was holding. As the boyfriend returned to the car, the drug dealer shouted, "He robbed me," which was repeated by others in the crowd, including the victim, who along with others followed the boyfriend to the car. After the boyfriend entered the front passenger side of the vehicle, the victim attempted to look in the driver's side window. The boyfriend reached over and shot the victim, after which he fired two or three more shots into the park. As they drove away, petitioner exclaimed, "That's why he loves me. That's why we ride or die." Petitioner was tried jointly with her boyfriend. The judge instructed the jury four times concerning accomplice liability, three of the times after questions from the jury. The final instruction was in response to a written question from the jury: "Does aiding after a crime in itself constitute accomplice liability?" After discussing the question with counsel, the trial court sent the jury a written answer to the effect that "it could." Following petitioner's conviction for robbery and second degree murder, trial counsel represented her on direct appeal and raised a single issue: "Did the trial court commit legal error by instructing the jury that she could be convicted under the accomplice theory solely by aiding after the crime had been committed?" Petitioner's judgment and sentence were affirmed with the appellate court finding that the instruction complied with state law. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner unsuccessfully argued that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object to the trial court's written response to the final jury question. In the federal habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged that her due process rights were violated by the supplemental instruction and that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on this basis. Because petitioner's state counsel had relied only on state law on appeal and in state post-conviction proceedings, the claims were unexhausted. And because no available state remedy remained open, they were deemed procedurally defaulted. The default was overcome for the trial ineffectiveness claim based on post-conviction counsel's ineffectiveness. Although post-conviction counsel did challenge trial counsel's performance under state law, post-conviction counsel overlooked the "significant and obvious" due process implications of the written supplemental jury instruction and trial counsel's failure to object on that ground. No strategic reason for the omission of the due process argument could be discerned. "Having shown that she presents a substantial claim of ineffectiveness of trial counsel and that her postconviction counsel's performance was deficient for allowing the default of that claim, [petitioner] has shown that the procedural default of her ineffective assistance of counsel claim may be excused under Martinez." Turning to the merits, which is reviewed de novo, the district court first found that under Pennsylvania law petitioner could be convicted of second degree murder if the jury found that a homicide occurred while she was acting as an accomplice to a robbery. Accomplice liability required a specific mens rea element: the intent to promote or facilitate commission of the offense. The trial court's initial instruction on accomplice liability conformed closely to the standard instruction on the issue. The following two supplemental instructions given by the trial court also comported with state law.

Capital Case*

But the provision of the correct instructions did not negate the harm from the final written answer to the jury inquiry. “The challenged supplemental instruction was a two-word response to the jury’s specific question and was delivered in writing. This concise but ambiguous written instruction likely stood out more to the jury than the previous verbal instructions that correctly explained the mens rea for accomplice liability.” As the Supreme Court recognized in Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U.S. 607, 612 (1946), a specific instruction on a key issue likely carries greater weight with a jury than a previous generalized instruction. “Reviewing the written answer to the jury’s question in the context of the trial record, there is “a reasonable likelihood” that the jury applied the instruction in a way that relieved the State of its burden of proving’ that [petitioner] acted with the intent to promote or facilitate the robbery.” While the prosecution in argument relied heavily on the childhood friend’s account of petitioner’s statements before and after the robbery to establish the requisite mens rea, her credibility was significantly challenged by petitioner and the record suggested that the jury may indeed have discounted the friend’s testimony. Notably, the jury acquitted petitioner of the charge of conspiracy to commit robbery even though conspiracy and accomplice liability have the same intent requirement under Pennsylvania law. The supplemental written instruction violated due process and the record provided no basis to discern a tactical reason for trial counsel not objecting on this ground. Longstanding Supreme Court precedent made clear that the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every element necessary to constitute a crime and that a jury instruction that relieves the government of its burden of proving every element beyond a reasonable doubt violates due process. Thus, deficient performance was established. As for prejudice:

The Court concludes that the error of [petitioner’s] trial counsel in this case in failing to object to the due process violation undermines confidence in the outcome. Given the government’s primary reliance on [petitioner’s] statements in the car, both before and after the shooting, and the jury’s apparent lack of confidence in [the friend’s] testimony and obvious confusion concerning accomplice liability, there is a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different had [petitioner’s] trial counsel objected to the trial court’s written response and had the jury been properly instructed on accomplice liability. [Petitioner] has demonstrated prejudice from her counsel’s deficient performance and therefore has established ineffective assistance of her trial counsel under Strickland.

Hesser v. United States*, 2019 WL 2717271 (M.D. Fla. June 28, 2019), reversed in part of other grounds, 40 F.4th 1221 (11th Cir. 2022). In case involving, inter alia, three counts of filing false tax returns with the IRS, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to renew or make a motion for judgment of acquittal at the conclusion of all of the evidence. Petitioner was charged with filing false tax returns in 2005, 2006, and 2007 – Counts One through Three. At the close of the government’s case in chief, defense counsel moved for a judgment of acquittal only on Count Three based on the absence of a signature on Form 1040. The motion was denied. After the defense presented its case, defense counsel failed to renew the motion as to Count Three or make a motion for judgment of acquittal on any other count. Petitioner was convicted of the charges. On direct appeal, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions. Although it found that the evidence presented by the prosecution in its case-in-chief was not sufficient to establish the falsity element of the three false tax return counts, it applied the difficult manifest miscarriage of justice standard due to defense counsel's failure to properly raise or renew a motion for judgment of acquittal. Defense counsel's "failure to renew or make a motion for judgment of acquittal at the conclusion of all the evidence constituted deficient performance as to Counts One through Three." Had counsel properly preserved a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence, review would have been de novo and petitioner would have prevailed on appeal. Thus, prejudice was established. Because the grant of relief is based on insufficiency of evidence, double jeopardy prevents petitioner from being re-tried on the three counts.

Gable v. Williams*, 2019 WL 1756468 (D. Ore. April 18, 2019), aff'd on due process claim only, 49 F.4th 1315 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S.Ct. 1796 (2023). Granting habeas relief on claim that petitioner's constitutional rights were violated by the exclusion of evidence concerning a third party's confession to the murder petitioner was charged with, as well as on a claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present appropriate legal support, including citation to federal law, in support of the admission of evidence of third party guilt. (The substantive exclusion of evidence claim was raised in state court solely as a state law violation.) Although the claims were procedurally defaulted, petitioner satisfied the Schlup actual innocence test. Multiple witnesses recanted with persuasive explanations for why they had lied, including coercive interrogation tactics, and expert witnesses testified about how the unethical and flawed polygraph testing procedures and the improper and coercive interrogations combined to obtain false testimony from the examinees. In addition, there was the third party confession that had indicia of reliability. The showing of innocence overcame the default of both the substantive exclusion of evidence claim and the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Regarding the defaulted trial ineffective assistance of counsel claim, the district court ruled in the alternative that Martinez was satisfied to overcome the default. In light of the prior merits resolution of the exclusion of evidence claim, it was easily found that trial counsel's failure to assert petitioner's rights under Chambers v. Mississippi stated a substantial claim. Petitioner also demonstrated a reasonable probability that, absent the deficient performance of his post-conviction counsel, the result of the post-conviction proceedings would have been different. Therefore, the procedural bar to the trial ineffectiveness claim is overcome under Martinez.

c. State Cases

2023: Washington v. State, 891 S.E.2d 668 (S.C. App. 2023). In case where petitioner was charged with the armed robbery and kidnapping of an elderly couple, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to (1) object to the prosecutor's statement during closing argument that implied petitioner had a history of committing similar crimes and (2) accept a curative instruction in response to the prosecutor's statement. The prosecutor's closing argument referenced petitioner's "pattern of robbing old folks, intimidating old folks, kidnapping old folks, holding them up." Defense counsel moved for a mistrial during a recess after the argument. The trial judge denied the request after finding that the remark referenced the pair of victims in this case but offered to give the jury a curative instruction to eliminate any possible confusion. Defense counsel declined, claiming that he did not want to draw attention to the comments. Contrary to the conclusion of the post-conviction court, the statement at issue could only be reasonably construed as discussing petitioner's prior record and therefore the statement was outside the record. Defense counsel's failure to contemporaneously object, which forfeited the issue for appeal, constituted deficient performance. Also deficient was the rejection of the offered curative instruction. Because trial counsel believed the prosecutor's comments were egregious enough that a mistrial would be granted, "counsel should have known that refusing a curative instruction was not a valid trial strategy." In a case where the record did not contain overwhelming evidence of petitioner's guilt, prejudice is established.

Capital Case*

2021: Commonwealth v. Little, 246 A.3d 312 (Pa. Super. 2021). In murder case where defense witness Alston contradicted the testimony of the prosecution's two "wildly" inconsistent eyewitnesses and admitted being the killer, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly preserve an objection to the trial court's limitation on the defense examination of the witness. In an effort to discredit Alston, the prosecution had elicited that Alston was serving two life sentences for unrelated crimes and had testified as a defense witness in two other defendants' trials. The prosecution argued that Alston had nothing to lose by taking the blame for the killing in this case. To counter this, defense counsel attempted to ask Alston whether his admission to murder could expose him to a possible future death sentence should the District Attorney choose to pursue charges against him. When the prosecution's objection to the question was sustained, defense counsel seemed to acquiesce to the ruling without reasserting an objection. As a result, a challenge to the ruling was found to be waived on the direct appeal. There was no strategic calculation on the part of defense counsel for agreeing with the trial court's ruling and making it non-reviewable on direct appeal. Indeed, the record indicated that trial counsel mistakenly believed he had done all that was necessary to preserve review of this critical ruling. "In cases where the fact-finder must necessarily make a credibility determination as to a pivotal witness, the erroneous exclusion of evidence pertaining to the witness' credibility may be found prejudicial and not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt." Thus, on the record of this case, there is a reasonable probability that petitioner could have prevailed on this issue in his direct appeal but for his defense counsel's ineffectiveness in waiving it. The requisite prejudice is established for purposes of post-conviction relief.

2020: People v. Jenkins, 187 N.E.3d 111 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Criminal convictions reversed where post-trial counsel failed to preserve issue that the trial court committed constitutional error by denying then-pro se petitioner free access to the transcript of his co-defendant's earlier trial, and then failed to raise the issue on appeal. No showing of prejudice was required on the Equal Protection Claim given that it was "impossible to measure, with any degree of precision, the actual negative impact" the denial of the transcript had on petitioner's preparation of his defense.

Jernigan v. State*, 2020 WL 4728117 (Tenn. Crim. App. Aug. 14, 2020). In prosecution for aggravated sexual exploitation of a minor, trial/appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately preserve the record regarding the prosecution's failure to disclose pre-trial voluminous text messages between petitioner and the victim that were introduced at trial. The prosecution's failure to disclose, while not amounting to Brady error, did violate state discovery rules. And, although there was a substantial amount of proof establishing petitioner's guilt in this case, this was due, in large part, to the prosecution's failure to comply with its statutory discovery obligations. "To allow the State to capitalize on a situation it created, in our view, would defeat the very purpose of the rules of discovery." Had trial/appellate counsel adequately preserved this issue on direct appeal by including in the record the motion for discovery and the compilation of the text messages, petitioner would have established that he was prejudiced by the discovery violation.

Milam v. State*, 2020 WL 6779970 (Tenn. Crim. App. Jan. 28, 2020). In rape of minor case where petitioner entered an Alford plea with the understanding that he would be able to appeal the denial of his motion to suppress evidence, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to preserve the certified question regarding the suppression motion as required under state law. (Counsel also failed to properly refer the case to someone who handled appeals but even had counsel done so, the appeal would have been dismissed for failure to comply with the certified issue requirement.) The case is remanded for the trial court to appoint counsel and enter a certified question in accordance with state rules and then grant petitioner a delayed appeal of the certified question.

2019: Squire v. State, 278 So.3d 153 (Fla. Ct. App. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective on the face of the appellate record for failing to move for a judgment of acquittal on the issue of whether appellant's discharge of a firearm caused great bodily injury to the victim. The evidence showed that appellant and his brother had fired multiple shots at the victim, who took off and ran away. The victim suffered two gunshots in each leg. A bullet recovered from one of the victim's legs was determined to have come from a revolver. A revolver found at the home shared by appellant and his brother had DNA linking the brother to the gun. Two other firearms were found at the home, a 40-caliber semiautomatic pistol and a 22-caliber semiautomatic pistol, although neither had DNA linking them to appellant. A shell casing found at the scene of the shooting had been fired by the 40-caliber semiautomatic pistol found in appellant's home. Appellant was convicted of attempted first-degree murder and the jury made specific findings that appellant actually possessed a firearm, actually discharged a firearm, and actually inflicted great bodily harm as a result of discharging the firearm. Following the second phase of trial, the jury also found appellant guilty of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. His ultimate sentence was negatively impacted by the great bodily harm finding because that implicated the provisions of Florida's 10/20/Life statute and mandated a 25-year mandatory minimum sentence. On appeal, appellant conceded that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that he actually possessed a firearm and discharged it. He contended, however, that there was insufficient evidence to prove that his personal discharge of the firearm actually caused great bodily harm to the victim. The appellate court agreed and found trial counsel deficient for failing to preserve the sufficiency of evidence issue. "There was no strategic reason for defense counsel to fail to move for a judgment of acquittal on this issue. Contrary to the State's argument that a motion for judgment of acquittal on this issue would have been inconsistent with appellant's misidentification defense, a motion for judgment of acquittal on this issue would not have precluded defense counsel from arguing to the jury that appellant was misidentified as one of the shooters." Prejudice was indisputable on this record. The case was remanded for the trial court to strike the 25-year mandatory minimum sentence and replace it with the 20-year mandatory minimum sentence for discharging a firearm.

Brewer v. State*, 924 N.W.2d 87 (N.D. 2019). In case where petitioner was charged with and convicted of two counts of Gross Sexual Imposition involving two minors, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to renew an objection to admission of an interview of one of the minors in which an incident involving petitioner that was unrelated to the charged crimes was discussed. In response to a pretrial motion to exclude evidence of the interview, the trial court ruled that the evidence was admissible to prove motive, intent, plan, absence of mistake or lack of accident. When the State offered a recording of the interview into evidence at trial, defense counsel failed to renew the objection. Petitioner raised a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on trial counsel's inaction. The trial judge presided in the post-conviction proceeding and stated it was likely that he would have granted the motion to exclude if it had been renewed in light of the evidence that had been presented at trial. Trial counsel explained that he did not renew the motion because he "felt that [he] had adequately formed a record in the hearing on the motion itself [and] did not need to raise it." According to the state supreme court, "[t]his statement admits a legal error that is below an objective standard of reasonableness." And even beyond the intentional failure to object, trial counsel stated affirmatively "no objection" when the State offered the interview. "We conclude failing to object at trial because of reliance on the record made in a pretrial motion is a basic legal error that satisfies Strickland's prong one" As to prejudice, admission of the interview "impl[ied] a propensity for sexual contact with minors," and perhaps particularly with the minor involved in the interview. The absence of an objection precluded the trial court from conducting the requisite three-step analysis for determining admissibility. Prejudice is established regardless of whether the objection would have been sustained or overruled. If sustained, the evidence would not have been admitted. If overruled, the issue would have been preserved for appeal. "Because we have repeatedly expressed grave concern where prior bad acts evidence has been admitted without the required analysis by the district court, if it had been preserved, this issue would have had sufficient merit on direct appeal to undermine our confidence in the outcome. . . . Although the admissibility of the interview and the appropriateness of a limiting jury instruction are left for the district court's determination in the context of any subsequent retrial, we conclude Brewer satisfied the prejudice requirement of Strickland's second prong." The argument that prejudice should only be found as to the one victim is rejected.

2008: People v. Owens, 894 N.E.2d 187 (Ill. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in residential burglary case for failing to consult with the defendant concerning a motion to reconsider sentence. The defendant informed the court he wished to appeal his 18 year sentence and the court informed him he must file a motion to reconsider the sentence in order to preserve the appellate issue. Retained counsel withdrew without taking any action and the court entered a notice of appeal for the defendant. "[T]he attorney's failure to consult with the defendant during a critical stage of the proceedings" was deficient and the defendant's ability to preserve his sentencing arguments for appeal was prejudiced.

2004: Heckelsmiller v. State, 687 N.W.2d 454 (N.D. 2004). Counsel ineffective in criminal trespass case for failing to preserve the record for appeal after two potential defense corroborating witnesses were excluded during the trial because counsel failed to ensure that they were sequestered as all other witnesses were. The defense was that the defendant had permission to be on the premises, but counsel considered this unsubstantiated and decided not to present the corroborating witnesses due to credibility concerns because they were family members. (Alleged victim was also a family member.) During the trial, counsel changed his mind and decided to present the testimony. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, when the court excluded the evidence, counsel did not make a proffer or preserve the record for appeal. Prejudice found because the excluded witnesses would have corroborated the only defense presented. Although the court was unaware of the substance of the witnesses' statements, the court held that "the significant point is that counsel's failure to make an offer of proof prevented a meaningful appeal on the issue."

11. MISCELLANEOUS

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: United States v. Osorio-Arellanes, 112 F.4th 647 (9th Cir. 2024). In case involving the killing of a border control officer during an attempt to apprehend individuals who were suspected of committing ongoing robberies of drug couriers in a remote area in Arizona not far from the Mexican border, defendant was entitled to relief from his murder and robbery-related convictions based on ineffective assistance from his Mexican attorney that led to defendant's confession. The offense occurred in 2010. Defendant was identified as having been involved in the crime from DNA on a water bottle recovered at the scene. In 2011, he and others were indicted on numerous charges related to the murder. Because it was impossible to know who fired the shot that killed the officer, the Indictment advanced a felony-murder theory predicated on the robbery charges. Defendant was arrested by Mexican authorities on April 12, 2017. While his extradition proceedings were underway, an interrogation with U.S. officials was arranged. Defendant was in a Mexico City prison at the time and requested the presence of his attorney. After defendant's attorney failed to arrive, defendant declined an offer to be represented by a prison attorney. Eventually, a Mexican attorney (Pimentel) appeared. The record was unclear where Pimentel came from or what he was doing at the prison that day. Pimentel spoke with the authorities and explained he had not "been in [Osorio's] case file," and that another attorney was named in the extradition file. A Mexican official assured him this did not matter because they were only there "for public assistance, just to fulfill the requirement," not for "the extradition proceeding." Pimentel thereafter spoke privately with defendant for about ten minutes. Defendant then consented to Pimentel's representation and the interrogation began. An FBI special agent Dreher confirmed that defendant had conferred with the attorney before reading the Miranda warnings and asking whether defendant had any questions. Although defendant was silent, Pimentel expressed confusion about the underlying nature of the interrogation. Pimentel was told that the U.S. officials were "just here to find out ... what happened," although an unidentified speaker did state that "they prosecute." In answer to questions about the night of the shooting, defendant confirmed his presence there and explained that he was in the area to drop off food on the roads and that the group carried weapons only for protection. Defendant consistently resisted the attempts by the officers to get defendant to admit that his real purpose being in the area was to rob drug smugglers until Pimentel interjected and advised defendant that it was not criminal to rob someone committing a crime so defendant did not need to worry about admitting having participated in that. Following this assurance, defendant informed the U.S. officials about his past experiences with robbing drug smugglers and his intent to rob drug smugglers on the night of the border agent's death. In assessing defendant's claim that the advice conveyed by Pimentel was constitutionally ineffective, the appeals court rejected the government's position that Pimentel could be accepted as properly acting as counsel for defendant for purposes of defendant's Fifth Amendment Miranda waiver, and yet not be recognized as counsel under the Sixth Amendment. "Foreign attorneys representing indicted defendants in U.S.-initiated proceedings should not be measured by a separate standard." Applying Strickland's first prong, deficient performance was easily found. "Objectively reasonable counsel would never encourage a defendant's confession to live charges without first securing any agreement from the prosecution." Further, the interrogation transcript established that Pimentel's advice stemmed not from strategy but from his misunderstanding of the underlying law and facts of defendant's case. As for prejudice,

Capital Case*

The Indictment, the preliminary jury instructions, and the prosecution's opening statement demonstrate that every charge against [defendant] required the Government to prove his intent to rob drug smugglers beyond a reasonable doubt. The remaining trial transcripts show that [defendant's] confession was the Government's key evidence on this dispositive factual dispute.

It was not until defendant received the erroneous advice that he provided the Government with a confession to robbery. Without the confession, the evidence tended to show that drug smugglers sometimes traveled through the area at issue, that crews planning to rob the smugglers tended to be armed, and that defendant's group traveled through the area with guns. Although such evidence might have been sufficient to convince the jury of defendant's intent to rob drug smugglers beyond a reasonable doubt, it did not eliminate any substantial likelihood of the opposite result. Notably, the earlier convictions of defendant's co-defendants were not mentioned, none of his co-conspirators testified against him, and defendant did not take the stand at trial. Additionally, in response to defense counsel's argument for acquittal on the robbery charges based on insufficiency of the evidence, the trial court pointed to the admissions made by defendant on Pimental's advice in denying the motion. But for that advice, "there is at least a reasonable probability that the district court's sufficiency determination (and thus, the case) would have come out differently." Whether looking only to the unaffected evidence presented to the jury, or the trial court's ruling on the sufficiency motion, prejudice is established.

2022: Witherspoon v. Stonebreaker, 30 F.4th 381 (4th Cir. 2022). In case involving a charge of selling cocaine to an informant in a controlled buy taking place in a car, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an order by the trial court to have petitioner stand next to an enlarged image appearing to show the seller's face reflected in the vehicle's side-view mirror that had been captured on the informant's surveillance video. (The seller sat behind the informant in the car and the informant's surveillance camera faced forward.) At the trial, the only person identifying petitioner as the seller of the cocaine was the informant, who was impeached with her criminal history for forgery. Inexplicably, the seller was not arrested at the scene of the controlled buy and petitioner's arrest for the crime was thirteen months after it occurred. The jury was initially unable to reach a verdict. Following receipt of an Allen charge, the jury requested to view the surveillance footage again. Instead, however, of asking for it to be reshown as presented during trial, the jury asked to see a freeze-frame from that video purportedly depicting the seller. Working with the court, the prosecutor located the image at issue and a magnified version was projected to the jury in the courtroom. The jury then requested that petitioner stand and face the jury. When asked if there was an objection, defense counsel responded, "I would, Your Honor, but ..." The trial court then stated, "I think that is appropriate," and ordered petitioner to stand. When asked how to proceed by petitioner, defense counsel told him to comply. Deliberations resumed shortly thereafter, and a guilty verdict was returned ten minutes later. In state post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel's testimony that she only "attempted" to object was credited. The state court nevertheless found that trial counsel's performance was not deficient. This constituted an unreasonable application of Strickland to the facts of this case. “Simply put, trial counsel cannot be found to have operated within the admittedly broad scope of Strickland’s measure of competence when she only attempted — and thereby failed — to object to the stand-up order.” In denying relief, the district court found that trial counsel had successfully objected. But this “disregarded AEDPA’s deferential standard” that applied to the state post-conviction court’s factual finding. Further, trial counsel’s response to the stand-up order did not meet the requirements for a proper objection under state law and the record did not suggest that any objection was actually raised and ruled upon by the trial court. “In these circumstances, the state PCR court’s determination that trial counsel attempted, but failed, to object to the stand-up order is unassailable.” Turning to counsel’s performance, there could be “no dispute that any reasonable lawyer would have objected to the trial court’s order for [petitioner] to stand next to the video freeze-frame, a procedure that presented the jury with new, material evidence following the close of the trial evidence.” State law made clear that evidence submitted to a jury for the first time during its deliberations is unfairly prejudicial to the defendant, and absent a curative instruction, granting the defendant a new trial is the appropriate remedy for such error. Even assuming that trial counsel had previously been unaware of the relevant law, she would have learned it when earlier the jury had requested an explanation for the delayed arrest of petitioner. The trial court had refused the request, telling the jury that supplementing the trial evidence was not permitted. Although the state post-conviction court had found that defense counsel “had a valid and clearly articulable trial strategy that was in line with the prevailing norms of professional conduct,” the court “made no effort to explain how trial counsel’s handling of the stand-up order was in furtherance of a sensible strategy and in line with what a reasonable professional would do under the circumstances.” And the avoidance of a potential “sparring” match with the trial judge could not justify the failure to properly object and preserve petitioner’s rights. Regarding prejudice, the state post-conviction court concluded that none was established because trial counsel’s performance was “professional and beneficial.” This was at least an unreasonable application of Strickland and possibly even contrary to it. Applying the correct test, prejudice is easily established on this record. “[T]here is at least a ‘reasonable probability’ that had trial counsel endeavored to stop the stand-up by objecting to the trial court’s order and explaining the well-founded basis for her protest, the jury would not have observed [petitioner] beside the freeze-frame and would not have returned a guilty verdict, such that ‘the result of the proceeding would have been different.’”

2020: Ellis v. Harrison, 947 F.3d 555 (9th Cir. 2020) (en banc). Habeas relief granted in robbery murder case where petitioner alleged that his defense attorney was a virulent racist and the State waived any exhaustion or Teague defense and conceded the convictions should be overturned. Three concurring judges complained of the failure of the court to offer a reasoned analysis. These judges concluded that the state court’s denial of relief was contrary to Strickland in that it imposed a higher prejudice standard than the decision requires. Under de novo review, they applied Cronic. Five other judges concurred in the result, arguing that the claim had not been adjudicated in state court because petitioner never raised Cronic there. Therefore, § 2254(d) did not apply and posed no barrier to granting relief under the standard of that case.

2017: McKernan v. Superintendent Smithfield SCI, 849 F.3d 557 (3rd Cir. 2017). The Third Circuit granted relief in this Pennsylvania first degree murder case on petitioner's claim that because of the egregious advice given him by his counsel, he was deprived of the right to a fair trial before an impartial tribunal. On the second day of the bench trial, after the prosecution had rested but prior to the defense beginning its case-in-chief, the trial judge, Judge Lisa Richette, summoned counsel for the parties and members of the victim's family to her robing room to complain about and discuss disparaging comments about herself that she had found on a website created by the victim's family members. Judge Richette read some of the comments from the website which she characterized as "vicious and unfair."

The website described an ongoing controversy between the judge and the actor Charlton Heston, who had criticized the judge as being soft on crime and referred to her as "Let 'em Loose Lisa." The judge read a passage from the website stating "Lisa Richette is a bleeding heart judge that often sympathizes with murderers and other violent criminals and gives them light sentences," which the judge characterized as "a total lie." The judge then accused the [victim's family] of writing "dreadful, slanderous things about [her]" throughout the website.

(Footnotes omitted.) Despite her anger, Judge Richette sought approval from the victim's family of her actions in the trial. She described the case as "a horrible, horrible murder," and told the victim's family that she "just want[ed] to make sure that you folks are happy with me." Noting that the victim's family had "already been hurt enough," she told the assistant district attorney that she didn't "want them to have this case heard by a Judge in whom they have no faith." She also told the victim's family that they were very fortunate because there was a witness who came forward in this case unlike in many other murder cases. After being assured by the victim's family that they were "satisfied" with Judge Richette presiding over petitioner's trial, she concluded, "I don't want to open the Daily News tomorrow and read the usual B.S." Defense counsel remained mute during this meeting until the assistant district attorney asked him if he was concerned about the conference. Defense counsel responded that he needed to apprise his client of what had transpired and he left the robing room with the other parties still there with Judge Richette remarking that she'd just talk to the family generally in defense counsel's absence. In the continued discussion in the robing room, the victim's brother and Judge Richette entered into an agreement permitting the judge to "red line" anything she did not approve of from the site and to write her own thoughts about victimology, which would be posted in the judge's "defense." The judge told the victim's mother that she (the judge) would have acted similarly if the same events had happened to her son. She also told the victim's mother that the family was "very lucky" because the assistant district attorney assigned to the case was "one of the best D.A.s in the world." After the victim's family left the robing room, defense counsel returned and expressed his client's concern over the judge's mention of the prosecution's witness and worry that the judge would be harsh on petitioner to prove the victim's family wrong. The assistant district attorney shared those concerns. Defense counsel said that he had advised petitioner to continue before Judge Richette and suggested the problem might be solved if petitioner was brought into the robing room as had the victim's family to talk with the judge. In the robing room, the judge assured petitioner that she would not be influenced by the conversation with the victim's family and that she would "try and pray to God that I be fair to you.” Following further conversation with defense counsel, petitioner reluctantly accepted counsel’s advice to proceed with trial, which later ended with the judge’s rejection of his claim of self-defense and arguments for conviction on a theory less severe than first degree murder. On appeal from denial of relief by the district court, the Third Circuit had “no trouble holding that, in the unique circumstances of this case, counsel’s performance in failing to move for recusal of Judge Richette fell far below the minimal standards of competence in the profession and the state court’s failure to recognize this incompetence was an unreasonable application of the Strickland factors.” Petitioner had reasonably recognized, as defense counsel had not, that a finding by the judge that petitioner was guilty of some offense involving a lower standard of culpability would play directly into the narrative the victim’s family had published on their website, “the caricature of ‘Let ‘em Loose Lisa Strikes Again!’”

While [defense] counsel’s belief that Judge Richette was the best option for his client at the beginning of trial may have been a reasonable strategic decision, by the time Judge Richette held the robing room conference and revealed herself to be actively concerned with her image on the internet and the victim’s family’s perception of her, any competent attorney would have realized that the strategy had to be revised. ¶ Indeed, it appears that if [petitioner] had had no counsel at all, he would have made the decision to seek recusal. He expressed his concerns to his attorney, only to have his attorney inexplicably talk him out of those concerns If counsel is ineffective only where his conduct was so deficient as to render his client de facto without counsel, [petitioner’s] counsel may have been worse: he convinced his client to proceed before a tribunal that objectively had the appearance of bias against him. He advised his client to proceed before a court that was structurally deficient, something no competent attorney would ever do. Under § 2254, where “[t]he question is whether there is any reasonable argument that counsel satisfied Strickland’s deferential standard,” the answer here is “No.” Consequently, [petitioner] claim fulfills the first prong of Strickland.

(Footnotes omitted). The Third Circuit went on to find that “Strickland’s second prong ... is easily met.” The court explained:

In view of Judge Richette’s sensitivity to criticism for being lenient, it would not appear likely that she would now accept [petitioner’s] defense of a lesser degree of homicide. There is evidence in the record from which an impartial judge could have found a lesser degree of homicide. ... Thus, there is a reasonable probability that if [petitioner’s] counsel had been effective and moved for recusal, the outcome of the trial would have been different.

2012: Cornell v. Kirkpatrick, 665 F.3d 369 (2nd Cir. 2012). Counsel was ineffective due to the failure to object to improper venue on one of two counts of rape. There were two separate instances involving two different women. The first woman was raped in a car in a motel parking lot in Monroe County but she did not report it until the second woman, who was her friend, was raped in Ontario County and reported it. The State conceded the first rape was in Monroe County but indicted the petitioner on both charges in Ontario County. The State asserted it had jurisdiction under a state criminal rule that states: “[a]n offense committed in a private vehicle during a trip thereof extending through more than one county may be prosecuted in any county through which such vehicle passed in the course of such trip.” Counsel moved to sever the charges but did not object to venue on the first rape. The District Court found counsel’s conduct was deficient because there was clear state case law limiting the application of this criminal rule to instances where it is “impossible to determine in what county the offense occurred,” but counsel did not research the law. The State did not appeal this issue. Prejudice found. If counsel had objected, the trial court would have been required to submit the issue of venue to the jury. The State twice conceded that the rape was in Monroe County and the victim’s testimony was unequivocal on this point. Thus, there is a reasonable probability that this charge would have been dismissed. Under AEDPA, the state court’s ruling was an unreasonable application of Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court.

2005: United States v. Scott, 394 F.3d 111 (2nd Cir. 2005). The indictment in illegal reentry case was dismissed because counsel was ineffective in the underlying deportation case for failing to apply for a waiver of deportation even though the immigration judge stated that he believed the defendant was eligible for a waiver and instructed counsel to file an application. Prejudice was found because the defendant could have made a strong showing that he was eligible for a waiver and his subsequent criminal charges were irrelevant because they would not have been considered at the time.

b. U.S. District Court Cases

Carter v. Clarke*, 667 F.Supp.3d 163 (W.D. Va. 2023), appeal dismissed, 2023 WL 7128469 (4th Cir. June 9, 2023). Habeas relief granted to petitioner convicted of murdering his wife on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to inform petitioner that he had a constitutional right to testify on his own behalf and refusing to let him take the stand when he asked to do so. The state habeas court found that trial counsel performed deficiently and the district court agreed. Trial counsel provided no particular strategic reason for the decision to keep petitioner off of the stand, stating only that he thought it best for the case. Notably, there is no evidence that petitioner had previous convictions of which the jury was unaware, that his testimony would open the door for admission of otherwise inadmissible evidence, or that his testimony would undermine the defense theory that petitioner’s wife committed suicide. Although it was certain that petitioner would have been subject to rigorous cross examination, trial counsel did not offer that as the reason for his decision to keep petitioner from testifying. The state habeas court denied relief on the ground that petitioner failed to meet the Strickland prejudice prong. The district court concluded that although the error was structural in nature, when raised in the context of an ineffective assistance of counsel claim prejudice had to be established. Petitioner alleged that if he had been permitted to testify, he would have told the jury: (1) his wife shot herself while he was trying to stop her, and he desperately did not want her to die; (2) at the time of her death, he suffered both from extreme anxiety for which he had been prescribed Xanax and also suffered from diabetes; (3) he was likely suffering from ketoacidosis, and it interfered with his ability to think and act clearly; (4) his wife’s suicide was so shocking and upsetting to him that he could not even dial a telephone; (5) in his numerous recorded statements to investigators, he wanted to answer every question they had and tried, perhaps too hard, to give the best answers that he could; (6) the fact that he was off by four to five hours regarding the time of death was an example of how distraught he was and how hard he was trying to help when interviewed by law enforcement officers; (7) he thought his wife died around noon because that was the time he thought he saw on the computer right before this wife shut herself in the bathroom; (8) regarding his hand injury, he was not sure how his hand was cut, but he told the investigators as best he could what he thought had happened based on what he was trying to do, i.e., stop the hammer on the gun from coming down; (9) the combination of extreme anxiety, ketoacidosis, and extreme shock and trauma at the death of his wife made it very difficult for him to function and recall the details of the frantic moments while he was trying to stop his wife from shooting herself; and (10) he would have looked the jurors in the eyes and told them he would never have killed his wife and would never have taken away his son's mother. In finding that prejudice had not been shown, the state habeas court pointed to, inter alia, the three audiovisual recorded interviews petitioner made to law enforcement which provided the jury with an opportunity to observe his demeanor, statements petitioner made to non-law enforcement witnesses that were presented to the jury, the serious discrepancies in petitioner's statements, the forensic evidence introduced at trial that significantly contradicted much of the content of petitioner's statements, the concession by defense counsel during closing argument that petitioner's statements contained inconsistencies, petitioner lack of qualification to testify about ketoacidosis or the impact it may have had on him which was covered by other expert witnesses in any event, the final interview petitioner provided to law enforcement occurred approximately twenty-one months after his wife's death and was devoid of any indication that he was suffering from a medical condition but still contained information that was inconsistent with and not supported by forensic evidence, many of the topics about which petitioner stated he would testify were addressed either in his interviews or through the testimony of other witnesses and much of his testimony would have repeated other testimony, and petitioner would have put himself in position to be cross-examined and subject to impeachment on numerous points had he taken the stand. The district court concluded, however, that there were many flaws to this analysis. For example, after finding the interviews contained discrepancies that were harmful to petitioner, it was "illogical to conclude that being denied an opportunity to correct the discrepancies was not prejudicial."

[H]ad the jury heard his explanations for why [petitioner] believed [his wife] died earlier in the day than she did, there is a reasonable probability that one or more jurors would have credited his explanation and found that his confused state of mind explained the inconsistency. The court finds this conclusion is not subject to reasonable disagreement.

Additionally, had he testified, petitioner "could have explained to the jury why he believed, he cut his hand on the hammer of the gun while wrestling with her over it, and there is a reasonable probability that one or more jurors would have believed him, especially given that one expert testified that [petitioner] could have cut his hand on the rear sight of the gun rather than the hammer." Because petitioner was not permitted to testify to these facts, the jury was left with the impression that petitioner lied about how he injured his hand. Regarding the state habeas court's observation that petitioner was not qualified to testify to a medical diagnosis and that he called medical experts to testify on this issue, he nevertheless could have described to the jury his state of mind immediately after his wife's death and any physical or mental symptoms he experienced. Petitioner's failure to immediately call the police "was puzzling at best and damning at worst." Confidence in the verdict is undermined by the fact that petitioner was not allowed to explain to the jury why he made the choices he did in the hour after his wife's death. A reference by the state habeas court to statements made by petitioner that were supposedly not supported by forensic evidence was made without any citation to the record and is found therefore not to be reasonable based on the evidence presented in the state proceeding. In point of fact, some of the forensic evidence did support petitioner's theory that his wife shot herself. Although other forensic evidence contradicted petitioner's description of events, the state habeas court's finding that petitioner was not prejudiced by his inability to testify was based on an incomplete assessment of the evidence introduced at trial. The state habeas court also found the fact that petitioner entered pleas of "not guilty" before the jury supported the finding of lack of prejudice. But this "brief recitation of 'not guilty' is no substitute for the testimony that [petitioner] wanted to provide the jury—his description of how [his wife] died, an explanation of his behavior immediately after her death, that he loved his wife and was devastated by her loss, and that he would not have taken his son's mother from him." Again, the state habeas court's consideration of the "not guilty" plea as supporting its prejudice conclusion was unreasonable. Regarding the state habeas court's finding that petitioner's proposed testimony would have repeated statements he made in his police interviews or testimony by other witnesses, the state court "did not specify what evidence would have been repetitive or how the repetitiveness would have detracted from its believability. But more importantly, the Supreme Court has made clear that such testimony by other witnesses is not a substitute for a defendant testifying on his own behalf."

Given the closeness of the evidence and the requirement of a unanimous jury verdict for a conviction, there is a reasonable probability that had [petitioner] been allowed to testify, the outcome of the trial would have been different. At a minimum, there is a reasonable probability that his testimony would have convinced the jury to find him guilty of one of the lesser included offenses of voluntary manslaughter or involuntary manslaughter, both of which carry significantly shorter sentencing ranges.

(Footnotes omitted.) "[T]he state habeas court's conclusion that [petitioner] was not prejudiced when he was not allowed to testify is contrary to the Supreme Court's opinion in Strickland that set forth the standard of evaluating prejudice in an ineffective assistance of counsel claim."

c. Military Cases

United States v. Edmond*, 63 M.J. 343 (C.A.A.F. 2006). Counsel ineffective in conspiracy, larceny, and other offenses case for failing to secure the testimony of a subpoenaed defense witness. The alleged conspiracy and larceny concerned two cellular telephones. The subpoenaed witness had also been charged but had been discharged from the military in lieu of a court-martial. He would have testified that there was no conspiracy and that he and the accused, who had both worked in the supply room, believed that they were authorized to obtain the cell phones and that they had intended to return them to the unit but kept the phones after the unit said they no longer wanted the cell phones. When the witness arrived for court, the prosecutor warned him of the possibility of a perjury charge if he testified falsely. When the prosecutor told defense counsel that the witness did not want to testify, counsel did not speak to the witness before he was allowed to leave but instead entered into a stipulation that the witness was invoking his Fifth Amendment rights. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the witness not only did not testify but the implication of the stipulation to the panel members was that the accused's coconspirator could not testify without incriminating himself. The case was remanded either for dismissal of the larceny and conspiracy charges and reassessment of the sentence or for a rehearing.

Capital Case*

d. State Cases

2024: Rivera v. State, 316 A.3d 683 (R.I. 2024). Affirming grant of post-conviction relief on claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for her advice to petitioner on whether to testify in case where petitioner, a Spanish-speaker who was not proficient in English, was convicted of second-degree murder following a bench trial. On the night of the offense, petitioner went to the police department and confessed to killing someone. He took officers to his apartment building where the victim and the murder weapon, a knife, were found. During an interrogation that included a Spanish-speaking officer, petitioner repeatedly told the officers that he did not want to talk and requested an attorney. The officers nevertheless persisted in questioning him. In the disjointed interview, petitioner told the officers that the victim had been in the apartment for approximately three hours before the fight began. Petitioner claimed that the victim sought to collect money that petitioner did not have. According to petitioner, the victim was someone who always intimidated others and he told petitioner that petitioner had "screwed up" and had no way out. Petitioner admitted to having stabbed the victim at least twice with a knife that was on top of the refrigerator and also indicated that the victim did not have a weapon. Petitioner's initial attorney withdrew after petitioner rejected a plea offer to second-degree murder. When trial counsel took over the case, her understanding was that petitioner did not want to enter that plea because he wished to assert self-defense at trial. At a pre-trial hearing, trial counsel read petitioner's statement of admission into the record. In the statement, petitioner admitted stabbing the victim multiple times with the kitchen knife that was recovered from the crime scene and that the stabbing was the proximate and actual cause of the victim's death. The statement concluded: "I do not waive my right to trial by a judge sitting without a jury on the issue of mens rea — that is, whether I had criminal intent." At the close of the State's case, trial counsel moved to dismiss the murder charge or to reduce it to a lesser-included offense. The prosecutor conceded that the motion should be granted but only as to first-degree murder. Petitioner thereafter waived his right to testify and no witnesses were called on his behalf. Petitioner was convicted of second-degree murder. During a pre-sentencing interview with a probation officer and in his sentencing allocution, petitioner explained in detail how the killing was in self-defense. Petitioner subsequently sought post-conviction relief, asserting that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise him that his testimony was essential to the claim of self-defense. In the post-conviction proceeding, trial counsel defended her representation, explaining that, in her view, petitioner's statement to the police was inconsistent with self-defense. She did not seek to suppress it because the prosecution made an off-the-record agreement not to use it in its case-in-chief. Trial counsel assumed that petitioner would testify and had no other witnesses to present. Prior to petitioner deciding not to testify, counsel warned him that he would be impeached with the police statement. She did not tell him that by not testifying, he would be convicted of the charged crime. This was deficient performance. Her failure to adequately advise petitioner of the consequences of not testifying “did not stem from any strategic consideration, but from an unreasonable mistake of law as to the effect of the denial of the motion to dismiss.” According to trial counsel’s testimony, after the motion to dismiss was denied she did not advise petitioner that he was certain to lose the trial if he did not testify because, she believed, the state “still had to prove mens rea.” But under the law, the denial of the motion to dismiss equated to a finding that the evidence at that juncture was sufficient to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. “Trial counsel was obliged to recognize and advise [petitioner] of the clear, indisputable impact of the denial of the motion to dismiss on his decision whether to testify.” The State suggested that trial counsel may have strategically wanted petitioner to waive testifying in order to avoid the consequences at sentencing of a finding that petitioner perjured himself. This was unpersuasive. The choice whether or not to testify belonged to petitioner alone and it was counsel’s duty to ensure the decision was properly informed. Further, “any potential strategic decisionmaking by trial counsel on this issue could not be disentangled from her mistake of law.” The lower court’s finding that counsel’s deficient performance was prejudicial is also upheld. That court emphasized petitioner’s “‘very compelling’ allocution, his lack of a criminal record, and the undisputed circumstances that ‘buttressed’ his account of self-defense.” The lower court “could also reasonably rely on the record evidence of [petitioner’s] consistent desire to present an account of self-defense at trial . . . to infer that he would not have waived his right to testify if adequately advised.” Finally, the appellate court agreed with the lower court’s conclusion that the clearly illegal police interrogation was less damaging than trial counsel suppressed.

2023: Commonwealth v. Tavares, 202 N.E.3d 1238 (Mass. Supreme Judicial Ct. 2023). Following defendant’s conviction for murder, the motion judge did not err or abuse her discretion in granting a new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel, where trial counsel was made aware of but failed to use proffer evidence from a confidential informant that could have raised a reasonable doubt whether defendant murdered the victim. The prosecution theory at trial was that defendant was alone when he killed the victim. According to the proffer, two individuals, “H.H.,” who was armed with a nine millimeter handgun, and “another man,” went to the victim’s apartment intending to rob the victim of money and marijuana. When the victim lunged for the gun, he was shot and killed. The evidence at issue had the potential to aid defendant by: (1) corroborating his mistaken identity claim; (2) undercutting the Commonwealth’s theory that defendant was the sole shooter in the victim’s murder; and (3) challenging the credibility of two witnesses who reported that only one man came to the victim’s home on the night of the shooting. In addition, the evidence could have bolstered the defense that police failed to investigate other leads by suggesting that the Commonwealth failed to investigate the possibility that someone other than the defendant committed the crime and by supporting a new and compelling third-party culprit defense. Found to be unavailing is the Commonwealth’s contention that a felony murder theory could have been the basis for convicting defendant even if the proffer had been utilized by trial counsel. The court explained: “The Commonwealth’s theory at trial was that the defendant was the lone shooter. The prosecutor neither presented evidence of a joint venture nor requested instructions on felony-murder. Thus, what otherwise might have happened if the case had been tried differently is purely speculative.”

Onyiego v. State*, 2023 WL 2326336 (Tenn. Crim. App. March 2, 2023). Petitioner was denied effective assistance of counsel as to one of two related aggravated rape charges where trial counsel failed to discuss with petitioner his ability to waive the statute of limitations as to the lesser-included offenses of rape, sexual battery, and misdemeanor assault, resulting in the jury not being given the option of convicting on a lesser offense. (As to the second aggravated rape conviction, prejudice is not established from counsel's deficiency. On the record of this case, even if trial counsel had requested instructions on lesser-included offenses of aggravated rape causing bodily injury, no reasonable jury would have found petitioner guilty of the lesser-included offense.)

2020: Commonwealth v. Diaz, 226 A.3d 995 (Pa. 2020). Where, as here, "the absence of a needed interpreter at a critical stage of trial obstructs [the defendant's] ability to communicate with counsel, Cronic applies such that the defendant need not prove that he or she was prejudiced by a Sixth Amendment violation."

2019: People v. Mooney, 124 N.E.3d 1068 (Ill. Ct. App. 2019). Conviction for driving while license suspended was reversed due to trial counsel's deficient performance for twice agreeing to continuances on the day of trial, thus tolling the speedy trial clock. Because of the absence of jail time in this case, defendant did not enjoy a Sixth Amendment right to counsel. He was entitled, however, to effective assistance of counsel under state law and the test for effectiveness is Strickland. Counsel could have no strategic basis for agreeing to delays that should have been attributable to the prosecution. "Defendant having asserted his statutory right to a speedy trial, defense counsel was duty-bound to zealously protect that right. Instead, counsel twice agreed, despite her expressed readiness for trial on both of the scheduled dates, to allow both continuances and concessions of tolling to be attributed to defendant. This, failure was objectively unreasonable under prevailing professional norms, and it rendered counsel's performance deficient." Rather than speculate what might have happened absent the deficient performance, the court holds that "the deficiency was prejudicial in that it resulted in defendant being brought to trial outside of the statutorily prescribed 160-day period."

Ford v. State*, 205 A.3d 896 (Me. 2019). Reversing the partial denial of post-conviction relief where trial counsel precluded petitioner from testifying on his own behalf. Petitioner had been approached by police who suspected that the concrete well tiles in the bed of petitioner's truck had been stolen. Petitioner sped off and a chase ensued, during which petitioner repeatedly used his truck to ram police vehicles. Petitioner eventually surrendered after being shot and crashing his vehicle. Petitioner was charged with aggravated attempted murder, two counts of aggravated criminal mischief, two counts of reckless conduct with a dangerous weapon, one count of eluding an officer, and one count of theft by unauthorized taking or transfer. He presented a mental state defense through expert testimony. The defense was unsuccessful and petitioner was convicted of all counts. In post-conviction proceedings, he alleged that trial counsel was ineffective, inter alia, for refusing to allow him to testify. "The post-conviction court found that [petitioner's] trial counsel failed to prepare [petitioner] to testify, failed to inform [petitioner] of his right to testify, and in fact prevented [petitioner] from testifying by stating, in no uncertain terms, '[t]here is no fing way you're going to testify.'" The post-conviction court ruled, however, that this deficiency by trial counsel only prejudiced petitioner on the theft count. The finding was based on a receipt for the well tiles and the testimony petitioner would have offered. The post-conviction court's ruling was erroneous because the theft conviction was "inextricably intertwined with the other charges, and the prejudice that [petitioner] suffered also affected his other convictions." The prosecution's theory was that petitioner was a thief who was attempting to avoid being caught. Petitioner's version of events, in contrast, began with his claim that he was not a thief, and that, in response to an unwarranted confrontation with the police, he was reliving traumatic experiences from his military service. According to [petitioner], when he was confronted by the police with sirens and flashing lights, his PTSD caused a "flashback" that made him believe that he was back in a combat zone.

If petitioner had not believed he had stolen the tiles, there would have been no reason for his flight, making the prosecution's explanation for his actions less plausible. "Because [petitioner] was prevented from testifying, the jury did not hear crucial testimony that would have borne directly on the pivotal issue in this case—whether [petitioner] was suffering from an abnormal state of mind."

2016: Commonwealth v. Brown, 145 A.3d 196 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2016) Trial counsel was per se ineffective where he failed to have even one face-to-face meeting with defendant prior to his capital trial.

State v. Garland*, 781 S.E.2d 787 (Ga. 2016). Counsel ineffective in motion for new trial of sexual battery involving a child case for withdrawing the motion without the defendant's consent and failing to challenge trial counsel's ineffectiveness for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health evidence challenging competence to stand trial and capacity at the time of the offenses. The defendant was convicted of initially touching a child's buttocks as he picked her up during a church conference. He was sentenced to one year imprisonment followed by four years of probation. Following sentencing, new counsel filed a motion for new trial asserting ineffective assistance of counsel. Prior to the motion hearing, the defendant had served his confinement and had been re-incarcerated on a probation violation. Without the defendant's knowledge, counsel entered an agreement with the state to re-instate probation in exchange for withdrawing the motion for new trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient in entering this agreement without the defendant's knowledge and for failing to pursue the issue of trial counsel's ineffectiveness, which was a meritorious claim. Uncontradicted expert testimony was available that the defendant had a cognitive disorder caused by multiple mini-strokes that impaired the defendant's ability to assist counsel and rendered the defendant unable to discern right from wrong or to conform his behavior to socially acceptable norms at the time of the crime.

2015: State v. Banks, 56 N.E.3d 289 (Ohio Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in multi-count conviction case for failing to seek a bench trial on the repeat violent offender specifications. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy. Prejudice established because the error allowed the jury to hear evidence of the defendant's prior conviction, even though the defendant had stipulated to the conviction and did not testify. The prejudice was compounded because the trial court erroneously informed the jury that it could consider the repeat violent offender specification as "other acts evidence."

Ex parte Whited*, 180 So. 3d 69 (Ala. 2015). Counsel ineffective in sodomy case for waiving closing argument. While counsel stated generally that this was a strategic decision, counsel did not recall any specifics of this waiver. There was no reasonable strategy and counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice was also established, as the state's case lacked any physical evidence connecting the defendant to the crime, there were inconsistencies in the alleged victim's testimony, the alleged victim and a codefendant had a sexually transmitted disease not carried by the defendant, and the defendant had "a relatively strong alibi." By failing to make a closing argument, "counsel lost the final opportunity to present these arguments to the jury."

State v. Armstrong*, 863 N.W.2d 449 (Neb. 2015). Counsel in sexual assault on children case had an actual conflict of interest and was ineffective in stipulating that defense witnesses would be excluded. The case arose from allegations that the defendant, who was retired, sexually abused two twin girls that he babysat routinely after school and before school for his neighbors. The girls had been interviewed on video by a forensic interviewer prior to trial and the videos were released to the defense for trial preparation and for use by the defense expert. Defense counsel provided the videos to the defendant without any instruction not to share the videos with anyone and the defendant's wife and son-in-law intended defense witnesses also viewed the videos. During the trial's opening, the state asserted that the alleged victims' behavior had changed over time due to the alleged abuse and that they had become reluctant to spend time with the defendant. The defense countered in the defense opening that the defendant's wife, son-in-law, and granddaughter would testify that the girls were always happy to stay with the defendant. Following the state's case, the defendant's granddaughter testified followed by the defendant's son-in-law. During cross-examination of the son-in-law, it was discovered that he had watched the videos of the alleged victims' pretrial interviews. Based on a state law making it a misdemeanor to disclose videos of interviews of child sex abuse victims without court permission, the state challenged the son-in-law's testimony. The trial court stating that defense counsel may be guilty of a crime and that he had a right to remain silent heard argument only by the co-counsel. The state focusing on impact on the trial rather than on whether counsel was guilty of a crime stated that there were only two options: (1) a mistrial; or (2) to strike the son-in-law's testimony and precluded testimony by the defendant's wife, who was similarly "tainted." Without asking for a continuance or conducting any research to determine whether the statute had been violated or whether exclusion of the evidence was appropriate, even assuming a violation, counsel agreed to exclude the defense evidence believing this was a better alternative to a mistrial because the defense evidence would still be excluded and the state would have more time to prepare for the defense evidence. Counsel had an actual conflict of interest due to "the prospect of criminal or ethical violations [that] had a chilling effect on defense counsel's representation." "[C]ounsel's interest in avoiding criminal or ethical sanctions was in conflict with Armstrong's interest in presenting the strongest defense possible." Counsel acquiesced to appease the state and the trial court for counsel's benefit rather than as a matter of "trial strategy to benefit Armstrong's defense." Because the conflict adversely affected counsel's performance, prejudice was presumed. Even if no presumption was applied, the court found actual prejudice under Strickland. The excluded defense witnesses would have lent credibility to the defendant's testimony. This prejudice was compounded by "the negative inferences the jury could have drawn from the unexplained striking of the son-in-law's testimony and the unexplained absence of Armstrong's wife.” “[T]here is a natural negative inference any time a defendant’s spouse fails to testify.” This negative inference was “made even worse” here because the jury reasonably expected from the defense opening that the wife would testify.

2014: People v. Spencer, 20 N.E.3d 785 (Ill. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in bench trial of armed robbery with a firearm for failing to object to the trial court’s conviction on the separate and distinct offense of armed robbery with a dangerous weapon other than a firearm. The trial court stated there was a reasonable doubt about whether a firearm was used as none was found and noted a sentencing enhancement if a firearm were used. It was error, however, to convict of armed robbery with a dangerous weapon other than a firearm because this offense was not a lesser-included-offense and the defendant had not been charged with this offense. Counsel’s conduct in failing to object was deficient and prejudicial. Conviction reduced to the lesser-included-offense of robbery and remanded for sentencing.

2013: Huertas v. Commissioner of Correction, 64 A.3d 766 (Conn. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in failing to request an increase on bond on two prior charges so that the petitioner could be credited with 17 days of presentence confinement credit on those charges. Counsel had “no strategic reason.”

People v. Johnson*, 991 N.E.2d 396 (Ill. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in unlawful possession of weapon by a felon and misdemeanor domestic battery case for acquiescing to the joinder of the charges. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial. In the felon weapon case, the effect of joinder was that the jury was improperly allowed to consider other crimes evidence of domestic violence or threats. While these uncharged acts were admissible on the domestic battery case, they were not admissible on the felon weapon case. This error was exacerbated by improper jury instructions. Likewise, the jury was improperly permitted in the domestic battery case, to consider the defendant’s felon status. “[C]ounsel’s decision to go along with the joinder was based more on convenience than strategy.” Reversal was also required due to “cumulative error” in light of the plain error in the trial court’s instructions, which did not limit consideration of the defendant’s felon status to the weapons charge.

2012: State v. Moore, 289 P.3d 487 (Utah 2012) (affirming 223 P.3d 1137 (Utah Ct. App. 2009)). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual abuse and dealing in material harmful to a minor case for failing to press issue of the discrepancy in the alleged victim’s testimony about whether incident occurred when he was 13 or 14 years old. Aggravated sexual abuse, a first-degree felony, was applicable only if the victim was under 14 years old. Thus, if the victim was 14, the defendant could be convicted only of a lesser offense. The state conceded that counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial on that offense but argued that the pornography charge was unaffected, even though both offenses allegedly occurred on the same day, which was “illogical.”

2010: Middleton v. State, 41 So. 3d 357 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately advise the defendant in capital murder prosecution. During trial, the state moved to strike a juror, who had failed to disclose (when asked) that he had a prior felony conviction. The court struck the juror and informed the defendant he could consent to proceeding with 11 jurors or replacing the struck juror with a previously-dismissed alternate juror. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to advise the defendant of the third option—a motion for mistrial—in light of the defendant’s absolute right under state law to have a jury of 12. Without this advice, the defendant consented to proceeding with 11 jurors and was convicted of second degree murder. On initial review, the court found counsel’s conduct was deficient and remanded for a determination of whether the defendant would have moved for a mistrial if he had been adequately advised. On remand, the court found that he would have moved for a mistrial, but found no prejudice because the defendant could not demonstrate that the “outcome of a new trial would have been any different.” This was erroneous because the defendant needed only to demonstrate a reasonable probability that he would have requested a mistrial and that a mistrial would have been granted.

2009: Bass v. State, 674 S.E.2d 255 (Ga. 2009). Counsel ineffective in arson and robbery case for failing to object when the county sheriff assumed the duties of the bailiff after providing key testimony for the state. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “no competent attorney could reasonably have believed that [the Sheriff’s] service as bailiff would not compromise appellant’s constitutional right to a fair jury.” Prejudice established where the Sheriff acted as bailiff for half of the trial or a two day period from the beginning of the defense case to the verdict. “[E]ven if it could be assumed that [the Sheriff] never did discuss the case directly with any members of the jury, it would be blinking reality not to recognize the extreme prejudice inherent in this continual association throughout [half of] the trial between the jurors and th[is] key witness[] for the prosecution.” Id. at ____ (quoting Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, 473 (1965)). In addition, the state’s case was circumstantial and hinged on credibility and a prior jury hung on 23 of 24 counts.

People v. Centeno*, 916 N.E.2d 70 (Ill. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel was ineffective in stolen vehicle plea case for failing to surrender the defendant on his recognizance bond in Will County while he was in custody in Cook County on an unrelated offense. Prejudice established because, if counsel had performed adequately, the defendant would have been in simultaneous custody on both offenses and would have received credit for both offenses. Presentence credit given.

2008: McCombs v. State, 3 So. 3d 950 (Ala. Crim. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for advising the 18-year-old defendant to lie in his testimony and deny that he stabbed the victim, which resulted in the defendant giving up the right to assert self-defense. In light of Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 171 (1986) (“under no circumstance may a lawyer either advocate or passively tolerate a client’s giving false testimony”), “[t]here can be no question that the performance of . . . trial counsel falls outside prevailing professional norms and was unreasonable under any circumstance.” Prejudice found because the evidence was undisputed that the defendant was told he was outnumbered and was going to get his “butt whooped,” that he had been hit by three people, and that he was attempted to run when the victim was killed. Thus, “a defense that [he] acted out of a reasonable belief that an assault was imminent was a viable defense.”

Williams v. State*, 254 S.W.3d 70 (Mo. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to adequately establish the defendant’s indigence in support of a motion for a psychiatric expert to evaluate the defendant’s capacity at the time of the offense and to assist counsel. The defendant was indigent, but counsel was retained for him by his father. Counsel requested funds for a defense expert and presented evidence that the defendant had twice been involuntarily committed and diagnosed with a schizophreniform type psychosis within several years of the crime. Counsel also presented testimony from the defendant to establish indigence that was inadequate under the state statute requiring an affidavit of indigence and specific information. Counsel's conduct was deficient for failing to present adequate testimony or evidence, which would have entitled the defendant to appointment of an independent expert. Prejudice was found because the court-appointed competence evaluation was insufficient. In addition, prejudice was found despite the defendant's failure to establish the expected testimony of an independent expert. "It would be useless to require such a movant, now proven to have been indigent, to produce at a post-conviction hearing the same expert testimony he could not afford at trial."

2007: State v. Grogan, 163 P.3d 494 (N.M. 2007). Court affirmed trial court's grant of new trial on its own motion following conviction for great bodily harm by vehicle. The court found that counsel was ineffective. On appeal, the court held that it was appropriate to presume prejudice "when a trial court witnesses gross or obvious incompetence." Here, the defense counsel's failure to secure and review his own expert's opinion before permitting the expert to write the report. While the state examiners had found cocaine and methamphetamines in the defendant's blood it was not quantified. The defense expert did so and his written report was provided to the state, which called him to testify and admitted the report. This was the most harmful evidence against the defendant.

2006: In re R.K.S., 905 A.2d 201 (D.C. 2006). Juvenile adjudicated for unauthorized use of motor vehicle and receiving stolen property was completely denied counsel and prejudice was presumed under Cronic due to counsel's refusal to participate in the first day of trial after being denied a continuance. While counsel refused to participate, the juvenile's statement to police and an officer's testimony that the juvenile was a passenger in the car were admitted without objection or even cross-examination.

Smith v. State*, 905 A.2d 315 (Md. 2006). Counsel ineffective in criminal contempt case. The witness, an inmate, was called to testify as a prosecution witness in another case. When the witness sought to invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, the court appointed counsel for him. Counsel informed the court, after discussions with the witness and the prosecutor, that he had advised the witness that he could find no legitimate basis for assertion of the Fifth Amendment privileges. The witness continued refusing to answer questions, although not on the asserted basis of the Fifth Amendment. The court found him in contempt and subsequently imposed a sentence of five months. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel, in violation of the attorney-client privilege, disclosed the nature of his advice to the witness and advised the trial judge as to his opinion regarding the application of the Fifth Amendment. In essence, counsel had a conflict due to his attempt to advise the witness and be a friend of the court. He could not do both here. Prejudice found because the trial court relied on counsel's statement in finding that the witness did not have a Fifth Amendment privilege.

2005: Jackson v. Washington, 619 S.E.2d 92 (Va. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in burglary and grand larceny case for failing to object to the defendant being tried before a jury while wearing a jail-issued "jumpsuit" after the jail misplaced the defendant's civilian clothes and failed to replace them or allow him an adequate opportunity to obtain new clothing. There was no valid strategy where counsel did not object simply because he believed the defendant wanted to go to trial quickly because counsel knew that the defendant also objected to being tried in jail clothing and that his credibility would be a critical issue during the trial. Prejudice found because “[r]eason and common human experience dictate, at a minimum, that the accused’s appearance in jail clothes is such a badge of guilt that it would render an accused’s assertion of innocence less than fully credible to the jury.”

2004: State v. Guerard, 682 N.W.2d 12 (Wis. 2004). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery and burglary case for failing to adequately seek admission of the defendant’s brother’s statements against penal interest. The state relied on the victim and an eyewitness, who identified the defendant as the perpetrator. The defendant’s brother confessed to his sister and a defense investigator thought that he was the perpetrator. During trial, the brother invoked his right to silence. Counsel initially sought to admit the brother’s confession to his sister, but did not pursue this or inform the court about the brother’s additional confession to the defense investigator. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the brother’s statements against penal interest were sufficiently corroborated (by their repetition to several people) to be admissible. Prejudice found because the defense sought to establish that the brother and not the defendant committed the crimes. If the jury had heard the brother’s confessions, there was a reasonable probability of a different result.

2003: Commonwealth v. Brooks*, 839 A.2d 245 (Pa. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in capital trial for failing to meet with his client face-to-face prior to trial. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in that counsel never once met with the defendant prior to the beginning of jury selection. Counsel spoke only briefly with the defendant by telephone.

It should go without saying that no lawyer, no matter how talented and efficient, can possibly forge a meaningful relationship with his client and obtain adequate information to defend that client against first-degree murder charges in a single thirty minute telephone conversation.

The court found that face-to-face meetings were important, because Without such a meeting, there is little to no hope that the client will develop a fundamental base of communication with his attorney, such that the client will freely share important information and work comfortably with the lawyer in developing a defense plan. Moreover, only a face-to-face meeting allows an attorney to assess the client’s demeanor, credibility, and the overall impression he might have on a jury. This is of particular importance in cases in which the client may take the stand in his defense or at the penalty phase in an attempt to establish the existence of particular mitigating circumstances.

The court held that there was no reasonable basis for the attorney’s failure to meet with the defendant and that “failure to do so is ‘simply an abdication’ of the most basic expectations of defense counsel in a capital case.” Prejudice found because, in this instance, the attorney’s failure to meet with the client and develop a relationship resulted in the defendant proceeding pro se with counsel serving only as standby counsel.

II. CAPITAL SENTENCING PHASE ERRORS

A. NUMEROUS DEFICIENCIES AND INADEQUATE MITIGATION

1. U.S. Supreme Court Cases

2024: Thornell v. Jones*, 602 U.S. 154, 144 S. Ct. 1302 (2024). In this capital case from Arizona, the Supreme Court reversed, by a vote of 6 to 3, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals’ opinion granting habeas relief on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing. Petitioner was sentenced to death for three murders. The trial court found three aggravating circumstances applied to two of the murders: multiple homicides, murder for pecuniary gain, and the murders were especially heinous, cruel or depraved. An additional aggravating factor, murder of a young child, applied to the third murder as well. The trial court concluded that the mitigating circumstances were not sufficiently substantial to outweigh the aggravating circumstances, and sentenced petitioner to death. In state postconviction, petitioner argued that his trial counsel was ineffective for failing to present a variety of mitigating evidence. After petitioner’s request for postconviction relief was denied, he sought federal habeas relief, which a Ninth Circuit panel granted. The Supreme Court majority reversed, finding that the Ninth Circuit departed from Strickland’s prejudice inquiry in at least three ways: (1) “it failed adequately to take into account the weighty aggravating circumstances in this case”; (2) it applied a “clearly unsound” rule prohibiting a court considering a Strickland claim from “assessing the relative strength of expert witness testimony,” e.g., comparing defense expert testimony with a contrary opinion of a prosecution expert to determine what weight to give the defense expert; and, (3) it erroneously found that the district court erred by “attaching diminished persuasive value” to petitioner’s mitigating evidence because there was no link between that evidence and petitioner’s crime. 144 S.Ct. at 1310-1311. This last mistake by the Ninth Circuit was based on a misinterpretation of Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982). The majority clarified that while Eddings held that a sentencer may not “refuse to consider . . . any relevant mitigating evidence,” it did not hold that a sentencer cannot find mitigating evidence unpersuasive. Id. at 1311. Turning to its own Strickland prejudice analysis, the majority held that petitioner was not entitled to habeas relief:

[m]ost of the mitigating evidence [petitioner] presented at the federal evidentiary hearing was not new, and what was new would not carry much weight in Arizona courts. Conversely, the aggravating factors present here are extremely weighty. As a result, there is no reasonable probability that the evidence on which [petitioner] relies would have altered the outcome at sentencing.

Id. Justices Sotomayor, Kagan and Jackson dissented

2021: Dunn v. Reeves*, 594 U.S. 731, 141 S.Ct. 2405 (2021) (per curiam) (1998 trial and sentencing). Reversing grant of habeas relief by Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Alabama death penalty case on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and present evidence of petitioner’s intellectual disability as mitigating evidence. The Alabama court did not violate clearly established federal law when it rejected petitioner’s contention that his attorneys were ineffective in failing to hire a neuropsychological expert they had successfully obtained funding to retain. Petitioner did not call trial counsel as witnesses at the state post-conviction hearing to explain this omission. The Eleventh Circuit mischaracterized the state court decision when it held that the state court, in denying relief, had adopted a per se rule that the absence of testimony by trial counsel would always preclude a finding of deficient performance. Rather, the actual analysis of the claim by the state court indicated a case-specific approach and the record supported a number of theories for why counsel proceeded as they did. “[T]he Alabama court’s treatment of the spotty record in this case was consistent with this Court’s recognition that ‘the absence of evidence cannot overcome the strong presumption that counsel’s conduct fell within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance.’” (Citations and internal quotation marks and brackets omitted).

Mays v. Hines, 592 U.S. 385, 141 S.Ct. 1145 (2021) (per curiam) (1985 offense and 1989 resentencing). In Tennessee death penalty case, reversing the grant of habeas relief by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals on claim that trial counsel had been ineffective at the guilt and sentencing phases of the trial by failing to suggest that the man who discovered the victim’s body was the actual killer. The victim worked at a motel where petitioner had rented a room. Her body was found stabbed to death by a regular patron of the motel. In state post-conviction proceedings, the patron’s account for his presence at the motel was shown to have been false. While he claimed at trial to have simply stopped by to visit the motel owners and fortuitously found the victim when he entered a room to use the bathroom, in fact he was there for a regular tryst with a woman who was not his wife. Although defense counsel was aware of the affair at the time of trial, defense counsel decided to forgo eliciting the embarrassing information. In granting relief, the Sixth Circuit failed to “carefully consider all the reasons and evidence supporting the state court’s decision” that petitioner had failed to establish prejudice. Instead of evaluating the substantial evidence linking petitioner to the crime, e.g., his “flight [from the motel] in a bloodstained shirt, his theft of the [victim’s] vehicle and money, and his ever-changing stories about stabbing and robbing various people on the day of the crime,” the court of appeals focused on all the reasons why it thought the third party “could have” been a viable alternative suspect. “This approach plainly violated Congress’ prohibition on disturbing state-court judgments on federal habeas review absent an error that lies ‘beyond any possibility for fairminded disagreement.’” (Citations omitted.)

2020: *Shinn v. Kayer, 592 U.S. 111, 141 S.Ct. 517 (2020) (per curiam) (1997 trial and sentencing). In Arizona death penalty case, summarily reversing the grant of habeas relief by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals on claim is ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals violated AEDPA jurisprudence in ruling that the state court unreasonably applied Strickland v. Washington when the state court held that Kayer had failed to establish prejudice from trial counsel’s alleged deficient performance. The federal appeals court arrived at its conclusions about the significance of the mitigating evidence trial counsel had failed to develop and present “without ever framing the relevant question as whether a fairminded jurist could reach a different conclusion.” Because the state post-conviction court did not articulate its specific reasons for finding that Kayer failed to establish prejudice, the Supreme Court looked to what theories or arguments could have supported the state court’s conclusion. Perhaps the most probable was that the state post-conviction court simply found “that the new mitigation evidence offered in the postconviction proceeding did not create a substantial likelihood of a different sentencing outcome.” In finding to the contrary, the Ninth Circuit impermissibly substituted its own judgment as to the relative weight of the aggravating and mitigating evidence instead of asking “whether a fairminded jurist could take a different view.” Unlike the Ninth Circuit, a fairminded jurist could have given substantial weight to Kayser’s prior conviction for burglary given that it involved a handgun and the capital crime was committed by a firearm. And a fairminded jurist could also have taken a different view of the mitigating evidence than did the Ninth Circuit. While the Ninth Circuit found that evidence of Kayser’s bipolar disorder and untreated alcohol and gambling addictions supported the finding of the statutory mitigating circumstance of mental impairment, “reasonable jurists could debate the extent to which these factors significantly impaired [Kayser’s] ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the law at the time of the murder” given that the record reveals that Kayser had extensive opportunities to consider his actions—planning the murder in advance, driving his victim to a remote area, and subsequently returning to the murder scene and shooting the victim in the head a second time. Moreover, Kayser’s planning of the murder, efforts to hide the body, interactions with [the victim] before and after the murder, and attempts to profit from his crimes using an alias display a measure of control and intentionality.

The Ninth Circuit had relied on Arizona Supreme Court direct appeal decisions in its prejudice analysis, concluding that they established a reasonable probability that the state supreme court would have reversed Kayser’s death sentence on direct appeal had trial counsel developed the mitigating evidence that was presented in the post-conviction proceeding. But “because the facts in each capital sentencing case are unique, the weighing of aggravating and mitigating evidence in a prior published decision is unlikely to provide clear guidance about how a state court would weigh the evidence in a later case.” And the Arizona Supreme Court decision focused on by both the Ninth Circuit and Kayser had distinguishable aggravating and mitigating circumstances, thus falling “far short of placing the state court’s prejudice determination in this case beyond the realm of fairminded disagreement.”

Andrus v. Texas, 590 U.S. 806, 140 S.Ct. 1875 (2020) (per curiam) (2012 trial and sentencing). In Texas death penalty case stemming from a double murder occurring during a botched carjacking, the Supreme Court reversed the unexplained denial of relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing and remanded for consideration of prejudice in light of this opinion. Trial counsel was constitutionally deficient by: (1) “perform[ing] almost no mitigation investigation, overlooking vast tranches of mitigating evidence”; (2) presenting evidence that, “due to counsel’s failure to investigate compelling mitigating evidence, . . . backfired by bolstering the State’s aggravation case” and (3) “fail[ing] adequately to investigate the State’s aggravating evidence, thereby forgoing critical opportunities to rebut the case in aggravation.” Trial counsel, by his own admission, was barely acquainted with the few mitigation witnesses he did call at the sentencing phase: petitioner’s mother, his biological father, a drug expert, and a prison counselor. Additionally, trial counsel “acknowledged that he did not look into or present the myriad tragic circumstances that marked [petitioner’s] life.” As shown by expert testimony presented in the state habeas proceedings, petitioner’s background of “very pronounced trauma” resulted in “posttraumatic stress disorder symptoms from, among other things, ‘severe neglect’ and exposure to domestic violence, substance abuse, and death in his childhood.” Trial counsel also ignored avenues of mitigation of which he was aware. Although at trial, trial counsel had “averred that his review did not reveal that [petitioner] had any mental-health issues, in fact there were “materials prepared by a mitigation expert well before trial” that “pointed out that [petitioner] had been ‘diagnosed with affective psychosis,’ a mental-health condition marked by symptoms such as depression, mood lability, and emotional dysregulation.” In addition, “a clinical psychologist briefly retained to examine a limited sample of [petitioner’s] files had informed [trial counsel] that [petitioner] may have schizophrenia.” Such known evidence would have led a reasonable attorney to investigate further. “Yet counsel disregarded, rather than explored, the multiple red flags.” The record showed that trial counsel’s failure to investigate resulted from inattention rather than strategy. The result of the deficient investigation was the presentation of evidence that actually aided the State’s case in aggravation. For example, petitioner’s mother “sketched a portrait of a tranquil upbringing,” during which petitioner got himself into trouble and involved with drugs despite his family’s best efforts. Trial counsel was ignorant of the falseness of such testimony and had failed to heed the warning of the mitigation specialist that petitioner’s mother appeared to be motivated by self-interest. And the uninformed decision to call petitioner’s mother ultimately undermined petitioner’s own testimony, which recounted, inter alia, his mother’s sale of drugs during petitioner’s childhood. Counsel even highlighted the discrepancy between petitioner’s testimony and that of his mother, which could have been interpreted by the jury as an insinuation that petitioner was the one who was lying. Finally, trial counsel failed to investigate and present evidence to rebut the State’s case in aggravation. In order to establish the future danger to society aggravator, the State emphasized evidence of aggressive behavior by petitioner both while incarceration as a juvenile and awaiting trial. But had counsel “genuinely” investigated petitioner’s experiences in juvenile custody, “counsel would have learned that [petitioner’s] behavioral problems there were notably mild, and the harms he sustained severe.” Alternatively, “with sufficient understanding of the violent environments [petitioner] inhabited his entire life, counsel could have provided a counternarrative of [petitioner’s] later episodes in prison.” Instead, “counsel left all of that aggravating evidence untouched at trial— even going so far as to inform the jury that the evidence made it ‘probabl[e]’ that [petitioner] was ‘a violent kind of guy.’” The State’s case in aggravation also highlighted petitioner’s alleged commission of a knifepoint robbery at a dry-cleaning business. Despite petitioner’s assertions of innocence, trial counsel failed to investigate the incident. Had counsel done so, “counsel would have discovered that the only evidence originally tying [petitioner] to the incident was a lone witness statement, later recanted by the witness, that led to the inclusion of [petitioner’s] photograph in a belated photo array, which the police admitted gave rise to numerous reliability concerns.” (Footnote omitted.) Failing to cast doubt on the aggravating evidence was “hardly the work of reasonable counsel.” Assuming that the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals found no deficient performance, such a conclusion was erroneous as a matter of law. (The rejection of the claim was without analysis.) As for the prejudice prong of the Strickland test, it was unclear from the record whether the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals considered this prong in ruling that petitioner was not entitled to relief. Although the concurring opinion by the state appellate court discussed prejudice in some detail, that analysis did not receive majority approval. Additionally, in that analysis, the state court concurrence “seemed to assume that the prejudice inquiry here turns principally on how the facts of this case compare to the facts in Wiggins.” The Supreme Court, however, has “never before equated what was sufficient in Wiggins with what is necessary to establish prejudice.” In light of the “uncertainty as to whether the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals adequately conducted that weighty and record-intensive analysis in the first instance,” the case was remanded for the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals to address Strickland prejudice.

2009: *Porter v. McCollum, 558 U.S. 30 (2009) (per curiam) (sentenced in 1988). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The defendant, after proceeding pro se with stand-by counsel, plead guilty to shooting his former girlfriend. His stand-by counsel was appointed to represent him in sentencing and presented only his ex-wife’s testimony and an excerpt from a deposition. “The sum total of the mitigating evidence was inconsistent testimony about [the defendant’s] behavior when intoxicated and testimony that [he] had a good relationship with his son.” Id. at 33. No mental health evidence was presented and the trial court found no mitigating circumstances. Because the state court did not decide whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, the Court reviewed this element of the claim de novo. While “counsel had an ‘obligation to conduct a thorough investigation of the defendant’s background,’” id. at 39 (quoting Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 396 (2000)), counsel “did not satisfy those norms,” id. Counsel was appointed a month before sentencing and had only one short meeting with the defendant about the sentencing phase. “He did not obtain any of [the defendant’s] school, medical, or military service records or interview any members of [the defendant’s] family.” Where counsel in Wiggins failed to “expand[] their investigation,” counsel here “did not even take the first step of interviewing witnesses or requesting records.” Id. “[H]e ignored pertinent avenues for investigation of which he should have been aware.” Id. at 40. Even court-ordered competency evaluations revealed his limited education, his military service and combat record, and his father’s “over-discipline.” Id. While counsel asserted that the defendant was “fatalistic and uncooperative,” the defendant had instructed him not to talk to his ex-wife or son, but otherwise “did not give him any other instructions limiting the witnesses he could interview.” Id. In short, while the defendant “may have been fatalistic or uncooperative, . . . that does not obviate the need for defense counsel to conduct some sort of mitigation investigation.” Id. There was also prejudice. In short, the judge and jury at sentencing “heard almost nothing that would humanize [the defendant] or allow them to accurately gauge his moral culpability. They learned about [his] turbulent relationship with [the victim], his crimes, and almost nothing else.” Id. at 41. Evidence was available that the defendant had routinely witnessed his father beat his mother. He was also routinely beaten by his father, particularly when he tried to protect his mother. His father even shot at him once. He attended classes for slow learners and left school when he was 12 or 13. He joined the Army at 17 and fought in the Korean War. His company commander testified that he fought in two major battles within a 3 month period and was wounded in both. In one of the battles his unit suffered more than 50% casualties. He was individually decorated for his actions in both battles. When he returned to the U.S., he went AWOL and was sentenced to six months’ confinement, but he was honorably discharged. Id. at 33-34. After his discharge, he suffered from posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), which the Court noted is “not uncommon among veterans returning from combat,” as the Secretary of Veteran Affairs testified before Congress in 2009 “that approximately 23 percent of the Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans seeking treatment at a VA medical facility had been preliminarily diagnosed with PTSD.” Id. at 35 n.4. He also developed a serious drinking problem. An expert in neuropsychology also found that he suffered from “brain damage that could manifest in impulsive, violent behavior.” Id. at 36. The expert testified that two statutory mitigating circumstances were present: substantially impaired ability to conform conduct and extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

Unlike the evidence presented during [the defendant’s] penalty hearing, which left the jury knowing hardly anything about him other than the facts of his crimes, the new evidence described his abusive childhood, his heroic military service and the trauma he suffered because of it, his long-term substance abuse, and his impaired mental health and mental capacity.

Id. at 33. The aggravation evidence “[o]n the other side of the ledger” was not substantial. Id. at 41.

Had the judge and jury been able to place [the defendant’s] life history “on the mitigating side of the scale,” and appropriately reduced the ballast on the aggravating side of the scale, there is clearly a reasonable probability that the advisory jury—and the sentencing judge—“would have struck a different balance,” Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 537, and it is unreasonable to conclude otherwise.

Id. at 42. Thus, under AEDPA, the state court’s finding of no prejudice was “an unreasonable application of our clearly established law.” Id. at 44. The state court did not consider the expert testimony for purposes of nonstatutory mitigation and “unreasonably discounted the evidence of [the defendant’s] childhood abuse and military service.” Id. at 43. The evidence of childhood abuse “may have particular salience” in a case like this where the defendant killed his former girlfriend. Id. The military service was important as “[o]ur Nation has a long tradition of according leniency to veterans in recognition of their service, especially for those who fought on the front lines.” Id. The military service was also relevant mitigation because of “the intense stress and mental and emotional toll that combat took.” Id. at 44.

2005: Rompilla v. Beard*, 545 U.S. 374 (2005) (sentenced in November 1988). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing “to make reasonable efforts to obtain and review material that counsel [knew] the prosecution [would] probably rely on as evidence of aggravation at the sentencing phase of the trial,” which would have led to significant mitigation. [For additional details, see the summary in the first section on U.S. Supreme Court cases.]

2003: Wiggins v. Smith*, 539 U.S. 510 (2003) (sentenced in October 1989). Counsel ineffective in capital habeas case, decided under the AEDPA, for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Prior to trial, counsel had arranged for a psychologist to test Wiggins and had obtained a presentencing report and his social services records. Prior to sentencing, counsel filed a motion to bifurcate sentencing so they could present evidence in the first phase that Wiggins was not directly responsible for the murder (a finding required by state law for death eligibility) and in the second phase could present mitigation. The court denied the motion. In opening statements, counsel argued both issues and said that Wiggins had a difficult life and no prior convictions. Counsel did not present any life history evidence during mitigation though. Before closing arguments, counsel preserved the bifurcation issue and argued that, if bifurcation had been granted, counsel would have presented psychological reports and expert testimony demonstrating Wiggins' limited intellectual capacity, the absence of aggressive behavior, and his desire to function in the world. In post-conviction testimony, counsel claimed to have investigated "extensively," but counsel in making their proffer did not even mention sexual abuse. This failure is "explicable only if we assume that counsel had no knowledge of the abuse." Id. at 533. The Court found that this "may simply reflect a mistaken memory shaped by the passage of time. After all, the state post-conviction proceedings took place over four years after Wiggins' sentencing." Id. The Court described the issue in this case as "not whether counsel should have presented a mitigation case. Rather, we focus on whether the investigation supporting counsel's decision not to introduce mitigating evidence of Wiggins' background was itself reasonable." Id. at 523 (emphasis in original). In this case, the Court held that "[c]ounsel's decision not to expand their investigation beyond the PSI and the DSS records fell short of the professional standards that prevailed in Maryland in 1989," because no "social history report" was prepared even though counsel had funds available to retain a "forensic social worker." Id. at 524. "Counsel's conduct similarly fell short of the standards for capital defense work articulated by the American Bar Association (ABA)—standards to which we have referred as 'guides to determining what is reasonable.'" Id. (quoting Strickland, supra, at 688; Williams v. Taylor, supra, at 396). Applying these standards, the Court found that, "[d]espite these well-defined norms, . . . , counsel abandoned their investigation of petitioner's background after having acquired only rudimentary knowledge of his history from a narrow set of sources." Id. (citing the ABA standards again). The Court found that "[t]he scope of their investigation was also unreasonable in light of what counsel actually discovered" in the records available to them. Id. at 525.

In assessing the reasonableness of an attorney's investigation, . . . , a court must consider not only the quantum of evidence already known to counsel, but also whether the known evidence would lead a reasonable attorney to investigate further. Even assuming [counsel] limited the scope of their investigation for strategic reasons, Strickland does not establish that a cursory investigation automatically justifies a tactical decision with respect to sentencing strategy. Rather, a reviewing court must consider the reasonableness of the investigation said to support the strategy.

Id. at 527. In this case, "counsel were not in a position to make a reasonable strategic choice . . . because the investigation supporting their choice was unreasonable." Id. at 536. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the trial record revealed that the "failure to investigate thoroughly resulted from inattention, not reasoned strategic judgment." Id. at 526. The trial record reflected that "[f]ar from focusing exclusively on petitioner's direct responsibility, . . . , counsel put on a halfhearted mitigation case. . . ." Id. The "strategic decision" the courts had found to be reasonable was rejected because it "resembles more a post-hoc rationalization of counsel's conduct than an accurate description of their deliberations prior to sentencing." Id. at 527-28. Prejudice was found because counsel did not discover "powerful" evidence of severe abuse from "alcoholic, absentee" parents. He also suffered "physical torment, sexual molestation, and repeated rape" in foster homes. He also spent time homeless and had "diminished mental capacities." Id. at 534-35. The Court found:

Capital Case*

Wiggins' sentencing jury heard only one significant mitigating factor – that Wiggins had no prior convictions. Had the jury been able to place petitioner's excruciating life history on the mitigating side of the scale, there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have struck a difference balance.

Id. at 537. In the final analysis, the Court held:

Given both the nature and the extent of the abuse petitioner suffered, we find there to be a reasonable probability that a competent attorney, aware of this history, would have introduced it at sentencing in an admissible form. While it may well have been strategically defensible upon a reasonably thorough investigation to focus on Wiggins' direct responsibility for the murder, the two sentencing strategies are not necessarily mutually exclusive. Moreover, given the strength of the available evidence, a reasonable attorney may well have chosen to prioritize the mitigation case over the direct responsibility challenge, particularly given that Wiggins' history contained little of the double edge we have found to justify limited investigations in other cases.

2. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2022: Sanders v. Davis*, 23 F.4th 966 (9th Cir. 2022) (1982 capital trial and sentencing). In pre-AEDPA case, trial counsel in California death penalty case was found to have rendered ineffective assistance in his handling of the penalty phase of the trial where he deferred to his client and presented no mitigating evidence or argument for a life sentence. Petitioner and a co-defendant were charged with a murder and an attempted murder that occurred during a robbery. Early on, petitioner expressed a resistance to a sentence of life without parole (LWOP), the statutory alternative to a death sentence should petitioner be convicted of capital murder. The first jury could not reach a verdict, voting 11-1 in favor of guilt. Despite this close call, defense counsel again focused on the guilt phase for the retrial, believing the prosecution's case was weak. After petitioner and the co-defendant were convicted at the retrial, there was a four day break before the penalty phase was set to begin. It was at this time that petitioner's attorney asked his investigator to conduct a limited inquiry into potential mitigation. The focus was on petitioner's employment and education history. When discussing the upcoming penalty phase with defense counsel, petitioner continued his resistance to a penalty phase defense and suggested he would become disruptive if evidence was presented over his objection. After defense counsel alerted the trial court to his concern that petitioner was acting on advice from jailhouse lawyers, a short continuance was granted and petitioner was evaluated by a mental health expert who opined that petitioner was competent. The trial court also appointed an experienced defense attorney who met with petitioner and confirmed that petitioner was serious and not gaming the system. This attorney also noted, however, that petitioner had some "ambivalence" in his feelings. Defense counsel additionally arranged for petitioner to meet with his parents, although defense counsel did not explain to them the nature of a penalty phase or ask them to attempt to change

Capital Case*

petitioner's mind about presenting a case in mitigation. When petitioner maintained his anti-mitigation position, defense counsel moved unsuccessfully for a second continuance. Petitioner told the trial court that he did not want defense counsel to present any evidence, ask any questions of the witnesses called by the prosecution, nor make a statement to the jury. He further stated that he did not want the jury to come back with an LWOP sentence nor a death penalty sentence. Instead, he wanted to leave the courtroom and go home even though he knew that was not possible. At the penalty phase, no mitigation was presented. The aggravating evidence involved prior robberies. The jury was instructed to return a sentence of death if the aggravating circumstances outweighed the mitigating circumstances. After asking the trial court about the consequences of an inability to reach a unanimous verdict—to which the trial court responded that the jury should not consider this—and requesting a copy of the jury instructions, the jury returned a sentence of death. Because petitioner threatened disruption if defense counsel failed to adhere to his stated anti-mitigation wishes, the following post-Landrigan analysis is employed. Regarding deficient performance, petitioner must show: (1) counsel's performance in conducting the penalty phase investigation was deficient under Strickland; and (2) that counsel's deficient performance (here, "the failure to adequately inform and advise [petitioner] in preparation for the penalty phase") affected petitioner's decision not to present a penalty defense. And for prejudice, petitioner must show: (1) a reasonable probability that, if he had been more fully advised about the mitigating evidence and its significance, he would have permitted trial counsel to present the evidence at sentencing; and (2) this new mitigating evidence, if heard by the jury, would have with a reasonable probability led the jury to recommend life instead of death. Turning first to defense counsel's mitigation investigation, it is found to be deficient under then-prevailing norms as defense counsel "failed to perform even a rudimentary investigation into [petitioner's] social history and failed to obtain reasonably available records." Importantly, "[n]either [petitioner's] actions nor the Supreme Court's holding in Landrigan excused [defense counsel] from conducting a mitigation investigation. Although a client may direct his attorney not to conduct a mitigation investigation, that direction does not relieve counsel of the obligation to conduct an investigation." That petitioner had provided defense counsel with some false information about his criminal history and education also did not excuse defense counsel's failure to conduct a mitigation investigation. Notably, petitioner did not instruct defense counsel to limit his investigation or refuse to provide information. In fact, petitioner was aware that defense counsel was speaking to his wife and family members and did not object, and in the first couple of weeks of counsel's representation, petitioner directed him towards a suitcase of files that could be used as mitigation evidence. Thus, the "false leads at the beginning of their relationship do not excuse [defense counsel's] limited investigation or render it reasonable." Further, "Landrigan did not change an attorney's obligation to conduct a mitigation investigation when a client objects to presenting a mitigation defense. Landrigan only concerned Strickland's prejudice prong." In finding that counsel's investigation was deficient, defense counsel's lack of effort was contrasted with that of counsel for the co-defendant, who began his representation of his client by working with his investigator to locate and interview as many people as they could who knew their client. Petitioner's counsel "did not interview a single person about [petitioner's] background, even though many of [petitioner's] family members were present at his trial, and [defense counsel] spoke with those family members for other purposes." A reasonable investigation would have uncovered classic mitigation: an unstable childhood, beatings from petitioner's parents, a history of alcoholism and drug abuse in the family, petitioner's own alcohol and drug abuse beginning in childhood, physical injuries, and difficulties in school. Trial counsel's failure to secure prison and juvenile delinquency records ran contrary to professional standards at the time of trial, particularly since counsel was on notice that the prosecution intended to present evidence about petitioner's past robberies. See ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4-4.1 (2d ed. 1980). The juvenile and school records would have supported the social history detailing petitioner's chaotic and traumatic childhood. Petitioner's military records would have corroborated family members' testimony about petitioner's "ability to find some success in structured environments." Finally, contrary to the district court's conclusion, neither the joint defense strategy to proceed to trial quickly nor a lack of investigatory resources available to defense counsel excused the absence of investigation. Defense counsel had an obligation to prepare for the penalty phase even if he believed that petitioner had a chance of an acquittal. And any cooperation between defense counsel's investigation and the co-defendant's investigator "would have been irrelevant to the penalty phase, because each defendant needed to present their own penalty defense." Regarding investigatory resources, defense counsel had access to similar resources as the co-defendant's attorney, "who prepared a robust penalty investigation." Further, "minimal resources were required to conduct social history interviews with members of [petitioner's] family, some of whom [defense counsel] spoke with for other reasons." The next deficiency was in defense counsel's failure to adequately advise petitioner about the penalty phase over the course of the representation. "A capital defense attorney has a duty to ensure that his client's decision not to present a penalty phase defense is informed and knowing." The Ninth Circuit precedent recognizing such a duty was not impacted by Landrigan because that case was under AEDPA and applying CEFL. Here, defense counsel failed to ensure that his client's decision not to present a penalty phase defense was informed and knowing because counsel did not: (1) adequately inform petitioner about the structure of the penalty phase; (2) educate petitioner about the two possible sentences; (3) inform petitioner of a significant mitigation factor that he could have presented to the jury—lingering doubt; (4) explain the types of mitigation evidence available and how they could be used; and (5) advise petitioner about the penalty phase throughout the course of his representation. Turning to prejudice, the record established a reasonable likelihood petitioner would have changed his mind had counsel not performed deficiently. Although petitioner early on took the position that an LWOP sentence was an unacceptable option, this "is a common response from defendants facing a death sentence, and one that experienced attorneys can usually overcome." Petitioner presented experts who explained that addressing a client's concerns about an LWOP sentence requires conversations over the course of the representation. It was "unsurprisingly, following [defense counsel's] failure to inform and advise [petitioner] about the penalty phase," that his "last-minute efforts to address [petitioner's] concerns about the penalty phase had no effect." Notably, all three of petitioner's experts opined that had defense counsel performed reasonably, there was a strong likelihood that petitioner "would have acted like nearly every other capital defendant in his situation and changed his mind." The mitigating evidence that should have been developed could have reminded petitioner that his life had value and there was "nothing in [petitioner's] background that suggests he would have been the rare defendant who would not have changed his mind." Further, "[i]n addition to the testimony and declarations from legal experts, [petitioner] presented his own affidavit stating he would have changed his mind had he been competently informed about the penalty phase, as well as declarations from mental health experts who opined that he would have changed his mind." Notably, petitioner challenged his death sentence since the initiation of his appeals. Finally, there is a reasonable likelihood that the penalty phase verdict would have been different had defense counsel undertaken a reasonable mitigation investigation and presented a penalty defense. In addition to evidence about petitioner's unstable childhood, abuse from his parents, history of alcoholism and drug abuse, and difficulties in school, there was evidence about petitioner's positive character. Defense counsel could also have argued lingering doubt as a mitigation factor. "The prosecution's case at the guilt phase rested on the testimony of two unreliable witnesses, and there was no physical evidence connecting either defendant to the crime scene. [Footnote omitted]. The jury's inability to reach a verdict at the first trial supports the assertion that the case against [petitioner] was relatively weak." As to the case in aggravation, although the circumstances of the crime were "disturbing and serious, and the death of [the victim] was an immense tragedy," petitioner's crimes were not especially egregious when compared with the offenses of other death-eligible defendants. Nor was the evidence of petitioner's past armed robberies particularly aggravating. The crimes were over a decade old by the time of the trial and petitioner harmed no one during their commission. Further, petitioner's "prison records would have shown that he had adjusted well to prison life and had been commended for both his work at his job placements and his enthusiasm in the classroom setting." Also weighing in favor of a finding of prejudice was the jury's initial hesitance in reaching a verdict in the penalty phase.

2021: Stokes v. Stirling*, 10 F.4th 23 (4th Cir. 2021), judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Shinn v. Martinez, 142 S.Ct. 2751 (2022), judgment granting relief reinstated on remand, 64 F.4th 131 (4th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S.Ct. 377 (2023) (1999 trial and sentencing). In South Carolina death penalty case where petitioner confessed to the rape-murder of a woman he had been hired to kill, trial counsel's mitigation investigation and choice not to present any personal mitigation evidence was unreasonable and prejudicial. (Although the IAC claim was procedurally defaulted, the ineffective assistance by state post-conviction counsel in failing to develop and raise the claim provided cause to overcome the default.) Trial counsel's sentencing phase plan was to focus on prison adaptability, arguing that petitioner's health condition made him especially suitable for a life sentence. Petitioner was HIV-positive and his health had been declining significantly before trial. Trial counsel retained a neurologist who was prepared to testify to evidence of brain damage possibly caused by AIDS. A forensic psychiatrist had been prepared to testify that petitioner was likely to imminently die of AIDS in prison. Petitioner, however, had always harbored reservations about this defense and ultimately, on the eve of the sentencing hearing, forbid trial counsel from revealing his HIV-positive status to the jury. Counsel then presented a single witness at sentencing, a retired prison warden who had not met petitioner and who testified generally about prison conditions and opined that petitioner did not present an "unusual" risk of causing harm in prison. In contrast, the prosecution presented "robust aggravating evidence" from 12 witnesses who, inter alia, testified to an additional murder committed by petitioner, his prior convictions, a prison assault by petitioner on another inmate with a box cutter, his assaults on his ex-wife, and further details by the state pathologist about the brutality of the capital offense which included mutilation of the victim's body. In finding deficient performance, the appeals court noted:

Capital Case*

Trial counsel had little-to-no experience preparing a mitigation defense, yet they consulted with no experienced attorneys or mitigation experts. Their mitigation efforts, totaling around 45 hours, began six months into their nine-month representation, though the ABA Guidelines stated that sentencing investigation should “begin immediately upon counsel's entry into the case and should be pursued expeditiously.” ABA Guidelines § 11.4.1 (1989). They hired an inexperienced mitigation investigator who was still conducting interviews through the guilt phase of the trial. They did not personally conduct any follow-up interviews or otherwise develop the investigator’s findings. They retained experts to testify at sentencing, but those experts were apparently not consulted about the personal mitigation evidence. In a capital murder trial where mitigating the death penalty was the central issue in the defense, such an investigation is objectively unreasonable.

Also unreasonable was trial counsel’s ultimate decision to withhold the limited personal mitigation evidence they did have available to them.

At the outset of sentencing, members of [petitioner’s] family and a social worker were prepared to testify. A neurologist and psychiatrist were prepared to testify about [petitioner’s] HIV status, but presumably could have offered other personal testimony about [petitioner] instead. Yet counsel abandoned this evidence based on their impressions of the jury, deciding the jurors—the Black jurors in particular—would react negatively to evidence of [petitioner’s] life story after hearing the prosecution’s aggravating case.

This concern by trial counsel reflected “a misunderstanding of the duty to mitigate.” Trial counsel’s job was not to ask the jury to excuse petitioner’s actions but rather to mitigate his “moral culpability.” Trial counsel “did not have to ask the jury to ‘overlook’ the graphic details of the prosecution’s case. Instead, their personal evidence could have provided humanizing context, allowing the jury to reach a more sympathetic understanding of the individual behind the aggravating evidence.” Because of trial counsel’s lack of experience, their “shallow” investigation, and the failure to consult with appropriate experts, they “underestimated the value of their evidence.”

[Petitioner’s] life story contains far more than a merely “difficult upbringing” and “struggles coming up”; the evidence shows profound and chronic trauma that was about as extreme as any child can experience. Such evidence is prototypical for a personal mitigation narrative. . . . If trial counsel believed the jury would not have responded well to a presentation that minimized [petitioner’s] conduct, their duty was to find a way to convey this highly significant evidence without doing so.

(Internal citations omitted.) The basis for trial counsel’s decision to offer almost no mitigation evidence at all was the belief that “a South Carolina jury in the 1990s, and particularly Black people, would not be open to a personal mitigation narrative . . .” This “was objectively unreasonable.” In 1989, ten years before petitioner’s trial, the Supreme Court expressly recognized the long-established societal consensus “that defendants who commit criminal acts that are attributable to a disadvantaged background, or to emotional and mental problems, may be less culpable than defendants who have no such excuse.” (Citations omitted). Thus, there was “no reason to believe that South Carolinians in 1999—no matter their race—would have been indifferent to the ‘frailties of humankind’ and these bedrock principles of mercy and morality.” Trial counsel’s failure to investigate and present personal mitigation evidence was objectively unreasonable under professional standards at the time of the representation. Regarding prejudice, the appeals court disagreed with the assessment by the district court that the mitigating evidence failed to outweigh the substantial aggravating evidence, and so petitioner failed to establish a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have voted for life. “While there is no doubt that the State’s aggravation case was extensive, the analysis is not as simple as comparing two piles of evidence and asking which is greater. The addition of just some meaningful mitigating evidence could be enough to sway one juror against death, even in the face of plentiful aggravating evidence.” In concluding that petitioner made the requisite showing of prejudice, the appeals court noted that “unheard mitigation evidence would have shown [petitioner] experienced an ‘extraordinarily high’ degree of childhood adversity, likely surpassing 99.9% of the population.” In addition, “through expert evidence, the defense could have explained the likely consequences of such a childhood, connecting ‘chronic trauma’ to brain development and adult behavior.” On the record of this case, “the prejudice analysis turns on the likely influence of dramatic mitigation evidence on a jury that heard dramatically little about the defendant. In that context, the weight of the unrepresented mitigation evidence is significantly increased, enough to outweigh even the upsetting and extensive aggravating evidence.” NOTE: The Fourth Circuit’s original opinion includes an extremely detailed description of the extensive background mitigating developed in federal court that was relied on in finding ineffective assistance of trial and post-conviction counsel. On remand from the Supreme Court, the Fourth Circuit ruled that the State forfeited any objection to consideration of the evidence presented in the federal evidentiary hearing.

Noguera v. Davis, 5 F.4th 1020 (9th Cir. 2021), cert. denied [petitioner’s cert petition], 142 S.Ct. 1695 (2022) (1987 trial and penalty phase). In California case where petitioner was sentenced to death for killing his juvenile girlfriend’s mother for financial gain, the grant of habeas relief as to sentence was affirmed on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to investigate and present evidence concerning petitioner’s background. At trial, the penalty defense focused on “good guy” evidence. The prevailing standards at the time for conducting a mitigation investigation were the 1980 ABA Standards for Criminal Justice. The California Supreme Court’s conclusion that defense counsel met those standards was unreasonable. Rather than conducting a thorough background investigation, defense counsel relied on petitioner’s mother, whose testimony had been rejected by the jury during the guilt-innocence phase of the trial, to secure witnesses to say “good things” about petitioner. Under the circumstances, where petitioner had been convicted of a brutal murder and his testimony and that of his mother had been found untruthful by the jury, “counsel’s decision to investigate only the positive aspects of [petitioner’s] life fell well below the prevailing professional norms.” The limited investigation was also unreasonable in light of the knowledge one of the defense attorneys had about petitioner’s background. This attorney met petitioner when petitioner was around twelve or thirteen years old and represented his mother in her “acrimonious” divorce from petitioner’s father. The divorce was resolved only a few months before the capital crime. Petitioner's mother had revealed to defense counsel in the course of the divorce proceedings that petitioner's father was violent and that she feared her husband's "actions were having a very bad effect on her children." Defense counsel learned that petitioner's father possessed audiotapes "contain[ing] details [about] sexual acts involving animals" and knew about petitioner's "troubled family history," including his mother's "emotional problems, her failings as a wife and mother, and ... the bitterness and humiliation she suffered in her home life." Despite this knowledge, defense failed to investigate whether petitioner's background or mental state could have led to the crime or reduced his culpability for it. Trial counsel's reliance on a "good guy" defense could not be immunized from scrutiny as a strategic decision because the failure to investigate before arriving at a defense strategy was itself unreasonable. And, contrary to the argument by the State, "presenting evidence that [petitioner] was a 'good guy' in most situations is not inconsistent with presenting other evidence that due to drug use, abuse, and mental health issues, he would be compelled to act differently in other situations." To the extent that this additional evidence could have resulted in counsel losing credibility with the jury after running an innocence defense at the first phase of the trial, the innocence claim had already been rejected by the jurors. The State also speculated that trial counsel curtailed their investigation because they believed mental health evidence would suggest that petitioner was prone to violence. But trial counsel did not provide that explanation and such a post hoc rationalization was inconsistent with trial counsel's "admitted failure to investigate mental health evidence, including their failure to have [petitioner] evaluated by a mental health professional." Without have conducted such an investigation, "counsel could not reasonably have evaluated the benefit—or possible detriment—of mental health evidence to the sentencing defense." On this record, the California Supreme Court's finding that counsel performed effectively involved an unreasonable application of Strickland as did its conclusion that petitioner failed to establish prejudice. While numerous witnesses testified about positive aspects of petitioner and his upbringing, the witnesses did not tell the jury about the kind of troubled history the Supreme Court has declared relevant to assessing a defendant's moral culpability. If trial counsel had performed effectively, the jury would have learned about the brutal physical abuse [petitioner's] father inflicted on him as a child, the abuse by his mother, the violent acts [petitioner] saw his parents commit against each other, and the violence he saw his father commit against animals. The jury would have heard the views of mental health experts that growing up under these conditions left [petitioner] with "severe emotional problems" and bereft of coping skills. The jury would have also learned about [petitioner's] mental health conditions, including ADHD, possible organic brain damage that caused a disturbed thought process, a propensity to use poor judgment, a predisposition to paranoid beliefs, and a lack of control over his impulses.

Further, the jury would have learned about [petitioner's] drug use that began when his father urged him to use steroids at the age of fourteen to become "a man" and that progressed to the use of PCP, cocaine, and other substances. The jury would have also heard experts' opinions that steroids compound paranoia and impulsivity and that these adverse effects would have been more severe for [petitioner] because of his mental health issues.

Capital Case*

In sum, trial counsel's failure to investigate petitioner's background "led to the failure to uncover an abundance of relevant and compelling mitigating evidence" and "[t]his failure undermines confidence in the outcome of the penalty phase." Notably, even after hearing only the meager mitigating evidence that counsel presented, the jury asked questions that suggested the deliberations were close. NOTE: William Noguera was resentenced to life without possibility of parole after the Orange County District Attorney declined to retry the penalty phase.

United States v. Barrett, 985 F.3d 1203 (10th Cir. 2021). Petitioner, who was sentenced to death for intentionally killing a state trooper when drug task force officers attempted to execute a warrant at his home, was entitled to sentencing relief due to his trial attorney's failure to present evidence concerning abuse suffered by petitioner as a child, his brain-damage, bipolar disorder, and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and his struggles to exercise judgment in pressured situations. Deficient performance was not at issue in this appeal, only prejudice. The district court denied relief after finding that the jury would not have been impressed by the opinions of the post-trial experts. At the original sentencing hearing, the mitigating evidence presented focused on petitioner's good character and remorse. At the post-trial evidentiary hearing, both sides offered expert testimony. Although the Government contested the finding by a defense expert that petitioner suffered from brain damage, "[g]iven [defendant's] recollections of childhood and adult head injuries, his performance on [a neuropsychologist's] tests, and the records of at least some head injuries, the jury could reasonably have concluded [defendant] suffered from brain damage." The Government also challenged the diagnoses by a defense expert of PTSD and bi-polar disorder. The record showed, however, that these diagnoses were "plausible." Notably, the defense expert was the only one to perform a comprehensive psychiatric examination of petitioner, which offered an explanation for why petitioner had not earlier been diagnosed with bi-polar disorder. Other points addressed the objections of the Government to the diagnosis, "and likely would have convinced at least one juror to accept [the defense expert's] diagnosis." The record further showed that petitioner's history of drug abuse did not necessarily undermine the bi-polar disorder diagnoses. Petitioner, for example, had exhibited symptoms of the condition that are not associated with substance abuse such as mood lability and pressured speech. Regarding the PTSD diagnosis, a defense expert opined that petitioner displayed symptoms "consistent [with] [PTSD]," likely resulting from his father's violence and exacerbated by his mother's alcoholism and neglect. In contrast, the Government expert declined to diagnose petitioner with PTSD, explaining that there was no qualifying threshold event for the disorder and petitioner had no prior diagnosis for that condition. Even if some reasonable jurors could side with the Government expert, "there is a reasonable probability at least one would credit [the defense expert's] testimony." Regarding the defense expert testimony opining that there was a nexus between petitioner's mental impairments and the offense, the Government countered in part that statements by petitioner clearly supported a finding of premeditation. The statements did not necessarily undermine the mental health evidence.

[Petitioner's] mental health evidence may have convinced at least one juror that he carried out his threats at least in part due to the influence of brain damage, bipolar disorder, or PTSD. Talking about killing police officers is not the same as deciding and acting to do it. Faced with [petitioner's] mental health evidence, a reasonable juror could have attributed his statements to bravado and his actions to brain damage, and also could have concluded he reacted to multiple police cars approaching his property in the middle of the night at least in part due to his mental impairments.

* * * *

Although the prejudice issue is close, the jury heard none of [petitioner's] mental health explanation for his criminal behavior at sentencing. At the evidentiary hearing, he introduced the type of mental impairment evidence that, as this court has recognized, can carry substantial mitigating weight. [The defense expert] connected that evidence to his offense. The Government cast some doubt on that evidence at the hearing, but not enough to erase a reasonable probability that a single reasonable juror would find it sufficient to vote against death.

Turning to the evidence of petitioner's abusive upbringing, i.e., a childhood "characterized by early exposure to alcohol and alcohol abuse, as well as physical and emotional abuse and neglect," a jury could reasonably have credited this evidence as mitigating. Balancing the aggravating evidence against the mitigating evidence, there is a reasonable probability at least one juror would not have recommended a death sentence had defense counsel introduced evidence of petitioner's mental impairments and abusive upbringing at the sentencing hearing. Although the Government challenged the mitigation evidence at the evidentiary hearing, it introduced no additional aggravating evidence that it would have offered in response to petitioner's new mitigating evidence. "Nor did the Government at the evidentiary hearing attempt to show [petitioner's] mental health evidence would have had a 'double-edged' effect." Instead, the Government's lack of prejudice argument relied on the aggravating evidence that it already presented to the jury at sentencing. Petitioner's "evidence of mental impairments and childhood abuse not only would have offset the weight of that evidence, it also 'would have softened [the] edge' of the planning and premeditation factor." Certain evidence that the district court identified as aggravating was dismissed as of minimal import.

2019 Andrews v. Davis*, 944 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (1984 trial and sentencing). Trial counsel was ineffective at the penalty phase in this California death penalty case for failing to investigate and present evidence about petitioner's upbringing in a segregated and impoverished area of Mobile, Alabama, his confinement as a teenager to a state-run institution described as a "slave camp for children," his later experiences in Alabama's brutal adult prison system, and mental health evidence about the impact the severe abuse petitioner suffered had on his subsequent behavior. The California Supreme Court unreasonably applied clearly established federal law when it concluded that petitioner received constitutionally adequate representation at the penalty phase of his trial. Petitioner was convicted of a 1979 triple murder with accompanying convictions for rape, sodomy by a foreign object, and robbery. Among the four special circumstances found true by the jury was that petitioner had previously been convicted of murder in Alabama. (Special circumstances are like aggravating factors in other states in that they are what make a defendant eligible for the death penalty. They are then considered, along with additional aggravating factors, in determining sentence.) At the penalty phase, the prosecution presented evidence that petitioner had previously pleaded guilty in Alabama to the crimes of armed robbery, escape, and robbery. The defense case, admitted by stipulation, consisted of two sworn statements describing the circumstances surrounding the prior murder conviction. According to the statements, it was petitioner's accomplice who shot and killed a store clerk during a robbery. Defense counsel made a short, nine-page closing argument, focusing on petitioner's age (29), and also mentioning prison security, petitioner's secondary role in his prior murder conviction, and the fact that the co-defendant in the capital offense, as well as defendants in other high-profile murders, did not receive death sentences for their crimes. Petitioner was sentenced to death for each of the three murders. At the state court hearing on petitioner's claim that trial counsel was ineffective at the penalty phase, petitioner presented evidence about his upbringing in a segregated and poor part of Mobile, Alabama in the 1960s. His parents were alcoholics who separated soon after his birth, leaving petitioner and his siblings in the care of his grandparents. When petitioner was approximately ten years old his grandfather, who was described as a "pivotal figure" in his life, died. Petitioner then became more withdrawn, his truancy increased significantly, and he began to be involved in minor crimes, resulting in his incarceration at Mt. Meigs when he was age fourteen, as the result of a car theft. Extensive evidence was presented about the appalling conditions there by former inmates, a federal district court judge who had participated in litigation pertaining to the conditions at Mt. Meigs before joining the bench, and a former juvenile probation officer who testified before Congress and state legislatures about juvenile facilities around the country. There was also evidence about a 1971 federal district court ruling that conditions at Mt. Meigs provided a basis for liability for cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The referee conducting the state court hearing on the ineffective assistance of counsel claim concluded that petitioner's academic schooling was virtually nonexistent once incarcerated at Mt. Meigs, and that he was subjected to beatings, brutality, inadequate conditions and sexual predators. After petitioner left Mt. Meigs, he became withdrawn and uncommunicative and began associating with streetwise older boys. It was only a few months after his release that the robbery-murder occurred. Petitioner spent the next ten years in various jails and prisons throughout Alabama. Multiple witnesses described the abysmal conditions in the Alabama penal system where sexual assaults were prevalent and opportunities for rehabilitation were absent. While precise details were unclear, evidence was presented that petitioner was repeatedly raped in prison. During the time petitioner was incarcerated in Alabama, the prison conditions there, like the conditions in Mt. Meigs, were held to violate the Eighth Amendment. Despite his violent surroundings, the referee found that petitioner "avoided violence and appeared to adjust well when the structure permitted and that he would continue to do so." Finally, petitioner presented "[e]xtensive psychiatric testimony" from several experts who described petitioner as suffering from a range of mental disorders, including post-traumatic stress disorder and organic brain impairment. According to the expert witnesses, the impact of petitioner's experiences in Alabama's correctional institutions "made his behavior understandable and his reincarceration predictable." The referee concluded that information about petitioner's upbringing was readily available through interviews with petitioner's mother and other family members. Regarding petitioner's experiences in the Alabama correctional system, this could have been discovered by a review of court files of prior convictions, prison records, and juvenile records. Further, standard "[l]egal research would have produced information concerning lawsuits and prison conditions that were a matter of public record as to conditions in the penal system during that period of time." And the "[r]outine appointment of psychiatric experts" would have provided the necessary information as to whether additional steps were necessary for a mental health assessment. In regard to what trial counsel actually did to prepare for the penalty phase, the referee found that counsel made limited efforts to gather evidence. They did not use investigators at the penalty phase, nor did they have petitioner examined by any mental health expert. Trial counsel did make two trips to Mobile, Alabama, each lasting a single day. The first trip consisted of counsel searching for records relating to petitioner at the courthouse and driving around in taxis looking for evidence of petitioner's "good character and good deeds." Most of that trip, however, was actually spent in New Orleans where Mardi Gras was underway. On the second trip, counsel began with a stop in New Orleans. The next day counsel flew to Mobile to "check[] the court records," then traveled to Pensacola to interview petitioner's mother during a layover before flying to Tampa. After a day in Tampa, the lawyers then spent five days in Miami. Neither New Orleans, Tampa, nor Miami had any connection to petitioner's case. The referee did find that trial counsel's investigation was limited in part by petitioner's opposition to his family's participation in the penalty phase. As to potential rebuttal, the referee concluded that introduction of mitigation by defense counsel could have resulted in the prosecution presenting additional facts about petitioner's prior convictions: (1) evidence that following the murder, petitioner and the co-defendant escaped from the scene and robbed a taxi driver at gunpoint with petitioner firing at least two shots at the driver from thirty feet away; and (2) evidence that in committing the robbery petitioner held a young woman hostage at the scene, threatening to shoot her and police officers. The referee also determined that the prosecution was likely to call its own mental health experts to rebut any presented by petitioner. The California Supreme Court, while acknowledging that counsel could well have conducted a more thorough mitigation investigation, nevertheless held that trial counsel did not perform deficiently in their investigation. This was because petitioner had requested that his family not be involved and he had failed to volunteer information about the abuse he had endured. As for the case trial counsel presented, portraying petitioner as a follower and comparing his sentence to sentences imposed in other recent murder cases, this was deemed reasonable by the California Supreme Court. The California Supreme Court further observed that presenting evidence about the horrific conditions petitioner endured in Alabama could have backfired because it would have required calling inmates with serious criminal records. Finally, for the same reasons that the state supreme court found that trial counsel were not deficient in their representation of petitioner, it held that petitioner did not establish prejudice from counsel's performance. Sitting en banc, the court of appeals found that the California Supreme Court unreasonably applied Supreme Court precedent in concluding that trial counsel's performance at the penalty phase was reasonable. Citing to the ABA standards in effect at the time of petitioner's trial, Standards for Criminal Justice § 4-4.1 (Am. Bar Ass'n 1980), as well as Wiggins and Williams, the appeals court explained, "[n]o fair-minded jurist would conclude that [trial counsel] conducted the requisite 'thorough investigation' of [petitioner's] background at the penalty phase." Indeed, "even the most basic of investigations would have uncovered evidence of the abuse [petitioner] suffered." The California Supreme Court's justifications for trial counsel's curtailed investigation each turned on an unreasonable determination of the record in front of that court. Regarding petitioner's alleged refusal to involve his family, "[a]s the referee concluded, counsel did not need [petitioner's] family to uncover evidence of the abuse he suffered in Alabama." (Emphasis in original.) Notably, petitioner placed no limitation on counsel's investigation unrelated to his family. Moreover, trial counsel did speak with petitioner's mother and she had been available to provide insight about the effect Mt. Meigs had on petitioner had she only been asked questions to elicit this information. As for petitioner's failure to disclose his past, "nothing suggest[ed] that counsel ever asked [petitioner] basic questions designed to elicit their client's life history." In any event, as found by the referee and not disputed by the California Supreme Court, all of the information about petitioner's history in Alabama could have been developed through outside sources irrespective of any lack of cooperation from petitioner. The California Supreme Court's reliance on Strickland to absolve counsel of their duty to investigate was objectively unreasonable. While counsel can reasonably make judgments based on what a defendant actually says, "neither Strickland nor its progeny suggest that a client's failure to affirmatively volunteer information about his past relieves counsel of the independent duty to investigate it—especially when the record suggests counsel never bothered to ask." Indeed, "later Supreme Court decisions have explained the opposite is true. A client may be 'fatalistic or uncooperative, but that does not obviate the need for defense counsel to conduct some sort of mitigation investigation.' Porter [v. McCollum], 558 U.S. [30,] at 40." Turning to the California Supreme Court's finding that counsel were justified in curtailing their investigation into petitioner's background because evidence of petitioner's treatment in the Alabama correctional system would have required the use of testimony from inmates, "this conclusion was directly contradicted by the record." At the state court reference hearing, testimony was presented from a federal district judge, a priest, a college dean, a clinical psychologist, a longtime prison doctor, and the regional director for the Florida Bureau of Detention about the conditions petitioner endured at Mt. Meigs and other Alabama institutions. "The California Supreme Court's decision to ignore the compelling testimony these witnesses could have provided was objectively unreasonable. See 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2)." Also unreasonable was the California Supreme Court's conclusion that the penalty phase strategy actually employed by trial counsel was not deficient given that trial counsel's portrayal of petitioner as a "follower" was contradicted by the record. The appeals court then engaged in a discussion of why the California Supreme Court's analysis of and reliance on the Supreme Court's decisions in Burger v. Kemp and Cone v. Bell was flawed. That the California Supreme Court had relied heavily on the Fourth Circuit's decision in Wiggins v. Corcoran, which was subsequently reversed by the Supreme Court, "as providing substantial support for its analysis should settle any doubt about the reasonableness of the California Supreme Court's own application of the Strickland standard."

Here, the only reasonable interpretation of Supreme Court precedent and the facts of this case lead to the following conclusions: (1) that [trial counsel] failed in their duty to undertake a reasonable investigation at the penalty phase of [petitioner's] trial; (2) that [trial counsel's] choices cannot be rationalized as "strategic" or "tactical;" and (3) that any reasonably competent attorney would have discovered and introduced the substantial and compelling mitigating evidence that existed. No fair-minded jurist would conclude otherwise.

The appeals court next found that no fair-minded jurist could conclude that petitioner did not establish prejudice. It noted, inter alia, that "[e]vidence of abuse inflicted as a child is especially mitigating, and its omission is thus particularly prejudicial." The appeals court again took issue with the manner in which the California Supreme Court analyzed Supreme Court precedent. It found, for example, that the state supreme court was objectively unreasonable to compare the aggravating facts in petitioner's case with the mitigating facts in Williams v. Taylor. The court of appeals also rejected concerns about the possible double-edged nature of some of the mitigating evidence or about possible rebuttal evidence, noting both that substantial mitigation evidence could have been presented without going into details of petitioner's incarceration history and that the jury also was already aware of substantial aggravating facts. The appeals court concluded:

[T]he California Supreme Court was objectively unreasonable in concluding there was no reasonable probability that at least one juror in [petitioner's] trial—in Los Angeles, in 1984—would have been persuaded that the violent and degrading abuse [petitioner] suffered as a child at the hands of his state custodians—in segregated institutions in Alabama, in the mid-1960s—compelled some measure of mercy and a sentence of life without the possibility of parole, rather than death.

Jefferson v. GDCP Warden, 941 F.3d 452 (11th Cir. 2019) (1986 trial and sentencing). On remand from the Supreme Court in pre-AEDPA death penalty case from Georgia, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence concerning petitioner's childhood head injury and the resulting brain damage. The case involved the robbery-murder of a co-worker. The victim died from multiple injuries to the head, probably inflicted by a piece of timber found at the scene. At the sentencing phase, the prosecution presented evidence of petitioner's past crimes including multiple armed robberies. The case in mitigation consisted of testimony from: (1) two police officers about the absence of problems created by petitioner while he was incarcerated; (2) petitioner's mother about his hard upbringing because he grew up without a father and had to assist in taking care of his siblings, how he was responsible, generous, gentle, kind, and playful as a child, and that his head had been run over by a car when he was two years old; (3) petitioner's sister corroborating that petitioner was generous and responsible, and had helped care for his siblings when he was young; (4) the mother of petitioner's children who described petitioner as a good father who was responsible and helped care for their children; and (5) petitioner himself who discussed his difficult upbringing without a father, how he helped his mother raise his siblings, how he left high school to make money for his family, and also generally denied having been involved in any prior wrongdoing. Defense counsel argued to the jury that petitioner, while a deeply flawed individual, also had some good in him and was capable of self-improvement. In addition, because of his difficult upbringing in a poor black family, petitioner was not as responsible for his actions as most individuals and therefore deserved mercy. Defense counsel also suggested, albeit only briefly, that petitioner had not actually killed the victim and that lingering doubt about his guilt should sway the jury's imposition of punishment. The argument was unsuccessful and petitioner was sentenced to death. In state habeas proceedings, petitioner raised his claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to follow-up on a defense expert's recommendation for neuropsychological testing. In a pre-trial report, the clinical psychologist opined that petitioner was in the midrange level of intelligence and that any mental deficiencies were "quite mild and in no way impair[ed] his judgment or his decision-making capacity." The report also mentioned petitioner's refusal to cooperate and berating of the psychologist one day but then apologizing several days later, explaining, "I get that way sometimes, man." The report further noted that the expert was unable to explore head injury during childhood and suggested a neuropsychological evaluation to rule out an organic etiology. At the state court habeas proceeding, trial counsel asserted that the psychologist had told him he had nothing helpful to say on petitioner's behalf, that further testing would probably be a waste of time, and that petitioner basically was just a criminal. The trial psychologist denied having said those things to trial counsel. Trial counsel also claimed that petitioner had been adamant about his innocence. In further support of the ineffectiveness claim, petitioner presented a neurologist's expert opinion that it was substantially likely "that any violent behavior [petitioner] may have engaged in was a result of the ... brain damage" he had suffered as a child. A clinical psychologist performed neuropsychological testing on petitioner and opined that "[petitioner] has brain damage, his brain cannot operate in the way a non-damaged brain operates, and this brain damage in and of itself causes abnormal behavior in [] [petitioner] over which he has no or substantially limited control." Petitioner's mother and brother described the severity of the car accident that had been briefly mentioned at trial, as well as the changes in petitioner afterwards, e.g., "he was slower than the others to pick up on things," and "around [the age of nine or ten], [petitioner] started getting the headaches he's been having ever since"; "[petitioner] wasn't a normal type kid[,] [h]e was a nervous type person[,] [h]e got emotional real quick, and he cried real easy." Following the evidentiary hearing, the state habeas court issued an opinion that was a verbatim adoption of an order proposed by the State of Georgia and denied relief. It made factual findings accepting trial counsel's version of the interaction with the defense expert and concluded that "counsel made a strategic decision, based upon their investigation, not to present any type of mental defense or pursue additional neuropsychological testing as counsel had investigated this line of inquiry but found nothing helpful to the defense." The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the ruling. In its initial decision, the appeals court had reversed a grant of relief by the district court by relying on the factual findings by the state habeas court. The United States Supreme Court vacated that decision and remanded for reconsideration of whether the state court findings were subject to a presumption of correctness. In this decision, the court of appeals affirms the ruling of the district court that the state habeas court's factual findings were not entitled to deference because petitioner had been denied a full and fair hearing in state court. This ruling was based on evidence developed at an evidentiary hearing in the district court following the remand from the Supreme Court. The appeals court went on to consider additional evidence that was developed in the district court regarding the merits of the claim. The trial defense expert discussed the reasons he suspected possible brain impairment from his evaluation of petitioner and flatly denied having ever backed off his written recommendation that neuropsychological testing be pursued. Other witnesses elaborated on the impact of brain damage and petitioner's possible behavior at time of crime. A neurologist testified: if "[petitioner] hit someone over the head with a log, it might have been a momentary fit of rage, which was not as controllable by someone who is impaired as it would be in a normal person, who would have simply spoken to that man and had worked it out in other ways." The absence of psychopathic or sociopathic tendencies in petitioner made it all the more likely that any occasional, violent behavior was the result of a closed head injury and brain damage. A clinical psychologist opined that an organic brain injury like the one suffered by petitioner could cause someone to have problems with self-control inhibition, irritability, judgment, planning and understanding consequences. The expert believed that petitioner suffered from a substantial loss of self-control, which typically results in agitated behavior. It was further noted that a brain injury suffered by a two-year-old is demonstrably more significant than one in an adult because a two-year-old's brain is continuing to develop. A two-year-old's brain injury has substantially more potential to alter cognitive development and cause impairment in neurometabolic function, communication, and development of the frontal lobes. In rebuttal, the state presented a clinical psychologist who performed a neuropsychological evaluation of petitioner. He found that petitioner did not exhibit any behavior to support a diagnosis of frontal lobe disorder. And although petitioner likely had a learning disability, that did not mean he consequently suffers from brain damage. He further opined that petitioner's injury at age two did not lead to the kind of symptoms associated with moderate-to-severe brain injuries that result in lifelong behavioral issues. Although the expert could not rule out the possibility of brain injury, he opined that it was unlikely that petitioner suffered this kind of injury. The defense experts heavily critiqued the state's expert, pointing out: the prosecution expert was not qualified to conduct neurological testing because he was neither a neurologist nor a medical doctor; the fact that petitioner was able to conform his conduct to the requirements of structured environments was not inconsistent with a finding of brain damage; the prosecution's "normal" interactions with petitioner was largely irrelevant because people with brain injuries may be perfectly capable of controlling their behavior under most circumstances; the absence of a skull fracture from the car accident did not mean petitioner suffered no brain injuries; the five days petitioner spent in the hospital following the car accident was not a relatively short stay indicating that the injury was not severe, but rather was a long hospital stay for a child and indicated that serious complications were involved; and the prosecution expert's use of demographically corrected norms on petitioner, norms that did not even exist at the time of trial, reflected an improper method of assessing whether petitioner suffers from organic brain dysfunction. The district court had expressed considerable skepticism about the state expert's testimony because, among other things, he had no medical expertise in neurology and because he used improper norms in scoring petitioner's test results. Turning to the question of deficient performance, the appeals court was unpersuaded by the state's argument that defense counsel's actions should be regarded as strategic because they pursued a residual doubt defense at the penalty phase, and thus had no need for neuropsychological evidence to mount their case. The appeals court pointed out that the penalty phase transcript revealed that defense counsel did not emphasize residual doubt at sentencing, indeed they only barely mentioned it in passing. Instead, they focused on petitioner's hard upbringing, the need to show petitioner mercy, and the idea that petitioner was not fully responsible for his actions. In fact, "the very evidence [defense counsel] failed to pursue would have powerfully bolstered the limited mitigation case they did present, to explain the contradiction between [petitioner's] background and the murder, and the compassion they sought from the jury." The particular circumstances of this case would have "impelled any reasonable lawyer toward further, more robust investigation." Trial counsel knew petitioner had suffered a serious head injury as a child. He had a visible, prominent scar across his skull and his head was asymmetrical. In addition, trial counsel knew that petitioner had an unusual interaction with the trial expert, when he first refused to cooperate with him and later explained, "I get that way sometimes, man." Defense counsel also knew that when petitioner was arrested, petitioner acted strangely, telling police that he didn't need to be around other people, that he wanted to be executed, and that he wanted to be put to sleep. And, most importantly, trial counsel had received the trial expert's written report, which made a crystal clear, uncontroverted recommendation that further neuropsychological testing would be worthwhile. To all these red flags, defense counsel turned a blind eye, without citing anything remotely suggesting that further testing would have impaired their case. Trial counsel was deficient. Regarding prejudice, the appeals court observed:

The evidence of brain damage that would have been introduced had petitioner's counsel performed in a constitutionally effective manner would have profoundly changed the character of the penalty phase of the proceedings by fundamentally transforming petitioner's sentencing profile. This sort of mitigation evidence is precisely the kind that may establish prejudice at the penalty phase.

There is a powerful difference between someone who grew up poor and without a father and a person who grew up suffering from organic brain damage yielding debilitating mental impairments that worsened into adulthood. There is an even bigger difference between someone who has an "attitude problem" and someone whose frontal lobe was permanently damaged at a young age and who is therefore not capable of controlling his impulses or reactions to external stimuli at critical moments.

Importantly, evidence of organic brain damage would have provided for the first time a plausible explanation for an otherwise inexplicable and senseless crime. The evidence also would have undermined the aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed in an "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible, or inhuman" manner. Petitioner's claim of innocence did not preclude habeas relief. The appeals court explained:

It is of course true, as this Court recognized in [petitioner's] previous appeal, that presenting extensive evidence regarding [petitioner's] brain damage would have been in some tension with [petitioner's] claims to innocence both at trial and during sentencing than his more generalized pleas for mercy were. . . . However, the dangers posed by any potential inconsistency of presenting this evidence at the sentencing phase after trial counsel had argued innocence at the guilt phase seem to be relatively insignificant in this case. . . . [T]he benefit of presenting the new and powerful forensic evidence would have been anything but small — [], evidence of [petitioner's] brain damage would have dramatically altered [petitioner's] sentencing profile and given the jury a compelling reason not to impose the death penalty.

And as for the impact of the state's rebuttal expert at the federal evidentiary hearing, the appeals court could not say that the testimony from that expert would have measurably damaged petitioner's case. The expert had no medical expertise in neurology, was not a licensed physician, and, as petitioner's experts pointed out, he used improper norms in scoring petitioner's test results. Moreover, some of what he relied on would not even have been available at the time of petitioner's sentencing. And, according to the defense experts, the state expert's report did not in any way cause them to doubt their conclusions. On this record, prejudice was established.

*Avena v. Chappell, 932 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2019) (1981 trial). In case involving, inter alia, a double-murder committed in Los Angeles during a carjacking, habeas relief granted as to petitioner's death sentence based on trial counsel's failure to adequately investigate petitioner's good character and social history, as well as counsel's failure to investigate petitioner's claim of self-defense in a jail homicide to counter the prosecution's use of that crime as aggravation evidence. Trial counsel presented no defense at the guilt-innocence phase of the trial and conceded petitioner's guilt in closing argument. At the penalty phase, the prosecution presented evidence of other violent crimes in which petitioner was implicated: (1) a shooting by petitioner at a former member of a rival gang; (2) the killing of another inmate while petitioner was in jail awaiting trial for the carjacking homicides; and (3) an assault by petitioner on a deputy in the jail. (During the guilt phase, evidence had been presented about petitioner shooting at two different cars before and after the homicides and then at police officers.) The prosecutor argued to the jury that petitioner was a “killing machine” with a “malignant heart, if he has a heart at all,” a wild animal that could not be caged, and a “cancer” that must be “remove[d] [] before it kills you.” Defense counsel presented two witnesses who testified about the jail killing but had not been present when it occurred. The defense argument was essentially that although petitioner was a violent and bad man, the death penalty should be reserved for serial killers. Because the state court did not reach the deficiency prong of the Strickland test when denying petitioner relief on his ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, that issue was reviewed de novo. The appeals court found the fact that trial counsel had billed only 53 hours in preparation time up through jury selection, and from jury selection through the end of the sentencing phase only another 41 hours was “a striking initial indication of his deficient investigation for the penalty phase.” The lack of background investigation was attested to by petitioner’s mother, sister and girlfriend. The deficiency in the investigation was confirmed by three experienced capital defense attorneys who discussed the prevailing professional norms. The appeals court rejected an argument that trial counsel’s decision not to call relatives was justified by counsel’s fear that doing so would open the door to further aggravating evidence, i.e., evidence that petitioner had thrown a chair at his father on one occasion. This excuse was not reasonable in light of trial counsel’s failure to investigate the circumstances surrounding the incident, which would have shown that petitioner had acted to protect his mother from his father’s abuse. Also rejected was the argument that trial counsel could not be faulted entirely for his failure to present character witnesses because petitioner’s mother “admitted that she had not been forthcoming with trial counsel at the time of trial.” This assertion was not supported by any of the cited testimony. Instead, petitioner’s mother testified only that trial counsel never contacted her and that she never told anyone about her son’s PCP use. “Competent representation requires counsel proactively to reach out to a defendant’s family members and friends to develop an understanding of the defendant’s background.” As to the jail killing, trial counsel’s assertion that his investigator had been charged with looking into this incident was refuted by his investigator and the records. The State’s alternative argument that a “reasonable trial counsel could have decided to forgo an unbelievable self-defense argument to avoid alienating the jury” could not excuse trial counsel’s failure to investigate without a reasonable or tactical excuse for the inaction. As to what a reasonable background investigation could have uncovered, the appeals court noted testimony from petitioner’s family members and friends that petitioner was loving and sweet, which “would have countered the prosecution’s characterization of [petitioner] as nothing more than a ‘killing machine’ with a ‘malignant heart.’” And “[a]long with social history experts, [petitioner’s] family members and friends also would have testified that [petitioner] suffered substantial and continual abuse as a child at the hands of his father.” Notably, petitioner was protective of his mother and sister and received the brunt of the abuse from his father. In state habeas proceedings, evidence was also presented about petitioner’s habitual PCP use, “as well as the effects the drug had on his demeanor,” and indications that petitioner was under the influence of PCP at the time of the homicides. As to the jail killing, evidence was available from eyewitnesses to corroborate petitioner’s claim that he acted in self-defense, which would have supplemented the trial testimony from a deputy that a few days before the incident petitioner had wounds on various parts of his body and claimed that someone was out to get him. Turning to prejudice, because the California Supreme

Capital Case*

Court rejected the claim on that prong of Strickland, deference to that decision was required. In assessing prejudice at the penalty phase, the state court primarily emphasized the aggravating circumstances. Regarding the mitigation that could have been presented, it found: (1) the character evidence was "no[t] very persuasive" because it lacked some detail and because the number of character witnesses—three—was "small" compared to other cases; and (2) the self-defense theory pertaining to the jail homicide was "dubious" because of the evidence implicating petitioner. The state court made no mention of the evidence of petitioner's PCP use in its analysis. The appeals court responded:

The number and detail of the character witnesses may not have been expansive, but it was qualitatively distinct from what the jury heard on the subject: nothing. . . . [T]he PCP evidence potentially humanized [petitioner] and his horrible crimes, yet the state court did not mention this evidence in assessing prejudice. Finally, despite the evidence implicating [petitioner] in the jail homicide, the jury may have found [petitioner's] alleged involvement in the incident less damning, had the jury heard from witnesses that [petitioner] acted in self-defense in jail.

The state supreme court decision finding insufficient prejudice from counsel's deficient performance was objectively unreasonable and petitioner was entitled to relief from his death sentence.

Williams v. Stirling, 914 F.3d 302 (4th Cir.), cert denied, 140 S.Ct. 105 (2019) (2005 sentencing).

Affirming grant of habeas relief in South Carolina death penalty case on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing for failing to develop and present evidence concerning Fetal Alcohol Syndrome ("FAS"). In 2003, petitioner gunned down his ex-girlfriend in the deli of a grocery store when she tried to escape after having been taken hostage for approximately 90 minutes. At trial, petitioner was represented by experienced capital lawyers and the defense team included: (1) a social worker; (2) a neuropsychologist; (3) a clinical psychiatrist; (4) a forensic psychiatrist; and (5) a neurologist. In preparing for trial, the team found evidence of a troubled childhood, including that petitioner's mother was an alcoholic who drank during her pregnancy with petitioner, the neuropsychologist determined petitioner suffered neurological impairments as a result of frontal lobe damage and, consequently, had learning difficulties, the psychiatrist diagnosed petitioner with bipolar and obsessive compulsive disorder, and the neurologist found some cognitive issues but an MRI revealed a normal brain. At the sentencing phase, there was a focus on petitioner's troubled childhood, including his mother's alcoholism. Defense experts opined that petitioner suffers from: (1) bipolar and obsessive-compulsive disorder; and (2) major depressive disorder and obsessive-compulsive disorder. Through cross-examination of the prosecution expert, additional mitigation was elicited, including that petitioner had untreated ADHD. The jury found a single aggravator: murder in the commission of kidnapping. During the second day of sentencing deliberations, the jury sent a note to the trial court stating that it was deadlocked 9-3 for death. The jury was sent back to deliberate and 3 hours 45 minutes later a death verdict was returned. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner alleged that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate signs that petitioner suffered from FAS – namely evidence about his mother's drinking during pregnancy and petitioner's corresponding brain damage. In support of the claim, petitioner presented several new experts: (1) a forensic psychiatrist who diagnosed petitioner with Partial Fetal Alcohol Syndrome ("PFAS"), a form of FAS; (2) a neuropsychologist who found indications of severe functional impairments and damage to the corpus callosum, all consistent with or symptomatic of FAS; and (3) a forensic psychologist who concluded that petitioner's executive functions – including self-regulation and behavior control – were impaired due to FAS, leading to behavioral difficulties, including impulse control problems and coping skills equivalent to a nine year old. The experts explained that although a widely recognized protocol to forensically assess FAS in the criminal justice context had not been fully developed at the time of petitioner's 2005 trial, individual practitioners had been addressing FAS for many years and had developed a framework for diagnosing and treating the condition. Although relief was denied in state post-conviction, the federal district court granted relief and the Fourth Circuit affirms. Regarding deficient performance, the appeals court finds that trial counsel performed deficiently in not following up on red flags for FAS – petitioner's mother's drinking and the expert conclusion that petitioner suffered from frontal lobe damage. In concluding that prejudice was established, it is noted that there was only one aggravating circumstance and the jury was initially deadlocked over sentence. In addition, FAS was seen as particularly powerful mitigation because "a FAS diagnosis could have provided to the jury evidence of a neurological defect that caused [petitioner's] criminal behavior."

2018: *White v. Ryan, 895 F.3d 641 (9th Cir. 2018) (resentencing hearing in 1996). At resentencing in Arizona capital case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to contest the pecuniary gain aggravating factor and failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence concerning petitioner's background and mental health issues. Petitioner was convicted of conspiracy to commit murder and the first-degree murder of the husband of a woman with whom he had been having an affair. There was also a finding of a pecuniary gain aggravating factor based on the state's theory that the victim's wife would share money from the life insurance policy with petitioner. Trial counsel unsuccessfully moved for a competency examination, believing that petitioner suffered from mental dysfunction, based on his strange behavior and the fact that petitioner repeatedly spoke about the case with inmates, prosecution witnesses, the prosecutor, and the victim's wife's lawyer, despite his counsel's advice not to. At the penalty phase, petitioner's counsel did not present mitigation evidence other than that petitioner had no prior felony record. Counsel also argued that the pecuniary gain aggravating factor did not apply because it was the victim's wife who wanted the insurance money, and petitioner only participated in the murder because of his love for or infatuation with her. Some additional mitigating evidence apparently was presented to the court (possibly through the probation report. Petitioner's conviction and sentence were affirmed on appeal, after appellate counsel moved to remand for appointment of mental health experts to determine whether petitioner was competent. The motion noted, inter alia, that petitioner said that the Arizona DOC was monitoring his thoughts through an electrical device attached to an electro-shock therapy machine and that the victim's wife visited him outside his cell to taunt him. Petitioner also moved the court pro se for a medical evaluation related to his claim that the DOC had implanted a listening device in him. The Arizona Supreme Court denied both motions. The state court granted petitioner penalty phase relief in post-conviction proceedings, during which post-conviction counsel also noted that petitioner exhibited "troubling signs of mental health issues," including letters sent to counsel in which "he did not appear to be close to being lucid." 895 F.3d at 649. The prosecutor testified at the PCR hearing that he did not believe petitioner deserved the death penalty because it was the victim's wife who had done all of the planning, and petitioner would have gone his whole life without committing such an offense but for his relationship with her. The prosecutor also testified it was his office's policy to ask for the death penalty in every first-degree murder case with aggravating circumstances. Petitioner's trial counsel testified he didn't adequately investigate because the prosecutor told him he did not think this was a death penalty case and he didn't either. He recognized that petitioner had "some type of either emotional problem or health-related problem." 895 F.3d at 650. Post-conviction counsel then represented petitioner during the resentencing proceedings. Counsel presented testimony only of the prosecutor who did not believe the death penalty was appropriate, and petitioner who testified about being a model inmate and serving an important role in the lives of his children, even from prison. Counsel argued that the death sentence was grossly disparate from the sentence of the victim's wife for the same crimes – life sentences. Counsel failed to challenge the pecuniary gain aggravating factor, mistakenly believing it had been conclusively decided on appeal. Petitioner filed his own resentencing memoranda pro se, claiming that the DOC had placed implants in his brain to monitor his thoughts and cause him to hear voices, and were torturing him by causing his bones to age faster than that of a pregnant woman. Counsel did not investigate petitioner's background or petitioner's mental health. Counsel instead presented petitioner's statement to the probation officer that "he had a normal childhood. The state court resentenced petitioner to death, finding that petitioner had stated that the victim's wife had asked him to kill the victim, that petitioner had attempted to collect insurance proceeds immediately after the murder, and that no statutory mitigation factors were present. The court rejected the prosecutor's opinions as irrelevant and found the sentences between petitioner and the victim's wife were not disparate because petitioner was the triggerman and planned the killing. It considered, but appeared to reject, the non-statutory mitigating factors presented. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed. New counsel was appointed to represent petitioner in a second round of state post-conviction proceedings. Multiple requests for funding for a neuropsychologist were denied. Counsel obtained medical and psychological records from the prison, and childhood school records, one of which showed an IQ of 74. An expert was appointed to conduct IQ testing to comply with Atkins. The expert reported verbal IQ of 95 and full scale IQ of 91. The post-conviction court approved funding for a mitigation specialist. The post-conviction petition included 13 areas that the mitigation specialist thought should have been presented at trial, including (1) petitioner's hyperthyroidism and Graves' disease, leading to many symptoms including anxiety, hyperactivity and excess energy; (2) psychological impairments, including a diagnosis of schizophrenia from the DOC, irrational thoughts and behaviors, grandiosity, auditory and visual hallucinations, paranoia; (3) borderline intellectual functioning; (4) the culpability of and duress imposed by the victim's wife; (5) family history of violence and criminality; (6) family history of alcoholism and substance abuse; (7) family instability; (8) neglectful parenting, resulting in multiple head injuries, lax supervision and discipline, and failure to send him to school; (9) transience; (10) head injuries likely resulting in brain damage; (11) hyperactivity; (12) inability to support himself and family and poverty; and (13) inability to maintain relationships over time, including lack of friendships, and multiple short marriages. The state court held an evidentiary hearing, at which counsel who represented petitioner during the penalty retrial and the mitigation specialist testified. The court summarily denied relief, adopting the state's proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and determining that resentencing counsel was not ineffective because there was no reasonable probability the court would have found that the pecuniary gain factor was not proven and because counsel either had no reason to investigate the mitigating evidence or made a strategic decision not to do so. Petitioner then filed a federal habeas petition which was denied. The Ninth Circuit reversed the denial, finding that the state court's conclusions that resentencing counsel was not ineffective was an unreasonable application of Strickland, Coleman v. Calderon, 150 F.3d 1105 (9th Cir.), rev'd on other grounds, 525 U.S. 414 (1998), and Wiggins. Counsel's failure to challenge the pecuniary gain aggravator was not based on a strategic decision but instead on a misunderstanding of the law. Counsel's failure to investigate and present mitigating evidence included failure to order readily obtainable records. In addition, "[g]iven the substantial evidence from multiple sources that [petitioner] may have mental health issues and the possibility that such issues would have a mitigating effect on his sentence, it was unreasonable of [counsel] not to investigate further or request funding for an expert investigation." 895 F.3d at 668. The state court's conclusion that counsel was not required to request mental health records absent a suggestion that they would contain mitigating value is both wrong on its face and also an unreasonable factual premise, since there was plenty of evidence of petitioner's mental illness. With regard to prejudice, the state court's finding of no prejudice was contrary to Strickland because (1) the court determined that it would have imposed the death sentence even with the mitigation evidence brought out in the second post-conviction proceeding, but the determination is an objective one – what would an appellate court independently reweighing the evidence do – not a subjective one; and (2) because the court reviewed prejudice for each of the different types of mitigating evidence separately rather than considering the prejudice cumulatively. As a result, the Ninth Circuit assessed prejudice without AEDPA deference. The Ninth Circuit listed as mitigating evidence petitioner's four father figures; physical and emotional abuse he suffered as a child; poverty, transience, and difficulties forming relationships; his borderline intellectual functioning score; his schizophrenia, Graves' disease, and possible ADHD. It listed as aggravation only the one factor – that petitioner committed the murder for pecuniary gain. It then noted that evidence from multiple sources showed that petitioner was pressured by the victim's wife into perpetrating the crime on her behalf – he "struggled with the decision but eventually agreed because he was infatuated or in love with her. [She] was described as manipulative and a liar; [petitioner] as psychologically vulnerable and emotionally impaired. [She] was the one who, days before marrying a man while seeing [petitioner] on the side, contacted insurers to arrange a payoff from the murder of her soon-to-be husband." 895 F.3d at 672.

*Abdul-Salaam v. Sec'y Pennsylvania Dep't. of Corrections, 895 F.3d 254 (3d Cir. 2018) (1995 trial). Trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase of a capital trial involving convictions by a jury of first-degree murder, robbery, and conspiracy based on the attempted robbery of a store and the shooting and killing of a police officer who responded to the scene. The penalty phase lasted one day and the defense presented the testimony of three witnesses, petitioner's mother and two of his sisters. They described some abusive behavior by petitioner's father and one sister indicated food was sometimes lacking in the household. Petitioner's mother also mentioned petitioner's placement in a special school because of his "deficit disorder" and his being sent to a rehabilitation program as a teenager following a juvenile adjudication. During state post-conviction proceedings, the state court held six days of hearings on petitioner's IAC claim. During the hearings, petitioner called 10 witnesses, 8 of whom had not been contacted by trial counsel. They testified that petitioner's father was physically abusive to petitioner's mother, petitioner, and his siblings, including beating them with aluminum bats, leather straps, sticks, and pipes. Petitioner's father hit him on the head, causing him to develop lumps. The witnesses also testified that frequently there was no food in the house and that petitioner was always very hungry. Petitioner's father used cocaine and marijuana, and gave the family's money to the Nation of Islam rather than using it for food, rent, or utilities, which were often turned off for failure to pay. Petitioner's father beat petitioner when he made mistakes reciting the rules of the Nation of Islam. Petitioner's mother took petitioner and his siblings to battered women's shelters several times. Petitioner's father testified and admitted to some, but not all, of these abuses. Lead trial counsel testified that his mitigation strategy had been to present evidence of petitioner's difficult upbringing. Although he had arranged for the appointment of a psychiatrist to evaluate petitioner, he did not follow through because he did not want her to explore events relating to the crime and was concerned about the dangerous side to presenting mental health evidence. He made no further investigation into petitioner's mental health, and did not try to obtain petitioner's school or juvenile records, but could not identify a strategic reason for failing to do so. Second trial counsel also testified that she had interviewed petitioner's mother, one of his sisters and one of his brothers shortly before trial. Petitioner also presented testimony from mental health professionals who, post-conviction, had reviewed and relied upon petitioner's school and juvenile records, which themselves contained records of mental health and educational assessments from the time petitioner was a young child. He attended schools for children with special needs from age 6 through 12, after being evaluated and given a diagnosis of "Unsocialized Aggressive Reaction of Childhood Secondary to Phobic Reactions" and being deemed to have problems so severe they could only be treated in a residential psychotherapeutic facility. His juvenile records indicated difficulty socializing, delinquency, and brief improvements and relapses. Both school and juvenile records indicated that he experienced physical abuse at home and that his home was unstable. The mental health professionals reviewing these records (including the psychiatrist trial counsel chose not to utilize) and evaluating petitioner opined that he had an impaired ability to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of law, that he had organic brain damage and schizotypal features, that he had severe impairments in logical reasoning and cognitive flexibility, and disparity between verbal and performance IQ. The state post-conviction court denied relief, concluding that trial counsel failed to investigate and present the mitigating evidence on the basis of a reasonable strategy, and did not present evidence of mental health because he reasonably believed that it would do more harm than good. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed. Both state courts reached only the deficient performance prong of Strickland, and finding no deficient performance, did not assess for prejudice. Petitioner then filed a habeas petition in federal court. The district court denied relief, finding that although the state court's determination that trial counsel's failure to present mitigation evidence and obtain the institutional records from petitioner's childhood was not deficient was unreasonable, petitioner had not demonstrated that he was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance. The Third Circuit agreed with the district court that trial counsel's performance was deficient and that the state court's conclusion otherwise was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. Trial counsel's failure to pursue expert opinion about petitioner's mental health, and instead to conclude prematurely that any testimony of an expert might result in warring experts or relitigation of guilt phase issues, was deficient because it was based upon an unreasonably limited investigation that cannot give rise to reasonable strategic choices. Trial counsel's failure to obtain background records had no strategic basis, as counsel admitted, and collection of these records was required under prevailing professional norms at the time. Trial counsel's limited investigation into petitioner's background through interviewing only a few family members rather than interviewing more and then deciding which would present the strongest mitigation case at trial was due to a lack of preparation and not to strategy, and it, too, was deficient. The Third Circuit disagreed with the district court's conclusion that this deficient performance was not prejudicial, an issue addressed de novo because it was not reached by the state courts. The Third

Circuit did, however, defer to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's fact-finding to the extent it found that fact-finding reasonable in light of the record. The Third Circuit thus deferred to the state court's factual finding that petitioner did not suffer from organic brain damage or other mental illness at the time of the crime that established the two statutory mental health mitigating factors petitioner pursued. It did consider the testimony by the mental health experts explaining petitioner's school records in the context of a child raised in an abusive home and how that context could explain the development of his issues with impulsive decision making, anxiety, aggression, and anti-social behaviors. The Court concluded that the unrepresented family testimony was of a totally different quality than that presented at trial, was not cumulative of that evidence, and that it could have been buttressed by the school and juvenile records that also were not collected or presented at trial. "The evidence presented at the [state] hearings – consisting of extensive and detailed testimony about the poverty and abuse that dominated [petitioner's] upbringing, buttressed by the school records and mental health experts contextualizing those records – presented a far stronger mitigation case than the minimal mitigation testimony presented at trial, which presented the severe physical abuse as an uncommon, instead of dominant, feature of [petitioner's] childhood. If this additional evidence had been presented to the jury, it could have changed the picture of [petitioner's] childhood from one that was abusive and poor in a general sense, with one or two more severe instances occurring over his entire lifetime, to one that appears to have been dominated by severe and pervasive violence at the hands of his father and poverty that often rose to the level of serious deprivation." 895 F.3d at 272.

2017: Phillips v. White, 851 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 2017) (sentenced in 2001). The Sixth Circuit granted sentencing relief in this Kentucky double murder case that was tried capitally but ended in consecutive sentences of life with parole eligibility after twenty-five years, concluding that defense counsel deficiently failed to prepare or present a defense at sentencing, and that prejudice could be both presumed under United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984), and found under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). The case arose when petitioner, who was intoxicated, shot and killed his two neighbors over a small cash debt which had led to a simmering dispute that included acts of aggression by one of the decedents. While defense counsel made an effort at the guilt or innocence phase, he made clear to the trial judge that he knew nothing about death penalty litigation and was completely unprepared to proceed with a capital sentencing. When the trial proceeded to the penalty phase, counsel declined to propose jury instructions or to object to the prosecution's, declined to give an opening statement, presented no evidence, and gave a brief closing in which he complained about his failure at the first phase and announced he did not "intend to take anymore of [the jury's] time in this part." Counsel also failed to object to or clarify the prosecutor's statements to the jury implying that the three most severe of the five sentencing options could be considered, while the other two – life with parole eligibility before twenty-five years, and twenty to fifty years – could not. After the judgment was affirmed on direct appeal, petitioner sought state post-conviction relief pro se but after six years without a state court disposition, petitioner – again pro se – proceeded to federal district court, where relief was denied. With exhaustion being excused, and no state court adjudication to review under § 2254(d), the Sixth Circuit had no difficulty finding counsel's performance deficient because he failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence and failed to clarify that the jury could sentence him to life imprisonment (with the possibility of parole before twenty-five years) or twenty-to-fifty years. With regard to prejudice, the court first determined that counsel's "performance amounted to nonperformance," thereby implicating Cronic. The Sixth Circuit added that counsel's failure to ensure the jury understood its lesser sentencing options or to present mitigating evidence also resulted in prejudice under Strickland. As for available mitigating evidence, petitioner had offered, inter alia: (1) positive character evidence from family and friends; (2) evidence that petitioner believed that the decedents posed a grave and imminent threat to his wife and stepdaughter; and (3) evidence that petitioner was intoxicated on the night of the shooting. Looking to this evidence, the court concluded that there is more than a reasonable probability that the available mitigation could have influenced the jury's assessment of petitioner's moral culpability and resulted in a different sentence.

2015: Saranchak v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Dept. of Corrections*, 802 F.3d 579 (3rd Cir. 2015) (sentenced in September 1994). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence in sentencing. The defendant entered an open plea of guilty to murdering his grandmother and uncle, which was followed by a nonjury degree-of-guilt hearing and then jury sentencing. The defendant challenged counsel's effectiveness in the degree-of-guilt hearing, inter alia, for (1) failing to move to suppress the defendant's confession to police following his arrest in which the defendant "acted as if the officers questioning him were drill sergeants," and (2) failing to investigate and introduce evidence of the defendant's mental health and family history to rebut a finding of intent. No expert testimony was presented during the degree-of-guilt hearing, but counsel presented lay witnesses, including the defendant's girlfriend, to establish that the defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crimes. The girlfriend also testified concerning the defendants' strange militaristic behavior when he was intoxicated. In sentencing, the mitigation testimony, including the state's cross of the girlfriend, consisted of only 40 pages. Her testimony was similar to that during the degree-of-guilt hearing and repeated that the defendant "thinks he's a sergeant" and gives orders when intoxicated. Trial counsel also presented the testimony of Dr. Kruszewski, a court-appointed psychiatrist, who examined the defendant only for purposes of competency and capacity at the time of the offenses and the statements to the police. The psychiatrist met the defendant only once and was not provided with any background information or records other than police records and the defendant's confession, but he was aware and testified that the defendant had a prior psychiatric hospitalization following a suicide attempt. On cross, Dr. Kruszewski conceded that the defendant had no major psychiatric diagnosis or any mental disability. The jury found no mitigating circumstances, which in light of the jury's finding of two statutory aggravating circumstances, made the death penalty a mandatory sentence. In post-conviction, after having reviewed the background records denied him prior to sentencing, Dr. Kruszewski's findings "changed drastically." He testified to a "Jekyll and Hyde type syndrome" under the influence of alcohol, in which the defendant experienced delusions. He also found a history of depression with two prior suicide attempts and hospitalizations. He concluded that the defendant suffered from "a psychoactive . . . alcohol induced delusional disorder and alcohol induced depressive disorder when drinking" at the time of the crimes. The defendant also presented a psychologist in post-conviction, who testified concerning the defendant's "'highly dysfunctional' family history," including an alcoholic, abusive father and depressed mother, a developmental disorder and special education classes, self-medicating with drugs and alcohol at an early age, and a failed attempt to join the military followed by a "pronounced downward spiral" into a "fantasy world about being in the military." The psychologist found a history of "atypical pervasive developmental disorder" as a child, adult attention deficit disorder, depressive disorder, and a “personality disorder . . . with paranoid and anti-social features.” The psychologist agreed with the “Jekyll and Hyde” type psychological problems under the influence of alcohol, which manifested as a “full blown paranoid disorder” or ‘a delusional disorder.’” He concluded that the defendant was experiencing an extreme mental or emotional disturbance at the time of the crimes. The state post-conviction court held that counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present the mitigation evidence. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed finding that counsel ended his investigation at a reasonable point because the defendant, his mother, and his girlfriend failed to provide counsel with information concerning the defendant’s background. This finding was rejected under AEDPA review because “the evidence before the Pennsylvania Supreme Court clearly and convincingly demonstrates that this premise was false.” Trial counsel was aware of the defendant’s odd militaristic behavior at times, which was reflected in the police reports, the defendant’s confession, and the girlfriend’s testimony. With this knowledge, trial counsel sought a court-appointed competence evaluation and focused his theory of defense on “the mental health issue.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to obtain a mental health evaluation despite his belief that this was the primary issue and despite the red flags in Dr. Kruszewski’s report. The state court’s finding to the contrary was an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceeding. The state court’s analysis was also an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland. Under Strickland, especially in light of Wiggins and Rompilla and a consideration of the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases, “a defendant’s failure personally to inform his counsel of possible avenues of investigation does not absolve his attorney from pursuing those avenues, particularly where counsel is aware of facts demonstrating that such an investigation may be fruitful.” With respect to prejudice, the state post-conviction court found no prejudice. While the Pennsylvania Supreme Court did not reach this issue, the habeas court reviewed “through AEDPA’s lens” due to the post-conviction court’s adjudication. While the post-conviction court, at times, described the Strickland prejudice test correctly, it also, at times incorrectly described the prejudice test as outcome-determinative or a sufficiency-of-the-evidence test. “Thus, at the very least, the PCRA court’s analysis constituted an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.” The state court’s analysis was also unreasonable because of “[t]he PCRA court’s failure to discuss the vast majority of the relevant evidence presented at the PCRA hearing.” In short, “the PCRA court brushed aside Saranchak’s childhood and mental health problems without analysis,” even though “the portrait of Saranchak’s troubled life that could have been presented to the jury and the one actually presented were stark.” Prejudice was established. The state court’s finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court case law.

Hardwick v. Secretary, Fla. Dept. of Corrections, 803 F.3d 541 (11th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 580 U.S. 908 (2016) (sentenced in March 1986). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Rather than present any evidence in mitigation, counsel simply relied on his closing argument: (1) attempting to undermine the statutory aggravating circumstances; and (2) appealing for mercy based on the defendant’s age (25 at the time of the crime) and the sanctity of human life. Trial counsel concluded his sentencing argument with an assertion that the defendant was innocent of murder. The jury recommended death by a seven-to-five vote and the trial court imposed a death sentence. On initial review, the Eleventh Circuit rejected the state court's findings of fact and conclusions of law and remanded to the District Court for an evidentiary hearing. During the hearing "three experienced capital defense attorneys testified as to the standard among defense attorneys in the mid-1980's for investigating and presenting mitigation evidence." Counsel's conduct was deficient. Counsel believed the defendant would be convicted and that the state would seek the death penalty. Counsel was aware of "a number of red flags," that "should have highlighted the need to conduct at least some life-history investigation and at least some mitigation investigation," such as information that the defendant had been physically and sexually abused, and had lived in foster homes and been in the care of social services for a great deal of his youth. Counsel also was aware of "potential sources of mitigating evidence" from notes a public defender had taken during a preliminary interview, which listed the names of family members, schools, and contact information for a prior mental health evaluation center where the defendant had been diagnosed with schizophrenia. Counsel even had the benefit of an evaluation by a court-appointed psychiatrist. Although this evaluation was focused solely on competence and sanity and counsel failed to provide the expert with any background information or records, the report still contained "many red flags" for potential mitigation. Prejudice also established. If counsel had adequately investigated and presented the mitigation, the evidence would have supported a statutory mitigating circumstance of impaired capacity at the time of the murder. Likewise, there was "ample evidence of 'the kind of troubled history [the Supreme Court] ha[s] declared relevant to assessing a defendant's moral culpability.'" Id. at ____ (quoting Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 535). The jury and the trial judge heard none of this evidence. All they had was a brief snapshot of the instant Hardwick's life hit rock bottom; absent was the decades-long slide of childhood neglect, abandonment, abuse, instability, mental and emotional problems, intoxication, and addiction that led to that moment. Without this evidence, the prosecutor was free to emphasize repeatedly in closing arguments that there was no mitigation. Even without this evidence, the jury came within a single vote of recommending life. Under these circumstances, there is at least a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have received a death sentence if counsel had performed adequately.

Pruitt v. Neal, 788 F.3d 248 (7th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 577 U.S. 1181 (2016) (2003 trial and sentencing). Sentencing relief was granted on two issues: (1) the defendant proved intellectual disability; and (2) counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence that the defendant also suffered from schizophrenia. While trial counsel asserted that counsel was intellectually disabled, the trial court rejected this claim finding no significantly subaverage intellectual functioning and finding no significant deficits in adaptive behavior. With respect to the ineffective assistance issue, trial counsel's theory was to: (1) establish intellectual disability; (2) establish that the defendant "was suffering mental illness at or around the time of the crime"; and (3) establish that the defendant "had serious brain damage, brain injury, [or] brain dysfunction." Counsel presented one expert witness in sentencing, who testified about the defendant's intellectual disability and neuropsychological problems on the basis of one interview and his testing. This expert "had no experience in the assessment or treatment of individuals with psychotic disorders." Nonetheless, counsel also asked this expert to review the defendant's prison records and discuss his diagnoses. He testified that in 1996, while incarcerated for a different crime, doctors at the federal Bureau of Prisons had diagnosed "schizotypal personality disorder . . . an Axis II mental illness." With schizotypal, according to this expert, “psychotic episodes should be the exception rather than the rule.” He further testified that two months after the defendant’s arrest in this case, doctors at the Indiana Department of Corrections diagnosed “schizophrenia, chronic undifferentiated type compensated residual.” According to the expert, this was similar to the schizotypal personality disorder diagnosis and antipsychotic medication was prescribed due to concern that the defendant “is capable of easily becoming schizophrenic at some time in the future.” Based on his review, the expert concluded that the defendant’s illness was “not severe enough to be called schizophrenic” so he agreed with the schizotypal personality disorder diagnosis. He then testified about the symptoms of this disorder. He opined that the defendant had been decompensating for six months prior to the crime, if not longer, but he conceded, in response to a juror’s question about his firsthand knowledge of the defendant’s thought processes, that they had only “talked a little bit about that” and the defendant “said to me basically what’s already in the record.” Counsel did not ask whether the defendant met the criteria for any statutory mitigating circumstances. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate the evidence of mental illness and present accurate evidence on this in mitigation. Dr. Olvera, who had conducted intelligence testing prior to trial, observed possible signs of psychosis and learned that the defendant was taking antipsychotic medications. He recommended that counsel obtain an expert “in dealing with psychosis, such as schizophrenia” but counsel did not do so, despite his awareness that the defendant had been diagnosed in pretrial confinement with schizophrenia and that other examiners examining the defendant for intellectual disability had observed symptoms consistent with schizophrenia. In short, counsel acted unreasonably in ignoring these “red flags” and failing to investigate further. If counsel had done so, evidence such as that presented in post-conviction from two forensic psychiatrists and a clinical psychologist and neuropsychologist would have been available. These experts testified that the defendant suffers from paranoid schizophrenia, an Axis I mental illness, “which is characterized by delusions, hallucinations, and thought disorder.” This evidence, in conjunction with the intellectual disability, supported two statutory mitigating circumstances at the time of the crime: (1) extreme mental or emotional distress; and (2) substantially impaired capacity to conform his conduct to the law. The state court denied relief on this claim finding that counsel made “a deliberate, strategic decision to concentrate on Pruitt’s intellectual disability rather than his mental illness.” This was an unreasonable application of Strickland in light of counsel’s testimony that he sought to prove both intellectual disability and schizophrenia. Even assuming counsel did choose intellectual disability over schizophrenia, “that choice was made after less than thorough investigation, and as a result, the decision was not fully informed and was unreasonable.” “[T]he evidence of mental illness was much weaker than the intellectual disability evidence only because counsel failed to investigate more fully Pruitt’s mental health.” Because the state court did not assess the prejudice prong, the Seventh Circuit’s review was conducted “de novo.” Prejudice was established. This was not simply “a ‘battle of the experts’ over the severity of Pruitt’s mental illness” or the correct “psychiatric terms and labels.” The sentencing judge found no statutory mitigating circumstances, when at least two were established by the evidence of mental illness. Thus, there is a reasonable probability that this evidence might have affected the assessment of the defendant’s “moral culpability” and the jury and the judge might have concluded that death was not warranted. It is clear from the jury’s question to the defense expert that the jury wanted to know the defendant’s “thought processes” at the time of the crime.

Bemore v. Chappell, 788 F.3d 1151 (9th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 577 U.S. 1182 (2016) (tried and sentenced in 1989). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel's conduct was also deficient during the trial phase, but no prejudice found during trial. The trial deficiencies were considered, however, in a cumulative prejudice analysis for sentencing. In denying relief, the state court addressed the "good inmate" issue in depth, but summarily denied the other claims "without analysis or citation to authority." The federal court, therefore, applied "AEDPA deference" to the "good inmate" claim, but otherwise reviewed the issues de novo. The defendant was convicted of robbing and killing a clerk at a liquor store. During trial, the defendant testified asserting an alibi that he was committing a different robbery at the time of this offense. Counsel's investigation of this defense was limited to reviewing police reports of this separate robbery and the preliminary hearing testimony of eyewitnesses to that crime, who had identified the defendant as the perpetrator. Counsel's investigation and preparation of the defendant's testimony was deficient in: (1) failing to adequately prepare the defendant as a witness resulting in his inability to supply basic facts about the crime, forgetting his own direct testimony on cross, and providing details that were easily disproved, such as relying on landmarks that did not exist at the time of the crime; (2) failing to investigate the geographical layout, which would have revealed the problems with the landmark testimony and revealed that it was possible for the same perpetrator to have committed the separate robbery and the liquor store robbery based on the timing of the offenses and the distance between them; and (3) failing to interview the eyewitnesses to the separate offense, which would have revealed that one would completely recant and that the others were not certain in their identification of the defendant. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to investigate a potentially viable alternative mental health defense, based on "[m]edical expert reports and statements by Bemore's family and friends, all known or readily available to" counsel at the time. If counsel had adequately investigated the mental health defense, counsel may well have "determined that a mental health defense, even if a longshot at the guilt phase, was the superior choice in view of the impending penalty phase," so as not to risk losing credibility in the sentencing phase from presentation of a weak denial defense during the trial. Id. at ____ (citing Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 191-92 (2004)). With respect to sentencing, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present the mitigating evidence. Counsel had read an article from Dr. Kenneth Fineman about his "sun children" theory – "minority children from poor homes who, because of their talents become immersed in affluent white society, but then subsequently act out and, due to the psychological stress of having to live in two different worlds, begin using drugs." Counsel hoped to use this theory for the defendant, "an African-American and former star basketball player recruited to play at several colleges." In essence, counsel's mitigation strategy was to show the defendant "as a good guy with a drug problem." She retained Dr. Fineman to conduct psychological testing and was "surprised" and "angry" when his 18 page report made no mention of "sun children." Thus, counsel did not use Dr. Fineman and instead proceeded anyway with her "good guy with a drug problem" theory. Counsel's conduct was deficient because Dr. Fineman had reported a number of psychological problems, including "'mild, diffuse organic brain impairment,' attention-deficit disorder; and poor impulse control." Based on his findings, he listed several "'diagnostic considerations,' including 'bi-polar affective disorder,' 'intermittent explosive disorder,' and 'anti-social personality disorder.'" He recommended further testing to reach a mental health diagnosis, which was not pursued. Instead, counsel called over 40 witnesses to testify about the defendant's good character. Prejudice was established, nonetheless, as "[m]any of these witnesses knew Bemore only slightly." Moreover, "a good character defense was unlikely to be persuasive to a jury that had just decided that Bemore had carried out a grizzly murder, including torturing the victim, and had lied on the stand to boot." Additionally, while some of these witnesses did mention the defendant's drug problems and tumultuous upbringing, this was "not enough" because "particularly persuasive evidence—especially evidence in the form of expert testimony—was omitted." Counsel's "good guy," including "good inmate" strategy, also opened the door to damaging rebuttal testimony about the defendant's "bad behavior in jail," including assaults and escape planning, which counsel had unreasonably failed to investigate and anticipate. Even if it were reasonable to present the "good guy" theory, this could have been presented in addition to mental health evidence. "A defense that Bemore was 'a good guy with a drug problem,' was fully consistent with a defense that he was a good guy who was plagued by a drug problem and mental illness." The court also considered the 25 year to life sentence imposed on the co-defendant in a separate trial by the same trial judge in the prejudice analysis. The co-defendant received this lesser sentence despite being convicted of a second robbery and murder in the same trial because his attorneys "presented evidence of impaired judgment due to drug use and organic brain damage." Finally, the findings of deficient conduct during the trial "support" the conclusion of prejudice in sentencing because "putting on a guilt phase defense both unlikely to succeed and likely adversely to affect the jury's view of Bemore for the penalty phase—must be viewed cumulatively in determining whether the Strickland prejudice standard was met with regard to the jury's decision to sentence Bemore to death."

Doe v. Ayers, 782 F.3d 425 (9th Cir. 2015) (tried and sentenced in 1984). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence in sentencing. Because the court "discuss[ed] disturbing evidence of sexual abuse suffered by the Petitioner" and was concerned about "the possibility that publication of this information might place him at risk in a prison environment" of further details, actual names and some details were omitted from the opinion. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence that "relates to sexual abuse he suffered while previously incarcerated in a notorious prison in the South, as well as to mental illness, neglect and abuse he suffered during his childhood, and substance abuse."

"[D]eath is different[.]" Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584, 587, 122 S. Ct. 2428, 153 L.E.2d 556 (2002). So too are the lengths to which defense counsel must go in investigating a capital case.

Id. at 435. Counsel had only one "perfunctory" interview with his client and did not follow-up on the information learned from the "limited investigation" that was discovered and "missed clear indications . . . that his client was repeatedly raped in prison." Counsel's failures "were not excused by the alleged failure of Doe (and his family) to be completely forthcoming." Counsel spoke at length only with the defendant's mother and aunt, but when he went to the defendant's home state, he did not get out of the car. He spoke to the mother by phone, "but did not conduct any in-person interviews." He spoke to no one other than those called to testify. When the investigator "went to Doe's home state, he, at least, got out of his car," but failed to "ask obvious questions . . . about [the defendant's] upbringing or behavioral signs of mental illness." He also met "only once with each interviewee" and then only in the mother's home. "Obviously, interviewees are less likely to be forthcoming about sensitive topics in the presence of family members and friends." While counsel did retain a psychologist with "the professional expertise necessary to discover and present the compelling mitigating testimony regarding Doe's mental health that went unheard at trial, . . . she was limited by the terms of her engagement," which asked her to consider only "mental state defenses" for the trial. "In addition to having a limited scope, the investigation that Dr. M.R. conducted was abbreviated." She was paid for less than 13 hours of time and provided only with police reports as background information. "This left [counsel] effectively without the assistance of any expert at all at the penalty phase," because "[h]iring an expert to evaluate possible guilt-phase mental-state defenses does not discharge defense counsel's duty to prepare for the penalty phase." The only witnesses called in sentencing "were family and friends attending the trial. Some of them were not told that they would be testifying until they arrived." The state argued that counsel's conduct was "an acceptable trial strategy," which was "both doubtful and disturbing" because "spur-of-the-moment mitigation presentations form no part of constitutionally adequate representation."

Capital Case*

Witness preparation is a critical function of counsel. . . . A lawyer needs to know the nature of the testimony he will elicit, and a witness needs to understand the proceeding in which he is participating. Our case law, and an elementary understanding of the function of a trial lawyer in our adversary system, make plain that although there is no requirement of rehearsal, not preparing penalty-phase witnesses at all is not a legitimate defense method in a capital trial.

Id. at 443. Despite the state argument, counsel conceded deficient conduct "because of a combination of inexperience and overconfidence" and "never attempted to justify his actions as based in strategy." Under these circumstances, which the court found to be "to his credit," the "presumption" of reasonable conduct fell. Counsel's conduct was also prejudicial in light of the "fairly minimal" aggravation evidence presented and the "brief . . . , haphazard, and thoroughly underwhelming" mitigation evidence presented. The most compelling mitigating evidence not presented was supported by multiple prison guards and inmates and consisted of the brutal and repeated rape of the defendant in prison when he was just 17-years-old and incarcerated for stealing two purses. "[T]his evidence alone would have stirred sufficient compassion or understanding in the jury to result in a life sentence." There was also "mental illness" as a result which was "obvious to those who knew him." He had symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder, major depression, and self-medication, resulting in poly-substance dependence. This also was sufficient to establish prejudice on its own. There was also evidence of childhood abuse and neglect that "would have been powerful" and substance abuse that, while not alone prejudicial, would "have helped to sway the jury when considered cumulatively, alongside the other mitigating evidence."

2014: DeBruce v. Commissioner, Alabama Dept. Of Corrections*, 758 F.3d 1263 (11th Cir. 2014), cert. denied, 576 U.S. 1021 (2015) (tried in February 1992). Under AEDPA, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence in mitigation. Counsel's conduct was deficient and “was the result of inattention, not reasonable professional judgment.” Counsel was retained only three to four weeks prior to trial and did not hire an investigator because he did not have the funds to pay for one and did not have time. Counsel interviewed only the defendant and his mother in preparation for sentencing and presented testimony only from the mother. She testified that DeBruce graduated from high school and attended college, “and that although he had an impoverished childhood, it was otherwise unremarkable.” She made “passing mention to DeBruce’s treatment for a mental disorder, although this statement was not accompanied by any explanation of the disorder or its effects.” The state court held that counsel’s conduct was not deficient in failing to investigate after a pre-trial report found the defendant competent.

[T]he Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals concluded that [counsel] did not fail to conduct a reasonable investigation because [counsel] testified during the state collateral hearing that the information he received did not lead him to question DeBruce’s competence to stand trial or to consider defending DeBruce based on a lack of mental capacity. However, DeBruce’s fitness to be tried and decisions about whether to present a mental health defense during the guilt phase are separate issues from the decision whether to investigate and present mitigating evidence during sentencing. . . . [E]ven if we accept the state court’s factual determination that [counsel] made a strategic decision not to investigate mitigation evidence based on the results of the pre-trial report governing DeBruce’s competency to stand trial, that decision could not have been reasonable as it would have been based on a failure to understand the law. Because no lawyer could reasonably have made a strategic decision to forego the pursuit of mitigation evidence based on the results of the pre-trial report governing competency to stand trial, the Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals’ conclusion to the contrary constitutes an unreasonable application of Strickland’s performance prong.

Id. at 1273-74 (citations and footnotes omitted). Counsel’s conduct “was all the more unreasonable” because the competence report, school records, and the “youthful offender investigation report” filed by a probation officer with the court contradicted the information supplied by the defendant’s mother and counsel still did not investigate. “As a result, [counsel] permitted DeBruce’s mother to present grossly inaccurate testimony during her son’s sentencing hearing” that he had been “a successful student who had attended college.” Prejudice established because the evidence through experts and the testimony of two of the defendant’s sisters would have revealed that DeBruce was raised in an impoverished family of eleven child with an alcoholic father who was verbally abusive, experienced violence in his neighborhood, including being frequently attacked by gangs and witnessing stabbings and shootings, daily severe abuse at the hands of his older sister who would beat him and threaten him with a knife, as well as lock him in a closet and withhold meals, dropped out of school in the seventh grade at age 16, developed substance abuse problems during his teenage years, suffers from mental impairments, including brain damage and blackout episodes consistent with seizures), and low intellectual functional (IQ scores between 76 and 79), and has a painful intestinal disorder. The state court found no prejudice, in part, “because of its view of the mental health evidence as ‘conflicting,’” but this finding “lacks support from the record.” The defense experts did not present “conflicting” testimony and the state's expert, while disputing serious mental illness or defect, conceded that the defendant had low intellectual functioning.

Moreover, in applying Strickland in cases where counsel has failed to introduce any of the available mitigating evidence of the defendant's mental impairment and history of abuse that should have been discovered by adequate investigation, the Supreme Court has repeatedly rejected arguments that the defendant is not prejudiced by the complete omission of this type of evidence.

Id. at 1277. Thus, the state court "unreasonably applied Strickland" in finding no prejudice.

2013: *James v. Ryan, 679 F.3d 780 (9th Cir. 2012) (reaffirmed 733 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 2013) following Supreme Court's GVR for consideration under Johnson v. Williams, 133 S.Ct. 1088 (2013), cert. denied, 572 U.S. 1150 (2014)) (sentenced in 1982). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. In a third state habeas petition, the state court held that the claim was procedurally barred. At the conclusion of the lengthy state court opinion rejecting 38 claims, the court included a paragraph holding that no hearing was warranted as no claim was "colorable." Because the state court "expressly stated" that it denied the claim "as procedurally barred," the Ninth Circuit rejected the State's argument that Harrington v. Richter, 131 S. Ct. 770 (2011), required a presumption that the state court's final paragraph was an alternative merits ruling. The court, thus, reviewed the claim de novo. Counsel's conduct was deficient because (1) counsel "failed to conduct even the most basic investigation of James's social history," despite "obvious indications that James had suffered emotional and psychological trauma during his childhood" in a pretrial competency report and a presentencing report. Counsel failed to interview James's adoptive parents, his biological family, or "others who knew him" and "failed to obtain readily available educational records." (2) Counsel failed to investigate James's mental health, despite awareness of several past suicide attempts and pretrial detention psychiatric care for "cyclothymia, a form of bipolar disorder," and medication with lithium. Counsel moved for the appointment of a forensic psychiatrist, which was denied, but then declined additional evaluation by pretrial competence examiners. (3) Counsel failed to investigate James's history of drug abuse, despite "clear cues that James had a history of polysubstance abuse and dependency" in the pretrial competence report. While counsel "argued James's diminished capacity because of LSD intoxication at the time of the offense as a mitigating circumstance," he "failed to appreciate that chronic drug abuse itself evinces, as well as exacerbates, serious mental illness." Prejudice established because substantial mitigation was available but counsel presented only "meager mitigation evidence" in sentencing. Counsel could have presented "a detailed picture of James's troubled childhood, his mental illness, and his downward spiral of depression and drug abuse in the year before [the] murder." James had "utterly unfit parents who exposed [him] to violence, drug abuse, poverty, and sexually predatory adults." He suffered physical and sexual abuse, was a dismal student, a high school dropout, and a habitual drug user.

2012: Winston v. Pearson*, 683 F.3d 489 (4th Cir. 2012) (affirming Winston v. Kelly, 784 F. Supp. 2d 623 (W.D. Va. 2011)), cert. denied, 568 U.S. 1205 (2013) (trial and sentencing 2003). Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to develop and present evidence of mental retardation. In sentencing counsel presented records of the petitioner's psychological evaluations and testimony about his family history "as ordinary mitigating evidence to illuminate [the petitioner's] troubled childhood and subaverage intellectual functioning, but not to establish mental retardation." In state court, petitioner presented evidence that the petitioner's school records included a mentally retarded classification but was unable to present any evidence concerning the basis for this diagnosis. The petitioner also had available three IQ scores in state court but all exceeded 70, which was the maximum score Virginia accepts as evidence of mental retardation. The federal district court granted an evidentiary hearing on both mental retardation and ineffective assistance. Petitioner produced for the first time a 1997 IQ test reflecting a score of 66. Counsel revealed that they obtained the school records but failed to "read the complete records" before sending them to their court-appointed mental-health expert. Thus, counsel did not notice the "mental retardation" classification or interview any teachers or counselors at the school. If they had, several school officials would have testified about the petitioner's "severe limitations in cognitive functioning." Likewise, one of these officials had the 66 IQ score saved on a computer disk in her office at the time of trial. Without this information, the court-appointed expert, who also did not recall whether he considered the mentally retarded classification in the school records, concluded that the petitioner was not mentally retarded. Without this information, counsel chose not to present the mental health expert to testify because he also concluded that the petitioner exhibited antisocial behavior and had a capacity for future dangerousness. Initially, the district court declined to consider the evidence presented in federal court and declined relief. The Fourth Circuit remanded finding that it was appropriate to consider the evidence that had not been reviewed by the state court. The District Court granted relief and this appeal followed. The Court reaffirmed its prior holding after analyzing Pinholster and Richter based on the state court's refusal to order discovery or an evidentiary hearing. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to review the school records and interview school officials. In relying only on the court-appointed examiner to review the school records, "counsel abdicated their responsibility" to investigate. Prejudice was also established. Although petitioner cross-appealed on the question of whether he would be allowed only a mental retardation hearing of an entirely new sentencing hearing, the state conceded that "state law likely requires" a full resentencing proceeding.

Stankewitz v. Wong, 698 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2012) (affirming 659 F. Supp. 2d 1103 (E.D. Cal. 2009)) (sentenced in 1984). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel's conduct in capital resentencing was deficient in failing "to conduct even the most basic investigation." Id. at 1166. Counsel did not hire an investigator or interview "teachers, foster parents, psychiatrists or anyone else who may have examined or spent time with [petitioner] during his upbringing." Id. Counsel did not interview anyone involved in the initial trial proceedings in 1978. Counsel did not obtain a mental health evaluation, even though he believed petitioner was incompetent. Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. Although counsel presented six witnesses in mitigation, three provided no information specific to petitioner. The other three provided "only vague references" to petitioner's history. Counsel "also focused very little on the actual details of [petitioner's] life during his closing arguments.” Id. Counsel’s conduct was not based on strategy. In short, rather than “presenting a narrative that might have humanized [petitioner] to the jury,” counsel chose “simply to ignore the state’s presentation” of aggravation evidence. Prejudice found because there was substantial mitigation evidence available of: (1) a childhood of abuse/neglect; (2) a history of mental illness; and (3) substance abuse/lack of sleep prior to the murder. The jury, however, “had heard next to nothing about [petitioner’s] traumatic childhood.” Id. at 1174. Nonetheless, several jurors initially voted for life before finally reaching a unanimous verdict.

Hooks v. Workman, 689 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2012) (1989 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation, failing to mitigate aggravation evidence, and actually bolstering the aggravation case. Counsel’s conduct was “woefully inadequate” in failing to investigate.

Evidence of family and social history was sorely lacking; the mental-health evidence presented was inadequate and quite unsympathetic; and [counsel] not only failed to rebut the prosecution’s case in aggravation but actually bolstered it by his own statements.

Counsel’s statements and the statements of the defense expert “served to vilify [the petitioner] in the eyes of the jury.” Counsel presented testimony from the petitioner’s sister and mother, but neither testified for much more than one page of transcript. It “was perfunctory, to put it mildly.” “Even the most minimal investigation would have uncovered a life story worth telling: a premature birth, an openly abusive father, frequent moves, educational handicaps, and personal family tragedies.” Counsel also presented an expert. While the expert did say that petitioner had a “form of psychosis,” he characterized the petitioner as “violent” and “crazy.” Counsel “made little effort to connect [the expert’s] diagnosis to the circumstance of the crime.” This was deficient, because “[c]ounsel in capital cases must explain to the jury why a defendant may have acted as he did—must connect the dots between, on the one hand, a defendant’s mental problems, life circumstances, and personal history and, on the other, his commission of the crime in question.” To make matters worse, it was revealed on cross that the expert “knew almost nothing” about the case. He had not even read police reports or listened to the confession. In short, counsel “totally failed to prepare his witness.” If counsel had adequately investigated the mental health evidence, the jury would have known that “the mental-health problems were enduring.” In childhood, the petitioner struggled in school, was evaluated for mental retardation, and was placed in special education classes. While the Court rejected his mental retardation claim, “no one disputes that by the time of trial he had been clinically diagnosed with mild or borderline mental retardation.” There were also “clear markers for organic brain damage due to a premature birth and head injuries from an 18-wheeler accident. This was powerful mitigation evidence because “the involuntary physical alteration of brain structures, with its attendant effects on behavior, tends to diminish moral culpability, altering the causal relationship between impulse and action.” Counsel also failed to rebut evidence of a prior armed robbery conviction, which was one of the three aggravating circumstances. “Even a cursory investigation into the circumstances surrounding this crime would have revealed a much less sordid tale” than the one told by a police officer testifying for the state. The truth was that the petitioner took $35 from a cash drawer in a liquor store and returned home with that and a sack containing a handgun. He told his mother what he had done and she immediately took him to the police station. While this evidence “would not have entirely negated the violent-felony aggravator, it certainly would have softened its edge.” Counsel also bolstered the prosecution’s aggravation by effectively conceding the continuing threat aggravator in his opening statement. Prejudice was established.

2011: Blystone v. Horn*, 664 F.3d 397 (3rd Cir. 2011) (sentenced in 1984). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because of an “extremely limited investigation.” At most, counsel interviewed the petitioner, his parents, and one sister, whom counsel “unintentionally encountered in the hallway of the courthouse during trial.” Counsel sought no background records. The Court did “not delve too deeply into” this question because the Commonwealth “all but concedes” that counsel’s conduct was deficient.

[T]h[e] duty to conduct a reasonable investigation of mitigating evidence exists independently of counsel’s duty to present a mitigation case to the jury. In fact, the former is a necessary predicate to the latter: if counsel had failed to conduct a reasonable investigation to prepare for sentencing, then he cannot possibly be said to have made a reasonable decision as to what to present at sentencing.

Id. at 420. Counsel’s investigation of mental health evidence was limited only to reliance on a pretrial competence evaluation. As the District Court held, “[i]t is beyond cavil that the scope of an evaluation for purposes of mitigation at a capital sentencing proceeding is far broader than that for competency at trial.” Id. at 421. Nonetheless, the competency report contained “‘red flags,’ which a qualified expert would have found to require follow-up prior to sentencing. But counsel never even presented the competency evaluation to an expert.” Id. Under AEDPA, the state court conclusion that counsel’s conduct was not deficient was unreasonable. Counsel’s explanation that the petitioner wanted “all or nothing” was also rejected. The fact that the petitioner turned down a deal for life “in no way compels the conclusion that he wanted to die if convicted.” Id. at 422. Regardless:

“The investigation for preparation of the sentencing phase should be conducted regardless of any initial assertion by the client that mitigation is not to be offered.” Counsel cannot avoid the consequences of his inadequate preparation simply by virtue of the serendipitous occurrence that, on the day of sentencing, his client stuck with the decision not to go forward with a mitigation case.

Id. at 422 (quoting ABA Guidelines). Here, counsel did not do that investigation. Indeed, counsel “did not even perform an investigation sufficient to provide the foundation for a reasoned strategic choice.” Id. at 423. Instead, the failure to investigate “was merely the consequence of lackluster performance.” Id. The Court also rejected the state court finding that the petitioner waived his right to present mitigation. The Court distinguished Schriro v. Landrigan, 550 U.S. 465 (2007). Trial counsel never intended to present any testimony at sentencing other than petitioner and his parents.

Capital Case*

Prior to sentencing, counsel informed the court that petitioner wished to waive mitigation. The court's colloquy "focused almost entirely" on whether petitioner wanted to take the stand or have his parents testify. The only question about whether he wanted to present any other evidence was part of a compound question: "Do you wish to testify yourself or to have your parents testify or to offer any other evidence in this case?" Id. at 425. The petitioner "waived, at most, all lay witness testimony." Id. at 426. There was no indication that petitioner was even aware that "any other form" of mitigation could be presented. Id. Counsel still could have presented "expert mental health evidence and institutional records," id., including Navy records, prior prison records, and the report of the competence evaluation. Under AEDPA, the state court's conclusion of waiver was unreasonable. Prejudice was also found. Petitioner suffers "from serious untreated brain damage and psychiatric disorders, all of which were aggravated by a history of poly-substance abuse." Id. at 406. The psychiatric disorders diagnosed by petitioner's experts were bipolar disorder with major depressive episodes, and borderline personality disorder. The expert testimony and records evidence would have supported mitigating circumstances of substantially impaired capacity, extreme emotional distress, and adaptability to confinement. Thus, there is a reasonable probability that the mitigation evidence "would have convinced one juror to find the mitigating factors to outweigh the single aggravating factor," id. at 427, of murder in the perpetration of a felony.

Sowell v. Anderson, 663 F.3d 783 (6th Cir. 2011) (sentenced in 1983). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel's mitigation strategy was to portray the petitioner "as a good person who lost his temper under the influence of drugs and alcohol." Counsel presented only two former probation officers, two work colleagues, petitioner's common-law wife, and an unsworn statement from the petitioner. The entire mitigation case totaled "only thirty-four pages of transcript" and included no mention of petitioner's "formative years." Counsel pursued this strategy despite having reports from court-appointed experts that "hinted at" petitioner's "difficult background" and without any investigation of petitioner's background or interviews of his family members. Because counsel failed to investigate, counsel "were not in a position to make a conscious, strategic decision about the type of mitigation case to present at sentencing." Id. at 790. In short:

There is nothing wrong with a mitigation strategy that emphasizes a capital defendant's redeeming qualities. But. . . [c]ounsel's failure to present evidence of [petitioner's] horrific childhood resulted from their ignorance of this evidence, not from an informed choice between mutually exclusive mitigation theories.

Id. In other words, "[a]n attorney does not make a strategic decision by choosing to ignore a body of evidence, the contents of which are unknown. This is not strategy." Id. at 791. Family interviews would have revealed that petitioner's "early life was abusive, impoverished, and totally chaotic." Id. His father was an abusive alcoholic, who was frequently absent but when present "the family lived in terror." Id. His mother was only 15 when she married. She "lacked basic parenting skills and vocally wished her children were dead or had never been born." Id. at 791-92. She often left the children "without supervision for days at a time." Id. at 792. The physical and psychological abuse continued into petitioner's adolescent years. His father also sexually molested petitioner's sister and threatened to kill her if she reported it. The family also lived in “extreme poverty.” A younger brother died of starvation and the children often “had to beg for and steal food.” Id. The children were also “bitten by rats, infected with worms, and lacked sufficient clothing and shoes.” Id. Housing was also inadequate and petitioner was “living in a junkyard, on his own, in a tent” by the time he was 14. Id. Aside from family interviews, counsel also failed to pursue “obvious leads contained in the written reports of court-appointed experts.” Id. These reports gave indications of the “troubled childhood.” Even if counsel chose to emphasize the positive while ignoring the “horrific childhood,” this “is not easily considered a reasonable mitigation strategy, particularly where the additional evidence would not have been inconsistent with—and might even have strengthened—the mitigation case counsel did present.” Id. at 793-94. In other words, the evidence could have shown “that petitioner was capable of generosity and good acts in spite of the upbringing that he endured.” Id. at 794. In addition, this was not “a case where counsel could have legitimately feared that digging deeper into [petitioner’s] past would turn up evidence that was more damaging than favorable,” because petitioner’s entire criminal record and arrest history was already included in the evidence. Thus, “the panel already knew the worst.” Id. Prejudice found. The reports of the court-appointed examiners spoke only “in generalities that lacked any details of the severe abuse and abject poverty” of petitioner’s “formative years.” Id. at 795.

In contrast, [petitioner’s] family members offered first-hand, eyewitness accounts of specific examples of extreme poverty and abuse. These specifics had far more evidentiary power than the abstractions and oblique references contained in the experts’ written reports.

What is more, the experts themselves never heard any of these details when they conducted their evaluations.

Id. At bottom:

[Petitioner’s] actions as an adult—good and bad—are merely a snapshot in time, unilluminated by the longitudinal perspective that his developmental history provides. . . . It is evidence of a lifetime of privation and abuse, beginning in early childhood and continuing throughout the formative years of [petitioner’s] life.

Id. at 796.

Foust v. Houk, 655 F.3d 524 (6th Cir. 2011) (sentencing in December 2001). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation in hearing before three-judge panel. While the petitioner’s parents and a psychologist testified, “their testimony pales in comparison to the horrific accounts detailed in records from Children’s Services and in affidavits from [the petitioner’s] siblings.” Prior to trial, the court-appointed a psychologist to evaluate competence and sanity. Shortly before trial, without notice even to the psychologist, the defense sought funding to retain him as a “mitigation specialist.” The psychologist informed counsel that normally a social worker is retained to prepare for capital sentencing. The psychologist recommended numerous times that counsel obtain records, including the Children’s Services records, and interview witnesses, but counsel did only “minimal work” in preparation for sentencing and did not even meet with the psychologist or any of petitioner’s family members, including the parents. Because the state court adjudicated the merits, “[w]e therefore afford double deference to both state-court decisions on both prongs of the Strickland test.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to obtain records and interview family members, even though the petitioner’s “dire upbringing formed the crux of the mitigation strategy.” The court could not “fathom why” counsel failed to obtain the Children’s Services records for the 24-year-old petitioner, especially with the psychologist pushing them to do so. “There is no question that a reasonable attorney would believe records of [the petitioner’s] childhood to be relevant to a defense about the conditions of [the petitioner’s] childhood.” Counsel also did not interview the petitioner’s siblings or even his parents, who were called to testify. Counsel had only four pages of notes and suggested questions that the psychologist prepared for them the day before sentencing began. The state court’s ruling—that counsel’s failure to obtain the records and interview siblings was “a tactical decision”—was “nonsensical.” This was not a case like Van Hook where counsel failed to “dig deeper.” Here, counsel “failed to interview anyone or seek any” records. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to interview the psychologist about his investigation and findings. “By neither interviewing [the psychologist] about his investigation nor conducting any independent investigation, [the] attorneys in effect delegated to [the psychologist], who is not an attorney, the strategic decisionmaking about how to present [the] mitigation defense.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to hire a “trained mitigation specialist,” even though they had “a clinical psychologist.” This is “particularly troublesome” here when counsel knew of the petitioner’s “difficult background” and the psychologist informed counsel that “that most death-penalty investigations include a mitigation specialist, which he was not.” Even if the psychologist was qualified as a mitigation specialist, he did not fulfill that role here as he was unable to collect the Children’s Services records and did not adequately interview family members. Prejudice also found. The state court’s finding to the contrary was unreasonable because “[t]he testimony at the mitigation hearing ‘only scratched the surface of [the petitioner’s] horrific childhood.’” The unrepresented evidence “paints an altogether different picture of [the petitioner’s] childhood.” The petitioner grew up in squalor and chaos that was documented repeatedly by Children’s Services; and suffered maternal abuse, both emotional and physical, and neglect, which was also documented by Children’s Services. In sentencing, the three-judge panel heard only minimal evidence of the conditions of the home and was “misled” into believing that only the petitioner’s father had been abusive. The petitioner’s childhood home was also filled with incest and sexual abuse of his sisters, none of which was presented in sentencing. The petitioner’s “acclimation to sexual abuse of women is particularly relevant because rape was one of the aggravating circumstances that supported the death penalty.” There was also available evidence of “good acts” by the petitioner, but no “positive” evidence was presented in sentencing. The fact that the post-conviction judge that rejected relief was also the presiding judge of the three-judge sentencing panel made no difference as “Ohio law requires unanimity among a three-judge panel for a sentence of death. Thus, ‘any one of the three judges alone could have prevented imposition of the death penalty.’” Moreover, the post-conviction judge’s conclusion of no prejudice was not reasonable. While the aggravating circumstances were “overwhelming” and the “crime was heinous” and “gruesome,” prejudice was still clear. “Powerful aggravating circumstances . . . do not preclude a finding of prejudice.”

Capital Case*

Goodwin v. Johnson, 632 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2011) (sentenced in December 1994). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel presented no evidence in sentencing and instead argued residual doubt. Counsel's conduct was deficient as counsel had "little contact" with petitioner and his family and did not obtain "school, medical, and family history records." Counsel claimed he did not present mitigation to avoid opening the door to evidence of five armed robberies in the petitioner's criminal history. Counsel declined a court-ordered presentence report and psychiatric evaluation because of his belief that there was "nothing psychiatrically wrong" with the petitioner. Counsel in closing even discounted youth as a mitigating factor and told the jury that it would insult their intelligence to rely on mental health evidence. Following the jury's recommendation but prior to imposition of sentence, the defendant's aunt spoke in mitigation. If counsel had obtained juvenile court records, he would have been aware that there were only two adjudications for robbery and one for criminal trespass, rather than five armed robberies. The records also revealed a serious drug problem. School records included an evaluation at age 14 that revealed an IQ of 73. A psychologist that examined the defendant at age 15 in juvenile proceedings testified that she diagnosed conduct disorder but she also found the possibility of dysthymia or depression. Family interviews revealed neglect by a drug-using mother and physical and sexual abuse by others. All of this information would have suggested the need for a mental health evaluation. Prejudice also established. Under AEDPA, the state court's determination to the contrary was unreasonable.

Cooper v. Secretary, Dept. of Corrections, 646 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 2011) (sentenced in January 1984). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The jury recommended death for three murders with votes of 9-3 and 7-5. The only mitigation witness to testify before the jury was the petitioner's mother. A psychologist testified before the judge but was not called before the jury for strategic reasons (i.e., the defendant admitted to him firing four shots while he had admitted to police firing only two shots). Counsel's conduct was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and to interview others, particularly the petitioner's brother and sister, his school principal, and his ex-girlfriend. Because the state did not offer any argument challenging the District Court's finding that counsel's conduct was deficient, "the State has abandoned that claim." Regardless, the court found counsel's conduct was deficient "[u]nder the prevailing standards in 1984." Counsel did not adequately investigate and unreasonably decided to end the background investigation after talking to no one other than the petitioner, his mother, and one expert. While counsel sought to argue that the petitioner was impulsive and acting under the domination of another, could "did little to follow through with this strategy." While counsel knew from the expert that the petitioner had been abused by his father, they did nothing to further develop this information once they decided not to call the expert. Under AEDPA, "fairminded jurists could not disagree about whether the state court's denial of this claim was inconsistent with earlier Supreme Court decisions." The state court's finding of no prejudice was an unreasonable determination of the facts. The petitioner's mother had testified that the petitioner's father abused her and the petitioner witnessed it. She gave no testimony about the father abusing the petitioner as the state court found. In addition, the mother's testimony "did not begin to describe the horrible abuse" described by the petitioner's brother and sister that was inflicted not just by their father but also by the older brother that testified in post-conviction proceedings. Thus, the state court's finding that the mother had presented a "substantial part" of the available mitigation was "a great exaggeration." Prejudice was, therefore, reviewed de novo without "AEDPA deference" and found. If counsel had adequately presented the evidence, two statutory mitigating circumstances that the trial judge had rejected would have been established: (1) age at the time of the crime; and (2) substantial domination by another. While the judge knew the petitioner was barely over 18, he did not hear the evidence that the defendant was "barely removed from being violently abused by his father and brother." Likewise, while the judge heard an expert's opinion that the petitioner was dominated by a co-defendant, the judge did not hear evidence from the lay witnesses, who described the petitioner's susceptibility to domination by older, dominant males during his childhood. In addition, the available evidence would have established multiple categories of nonstatutory mitigation including horrific abuse by his father and brother; drug and alcohol abuse by age 11; abandonment by his mother for long periods; learning deficits; an IQ of 75; and depression. The state emphasized "the dearth of evidence in mitigation" in closing arguments. Given that some jurors had voted for life even without this substantial mitigation, this evidence made it "possible" that "more jurors would have voted for life."

Johnson v. Secretary, DOC, 643 F.3d 907 (11th Cir. 2011) (sentenced in 1980). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The jury recommended death by a 7 to 5 vote after hearing only brief testimony from family members and testimony from a psychologist who saw the defendant in a detoxication program he voluntarily entered less than five weeks before the crimes. She testified that his primary problem was "a character disorder" and that "alcoholism was secondary." While she testified that the defendant sincerely wanted to cure his problems, the program had been inadequate because "it was geared to people whose alcoholism is primary instead of secondary." Counsel's conduct was deficient. He conceded that he knew well before trial "that he had little or no chance of prevailing" on the question of guilt-or-innocence. Counsel had asked a jail psychologist to do "a personality profile," but did not interview family, "family physicians, or any school teachers," and did not obtain school records. The jail psychologist did only two personality tests, diagnosed "conduct or behavior disorder," and disclosed this information to the prosecutor and the judge, as well as defense counsel.

The question under Strickland is not whether . . . trial counsel's overall performance at the sentence stage was exemplary or even average, but whether he conducted an adequate background investigation or reasonably decided to end the background investigation when he did. . . . And as the recent Harrington decision emphasized, because our deficiency inquiry is governed by AEDPA, the question is not just if counsel's investigative decisions were reasonable, but whether fairminded jurists could disagree about whether the state court's denial of the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent or was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts. If fairminded jurists could reasonably disagree, then habeas relief is due to be denied.

Id. at 931-32 (citations omitted). Here, "[g]iven the overwhelming evidence of guilt, any reasonable attorney would have known, as [counsel] testified he actually did know, that the sentence stage was the only part of the trial in which [the defendant] had any reasonable chance of success.” Id. at 932. Nonetheless, counsel “waited until the eleventh hour” to begin preparing for sentencing. Although counsel was aware that the defendant had a bad childhood, including an alcoholic and abusive father, counsel did not investigate or seek a continuance until after conviction on Friday with the sentencing to start on Monday. He did nothing other than speak to the defendant’s father and he investigated no further when the father denied being an abusive alcoholic.

No reasonable attorney who has every expectation that his client will be convicted and will be facing a death sentence would wait until the guilt stage ended before beginning to investigate the existence of non-statutory mitigating circumstances. No reasonable attorney, after being told by his client that he had an abusive upbringing, would fail to interview members of his client’s family who were readily available and could corroborate or refute the allegations of abuse. No reasonable attorney told by his client that he had an alcoholic and abusive father would fail to pursue those non-statutory mitigating circumstances simply because the father denied it. . . .

[I]t was unreasonable for him not to allocate even a few hours of time before the trial to investigating his client’s claim of having been abused by an alcoholic father.

This is not a case in which counsel relied on what his client told him, or failed to tell him, about his background. It is, instead, a case in which counsel failed to adequately investigate what his client did tell him.

Id. at 932-33 (citations omitted). In short, counsel’s failure “was not influenced by”: (1) a strong possibility of getting his client acquitted of the capital murder charge”; (2) “what his client said or failed to say,” (3) “avoiding the possibility of opening the door to what could be harmful evidence”; or (4) “any difficulty in finding other family members or in getting them to talk.” Id. at 934-35. The state court’s determination was an unreasonable application of Strickland. “In Harrington terms, fairminded jurists could not disagree about whether the state court’s denial of this claim was inconsistent with earlier Supreme Court decisions, including Strickland and Williams v. Taylor.” Id. at 935. Prejudice was reviewed de novo as the state court had not decided the issue. “Prejudice established, as numerous family members would have testified. While the defendant’s father had testified previously in sentencing, he had not been prepared and denied at that time that he was an abusive alcoholic. “The description, details, and depth of abuse . . . far exceeded what the jury was told.” Id. at 936. The jury never heard even that both parents were abusive alcoholics. While the jury heard that the defendant had been placed in an orphanage and with grandparents at times, they jury was not told that it was because the father abandoned him. While the jury was given the impression that the grandparents were caring and nurturing, they inflicted horrible physical and emotional abuse on the defendant, including rubbing his face in his own urine when he wet the bed. The jury did not hear that the defendant witnessed repeated suicide attempts by his mother. Likewise, although the jury heard that the defendant blamed himself for his mother’s death and his brother’s death in Vietnam, the jury “did not learn that his mother killed herself the same way his brother died—with a drug overdose. And the jury was not told that [the defendant] found his mother’s body, with a photograph of his dead brother clutched in her hands.” Id. at 937.

Ferrell v. Hall, 640 F.3d 1199 (11th Cir. 2011) (sentenced in September 1988). Trial counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Appellate counsel ineffective in failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness. During sentencing, the defense presented five family witnesses, whose combined testimony and a break lasted only 26 minutes. These witnesses testified that they believed the petitioner was innocent and that he was a Christian, but they did ask for mercy. The available evidence through experts, records, and lay witnesses would have established that the petitioner suffers from organic brain damage, mental illness (probably bi-polar disorder), an epileptic or seizure disorder, and borderline mental retardation. He also had an impoverished and abused childhood, but always had a strong work ethic. His mother was schizophrenic and his family history included depression. While the Georgia Supreme Court’s opinion on whether trial counsel was ineffective was viewed through the prism of AEDPA, the state court never reached the prejudice prong of the appellate counsel ineffectiveness claim and, therefore, AEDPA did not constrain federal court review. Nonetheless, the Court’s “determination about prejudice would be exactly the same” whether AEDPA applied or de novo review. “Trial counsel conducted a profoundly incomplete investigation, and its judgment to so sharply limit its inquiry” was deficient conduct. The state court’s conclusion to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court law. The “mental health investigation was unjustifiably and unreasonably circumscribed.” While counsel did obtain a mental health evaluation pretrial, the evaluation was limited to whether the petitioner was retarded and whether he suffered from any problems that would affect the waiver of Miranda rights. Likewise, the expert was not asked to look for evidence of brain damage, was provided with no material other than school records, was not asked to perform a clinical interview, and was not asked to even consider mitigation despite “the many red flags” raised about the petitioner’s mental health such that counsel and the retained investigator “harbored serious questions” about petitioner’s mental health. In addition, the petitioner had a seizure during the charge conference, but counsel did not seek a continuance or to have a mental health evaluation. Counsel also failed to even ask the family members who testified about the petitioner’s mental health. Indeed, the investigator who had actually interviewed 40-50 witnesses, “only asked statutory character evidence questions . . . and only followed up with them if they said anything positive” about the petitioner. The questions were basically taken from the state statute governing character evidence and sought information on reputation in the community and opinion of the petitioner’s truthfulness. While counsel claimed a “residual doubt” strategy, “[t]he long and the short of it is that defense counsel had nothing else to rely on because they looked for nothing else.” Thus, this “strategy” was “completely undermined” and did not “explain adequately why they unreasonably limited their mitigation investigation.” Likewise, counsel’s closing argument “undercut” any possible “residual doubt” strategy in that counsel said the petitioner’s story of innocence was “absurd,” “ludicrous,” and the like. Counsel also “raised for the jury the question hovering over the entire trial, why [petitioner] did it—the very question that could have been answered by the powerful mitigating mental health evidence easily developed later.”

Capital Case*

Even though counsel asked “why” . . . , counsel never conducted an investigation that would have begun to answer this question, and never offered the jury the slightest reason. . . .

In short, the record . . . establishes that counsel at most pursued a half-hearted residual doubt defense, and then eviscerated that defense with his observations about the inadequacy of defendant’s explanations. The real thrust of the defense at sentencing was not residual doubt, but rather, mercy.

Prejudice was also established and the state court “unreasonably determined” otherwise. First, “the ‘new’ mitigating evidence is consistent, unwavering, compelling, and wholly un rebutted.” Second, the mental health evidence also “measurably weakens the aggravating circumstances found by the jury.” The state argued that the crimes were “cold-blooded, execution-style, and planned out,” such that they were “outrageously and wantonly vile.” The mental health evidence would have served to reduce the volitional nature of the crimes, as well as the petitioner’s ability to plan and act rationally. Third, the mental health evidence “would have easily and directly supported” the argument for mercy that “counsel offered at sentencing.” It also would have answered the “repeated questions to the jury about why” the crimes were committed. Finally, the mitigation evidence presented at trial “was very sparse.” Appellate counsel was also ineffective. During a motion for new trial, new counsel asserted ineffective assistance of counsel. She was provided funding to hire a mental health expert but not an investigator. While counsel asserted that trial counsel had not adequately investigated mental health, she hired a psychiatrist, but asked him to evaluate only competence and sanity. She provided him only with the trial expert’s report and jail records. She did not even provide him with information known to her about the petitioner’s seizure during trial, his mother’s mental illness, or indications of the petitioner’s mental illness. While the expert reported that the petitioner reported hearing voices, counsel did nothing with this information. The state court’s determination that counsel’s conduct was reasonable was an unreasonable application of Strickland. It was also unreasonable to conclude that the “other” mitigation investigation was not deficient. She presented three of the same family members who testified in sentencing, but did not elicit the kind of mitigating evidence that she claimed she sought to establish. She did not track down additional witnesses and did not “dig deeper with the witnesses she did have.” She also “affirmatively presented harmful testimony.” While the mother of petitioner’s children testified that he tried to be a good father, she also provided harmful testimony. Specifically, in response to counsel’s question, she could not answer whether she would have asked the jury to show mercy. Counsel also failed to even speak with the trial investigator and the limited nature of that investigation was not even referenced. Prejudice established for the same reasons as with trial counsel’s ineffectiveness.

2010: *Griffin v. Pierce, 622 F.3d 831 (7th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 562 U.S. 1250 (2011) (sentenced in June 1985). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing (death sentence later commuted to life imprisonment) for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation in sentencing. Counsel presented only the defendant and one witness, who volunteered in the courtroom, to testify briefly in mitigation. Prejudice established because the evidence would have revealed petitioner’s father’s alcoholism and abusiveness, his mother’s absence from the home, the impact of his mother’s death, his diagnosis of schizophrenic reaction, and his drug addictions. The state court held there was no reasonable probability that the sentencing judge would have found that the mitigating evidence precluded the death penalty. The Seventh Circuit held:

The question is not whether a particular judge would have imposed a different sentence, but rather whether there was a “reasonable probability” that the sentence would have been different. In assessing that probability we conduct an objective evaluation of the evidence.

Id. at 845. The state court had also considered the seriousness of the crime and petitioner’s lengthy criminal history, “but it did not properly evaluate the totality of the mitigation evidence and reweigh it against the aggravation evidence as it must.” The state court’s decision was also unreasonable under AEDPA because it viewed the available mitigation evidence as “cumulative and not inherently mitigating,” which was wrong on both fronts. While the presentence report contained some information about petitioner’s history, it was incomplete and also inaccurate as it portrayed a normal childhood with good relationships with his parents when petitioner’s “childhood was anything but normal.” Id. at 845.

2009: Johnson v. Mitchell*, 585 F.3d 923 (6th Cir. 2009) (retrial in 1986). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel had represented the defendant in post-conviction arguing successfully that original counsel had failed to adequately investigate and present mitigation and then, in the retrial, counsel “himself committed the same grievous error.” Counsel’s sole preparation for sentencing was “reading the transcript of the . . . first trial” and speaking with the defendant. “Such inaction on the part of defense counsel in this case amounted to a complete abdication of the attorney’s duty to investigate and present evidence in mitigation.” He offered no mitigation evidence and relied only on the defendant’s unsworn statement, which chastised the factfinders at length for failing to acquit him. “Thus, in effect, [counsel] merely replayed the disastrous initial trial a second time. Not surprisingly, the same result followed.” When counsel did speak with the defendant, he asked only that the defendant provide him with the names of people who say anything “good” about him.

Obviously, confining investigation in the defense of a capital case to only the “good” things that could be said about the client cannot be considered a reasonable investigation.

Id. at 942. At minimum, there were relatives willing to testify. “Without their testimony, the jury was left with no alternative but to believe that [the defendant’s] own relatives were not supportive enough of him to plead for his life.” Id. These witnesses also could have provided “a more compassionate tint to the portrait,” id. at 943, by providing humanizing testimony about the defendant’s background and life. The state court’s finding that counsel’s conduct was not deficient was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Because the state court had not reached the question of prejudice, the Sixth Circuit reviewed this issue de novo.

Capital Case*

In order to establish prejudice, the new evidence that a habeas petitioner presents must differ in a substantial way—in strength and subject matter—from the evidence actually presented at sentencing.

Id. (quoting Hill v. Mitchell, 400 F.3d 308, 319 (6th Cir. 2005)). Here, there was evidence that the defendant had been frequently beaten by his father. He was also exposed to violence in school and in his predominantly white neighborhood where the black defendant was forced to defend himself numerous times. The defendant also had diagnoses of cocaine abuse and mixed personality disorder.

Libberton v. Ryan, 583 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 560 U.S. 979 (2010) (tried in June 1982). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel “spent very little time preparing for sentencing.” Although counsel had funds to hire an investigator, the investigator never interviewed anyone. Counsel did not interview the defendant’s sister or ask the defendant’s mother to testify, even though he did talk to her. Instead, counsel presented only two mitigating witnesses, “both of whom were only tenuously connected” to the defendant. Other than that, the sentencing court had a presentence report reflecting hearsay statements from the defendant’s father that “his son is a liar and thief” and reflecting his opinion that his son “may have been the leader in planning the crime.” Prejudice established as there was evidence available that the crimes were instigated by a co-defendant and the defendant was “merely a follower.” Likewise, evidence was available to impeach a second testifying co-defendant who portrayed the defendant as an equal participant in the crimes. Finally, there was significant evidence that the defendant was seriously physically abused by his father and a step-father during his childhood. This evidence was not only mitigating but “could have seriously undercut his father’s opinion” presented through the presentence report.

Hamilton v. Ayers, 583 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2009) (tried and sentenced in 1982). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in his first capital case.

[H]e never even thought about retaining a mitigation expert or a mental health expert. Moreover, he did not have the benefit of a more experienced attorney’s advice, as he did not associate co-counsel.

The investigation consisted of five interviews conducted shortly before jury selection began. The interviews, including that of the defendant’s sister, did not address the defendant’s childhood at all, even though the sister “could have provided countless details about the physical and mental abuse [the defendant] suffered as a child.” Counsel also failed to investigate further after his investigator learned from the defendant’s uncle that the defendant’s sister had been sexually abused by her father while her mother acquiesced, and the family moved from place to place in the military. This was “classic mitigating evidence” that was not pursued. The other three interviews conducted revealed nothing as “each of them lasted only one to two minutes” and related only to events around the time of the crimes. A number of available witnesses were never contacted, including a sister who was a co-defendant, and available “documentary evidence” was never pursued, even though “[m]any of these documents were in fact in defense counsel’s possession, but he never reviewed them.” The unreviewed records, which were collected by the investigator just prior to sentencing, included information that the defendant's father's was sexually abusive, which resulted in the defendant being placed in foster care. Counsel was aware that the defendant had attempted suicide in prison and that he was taking antidepressants at the time of trial but did not investigate and discover other records that revealed that the defendant "had suffered from serious mental illnesses throughout most of his life."

Defense counsel thus should have retained a mental health expert and provided the expert with the information needed to form an accurate profile of [the defendant's] mental health.

While counsel testified that the defendant was uncooperative, "[a] defendant's lack of cooperation does not eliminate counsel's duty to investigate." The court found Schriro v. Landrigan, 550 U.S. 465 (2007), "distinguishable" because "at most [the defendant] refused to assist in his defense; he did not impede the many other avenues of mitigating evidence available to counsel." Nonetheless, during sentencing, counsel "presented almost none of the mitigating evidence he had discovered." The entire penalty phase, including counsel's "anemic presentation," covered only 39 pages of transcript. Counsel waived his opening statement. He then presented only the defendant's mother to testify, but with "scant questioning" and lack of preparation, this testimony covers only 5 pages of transcript and "left the false impression that [the defendant's] childhood, while unhappy, was not unusual." Because the mother was involved in the abuse of the defendant and his siblings and testified as a prosecution witness during the trial, she "was one of the worst witnesses that defense counsel could have presented to the jury." Counsel also did not explain "the significance of the meager mitigating evidence during closing" and mentioned the mother's testimony only once. Counsel even "validated" the prosecution's characterization of the defendant's childhood "as 'unfortunate' but neither unusual nor extreme," even though "the environment in which [the defendant] grew up was extraordinarily abusive and atypical in almost every sense." Counsel's "strategy" to beg for mercy was unreasonable under these circumstances.

Limiting the scope of a penalty phase presentation to evidence that the defendant is a good person who has done good deeds is, in and of itself, unreasonable where there is an extreme unlikelihood that any testimony about the defendant's character would be sufficient to humanize him.

Prejudice established. The evidence not presented would have revealed that the defendant's family moved 11 times in a 13 year period during the defendant's childhood. His father was an abusive alcoholic, who would kill the children's pets and terrorize them. He fought with his wife "wield[ing] butcher knives" in front of the children. He beat the defendant regularly, "but otherwise ignored him." The parents were sexually inappropriate in front of the children and made them watch while the mother performed oral sex on the father. The father also sexually abused the defendant's sister for four years, while the mother acquiesced and even assisted at times by holding her daughter down or participating sexually. The defendant was aware of this activity and "tried to defend his sister, but his father beat him and threatened to kill him." When the sister reported the abuse to an uncle, the parents were arrested and the children were taken into protective custody. The father was convicted and “adjudged a mentally disordered sex offender.” The defendant moved “from one foster home to another” after that. He was initially placed with an uncle until he observed the uncle also molesting his sister. From the time he was twelve years old, the defendant’s records revealed “serious mental health problems,” including schizophrenia and depression. He had attempted suicide and was still being treated for depression at the time of trial. Mental health problems and sexual abuse “were rampant in [the defendant’s] immediate and extended family as well.” In denying relief, the District Court “went astray by holding counsel to a lesser standard of performance than existed in 1982,” even though compliance with the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice “was as crucial in 1982 as it is today.”

[W]e need not decide whether standard practice at the time of trial included retaining a “mitigation expert”—someone specially trained in investigating and presenting mitigating evidence at the penalty phase of a capital trial—because the deficient performance here did not result from counsel’s failure to hire a specialized investigator. Rather, it resulted from counsel’s failure to pursue obvious leads provided by the people he did interview, to review relevant documents that were in his possession, and to present to the jury the mitigating evidence of which he was aware.

2008: Bond v. Beard*, 539 F.3d 256 (3rd Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 558 U.S. 932 (2009) (sentenced in Feb. 1993). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel presented “seven family members and friends at the penalty phase hearing” to testify generally about “good character and willingness to help others.” The post-conviction testimony “painted a very different picture than that presented at the penalty hearing.” In short, the defendant “endured an extremely troubled and deprived childhood.” His mother drank, gambled extensively, and physically abused the defendant. The family lived in “poverty, disrupted by periods in which the family lacked food, utilities, or adequate clothing.” The defendant “ate lead paint chips at certain points in his youth.” There was “pervasive drug use in the home and . . . heavy gang presence in their neighborhood.” School records reflected substantial absences from school, which his mother testified were “caused by his unstable family circumstances.” Counsel did not discover this information because “counsel did not inquire into [the defendant’s] background in any meaningful fashion.” Counsel did not obtain school and hospital records and had only “brief and perfunctory discussions” with the family “between the guilt and penalty phases” of trial and “did not inquire into family dynamics or background.” Counsel retained a mental health expert to evaluate capacity to understand Miranda warnings, but did not talk to the expert after receiving his report or inquire about the tests administered or anything the expert learned about the defendant’s background. Counsel’s conduct was deficient.

We do not doubt that the prospect of representing a defendant at a capital penalty phase hearing can overwhelm even experienced lawyers. Nor does it surprise us that a first-degree murder verdict would disappoint defense attorneys who have worked hard during a trial. But that does not excuse trial counsel’s failure to prepare for the penalty phase prior to the handing down of the conviction. These attorneys, particularly in the face of a record so full of testimony calling for a first-degree murder verdict, should not have waited until the eve of the penalty phase to begin their preparations.

Capital Case*

Id. at 288. Because counsel did not obtain “readily available” school and medical records and did not “conduct a meaningful inquiry into [the defendant’s] family life,” they “failed to give their consulting expert sufficient information to evaluate [the defendant] accurately.”

Trial counsel did not investigate possible mitigating circumstances or ask experts to do so. Instead, counsel conducted an ad hoc and perfunctory preparation for the penalty phase the night before it began. Their “strategy” relied on an uninformed guess as to the best available way to present [the defendant] to the jury. We will not excuse this conduct on the ground that [the defendant] and his family members did not tell counsel that his background provided fertile territory for mitigation arguments. Neither [the defendant] nor his family had a duty to instruct counsel how to perform such a basic element of competent representation as the inquiry into a defendant’s background. They did not, as the Commonwealth suggests, have to volunteer “red flags” about [the defendant’s] mental health when trial counsel should have discovered that information through a basic inquiry into his background.

Id. (citing and quoting the American Bar Association’s Guideline for Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases). Counsel, here, “neither began their investigation at an appropriate time nor attempted to discover reasonably available mitigation evidence. They thus failed to meet prevailing standards of timeliness and quality.” Counsel compounded this error by deciding at the eleventh hour for co-counsel with no capital experience to take full responsibility for sentencing. “[N]o amount of good intentions makes up for his lack of experience and preparation.” The state court “applied Strickland in an objectively unreasonable fashion in concluding that counsel performed adequately.” The state court holding also rested “in part on the unreasonable factual determination that trial counsel began meaningful preparations for the penalty phase at a point prior to the eve of the penalty phase. The record includes no evidence to that end.” The state court also “incorrectly” relied on strategy.

It is difficult to call . . . counsel’s decisions “strategic” when they failed to seek rudimentary background information about [the defendant]. Strategy is the result of planning informed by investigation, not guesswork.

Id. at 289. If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have established: (1) neglect, along with physical and psychological abuse, as a child; (2) severe cognitive impairments, likely from birth; (3) ingestion of lead paint chips, as well as fetal alcoholism, are consistent with a finding of organic mental deficit; and (4) Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (“PTSD”), caused by the abuse he suffered as a child, being attacked by gang members, and/or the stillborn birth of one of his children. If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have supported two statutory mitigating circumstances (“under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance” and substantially impaired capacity “to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law”) and the catch-all mitigating circumstance. The state court’s conclusion that the state’s expert had thoroughly refuted the defense experts in post-conviction, “rendering any claim based on their testimony ‘meritless,’ . . . rests on an unreasonable factual determination.” “[C]ounsel could have obtained testimony from family members that would have given the jury a very different impression than that left by the other penalty phase testimony. This testimony would not contradict earlier testimony, but rather provide details not uncovered by trial counsel at the penalty phase hearing.” The state court found no prejudice.

That court apparently equated the paltry testimony at the penalty phase hearing with the vastly expanded testimony provided by friends and family members at the PCRA hearing. The two sets of testimony brook no comparison. The first left the impression that [the defendant] came from a supportive (if poor) family but went on a crime spree after the type of disappointments many people face in life. The second showed that he had grown up in an extraordinarily dysfunctional environment rife with abuse and neglect. The penalty phase testimony may have suggested some difficulties during [his] youth, but this does not prevent relief. Strickland permits relief where, as here, trial counsel presented some mitigation evidence but could have introduced evidence that was upgraded dramatically in quality and quantity. The PCRA court’s conclusion that [the defendant] had failed to show prejudice, however construed, either reflects an unreasonable determination of fact (in the comparison of the two sets of testimony) or an objectively unreasonable application of controlling law (in denying relief on the basis that [the defendant] already had presented some mitigating evidence).

Id. at 291.

A reasonable lawyer who understood [the defendant’s] life history would not have proceeded on the theory that he had led a productive life before going on a crime spree as a result of a series of disappointments. Such an attorney instead would have presented evidence to the jury of [the defendant’s] abusive and neglectful family life, his low intelligence, and his psychiatric and psychological problems. There is a reasonable probability that this different course, even in the face of competing expert testimony introduced by the Commonwealth, would have resulted in the imposition of a life sentence.

Gray v. Branker, 529 F.3d 220 (4th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 556 U.S. 1114 (2009) (sentenced in December 1993). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mental health evidence. The defendant, who was a dentist or “prosperous professional” (as noted by the dissenting judge) represented by retained counsel, was charged with killing his wife during ongoing, bitter divorce proceedings. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel was aware from the divorce proceedings, from the defendant’s behavior in pretrial confinement, and from a five-week court-appointed evaluation of mental health issues, but only talked to the defendant once, pre-indictment and prior to the state's notice of intent to seek death, about the need to retain an independent mental health expert.

Defense counsel should not have dispensed with a mental health investigation just because Gray did not want to hire an independent psychiatrist at the pre-indictment stage, well before the state announced its intention to seek the death penalty. See ABA Guideline 11.4.1.C ("The investigation for preparation of the sentencing phase should be conducted regardless of any initial assertion by the client that mitigation is not to be offered.").

Here, the court-appointed examiner had offered additional assistance at no charge. Additionally, counsel did not "seek court approval to hire an independent psychiatrist at state expense when [the defendant] became indigent shortly after his indictment" or even after the jury returned a guilty verdict and the defendant faced the certainty of a capital sentencing proceeding. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy. "There was simply no consideration of whether a defense based on psychiatric evidence might be a strategy worth exploring," before pursuing "a questionable alibi theory until days before trial" and then pursuing an accident theory. Counsel "simply missed or ignored-and failed to act on-the many signs that [the defendant] was mentally and emotionally unstable." The state court finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland because the state court "failed to consider the reasonableness of counsel's actual performance under prevailing professional norms, which include the duty to make considered decisions about areas of potential investigation. The state court also erroneously found that the accident defense and the diminished mental responsibility defense were inconsistent, when "common sense dictates" to the contrary in this case. The state court also "overlooked" the mental health testimony that would have been available and unreasonably "relied heavily on [the defendant's] one-time refusal to hire an independent psychiatrist." "[A] reasonable lawyer would not rely on his client's self-assessment of his mental health, especially in a capital case. There was an independent duty to investigate." The state court held that the defendant was not indigent, but this finding was rebutted by clear and convincing evidence that he was in fact indigent at the time of trial, having placed all of his assets in an irrevocable trust for his children six months earlier." Finally, regardless of financial status, the court-appointed examiner had offered additional assistance without charge. Schriro v. Landrigan does not require a contrary conclusion, because "[n]othing in Schriro permits [the defendant's] statement to be used to relieve his counsel of their duty to investigate for mitigating mental health evidence." With respect to prejudice, the state court "required certainty that the jury would have reached a different result at sentencing," which is contrary to Strickland's "reasonable probability" standard. The state court decision was also an unreasonable application of Strickland because the state court relied on determinations that the court had instructed the jury on mental health mitigating evidence and the state had presented contrary lay evidence. The state court did so without mention, as Williams requires, of the mitigation evidence presented at trial and by improperly discounting the evidence that could have been presented in mitigation. Independent review established prejudice. The defendant had already presented mitigation evidence establishing the defendant was a loving and dedicated father and son, who contributed to the community as a Little League baseball coach. He had no prior offenses, cooperated with law enforcement, and behaved well in confinement. The defense presented no mental health evidence, even though “[e]vidence of mental disturbance . . . can be persuasive mitigating evidence for jurors considering the death penalty, and this evidence can determine the outcome.” Id. at 235 (citing 2003 ABA Guidelines and capital jury study article). Here, “the two mental health mitigating factors—largely ignored by defense counsel—were [the defendant’s] best hope of convincing the jury that he did not deserve the death penalty.” If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have revealed a diagnosis of paranoid personality disorder and adjustment disorder, with the possibility of “psychotic episodes” under severe stressors, such as faced by the defendant at the time of the offense. “The jury would have known that he suffered from a severe mental illness” when he killed his wife.

Johnson v. Bagley, 544 F.3d 592 (6th Cir. 2008) (tried and sentenced in May 1998). Under AEDPA, counsel “committed legal malpractice—or, what is worse, legal representation that amounts to constitutionally ineffective assistance—“ in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Citing the 2003 ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases, the court observed that counsel had complied on a “surface level” in making the petitioner’s grandmother as a positive caretaker the central theme of their sentencing strategy.

In the abstract, this might well have been a legitimate strategic decision, one about which the Constitution would have nothing to say. But in [petitioner’s] case, his counsel pursued this strategy after what can only be described as an anemic and leaderless investigation that suffered from at least three conspicuous flaws.

First, counsel never interviewed the petitioner’s mother, even though counsel knew of her whereabouts. Counsel “chose” not to interview her because she had a bad background as a prostitute and drug addict and would make a bad witness.

But [the mother’s] “bad background” is precisely what should have prompted the defense team to interview her—both to see what that background entailed and to learn more fully how her prostitution and drug addiction affected [the petitioner’s] childhood. That someone may make a bad witness is no explanation for not interviewing her first. And, that is particularly true with respect to this witness, who was [the petitioner’s] mother, not a distant aunt or neighbor.

Second, counsel obtained a 12 inch thick stack of Department of Human Services (DHS) records shortly before sentencing and, without reading them, submitted them to the jury. Many of these pages were not relevant to the petitioner. Some of the records indicated concerns about the grandmother’s abusive history and placing the petitioner in her care.

A review of the records, in short, not only would have tipped them off to a different mitigation strategy but also would have avoided the pitfall of submitting records to the jury, that directly contradicted their theory that [the grandmother] was a positive force for change in his life.

Third, “these investigative blunders occurred because no one who participated in [the] penalty-phase defense made any deliberate decisions about the scope of the investigation, let alone the ‘reasonable’ ones Strickland requires.” Counsel gave the two “alleged mitigation specialists” an initial set of names for interviews but were otherwise “not involved in the investigation” and only began thinking about “a mitigation strategy” after the petitioner was convicted. The “lead” mitigation specialist was “in the midst of a debilitating bout of depression” that ultimately resulted in suspension from the practice of law. He, “it seems clear, was almost certainly not making any significant decisions, reasonable or otherwise, regarding the scope of . . . investigation.” The other “alleged mitigation specialist,” a graduate student with limited experience and working part-time interviewed only the witnesses on the list counsel initially gave him and gave only his notes to the defense expert. The state court’s finding that counsel’s conduct was not deficient was an unreasonable application of Strickland in finding that counsel had discovered the relevant evidence as shown by the sentencing evidence. “[T]he testimony only scratched the surface of [petitioner’s] horrific childhood.” While some information may have been included in the records submitted, “that does not mean defense counsel performed a reasonable investigation or for that matter reasonably used the evidence.”

[D]efense counsel was not familiar with the records; some of the records contradicted their mitigation strategy . . . ; and it hardly constitutes a reasonable investigation and mitigation strategy simply to obtain . . . records from the State, then dump the whole file in front of the jury without organizing the files, reading them, eliminating irrelevant files or explaining to the jury how or why they are relevant.

The state court also unreasonably concluded that counsel performed adequately “without looking to the reasonableness of the investigation’s scope.” While counsel had presented testimony of five people about the petitioner’s “troubled past” and presented an expert witness, “an unreasonably truncated mitigation investigation is not cured simply because some steps were taken prior to the penalty-phase hearing and because some evidence was placed before the jury.”

Buttressed by a reasonably adequate investigation, the defense team’s ultimate presentation to the jury might have been justified as the product of strategic choice. But, that is not what happened. [Petitioner’s] attorneys “were not in a position to make . . . reasonable strategic choice[s] . . . because the investigation supporting their choice[s] was unreasonable.” Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 536; Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690-91.

Counsel’s conduct was also not excused because their interviews did not yield information about the grandmother’s abusive history or negative influence on the petitioner. “Uncooperative defendants and family members . . . do not shield a mitigation investigation (even under AEDPA’s deferential standards) if the attorneys unreasonably failed to utilize other available sources that would have undermined or contradicted information received.” Because the state court did not address prejudice, the court reviewed this issue de novo. Counsel’s errors, “particularly their lack of investigation, had a serious impact on the mitigation theory presented to the jury.” First, there was “a goldmine of mitigating evidence showing that [the grandmother] was anything but a saint.” She had schizoid personality disorder, had no maternal instincts, was abusive to her daughter, and allowed her daughter to be raped by a friend. While petitioner “was an indirect victim” of the neglect and abuse of his mother, “he was a direct victim as well.” The grandmother was emotionally and physically abusive to him. Thus, the jury was misled to believe that she was a positive influence. Second, counsel “could have presented a detailed and horrific picture” of petitioner’s mother’s role in his life. She was portrayed in sentencing as “a mostly absent mother, when the truth is that her early abuse and on-again-off-again presence in his life had an irreparable and devastating impact on [him]. The evidence would have shown: (1) she was a prostitute who sold herself to buy drugs; (2) she often fed him only sugar water; (3) when he cried, she would put him in a closet and give him beer and pain killers to make him stop crying; (4) she was physically abusive, even putting a cigarette out on his eye, and threatened to kill him; (5) she was involved in many abusive relationships and tried to set fire to petitioner’s father at one time; (6) she taught petitioner to cut cocaine, cook it into crack and sell it; and (7) she killed one of her abusive boyfriends and bragged to petitioner about it.

Yet, due to counsel’s bungling or sheer laziness, the jury heard none of this. “I and the public know [w]hat all schoolchildren learn,” it has been said, “[t]hose to whom evil is done [d]o evil in return.” W.H. Auden, “September 1, 1939.” While these words may not capture a satisfactory theory of morality, they assuredly suggest a plausible theory for sparing a life at a mitigation hearing, see ABA Guideline 10.11(F)(1)-(2), one that on this remarkable record could well have affected a juror’s vote in the case.

Third, counsel’s failure to investigate led to damaging testimony from the defense expert, who diagnosed antisocial personality disorder and testified that the petitioner was not remorseful. “This unhelpful testimony could have been prevented” with a complete background picture. The defense expert “then might have been able to say, as [the PCR expert] did . . . , that [petitioner’s] ‘chaotic, abusive, neglectful’ family ‘play[ed] a significant role in the development of [his] personality and his addiction to alcohol and drugs and later mental illness,’ such that his ‘psychological profile is ‘almost identical’ to that of his mother.’”

Defense attorneys, we recognize, are not obligated to shop for “the ‘best’ experts” who will testify in the most advantageous way possible. But it is unreasonable, after an incomplete investigation, to put an expert on the stand who will “directly contradict[] the sole defense theory” and “render worthless” other helpful testimony.”

Id. (citations omitted). This is especially so when the prosecution even points out in closing that the expert testimony is harmful to the defense. In sum, “this post-conviction evidence differs from that heard by the jury not only in degree but also in kind, and forms a mitigation story that ‘bears no relation’ to the story the jury heard.” Even though some of this information was in the documents submitted to the jury, “this jury was given no basis for construing and digesting this information” because no mitigation witness ever referred to the 12-inch thick records and counsel simply told the jury to “leaf through” them, which “likely would have discouraged the jury from reading more closely” and the references to the grandmother’s “deficiencies were few.”

Mason v. Mitchell, 543 F.3d 766 (6th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 558 U.S. 1007 (2009) (sentenced in June 1994). Under AEDPA (and citing the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases (1989)), counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel presented only brief testimony of adaptability to confinement, family member requests for mercy, and the defendant’s unsworn denial of guilt. Counsel’s decision to limit the defense presentation “to appeals for mercy and claims of residual doubt” was made after the conviction during a phone call with members of the Ohio Public Defender Office. “Therefore, the evaluation of [counsel’s] performance must focus on what knowledge [counsel] then possessed regarding [the petitioner’s] childhood and background and what investigation and interviews, if any, that [counsel] had performed prior to making that decision.” Counsel met with the petitioner and his wife several times but did not really discuss mitigation. Counsel had been denied a mitigation investigator from the Public Defender Office and denied funding from the court. He was provided only with a brief psychiatric examination limited to “potential for rehabilitation and the likelihood of future dangerousness.” He was provided voluminous records by the state concerning criminal history, involvement by Children’s Services, drug treatment programs, and some educational records. From this, counsel was aware that: (1) petitioner was born into a drug-dependent family; (2) the family was involved in drug trafficking; (3) both parents had been incarcerated on trafficking charges; (4) petitioner had been exposed to a lot of violence; and (5) petitioner had prior injuries and scars he told police were due to beatings from his father. Counsel had only brief phone calls with a person at Children’s Services and the petitioner’s probation officer. Counsel’s time records reflected only “very brief” contacts with some family members after that phone call. He never contacted some of petitioner’s siblings. And, at most may have talked briefly with the petitioner’s father and a brother, whose “statements appear to contradict the ample documentary evidence” already provided by the state in discovery. The failure to investigate further “is inexcusable given this apparent contrast between the facts contained in the documentary evidence and what he apparently learned” from the petitioner’s father and brother.

[Counsel’s] efforts consisted of no more than reviewing documents provided by the state, arranging for a psychiatric evaluation limited to predicting [petitioner’s] future dangerousness, talking to Mason himself, and very briefly talking to a small subset of [petitioner’s] family members. Under the Supreme Court’s governing case law regarding counsel’s obligation to undertake a reasonable investigation to support strategic decisions about the presentation of mitigation evidence, we have no doubt that the performance of [petitioner’s] counsel was deficient.

Prejudice established.

[Petitioner] need only have persuaded one juror not to impose the death penalty, and [Petitioner’s] jury initially reported a deadlock regarding his sentence. Even a slightly more compelling case for mitigation thus might have altered the outcome of the sentencing phase of [the petitioner's] trial.

If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have established: (1) petitioner's father ran a prostitution ring and a home-based drug business with 10 employees; (2) both of petitioner's parents were drug users and traffickers; (3) petitioner's mother shot his father; (4) petitioner's parents abused him and isolated him from anyone not associated with their drug dealing activities; (5) petitioner began using drugs at eight years old; (6) petitioner's father included him on drug trafficking trips when he was in junior high; and (7) petitioner has "a borderline personality disorder largely as a result of his dysfunctional home environment." This evidence would not necessarily have opened the door to damaging prosecution rebuttal evidence, which is permitted under state law only to rebut good character or rehabilitation potential evidence. The state court "unreasonably applied the Strickland standard" because the state court ignored the Strickland principle that "strategic choices made after less than complete investigation are reasonable precisely to the extent that reasonable professional judgments support the limitations on investigation." Id. (quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690-91). Here, the state court "simply asserted that . . . counsel had made a strategic decision regarding mitigation strategy, but that court failed to assess whether a thorough and reasonable investigation supported counsel's strategic decision." The state court's prejudice analysis was also "flawed and objectively unreasonable" because the court relied on the possibility of the state presenting rebuttal evidence to good character or rehabilitative potential evidence, which was "a mitigation strategy that [petitioner] was not advocating."

Jells v. Mitchell, 538 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 2008) (sentenced in October 1987). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. In so holding, the court observed: "the deference owed to counsel's strategic judgments about mitigation is directly proportional to the adequacy of the investigations supporting such judgments." Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to timely prepare for sentencing and in failing to utilize a mitigation specialist to gather information about the defendant's background, including his educational, medical, psychological, and social history. Counsel did not contact a mental health expert until two days after conviction and 16 days prior to the mitigation hearing. Counsel did not provide the expert with "personal history records—records that would have been collected had they uses a mitigation specialist—that were necessary for the evaluation." In addition, counsel interviewed only three family members, "neglecting to speak with many other family members who had lived with [the petitioner] and were available. When speaking with the family members they did contact, their inquiry was brief and they failed to ask sufficiently probing questions; as a result they failed to discover the abuse that [the petitioner] received from his mother's live-in boyfriend and his stepfather." Counsel also failed to obtain a prior psychological report and accessible school records that revealed mental impairments. Counsel's conduct was also deficient "[i]n the context of [the petitioner's] case" in "failing to use a mitigation specialist." "While [petitioner's] counsel did not have a specific obligation to employ a mitigation specialist, they did have an obligation to fully investigate the possible mitigation evidence available." Under state law, "the range of potential mitigation evidence is quite broad." Thus, "defense counsel must conduct a reasonably thorough investigation into all possible mitigation evidence that would present a sympathetic picture of the defendant's family, social, and psychological background.” Counsel conducted some investigation and made a “limited presentation of [petitioner’s] unstable childhood and academic difficulties.” Counsel’s awareness of this limited information “should have alerted them that further investigation by a mitigation specialist might [have] proved fruitful.” Counsel’s failure to investigate prior to the conviction was objectively unreasonable under Strickland and the state court’s finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Prejudice established because “there is a reasonable probability that at least one of the [three state sentencing panel] judges may have reached a different conclusion regarding the imposition of the death penalty.” Available but unrepresented evidence “paints a significantly more detailed picture of [the petitioner’s] troubled background.” While trial counsel presented evidence of essentially a normal childhood, an IQ of 77, and no antisocial personality disorder or mental illness, petitioner had “a history of serious cognitive learning and socialization impairment” that amounted essentially to academic problems that resulted in behavioral problems with “several missed opportunities” to resolve the problems “through special education and remedial classes.” These educational problems were compounded by his home. The defendant was one of seven children and his mother constantly moved in and out of relationships with abusive men making the petitioner “a witness to . . . violence and cruelty” inflicted on his mother. “In short, rather than being cumulative, this evidence provides a more nuanced understanding of [petitioner’s] psychological background and presents a more sympathetic picture of [him].” The state court’s finding of no prejudice was unreasonable.

Sechrest v. Ignacio, 549 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 558 U.S. 938 (2009) (sentenced in Sep. 1983). In pre-AEDPA case, counsel was ineffective in sentencing for three reasons. First, counsel permitted the prosecution to review and introduce into evidence the confidential report of a defense-retained expert counsel decided not to present as a witness. The report contained information about the defendant’s “criminal history and his upbringing” revealed only to this doctor, who diagnosed a “polymorphous perversion.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the state would not have had access to this information otherwise and “defense counsel had absolutely no obligation to disclose [the] confidential report to the prosecution.” Second, counsel erred in allowing the prosecution to call the defense expert as a witness.

[C]ounsel should not have stipulated to the prosecutor calling [the same defense-retained expert] as a witness for the prosecution. Counsel’s decision to so stipulate is indefensible. This decision put counsel in the difficult position of having to cross-examine the only mental health expert to testify during the penalty phase of . . . trial, even though counsel himself had chosen [the expert] and supplied him with information about [the defendant]. Furthermore, the jury was told that [the expert] was hired by the defense to examine [the defendant] and report on his mental health. Given that the defense’s expert not only had nothing favorable to say about [the defendant], but thought that he was beyond all hope of rehabilitation, the jurors had even less incentive to impose a sentence that they were told [improperly] by the prosecutor and the court might lead to [the defendant’s] eventual release.

Capital Case*

Id. at _____. Counsel's alleged strategy for not objecting was the belief that the witness would provide helpful information on the defendant's troubled background, but this was not "a sound strategic decision" because [i]f counsel truly believed that [the] testimony would be helpful, the appropriate 'strategic decision' would have been to call [the expert] to testify on behalf of the defense." In addition, counsel did not pursue or argue any mitigating factors related to troubled background. "Given these considerations, counsel cannot hide behind a later, implausible assertion that his decision was 'tactical' given that his actions show that he had no intention of presenting any mitigating evidence based on . . . mental health." Finally, counsel inadequately prepared for the expert testimony. "Once counsel decided to allow the prosecution to call [the defense expert] as a witness, counsel had a duty to prepare for [the] testimony." Counsel did not speak to the expert after agreeing to let him testify for the state, which was evident in "counsel's lackluster performance at trial" eliciting on cross that the defendant could not be cured or treated. "In sum, some of the most damaging testimony presented during the penalty phase of trial was elicited by [the defendant's] own counsel, from a witness [defense] counsel had originally selected and could have prevented from testifying." Prejudice found because the expert's testimony "likely played an important role in the jury's verdict imposing the death penalty." Reversal was also required due to a due process violation in the prosecutor repeatedly making false, inflammatory statements indicating that the state board of pardon commissioners could release petitioner if the jury did not return a verdict imposing the death penalty.

Correll v. Ryan, 539 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 555 U.S. 1098 (2009) (tried in 1984). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of the petitioner's mental health and failing to present mitigation evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient in numerous respects. Counsel knew the petitioner "came from a dysfunctional family, sustained a serious head injury, was committed to various psychiatric facilities, and that he was addicted to drugs; yet defense counsel did not obtain the records nor did he interview witnesses concerning these matters." Counsel only met with the petitioner possibly once and with the petitioner's father, sister, and brother once and at the same time. He did not obtain school records, police reports on prior convictions, records from the California Youth Authority, medical records, or psychiatric records. "As anemic as the defense counsel's investigation was, his presentation of mitigating evidence at the penalty phase was worse." Counsel presented no evidence, which mandated the death penalty under Arizona law because the defendant had a qualifying prior conviction and no mitigation. Defense counsel's mitigation argument did not even attempt to rebut three of the five aggravating factors urged by the State. "The entirety of his oral argument at the penalty phase consists of approximately 7 pages of transcript." "Given his virtual concession of most of the aggravating factors argued by the State, and waiver of the presentation of mitigation evidence, the outcome was obvious: imposition of the death penalty." Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have established the petitioner endured an abusive childhood in which he was neglected by his mother, who spent most of her time at church. The children were physically punished if they did not understand religious doctrine. There was incest in the family. A brick wall collapsed on the petitioner's head when he was seven causing unconsciousness for some time, but no medical treatment was sought for several days. The petitioner began "self-medication" by experimenting with alcohol and drugs around age ten and was using marijuana, LSD, and amphetamines regularly by age twelve. The petitioner's parents responded by beating him and threatening to kick him out. After the petitioner was shot at age 14, his parents asked the state to terminate their parental rights and cut off all communication with him. He became a ward of the state and spent his teenage years "in various state institutions described as 'gladiator schools,' which were characterized as cruel and inhumane, even by those who worked there." Within months, he became addicted to heroin. He was committed to psychiatric institutions at least twice during his teen years and was described at age 16 as "severely psychologically impaired." He was treated with a tranquilizer/anti-psychotic drug while institutionalized, and attempted suicide on two occasions. By the time of the crimes, he was injecting a quarter gram to a gram of methamphetamine in one shot, and injecting three to four shots a day. He would go seven to ten days without sleep, followed by one to two days of continuous sleep. Expert testimony indicated that he was likely having impulse control problems and judgment impairment at the time of the crime, and may have been experiencing drug-induced paranoia. Counsel did not pursue "the classic mitigation evidence," because "he didn't think of the evidence as favorable evidence. However, it is precisely this type of evidence that the Supreme Court has termed as 'powerful.'" Id. (quoting Wiggins). While counsel also appeared to be afraid of the particular judge's reaction to the evidence, "this presumes that the judge would not follow the law—speculation that is never appropriate and that is not supported by the record here" and also ignores the fact that, under state law, the Arizona Supreme Court independently reviews the aggravating and mitigating factors and re-weighs them and conducts a proportionately review.

Williams v. Allen, 542 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 556 U.S. 1253 (2009) (sentenced in April 1990). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel was aware of: (1) a report by a defense psychologist, who examined only competence and mental state at the time of the offenses, that the defendant had an IQ of 83 and exhibited signs of personality disorder and depression; (2) a presentencing report describing the petitioner's father as an abusive alcoholic and referring to previous psychological evaluations of the petitioner; and (3) petitioner's mother's statements. Counsel's "failure to broaden the scope of their investigation beyond these sources was unreasonable under prevailing professional norms" in the ABA Guidelines. "A reasonable investigation into the leads in this case should have included, at a minimum, interviewing other family who could corroborate the evidence of abuse and speak to the resulting impact on [the petitioner]. Counsel, however, failed to contact such witnesses."

Counsel uncovered nothing in their limited inquiry . . . to suggest that "further investigation would have been fruitless." Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 525, 123 S. Ct. At 2537. To the contrary, the many red flags . . . would have prompted a reasonable attorney to conduct additional investigation. Moreover, acquiring additional mitigating evidence would have been consistent with the penalty phase strategy that counsel ultimately adopted. Given that counsel's sentencing case focused on establishing . . . a troubled background, they had every incentive to develop the strongest mitigation case possible. Cf. id. at 526, 123 S. Ct. 2538. It is thus apparent that counsel's failure to expand their investigation "resulted from inattention, not reasoned strategic judgment." Id. at 526, 123 S. Ct. 2537.

The state court decision unreasonably applied Strickland by focusing "entirely on counsel's decision not to present additional mitigating evidence" without addressing "whether counsel's investigation into such evidence was adequate under prevailing professional norms." While other family members were available for interview, counsel relied only on the petitioner's mother, who was the sole mitigation witness, to provide "brief testimony" about the petitioner's childhood. "By choosing to rely entirely on her account, trial counsel obtained an incomplete and misleading understanding of [the petitioner's] life history." Prejudice established.

The mitigation evidence that . . . trial counsel failed to discover paints a vastly different picture of [the petitioner's] background than that created by [his mother's] abbreviated testimony. . . . [T]he violence experienced by [the petitioner] as a child far exceeded—in both frequency and severity—the punishments described at sentencing. . . . Moreover, contrary to the impression created by [the petitioner's mother], this violence was not of a type remotely associated with ordinary parental discipline. . . . This evidence surely would have been relevant to an assessment of [the petitioner's] culpability, particularly in light of his age [nineteen] and lack of prior criminal history.

In addition, the trial court, in overriding the jury's nine to three recommendation for life, "expressly relied" upon the mother's testimony in "discounting the significance of the abuse described at sentencing." The available but unrepresented mitigation evidence contradicted this finding. Prejudice was also clear because "this case is not highly aggravated." The state court's finding of no prejudice was an unreasonable application of Strickland because of the "court's emphasis on the absence of a 'causal relationship' between [the] mitigating evidence and the statutory aggravator." The state court also "rested its prejudice determination on the fact that . . . mitigating evidence did not undermine or rebut the evidence supporting the aggravating circumstances" without considering the "possibility that the mitigating evidence, taken as a whole, might have altered the trial judge's appraisal of . . . moral culpability, notwithstanding that the evidence did not relate to his eligibility for the death penalty." The court rejected the trial court's "post-hoc statements" that additional evidence would not have impacted his decision because "the assessment should be based on an objective standard that presumes a reasonable decisionmaker."

2007: Morales v. Mitchell*, 507 F.3d 916 (6th Cir. 2007) (tried in December 1985). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to interview the petitioner's family, friends, and others who knew him; failed to obtain any background records; failed to retain a mitigation expert; and failed to adequately prepare the petitioner for his unsworn statement in sentencing. The state court's finding that counsel's conduct was not deficient was an unreasonable application of clearly established constitutional law. Because the state court did not address the issue of prejudice, the federal court's review of prejudice was de novo. Prejudice established because counsel presented no sworn testimony or evidence, made no opening statement, and made a closing statement that was a mere three pages long during the penalty phase. The jury was provided only with an unprepared unsworn statement by the petitioner. If counsel had adequately investigated, a number of family members and a former principal at the petitioner's school would have testified and documentary evidence was available to corroborate information about the alcohol abuse of the Petitioner's parents, his abuse by an older mentally retarded brother, his mentally disturbed sister's suicide when he was only nine, his mother's emotional problems, and the effect and role of alcohol, drugs, and Native American culture on him.

Haliym v. Mitchell, 492 F.3d 680 (6th Cir. 2007) (tried in September 1987). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel presented three witnesses in sentencing along with an unsworn statement from the defendant. A former employer testified that the defendant was a good employee. A psychiatrist, who spent only one and a half hours with the defendant and relied on pretrial court-appointed competence and sanity reports, testified that the defendant was diagnosed with an "adjustment disorder with depressed moods" and "malingering," but that the defendant does not have a mental disease or defect. Finally, the defendant's grandmother testified that the defendant lost both his parents and a brother over a two-month period. His father died of a heroin overdose and his brother was shot. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to conduct "even the most basic interviews" with the defendant's family members concerning the family background, even though counsel knew the defendant's father died of a heroin overdose. "It is not the usual case where a parent copes with an addiction as serious and controlling as a heroin addiction without repercussions, often serious repercussions, being felt by the remaining family members." Even basic interviews would have revealed a family history filled with the father's physical abuse, which is "an important mitigation factor." Counsel instead presented inconsistent evidence in the defendant's statement that his parents were wonderful and in a doctor's report that the defendant denied any physical abuse. Counsel also was aware that the defendant had attempted suicide by shooting himself in the left temple, "which should have strongly suggested the need to investigate whether Petitioner had a mental defect." Instead, counsel presented evidence that the defendant had no mental disease or defect when "the limited time that [the doctor] spent with Petitioner—a mere hour and a half—sharply hindered his ability to make any independent analysis of Petitioner's mental health." The court also noted that counsel's performance fell short of the 2003 ABA Guidelines. Counsel's failure to investigate "was unlikely the result of a strategic choice. Despite the availability of funding to procure experts chosen by Petitioner at the mitigation phase, . . . Petitioner's attorneys nevertheless relied upon the presentence report" of a court-appointed expert and the inadequate testimony of the expert witness presented.

Had Petitioner's counsel taken an active role in procuring an expert to investigate Petitioner and author a report for mitigation, evidence of Petitioner's social history and brain injury would likely have come before the trial court. We can fathom no strategic reason for Petitioner's counsel's failure in this regard.

Capital Case*

Prejudice found because adequate investigation would have revealed significant mitigation, including the defendant's father's violence against the defendant and his family, the loss of both parents and a brother when the defendant was only a teenager, which affected the defendant profoundly. Shortly afterwards, he started using heroin, leading to a drug addiction. He also became severely depressed and shot himself causing a serious brain injury and functional brain impairment, which causes problems with impulsivity, judgment, and problem solving. There is a reasonable probability that this evidence would have led to a different result before the three-judge sentencing panel, which would likely have reached a different result with evidence of a mental disease or defect.

Stevens v. McBride, 489 F.3d 883 (7th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 553 U.S. 1048 (2008) (1995 trial and sentencing). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mental health expert and presenting the testimony of an "expert" counsel believed to be a "quack," which was very prejudicial. The defendant, described in the first sentence of the opinion as "an emotionally disturbed young man who had been abused and raped as a child," was sentenced to death for "the molestation and brutal murder" of a 10-year-old boy. He also had a prior molestation conviction for which he was on parole at the time. Prior to trial counsel retained "a defense mitigation specialist" and were aware of obvious mental health issues due to the defendant's physical, mental, and emotional abuse and his rape as a child. Medical records reflected that he had been held in a psychiatric facility following an attempted suicide and that he had been diagnosed with major depression and possible schizophrenia. The defendant also disclosed to the mitigation specialist that, at the time of the murder, he put himself in the victim's place because he had wished that the man who raped him had also killed him. Based on the mitigation specialist's recommendation, counsel retained a psychologist, who at the time was director of a child and adolescent psychiatric center. Counsel met with the doctor and asked him to evaluate the defendant but not to prepare a report. The doctor wrote a report anyway which included very prejudicial information such as no mental illness, molestation of 25-30 children, a prior murder (later recanted), lack of acceptance of responsibility, committing this murder for the purpose of avoiding a return to prison, a diagnosis of pedophilia, and future dangerousness. Counsel contacted the doctor, who said basically that he would make a good witness for them despite his report. Counsel also learned that the doctor believed that "mental illness" is a "myth" and used a "therapeutic technique described as putting 18-year-olds on his lap and sticking a bottle in their mouth." Counsel then had "well-founded doubts" about the doctor's "fitness as a defense expert" and believed he was a "quack." Counsel's conduct was deficient though because counsel did not seek a different mental health expert and provided the state with this doctor's report prior to trial (when counsel was only required to disclose reports from expert witnesses who would be called to testify). During trial, rather than pursuing a mental illness defense, counsel argued a voluntary manslaughter theory, but the court refused to even charge on manslaughter. In the penalty phase before the jury, counsel presented testimony from the defendant and some family members and then called the "quack" to testify. His testimony extensively covered the doctor's beliefs and theories and some testimony about the defendant's "terrible childhood" and abuse. His testimony did not, however, provide any evaluation of the defendant's mental health at the time of the offenses. On cross, the state questioned the doctor extensively on his report, which he confirmed. The quack volunteered that the defendant had "antisocial qualities and sociopathic traits." In response to questions from the state, the doctor also confirmed that the defendant had admitted to him that he was sexually aroused by killing the child and had masturbated on the child's body. The doctor had not even disclosed this last information to defense counsel. After the jury recommended death, counsel called the doctor to testify yet again in sentencing before the judge. This time he added that the defendant posed "a great risk to society." The defendant challenged counsel's ineffectiveness for failing to present a mental health defense during trial and in mitigation. The state argued essentially that counsel was entitled to rely on their "expert" without seeking an additional expert because he was a qualified doctor. The court rejected this because "the general qualifications of an expert witness do not guarantee that the witness will provide proficient assistance in any given instance." The problem in this case arose due to the "methods" the doctor used, "his idiosyncratic view of mental disorders," and "the fact that [his] views favored the prosecution." Thus, "it would not have been reasonable for defense counsel to rely on" this doctor "based only on his credentials." While the court was "inclined to believe that their performance was ineffective" during the trial and that prejudice was established, the court, constrained by AEDPA review, did not find that the state court's contrary conclusion was an unreasonable application of Strickland. With respect to sentencing, however, counsel's conduct was both deficient and prejudicial because counsel presented lay testimony as essentially non-statutory mitigation but did not present evidence of the statutory mitigating circumstances of extreme emotional disturbance and impaired capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct at the time of the murder, which were supported by two competent experts in post-conviction. These experts diagnosed a severe dissociative disorder and found that the defendant was dissociating during the murder and killing the child because he himself wanted to be killed by the man that had raped him as a child.

The strategic reasons that might, at a stretch, have justified this decision [not to present a mental health defense] at the guilt phase, fall apart when we consider that at the sentencing phase [the defendant] had nothing left to lose. The lawyers' decision to forego presenting this kind of mitigation evidence was made without the kind of investigation into [his] mental health that Strickland calls for, after [his] lawyers had concluded that [the doctor] was a "quack." Indeed, it is uncontested that [his] lawyers knew nothing about the content of [the doctor's] planned testimony. The lawyers confessed at the post-conviction hearing that they were utterly in the dark about what [he] would say when he took the stand. . . . This is a complete failure of the duty to investigate with no professional justification. Where an expert witness's opinion is "crucial to the defense theory[,] defense counsel's failure to have questioned [the expert] ... prior to trial is inexcusable."

Id. (quoting Combs v. Coyle, 205 F.3d 269, 288 (6th Cir.2000)). The court also noted that counsel had the doctor's report and "we cannot imagine what they hoped to gain" by calling him to testify. In addition, if he had not been called as a witness, counsel was under no obligation to disclose his report to the prosecution. Even though counsel may not have been ineffective for not presenting mental health testimony during the trial, they were during sentencing.

Capital Case*

[T]here is an important difference between the statutory mitigating factors . . . for capital sentencing purposes and the requirements for proving an insanity defense at the guilt phase. Furthermore, the burden on the defendant is not as heavy at sentencing as during the guilt phase. . . . As a legal matter, a mental illness mitigation defense to the imposition of a death sentence may be available even if an insanity defense to the murder charge is not.

If counsel had presented “mainstream expert psychological testimony” such as that presented in post-conviction, there is a reasonable probability of a different outcome. “Competent evidence” of “mental illness would have strengthened the general mitigation evidence presented by defense counsel . . . by focusing the jury on the concrete results of years of abuse on [the defendant’s] psyche.” There was also “little downside” in further evidence of the defendant’s “predatory pedophilia” being presented when “evidence of the most damning sort was already before the jury.” Prejudice was especially clear in calling the “quack” to testify and then to do it a second time because he not only provided the only evidence of “necrophilia after the murder, he also gave the prosecution a gift by expressing his belief in . . . future dangerousness—a subject that the prosecution itself is not permitted to argue as an aggravating circumstance under Indiana law.” The trial court’s sentencing order also was “a close reflection of [the doctor’s] written report and testimony.

*Lambright v. Schriro, 490 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1097 (2008) (tried in 1982). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel “failed to do even a minimal investigation of ‘classic mitigation evidence,’ notwithstanding the fact that he knew such evidence potentially existed.” He spent less than five hours preparing for sentencing even though counsel was aware from the pre-sentence investigation report and the court-appointed examiner’s report of the defendant’s long history of mental health problems, his two prior suicide attempts, his prior hospitalization in a psychiatric facility, his traumatic combat experiences in Vietnam, his serious drug problems, and his diagnosis by a court- appointed examiner of antisocial personality disorder. It was not sufficient that counsel prepared a short memorandum for the sentencing court because counsel’s duty “is not discharged merely by conducting a limited investigation of these issues or by providing the sentencing court with a cursory or ‘abbreviated’ presentation of potentially mitigating factors.” Prejudice found because counsel presented a single witness to testify about adaptability to confinement and this evidence covered less than three pages of the transcript. The court rejected the “nexus requirement” applied by the District Court.

If evidence relating to life circumstances with no causal relationship to the crime were to be eliminated, significant aspects of a defendant’s disadvantaged background, emotional and mental problems, and adverse history, as well as his positive character traits, would not be considered, even though some of these factors, both positive and negative, might cause a sentencer to determine that a life sentence, rather than death at the hands of the state, is the appropriate punishment for the particular defendant. This is simply unacceptable in any capital sentencing proceeding, given that “treating each defendant in a capital case with that degree of respect due the uniqueness of the individual,” and determining whether or not he is deserving of execution only after taking his unique life circumstances, disabilities, and traits into account, is constitutionally required. Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 605, 98 S.Ct. 2954, 57 L.Ed.2d 973 (1978).

Prejudice established because counsel failed to even develop or argue the limited and unsubstantiated mitigating evidence that was before the court in the pre-sentence report and the state’s expert report. These documents included information that the defendant’s mother was “very strict” and hypochondriacal. In truth, she physically abused the defendant frequently and stayed in bed much of the time claiming to suffer from illnesses and was profoundly addicted to prescription drugs. She would even force the defendant to take Valium and sleeping pills when he acted up or had too much energy. The information before the court indicated that the defendant’s family moved frequently but did not “convey” the impact on the defendant in terms of his ability to form relationships or that he never attended any school for more than a year. The information before the court indicated that the defendant was raised in a lower-middle class family, when he grew up in extreme poverty. The family moved frequently because of his father’s struggle to maintain employment. The family often lived in homes with no running water or indoor plumbing and once had to live in a rat-infested house in which the walls and ceilings were lined with cardboard to block holes. The court had information about drug use but was not aware that drug and alcohol abuse were rampant in the defendant’s family or that it was his mother who first exposed him to drug abuse by forcing him to take sedatives when he was a child or that he used large quantities of drugs throughout his life and would stay awake for weeks at a time on methamphetamine. The defendant also likely suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder from his combat experience and abusive background, but even the state’s expert in post-conviction agreed that the defendant had a depressive disorder, which resulted in two suicide attempts, and had to be hospitalized at least once due to hallucinations. The state expert also agreed that the defendant has a personality disorder not otherwise specified with antisocial, borderline, and inadequate features, which “if properly developed and explained to the sentencer, would have had a mitigating effect under Arizona law.” Even the diagnosis of antisocial personality disorder given by the court-appointed examiner at trial, “is a mitigating factor under Arizona law.” Even though some mitigating evidence was before the court, prejudice was still clear.

We do not underestimate the importance of the role of counsel in the adversarial process. The sentencing judge cannot be expected to comb the record looking for mitigating factors, particularly where the minimal evidence that exists is buried in reports that are on the whole strongly unfavorable to the defendant.

Prejudice was especially clear since there was only one aggravating factor and Arizona law at the time of sentencing “mandated the death penalty” when one aggravating factor was present and no mitigation evidence was presented.

Anderson v. Sirmons, 476 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2007) (1997 trial and sentencing). Under AEDPA analysis, trial counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. Although the issue was first raised in federal habeas, the court found, under unique facts not relevant here, that exhaustion was excused and the issue was not procedurally barred because the state had not established regular and consistent application of a procedural bar. Because of these rulings and the state court's failure to address the merits, the court applied de novo review and cited repeatedly to the 1989 and 2003 ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel focused "almost exclusively on the guilt phase of his trial." Id. at 1143. While counsel had a mitigation investigator that investigator spent only 23 hours on the case, all of which was in the month prior to trial, did not interview the petitioner and "did not have access to life-history information, school records, or medical records." Counsel also did not have the petitioner evaluated by any mental health expert or other expert qualified to ascertain whether the petitioner "suffered from neurological or other deficits that would mitigate his moral culpability." Id. Although trial counsel did not provide an affidavit, the mitigation investigator's affidavit along with evidence that trial counsel's file contained no background records was sufficient to establish that the investigation of mitigation evidence was unreasonable. Prejudice established despite three "callous and brutal" murders, no residual doubt of guilt, three aggravating circumstances, and evidence the petitioner obtained drugs and a weapon and corresponded with his wife about "taking care" of witnesses while in pretrial confinement. Trial counsel had presented evidence only of petitioner's support of his family, that his mother was a "good woman," who loved him, and his daughter loved him and he could help her from prison. "Thus, rather than offering the jury a potential explanation for [the petitioner's] actions relating to the murders he participated in, trial counsel's case in mitigation was limited to a simple plea for mercy." Id. at 1144. This evidence "played into the prosecution's theory that the only explanation for the murders was that [the petitioner] was simply an 'evil' man." Id. at 1147. If counsel had adequately investigated the evidence would have established that the petitioner was raised in an environment of neglect and abuse; his mother and step-father were violent alcoholics, who battled before the children; his mother physically abused the children with anything at hand; his mother had numerous illicit affairs in the home that were known to the children; he suffered from brain damage and an IQ in the 70's, likely as a result of extensive drug and alcohol abuse begun as a child and numerous head injuries. "[T]his is just the kind of mitigation evidence trial counsel is obligated to investigate and develop as part of building an effective case in mitigation during the penalty phase of a trial." Id. at 1144.

2006: Outten v. Kearney*, 464 F.3d 401 (3rd Cir. 2006) (sentenced in March 1993). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The state presented evidence of the defendant's post criminal history, which was all non-violent offenses. The defense presented six people (four family members, a friend, and an ex-girlfriend, who was the mother of the defendant's children) to testify about general background and good guy evidence in mitigation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the "investigation was cursory" in that counsel only sent the defendant a letter asking for the names of "potential penalty phase witnesses" and had only limited discussions with the defendant and his mother. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy to focus on the defendant being a loving, generous, and non-violent person, who did not commit the crime, and to avoid negative information.

Simply stated, defense counsel's penalty-phase strategy was to argue to the jury-which had convicted Outten of murder unanimously and beyond a reasonable doubt-that he was a good guy and that his life should be spared because he was actually innocent.

The court found, however, that trial counsel did not “carry through this tack” because the trial court prohibited counsel from arguing actual innocence in sentencing. Trial counsel then changed tactics and stated explicitly that the defendant was guilty and had a “horrendous record.” Counsel never mentioned the defendant’s positive character traits. While counsel did mention the non-violent nature of the defendant’s prior convictions, this was undermined by the state’s cross of the mitigation witnesses about his assaults on various family members and his ex-girlfriend. Counsel’s “effort fell well short of the national prevailing professional standards articulated by the American Bar Association” in the 1989 ABA Guidelines. Counsel’s conduct was also unreasonable in light of “what they presumably discovered from the conversations” counsel had with the defendant and his mother. Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have established that the defendant’s alcoholic father was extremely physically and emotionally abusive to his children all of whom ultimately suffered from alcoholism and/or drug addiction. The defendant’s mother drank regularly while she was pregnant with him and was beaten by her husband. The defendant also had two serious head injuries that caused loss of consciousness as a child. He was placed in classes for the learning disabled at school. After the defendant ran away from home as a teenager to avoid his father’s abuse, he was placed in foster care where he was sexually abused by his foster mother. He was ultimately placed in a facility for troubled children where counselors noted that he was depressed and hopeless. As an adult, the defendant suffered two major losses due to the death of his father from cancer (and the defendant cared for him the last 6 months of his life despite the history of abuse) and the death of his child who lived only 14 days because of the mother’s drug use during pregnancy. The defendant also had a substantial history of alcohol and substance abuse beginning at age 10. Although counsel did present “some mitigating evidence” to the jury, “it does not follow that the jury was provided a comprehensive understanding” of the mitigation. “For example, while Outten’s mother portrayed her husband as a ‘very, very strict parent,’ she did not relate to the jury the disturbing abuse. . . .” The jury also heard nothing of the sexual abuse, possible neurological damage, learning disabilities, or low IQ. Prejudice was also clear due to the jury’s close vote in favor of death (7 to 5). Under AEDPA, the state court’s holding was an unreasonable application of Strickland on both prongs. With respect to sentencing it was unreasonable, in part, because the court found no prejudice because the background information also “contained some harmful information.”

Williams v. Anderson, 460 F.3d 789 (6th Cir. 2006) (tried in July 1984). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. Following the defendant’s conviction of hiring a person to commit the murder, counsel waived opening statement in sentencing and presented no evidence. The defendant made a brief statement and then counsel gave “a long, rambling closing, in which he arguably presented a case for residual doubt.” Id. at 794. The remainder of the closing argument included prejudicial statements by counsel. Appellate counsel asserted counsel’s ineffectiveness on direct appeal, which was denied due to the lack of any evidence outside the trial record. Post-conviction counsel asserted the issue with supporting evidence, but the post-conviction court was prohibited from granting relief under state law because the issue had been addressed on the merits during the direct appeal. The federal court determined that its review should be based on the direct appeal opinion. While the court would normally be prohibited from considering evidence not before the court at that time, the court found cause and prejudice for the default because appellate counsel was ineffective. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[i]t is well-established in Ohio law that where an ineffective assistance of counsel claim cannot be supported solely on the trial court record, it should not be brought on direct appeal." Id. at 800. Moreover, "[i]neffective assistance of counsel claims based on trial counsel's failure to investigate and present mitigation evidence can never be proven based solely on evidence in the record because the record necessarily does not contain evidence of prejudice." Id. Prejudice was established because the underlying claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel had merit when supported with evidence. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient in completely failing to investigate mitigation evidence. Counsel never even discussed the possibility of a court-ordered psychiatric evaluation and pre-sentence report with the defendant until two days prior to sentencing. He did not even discuss the issue with the defendant or with his family or friend. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy to focus only on residual doubt "because defense counsel never conducted an investigation into mitigation before deciding to pursue residual doubt." Id. at 804. The state court's determination that counsel's conduct was reasonable was "contrary to federal law as articulated in Strickland." Id. at 802. The state court did not address the question of prejudice so the federal court's review of this issue was de novo. Prejudice found because the available but unrepresented evidence included evidence of an alcoholic, abusive mother; abandonment by his father at a young age; an uncle, who was his primary male role model, that was a career criminal; cocaine dependence and cocaine induced paranoid fears at the time of the murder; a diagnosis of Dyssocial Reaction, Mixed Personality Disorder with Anti-social and Narcissistic Features; and that the defendant had treated his wife's autistic son like his own. "In addition to presenting the jury with mitigating evidence, the testimony of Petitioner's family and friends would have humanized Petitioner." Id. at 805.

Poindexter v. Mitchell, 454 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2006) (sentenced in June 1985). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. In sentencing, counsel presented the testimony of three family members and a friend. This testimony included the following information: (1) the petitioner was a good student, who was involved in gymnastics in school; (2) the petitioner was peaceful and quiet and kept to himself; and (3) the petitioner read the Bible a lot, worked, and got along with everyone. The petitioner also made an unsworn statement that began with describing his relationship with his former girlfriend, whose new boyfriend was the murder victim in this case and she had also been assaulted. He described an incident when he had slapped her for wearing an "obscene" miniskirt and said her mother had instigated everything because "she disliked dreadlocks." After that point, the petitioner refused to continue reading the prepared statement and a recess was taken. Counsel convinced him to continue reading "his" statement. He read the rest, which basically said he was a good guy and believed in God. At the end, "he yelled, 'And the main thing, I didn't kill that man,' and slammed the microphone down." Counsel's conduct was deficient.

[C]ounsel failed to conduct virtually any investigation, let alone sufficient investigation to make any strategic choices possible. They did not request medical, educational, or governmental records that would have given insight into [the petitioner's] background. They did not request funds to enlist a psychological or psychiatric expert to evaluate [the petitioner], despite the fact that he exhibited odd behavior. They did not consult with an investigator or mitigation specialist, who could have assisted in reconstructing [the petitioner's] social history. They failed to interview key family members and friends who could have described his upbringing. And they did not even begin to prepare for mitigation until [the petitioner] was convicted, which was only five days before the sentencing phase began. This was despite the fact that prevailing norms at the time of trial required counsel in a death penalty case to seek records, interview family members and friends, and obtain appropriate mental evaluations well in advance of trial.

Id. at _____. Counsel expressed no strategic reason. Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have established the following: (1) the petitioner's father beat him, his mother, and his sister; (2) the petitioner's mother was a heavy drinker, who used marijuana almost daily; and (e) the petitioner's mother neglected her children, beat them, and once tried to kill the whole family by shutting them in the house and turning on a gas stove. An expert in forensic psychology described the family as "very dysfunctional" with "four generations of alcoholism and physical abuse and emotional abuse." In addition to his mother's problems, the petitioner was exposed to the alcohol abuse and domestic violence she endured in two of her three significant relationships. She was ultimately hospitalized and her children placed in foster homes. The petitioner functioned in the borderline range of intelligence and suffers from a paranoid personality disorder. These crimes were caused by "his paranoid personality disorder" and "a pathological jealous reaction accompanied by rage." Because of this evidence "any mitigation strategy to portray [the petitioner] as a peaceful person was unreasonable since that strategy was the product of an incomplete investigation." Id. at _____.

Dickerson v. Bagley, 453 F.3d 690 (6th Cir. 2006) (tried in November 1985). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. The court quoted extensively from the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Defense Counsel in Death Penalty Cases in describing counsel's duties. Here, counsel failed to discover significant mitigation that included that the petitioner's biological father denied that petitioner was his son; his mother referred to him as "the moron"; he was raised in an atmosphere of pimps, prostitutes, and drug dealers; several homosexual advances were made upon him; he had a full-scale I.Q. of 77, placing him in the lower seven percent of cognitive ability; and he had a borderline personality disorder. The state court held that counsel had a strategic reason for the failure to investigate, because one of the three-judge panel had suggested to him waiver of the jury, which counsel took to mean that the judges would not impose death. This finding was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court case law because "[i]t is not reasonable to refuse to investigate when the investigator does not know the relevant facts the investigation will uncover."

Had the investigation been conducted, reasonable lawyers surely would not have limited the mitigation proof in this case to simply an effort to show only that [the petitioner] was “provoked” by jealousy [in killing his former girl-friend’s new lover] and could not control his impulses, and therefore suffered from “diminished capacity” at the time of the crime.

“Accordingly, the state court unreasonably applied clearly established Supreme Court precedent when it simply assumed that counsel’s oversights were motivated by strategy, instead of requiring a complete and thorough mitigation investigation as mandated by Strickland and its progeny.” Prejudice found because “[a]n argument based on reduced culpability similar to that given by the Supreme Court in Atkins might well have been persuasive in [this] case too.”

Frierson v. Woodford, 463 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2006) (crimes in 1978 and third trial in 1986). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in third capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation and for failing to challenge a significant mitigation witness’ invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to adequately investigate, even though “[t]he imperative to cast a wide net for all relevant mitigating evidence is heightened at a capital sentencing hearing.” Id. at 989. “[T]he reasonableness of counsel’s investigatory and preparatory work at the penalty phase should be examined in a different, more exacting, manner than other parts of the trial.” Id. at 993. Here, counsel did not review the prior sentencing transcripts, which would have revealed a thorough drug history by an expert, along with a series of psychiatric evaluations while the defendant was in the custody of the California Youth Authority (CYA). These records revealed symptoms of organic brain dysfunction. Counsel also did not obtain readily available school, hospital, prison, and juvenile records. These records revealed significant head injuries as a child that required hospitalization, an IQ score of 71, and a documented learning disability. Although counsel knew of the head injuries, he “ignored the red flag of possible brain damage caused by multiple childhood head injuries by failing to consult a neurologist, and instead relied on the lay opinion of [the defendant’s] parents” who saw no change in behavior following the injuries. Id. at 991. Counsel also claimed to have relied on the prior testimony of a forensic psychiatrist that there was no evidence of brain damage, but the “failure to consult with a neurologist—the only expert qualified to evaluate organic brain dysfunction caused by multiple childhood head trauma—[was] not ameliorated” on this basis, in part, because it was clear that counsel had not been aware of the prior testimony. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by “strategy” because “strategy presupposes investigation.” Id. at 992. Prejudice found because the omitted evidence, taken as a whole, might well have influenced the jury’s appraisal of the defendant’s moral culpability. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in adequately preparing and responding to the state’s evidence that the defendant had a juvenile adjudication for murder for which he was committed to CYA. Counsel presented several witnesses who testified that the defendant was not the shooter, but these witnesses lacked much credibility. Counsel then sought to present the testimony of the juvenile co-defendant that counsel believed to be the shooter but basically encouraged this witness to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights even though this witness had confessed to counsel and his investigator that he was, in fact, the shooter. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because, much like counsel in Rompilla, counsel failed to review the prior juvenile records, which would have disclosed that this witness had been tried and acquitted on this charge and thus could not assert the Fifth Amendment privilege because double jeopardy barred trying him again for this murder. Prejudice was also established for this error because this prior homicide was “the central focus of the penalty hearing” and the prosecution’s closing argument. Had the jury heard testimony that the co-defendant confessed to the murder rather than a simple invocation of his Fifth Amendment rights there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have struck a different balance in the outcome.

Hovey v. Ayers, 458 F.3d 892 (9th Cir. 2006) (tried in 1982). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mental health evidence during the trial, where a finding of premeditation was required before the petitioner was eligible for the death penalty, and sentencing. In exchange for the exclusion of other unrelated charges, the petitioner stipulated his guilt with the exception of the intent element. Early in the trial, the court convened a two-day hearing because of the court’s concerns about primary counsel’s competence. The court found him competent, but no one even informed the petitioner about this hearing. Following his conviction with a finding of premeditation, the defense presented eighteen witnesses, including twelve friends and three family members, who described him as a well-meaning and introspective young man from an unexceptional middle-class family. He attended college and had been living at home and working sporadically at the time of the murder. Witnesses described his behavior in the months leading up to his crimes as increasingly eccentric. The primary defense witness, a psychiatrist, testified (primarily just on his interviews with the petitioner) that the petitioner suffers from schizophrenia, which caused him to lose control and kill the victim. Counsel’s conduct was deficient.

A defense attorney in the sentencing phase of a capital trial has “a professional responsibility to investigate and bring to the attention of mental health experts who are examining his client[] facts that the experts do not request.” Regardless of whether a defense expert requests specific information relevant to a defendant’s background, it is defense counsel’s “duty to seek out such evidence and bring it to the attention of the experts.”

Id. at 925 (citations omitted). While the petitioner’s mental health was the “heart” of the mitigation case, this evidence came almost exclusively through the testimony of the psychiatrist. Counsel had not provided the psychiatrist with relevant background information, including records from the petitioner’s hospitalization a year before these crimes due to what doctors initially believed was an acute “catatonic” schizophrenic episode. These records “would have strengthened” and “confirmed” the psychiatrist’s diagnosis and “corroborated [his] testimony and bolstered the credibility of his response to the prosecution, whose primary strategy in attacking [the psychiatrist] was to suggest that [the petitioner] had never suffered from mental illness.” Id. at 926. Without these records, the psychiatrist testified in cross-examination that he was not aware of the petitioner receiving any treatment or diagnosis prior to his arrest. The prosecution focused on the lack of support for the doctor’s testimony in closing arguments in sentencing. “The prosecutor’s closing argument, in combination with [the psychiatrist’s] ignorance of [petitioner’s] experience [in his prior hospitalization], strongly suggested that the defense had concocted the mitigating mental illness evidence.” Id. at 927. Prejudice found because “[t]his evidence, coming as it did from doctors who had no connection to the defense or incentive to invent a diagnosis and thus who were invulnerable to charges of fabrication, could very well have made the difference in a life as opposed to death verdict.” Id. Moreover, even though the prior doctors ultimately concluded that the petitioner suffered from “drug-induced psychosis,” this was based on his own statements that were not confirmed by blood tests. Regardless of the diagnosis, he “displayed symptoms consistent with” the defense expert’s diagnosis and the initial diagnosis of the prior doctors of an “acute schizophrenic episode.” “[A]ll potentially mitigating evidence is relevant at the sentencing phase of a death case, so ... mental problems may help even if they don’t rise to a specific, technically-defined level.” Id. at 928 (citation omitted). Finally, during deliberations, the jury specifically asked that the defense expert’s “testimony be re-read, suggesting that the jury placed importance on it.” Id. Counsel also failed to provide the psychiatrist “with important information about the circumstances surrounding” a kidnapping that occurred after these crimes.

This information would have prevented the prosecutor from portraying [the psychiatrist] as ill-prepared and foolish and thereby impugning his medical conclusions. Because [the psychiatrist] was not adequately prepared, the prosecution was able to demonstrate that [he] was completely ignorant of several important facts, including that [the petitioner] was regularly and successfully attending a training school at the time of [this] murder, that [the petitioner] altered his appearance after [this] murder and before the [separate] kidnapping, and that [the petitioner] released [the kidnapping victim] only after being discovered and pursued by two witnesses to his crime.

Id. The prosecution also focused on the doctor’s ignorance of these facts in closing arguments. Prejudice found because “there is a reasonable probability that [the psychiatrist’s] ignorance of basic background facts related to the [separate] kidnapping affected the jury’s sentencing decision.”

The clear implication of the prosecution’s argument was that [the psychiatrist] was uninformed about the subject of his diagnosis and that his conclusions stemmed from a general misunderstanding of the facts. Even if the background information did not change [his] diagnosis, he at least would have been able to testify more knowledgeably about the case and better weather the prosecution’s attempts to discredit him. He would have been able to anticipate the prosecution’s questions during cross-examination and explain how [the petitioner’s] activities around the time of the offense could be consistent with a diagnosis of schizophrenia. Instead, [the psychiatrist] was caught by surprise, in an embarrassed and vulnerable situation. He was entirely discredited by his lack of critical information, information that lay in the hands of [petitioner’s] counsel.

Id. at 929. In a footnote, the court addressed additional prejudice due to counsel’s failure to provide the psychiatrist with a probation report after he plead guilty to the separate kidnapping and with hospital records from post-arrest hospitalizations. While these documents reflected diagnoses of schizoid personality rather than schizophrenia, they also contained observations by medical professions, “including descriptions of his delusions and grandiose ideas that are consistent with [the psychiatrist's] observations and diagnosis." In short, whatever the precise diagnosis, medical professionals repeatedly had concluded that [the petitioner] was seriously mentally disturbed."

2005: Marshall v. Cathel*, 428 F.3d 452 (3rd Cir. 2005) (affirming 313 F. Supp. 2d 423 (D.N.J. 2004)), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1035 (2006) (tried in March 1986). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence, failing to seek a continuance to do so, failing to adequately consult with the defendant concerning his options and the procedure in the sentencing proceeding, and did not even make a plea for his client's life. Following conviction for hiring someone to murder his wife, the defendant proceeded immediately to sentencing after being checked at the hospital after fainting following his conviction. Counsel had not prepared at all for the penalty phase and had not investigated at all on this front or retained any experts. Nonetheless, counsel did not request a continuance to prepare. Instead, counsel "agreed" with the prosecutor that both sides would waive opening and would not present evidence in sentencing and would only do a short closing argument. The state also dismissed two of the three aggravating factors charged and stipulated a single mitigating factor—that the defendant did not have a prior criminal record. Analyzing the case under AEDPA, the court found that counsel's conduct was deficient because "the lack of preparation is striking and inexplicable," id. at 466, "in light of his knowledge from the inception that the case would be a capital one and that his client faced powerful State's evidence," id. at 472. While the defendant was a "difficult client to control" and the community, and perhaps his family, had turned against him, "neither circumstance excuses counsel's failure to conduct any investigation into possibly mitigating factors or prepare a case for life." Id. at 467. Counsel also failed to adequately consult with the defendant and did not even explain to him that he "had the right to allocute at the penalty phase." The defendant's failure to cooperate with the preparation of mitigation does nothing to relieve counsel "of his constitutional duty as an attorney."¹ "Widely accepted national guidelines, state specific standards, and [counsel's] own testimony regarding his previous capital experience—all of which aid in our evaluation of the reasonableness of [counsel's] preparation—make clear that [counsel] understood but abdicated his responsibility as counsel to a client facing a possible death sentence." Id. at 467 (citing the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice).

Regardless of counsel's trial strategy of denying guilt, "[w]ith the outright rejection of [the] defense, which is the only way the guilty verdict can be interpreted, [counsel]

Even when clients strongly assert their innocence and refuse to discuss the possibility of being found guilty, an attorney must find a way to prepare for and investigate a mitigation case. . . . No matter how difficult, [counsel] had an obligation either to convince [the defendant] to cooperate with him in preparing a case for life, or to find a way to conduct an investigation without [the defendant's] assistance.

Marshall v. Hendricks, 313 F. Supp. 2d 423, 451 (D.N.J. 2004).

Capital Case*

knew that the jury also had rejected the character evidence submitted in support of that defense. Indeed, it would only be fair to assume that they had found [the defendant] to be a liar and a despicable person for paying someone to have his wife killed. [Counsel's] clear duty at that point was to shift his focus away from absolving [the defendant] of involvement in his wife's murder—certainly, the evidence for the guilt phase had not worked for that purpose—to saving his life.

Id. at 469. Counsel's most glaring omission was failing to interview the defendant's sons even though he believed they would be hostile to the defendant. "[C]ounsel's 'beliefs' are not a substitute for informed strategy." Id. at 471. The court also viewed counsel's "agreement" with the state as an "abdication of his role." Id. at 472. Counsel "was not merely agreeing to hold back on the production of evidence—he had no evidence to introduce. . . . Far from a strategic, bargained-for exchange, the agreement appears to have been the only option." Id. While counsel argued that the defendant was a law abiding citizen with no significant history of prior criminal activity, these are "relatively insignificant aspects—essentially applicable to any and every first time offender of a brutal crime—that are anything but 'humanizing.'" Id. at 473. Counsel's presentation was only a "bland emotionless argument." Prejudice was found because the general character testimony presented during the trial was only general, "cursory" information. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy. "Rather, it is a situation where [counsel] inadequately prepared for the penalty phase and put in no mitigating evidence because he had none to present." Likewise, counsel only gave a "verbal shrug of the shoulders" in arguments and did not even make a plea for mercy. Prejudice was found because an adequate investigation would have revealed numerous family members and friends willing to ask for mercy and to testify about the harmful impact of execution on the defendant's family, particularly his son. The state court's finding of no prejudice was an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Harries v. Bell, 417 F.3d 631 (6th Cir. 2005) (tried in 1981). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to prepare and present evidence in mitigation in case analyzed under pre-AEDPA standards. Despite the requirements of the ABA Guidelines to investigate "to discover all reasonably available mitigating evidence," id. 638 (quoting ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases § 11.4.1(c), p. 93 (1989)), counsel limited their investigation to a few phone calls with family members, sending requests for information to some of the institutions in which the petitioner had been confined, and interviewing the defendant, his co-defendant, and two state witnesses. While the petitioner had requested that counsel not pursue mental illness as a defense and counsel believed that background evidence "would not persuade the jury," counsel's conduct was unreasonable because "defendant resistance to disclosure of information does not excuse counsel's duty to independently investigate." Id. at 639 (quoting Coleman v. Mitchell, 268 F.3d 417, 449-50 (6th Cir. 2001)). Counsel's conduct was also deficient because counsel was aware of the defendant's poor mental health and troubled family background, which left "no 'room for debate'" that their truncated investigation was deficient. Id. at 639 (quoting Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, ____ (2005)). Prejudice was found because adequate investigation would have revealed a traumatic childhood, involving physical abuse by petitioner's mother, stepfather, and grandmother. He had been hit on the head with a frying pan and choked so severely, at age 11, that his eyes hemorrhaged. A year later, staff at a detention home noted multiple traumatic scars on his head. He was also exposed to his father and stepfather beating his mother and both his father and stepfather had ultimately been murdered themselves. Since age 11, he spent all of his life, except a combined total of 36 months, combined in institutions, many of which were violent or unsanitary. He had also had numerous head injuries and had attempted suicide and suffered carbon monoxide poisoning at age 20. He had frontal lobe damage, even according to the state's experts, which "can result from head injuries and can interfere with a person's judgment and decrease a person's ability to control impulses." Id. at 640. He also suffered from a mental disorder although the exact diagnoses ranged from bipolar mood disorder, trauma-induced anxiety, anxiety disorder, post-traumatic stress disorder, and antisocial personality disorder. "This evidence adds up to a mitigation case that bears no relation to the few naked pleas for mercy actually put before the jury." Id. (quoting Rompilla, 125 S. Ct. at 2469). While the State argued that admission of this evidence would have opened the door to evidence of numerous prior criminal acts, Tennessee law prohibited this evidence. Even if it was admissible, however, prejudice was still found because the petitioner in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 396 (2000), "had a criminal history . . . at least as serious" as the petitioner's and the Court still found prejudice. Id. at 641. Tennessee law also supported a finding of prejudice because counsel's failure to present mitigation evidence left the jury with no choice but to impose the death penalty.

Summerlin v. Schriro, 427 F.3d 623 (9th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 547 U.S. 1097 (2006) (sentencing in July 1982). Counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to prepare and present mitigation evidence. Analyzing the case under pre- AEDPA law, the court held that counsel "utterly failed" to investigate the defendant's family and social history or to develop a mental health defense. Counsel instead relied "on the limited information developed in [the defendant's] pre-trial competency examination, which was prepared for an entirely different purpose" than mitigation. Id. at 631. Counsel did so even though he was aware of the "preliminary mental health information" from the defendant's prior counsel. He even failed to interview the state's experts even though counsel knew the state intended to call these experts in sentencing. During the month between the trial and sentencing hearing, counsel did not meet with his client. In sentencing, counsel sought only to present testimony of consulting psychiatrist retained by the defendant's prior counsel. Before this witness was sworn, the defendant interrupted and apparently requested that the witness not be called so the defense presented no testimony.

Even if [the defendant] had instructed counsel not to present a mitigation defense, that fact would have no effect on the deficient conduct prong of Strickland because counsel had already demonstrated ineffectiveness by failing to thoroughly investigate the existence of mitigating factors. Although the allocation of control between attorney and client typically dictate that 'the client decides the 'ends' of the lawsuit while the attorney controls the 'means,'" it does not relieve an attorney of the duty to investigate potential defenses, consult with the client, and provide advice as to the risks and potential consequences of any fundamental trial decision within the client's control.

Capital Case*

Id. at 638 (citation omitted). The court stated that “[t]his is especially true in capital cases.” Id. (citing the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice and ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases). Prejudice found even in the “context of judge-sentencing.” If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have shown a “tortured family history” in which the defendant’s father deserted him and was later killed in a police shootout and the defendant’s alcoholic mother beat him frequently and punished him by locking him in a room with ammonia fumes. He had electric shock treatments, at his mother’s behest, to control his temper. He had a learning disability that left “him functionally mentally retarded.” He had also been diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic and had been treated with anti-psychotic medications. He also had a temporal lobe seizure disorder and there were indications of organic brain syndrome and impaired impulse control. Instead of developing and presenting this evidence, counsel presented no evidence in sentencing and only asked the court to consider a report attached to the presentencing report. Counsel’s argument covered only three pages of transcript. In addition to failing to present mitigation evidence, counsel also failed to present evidence mitigating one of the statutory aggravating circumstances (a prior violent felony conviction). The defendant’s prior aggravated assault conviction was a result of the defendant showing a pocket knife to the driver of a car that veered off the road, jumped the curb, and struck the defendant’s wife causing serious injuries that required hospitalization. The knife was pulled at the scene, but the driver was not physically injured. Counsel knew of this information because he had represented the defendant on this prior assault but still did not present this information. Finally, counsel also failed to object to the presentence report prepared by a probation officer that contained numerous sentencing recommendations from the probation officer, the victim’s family and friends, police officers, and others. All of this material was hearsay and inadmissible and almost all was damaging to the defendant. Instead of objecting, counsel made it worse by requesting that the court review a report attached to it. Counsel’s failure to present mitigation “all but assured the imposition of a death sentence” under state law that mandated death if there was a qualifying prior conviction and no mitigation. The court also found that this “was not by any means a clear-cut death penalty case” because the initial very experienced prosecutor did not believe he could get a death sentence and offered to allow the defendant to plead to second-degree murder for a 21 year sentence that would have allowed the defendant’s release in 14 years. (This offer was withdrawn when the initial prosecutor and defense counsel were replaced.)

2004: Smith v. Mullin*, 379 F.3d 919 (10th Cir. 2004) (trial in October 1994). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel’s conduct during the trial was “troubling” but the court found no prejudice in light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt and disposed of these claims on that basis. In addressing the right to effective assistance in sentencing—“the most critical phase of a death penalty case,” id. at 939—the court declared:

[W]e are particularly vigilant in guarding this right when the defendant faces a sentence of death. Our heightened attention parallels the heightened demands on counsel in a capital case. See ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4-1.2(c) (3d ed. 1993) (“Since the death penalty differs from other criminal penalties in its finality, defense counsel in a capital case should respond to this difference by making extraordinary efforts on behalf of the accused.”).

Id. at 938-39 (other internal citations omitted). Here, counsel had no experience or training in capital cases and inadequate funding from the defendant’s family. In addition, while counsel presented some mental health evidence during the trial, it was done in an “incoherent and haphazard” way. Id. at 929. Counsel did not present any additional mental health evidence during sentencing because counsel was unaware that he could do so. Counsel presented only on a few witnesses to testify that the defendant was kind and considerate but “made no attempt to explain how this kind and considerate person could commit such a horrendous crime, although mental health evidence providing such an explanation was at his fingertips.” Id. at 939-40. The evidence in mitigation was “pitifully incomplete, and in some respects, bordered on the absurd.” Id. at 944. Counsel’s arguments concerning the trial mental health evidence in sentencing also “were at best belittling of the evidence and at worst damning” of the defendant. If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have established that the defendant was completely illiterate, mentally retarded or borderline mentally retarded, and had significant brain damage due to a near drowning and lack of oxygen to the brain when the defendant was quite young. The defendant had been taunted, tormented, and then beaten in school to the extent that the defendant’s mother kept him home for an entire year. He also had an unstable home and had been abused by an aunt charged with his care.

The Supreme Court has, time and again, cited “the standards for capital defense work articulated by the American Bar Association (ABA) . . . as ‘guides to determining what is reasonable’” performance. Those standards repeatedly reference mental health evidence, describing it as “of vital importance to the jury’s decision at the punishment phase.” See ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Defense Counsel in Death Penalty Cases 1.1, 4.1, 10.4, 10.7, 10.11. It was patently unreasonable for [counsel] to omit this evidence from his case for mitigation.”

Id. at 942 (other internal citations omitted). Prejudice found because the mitigating evidence omitted in this case “is exactly the sort of evidence that garners the most sympathy from jurors,” according to “available empirical evidence as to juror attitudes.” Id. at 942. This evidence could have provided the “explanation” of how a “kind-hearted person” could commit these crimes because the “organic brain damage caused these outbursts of violence.” Id. at 943.

2003: *Lewis v. Dretke, 355 F.3d. 364 (5th Cir. 2003) (sentencing in May 1987). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of the petitioner’s abusive childhood. Applying pre-AEDPA law, the court gave no deference to the state court’s resolution of the claims because the state court did not make any factual findings. Under Wiggins, “[a] limited investigation into mitigating evidence may be reasonable only if counsel has a basis for believing that further investigation would be counterproductive or fruitless.” Id. at 367. Here, counsel’s performance was deficient. While the record was limited by counsel’s hazy memories and the fact that neither counsel had their file from the trial conducted 14 years before, the petitioner’s sisters testified credibly that counsel had never interviewed any of them. Nothing in counsel’s testimony indicated a tactical decision for failure to do so. Although the district court found the sisters' testimony was not credible, the Fifth Circuit rejected this finding because the testimony of the sisters was remarkably consistent in that each testified that their father beat them all with extension cords, switches, sticks, or anything else within his reach and that he regularly made them undress and whipped them in their genital areas. The court also found that there was corroborating evidence in the records, which revealed that the defendant's father was a violent drug abuser who shot the defendant's mother, almost killing her; and that he beat the defendant's mother on numerous occasions in front of the children. Medical records also establish that the children made numerous trips to the hospital emergency room for treatment of injuries consistent with the described beatings. The defendant had been hospitalized for cuts on his penis and his sister had been hospitalized for severe burns on her back. The defendant's mother had been hospitalized for a gunshot wound. There was also evidence of numerous domestic disturbance calls to the home. Prejudice was found even though the defendant's grandmother testified that the defendant had been abused. "[H]er conclusional testimony contained none of the details provided by Lewis' siblings at the habeas hearing, which could have been truly beneficial. [Her] skeletal testimony concerning the abuse of her grandson was wholly inadequate to present to the jury a true picture of the tortured childhood experienced by Lewis." Id. at 368. "[H]ad this evidence [of Petitioner's abuse] been presented, it is quite likely that it would have affected the sentencing decision of at least one juror." Id. at 369. The district court found that the testimony would have been inadmissible or given little weight due to the elapsed time between the child abuse and the crimes and the fact that the defendant had intervening criminal convictions, but this finding was erroneous. Mitigating evidence was considered in both Williams v. Taylor and Wiggins despite the elapsed time in both cases and the defendant in Williams had many intervening criminal convictions. "The district court's conclusion regarding the temporal nexus requirement was therefore erroneous." Id.

Hamblin v. Mitchell, 354 F.3d 482 (6th Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 925 (2004) (sentenced in April 1983). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel did not attempt to obtain any family history or any facts concerning the defendant's psychological background and mental illness and counsel did not seek any advice or expert consultation. Despite a large body of mitigating evidence, counsel did nothing to discover what was available or introduce it in evidence. Analyzing the case under pre-AEDPA standards, the court held:

the Wiggins case now stands for the proposition that the ABA standards for counsel in death penalty cases provide the guiding rules and standards to be used in defining the "prevailing professional norms" in ineffective assistance cases. This principle adds clarity, detail, and content to the more generalized and indefinite 20-year-old language of Strickland.

Id. at 486. Even though Hamblin was tried before the 1989 ABA standards were published, the Court held:

Capital Case*

The standards merely represent the codification of long-standing, common-sense principles of representation understood by diligent, competent counsel in death penalty cases. The ABA standards are not aspirational in the sense that they represent norms newly discovered after Strickland. They are the same type of longstanding norms referred to in Strickland in 1984 as “prevailing professional norms” as “guided” by “American Bar Association standards and the like.”

Id. at 487. The court also held:

New ABA Guidelines adopted in 2003 simply explain in greater detail than the 1989 Guidelines the obligations of counsel to investigate mitigating evidence. The 2003 ABA Guidelines do not depart in principle or concept from Strickland, Wiggins, or our court’s previous cases concerning counsel’s obligation to investigate mitigation circumstances.

Id. While the court recognized that it was required to measure counsel’s performance against the prevailing standards at the time of trial,

We cite the 1989 and 2003 ABA guidelines simply because they are the clearest exposition of counsel’s duties at the penalty phase of a capital case, duties that were recognized by this court as applicable to the 1982 trial of the defendant in Glenn v. Tate. . . .

Id. at 488. The district court held that counsel had a strategic reason for the failure to investigate and to rely instead on a residual doubt theory in sentencing (which has since been rejected by the Ohio Supreme Court as an improper mitigating factor). Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel did not prepare in any way until after the guilty verdict. Counsel only interviewed the mother of Hamblin’s daughter. Counsel did not gather any medical information, including psychological information, in part, because counsel believed that the only mental condition relevant was the defendant’s competence to stand trial. In sentencing, the mother of the defendant’s daughter testified only that the defendant had a good relationship with his child. She had nothing else positive to say and did not want to testify. The only other mitigation was a relatively short rambling, almost incoherent, unsworn statement by the defendant explaining his background. Counsel did nothing to prepare the defendant in giving this statement. The only explanation for the failure to prepare was that counsel believed the case would plead out and not go to trial. While the district court found a strategy because counsel would have uncovered harmful evidence and because the defendant expressed that he did not want to present evidence in mitigation; the Sixth Circuit rejected these findings because counsel does not know what an investigation will reveal is no reason not to conduct the investigation. Counsel was obligated to find out the facts not to guess or assume or suppose some facts may be adverse.

Id. at 492. Likewise, the court observed that

Capital Case*

ABA and judicial standards do not permit the court to excuse counsel's failure to investigate or prepare because the defendant so requested. . . . The Guidelines state that "the investigation regarding penalty should be conducted regardless of any statement by the client that evidence bearing upon penalty is not to be collected or presented," because [c]ounsel cannot responsibly advise a client about the merits of different courses of action, the client cannot make informed decisions, and counsel cannot be sure of the clients competency to make such decisions, unless counsel has first conducted a thorough investigation. . . .

Id. (citing the 2003 ABA guidelines). Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately investigated and presented mitigation, the evidence would have shown Hamblin's unstable and deprived childhood in which he grew up in extreme poverty and neglect surrounded by family violence and instability. He had a poor education and likely suffered from a mental disability or disorder. Hamblin's father was violent and beat his wife regularly. He ran a still and was arrested for public intoxication, manufacture of moonshine, and child neglect. Hamblin's mother often abandoned her children, leaving them to fend for themselves, and she at times resorted to prostitution. Hamblin tried to provide for himself and his younger sister by stealing food as a very young child. He started getting in trouble with the law as a teenager and left home at 13 the first time and left permanently at 16. He started showing signs of mental disorder when he was a teenager, probably resulting from his poor family situation and possibly from a severe blow to the head at age 8 inflicted by his father with a dog chain. His mother also had a severe infection while pregnant with him as a result of being stabbed by the defendant's father. In light of the "substantial evidence of a childhood in which abuse, neglect, violence and hunger were common," id. at 493, the court was convinced that had the available evidence been presented "at least one juror would have voted against the death penalty," id. Note: In Bobby v. Van Hook, 558 U.S. 4, 17 (2009) (per curiam), the Supreme Court ruled it had been error for the Sixth Circuit in that case to have judged trial counsel's "conduct in the 1980's on the basis of [the] 2003 [ABA] Guidelines — without even pausing to consider whether they reflected the prevailing professional practice at the time of the trial" and in treating the Guidelines as "not merely as evidence of what reasonably diligent attorneys would do, but as inexorable commands with which all capital defense counsel 'must fully comply.'" (Internal citations omitted.)

Frazier v. Huffman, 343 F.3d 780, supplemented on denial of rehearing, 348 F.3d 174 (6th Cir.2003) (tried in August 1991). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to prepare and present mitigation evidence concerning a brain injury and a lack of impulse control that reasonably was a result of that injury. The defendant had been charged with killing his stepdaughter after she filed sexual assault charges against him in state court. During trial, the defense theory was one of innocence and the defense presented no evidence. In sentencing, the state had already proven the aggravating circumstances and state law required the jury to weigh aggravating and mitigating circumstances, but the defense presented no evidence, relying instead only on the defendant's brief statement to the jury in which he denied guilt, but asked for mercy. The court found that defense counsel was aware from a review of records about the brain injury and that there could be no reasonable trial strategy that would justify failing to investigate and present evidence of the brain impairment and instead rely exclusively on the hope that the jury would spare the defendant's life due to doubt about guilt. The court also noted that residual doubt is not a mitigating factor under Ohio law. The defendant "had everything to gain and nothing to lose by introducing evidence of his brain injury in the penalty phase of the case. Yet they sat on their hands." In analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court's determination that counsel had performed in a competent manner was not simply erroneous but unreasonable. The court also found prejudice because evidence of the brain injury could easily have been used by counsel to argue a scenario where the defendant did not intend to kill the victim and did so only due to the impulsively and stress. The state court's conclusion that counsel was effective was found to be an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent.

3. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: *Leonard v. Gittere, 686 F.Supp.3d 1083 (D. Nev. Aug. 10, 2023), appeal pending, 24-752 (9th Cir.). In prison killing case where evidence of prior killings by Leonard and other acts of violence in custody was presented in aggravation, trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase of the trial for failing to investigate and present evidence of Leonard's traumatic upbringing and to present expert testimony to explain the impact of Leonard's childhood traumas, addictions, and medical problems. (Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, Leonard overcame the default through Martinez.) The new mitigation evidence "would have better portrayed Leonard's turbulent childhood, detailed the obstacles Leonard faced as a child and adolescent, and presented his family's issues and their effect on Leonard." Although expert testimony had been presented at Leonard's trial, Leonard's supplemental expert evidence would have provided a more detailed, concrete picture of Leonard as an individual, for example: (1) instead of indicating that Leonard may have had brain damage, the supplemental evidence would have affirmatively demonstrated that he had brain damage, (2) instead of indicating that Leonard suffered from general mental illness as a child, the supplemental evidence would have specified that Leonard suffered from posttraumatic stress disorder as a child leading to a dissociative disorder as an adult, and (3) instead of generic information concerning Leonard's substance abuse, the supplemental evidence would have explained Leonard's addiction and his brain's dysfunction surrounding that addiction.

The inexperience of and lack of preparation by Leonard's trial attorneys provided context for their deficient performance in failing to investigate and present "concrete, detailed, illustrative evidence to the jury to provide clarity on Leonard's background and behavior." Regarding prejudice, although the supplemental mitigation evidence would not have excused the three killings committed by Leonard, "it would have provided the jury with an accurate lens with which to view Leonard's behavior and those killings.” Further, the “likely shift in awareness of Leonard’s cognitive hardships” through presentation of the supplemental mitigation “is especially notable when combined with the fact that the jury should have been informed that mitigation circumstances did not have to be found unanimously”

As such, in reweighing the evidence in aggravation, although violent and inexcusable, against the totality of the available mitigating evidence, including Leonard’s supplemental expert evidence and supplemental upbringing mitigation evidence, which would have contextualized the aggravation evidence, the Court finds that the evidence in mitigation counterbalances and sufficiently eclipses the aggravation evidence.

2022: *Maples v. Dunn, 582 F.Supp.3d 1040 (N.D. Ala. 2022) (1997 trial and penalty phase). In double murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. (In a prior appeal, the Eleventh Circuit determined that the state habeas court’s denial of the claim was unreasonable, allowing for de novo review by the federal court. Additionally, although the claim was procedurally defaulted, abandonment by state habeas counsel at the state appellate level provided cause to overcome the default.) Trial counsel failed to contact the numerous mitigation witnesses who testified on his behalf at the federal evidentiary hearing and who stated that they were available and willing to testify at the time of trial. Trial counsel also failed to obtain petitioner’s education records. And although trial counsel did subpoena petitioner’s medical records and provide them to the forensic psychologist who testified on petitioner’s behalf at the sentencing phase, trial counsel failed to “take certain steps that would have allowed [the expert] to perform a more thorough assessment,” e.g., asking the expert about the reports of petitioner’s suicidality and depression that were mentioned in the records and having the expert meet with members of petitioner’s family. Without additional information, the expert was able to offer only limited insight about the impact on petitioner of his mother’s abandonment. At the federal evidentiary hearing, experts provided details about how the mother’s abandonment and a second rejection of petitioner affected his emotional development. Although it was doubtful that the trial judge in 1997 would have allowed all three of the experts petitioner called at the federal evidentiary hearing to testify at trial, “had counsel adequately prepared [the trial expert] and provided him with and pointed him to crucial mitigation evidence, [the trial expert] could have recognized, understood, and explained the adverse impact [petitioner’s] troubled background had on [petitioner’s] mental health without the need for additional experts.” In sum, trial counsel’s failure to broaden the scope of the mitigation investigation was unreasonable under prevailing professional norms in that trial counsel, who had never previously participated in a capital penalty trial: (1) concluded the mitigation investigation after only briefly speaking to petitioner’s father, stepmother, and the forensic psychologist, “declining without reason to interview any of [petitioner’s] extended family”; (2) failed to request education records; (3) failed to further investigate evidence of petitioner’s suicidality and depression, and (4) failed to provide the forensic psychologist with crucial resources and oversight. Although trial counsel professed that the strategy was to humanize petitioner, “[c]ounsel failed to thoroughly investigate several aspects of [petitioner’s] life that would have humanized him for the jury, including his struggles with depression and suicidality and the abuse and abandonment [petitioner] suffered at the hands of his mother.” Defense counsel also explained that the decision to limit the witnesses regarding petitioner’s good character was strategic. Because the murders occurred in a small community where everyone knew each other, counsel was concerned about opening the door to victim impact testimony. While this strategy was reasonable as to some potential witnesses, such as school officials and coaches, it was not reasonable concerning family members and some mutual friends. And while trial counsel claimed that he wanted to avoid discrediting helpful witnesses by calling other witnesses who had knowledge of prior bad acts by petitioner, this was unreasonable insofar as counsel failed to interview the other witnesses to determine whether their testimony would lead to issues trial counsel wanted to avoid. While valid bases for not calling some of the witnesses were revealed at the federal hearing, this was not true for all of them, something counsel would have discovered during a reasonable investigation. In assessing prejudice, the district court gave mitigating weight to evidence about petitioner’s mother’s abusive and erratic behavior. Although the State could have responded with evidence explaining the mother’s behavior in more sympathetic terms, this did not serve to negate the mitigating value of the evidence as “the jury would not have blamed [petitioner], who was younger than three at the time, for the difficult circumstances that may have caused [his mother’s] violent outbursts.” Also considered in the prejudice analysis was the evidence that petitioner’s mother had abandoned him on more than one occasion and the impact it had on him. And there was evidence of many positive, humanizing relationships that petitioner had with family and friends. With the record developed, the district court agreed with the observation by the Eleventh Circuit, which had been based on petitioner’s allegations, that the mitigation evidence that was heard by the jury presented petitioner “as someone who was abused as a child but suffered no real continuing effects from the abuse, got mixed up with drugs as an adult, and made bad decisions solely as a result of his drug addiction.” (Citation omitted.) The district court further agreed with the Eleventh Circuit’s pre-remand statement that “the totality of the mitigation evidence paints a different picture of [petitioner] as someone with life-threatening mental health issues who has experienced lasting, ongoing trauma due to his birth mother’s abuse and rejection, and who, despite such issues, tried to lead a productive life.” (Citation omitted.) The new evidence was not “merely cumulative” of what the jury heard. And even if some was cumulative “in a sense,” it was considerably more detailed and substantial than what was presented at trial. What was cumulative was some of the negative information that came out during presentation of new mitigation that the State attempted to discount as “double-edged.” Notable to the district court “was the sheer volume of new witnesses willing to testify on [petitioner’s] behalf, which included [petitioner’s] aunts, uncles, cousins, and friends from different eras of his life.” Although some of their testimony overlapped, the volume of the testimony was a consideration in assessing prejudice. Additional considerations in the finding of prejudice were the fact that two jurors voted for life at the original sentencing despite the meager case in mitigation and that the aggravation was limited in the case, with the sole statutory aggravating factor of robbery-murder being found by the trial court. NOTE: Cory Maples was retried and the jury returned a sentence of life without the possibility of parole. 2021: Flowers v. Dunn*, 2021 WL 136416 (M.D. Ala. Jan. 13, 2021) (1998 trial and sentencing). In Alabama death penalty case where petitioner, who had a prior murder conviction, killed a co-worker, trial counsel were ineffective in failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence. Because the state courts failed to address the claim, it is evaluated de novo. The jury convicted petitioner of the capital offense after only twelve minutes of deliberations and the penalty phase began immediately thereafter, without a recess. The case in mitigation consisted of petitioner's older brother, whose testimony took up a mere "six-and-one-half typed, double-spaced pages," with less than a single page of redirect examination. That same day, the jury returned a 10-2 recommendation for a death sentence. Following a sentencing hearing that covered five double-spaced pages of text, the trial court sentenced petitioner to death. In finding trial counsel's performance deficient, the district court observed that it was incumbent on trial counsel to investigate petitioner's background and that "[s]uch an investigation would necessarily have included a review of his educational, medical, and criminal history records, his family and social history, and any other avenues for potential mitigating evidence that might arise during the investigation." Here, however, lead counsel "shirked his duty to investigate for mitigating evidence." The attorney who became second-chair counsel fewer than three weeks prior to trial did not similarly abandon his duty, "but he was simply too late to the table and had no time to conduct any meaningful investigation for mitigating evidence." As for what could and should have been developed, state post-conviction counsel presented "a plethora of mitigating evidence at the Rule 32 hearing, evidence that trial counsel missed due to their failure to conduct any investigation for mitigating evidence." At the state hearing, "roughly twenty witnesses painted a poignant picture of a thrown-away, poverty-stricken, bullied, sexually abused, physically abused, and emotionally abused child, abandoned by his family (the latter a decidedly deceptive descriptor) and, except for a few caring school personnel, likewise abandoned by the social work and criminal justice apparatus of government." Also presented were two mental health experts who opined that petitioner suffers from a cognitive disorder. The district court concluded:

Even without the mitigating evidence [petitioner] presented at the Rule 32 hearing, two jurors voted against the death penalty. Had counsel offered the abundance of mitigating evidence at trial that [petitioner] introduced at the Rule 32 hearing, there is a reasonable probability that at least one more juror would have voted for life imprisonment instead of the death penalty. With a nine-to-three vote, instead of a ten-to-two vote, [petitioner] would have avoided a jury's recommendation of a death sentence.

Thus, [petitioner] has demonstrated that he was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance at the penalty phase.

NOTE: The parties reached an agreement that Richard Flowers would be resentenced to life without parole and no appeal was taken.

2020: Gallegos v. Shinn*, 2020 WL 7230698 (D. Az. Dec. 7, 2020) (1994 resentencing proceeding). In Arizona death penalty case involving the rape and murder of an eight-year-old girl, petitioner was denied the effective assistance of counsel at his resentencing proceeding as a result of resentencing counsel's failure to investigate and present evidence of petitioner's organic brain damage. (In a prior order, cause was found under Martinez v. Ryan to excuse the procedural default of the claim.) At the resentencing, defense counsel presented testimony from petitioner and his family and friends regarding petitioner's drug and alcohol use, learning disability, tendency to be a follower, and passive, nonviolent personality. Several witnesses, and petitioner himself, pointed to the negative influence the victim's half-brother had on petitioner. Also presented was testimony from the lead investigators, both of whom opined that the death penalty was not the appropriate sentence for petitioner, who was 18 at the time of the offense. One detective explained that he believed the killing had been accidental and that petitioner had been drinking at the time of the offense. Although resentencing counsel was provided with information about serious ATV accidents petitioner had been involved in as a late teenager, counsel did not investigate the accidents. Nor did he offer any expert testimony with respect to learning disabilities or the effects of substance abuse on the brain. Under the prevailing standard of care, "more was required" than the lay evidence of petitioner's learning disability and substance abuse, i.e., expert testimony explaining the ramifications of petitioner's conditions. No tactical basis for the omission could be discerned. Respondent's contention that "the tests, technology, and theories surrounding adolescent organic brain damage that exist today, were not widely accepted in the scientific community" in 1994 "was not borne out by the testimony at the [federal] evidentiary hearing." Petitioner's experts testified, inter alia: (1) petitioner's neuro-cognitive deficits could have been "reliably assessed" in 1994; (2) the effects of alcohol abuse were known in 1994; and (3) specific learning disability (SLD) and ADHD were both well understood as far back as the 1980s. As to prejudice, respondent had presented expert opinion disputing petitioner's expert on the issue of whether the ATV accidents resulted in brain damage. Prejudice is established without a definitive finding on the merits of the competing positions.

Given the conflicting evidence and opinions, and the fact that SLD and the effects of substance abuse are also forms of organic brain damage, the Court concludes that "there existed a 'reasonable probability' that 'an objective fact-finder' in a state sentencing hearing would have concluded, based on the evidence presented, that [petitioner] had a brain injury that impaired his judgment at the time of the crimes." [Citation omitted.]

Organic brain damage is recognized as particularly compelling mitigation, including by the Arizona Supreme Court. And "the likelihood of prejudice in [petitioner's] case is magnified because the new information which [resentencing counsel] failed to present would have supported a finding that [petitioner's] ability to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law was impaired." Additionally, there is a reasonable probability that the state court would not have discounted evidence of petitioner's learning disability if it had known of the brain-based nature of SLD and its behavioral effects. Further, evidence that petitioner "was predisposed to alcohol abuse might have affected the trial court's consideration of [petitioner's] 'history of drinking.'" That "the crime here was particularly disturbing" does not defeat the finding of prejudice on the record of this case. NOTE: The decision granting habeas relief was not appealed.

Marshall v. Dunn, 497 F.Supp.3d 1124 (N.D. Ala. 2020) (2005 conviction and death sentence). Alabama death row inmate was entitled to habeas relief on his claim that trial counsel were ineffective in failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence. Petitioner was sentenced to death for the murder of his 15-year-old stepdaughter during a burglary, with sexual abuse or attempted sexual abuse involved. Trial counsel's mitigation investigation consisted of hiring an investigator to find family members who might be willing to testify on petitioner's behalf and a clinical psychologist who prepared a mitigation report based on the limited information provided by counsel and a four hour interview with petitioner. Although the psychologist's report recounted petitioner's violent and unstable upbringing, trial counsel conducted no further investigation into potential mitigation and did not call any witnesses at the sentencing phase. The failure to conduct additional investigation after receiving the expert report was deficient performance. Also deficient was the failure to track down family members who the investigator had learned of after petitioner's father indicated he did not wish to assist his son. Although the state court concluded that trial counsel could not be faulted because family members were uncooperative, such an assessment was "based on a set of facts that is at best incomplete." In fact, the record showed that trial counsel blindly followed the investigator's unsupported conclusion that family members were unwilling to help despite knowing that at least one of petitioner's brothers had reached out in an effort to assist. This fact should have caused counsel to doubt the investigator's assessment of the situation and prompted counsel to do their own follow up. The unwillingness of petitioner's sister to testify on behalf of her brother was explained in the post-conviction proceeding. She recounted that trial counsel approached her at trial and she was simply unprepared to take the stand with no notice. "Put simply, her decision not to testify was not made out of malice, and proper efforts undertaken by counsel prior to the trial may have yielded a different response." Numerous other family members and life history witnesses testified or attested that neither trial counsel nor the trial investigator contacted them about testifying on petitioner's behalf and each claimed they would have testified for petitioner if asked. The state court unreasonably assumed that the familial relationship between petitioner and the victim – i.e., she was his first cousin once removed – created a barrier to family assistance that rendered trial counsel's performance adequate. But the record did not show that attempts to enlist aid from the family, other than petitioner's father, were rebuffed. "[B]y adopting counsel's post-hoc rationalization of why they were unable to turn up mitigating evidence without considering the other evidence presented at the Rule 32 hearing, the [Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals] engaged in an unreasonable application of clearly established law to the facts in this case." Also criticized was trial counsel's failure to review the medical records the investigator obtained. Had counsel done so, "and performed even a cursory investigation into [petitioner's] physical conditions, counsel would have discovered that [petitioner] suffered from two medical conditions, sleep apnea and a thyroid condition." Both conditions "purportedly have cognitive and emotional effects" which "may have supported [petitioner's] contention for a sentence less than death." The decision by trial counsel not to engage a mitigation specialist, and instead to rely on an investigator and a psychologist, is not deemed deficient performance.

But, having done so, counsel were not relieved of their obligation to actually look at the reports their professionals prepared. [The psychologist's] report is replete with red flags that courts have held warrant further investigation. Again, this is not to suggest that counsel should have offered the report at the trial or called [the psychologist] as a witness. To the contrary, opting not to admit [the psychologist's] report at the penalty stage was a strategic decision for counsel to make based on their professional expertise. [Citation omitted.] However, counsel unreasonably chose not to follow up on the information contained in that report. Under then prevailing standards, knowing of [petitioner's] abusive, neglected childhood, any reasonable attorney would have engaged in a more thorough investigation, by either talking to family members (at least one of whom counsel knew had written [petitioner]) or revisiting the decision whether to hire a mitigation expert. The failure to use the information provided by the two individuals counsel hired is the error rather than counsel's failure to hire a mitigation expert.

In the post-conviction proceeding, trial counsel admitted that he knew little about developing mitigation, explaining that in Jefferson County, Alabama, "we don't get any money to hire anybody to do mitigation." But lack of resources could not excuse counsel's failure to investigate in this case given that counsel "actually had information that should have caused them to inquire further, i.e. multiple red flags indicating readily available and compelling mitigation evidence, as well as leads on where to find that evidence." Regarding prejudice, the family members who trial counsel neglected to contact could have told the jury about, e.g.: (1) the physical abuse inflicted on petitioner and his siblings by petitioner's stepfather, with petitioner receiving the worst of the beatings; (2) the threats of violence by the stepfather against petitioner's mother in front of petitioner, including with a gun and an automobile; (3) the extreme emotional abuse and neglect inflicted on petitioner by his mother and her ultimate abandonment of him; (4) the physical abuse inflicted on petitioner, his sister and his mother by a later paramour of his mother; (5) attempts by petitioner to protect his mother and sister; (6) the constant moving and searching for shelter when petitioner's mother was with his stepfather; (7) petitioner's placement in a facility for children in need when he was a teenager where his mother apparently never visited him; and (8) petitioner's later placement in foster care in a structured environment with a family who loved and cared for him, and petitioner's successful adjustment there, including his help in looking after the foster parents' mentally challenged son. With an adequate investigation counsel could also have presented testimony from someone like the social worker/mitigation specialist whose preliminary affidavit was proffered at the post-conviction proceeding. This expert identified five types of "psychological battering" petitioner experienced as a child, as well as twenty risk factors in petitioner's life that impacted his psychological and emotional development. In assessing prejudice, it is noted that the jury was presented with an aggravating factor that was in fact inapplicable, i.e., that petitioner was under a sentence of imprisonment when he committed the murder. On the record of this case, prejudice is established.

Reweighing the two proper aggravating circumstances—that [petitioner] had a prior conviction for a violent felony and was engaged in a burglary when he committed the murder—against a competent closing statement and testimony from his family, foster parents, children's home director, as well as from medical records and a competent mitigation specialist detailing his painful life history, this court finds that the wealth of mitigating evidence [petitioner's] counsel failed to find or present was both powerful and significant, creating a "substantial likelihood of a different sentence." NOTE: The Commissioner's appeal of the grant of sentencing relief and Marshall's cross-appeal of the denial of a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to hire a forensic expert were dismissed as moot by the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals after Marshall passed away on death row.

2019: Mitchell v. Wetzel*, 2019 WL 5537899 (W.D. Pa. Oct. 25, 2019), appeals pending, 20-9001 & 20-9002 (3rd Cir.) (1999 trial and sentencing). In case involving the rape, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse (IDSI) and murder of petitioner's estranged wife, habeas relief is granted as to the death sentence based on trial counsel's deficient performance in failing to provide critical evidence to and prepare the testimony of the defense's sole expert. Prior to trial, petitioner pleaded guilty to a prior rape of the victim, as well as the rape and IDSI charges. At trial, petitioner relied on a diminished capacity defense to the murder charge, arguing that he was unable to form the specific intent to kill because of the effects of his long-term alcohol abuse and his psychological condition. The defense was supported by testimony by a mental health expert, Dr. Bernstein. Six months before trial, Dr. Bernstein had sent trial counsel his preliminary report, copying penalty phase counsel. In the report, he opined that petitioner suffered from alcohol abuse and dependence and had a history of concussions, organic mood disorder (depression) and alcoholic hallucinations. He further opined that petitioner lacked the capacity to form the specific intent to kill, thereby supporting the diminished capacity defense. The report also addressed potential mitigation. Dr. Bernstein wrote that there were "multiple, significant pre-natal and anti-natal mitigating factors." These included in utero exposure to alcohol, genetic loading for alcoholism coupled with chronic alcohol abuse, and a history of recurrent depression. In Dr. Bernstein's opinion, petitioner was in desperate need of psychiatric care during the time period in question. At the end of the report, Dr. Bernstein asked for all records regarding petitioner's arrest, statements made by petitioner, police reports, etc. He was not provided with all the requested documents, however. Among the materials trial counsel did not give Dr. Bernstein were: (1) a witness's statement that petitioner called her shortly before the killing telling her that he intended to kill the victim; (2) letters by petitioner from jail to that same witness stating, inter alia, that the victim deserved to die because of what she'd put petitioner through; and (3) entries from the victim's journal in which she wrote that petitioner threatened to kill her. At the guilt phase of the trial, Dr. Bernstein discussed genetic loading for alcoholism. He also noted that petitioner's mother drank when pregnant with petitioner and that there is a higher prevalence of neurological and psychiatric abnormalities in fetuses that are exposed to alcohol in the womb. Dr. Bernstein told the jury that petitioner had been admitted to the hospital twice at age 14 because his drinking was out of control and he was having homicidal thoughts. The substance abuse problem petitioner suffered from would have been treatable with help that petitioner did not receive. Dr. Bernstein further observed that individuals like petitioner are likely to be more violent and impulsive. Dr. Bernstein ultimately opined that petitioner's "cognitive capacity to premeditate and deliberate and form specific homicidal intent and be fully conscious of that intent was diminished." When he offered that opinion, unbeknownst to Dr. Bernstein, the jury had already heard the evidence of premeditation/intent that trial counsel had failed to provide him with. Dr. Bernstein's credibility was severely undermined during cross-examination and the diminished capacity defense was rejected by the jury. Dr. Bernstein was called again by the defense at the sentencing phase as the sole expert witness. His testimony expanded on what he had told the jury at the guilt phase about petitioner's background, etc. In deciding that death was the appropriate sentence, the jury did not find a single mitigating factor. In state post-conviction proceedings, penalty phase counsel testified that she had unsuccessfully advised lead counsel not to present a diminished capacity defense at the guilt-innocence portion of the trial but instead to save Dr. Bernstein for the sentencing phase. Dr. Bernstein in turn stated that had he been aware of the material that had been withheld from him, he would have explained to lead counsel how perilous a guilt phase defense could be and suggested the option of focusing instead on the penalty phase. Lead counsel admitted he would have followed such advice had it been given to him. In holding that petitioner was not prejudiced at the sentencing phase by lead counsel's failure to supply Dr. Bernstein with the materials he had requested, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court found that Dr. Bernstein's credibility had been undermined primarily through the prosecution's challenges to records Dr. Bernstein had relied on concerning petitioner's history of alcohol abuse. According to the district court, this finding involved an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence before the state court. In then assessing the question of prejudice de novo, the district court observed that the evidence that is relevant to mitigation factors at a capital sentencing hearing is significantly broader than that which is relevant to support the very limited diminished capacity defense to first-degree murder. It then found:

Dr. Bernstein's testimony was relevant to several of the mitigating factors the defense asked the jurors to find, i.e., that Petitioner was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance when [he killed the victim]; that his capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law was substantially impaired; and the catch-all factor, which a juror could find to be present upon evidence of neglect Petitioner suffered during his childhood, his chronic alcohol abuse and his repeated attempts at treatment and counseling. Dr. Bernstein's testimony also bolstered, and gave context to, the testimony given by the lay witnesses Petitioner presented at the sentencing hearing. The fact that not one juror found even a single mitigating circumstance is evidence as to just how thoroughly and successfully the prosecutor destroyed Dr. Bernstein's credibility because he had not reviewed the [withheld] documents prior to diagnosing and forming his opinion of Petitioner.

Had counsel provided Dr. Bernstein with the documents he requested, "it is reasonably probable that the defense would have provided his testimony only at the sentencing hearing, and that at least one juror would have credited the testimony given by him at that hearing and changed his or her assessment of Petitioner's mitigation case and voted for a life sentence." Thus, prejudice is established.

*Nika v. Gittere, 2019 WL 2453658 (D. Nev. June 12, 2019), affirming denial of guilt-related claims, 2022 WL 4243956 (9th Cir. 2022) (1995 trial and sentencing). Habeas relief is granted as to the death sentence on three claims, including ineffective assistance of counsel for inadequately investigating and presenting mitigation and for failing to contact the Yugoslavian consulate for assistance. Nika was convicted of murdering a man at the side of a highway east of Reno, Nevada. The victim stopped to assist Nika, whose car was broken down. According to a jailhouse informant, Nika claimed the victim insulted him. Nika struck the victim several times on the back of the head, rolled the victim onto his back and shot him in the head. The prosecution's penalty phase evidence included victim impact evidence from the wife and daughter of the murder victim, testimony from Nika's in-laws and another man about Nika's violent temper and threatening behavior, and testimony from a woman who claimed Nika had raped her. In mitigation, Nika's wife attempted, mostly unsuccessfully, to cast doubt about the allegations of Nika's violent behavior. Beyond that, much of her testimony reflected negatively on Nika, including the suggestion that Nika had committed a battery on a woman who was seven months pregnant. Nika's sister-in-law testified that Nika played sports with her children and that her children liked Nika, but she also stated that he was a stern disciplinarian and she didn't allow her children to watch the violent programs Nika liked to watch. The sole aggravating factor found proven by the jury was that the murder was committed at random with no apparent motive. The jury concluded that no mitigating circumstances existed and Nika was sentenced to death. In state habeas proceedings, Nika raised his claim that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately develop and present mitigation evidence. The state district court allowed no factual development, failed to rule on motions seeking funding for investigation and mental health experts, and summarily denied the claim with no evidentiary hearing. The Nevada Supreme Court affirmed the denial of relief, concluding that Nika failed to adequately explain how the additional investigation he proposed would have altered the outcome of his trial. The federal district court ruled that "[w]hile this claim was – at least ostensibly – adjudicated by the state courts in Nika's first state habeas action, because the fact-finding process in that case was defective, and Nika did not have a fair opportunity to develop the facts supporting the claim, the Court does not apply the standard prescribed by 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)." Turning to the merits of the claim, the district court cited to the ABA Guidelines that existed at the time of trial as reflecting the standard of practice applicable to defense counsel. As for the mitigation that should have been uncovered, the district court observed that Nika grew up in Serbia and was 19 when he came to the U.S. Nika only knew his wife and her family about 5 years prior to the crime. Although Nika's "entire biological family and all the records related to his childhood remained in Serbia," trial counsel obtained no mitigation regarding Nika's background in Serbia. With a reasonable investigation

[t]he jury would have heard of Nika's upbringing as a member of a marginalized group [Roma], in abject poverty, in a cold and leaky one-room mud-brick house with no indoor plumbing. The jury would have heard that Nika worked as a child to help support his family and had to beg and scavenge for food. The jury would have heard that Nika's father was an alcoholic for much of Nika's childhood, and that he engaged in extramarital affairs. The jury would have heard that Nika was brutally beaten by his father throughout his childhood. The jury would have heard about Nika's cognitive and impulse-control deficits, and his minimal education. The jury would have heard of Nika's military service. The jury would have heard that, in Serbia, Nika had an extended family and circle of friends that cared about him.

The failure to develop such evidence was deficient performance and had such evidence been presented, there is a reasonable probability that Nika would not have been sentenced to death. Trial counsel was also found deficient in failing to contact the Yugoslavian consulate for assistance in obtaining mitigation evidence. Although state habeas counsel alleged trial counsel's ineffectiveness for not making contact with the consulate, state habeas counsel failed to show what such contact would have produced. When the claim was raised again in a second state habeas proceeding with a showing of the assistance the consulate could have provided, the claim was found by the state court to be procedurally defaulted. The ineffectiveness of initial state habeas counsel in raising the claim without including evidence showing prejudice provided the cause necessary to overcome the default under Martinez v. Ryan. And prejudice was shown through evidence establishing the assistance that second habeas counsel received from the consulate. Serbian officials, inter alia, “facilitated interviews with family and friends of Nika in Serbia; obtained Nika’s school, medical and military records; helped secure a culturally competent expert; . . . and provided additional information regarding Roma culture.”

2018: Walker v. Davis, 2018 WL 6591665 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 14, 2018), reversing denial of relief on Batson claim, 822 Fed.Appx. 549 (9th Cir. 2020) (1980 trial and sentencing). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present evidence concerning petitioner’s troubled background. Trial counsel did not prepare for the penalty phase until after petitioner’s convictions of murder during a robbery and several counts of attempted murder. This left him with a single day to develop mitigation. He had no investigator and had rejected a list of potential witnesses provided by petitioner’s mother and brother. Trial counsel simply selected family members and friends who were in the courtroom to be mitigation witnesses without explaining to them the purpose of their testimony; instead he told them to plead for petitioner’s life and cry if they could. The family and friends (5 total) told the jury that petitioner was 19 years old at the time of the offenses, he had no prior criminal record, he had done yard work for the church secretary in the past, he gave a friend rides to work, he provided financial and emotional support to his mother and sister, and he was loved by them and his girlfriend. Petitioner also testified, denying having committed the crimes he was convicted of, as well as having made certain threats that had been offered as aggravation evidence. Petitioner was sentenced to death. In state habeas proceedings, evidence about petitioner’s background was developed through siblings, extended family, teachers and petitioner’s father. Petitioner’s family relocated frequently during his childhood with little or no notice or explanation. The poverty the family lived in was detailed. There were other family members living with them at times with up to 20 kids present with no supervision. When the children got into trouble they were beaten by one or both parents irrespective of who was actually to blame. Petitioner’s father had “Line-up Sessions” where the children were forced to line up and watch as the father made each child bend down and grab his or her ankles and then he hit them multiple times with an extension cord, braided switch or a belt. Kids were placed in the back of the line for a second beating if they cried or let go of their toes. The father also had “Lay Down Sessions” where 4 or 5 kids laid down side-by-side on the floor to be whipped at the same time. Other adults were present during these beatings and they laughed at the children, taunted them and insulted them. The children became “objects to humiliate.” Other instances of violence against petitioner were disclosed by the witnesses, including when he tried to protect his mother from his father, resulting in his father beating petitioner. Because petitioner was the oldest son, he was often in the line of fire. His siblings would ask him to do things that they knew would lead their father to beat petitioner, such as getting them food. Petitioner attempted to be the peacemaker in the family. The witnesses also recounted the death of one of petitioner’s younger brothers from meningitis, and the impact this had on him, as well as the death of a beloved grandmother. After petitioner’s father left the family, petitioner sought to be the protector of his mother and sisters even though petitioner was only twelve years old. Around that same time petitioner’s older sister was murdered by her estranged husband. Petitioner “had seen his dying sister lying naked and bleeding with her killer still holding the knife over her body, and he could not shake the sight.” He blamed himself for his sister’s death and felt like he failed as the man of the family. Later, a new man moved into the household who attempted to sexually molest petitioner’s sisters and maybe even the boys. He was a corrupting influence who taught the boys how to commit crimes and even joined them in doing so on some occasions. Petitioner tried to protect his sisters from the man. As he grew older, he also provided for his family members when he could, including shortly before the capital crimes. Teachers provided positive descriptions of petitioner but also attested to the failure of the schools petitioner attended to provide necessary assistance to black students like petitioner. Trial counsel's failure to adequately investigate petitioner's background was deficient, as was his failure to properly prepare the few witnesses he did call at the sentencing phase and his performance in examining them. As for prejudice, the state's contention that the new mitigation was weak was rejected. And although petitioner could not show that the state supreme court could not reasonably have found that trial counsel lacked notice of brain damage and mental impairments discovered in the state habeas proceeding, there was at least some evidence that, had counsel conducted a reasonable investigation, he would have discovered that petitioner suffered from "long-standing" brain damage which affected petitioner's "cognitive functioning." Petitioner's proffered mental health evidence also showed that the systematic ritualized beatings by petitioner's father, "which at times constituted torture, affected every aspect of his development and life, including brain function, emotional responses, perception of the world around him, beliefs about himself, sense of personal integrity, and relationships with others." The state court's decision finding no prejudice was unreasonable. NOTE: Marvin Walker accepted a plea with a sentence of life with the possibility of parole. Second chance at life

2017: *Jefferson v. Sellers, 250 F.Supp.3d 1340 (N.D. Ga. 2017), aff'd, 941 F.3d 452 (11th Cir. 2019) (trial and sentencing 1986). In this capital, pre-AEDPA case, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present evidence of brain damage where they knew defendant had been hit by a car and suffered a head injury at age two and where a psychologist, Dr. Gary Dudley, recommended in his written report that counsel obtain a neuropsychological evaluation. One of defendant's trial attorneys claimed that they made a strategic decision not to pursue neuropsychological testing because Dr. Dudley later told them by phone that it would be a waste of time and defendant was "just a criminal." Dr. Dudley denied making such a statement. The court credited Dr. Dudley's testimony over trial counsel's assertions for the following reasons: (1) trial counsel's time sheets do not reflect that he ever had a phone call with Dr. Dudley after he received Dr. Dudley's report recommending neuropsychological testing; this is consistent with Dr. Dudley's testimony that he did not recall having any conversations with counsel after he submitted his report; (2) trial counsel's claim of a follow-up telephone conversation with Dr. Dudley is inconsistent with his co-counsel's testimony; (3) trial counsel's own testimony on this issue has been internally inconsistent – at some points counsel claimed Dr. Dudley told them defendant was "just a criminal," at other points counsel said Dr. Dudley asserted that they shouldn't worry about it because defendant was a sociopath or a psychopath (however, no mental health professional has ever diagnosed defendant with psychopathy or anti-social personality disorder); and, (4) the court considered the witnesses' demeanor, tones of voice and levels of engagement during the hearing. The substantive evidence of brain damage included neuropsychological test results, a neurological evaluation, IQ test scores, academic test scores, and neuroimages – all of which established that defendant suffers from significant brain damage. Trial counsel performed deficiently because they knew that defendant was hit by a car at a young age and suffered a head injury, but failed to gather further information and abandoned a mental health investigation without requesting neuropsychological testing. Defendant was prejudiced because the jury did not hear that his head was run over by a car at age two and the impact his injuries subsequently had on his life. His brain damage would have provided the jury an explanation for his past behavior. The fact that Respondent recently obtained some rebuttal evidence while the case has been pending in federal court does not compel a conclusion that defendant suffered no prejudice. Defendant does not have to show that a jury would have preferred his experts over Respondent's to establish prejudice. Rather, a jury should have the opportunity to weigh and consider the evidence, including the opinions of both parties' experts. Evidence of brain damage would have also weakened the state's evidence in aggravation because if defendant's impulsive behavior is explained by brain damage it would reduce the volitional nature of the crime as well as his ability to plan and act rationally.

McNish v. Westbrooks, 149 F. Supp. 3d 847 (E.D. Tenn. 2016) (trial and sentencing in 1984). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. This issue was first raised on appeal of the denial of state post-conviction. The District Court held the issue was procedurally defaulted but the Sixth Circuit remanded following the decisions in Martinez v. Ryan and Trevino v. Thaler. On remand, the District Court held that post-conviction counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness and the issue was "substantial." Therefore, the procedural default was excused. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient because trial counsel "failed to explore a wealth of evidence that was available" concerning the defendant's social, mental, and family history. While counsel had available records that indicated "a history of attempted suicides, depression, blackouts, and drug abuse," as well as indications of the defendant's traumatic childhood, counsel "chose not to investigate petitioner's family history any further because of their decision to pursue a reasonable doubt defense." This decision was not a valid strategic decision "because counsel did not fulfill their obligation to independently investigate this evidence in order to make an informed decision." Moreover, the decision to "limit their investigation" was not reasonable, "particularly considering that counsel had a general knowledge of the difficulties of Petitioner's family history." Prejudice was established. "The sum of the testimony portrayed Petitioner as a good-hearted, tender, and compassionate person who was not violent and loved his family and friends," which was "undermined by the nature of the crime for which Petitioner had been convicted." If counsel had adequately investigated and presented the evidence, the jury would have heard evidence of the "degenerative environment Petitioner grew up in" with parents that ran a bootleg business in a dry county. The petitioner was physically and sexually abused by his parents, their customers, and his older siblings. He became addicted to prescription medications after back and head injuries. He attempted suicide and was admitted to a mental health center where he was diagnosed with "hysterical personality and drug dependence." NOTE: David McNish passed away in October 2016.

2014: Hall v. Beard*, 55 F. Supp. 3d 618 (E.D. Pa. 2014), appeal dismissed, 14-9007 (3rd Cir. April 18, 2018) (sentenced in October 1994). Under AEDPA (with the court citing the ABA Guidelines numerous times), counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate, develop, and present mitigating evidence. During sentencing, counsel called only two witnesses, the defendant's mother and the mother of one of his two children, "who testified generally to [his] good character and willingness to help others." Trial counsel testified that he did not investigate further because "he was trying to 'speed this up as quickly as possible and give [the jury] the nuts and bolts and . . . [not] all the little flowers and trimmings.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to “reasonably investigate his life, medical, educational, and employment history, and performed no expert mental health evaluation.” While the Commonwealth argued that the defendant and his family failed to inform counsel of the defendant’s background, despite conversations with counsel, the court rejected this argument because a defendant “does not have ‘a duty to instruct counsel how to perform such a basic element of competent representation as the inquiry into a defendant’s background.’” Id. at ____ (quoting Bond v. Beard, 539 F.3d 256, 288 (3rd Cir. 2008)). Because the state court decision that counsel was not ineffective based, primarily on this argument, the state court’s decision was “contrary to United States Supreme Court precedent because it fails to address the question of whether trial counsel’s investigation for potentially mitigating evidence is reasonable under prevailing professional norms.” Because the state court did not address the prejudice prong, the court reviewed this issue de novo. Prejudice established as the records and testimony established that the defendant suffered an abusive and neglectful childhood, a history of seizures and several severe head traumas, but his school records established his ability to adjust to a structured environment during his years in a court- ordered placement in “disciplinary school.” The evidence supported two statutory mitigating circumstances that had not been presented to the jury: (1) the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental and emotional disturbance and (2) his capacity to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law was substantially impaired. Additionally, the evidence would have given additional weight to “the catch-all factor” that the jury did consider.

2013: Bridges v. Beard*, 941 F. Supp. 2d 584 (E.D. Pa. 2013), aff’d, 706 Fed.Appx. 75 (3rd Cir. 2017) (tried in 1998). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate, development, and present mitigating evidence. Counsel did not investigate the petitioner’s “life history” and did not obtain a mental health evaluation, even though funding was approved for an expert to assist with the penalty phase. Counsel did not express a strategic reason for this and instead admitted that he simply did not see evidence of “psychological disturbance.” Instead, counsel presented “thirteen witnesses, nearly all of them family or acquaintances,” to testify to the petitioner’s good character. Even with this limited presentation, the jury deliberated for more than six hours and reported being deadlocked before reaching a death verdict. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. The state court’s finding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of federal law. The state court essentially found that counsel made valid strategic decisions based on his discussions with petitioner and that counsel simply had no further information that should have led to investigation.

First, it is simply not the case that the lawyer’s duty to investigate begins and ends with discussions with his client. Even a “fatalistic and uncooperative” client does not absolve a lawyer from independent investigation. . . . [I]t is not the duty of the defendant to provide information on mitigation to the lawyer; rather, it is the lawyer’s duty to uncover it.

Id. at 615 (quoting Porter v. McCollum, 130 S. Ct. 447, 453 (2009)). Second:

Capital Case*

The state court is incorrect in suggesting that, under Wiggins [v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003)] a lawyer is only obligated to investigate areas of mitigation of which he has knowledge already. The Supreme Court has specifically rebuked lawyers for “ignor[ing] pertinent avenues for investigation of which he should have been aware.”

Id. at 615-16 (quoting Porter, 130 S. Ct. at 453 (emphasis added)).

Moreover, even if the state court’s characterization of the Wiggins rule were accurate, there was plenty of evidence of which [counsel] was already aware that should have triggered a wider investigation.

Counsel knew of petitioner’s health problems and that petitioner had often been left in his grandmother’s case. Prejudice was also established. The state courts one-sentence assessment was simply that petitioner “failed to prove the factors counsel was unaware of would have changed the outcome of the penalty phase proceeding.” “This is the wrong standard,” which is explicit in the examples given by the Court in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 405-06 (2000). Thus, the state court’s decision is “contrary to” clearly established federal law and is entitled to no deference. Prejudice was clear as “compelling mitigation” was available “that would have helped the jury to ‘see the client as someone they do not want to kill.’” Id. at 613 (quoting American Bar Association Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases Commentary, Guideline 11.8.6 (1989)). In short, the petitioner was raised in an unstable home by a single mother who was addicted to crack and he moved frequently between this chaotic life and the relative structure of his father’s home. Petitioner had to move frequently as a child and attended three different schools in his first three school years. His mother’s crack addiction was “debilitating.” Medical records showed that she tested positive for cocaine while pregnant with petitioner’s sibling. She gave up another sibling for adoption. She and the children were on food stamps and welfare through most of petitioner’s childhood. She would often disappear for two to three weeks at a time leaving petitioner with his grandmother or aunt. Petitioner’s father suspected that she was engaging in prostitution to support her drug habit. Many of her boyfriends were violent and beat her in front of petitioner. She made frequent visits to hospitals with physical injuries that were most likely caused by abuse. Petitioner also “suffered debilitating illness and hospitalizations as a child.” Specifically, while he was in the fifth grade, he was hospitalized for severe groin and leg pain. He was diagnosed with acute rheumatic fever and anemia. A year later, he was readmitted for rheumatic fever. Doctors recommended chronic care hospitalization, bed rest, and a wheelchair, but the family, who never visited while he was hospitalized, took petitioner home.

Rheumatic fever is associated with untreated strep throat, and thus can be a sign of neglect. If left untreated, it can damage the heart valves—precisely what happened to [petitioner], who was forced at age 17 to undergo open-heart surgery. His mother never visited him in the hospital during his surgery or recovery.

“This evidence would not excuse [petitioner’s] crimes, but it would have provided context for it.”

Capital Case*

A proper life history . . . would have helped the jury see that [petitioner's] witnessing of the abuse of his mother could have spurred a strong sense of over-protectiveness of his girlfriend that could have explained his violent reaction to the robbery that preceded the murders. . . . This evidence could well have convinced the jury that [petitioner] was less culpable for his criminal behavior.

In finding prejudice, the court also considered the “relative weakness of the aggravation.” Even without the available mitigation, the jury struggled through roughly six hours, additionally requested instructions on mitigation and weighing aggravation and mitigation, and a deadlock, before reaching a death verdict. Additionally, “the jury rejected the prosecution’s theory of the case—that it was related to drug trafficking—when it rejected the aggravating factor relating to the drug trade.” Under these circumstances, “it is reasonably probable than an effective presentation of the available mitigating evidence would have convinced at least one juror to find that the mitigation outweighed the aggravation.” Convictions and death sentence also vacated due to the prosecution’s Brady violation. NOTE: When the case returned to the trial court, Shawnfatee Bridges pleaded guilty to two counts of third degree murder.

2012: * Johnson v. United States, 860 F. Supp. 2d 663 (N.D. Iowa 2012) (sentenced in June 2005). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and challenge the government’s aggravation evidence and arguments and failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The defendant was convicted of five murders in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise. Even though she was tried as an “aider and abettor,” she received four death sentences and one life sentence, while her boyfriend/the principal received only two death sentences in his separate trial. One of the persons killed was a drug dealer, who worked for the defendant’s boyfriend. He was killed after the defendant’s boyfriend was indicted on drug charges, due to fear that he might cooperate with law enforcement. His girlfriend, and her two children “simply had the misfortune to be at home” and they were also killed. The fifth victim was also a drug dealer for the defendant’s boyfriend and was the defendant’s “ex-boyfriend in what had been a stormy and physically abusive relationship.” The defendant was sentenced to death for all but the first drug dealer’s murder while her boyfriend/the principal was sentenced to death only for the murder of the two children. First, counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the prosecution’s theory that the ex-boyfriend was killed due to the defendant’s motive for “revenge for the beatings that he had inflicted upon her.” Counsel did not present evidence that the defendant suffered from battered woman’s syndrome, which made the “revenge” theory untenable. This evidence would have addressed the defendant’s “mental state at the time of the offense.” Prejudice was established with respect to the ex-boyfriend’s murder. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to provide the defense psychiatric pharmacologist with data regarding the defendant’s drug history. The expert testified about methamphetamine generally “from an informational perspective.” He knew nothing at all and did not testify about the defendant. This expert could have testified that the defendant was a methamphetamine addict and about the effect of her chronic addiction on her at the time of the crime, even if she was not using at the time (which she claimed as she was pregnant at the time of the offenses). Even without this connection, four jurors found her methamphetamine addiction to be mitigating. While the trial expert did not testify in these proceedings, the court found that the assertions about what his testimony could have been was “not based on mere speculation.”

It is not speculation to find that . . . he would have been able to cast his testimony about the effects of methamphetamine use in terms of the effects of methamphetamine on Johnson in light of her drug use history, rather than simply in terms of the effects of methamphetamine on people who use some amounts of methamphetamine in certain ways.

Finally, counsel also failed to adequately investigate, prepare, and present mitigation evidence from experts and lay witnesses about the defendant’s mental state at the time of the offenses. During the trial, counsel relied on a “mental state” defense in arguing that the defendant was present for the first four crimes but “did not have the requisite intent.” Likewise, counsel argued that, while she lured her ex-boyfriend to a meeting where he was killed, she was not present and did not have the intent to kill him. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to pursue mental state at the time of the crimes in mitigation. Counsel retained an expert to explore her mental state at the time of the offenses but “pulled the plug” after his initial evaluation, which revealed “red flags” suggesting “brain impairments.” Likewise, a second expert identified possible brain impairments and recommended further testing. “Thus, the hired experts’ own advice called for further development of mental health evidence to support their opinions, suggesting that the limited bases for and scope of their opinions developed so far rendered those opinions inadequate.”

The lack of a reasonable investigation of mental health mitigation evidence here deprives the decision not to pursue a mitigation case based on mental state at the time of the offenses of any presumption of reasonableness.

Moreover, counsel’s explanation that he decided to pull the plug “based on a bad experience that he had had with disclosure of mental health evidence in a capital case many years earlier” was inadequate “in the context of this case.” As the Court stated:

If [the] decision to reject such a mitigation defense was in some sense strategic, it was the worst strategic decision by any defense counsel that I have ever seen in my entire career: It effectively doomed [the] mitigation case from the start.

If counsel had adequately investigated, numerous experts could have testified about the defendant’s impaired capacity at the time of the crimes based on a borderline personality disorder, and her brain dysfunction, including possibly temporal lobe disease, bipolar disorder, chronic methamphetamine abuse, dependent personality disorder, and post-traumatic stress disorder. NOTE: The Attorney General withdrew the request for the death penalty and Angela Johnson was resentenced to life without the possibility of parole.

2009: *Turner v. Wong, 641 F. Supp. 2d 1010 (E.D. Cal. 2009) (sentencing in November 1984). In pre-AEDPA case, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Prior to sentencing, counsel informed the court that he was not prepared for the penalty phase. During sentencing, counsel presented brief, superficial testimony from the defendant's mother, half-sister, cousin, neighbor, and "job developer." Counsel argued "lingering doubt," despite the defendant's confession that he killed the victim after a homosexual advance and took his car and items from the home. Counsel also "referred to the Bible passage about not judging others" and summed up the defendant's life: "He's lived, the drug thing is wrong, the prior robbery is wrong, the prior receiving charge is wrong, this Defendant was wrong. Four item [sic] wrongness." Evidence that was available but not presented included: "early childhood abuse, his borderline intellectual capabilities, his drug abuse history, as well as [the victim's] predatory sexual practices." When the defendant was only five or six years old, his father would get drunk and abuse him by "thumping" him on the head, "whooping" him with a razor strap, and giving him karate punches in the stomach. The father also was verbally abusive berating the defendant as "stupid" and "dumb." The defendant's parents also fought frequently in front of the children, including physical fights that would leave the mother with knots on her head and black eyes. When the father moved out, he moved in with a woman and her four children just down the street. The defendant had an extensive history of drug and alcohol abuse that began in early adolescence. He used marijuana smoked cigarettes dipped in PCP ("sherms") pretty much daily. He frequently engaged in bizarre behavior, such as running down the street and attempting to fly. On the day of the crimes, he was using marijuana, PCP, methamphetamine ("speed"), and drinking alcohol. PCP was confirmed in blood samples taken two days after the crimes. Trial defense counsel did not have his file and could not remember a lot of details about the counsel but recalled that he chose not to rely on the PCP evidence because he believed it was inconsistent with the focus on the homosexual advances. He was also aware of information from family members that the defendant was violent on PCP. He recalled only one group contact with family members, but did not recall much of what was discussed. He did not recall learning about beatings, physical abuse, or the father's alcoholism. Counsel's conduct was deficient. The background investigation "was minimal and superficial." Counsel focused only on the defendant's mother and did not interview his sister's even though one was present during a group interview. Counsel also failed to interview the numerous family members and acquaintances interviewed by detectives or numerous people that had previously provided statements in support of a prior probation. "The problem with the investigation was not a lack of quantity of witnesses interviewed, but the quality of the interviews." At the very least, the defendant's mother, sisters, and others "were aware of serious family dysfunction in the [] household during [the defendant's] childhood and early adolescence." These witnesses "were not asked the questions which would have elicited the information. Without the questions having been asked, there is no indication that the subject matter would have been obviously important to the family members, and thus volunteered." "Conducting an adequate investigation to inform strategic decisions is exactly what is required, and is exactly what wasn't accomplished." The "very limited penalty phase evidence and argument of Turner's good character, paternal abandonment, and occupational responsibility," during summation "was not a reasonable strategy for casting [the defendant] in a positive light. It was disjointed, confusing and lacking in real mitigation value." The requirements for competent counsel were not lower in the 1980's.

The notion that the standard for death penalty cases was merely good character and good deeds also is refuted by the May 1983 article authored by Gary Goodpaster about how defense attorneys should try a capital case. The Goodpaster article is cited by the Supreme Court in Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689-90, itself decided May 14, 1984.

Id. at 1101 (quoting Gary Goodpaster, “The Trial for Life: Effective Assistance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases,” 58 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 299, 335-36 (1983)).

Even earlier, in 1982, the Supreme Court held that evidence about a defendant’s upbringing and turbulent family history is relevant to the individualized sentencing process in a death penalty trial. See Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 115, 102 S.Ct. 869, 71 L.Ed.2d 1 (1982).

Here, counsel “either didn’t even think of developing background evidence, or, if he did, . . . he inexplicably chose not to pursue it. Neither course is reasonable, especially since there was no downside to the admission of evidence about [the defendant’s] childhood victimization.” “[A]t best,” counsel gave “a distorted view of normalcy and non-violence in [the] family.” Likewise, “there was no down side to presenting the jury with evidence of [the defendant’s] depressed intelligence beyond the testimony of his paid defense expert.” “There was no reasonable investigation or strategy supporting the decision to ‘minimize the whole PCP episode.’”

The PCP use may well have explained to the jury why the defense theory of the case was consistent with the [defendant’s] actions in committing the crime (the excessive number of wounds) and immediately afterwards (stealing the television yet leaving the jewelry). Contrary to [counsel’s] fears, [the defendant’s] chronic drug use and the reasons therefor, were valid mitigating factors that could and should have been presented at the penalty phase.

Nonetheless, counsel continued his “indefensible adherence to [the] sexual advance resistance defense strategy when he could not or would not substantiate it. A reasonable attorney would have adjusted the trial strategy to theories that could be substantiated, like childhood abuse, borderline mental retardation, and PCP intoxication.” Prejudice was also established. “[T]he background information presented at the penalty phase trial was general and superficial.” In short, it was “a sanitized version of [the defendant’s] life with no explanation of his turbulent childhood, severe intellectual limitations, or dependence on PCP.” NOTE: Thaddaeus Turner is now serving a life without possibility of parole sentence.

McNeill v. Branker, 601 F. Supp. 2d 694 (E.D.N.C. 2009) (tried in April 1996). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. During sentencing, the defense presented family members to testify about the defendant’s positive traits and deeds, lack of criminal history, honorable military service, and how he was easily influenced by his brother, who was also a co-defendant. Although counsel had retained a mental health expert to examine the defendant, counsel did not present any evidence of the defendant’s depression, troubled family background, or suicide attempt. Relying on the 1989 ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases, the court found deficient conduct in the investigation because “counsel focused their attention on the guilt phase of trial and made only minimal effort to investigate potential mitigating evidence,” which consisted only of asking the defendant and his parents “their impression on the subject.” Counsel did not request funding for a “mitigation expert,” even though “funds for mitigation experts were granted in capital cases during that time period.” In addition, the defense psychiatric expert was given very little background information and was asked only to focus on the defendant’s competence and criminal responsibility rather than sentencing issues. Counsel never contacted the defendant’s sister, family members, former girlfriend, friends, and neighbors. The state court unreasonably “placed the responsibility on [the defendant] and his family for failing to inform counsel of petitioner’s suicide attempt, depression, alcohol abuse, and troubled background.”

Rather than investigating the accuracy of the impression they received from [the defendant] and his parents in discussion or seeking other potential mitigating evidence, counsel did little more than work to confirm the opinion that petitioner had a good or “normal” childhood.

“The few people whom counsel did call at sentencing were not interviewed by counsel or the defense investigator to learn what type of evidence or information they could provide.” Counsel also “failed to inform themselves of and develop information in their possession,” including failure to review the defendant’s “diary or autobiography, 84 pages long, with information about his life and upbringing,” which was prepared at counsel’s request. “It included references to . . . depression, regular abuse of alcohol, dysfunction in family relationships, and his suicide attempt.” If counsel had adequately investigated the evidence would have established that: numerous family members suffered from depression and/or mental illness; the defendant’s father sexually abused one of the defendant’s sisters and, physically abuse, and ruled by threatening severe beatings; the defendant “exhibited symptoms of mental health problems as young as seven years-old when he began self-mutilating himself by pulling out all of his eyelashes and developed a nervous habit of clearing his throat”; and as a teenager he experienced serious depression, struggled with substance abuse, and eventually attempted suicide. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by strategy, due to the failure to investigate. In addition, the available but unrepresented evidence would not have conflicted with the evidence counsel presented in sentencing because the defendant’s “helpful and reliable nature, military service, and positive character traits would have been more admirable in light of his personal struggle with mental health issues and substance abuse.” Prejudice established because “[t]here is a ‘belief, long held by this society, that defendants who commit criminal acts that are attributable to a disadvantaged background, or to emotional and mental problems, may be less culpable than defendants who have no such excuse.’” Id. at 721 (quoting Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370, 382 (1990)). NOTE: The Wake County District Attorney ultimately declined to reseek a death sentence at a retrial and Elmer McNeill was resentenced to life in prison.

Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. The 18-year-old defendant’s confessions suggested that he wanted to be a “mercenary,” planned to “fight communists in Burma,” and the crimes were a “mission.” Although counsel “consulted with five mental health experts during trial preparation [concerning a possible diminished capacity defense], he presented no expert testimony at penalty proceedings” and did not provide his mental health experts with records or social history information. He presented only a few family members, associates, and the defendant to testify. Counsel’s conduct was deficient.

It is manifest that to counter the effect of the aggravating circumstances of the crime [counsel] was obligated to show something mitigating about [the defendant’s] mental state during his homicidal actions. . . . What was missing was evidence explaining why [he] committed this awful crime and an effort on [counsel’s] part to develop that evidence.

Id. at 1120.

In this case, however, it was not the quantity of sources consulted but the quality of the investigation and the assimilation of that information into a coherent mitigation case. Because [counsel] hung onto a “strategy” of not providing experts with pertinent background information and the belief that a clinical interview was unnecessary for psychological testing, the expert consultations he arranged were worse than worthless because not only were they based on insufficient information, but on fabricated information [the defendant] supplied. Digging deeper in this case meant that [counsel] needed to ascertain the true facts about [the defendant].

Id. at 1121. Counsel’s “opinion about mental defenses being a ‘hard sell’ and that the jury would have been disgusted” with such evidence was not borne out by other attorney testimony in the case, including a “Strickland expert.” [The court also considered CLE publications prior to trial in determining the applicable standards.] Counsel’s “conscious decision to provide no documents to most of his experts and only a few document[s] to” one was also unreasonable. The “idea that any psychologist could offer evidence of empirical test results without a clinical interview was totally wrong.” “[N]ot giving his experts all relevant information, good and bad, totally defeated the purpose of a mental health examination.” “Because [counsel] failed to verify [the defendant’s] background information, he did not (and could not) provide what he didn’t know to his experts.” Counsel’s actions (in not providing sufficient information to the one mental health expert he wanted to testify) were not justified by concerns that the four bad reports he had already received would be disclosed. Rather than providing these negative reports, counsel could have supplied the expert with the “actual background” information through witness interviews.

The problem with [counsel’s] approach was that since he provided his experts with no substantiated background information, they could not be sure how much of what [the defendant] told them during clinical interviews was embellished, exaggerated, or true. The resulting opinions were uninformed, incomplete, and unfounded. . . . The lack of verifiable, true information about [the actual] background disabled the experts from giving the assistance for which they had been retained.

Capital Case*

Id. at 1124. Counsel's failure to present mental health evidence in sentencing was not justified by "clearly anti-social behavior in [the defendant's] past," which could be presented in rebuttal by the state's expert.

[T]he cause for that behavior, including the merciless abuse inflicted by his father, the sense of abandonment by his mother, the depression over losing his life-long dream of being in the Army, and his lack of identity, were mitigating and could have been developed to explain why and how [the defendant] became involved in the unrealistic, military mission that tragically ended [the victim's] life. [Counsel's] failure to expose the [false] foundation for [the state expert's] potential testimony was constitutionally ineffective.

Id. at 1128. The court "accept[ed]" the opinion of the "Strickland expert, knowledgeable about the standard of professional performance at the time" that "the entire trial presentation was confused and at cross purposes." Since counsel "viewed a penalty phase a certainty, the guilt phase opening statement should have raised penalty phase mitigation concepts."

While [counsel] did explain the idea that [the defendant] and his companions perceived the entire crime as a military mission with the ultimate purpose of going to Burma, he didn't argue that the mission was fantasy, but instead told the jurors they would have to determine for themselves whether the military purpose of the crime was reality or fantasy.

Counsel then "negated" the military mission notion in trial closing. Counsel referenced some potential mitigation in the sentencing opening, "but failed to explain how those facts were mitigating and failed to mention these subjects again on summation." Counsel also failed to mention other significant aspects of mitigation, including the defendant's testimony "of his remorse and substantial domination (following the order to kill [the victim] 'explicitly')," in closing. Prejudice was established because the evidence would have shown: (1) abuse as a toddler "during the critically important time of toilet training"; (2) his father's "sadistic abuse" from the time he was seven years old; (3) 13 different schools; (4) a history of nightmares, depression, and preoccupation with suicide; (5) "extreme emotional and mental disturbances at the time of the crime, including PTSD, borderline personality disorder, identity fragmentation, and major depression; (5) hypertension for which he received a prescription of "Inderal, which can exacerbate depression"; and (6) humiliation and demeaning "by his anti-Semitic father because he was Jewish." Yet, the defendant sought and "responded well to therapy, revealing his hurt and consistent efforts to escape an untenable home life (by running away) and seeking help from therapists." While counsel presented some of the background facts through lay witnesses in sentencing, "the depth and breadth of the evidence paled in comparison with the understanding the mental health experts added."

[A]t least one member of . . . [the] penalty phase jury would have voted for life without the possibility of parole had [counsel] presented mental state evidence through the testimony of mental health experts. This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that the penalty verdict following the paltry mitigation evidence presented was not an instant victory for the prosecution. The deliberations began with a vote favoring life by eight to four and deliberations were protracted, lasting nearly 17 hours in contrast to the two and one half hours from beginning to end of the actual penalty phase case. The state of these deliberations suggest a close case.

Id. at 1139-40 (citations omitted).

[The defendant] was sentenced to death by a jury that had no understanding of the “indisputably sadistic treatment” inflicted upon him as a child. Nor was the jury aware of well-established psychological criteria for [his] mental state at the time of the crime.

Sowell v. Collins, 557 F. Supp. 2d 843 (S.D. Ohio 2008), aff'd 663 F.3d 783 (6th Cir.2011) (sentenced in November 1983). Counsel, in pre-AEDPA case, ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel’s mitigation strategy was to emphasize petitioner’s good deeds during his adult life. Counsel presented lay witnesses (probation officers and acquaintances) on this, an unsworn statement by the petitioner, mental health reports of court-appointed examinations requested by counsel, and a presentencing (PSI) report. Citing the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases (1989), the court found deficient conduct.

[P]etitioner’s case closely resembles that of Wiggins. [Petitioner’s] trial counsel did not request or obtain a mitigation specialist or investigator, and instead relied on the investigations of others who were not trained to conduct the type of investigation required in a capital case. Counsel failed to investigate highly relevant mitigating evidence of petitioner’s family background. Counsel relied on the information contained in the PSI and the brief mitigation reports prepared by [court- appointed examiners], and did not “dig deeper” and investigate several leads contained in those reports. Counsel did not call one family member to testify, and there is no evidence that counsel conducted even the most basic interviews with petitioner’s siblings and other family members for the purpose of investigating petitioner’s background. Like Wiggins, counsel abandoned their duty to investigate after “having acquired only rudimentary knowledge of his history from a narrow set of sources.” 539 U.S. at 524, 123 S. Ct. 2527.

The court-appointed examiner reports “contained hints of petitioner’s violent and deprived background,” and “morsels of evidence,” but “counsel did not investigate further.”

Capital Case*

[C]ounsel's investigation into petitioner's background did not reflect reasonable professional judgment. Counsel's failure to interview members of petitioner's family was neither consistent with the professional standards that prevailed in 1983, nor reasonable in light of the evidence contained in the PSI and the psychological reports that would have led a reasonable attorney to investigate further. . . .

This is not a case where counsel presented absolutely no evidence in mitigation. Counsel did present a case emphasizing the good in petitioner. The Court cannot conclude, however, that counsel's decision to emphasize the good rather than the bad was reasonable trial strategy, not because there was insufficient evidence to support that theory, but because there simply is no evidence that counsel were even aware of petitioner's troubled past because they did not sufficiently investigate petitioner's background. . . . In this case, counsel were not in a position to elect to pursue one strategy over another because they had not reasonably investigated petitioner's background. Pursuing the leads regarding petitioner's background was necessary to making an informed choice regarding available mitigation strategies. Furthermore, . . . a reasonable investigation would have revealed that the information concerning petitioner's background was not inconsistent with, and might actually have bolstered, counsel's mitigation theory.

Prejudice established because the available evidence "paint[s] a more complete picture of petitioner" and "is qualitatively different than the information that was presented during the mitigation hearing." The evidence was "powerful" and established: (1) severe deprivation, neglect, and physical and emotional abuse as a child; (2) extreme poverty, including malnourishment, a younger brother dying of starvation, inadequate clothing, and being bitten by rats; (3) beatings and head injuries as a child; and (4) living in a tent in a junkyard at age 14 to escape his father's home. This evidence "was significant, and qualitatively different" and "would have painted an entirely different portrait of petitioner." This evidence also "would have bolstered their mitigation case by demonstrating that petitioner was capable of generosity and good acts in spite of the upbringing that he endured."

The testimony regarding his childhood could not have possibly made petitioner appear more culpable. Rather, the evidence, if discovered and presented, is of the type that might well have affected the [three-judge] panel's appraisal of his moral culpability. . . . The evidence would have helped illustrate the manner in which [petitioner's] violent background contributed to his conduct and violent reaction to the theft that he perceived.

This is also not a case where counsel could have reasonably feared opening the door to negative information that the panel would not have otherwise learned about petitioner. The door was already opened by the information [presented in sentencing] Yet, the panel did not hear any evidence of how violence was so very prevalent during the formative years of petitioner's life-evidence which may have explained why petitioner grew into the kind of adult who found himself frequently reacting in a violent manner. Evidence of petitioner's background would have helped explain petitioner's significant repressed rage, and had the panel been able to place petitioner's "excruciating life history on the mitigating side of the scale," there is a reasonable probability that at least one member of the panel "would have struck a different balance." Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 537, 123 S. Ct. 2527.

Richie v. Sirmons, 563 F. Supp. 2d 1250 (N.D. Okla. 2008), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. Richie v. Workman, 599 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2010) (sentenced in October 1993). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to develop and present neuropsychological evidence. Counsel presented family member testimony of alcoholism in the family, verbal and physical abuse of petitioner, petitioner's prior hospitalization for stab wounds, and petitioner's drug problems and prior problems with the law.

Consisting solely of testimony from family members, the thrust of Petitioner's mitigation defense focused on Petitioner's family history. Some of the family members touched briefly upon Petitioner's social and educational background. However, other than the mention of one hospitalization, there was no testimony regarding Petitioner's medical history, religious and cultural influences, or employment history. Notably, there was no testimony from a medical expert concerning Petitioner's mental state and mental abilities. . . . Omission of mental health evidence from Petitioner's case for mitigation was unreasonable, and resulted in prejudice to Petitioner.

Petitioner had a series of head injuries as a teenager and a long history of severe headaches.

Nothing in the record indicates that trial counsel's failure to investigate and obtain a neurological expert was a strategic decision. Counsel simply did not take any action to determine whether such evidence was available.

While counsel did retain a psychologist prior to trial, his "evaluation was based on personality tests, rather than neuropsychological tests which are designed to detect brain damage." If counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have included evidence of brain dysfunction, a history of significant alcohol and marijuana dependency, and limited intellectual capacity. Reversal was also required because petitioner was denied an instruction on second degree depraved mind murder, which was supported by the record.

2005: King v. Bell*, 392 F. Supp. 2d 964 (M.D. Tenn. 2005) (trial in November 1982). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation and failing to object to the prosecutor's argument expressing his personal opinion. Counsel's conduct was deficient under Strickland and the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice. Counsel "focused their limited sentencing efforts on researching the statutory aggravating and mitigating factors and consulting with each other about the content of closing argument" after the guilty verdict. Id. at 975. Counsel did not interview family members or otherwise investigate. Counsel also failed to even discuss sentencing with the defendant or prepare him for his testimony. Even if counsel were not aware of any of the defendant's history before, counsel knew the basics about the defendant's background from his testimony during the trial. Nonetheless, counsel did not seek to delay sentencing to allow more time for investigation and preparation for sentencing. In short, "it appears trial counsel failed to conduct any investigation whatsoever." Id. at 986. Prejudice found based on the failure to present mitigation and the failure to object to the prosecutor's improper arguments expressing his personal opinion that the defendant deserved the death penalty without objection. If counsel had adequately investigated the evidence would have established that the defendant's biological parents separated when he was nine months old. His father moved to New York. His alcoholic mother gave him over to his aunt and uncle to raise. She died when he was 14 for cirrhosis of the liver. The defendant was raised in a good loving home with discipline even though they lived in "the projects." As a teenager, the defendant started getting into trouble running around with a biological brother raised in a different home nearby. After he was disciplined, he asked to move to New York with his father, which was allowed. His father did not maintain discipline and the defendant started skipping school and getting into trouble. Thus, the defendant "spent his formative years in New York with little supervision." Id. at 979. He became addicted to heroin before returning to Tennessee as a young adult. The turning point in his life though came when his aunt and uncle were murdered in 1975 by Black Moslems in retaliation for a mentally retarded, schizophrenic shooting one of their own. They were abducted and their bodies were later found shot in a burned out vehicle. Four other homes, including those of the defendant's brother and cousin who were raised in the same home with him, were firebombed. The murders "overwhelmed" him and he began seeing and hearing his "Mama" (the aunt) and using drugs to "an even greater extent than before." Id. at 980. He would often call out to her in his sleep and wake up sweating with nightmares. He had "anxiety attacks" and passed out a few times at work. He was also hospitalized for three gunshot wounds and a heroin overdose. His records showed "episodes of depression, heavy alcohol abuse, and IV drug abuse" and a referral for psychiatric treatment. Mental health experts could have testified that the defendant had Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and an organic brain syndrome, along with panic attacks associated with an anxiety disorder. The state court decision was an objectively unreasonable application of Strickland. The court withheld a final ruling, however, in order to conduct an evidentiary hearing to obtain counsel's testimony and "to resolve any factual disputes that may remain."

4. Military Cases

2004: United States v. Kreutzer*, 59 M.J. 773 (Army Crim. App. 2004), aff'd on other grounds, 61 M.J. 293 (2005) (sentenced in 1996). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failure to adequately investigate and present mitigation. The appellant was charged with 18 specifications of attempted premeditated murder and one premeditated murder arising from Appellant opening fire on his unit formation at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. After his apprehension, he asked to speak with a social worker that he identified as "his psychiatrist." The social worker was not available, but a substitute psychiatrist was brought in. Appellant was given three military defense counsel, none with capital experience, beyond a two day training seminar. Prior to trial, Appellant privately paid for an evaluation by a civilian forensic psychiatrist, who advised defense counsel that an insanity defense was not viable and that their efforts should focus on mitigation. This doctor's services were not continued because Appellant could not afford to continue to pay for his services. A sanity board (similar to court-appointed examiners) evaluated Appellant and concluded that he was not suffering from any severe mental disease or defect at the time of the offenses. Counsel then requested funding for a mitigation specialist and for counsel to travel to investigate the case. Although funding for travel was authorized, counsel did very little travel for investigation. The mitigation investigator was denied. Instead, a team of psychiatrists at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center was assigned to evaluate Appellant as defense experts. Counsel interviewed two members of the Walter Reed team, who did not reduce their findings to writing. Their reports were made orally to defense counsel and “were not all favorable” to Appellant. Appellant entered pleas of guilty to the lesser included offenses of aggravated assault with a loaded firearm and murder by an inherently dangerous act, which left the government to prove only specific intent and premeditation. In the defense opening statement, counsel asserted that Appellant’s state of mind at the time of the offenses was the focus of the defense case. During the defense case-in-chief, counsel presented lay testimony about the Appellant’s breakdown in the Sinai two years before that required counseling. Counsel also presented testimony from the President of the Sanity Board, who testified that Appellant had embellished his statements to examiners but had been diagnosed with an adjustment disorder with mixed anxiety and depressed mood, dysthymia (a “lowgrade depression”), and a personality disorder not otherwise specified with a mixture of paranoid and narcissistic traits. This expert also testified that Appellant’s actions were “a coolly calculated plan of revenge upon his unit,” which supported the panel’s findings of premeditation. In sentencing, the defense presented evidence that Appellant came from a normal family upbringing and had been an above average student in high school. Counsel also presented a “good soldier” packet of awards, certificates, transcripts, and counseling statements about Appellant. On appeal, the Army Court granted the request for a mitigation expert. A two-judge majority of the court found that the trial court erred in denying the defense request for a mitigation specialist and that the trial court’s error required that the contested findings and sentence be reversed. [This was the issue addressed in a wonderful fashion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces in United States v. Kreutzer, 61 M.J. 293 (2005).] The unanimous court agreed that counsel was ineffective in sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel did not discover and present evidence of Appellant’s history that included a family history of alcoholism and depression and Appellant’s depression since age 12 and multiple suicide attempts, since age 16. Counsel also did not discover and present the testimony of a social worker, who saw Appellant twice when Appellant broke down in the Sinai. He concluded that Appellant had problems with anger and interpersonal relationships, poor coping skills, and low self-esteem. Counsel also did not listen to the audiotapes of the interview or interview the psychiatrist that examined Appellant shortly after his arrest. The psychiatrist opined that she had never seen anyone in such psychic distress and that Appellant’s mood was severely distraught and that he was irrational and possibly delusional because of his beliefs that “God wanted him to commit murder and that he was doing [the] soldiers a favor by killing them.” Counsel failed to interview the expert witnesses not due to a conscious, tactical decision, but due to incompetence because each counsel thought the other was responsible for interviewing the witnesses. Counsel also never interviewed the psychologist that examined Appellant for suicide risk in pre-trial confinement, even though this expert faxed his report to counsel. This expert found that Appellant was “profoundly depressed” and that “there were definite mental health issues in the case.” Counsel also failed to request that their own examiners at Walter Reed consider mitigation and then failed to adequately interview their own investigation team at Walter Reed. If counsel had adequately investigated, they would have discovered that a third member of the Walter Reed team, a reserve officer, who was also a practicing civilian psychiatrist, signed a written report stating his opinion that Appellant was “chronically and seriously mentally ill,” that “[t]he crimes which he committed are causally related to his mental illness,” and “[t]he impulse to commit these crimes could not have been resisted by” Appellant. As a result of counsels’ failure to adequately investigate and discover all this evidence, counsel presented the harmful testimony of the President of the Sanitary Board. Prejudice was found because, “[a]s horrific as Appellant’s crimes were, there was but a single death, and a substantial body of information to suggest Appellant’s disordered mental status may have affected his volitional acts.” One judge also found that counsel was ineffective in failing to interview or cross-examine the wife of the deceased, who provided victim impact testimony. Had she been interviewed and cross-examined, the panel would have learned that she was a religious woman, who had forgiven Appellant for killing her husband.

Capital Case*

5. State Cases

2024: *State v. Mack, ___ So.3d ___, 2024 WL 5181581 (Ala. Crim. App. 2024) (1995 trial and sentencing). Affirming grant of postconviction relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing for failing to investigate and present evidence of petitioner’s life history which included an abusive childhood. Petitioner was convicted and sentenced to death for a robbery-murder. It was undisputed that petitioner killed the victim. The defense was that petitioner had shot the victim because he was in fear of the victim killing him over the sale of “bad dope.” At the penalty phase, trial counsel presented the testimony of several law-enforcement officers. These witnesses discussed, inter alia, how petitioner had since his incarceration been talking to high-risk juveniles and counseling them about the mistakes that he had made and how they could make decisions so that they would not end up like him. At the postconviction hearing, postconviction counsel presented the testimony of family, friends, and teachers. One of petitioner’s sisters “painted a bleak picture of [petitioner’s] childhood, a childhood marked by extreme poverty, physical abuse, and neglect.” Her testimony was corroborated in part by testimony from a former employee of the Tuscaloosa County Department of Human Resources (“DHR”), a former neighbor, and a teacher. Testimony was not limited to detailing the deprivation and abuse suffered by petitioner. “The testimony of friends and teachers showed how helpful and kind [petitioner] was to everyone that he encountered,” including in school and continuing during military service. Supporting the witness testimony were school records, DHR records, and military records. Also at the postconviction hearing was testimony from trial counsel. Lead counsel claimed to have made a strategic decision to present evidence about petitioner’s time in jail versus presenting family background mitigation to the jury. The postconviction court declined to credit this testimony because it contradicted lead counsel’s earlier testimony that he could not recall whether he had presented a report to the jury containing family background information. Lead counsel also testified that he had wanted to avoid focusing the jury on petitioner’s prior record. Counsel began the defense penalty phase case, however, by calling a California parole officer and asking her what sentence the victim from the prior case thought petitioner should have received. Further, the postconviction court found that lead counsel’s statement to the jury that he did not have any notes for the penalty phase further undercut his testimony about strategy. In contrast, second counsel's testimony about the lack of a mitigation investigation was found more credible by the postconviction court. Based on the record before it, the postconviction court concluded that trial counsel failed to conduct an adequate investigation into mitigation, thereby preventing trial counsel from making a reasonable strategic decision about what to present to the jury. The facts relied on to reach this conclusion included that the attorneys, who had never defended a capital case, were on the case for 28 months before trial but did not start their mitigation work until six days before trial; they did not interview any of [petitioner's] teachers, coaches, neighbors, social services workers, or fellow Marines; they did not request any records regarding [petitioner] or his family; they did not respond when [the medical facility that was to conduct a mental state evaluation] asked them for information about [petitioner]; they did not pursue evidence of the abuse [petitioner] suffered as a child, even after they learned about the abuse in general terms; they did not prepare or present to the jury any evidence about [petitioner's] childhood, adolescence, or service in the Marines; they told the jury at the start of the penalty phase that they did not have any notes for this part of the trial; they presented at least one witness from the sheriff's department who did not know he would be called until that morning and all the other evidence regarding their approach to the penalty phase bears the hallmarks of deficient performance. This is a clear-cut case of deficient performance at the penalty phase.

Capital Case*

The postconviction court's finding that counsel had conducted an inadequate investigation prior to deciding what to present to the jury was supported by the record, which included trial counsel's billing records. The record also contained a letter from the Alabama Prison Project concerning the representation of a defendant charged with a capital offense. In response, second counsel sent lead counsel a draft motion for investigative expenses in order to collect life history records. Lead counsel never filed the motion. Although counsel did retain a clinical social worker to conduct a mitigation investigation, the social worker did not begin working on the case until a week before trial, and the only documents he received from defense counsel were documents that had been provided by the prosecution through discovery or from the state medical facility. The clinical social worker "was retained too late to conduct any type of meaningful investigation." It is also noted that petitioner had admitted to shooting the victim, giving counsel a reason to focus on sentencing. The postconviction court's findings about the inadequacy of trial counsel's performance were not clearly erroneous. The finding of prejudice by the postconviction court was supported by its recounting of the "powerful" and "credible" testimony describing the circumstances of petitioner's childhood, "including profound poverty, extreme physical and verbal violence in the home, neglect and abandonment, and a family history of severe alcoholism." Records not only corroborated testimony but provided independent "vivid accounts of [petitioner's] tumultuous childhood." Not only was the background mitigation "compelling" on its own, "[i]t also would have made it more difficult for the prosecution to argue — as it did at trial and at the judicial sentencing proceeding — that [petitioner's] good conduct at the Tuscaloosa County jail was motivated by secondary gain." In assessing prejudice it is noted that the jury recommended a death sentence by a vote of 10-2. Thus, a single changed vote in favor of life would have prevented a death recommendation. “We agree with the [postconviction] court that there was a ‘reasonable probability’ that the mitigating evidence that counsel failed to present might have influenced at least one juror to vote to recommend a sentence of life imprisonment and not death.” The finding of prejudice was not clearly erroneous.

2022: *State v. Lewis, 371 So.3d 863 (Ala.Crim.App. 2022) (2007 trial). In case where the jury recommended a death sentence on a 10-2 vote, affirming the grant of sentencing relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence. Petitioner was convicted, inter alia, of murdering the victim in the course of kidnapping and robbing the victim’s girlfriend, who petitioner was convicted of attempting to murder by running her over with her own car. The victim was shot by petitioner while sitting in the victim’s girlfriend’s automobile with two toddlers in the back seat. The abandoned car was discovered the day after the shooting with the victim dead in the passenger seat and the toddlers still in the vehicle. At the sentencing phase, only two witnesses were called by the defense: (1) a forensic psychologist who was hired only five weeks before trial and who knew very little about petitioner’s tumultuous childhood or his success when he was in a stable environment and who, because of trial counsel’s deficient investigation, testified incorrectly about petitioner’s background; and (2) a cousin who happened to be attending trial that day and who was not prepared to testify and was not asked about petitioner’s childhood. The post-conviction court did not err when it adopted in part the proposed order of petitioner granting penalty relief. Nor did the post-conviction court err in its consideration of the ABA Guidelines. The post-conviction court did not mischaracterize the trial psychologist’s limited work on the case. The psychologist’s testimony made clear that her late involvement prevented her from conducting a “full blown” mitigation investigation and that she did not receive any files from counsel that would have assisted in her investigation. It was not clearly erroneous for the post-conviction court to assert that the attorney initially assigned to prepare the penalty phase defense had done “nothing” where the attorney spoke only with petitioner’s mother and interviewed no other family members or school teachers and failed to obtain medical or Department of Human Resources (DHR) records. Because the post-conviction court did not rely on the testimony from a mitigation expert who could not herself have testified at the time of petitioner’s trial, the State could not establish it was harmed by admission of the testimony. The post-conviction court did not clearly err in finding that trial counsel was constitutionally ineffective at the sentencing phase. The entire trial mitigation case took up only 13 pages of transcript and although abuse by a stepfather was mentioned, along with petitioner’s removal from the home and his multiple placements over the years, the jury learned little about petitioner’s actual background. “In sharp contrast, at the postconviction hearing, counsel presented numerous witnesses who testified about [petitioner’s] difficult upbringing and his abusive stepfather and the impact of that abuse on [petitioner].” Testimony came from multiple family members as well as a teacher, a foster parent, a counselor and longtime friends of petitioner and his mother. In addition to discussing the hardships petitioner faced, witnesses touched on petitioner’s positive attributes. Also presented in the post-conviction proceeding were DHR records and other exhibits documenting the abuse suffered by petitioner and his extensive history in the foster care system. Although trial counsel testified that he had retained a mitigation expert, i.e., the forensic psychologist, “it is clear that this expert was hired too late to conduct an extensive mitigation investigation or to uncover the mitigation that was presented at the postconviction court evidentiary hearing.”

2021 Ex Parte Garza*, 620 S.W.3d 801 (Tex. Crim. App. 2021) (2005 trial and sentencing). In case where Garza was sentenced to death for the murders of six men in the course of robbery or attempted robbery, trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. Although Garza, a gang leader, admitted to planning the robbery of the victims, he was not physically present when the offense took place and he denied that killing had been part of the plan. He cooperated with and assisted authorities in locating others involved in the crime. During the sentencing phase, the prosecution presented evidence of Garza's substantial criminal history. Defense counsel called eight witnesses in mitigation: (1) a Sheriff's Department officer testified that Garza had not caused "any problem" in the facility where he had been detained for this offense and that Garza had participated in Bible study; (2) three witnesses testified to Garza's active participation in prison ministry programs; (3) a treatment-program counselor testified that, upon his earlier release on parole, Garza had attended three months of an alcohol-abuse treatment program and attended church on Sundays; (4) a family friend testified that, at age ten, Garza saw the "blood gushing out of [her husband's] head" after he was fatally shot; (5) Garza's aunt testified that his father had not been present much in Garza's home, that she tried to help Garza and minister to him throughout his life, and that she remained close to him through his high school years and had visited him in prison. She was unaware, however, that he was in a gang; and (6) Garza's mother testified, inter alia, to her attempts to help Garza and obtain counseling for him when he got in trouble in high school, that she visited him regularly when he was in prison and that she had always had a good relationship with him, that she assisted him when he was released on parole, and that Garza's father, who was often in prison and died a year before the capital offense, was not around when Garza was growing up, although he treated Garza "[g]ood." She denied that Garza was in a gang. Garza was sentenced to death. In the state habeas proceedings, lead trial counsel Martinez, who had been hired by Garza's mother and lacked death penalty experience, explained that he and court appointed local counsel conducted the mitigation investigation themselves rather than retain an investigator or mitigation specialist. Although Martinez believed the trial court would have granted a request to appoint someone to assist, Martinez did not believe this was necessary because "there wasn't that much mitigation in this case. . . ." In rejecting the lower court's conclusion that trial counsel performed effectively, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals (TCCA) observed:

The record reflects that trial counsel relied almost exclusively on the assistance of [Garza's] mother to locate witnesses, records, and information in the mitigation investigation. [Garza's] mother defended her own parenting abilities and represented that their household and his childhood had been normal except for the absence of his father. When [Garza's] mother did not produce the requested school records, counsel did not try to obtain the records themselves. [Garza's] mother found potential witnesses from her own family and brought them to a hotel to talk to counsel in a group, but she did not include witnesses from [Garza's] father's family. Counsel did not interview the witnesses separately or ask them specific questions about sensitive matters, such as alcohol and drug use.

Capital Case*

Notably, trial counsel declined to seek any investigative or expert assistance in conducting the mitigation investigation and in assessing Garza's mental health "despite the 'red flags' evident in [Texas Youth Commission] documents in the State's file." These records revealed that Garza "had received mental health treatment services, suffered from persistent depression and PTSD due to childhood trauma, had experienced suicidal thoughts, as a teenager engaged in serious substance abuse, had anger-management issues, and reported 'problems with being pushed into sex.'" The TCCA summarized the several types of mitigating evidence that trial counsel failed to investigate or fully develop, as shown in the state habeas hearing: (1) Garza suffered from PTSD due to childhood trauma; (2) Garza's mother was a heavy drinker, he was exposed to alcohol in the womb, and an expert diagnosed him with a type of FASD; (3) Garza suffered from "Persistent Depressive Disorder" and experienced occasional suicidal ideation in adolescence; (4) Garza was raised in a dysfunctional extended-family environment characterized by drug trafficking, violence, sexual abuse of female family members, and pervasive alcohol and drug abuse; (5) Garza's FASD and PTSD made it "psychologically difficult for [him] to resist the antisocial role modeling in his environment"; (6) Garza abused alcohol and cocaine during adolescence; (7) Garza's parents neglected him, failed to supervise him, and spoiled him with "lavish material gifts[] bought with drug trafficking proceeds"; (8) Garza idolized his violent, often-incarcerated, gang-member father who pioneered the type of "pseudocop robbery" that Garza committed in this case; and (9) at age five or six, Garza was molested by his 13-year-old aunt who has admitted this conduct but stated that it consisted of "mostly fondling." The TCCA observed that "trial counsel's open-ended questions of family members—often in a group setting—were not sufficient to elicit the kind of sensitive information counsel needed to develop mitigation evidence in this case." Further, there was no evidence that either one of Garza's trial attorneys "had the expertise to decide whether [Garza] had any mental illness or dysfunction without the assistance of a qualified expert." Garza established that trial counsel failed to conduct the required "thorough investigation of his background" and that their performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Although the aggravating evidence adduced at trial was powerful, the TCCA nevertheless found "a reasonable probability that, but for defense counsel's deficient investigation, at least one juror would have struck a different balance, voting to spare [Garza's] life."

Compared to the meager mitigating evidence presented at the punishment trial, the new mitigating evidence is voluminous and paints a starkly different, more detailed, and more nuanced, picture of [Garza's] childhood and formative years. That evidence includes a wealth of information about how parental neglect and incarceration, sexual and physical abuse, extreme violence, and exposure to drug-dealing and substance abuse influenced [Garza's] upbringing. It also shows that [Garza] suffered from PTSD from an early age and that, because it was left untreated, [Garza] developed other mental health problems like chronic depression and suicidal ideations. It also shows that [Garza] likely suffers from FASD.

As for the State's argument that the evidence concerning PTSD and FASD was "double-edged," and therefore not helpful, the TCCA explained that just because evidence is "double-edged" does not make it dispositive of the prejudice issue. Rather, a court must "consider all the evidence from trial and the habeas proceedings, even if it is ‘double-edged.’” The TCCA noted that there are two types of “double-edged” evidence. First, there are diagnoses such as PTSD and FASD that some jurors could view as lessening moral culpability while others could see as creating a risk of future danger. The second is evidence that contains mitigating evidence, for example, a juvenile report, but that also reveals previously unknown aggravating facts. “Although these types of evidence are ‘double-edged,’ they could nonetheless tip the scales of the prejudice analysis when the entirety of the available mitigating evidence is considered.” On the record of this case, prejudice is found. Despite the substantial aggravation, the TCCA concluded “that the habeas mitigation evidence would have provided jurors with important context about [Garza’s] life that trial counsel failed to present and that would have drawn a considerably different picture for the jury of [Garza’s] childhood and mental health than what it was presented with at trial.”

2020: *State v. Montgomery, 2020 WL 7233090 (Ohio App. 2020) (2012 convictions). In triple murder case where the victims were petitioner’s former girlfriend, Tia, their two-year-old son, and Tia’s nine-year-old daughter, affirming grant of relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present expert testimony regarding petitioner’s untreated childhood trauma—from sexual abuse but also from the suffering and witnessing of physical abuse, substance abuse, and familial mental health problems—in order to explain how all of that impacted his brain development, his personal relationships and his adult life. It was also ineffective for trial counsel to have failed to further investigate and offer expert testimony to explain petitioner’s dissociation during a number of instances throughout his life, including possibly during the commission of the capital crimes. Petitioner pleaded guilty to the killings, waived jury sentencing and was sentenced by a three-judge panel. Although trial counsel had retained two psychologists who could have helped the sentencing panel understand the relationships between petitioner’s untreated childhood traumas and his actions as an adult, trial counsel chose not to present that expert testimony to the three-judge-panel. It was not reasonable to presume that the general experience of the judges obviated the need for expert explanation. And the inclusion of a mental health report in the record was not a sufficient substitute for expert testimony. That certain negative information about petitioner’s history of domestic violence could have been revealed had the expert testimony been presented did not justify the decision to forgo such testimony which could have provided a context and explanation for the bad conduct. The lower court’s conclusion that trial counsel performed deficiently in this case was supported by, inter alia, the testimony of trial counsel, the mitigation supervisor of the Office of the Public Defender, and an experienced capital defense attorney. And even though the aggravating circumstances in this case were “extreme,” the lower court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that prejudice was established. NOTE: Following an agreement between the prosecution and defense counsel, a three-judge panel in 2023 resentenced Caron Montgomery to life imprisonment without possibility of parole. Commonwealth v. Housman, 226 A.3d 1249 (Pa. 2020) (2001 penalty phase). Trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase of petitioner’s capital trial for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. Petitioner and his live-in girlfriend, co-defendant Markman, were convicted, inter alia, of the murder of a young woman, White, who petitioner was having a romantic relationship with. At the penalty phase, defense counsel presented testimony from a spiritual advisor

at the prison where petitioner was incarcerated, petitioner's half-sister, a psychologist, and petitioner. The half-sister described sexual, physical and emotional abuse by petitioner's father inflicted on herself and two other brothers. When she reported the sexual abuse to her mother, her mother left her husband and took petitioner's half-sister and her siblings, leaving petitioner with his father. The psychologist stated that petitioner had disclosed his own abuse and harsh treatment by his father. Petitioner's failure to achieve success in school was attributed by the psychologist to an attention deficit disorder and his inability to form positive relationships with others. Although the psychologist stated that petitioner lacked a history of violence or aggression, he also testified that petitioner had been diagnosed as having a conduct disorder because of his acting out as an adolescent which resulted in his hospitalization for three weeks in South Carolina. The records reviewed by the psychologist indicated that petitioner did well for a short period of time after his release from the facility but he received no follow-up treatment. When petitioner took the stand, he requested a life sentence so that he could continue to correspond with the spiritual advisor. In finding that trial counsel performed deficiently, the failure to obtain the records from the mental health clinic where petitioner had been hospitalized was highlighted. Trial counsel erroneously assumed that the records he received from the South Carolina medical center encompassed all the relevant records. Review of the missing records would have led counsel to the doctors who had treated petitioner and would have provided evidence supporting the more severe mental health diagnoses presented in the post-conviction proceedings: neurocognitive impairment; severe ADHD; Generalized Anxiety Disorder with elements of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder; Dysthymic Disorder; and Developmental Reading Disorder. Counsel would also have received information about petitioner's background and home-life at the time of his hospitalization and learned how his family had essentially washed their hands of him and refused to provide the assistance recommended by the mental health experts. Trial counsel's apparent reliance on his retained expert, who counsel knew was neither a forensic psychiatrist nor psychologist, did not absolve him from his failure to obtain key records he should have known existed.

An attorney cannot abdicate his own responsibility by hiring a mental health expert, or any other expert for that matter. While a mental health expert reasonably may be expected to spot red flags regarding certain aspects of a defendant's mental state, the expert is not an attorney, and should not be expected to make decisions as to whether to obtain records, such as school or hospital records, that are clearly relevant to a defendant's mitigation case, or to decide what witnesses to interview.

Turning to prejudice, "[a]lthough [the trial expert] testified at the penalty phase that [petitioner] was subject to 'a number of negative environmental factors, abandonment, loss issues,' and witness to 'family torture and violence,' he did not describe any specific incidents in support of that vague statement." Evidence from a reasonable investigation would have provided the jury was "a more vivid picture of the violence and abuse that occurred in the household from the time [petitioner] was born." And had the trial expert been provided with the relevant records, it was possible that he would have "observed the same red flags and risk factors for brain dysfunction and abnormal brain development" that were described in the post-conviction proceeding. Notably, this case involved a single aggravating factor. The missing evidence would have supported the submission of two additional statutory mitigating factors (extreme emotional disturbance and impaired capacity), and, at the very least, the same evidence “may have resulted in at least one juror finding that the mitigating circumstances under the catch-all mitigator collectively outweighed, or were as weighty as, the single aggravating circumstance, such that the penalty verdict would have been different.”

2018: Reams v. State*, 560 S.W.3d 441 (Ark. 2018) (1993 trial and sentencing). Affirming decision that trial counsel was ineffective at the penalty phase for failing to call the co-perpetrator to testify that he had been the actual shooter. Petitioner was convicted as an accomplice of capital murder based on the robbery and shooting death of a victim at an ATM, and sentenced to death. The co-perpetrator had pleaded guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to life without parole shortly before petitioner’s trial. During post-conviction proceedings, counsel testified that he could not talk to the co-perpetrator because he was represented by counsel, that he did not have a good relationship with the co-perpetrator’s counsel, and that he did not know when the co-perpetrator pleaded guilty. He did not investigate any of this or attempt to present the co-perpetrator’s testimony to corroborate petitioner’s defense that he was not the shooter. At the post-conviction hearing, the co-perpetrator admitted that he was the shooter. Although this did not have legal relevance during the guilt phase, it did at the penalty phase. This testimony left the post-conviction court “with doubts that the petitioner fired the fatal shot” and “those doubts . . . would have caused at least one reasonable juror to have doubt that the petitioner should be sentenced to death, despite his unquestionable complicity in the capital murder.” 560 S.W.3d at 456 (quoting post-conviction court). The state Supreme Court rejected the state’s argument that there were questions whether the co-perpetrator would have testified at the trial based on his hearing testimony; it determined that the co-perpetrator had already pleaded guilty and been sentenced to life without parole by the time of petitioner’s trial, so it was likely he would have testified.. (Petitioner also raised a claim that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to raise a fair cross-section challenge based on the systematic underrepresentation of African-American potential jurors under Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1979). The post-conviction court had denied that claim. The Arkansas Supreme Court reversed, finding that trial counsel was deficient but remanding for a determination of whether there was a valid Duren claim. If there was, this established the necessary prejudice for a grant of relief.)

Commonwealth v. Crispell, 193 A.3d 919 (Pa. 2018) (1990 trial and sentencing). Affirming grant of relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present mitigation. Petitioner was convicted, inter alia, of the robbery, kidnapping and murder of a woman who had been abducted in her own car from a mall parking lot. She was taken to a deserted area where she was stabbed to death. At the time of the murder, petitioner was eighteen years old. At trial, the key issue in dispute was whether petitioner or the co-defendant stabbed the victim. The case in mitigation at trial was limited to petitioner’s own testimony reciting his age, expressing remorse, and continuing to deny having stabbed the victim. Trial counsel had entered into an agreement with the Commonwealth to forgo the presentation of evidence about petitioner’s good character or his lack of criminal history in order to keep out evidence of petitioner’s extensive history of violent juvenile delinquency. Trial counsel conducted few interviews in preparation for the sentencing phase and collected minimal records. Petitioner informed counsel that he did not want his teacher, father or brother called as witnesses. Three days after the capital crime, petitioner had been arrested in Arizona for attempted purse snatching. His public defender in that case was concerned with petitioner's mental condition and arranged psychological testing prior to petitioner's extradition to Pennsylvania. The testing indicated petitioner had impulse control problems, significant problems with depression, manic phases, posterior brain damage, and "a number of things with regard to his family" Trial counsel failed to respond to the public defender's attempts to contact him concerning these findings. In state post-conviction proceedings, evidence was discovered and presented concerning physical, verbal and sexual abuse; mental health issues including PTSD; childhood poverty and hardship; substance abuse; and suicide attempts. Included in the voluminous records reviewed by a forensic psychiatrist was a medical record from when petitioner was sixteen years old. He had run away from home and reported that he was brutally raped by two men on a beach in Florida. The records also recounted at least one suicide attempt. Letters written pre-trial by petitioner to trial counsel and others reflected anxiety, suicidal thoughts, references to an alter ego, and multiple requests for psychiatric treatment and an evaluation. Background evidence discovered post-trial indicated petitioner's father began hitting petitioner around age 3, using sticks, belts, broomsticks, and metal objects, as well as punching petitioner in the face and then choking him. Military records showed that the military was going to find petitioner psychologically unfit for military duty. Petitioner suffered from emotional instability, persistent headaches and unpredictable losses of consciousness. Notably, the juvenile records that trial counsel had obtained indicated petitioner's dysfunctional family situation, providing a description of "child abuse, physical child abuse, by the father; growing up in a dysfunctional home environment; frequent moves; sexual assault; and behavioral problems; a wish to die; [and] problems with depression." Unpersuasive was trial counsel's post-trial contention that the prevailing norms at the time of petitioner's 1990 trial in Clearfield County did not include development of mental health issues for mitigation and that little was being done on showing how a family history impacted a defendant. "The Commonwealth's own experts . . . testified that a capital defendant's background and trauma were part of the mitigation assessment at the time. Professional norms for capital representation in 1990 did not exempt mental health and family background from investigation." Decisions made by petitioner to limit the mitigation presentation did not preclude relief because those decisions were made prior to trial counsel conducting an adequate investigation. And while the agreement trial counsel made to limit good character evidence was reasonable, the agreement did not preclude the introduction of evidence about petitioner's sexual, physical, or emotional abuse, or his history of mental health problems. In the post-conviction proceedings, the Commonwealth presented a forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist in rebuttal. Yet all experts agreed that the pre-trial testing presented red flags indicating the need for further investigation and evaluation. And all experts agreed about the psychological impacts of petitioner's upbringing and that understanding this upbringing was essential to understanding petitioner in 1990. Although the Commonwealth's forensic psychiatrist questioned the validity of petitioner's early report of juvenile rape, "it was not necessary to determine every detail about what did or did not occur, because the evidence of the sexual assault and the trauma it produced was available to trial counsel, was attested to by experts for both parties, and could have been presented to the jury." And as for disagreement about the PTSD diagnosis, this also did not need to be resolved as all experts testified about the psychologically damaging impact of petitioner's upbringing. Testimony collectively established a reasonable probability that one juror may have reached a different sentencing verdict based on the omitted evidence. NOTE: A deal was reached and Daniel Crispell was resentenced to life without parole.

2017: *Ellerbee v. State of Florida, 232 So. 3d 909 (Fla. 2017) (trial and sentencing presentation 2009).

Petitioner was convicted of capital murder, cruelty to animals, burglary with an assault or battery while armed, grand theft of a firearm, and grand theft of a motor vehicle and sentenced to death by a recommendation of the jury by a vote of 11 to 1. After rejecting several claims of IAC related to the guilt phase, Supreme Court of Florida granted habeas corpus relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase (as well as pursuant to Hurst). The court noted,

Based on our conclusion that Ellerbee is entitled to a new penalty phase proceeding pursuant to Hurst and Mosley, we would normally decline to reach his penalty phase claims. Nevertheless, we feel compelled to address this issue [of IAC] because of the egregious nature of Ellerbee's upbringing, counsel's failure to discover it, and the prejudice Ellerbee suffered as a result. Due to the multiple failures of trial counsel to explore and present various aspects of Ellerbee's childhood, compounded with the presentation of conflicting evidence during the penalty phase, we cannot say the outcome of the penalty phase would have been the same had the jury heard this evidence.

While the postconviction court found deficient performance for the failure to develop mitigating evidence but not prejudice, the Supreme Court found prejudice, too. The Supreme Court also found deficient performance and prejudice for the failure to develop mental health mitigation. At trial, evidence was presented that Ellerbee's mother physically abused him and his siblings, poked them with a cattle prod, forced them to drink castor oil, beat them with hoses, switches, and cutting boards, did not feed them, and kept a padlock on the refrigerator. Although there was testimony that Ellerbee's father hit him with a belt, other testimony was presented that his father loved him, took him hunting, and never physically abused him. By contrast, at the evidentiary hearing on postconviction, there was testimony that Ellerbee's father whipped and beat Ellerbee with his belt, punched him in the chest to knock the air out of him, and punched him in the head. He brought Ellerbee to the bad part of town while he looked for women and drugs and locked Ellerbee in the tool box of his truck. He dropped Ellerbee off with relatives, wearing dirty clothes, malnourished. His father was not involved in Ellerbee's schooling and withdrew him from a dropout prevention program. Ellerbee's father was always drunk, used drugs, and had women through his house. The trailer Ellerbee lived in was filthy, his clothes soiled with feces, and there were bugs and rotten furniture inside. The hunting trips were terrifying for Ellerbee because they occurred at night, involved a lot of drinking, and were dangerous because the hogs being hunted were massive and mean. Mental health evidence presented at trial was conflicting and unsubstantiated (including that Ellerbee had diagnoses of fetal alcohol syndrome although there was evidence that his mother did not drink during her pregnancy). In postconviction, the evidence presented explained how Ellerbee's abusive background (adverse childhood experiences, or ACEs) and extensive drug use damaged his brain and affected his cognitive development. Ellerbee was exposed to at least 9 of the 10 ACEs, leading to impaired development, emotional regulation, executive function, and decision making. He also experienced psychological maltreatment, including rejection, isolation, ignoring, terrorizing, and corrupting. Ellerbee was 21 at the time of the murder, at a time before his brain was fully developed in the areas of emotional regulation, executive function, and decision making. Ellerbee experienced chronic stressful events, with an increase in the release of cortisol that caused damage to his organ systems and brain. His severe drug and alcohol use, including chronic methamphetamine use, led to brain dysfunction, including frontal lobe deficits. Had the jury heard about the extensive abuse and how it affected his emotional and cognitive development, in addition to the other mitigation presented, there is a reasonable probability it would have arrived at a different sentencing conclusion.

2016: State v. Bright*, 200 So. 3d 710 (Fla. 2016) (sentencing in 2009). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. The defendant was sentenced to death by an eight to four vote. The defendant, who was a former Marine, killed his two roommates with a hammer. His ex-wife testified that he had had problems with the roommates, who had essentially taken over the house for the purpose of selling drugs. They had made multiple calls to the police but did not pursue charges out of fear of retaliation. After his arrest, the defendant made statements to multiple people consistent with this testimony. He also said that on the night of the killing, one of the two victims was waving a gun around and the defendant “lost it.” The defendant struggled with him and the gun went off. The gun then jammed and the defendant grabbed a hammer and killed both men. In sentencing, counsel presented testimony that the defendant had been a good Marine for over nine years but was discharged due to abuse of alcohol. Friends, family, and co-workers described him as a good man, who struggled with alcohol and drug abuse. Before the judge, a psychologist (Miller) testified about the defendant’s dependency problems. While he had attempted rehabilitation, the treatment never addressed the underlying emotional issues. Relying on this testimony, the court found one statutory mitigating circumstance – extreme mental or emotional disturbance – but still imposed death. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present other available mitigation evidence. Lead counsel designated his co-counsel as “penalty phase counsel.” Co-counsel retained a psychologist (Krop) to evaluate competence to stand trial and potentially to evaluate mitigation. In an initial letter, Krop informed counsel that the defendant was competent, “but asked whether he should conduct a more comprehensive mitigation evaluation and requested additional background information and records, particularly his VA psychiatric records,” as well as family interviews. In a subsequent letter ten days later, Krop provided a detailed history report based on the defendant’s statements, “alerting counsel to a history of family mental health problems, bipolar disorder, as well as a prior involuntary commitment.” Following that letter, co-counsel obtained information that the most of the defendant’s prior arrests were drug-related and obtained some VA medical records, but “the investigation ended there.” A year later, Krop, who had been provided no additional information, wrote to co-counsel requesting the same documents and interviews earlier requested. With still no response, Krop wrote two months later noting that counsel had not arranged the family interviews requested. Krop was never contacted again until post- conviction counsel contacted him. “[L]ead counsel was predominantly out of the loop” and knew nothing about Krop. He scrambled only after the conviction to prepare and present the limited sentencing evidence that was presented. If counsel had investigated and provided the available records and information to the experts, Dr. Miller’s suspicions of “deeper emotional and mental health struggles” would have been confirmed. Between 1983 and 1997, the defendant had been treated for mental health problems on multiple occasions. In 1997, he was involuntarily committed because he was suicidal and behaving erratically. He was diagnosed with depressive disorders. Correctional records indicated diagnoses of depression, anxiety, and bipolar disorder. These records also reflected a family history of mental health problems. School records reflected low academic performance related to the “effect of a horrific childhood.” While the defendant’s sister had testified in sentencing, her testimony in post-conviction provided far more information about how the defendant “grew up in a situation that could have easily been referred to as child labor and slave labor.” The sister described “destitute” living; forced labor in their father’s junkyard; physical, verbal, and emotional abuse of the defendant, his siblings, and their mother by their alcoholic father; and physical and sexual abuse of the defendant by his older brother. Expert testimony “explained for the first time” in post-conviction how this abuse caused severe trauma leading to severe mental disorders, including major depression, obsessive compulsive disorder (OCD), social phobia, substance abuse, and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). Prejudice established. At minimum, this additional evidence would have supported the additional mitigating factor of lack of capacity to conform conduct to the law. Moreover, even without this additional information, the sentencing court “expressed notable hesitation” in imposing a death sentence.

Salazar v. State, 188 So. 3d 799 (Fla. 2016) (trial and sentencing in 2006). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. The state conceded that counsel’s conduct was deficient, as counsel failed to conduct any investigation. Counsel also failed to follow-up on the recommendations of the one expert who conducted a preliminary evaluation of the defendant one week before trial. The expert noted the possibility of mental health impairments and possible organic brain damage that should be investigated. Instead, counsel presented only the testimony of the defendant’s two sisters about the love and support the defendant provided to his family. Prejudice was established as there was significant available evidence of the defendant’s low IQ, borderline intellectual functioning, and deficits in adaptive behavior. There was also significant mitigating evidence about the defendant’s family history and traumatic childhood.

2015: *Commonwealth v. Solano, 129 A.3d 1156 (Pa. 2015) (2003 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence “of the cognitive and psychological impact of Solano’s traumatic and abusive childhood.” Counsel, who had only graduated from law school two years earlier and had no experience in homicide or capital cases, did not use available investigators in the public defender office and instead conducted her own mitigation investigation. Counsel met with the defendant only about five times and found him to be “guarded,” but “she did nothing to foster a rapport with him in an effort to enable him to be more open with her.” Counsel contacted only the defendant’s mother and brother, despite having the names and locations of extended family members. Counsel did not interview the defendant’s Children and Youth Services (CYS) caseworker. While she obtained a mental health evaluation, she did not discuss the evaluation with the examiner before deciding not to call him as a witness because of his anti-social personality diagnosis. In sentencing, counsel presented testimony only from the CYS caseworker, who had not been interviewed or provided a copy of the CYS records, the defendant’s mother, and former foster parents. If counsel had adequately investigated, a number of the defendant’s school teachers and aunts and uncles would have testified. The presentencing mental health expert, who had not been provided with information from these witnesses or the records of the defendant’s parents, also would have provided substantial mitigating testimony. The CYS caseworker would have provided much stronger mitigating testimony, if he had been interviewed and provided the prior records. Neuropsychological testing would have established a cognitive disorder. Prejudice established. Even though the jury found the “catch-all mitigator,” if counsel had adequately investigated and presented the evidence, “the jury may have given this mitigator more weight had counsel presented additional life-history mitigating evidence.” The available but unrepresented evidence “was not merely cumulative – it provided significant details concerning Solano’s background that were not mentioned at the penalty phase.”

Chatman v. Walker, 773 S.E.2d 192 (Ga. 2015) (2005 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel obtained funded for a mitigation specialist and hired William Scott, based on the recommendation of someone counsel had worked with on a prior capital case. According to counsel, Scott claimed to be a “Ph.D.” with experience in capital cases, but his curriculum vitae did not support these claims. Counsel hired him without investigating further and delegated responsibility for developing mitigation to him. Scott, on the other hand, testified that he disclosed his limited experience to counsel and was relying to counsel to guide him and obtain records. Over a six month period prior to trial, Scott billed for 82 hours, less than 20 of which was devoted to interviews. Then three months before trial, counsel retained a psychiatric expert, who provided a report detailing five areas of potential mitigation, which were not pursued. Counsel asked Scott for a report and received only a half-page summary of his work and conclusions, along with four pages of sparse handwritten notes. Scott also provided a “script” for his proposed testimony. Although counsel were concerned about Scott’s level of preparation, counsel was focused on obtaining an “acquittal” and believed it was too late to obtain a different mitigation specialist. During sentencing, counsel presented testimony only from the defendant’s aunt, Scott, and the psychiatrist. Scott essentially testified that life was good for the defendant until his father died when the defendant was fifteen years old, which contradicted the testimony of the defense psychiatrist and “eventually devolved into opinions about Walker’s characterological problems and the alignment of the planets.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in hiring Scott “without any investigation into his qualifications and then delegat[ing] to him responsibility for the mitigation investigation without sufficient supervision.” Prejudice established. While the psychiatrist made some effort, “his account of Walker’s life provided, at best, an overview and was cause for further investigation” into the extensive domestic violence in the defendant’s childhood home between his parents, as well as the extreme physical abuse by his caretakers. In light of the “inaccurate, impersonal” sentencing presentation, the state was able to argue that the defendant’s “childhood wasn’t that bad” and his siblings were “doing quite well.” If counsel had performed adequately, the jury would have had substantial evidence of the defendant’s “exposure to pervasive violence in the forms of domestic violence, physical abuse, and abusive corporal punishment, which came from nearly every adult in [his] life who acted in a parental role.” The witnesses that could have provided this testimony could also have “explained how and why Walker differed from his siblings.”

2014: State v. Herring*, 28 N.E.3d 1217 (Ohio 2014) (tried and sentenced in 1997). Counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence, instead presenting only positive-mitigation evidence. The defendant and five other individuals robbed a bar and shot five people, three of whom died. The defendant was the “ringleader.” If counsel had adequately investigated and conducted psychological testing, the evidence would have established that the defendant suffers from alcohol and substance abuse/dependence; depressive disorder; personality disorder with narcissistic and antisocial features; and learning disabilities. Other available evidence would have established the defendant's deeply troubled childhood, such that most of the adults around him were drug addicts, a complete lack of any positive role models, membership in gangs, as well as the possibility of organic brain impairment. While the mitigation specialist hired performed inadequately, it was counsel's responsibility to ensure an adequate investigation. While the state argued that counsel made a strategic decision to present only positive evidence, this argument was rejected because "counsel's decision to pursue a positive-mitigation theory was not justified because it was made before an adequate investigation had been conducted into Herring's background." Likewise, Herring's failure to be "forthcoming" about negative information about his family did not excuse counsel's failures. Prejudice established.

Commonwealth v. Daniels, 104 A.3d 267 (Pa. 2014) (sentenced in November 1989). Counsel for defendant Pelzer, who was jointly tried with his co-defendant Daniels, was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health evidence in mitigation. Both were convicted of kidnaping for ransom and murder after holding the victim bound and gagged in the trunk of a car for more than 24 hours and then shooting him four times in the back of the neck to make sure he was dead. Pelzer's mitigation in sentencing consisted only of his own testimony and four pages of testimony from his aunt, with whom he lived as a teenager. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate and present additional mitigation from the aunt, who testified for 46 pages in post-conviction in a "more pointed" fashion. Additionally, another aunt and uncle were available to testify. This testimony would have established that Pelzer's mother was a compulsive gambler who permitted her home to be taken over by drug dealers. There were frequent changes of homes and schools and violently abusive men in the home. Pelzer was using drugs and alcohol by age 15. Counsel also failed to obtain school records despite his knowledge that the defendant was a "slow learner." The records indicated a learning disability, depression, feelings of inadequacy, and anxiety and should have led to counsel to investigate mental health evidence. A pre-sentencing report prepared for the court indicated a mixed personality disorder. Defense experts in post-conviction testified that he met the standards for two mitigating circumstances: (1) the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental and emotional disturbance and (2) his capacity to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law was substantially impaired. Both of these were statutory mitigating circumstances that the jury had not been instructed to consider. Prejudice was established, despite the Commonwealth's presentation of contradictory expert testimony in post-conviction and despite the presence of four aggravating circumstances, one of which was torture. Despite "the relative paucity of the mitigation presented by counsel at trial," the court found it significant that "the jurors were still receptive enough to find two mitigators, one unanimously." Specifically, the jury unanimously found the lack of a significant prior criminal history and a single juror found "the catchall mitigator."

When analyzing Strickland prejudice in the context of the penalty phase of a capital trial, we must also keep in mind how tailored death penalty proceedings are toward life sentences, largely under the command of the U.S. Supreme Court, not only in the channeling of aggravators and the differing burdens of proof governing aggravators and mitigators, but also in the fact that a single juror can effectively negate the prospect of a death sentence.

Here, the evidence arguably would have supported two additional statutory mitigating factors and would have strengthened and added weight to “the catchall mitigator.” “There is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would view both the mitigation case differently, and the overall penalty judgment differently, and would have decided against the imposition of the death penalty.”

Commonwealth v. Tharp, 101 A.3d 736 (Pa. 2014) (tried in November 2000). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health evidence in mitigation. The defendant was convicted of deliberately starving her seven-year-old daughter to death. The defendant had three other children and did not mistreat or neglect them. The victim in this case, however, the second born, was born prematurely and spent the first year of her life hospitalized. At age 7, she died from malnutrition due to starvation. She weighed less than 12 pounds and was only 31 inches tall. The defendant testified during the trial and denied guilt. She further testified about her background asserting that she had been the victim of physical and emotional abuse at the hands of her parents, step-parents, and previous boyfriends, including the fathers of her children. In sentencing, counsel presented no additional evidence, with the exception of a stipulation that the defendant had no prior criminal history. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present evidence of the defendant’s brain damage, mental health disorders, and low I.Q. Counsel conceded that they had interviewed two family members “for purposes of the guilt phase” but did not even inquire about mitigation. They interviewed no other family members and did not obtain any school, medical, or prison records. Additionally, despite a pretrial competence report indicating borderline intellectual functioning, schizoaffective disorder, adjustment disorder with anxiety, depressive personality disorder, and passive-aggressive personality disorder, counsel did not investigate further or call the competence examiner to testify in sentencing. Counsel also failed to obtain prior medical records indicating that the defendant was suffering from depression, even prior to the birth of the deceased child, and pretrial confinement records indicating that the defendant was being treated for major depression. Counsel conceded that there was strategic reason for these failures. Post-conviction examiners diagnosed brain damage, cognitive disorder, post-traumatic stress disorder (based on her prior abuse as a child), major depressive disorder, borderline intellectual functioning, borderline independent personality disorders, polysubstance abuse, dissociative disorder, adjustment disorder, and encephalopathy (altered brain function). The pretrial competence examiner agreed with these experts that at the time of the crimes, (1) the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental and emotional disturbance and (2) her capacity to conform her conduct to the requirements of the law was substantially impaired. Both of these were statutory mitigating circumstances that the jury had not been instructed to consider. Prejudice established where the sole aggravating circumstance was the age of the victim.

Weik v. State, 761 S.E.2d 757 (S.C. 2014) (tried in June 1999). Trial counsel were ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to develop and present social history mitigation evidence. The defendant killed his girlfriend following an argument over the couple’s child. He confessed to the shooting and cooperated with law enforcement. “There was never any dispute regarding guilt.” The aggravating factors asserted by the state were burglary and torture because the shooting occurred on the victim's property and there were multiple shots. The defense presented three mental health experts in sentencing who testified that Weik suffers from "paranoid schizophrenia, including auditory and visual hallucinations, suicidal ideations, and paranoid delusions." Weik's confession indicated that he was hearing voices just before the shooting and he quietly chanted Bible verses throughout his trial so the voices would not bother him. The only social history mitigation presented was through Weik's sister, who testified very briefly (three pages of transcript "out of a multi- thousand page record") about Weik's childhood. She described his childhood as "rough" and said that all the children suffered from "abuse." She made "cursory and nonspecific" references to her father's "military flashbacks" and described him as "paranoid, abusive." The state countered with two mental health experts who testified that Weik did not have schizophrenia and suffered only schizotypal personality disorder. The state's psychologist also testified that Weik essentially had a "normal" childhood. Counsel's conduct was deficit in failing to investigate and present the true nature of Weik's social history. Weik's family had initially retained counsel, but after the state served notice of intent to seek the death penalty, the retained counsel and the public defender were appointed in July 1998. Lead counsel was an experienced criminal defense lawyer but had never tried a capital case or even "attended any seminars or continuing legal education courses dedicated to capital defense." The public defender "is currently suspended from the practice of law" due to a number of ethical violations including competence, diligence, and misconduct involving dishonesty. In March 1999, "a mere eleven weeks prior to trial" an experienced mitigation investigator was hired. Counsel met with the investigator only once and did not provide the investigator with assistance in providing information or obtaining records despite the investigator's repeated requests. Nonetheless, the investigator provided counsel with a potential witness list for sentencing, including Weik's family members and their contact information, a list of records that should be obtained, and "detailed investigative interviews with Weik's family members that revealed pervasive mental health issues throughout the Weik family and that Weik endured severe emotional, psychological, and physical abuse during his childhood." After six to seven weeks, the investigator resigned because of counsel's failure to assist her or respond to requests. A week later, a different mitigation investigator was hired and he requested a two month continuance. Instead, counsel sought a continuance of only two weeks so that some medical records could be obtained – records which the initial investigator had pushed counsel to obtain months earlier. Counsel told the trial judge only that the initial investigator had resigned due to "communication problems" without revealing the true reason for the departure or the investigator's detailed resignation letter. The continuance was denied. The new investigator interviewed the family members and provided reports to counsel but counsel never followed up on the information or reviewed it. Lead counsel testified that he focused on the trial phase and the public defender was responsible for the sentencing phase but during the trial she "was present, occupying space, but did not contribute anything useful or of substance during the entire case." The public defender testified that she had "limited" involvement and was just a "paper person" and "silent party" not involved in strategy or trial preparation at all. The court found this "especially troubling, for she simply washed her hands of the case, leaving the entire representation" to lead counsel. Counsel's conduct was clearly deficient due to "counsel's failure to review the investigators' reports they possessed in their own case files to become aware of the wealth of information that had been uncovered." This failure was not "the product of a strategic decision" so counsel's decision to present only the testimony of Weik's sister, Amy, "resulted from counsel's inattention, not reasoned strategic judgment."

Indeed, counsel did not undertake a strategic decision to omit . . . [social history mitigation]; counsel simply did not read the investigators' reports and therefore did not know such evidence was available. Decisions made in ignorance of relevant, available information cannot be characterized as strategic.

The court declared:

"The sentencing stage is the most critical phase of a death penalty case." Romano v. Gibson, 239 F.3d 1156, 1180 (10th Cir. 2001). . . . Important sentencing phase considerations include a defendant's "medical history, educational history, employment and training history, family and social history, prior adult and juvenile correctional experience, and religious and cultural influences." Wiggins, 539 U.S. at 524.

Id. at 234 (emphasis in original). Here, the post-conviction judge erred in finding that counsel's conduct was not deficient.

Though counsel introduced psychological testimony regarding Petitioner's mental illness, counsel failed to present even a skeletal version of Petitioner's social history, even though there was abundant social history evidence available to them.

Here, the available evidence revealed that Weik had an "extremely dysfunctional, unstable, and abusive childhood." Weik's house was "filthy" and had no "running water for a period of several years." His father, Russell, "compulsively hoarded things (particularly military-related items such as guns, knives, swords, and other weapons and munitions) such that the inside and outside of the house were piled high with junk and debris." Weik and his siblings were constantly teased by other children because they were "so poor." Weik was also teased because of his "large head" and for being "slow." He had a learning disability and attended special education classes. He ultimately was expelled from school after he fought another student who teased him for being "slow." Russell "experienced daily Vietnam flashbacks" and told his children that he had executed over two thousand people in Vietnam. He taught his children "how to kill people by 'crushing the windpipe' and 'snatching the heart.'" He also tormented his sons in order to "toughen them up" by making them do things like "stand at attention outside at all hours of the night in their underwear." Russell had served in the military from 1961 to 1965 when he was honorably discharged after being hospitalized for chronic schizophrenia. He had not, however, served in Vietnam or ever had any combat experience. Russell was also physically abusive and had beaten Weik with "rubber hoses, rose bush switches, a car antenna, a coax cable, and a machete." He would also punish the children by locking them in a "sweltering hot attic" for hours at a time. Russell was also verbally abusive and "consistently berated all of the children," but especially Weik who he called "'worthless' and 'stupid.'" He told Weik "he would never be good for anything." The children "always had to walk on eggshells" to avoid triggering "a fit of rage" from Russell. Their mother did not protect them from the abuse at all except on one occasion when she knocked Russell unconscious with a frying pan to stop him from choking his eight year old daughter during a “flashback” because he mistook her for “Charlie.” Weik had “odd behaviors as a child, including that he ‘would laugh at things that weren’t really funny.’” He was also “slow learning to talk” but when he did learn she would speak “very quickly” and ramble from “thought to thought.” He also had developmental delays in walking, being “potty trained,” and “he didn’t seem to grasp things as quickly as other children did.” As a teenager, he was a loner and “experienced dramatic personality swings and became unpredictably irritable.” Weik’s father and paternal grandfather were hospitalized for “psychiatric illness.” Weik’s mother and all of his siblings “suffered from some form of mental health issue, such as depression, or alcohol or drug abuse problems.” Prejudice was established. Weik’s sister’s testimony in sentencing “was general, vague, and offered no detail or insight into the degree of abuse Weik suffered as a child. Thus, the jury remained unaware of the severity and pervasiveness of the physical and psychological abuse Weik faced and the full extent of his father’s mental illness.” Additionally, the available but unrepresented evidence “would have demonstrated Petitioner’s genetic predisposition to schizophrenia and helped explain his auditory and visual hallucinations at the time of the shooting.”

Davidson v. State, 453 S.W.3d 386 (Tenn. 2014) (trial and sentencing in August 1997). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of the defendant’s brain damage and cognitive disorders. Counsel possessed evidence that the defendant suffered from severe lifelong cognitive impairments and personality disorders and was predisposed to sexual violence. While counsel retained a neuropsychologist shortly before trial, counsel did not provide the expert with most of the evidence available. Likewise, counsel retained a mitigation specialist shortly before trial but did not seek a continuance as this expert advised. During sentencing, defense counsel presented only cursory social history evidence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial. “Counsel held in their hands compelling evidence that Mr. Davidson has a broken brain and a tragic past,” but failed to present this persuasive evidence. The court was not persuaded by the state’s argument about a “two-edged sword” because the jury was already exposed to aggravation evidence of “a long history of sexual violence against women. The evidence from Mr. Davidson’s mental health records held little potential to demean him further in the jury’s eyes. However, it had great potential to help explain the invisible mental machinations that made him behave this way.”

2013: *Shellito v. State, 121 So. 3d 445 (Fla. 2013) (1995 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present significant mental health evidence and social history evidence. Following the conviction, but in the month prior to sentencing, could requested a psychiatric evaluation and prior records, which indicated prior diagnoses of organic brain disorder and mental health issues. Counsel did not present expert testimony primarily because counsel’s only conversation with an expert focused only the issue of insanity and not mitigation and counsel was concerned about opening the door to significant negative information. Thus, “there was no true follow-up” after receiving the prior records. “Yet counsel made a marginal attempt to present organic brain damage and other impairment as mitigation” through family member testimony. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to follow up on the mental health evidence and in failing to have the “mental health issues presented by an expert at trial to explain their significance and impact on his behavior at the time of the murder.” Prejudice was established because the trial court found “no mental health mitigation, statutory or otherwise” when the prior records and additional expert evaluation, including a PET scan, revealed bipolar disorder and organic brain damage, which would have supported both statutory and nonstatutory mitigating factors. In evidence, while the lay witnesses had presented a picture in sentence that the defendant had been raised in a stable home, the post-conviction evidence revealed that he was raised in an abusive home. He was physically and sexually abused by his mother, and was neglected, such that there was no structure in the home and the defendant was left without food or supervision for days at a time, such that he would sometimes have to scavenge for food in neighbors’ garbage cans.

2012: Simmons v. State*, 105 So. 3d 475 (Fla. 2012) (sentenced December 2003). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate or present mitigation evidence concerning the defendant’s childhood and mental health. During the jury hearing, counsel presented testimony from once jailer and the defendant’s sister. The jury unanimously recommended a death sentence. Before the judge, counsel also presented an expert who testified that the defendant had a moderate to severe learning disability and no significant history of violence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to consult with a mental health expert or to otherwise investigate “mental mitigation.” The expert presented before the judge had been retained by initial counsel and had not ordered a PET scan, despite knowledge that the defendant had “experienced a partial suffocation incident as a toddler that required medical intervention.” If counsel had obtained the available records and a neuropsychological evaluation confirmed by a PET scan, the evidence would have established an IQ of 79, a history of special education and emotional handicap classes, a history of untreated attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), brain damage that resulted in “impulsivity and behavioral problems,” and borderline personality disorder. This evidence would have supported two statutory mitigating circumstances: (1) extreme mental or emotional disturbance; and (2) impaired capacity to appreciate the criminality of conduct. Counsel also failed to “have any significant conversations with” the defendant’s family and did not even “consider hiring a mitigation specialist to do an investigation.” Adequate investigation also would have revealed that the defendant’s father abused alcohol and marijuana and the defendant “modeled” this behavior beginning at age nine and continuing into adulthood. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by any alleged strategy to present only good character mitigation. Counsel conducted no investigation and presented “almost nothing” on good character either. The defendant also was not “told what mitigation he was waiving – or the effect of such a waiver – in following this strategy.” Prejudice established even though the state presented an expert to assert that, based on the PET scan, the defendant’s brain was not abnormal. “Even without convincing proof of the brain abnormality, [the defendant] established the existence of substantial mental mitigation that was not presented to the jury or the judge.”

Robinson v. State, 95 So. 3d 171 (Fla. 2012) (1989 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence that would have legally precluded the trial court from overriding the jury’s life recommendation. Before the jury, counsel presented only the defendant’s mother and a psychologist that had interviewed the defendant twice. The jury recommended life. In the hearing before the judge, counsel added only “character letters” even though counsel was aware that the Florida Supreme Court “had a history of affirming life overrides in the absence of substantial factual mitigation.” The only mitigation the judge found, before overriding the jury vote and imposing death, was that the defendant “maintained close family ties and had been supportive of his mother.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately investigate. Counsel did not obtain the court files of priors, obtain a mitigation expert, or provide sufficient information to the defense expert, even after the expert indicated that the defendant “was not an adequate historian.” As a result, the sentencing testimony “pales in comparison to the postconviction testimony.” The defendant’s father was a violent, abusive drug abuser and dealer, who introduced the defendant to drugs at an early age. The defendant was also exposed to illegal activities by an older brother and attended an alternative school known for ongoing physical and sexual abuse (Okeechobee Boys’ Home). The trial judge found that there was no prejudice because he was aware at the time of sentencing that the defendant “was a perpetual witness to violence, that he grew up impoverished and in a crime-ridden neighborhood, and that he spent his childhood in a chaotic environment.” This finding was rejected, however, because, as one example: “testimony that [the defendant] grew up in a crime-ridden neighborhood does not reveal that he witnessed a murder at the age of five years old.”

Walker v. State, 88 So. 3d 128 (Fla. 2012) (2004 conviction). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. In sentencing, counsel presented testimony from two mental health experts, who diagnosed bipolar disorder based primarily only on the defendant’s self-reporting. The jury recommended death by a 7 to 5 vote. Before the judge, counsel presented only letters from the defendant’s sister and a friend asking for mercy. Another friend testified that the defendant was addicted to drugs and that the drugs made him violent. The trial court in post-conviction proceedings found counsel ineffective. Counsel’s investigation consisted only of five phone calls with the defendant’s mother and sister and “unidentified ‘local people.’” Counsel “never sought medical, educational, criminal, drug treatment, or social service records.” Counsel also failed even to interview the defendant’s cousin, despite the fact that the defendant had been using his name and identification at the time of the crimes. Counsel also failed to attempt to speak to “any other immediate or extended family members” of “former neighbors, correctional officers, or teachers.” If counsel had investigated, he could have presented extensive testimony from family and friends and two mental health experts with “specific” knowledge of the defendant’s “drug addiction and lifelong emotional and educational problems.” The defendant’s parents often hosted chaotic parties that involved violence, drugs, and alcohol during which the children were neglected and allowed to sample drugs. The children often had to find their own meals. The defendant ended up addicted to drugs, including methamphetamine, which resulted in paranoia and violence. He was referred to therapy by a juvenile court at age 15. A psychopharmacologist testified about the drug abuse, which “typically results in drug-induced delirium, pronounced paranoia, and psychosis.” This information “‘gave considerable insight into [the defendant’s] childhood and young adulthood,’ serving to humanize him to the jury.”

Davis v. State, 87 So. 3d 465 (Miss. 2012) (1992 conviction). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The defendant killed his friend, but immediately turned himself over to police, waived Miranda rights, and cooperated fully with the police. After learning that the State would seek death, counsel met with the defendant only twice, the second of which took place on the day before trial.

Almost all of [counsel's] interviews of mitigation witnesses and preparation for the penalty phase of [the] trial took place the day before trial. [Counsel] made no attempt to obtain medical, school, or military records; he never interviewed any of the prison personnel where [the defendant] was incarcerated prior to trial; and he did not produce any evidence that described the alleged abuse [the defendant] had suffered as a child, at the hands of his father.

Id. at 467. In sentencing, counsel “made no opening statement. The total, combined testimony of mitigation witnesses consumed less than fifteen pages of transcript.” The defendant’s mother had met counsel only twice. The first time, she characterized as “a lot of nothing.” The second time, which was the day before sentencing, counsel told her to “beg for [your] son’s life.” The defendant’s sister also testified. She had met with counsel for only 10 minutes the day before sentencing. The defendant’s landlord testified, at the defendant’s suggestion, with “no preparation whatsoever.” Finally, a highway patrolman testified about the defendant’s criminal record. Counsel’s conduct was deficient.

[N]o trial strategy was involved here. It takes no deep legal analysis to conclude that an attorney who never seeks out or interviews important witnesses and who fails to request vital information was not engaging in trial strategy.

[Counsel] had a duty to conduct a reasonable, independent investigation to seek out mitigation witnesses, facts, and evidence for the sentencing phase of [the] trial. Instead, he conducted no investigation, relying on witnesses whom [the defendant] suggested, and whom [counsel] failed to properly prepare.

Id. at 469 (footnote omitted) (emphasis in original). Likewise, counsel’s explanation that he was not aware that the defendant was from the local community did not excuse counsel’s failures. Except for his time in the military, the defendant “had lived in the local community his entire life.” Id. at 470. Prejudice was also clear. Evidence was available from a lifelong friend of the defendant’s family that he basically was a good guy, who helped everyone in the neighborhood, including a crippled, elderly woman. Evidence was also available from “the office deputy” of the Sheriff’s Department that the defendant was a “trustee” in pretrial confinement. He ran errands within and even outside the jail. He was even allowed to drive patrol cars, unescorted, and in civilian clothes to a facility where he changed the oil in the cars. He never caused trouble and was “a very nice and polite fellow,” who “had adjusted well to the prison environment.” The defendant’s sister, if prepared and asked, could have testified that the defendant’s father was an abusive alcoholic. On one occasion, when the defendant was 12, he tried to save his mother who was being strangled by his father. He was unsuccessful and ran to a neighbor’s house for help. When he returned home, his father threatened to kill him and forced him to sleep outside. The sister testified that this type of event happened “at least every weekend.” Seven other witnesses—a church deacon, the husband of defendant’s Sunday School teacher, three past employers, an ex-brother-in-law, and a long-time neighbor—would have testified if asked. All testified that the defendant (1) volunteered around the community and in church, (2) was not violent, and (3) had a “good work ethic.”

Commonwealth v. Keaton, 45 A.3d 1050 (Pa. 2012) (tried and sentenced in 1994). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel retained a mental health expert to evaluate the defendant but did not call him to testify or follow-up on the expert’s request for records or recommendation of additional testing. Despite the expert’s request, counsel did not obtain basic records, such as school, dependency, hospital, and pre-sentence reports that revealed substantial mitigation. During sentencing, counsel presented two younger sisters, an aunt, a family friend, and a minister to testify. In general, the testimony was that the defendant was helpful, respectful, and kind when he was not on drugs, but he was addicted drugs. The defendant also testified against the advice of counsel and admitted his drug addiction while claiming innocence. Counsel argued in closing that the jury should consider as mitigation: (1) age (31) because the defendant was young enough to have time to be rehabilitated if sentenced to life; (2) mental or emotional disturbance due to drug use; and (3) the defendant was worth saving. The jury found no mitigation. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. Counsel did not prepare the sisters or inquire about the defendant’s childhood. He spoke to them only outside the courtroom immediately prior to the sentencing hearing. They could have testified that the defendant was physically abused in childhood and witnessed his mother and siblings being beaten by the defendant’s father and the mother’s boyfriends. The family lived in extreme poverty. A psychologist, who treated the defendant in group therapy at age 13 because of his academic difficulties, confirmed the domestic violence in the home and that the defendant was ostracized by other children because of his extreme poverty. The psychologist retained by the defense conducted screening tests that revealed “a strong possibility of underlying organic or brain dysfunction.” He reported these findings to counsel, recommended additional testing, and requested records. All he was provided, however, “was part of the police discovery materials.” In post-conviction, he was provided with records from school, adolescent counseling, juvenile dependency, and drug treatment. These records, among other things, showed a “‘squalid’ background of neglect and poverty, treatment for depression and suicidal ideation, drug dependence, auditory and visual hallucinations when he was on drugs, which suggested “brain involvement.” A neuropsychologist, who evaluated the defendant in post-conviction, found borderline intelligence and neurocognitive deficits in executive functioning. The brain damage could have been caused by chronic poly-substance abuse, serial beatings to the head, or a gunshot wound to the head. Another expert confirmed the neurological problems and testified, based on examination and the records available, that the defendant had untreated attention deficit hyperactive disorder and bipolar disorder characterized by episodes of grandiosity and mania. This evidence would have supported at least three statutory mitigating factors. Thus, there was “a reasonable probability at least one juror may have struck a different balance, had such evidence been presented.”

2011: Coleman v. State*, 64 So.3d 1210 (Fla. 2011) (sentenced in 1989). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present available mitigation evidence that would have legally precluded the trial judge’s override of the jury’s life recommendation. The jury recommended life by a vote of six to six. Despite knowing the defendant grew up in Liberty City in horrendous conditions, counsel did not retain an investigator or seek a mental health evaluation because he claimed he believed the defendant's alibi defense. Counsel also stated that he did not believe mitigation would have made a difference to the court. Under state law, the focus is on "the reasonableness of the jury recommendation, not on the judge's determinations or personal inclinations." Likewise, state law provides that residual doubt is not an appropriate mitigating circumstance. Substantial mitigating evidence, including an impoverished, chaotic childhood, special education, substance abuse from a young age, sexual molestation, head injuries, and "mental health illness and deficiencies." Under state law, a trial court could not override a recommendation of life, unless "the facts suggesting a sentence of death should be so clear and convincing that virtually no reasonable person could differ." Here, if the true mitigation evidence had been presented, the trial judge would have had to view it in the light most favorable to the defense and would have been precluded from overriding the jury. Thus, the defendant was prejudiced not just in the trial proceedings, but also in direct appeal. Remanded for imposition of a life sentence.

Perkins v. Hall, 708 S.E.2d 335 (Ga. 2011), overruled on other grounds, State v. Lane, 838 S.E.2d 808 (Ga. 2020) (sentenced in 1997). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to investigate brain injuries and unduly limiting interviews of family and friends of the defendant. Counsel's conduct was deficient. "There is some tension, if not outright contradiction, between lead counsel's and co-counsel's accounts of who was responsible for preparing for the sentencing phase." Each claimed that the other was responsible, which helped "explain, at least in part," why the investigation was inadequate. Original counsel had discovered records of a head injury that left an "identifiable hole in his skull." The defendant insisted he did not want to pursue this mental health evidence and demanded her removal as counsel. Thereafter, the defendant refused to cooperate with a mental health evaluation. Counsel contacted only a few family members taking the word of the defendant's mother that others were "unavailable," even though numerous witnesses would have cooperated and testified. Citing the 1989 ABA Guidelines, the court found counsel's conduct deficient. Prejudice also established. While the mother testified about the defendant's traumatic childhood in sentencing, the available evidence of "his abusive background is admittedly somewhat cumulative, but overall it is far more compelling." Even more powerful was the evidence of the defendant's "change in behavior and apparent mental distress following two head injuries." While the defendant "resisted investigation of this sort of evidence and refused expert mental health evaluations, he did not preclude his trial counsel from presenting a mitigation defense that included details about his personal history."

2010: State v. Gamble*, 63 So.3d 707 (Ala. Crim. App. 2010) (sentenced in November 1997). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. Counsel spoke to the 18-year-old defendant one time and initially attempted contact with his family by simply sending them letters several months before trial. Later, eleven days before trial, he went to the defendant's neighborhood and simply stopped people at random to ask if they knew the defendant and what their opinion of him was. Counsel made no other efforts to investigate mitigate despite knowledge that the defendant had "cognitive limitation" and that his father had served in Vietnam and subsequently exhibited violence, erratic behavior, and alcoholism. Counsel initially filed a motion seeking funds for a mitigation investigator but abandoned this request. While counsel did speak to some family members right before trial in a group discussion lasting approximately 10 minutes, counsel did not call any of them to testify because he “had no idea what he wanted the family members to testify about.” It was also clear based on counsel’s closing argument in sentencing and his post-conviction testimony that counsel believed that the only mitigating evidence that was admissible in sentencing was evidence that fit within one of the statutory mitigating circumstances. The court considered the case in light of the 1989 ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases. The court held that could sought none of the information set forth in Guideline 11.4.1, except that counsel requested that the defendant, “who presented obvious cognitive deficits, compose a journal that would include his biography.” On this evidence alone, counsel’s conduct was deficient. Prejudice established because family members and friends would have testified that the defendant’s father was an abusive, alcoholic. His mother was also an alcoholic, who had been in special education and was “slow.” The defendant was raised in a small “run down shack” occupied by 14-20 people. His mother had taken him to Atlanta when he was just a child and had abandoned him. The defendant was in a special needs remedial program in school. Aside from these witnesses, available records documented that the defendant’s mother was mentally retarded. His father’s IQ was only 72 in school and later testing documented an organic mental disorder because of “heavy alcohol consumption” and possible schizophrenia. The defendant was hospitalized at 3 months when he was “dirty and emaciated.” He was in the custody of the Department of Human Resources for seven months due to parental neglect, but then returned to his mother. Until he was seven he lived in his paternal grandmother’s “run down shack” with 23 relatives in 4 rooms. When he was 7, his mother took him to Atlanta where he attended four schools in two years. After returning to Alabama at age 9, the defendant and his sister were passed from relative to relative for a year. He and his mother then lived with his mother’s friend for 9 years. The friend sold drugs out of the house and frequently had the defendant to assist her. School records showed frequent absences, repeating the fourth grade three times, a social promotion in the fifth grade, and dropping out in the 7th grade at age 15. School records showed an 82 IQ, but the state’s expert found a 77 IQ in pretrial testing. Prejudice established as the trial judge, who presided over the defendant’s trial and sentenced him to death following a 10-2 jury recommendation of the death verdict, found prejudice. This finding was entitled to “considerable weight,” especially in light of the “plethora of evidence that could have been presented” rather than presenting no mitigation evidence at all.

Ferrell v. State, 29 So.3d 959 (Fla. 2010) (1993 sentencing). The trial court’s finding of ineffective assistance in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation was upheld. The defendant did not make a knowing and voluntary waiver of the right to present mitigation. “Each of the witnesses who testified for [the defendant] stated that they made repeated unsuccessful attempts to contact trial counsel and were never contacted by him. There is simply no indication that trial counsel performed any investigation into the penalty phase.” Counsel also failed to retain or consult with a mental health expert concerning mitigation, although court-appointed examiners did examine competence and sanity issues. The trial court’s finding of prejudice was also supported by the evidence. In addition to failing to present mitigation, counsel failed to object to improper sentencing arguments by the prosecutor. The prosecutor invited the jury to disregard the law, argued improperly the age mitigator could not apply to the defendant, argued improperly that the case deserved the death penalty, and improperly vouched for the credibility of several witnesses. Cumulative prejudice was clear in that the jury vote for death was only seven to five and the defendant was not the triggerman in the murder.

Commonwealth v. Martin, 5 A.3d 177 (Pa. 2010) (sentenced in 1994). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence, especially evidence of chronic post-traumatic stress disorder and depression as a result of sexual abuse he suffered as a child at the hands of his uncle. Counsel did not contact any of the defendant's prior doctors or obtain records from his prior substance abuse and mental health treatments, even though the defendant's mother gave them names and addresses, along with the dates of treatment. The day prior to sentencing, the mother, due to concern that counsel had not obtained the prior records, delivered some of the defendant's mental health records to counsel. Nonetheless, the only mitigation evidence presented was the mother's testimony that mentioned prior drug and mental health treatments following sexual abuse by his uncle, who was later convicted for the molestations. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not the result of reasonable strategy. While the state asserted that the defendant directed counsel not to investigate or not to present evidence regarding his mental health history, the record did not support such a finding. Likewise, counsel testified that he had a strategic decision to rely solely on the defendant's mother because, in his view, jurors in the county "view psychiatry as 'one step above witchcraft.'" The trial court rejected this, however, because counsel did not receive the defendant's mental health records until the day before the penalty hearing. He did not contact the defendant's prior documents. Thus, the court held that "the scope of his investigation was the result of lack of attention rather than reasoned strategic judgment." Id. at 202. In addition, the record did not support an alleged strategic decision not to present this evidence, due to concerns about "open[ing] the door" to evidence of another murder committed after this one. Counsel did not testify that he had such strategy and the defendant had not been convicted of the subsequent murder in Nevada at the time of this trial. Prejudice established. The mental health records and the testimony of two prior treating physicians, who were never contacted but would have been willing to testify in sentencing, documented Chronic PTSD and depression due to past sexual abuse as early as age 15 and continuing until after the murder at issue, committed when the defendant was 21. This evidence was particularly significant in this case where the victim was a 74 year old homosexual man, who had offered the defendant money for sex, which resulted in his murder by the defendant. Two statutory mitigating circumstances were present, yet never presented to the jury: (1) extreme mental or emotional disturbance; and (2) substantially impaired capacity to appreciate criminality or to conform his conduct. The record supported the PCRA court's finding "that it was probable that at least one juror would have accepted at least one mitigating circumstance, and found that it outweighed the aggravating circumstances found." Aside from deference to the PCRA court's findings, the Court agreed with the assessment of prejudice.

Commonwealth v. Smith, 995 A.2d 1143 (Pa. 2010) (sentenced in May 1995). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing in failing to adequately develop and present mitigation. During trial, in a challenge to the degree of murder, the defense presented one expert to testify that the defendant was suffering a cocaine-induced psychotic disorder. The testimony of a second expert was excluded as cumulative. The state presented a rebuttal expert. The defense again sought to present its second expert, but this testimony was again precluded. In sentencing, the defense presented testimony from the defendant's mother and a case manager from a job training program the defendant had attended. A videotape of the second expert's testimony was also played. Lead counsel conceded that he "was primarily concerned with the guilt phase defense, and turned over preparation for the penalty phase to [co-counsel] one month before trial, but gave her no direction." Indeed, it was doubtful counsel "had any meaningful conversations concerning what mitigation evidence might be helpful." Lead counsel was aware of the defendant's abusive childhood, drug abuse, and past treatment for addiction but did not delve into the details, including during the defendant's mother's testimony. Counsel had not previously "mentioned or explained" to the mother "mitigation evidence." Counsel had had only a few brief calls with family members prior to trial and had obtained only the defendant's parole and military records. Counsel had an expert to examine the defendant for trial issues of diminished capacity, but did not ask the expert to evaluate him for sentencing mitigation purposes even after the expert and co-counsel suggested that he do so. In short, lead counsel "ignored the possibility that mental health mitigating evidence existed which would be helpful in the penalty phase; instead, he myopically focused only on the guilt phase defense of cocaine-induced psychosis, offering only generalized character evidence at the penalty phase." Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on reasonable strategy.

This is the type of case described by Bobby [v. Van Hook, 130 S. Ct. 13, 19 (2009)] as one where "potentially powerful mitigating evidence . . . would have been apparent from documents any reasonable attorney would have obtained."

Prejudice was established. If counsel had performed adequately, the testimony of family members and other lay witnesses would have established that the defendant had meningitis and head injuries as a baby. He suffered neglect and physical abuse from his father and also witnessed his father beating his mother and siblings. The defendant abused drugs and his personality would change when he was on drugs. After serving in the military, the defendant's attitude towards white people became almost paranoid. A neuropsychologist testified that the defendant's "poor school performance, impoverished and abusive childhood, and drug use suggested the possibility of cognitive impairments." In testing, the defendant had a full scale IQ of 76 and had moderate to severe impairments on neuropsychological testing "designed to test for brain damage." These cognitive impairments would affect the defendant's "ability to reason, use judgment, and see the consequences of his actions; these abilities would become even more impaired by drug use, particularly cocaine." This expert's testimony would have supported several statutory mitigating factors. Another expert testified that the defendant's juvenile and hospital records included a number of "red flags" for potential mental disorders. The juvenile records, which were admitted in post-conviction "documented the dysfunctional environment in which he was raised, his psychological and mental impairments, and his cognitive deficits." The medical records, which were also admitted, revealed "treatment for drug and alcohol addiction." While the Commonwealth's expert testified and raised the issue of malingering, he conceded that the defendant had brain damage.

2009: Hurst v. State*, 18 So. 3d 975 (Fla. 2009) (1998 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to present expert mental health evidence in mitigation to establish the defendant's low IQ, borderline intellectual functioning, and possible organic brain damage caused by fetal alcohol syndrome. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to have the defendant examined by a mental health expert, even though prior counsel had filed a motion for an evaluation. Counsel also did not obtain school records that revealed a low IQ and the defendant had been in special education classes and dropped out of school after repeating the tenth grade. Counsel had sufficient information, however, to “place him on notice that further investigation of mental mitigation was necessary.” Information from the family indicated he probably had borderline intelligence and was emotionally immature. Counsel also knew the defendant’s mother drank heavily during her pregnancy, which could lead to fetal alcohol syndrome. Counsel also could have easily obtained the school records. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by reasonable strategy as counsel simply believed that the defendant did not have a “mental problem,” the defendant would be acquitted due to his claim of innocence, and that presentation of mental mitigation would have been inconsistent with evidence that the defendant was a good person.

[B]ecause counsel never had [the defendant] examined and could not know what a mental health expert might discover, he could not make an informed tactical decision that the mental mitigation would be inconsistent with the defense or with other mitigation. Moreover, presentation of the mental mitigation discovered in this case. . . would not have been an admission that he committed the murder but would have been consistent with and supportive of the other mitigation that [the defendant] was slow, emotionally immature, and a follower.

In addition, even if counsel was concerned about inconsistency of the evidence before the jury, there was no explanation for not presenting the evidence before the judge. Prejudice established as both the prosecutor and the trial judge criticized the lack of any mental health expert testimony and the available evidence would have had an impact of the process of weighing the aggravation and mitigation in this case.

Parker v. State, 3 So. 3d 974 (Fla. 2009) (sentenced in 1990). Counsel ineffective for failing to fully investigate and present mitigating evidence regarding defendant’s chaotic and dysfunctional childhood and mental health. If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have shown: (1) defendant was abandoned by father as baby; (2) defendant’s mother was frequently hospitalized with mental health issues; (3) defendant spent his childhood in a series of foster homes and attended 17 different schools; (4) defendant was physically and sexually abused; and (5) defendant had a long history of alcohol abuse and violent and “crazy” behavior. Counsel did not request any records and did not interview anyone other than the defendant, his mother, and his ex-wife. “The only investigator employed . . . was asked to investigate the victim’s background and guilt phase issues.”

While trial counsel presented a ‘bare bones’ rendition of some of . . . [the defendant’s background], it was not enough to establish mitigation even though there was a wealth of witnesses who were never interviewed and documents that were never sought that could have fleshed out and established the mitigating circumstances. . . . In addition to this failure to conduct an adequate investigation, . . . counsel presented the information about his childhood and background through the hearsay testimony of the public defender investigators and not from first-hand sources.

Counsel also gave the defense mental health expert, “quite sparse materials” and “no background records,” such that the expert had to rely only on the defendant’s self-report and a brief phone call with his mother. Counsel erroneously believed “it was the doctor’s responsibility to seek out this information.” If the expert had seen the records and been given background information, including the mother’s mental health history and school records indicating significant behavioral and intellectual functioning problems, he would have supported additional nonstatutory mitigating factors and recommended additional evaluation and further testing that would have revealed “some type of neuropsychological impairment that affects his executive brain functions.”

*Doss v. State, 19 So. 3d 690 (Miss. 2009) (1993 sentencing). On rehearing, counsel found ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel had only a “cursory telephone interview” with the defendant’s mother, who was the sole mitigation witness in sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate despite awareness of prior head injuries and possession of some of the prior records, which were provided by the defendant’s counsel in a separate case. Counsel also failed to interview possible witnesses and “failed to ask a single question” about possible abuse, the environment the defendant had grown up in, how he did in school, “or anything else that could have been mitigating.” Prejudice established as there was significant evidence that the defendant’s mother drank and was taking Valium during her pregnancy and was beaten and infected by gonorrhea by her husband during her pregnancy. The defendant had lead poisoning as a child and witnessed the man he thought was his father (but he was not) beating his mother and abusing drugs. The family also “lived in a very poor, bad, drug-infested neighborhood where gangs were prevalent in Chicago.” The defendant began drinking and using drugs by age 11. He had a low IQ and was placed in special education classes.

*Rosemond v. Catoe, 680 S.E.2d 5 (S.C. 2009) (1996 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to present evidence of the defendant’s mental illness. There was no need to “speculate about the mitigation evidence known by trial counsel as the evidence was presented during pretrial competency hearings.” Specifically, two defense experts testified that the defendant was “clearly paranoid” and suffered either from a delusional disorder or schizophrenia but a diagnosis could not be made because the defendant was evasive and guarded even with the experts. A court-appointed examiner was also willing to testify that the defendant might be in the early stages of schizophrenia. Trial counsel did not present this evidence in sentencing because he “mistakenly believed” that the trial court’s finding of competence to stand trial “precluded him from presenting . . . mental health mitigation evidence in the sentencing phase.” “Counsel’s erroneous belief clearly constituted deficient representation.” Prejudice was also established because counsel only presented a few family members and friends to portray the defendant as a good boy and a mental health expert gave “conclusory” testimony that the defendant “could adjust to prison.” The expert conceded on cross, however, that he had not diagnosed a mental illness. In short, “the theme of the evidence was the absence of any mental health concerns.” Even with only this evidence, the jury deliberated for more than 11 hours of two days and received an Allen charge before reaching its death verdict. “Given the jury’s struggle during the sentencing phase and the want of any mental health mitigation evidence,” prejudice found.

2008: State v. Pearce*, 994 So. 2d 1094 (Fla. 2008) (2001 sentencing). Counsel ineffective for failing to adequately investigate mitigation in order to advise client prior to his waiver of presentation of mitigation and argument in sentencing. Counsel “did not conduct any preparation for the penalty phase of the trial.” Counsel did not obtain any background records, never contacted any of defendant’s family members, and never investigated mental health issues. If counsel had investigated, the following information would have been able: (1) defendant received “whoopings” with a belt or switch as a child; (2) he had “temper tantrums and mood swings” as a child; (3) there was a family history of bipolar disorder; (4) defendant fell down stairs as a baby and fell out of a truck, resulting in head injuries; (5) he was a drug user; (6) his ex-wife physically abused him; (7) he suffers from brain damage and (8) has bipolar disorder and “is predominantly manic and goes for long periods of time in manic states.” Although the defendant “did not want any form of mitigation presented during the penalty phase. . . ., an attorney’s obligation to investigate and prepare for the penalty portion of a capital case cannot be overstated because this is an integral part of a capital case.”

Although a defendant may waive mitigation, he should not do so blindly. Counsel must first investigate and advise the defendant so that the defendant reasonably understands what is being waived and reasonably understands the ramifications of a waiver. The defendant must be able to make an informed, intelligent decision.

Id. at 1102. The “waiver of the presentation of mitigating evidence was not knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently made.” Prejudice established “because there was substantial mitigating evidence which was available but undiscovered.”

Lowe v. State, 2 So. 3d 21 (Fla. 2008) (1991 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for failing to investigate and present two witnesses, who would have testified that a state witness, who denied involvement at trial, had previously admitted participation in the robbery and to killing the victim. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. The state’s theory was that the defendant acted alone and specifically excluding the state witness. Defense counsel believed the state witness was involved. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because he failed to investigate even though one of the potential witnesses was mentioned in a police report and an officer’s deposition as having information about the crime. This witness was aware of the other witness and could have provided that information. No prejudice during trial because his statements did not exclude the defendant and there was substantial evidence of the defendant’s involvement in the crimes. Prejudice was found in sentencing even though there were “some inconsistencies . . . as to the specific details.” In addition, these witnesses supported two mitigating factors raised by the defense but rejected by the trial judge: the disproportionate punishment mitigator and the relatively minor participation mitigator. Finally, while the evidence at trial proved the defendant was involved, including his confession also implicating the state witness, there was no evidence presented that conclusively showed that he was the actual killer.

Williams v. State, 987 So. 2d 1 (Fla. 2008) (1991 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to present a detailed report from a mental health expert in the override hearing before the trial court. The defendant was convicted of ordering the murders of three people and other charges stemming from the victims' alleged theft of drugs and money from the defendant in a drug trafficking ring. Counsel was aware that three co-defendants had already proceeded separately to trial. Each received a life verdict from the jury, but the same judge as defendant had overrode the verdict and imposed death. Counsel possessed an expert report that revealed that the defendant had: 1) an IQ of 75 and functioned mentally at the age level of a thirteen or fourteen-year-old; 2) abusive, alcoholic parents and an impoverished childhood; and 3) a lengthy drug abuse history. Counsel did not present this evidence before the jury or the trial court and instead presented only brief evidence that the defendant was a loving son and father. The jury recommended life by a vote of eleven to one, but the trial court overrode the verdict and imposed death. Counsel's conduct was deficient, especially since counsel was aware of the overrides for the co-defendants. Counsel's conduct was not based on strategy.

It appears counsel's decision to withhold [the mental health expert's] evidence was based upon counsel's overconfidence that a life sentence would be imposed and his erroneous belief that it was not necessary since his research seemed to show that this Court generally did not approve of overrides. However, counsel clearly missed the mark in overlooking our extensive case law that consistently requires some reasonable evidentiary basis for a life sentence in order to bar an override. Under Florida law, a trial judge is prohibited from rejecting a jury's recommendation of life imprisonment if there is competent evidence of mitigation supporting a life recommendation at the time of sentencing.

The court also noted that counsel had "nothing to lose in presenting this evidence" to the court. Prejudice was clear even though the trial court held that it would have made no difference to his override ruling. The evidence would have "provided an objective and reasonable basis for the jury's recommendation and a sentence of life" and, thus, would "preclude a trial judge's override of the jury's decision."

State v. Larzelere, 979 So. 2d 195 (Fla. 2008) (jury 7-5 death recommendation 1992; sentenced 1993). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Even though the defendant waived presentation of mitigation evidence, the jury recommended death only by a vote of seven to five. The defendant was convicted of planning and directly the murder of her husband for assets and insurance money. Counsel did not conduct any investigation concerning the defendant's background or interview her family members about mitigation. They even discounted reports from a prior investigator of her father's alcoholism, possible child abuse, and possible spousal abuse. They did not hire a mental health expert until after the jury's recommendation and then did not provide him with the investigator's report or other relevant information and did not even attend the state's deposition of the defense expert. Counsel even told the expert that "no family members were available to assist in his evaluation." The defendant's waiver was "not made knowingly and intelligently" because counsel

“did not investigate possible mitigation sufficiently before [she] waived her right to present penalty-phase evidence.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate, despite the investigative report, and in failing to obtain “an informed mental health evaluation . . . in advance of the penalty phase.” Prejudice was established because the evidence would have revealed that the defendant was: 1) sexually abused as a child by her father and uncle; 2) physically abused as an adult; and 3) suffered from narcissistic and histrionic personality disorders. She also may have suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder and obsessive compulsive disorder. Although the state could have presented rebuttal evidence in sentencing, the prejudice was still clear, especially in light of the bare majority of jurors voting for death even in the absence of any mitigation evidence.

Hall v. McPherson, 663 S.E.2d 659 (Ga. 2008) (sentenced in September 2000). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence and rebuttal to aggravation evidence. Initially, the court rejected the state’s argument that the “habeas court erred as a matter of law by relying upon the American Bar Association Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases and the Southern Center for Human Rights Defense Manual in evaluating counsel’s performance.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. Counsel did not hire a mitigation investigator and instead arranged with the defendant’s mother to bring anyone “she wished to bring with her” to his office one evening a week. Counsel did so despite having a court-appointed examiner’s report that reflected that the mother was alcoholic and had physically and verbally abused the defendant and his brother and neglected them during their childhood. Counsel also did not interview the defendant’s brother or a foster mother and did not obtain records from youth detention centers, group homes, or foster homes that the defendant informed him about. Counsel also did not adequately investigate and present evidence of the defendant’s drug history and the “psychiatric mitigating evidence” related to that, despite the “thrust” of state’s case at both phases being the defendant’s drug addiction and intoxication when he left detoxification treatment against medical advice and killed his live-in girlfriend shortly afterwards. Trial counsel were on notice of this and had been provided with some records of prior detox treatments reflecting discharge prior to completion. Counsel failed, however, to obtain the complete records or to interview prior doctors, although eliciting testimony about these treatments from the defendant’s mother and sister. While counsel proceeded on a theory of “residual doubt,” counsel also “propounded a broad mitigation theory” that encompassed “lack of parental supervision, his early introduction to drugs and alcohol, and the absence of a positive male role model in his life.” “Trial counsel’s [investigation and] presentation was not strategic, as the testimony presented in the habeas evidentiary hearing would have supported counsel’s arguments at the sentencing phase of trial.” Counsel argued about the defendant’s rough life and use of drugs at an early age, but did not present any evidence of juvenile drug use. He also presented evidence of abandonment by the defendant’s father but “the witnesses only hinted at the extent and scope of the neglect that [the defendant] suffered from his mother, and there was no testimony regarding his childhood history of abuse or his placement in foster homes and group homes as a youth.” Prejudice found based primarily on the testimony of the defendant’s foster mother and brother concerning the mother’s extreme physical and verbal abuse and neglect, such that the defendant would sleep in abandoned cars and get food from dumpsters when she chased him from the home and he was on his own for days at a time. The older brother also testified that he introduced the defendant to marijuana, LSD, and other drugs when the defendant was 12. The jury did not hear this evidence and, in fact, heard evidence portraying the defendant as a child simply unsupervised because his mother was working two jobs, but doing “everything she possibly could to help her son, including trying to keep him away from drugs.” The jury also did not hear testimony from a prior doctor that diagnosed a major depressive disorder and drug dependence following a suicide attempt. This doctor would have also testified about the defendant’s genetic predisposition to substance dependence, such that he “never had a choice in the matter of whether to develop drug and alcohol addiction problems in his life.” He also would have testified that the defendant did not complete detox on that occasion because his insurance would not cover it and no other funds were available. This doctor “would have willingly testified at . . . trial without charging a fee for his time.” Information in the records also rebutted the state’s claim that the defendant “chose his life of addiction” by establishing the defendant’s struggles and intense desire for help.

Taylor v. State, 262 S.W.3d 231 (Mo. 2008) (2003 trial). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. The case involved a killing in prison. The defense presented substantial expert testimony concerning mental health history and issues in the trial in pursuing a not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect verdict, but otherwise presented only videotaped deposition testimony from the superintendent of the correctional facility, who testified that the defendant would present minimal risk to correctional officers and other inmates under his conditions of confinement. “Because of the unique nature of capital sentencing—both the stakes and the character of the evidence to be presented—capital defense counsel have a heightened duty to present mitigation evidence to the jury.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. Where there is strong mitigation evidence available, “and the jury has recently convicted a defendant of first-degree murder while in a maximum security prison, it is not reasonable for defense counsel to only present mitigation evidence that the defendant is unlikely to commit crimes in prison.” Here, four of five experts that testified in the trial were limited and the fifth focused on the affirmative defense. These experts could have been recalled in sentencing “for their own merit, as evidence of . . . [the] history of mental illness” without limitations “at a time when their instructions would have permitted them to give mitigating effect to their conclusions about . . . [the] history of mental illness—testimony that in itself provided no defense in the guilt phase.” Likewise, while one of the experts testified about the defendant’s “abusive upbringing and other difficulties in childhood,” this testimony was “provided primarily to support his conclusion at the guilt phase” on the affirmative defense. “Reasonable trial counsel would have recognized the need to put on additional mitigation evidence regarding the defendant’s character and background at the penalty phase, particularly after the jury had rejected the expert’s ultimate conclusion.” Counsel also failed to introduce any of the records supporting the conclusions regarding the “abusive background, history of mental illness, and eventual diagnosis,” which the jury asked for during the trial.

Despite the jury’s specific desire to see these available records, which were replete with statements showing [the defendant] had suffered from mental illness since long before the murder, counsel made no attempt to fill this evidentiary void by introducing them in the penalty phase.

Capital Case*

Counsel did not present the records because of potentially harmful information.

While not all of the evidence in the records was favorable . . . , such records seldom are. Where the only basis of defense is that one's client has long had a mental illness that reduces his responsibility, the failure to introduce records that present not only support for his history of mental health evaluations and treatment beginning at the extremely young age of 7, but also a treasure trove of mitigation regarding [his] abusive childhood, simply is not a reasonable trial strategy.

Counsel could also have presented record and family member testimony of the defendant's father's abuse of him and his mother, living in an abuse shelter, struggling in school, the early onset of mental illness hearing voices at 11 or 12, belief in "demons" so badly that "they attempted a church exorcism when he was in early adolescence," running away from home, command hallucinations, and suicide threats and behavior. Prejudice found. "A vivid description of [the defendant's] poverty-stricken childhood, particularly the physical abuse, and the assault . . . , may have influenced the jury's assessment of his moral culpability." Id. at 253 (quoting Simmons v. Luebbbers, 299 F.3d 929, 939 (8th Cir.2002)). In addition the "contemporaneous records documenting . . . mental health problems, more than any testimony the defense offered at the guilt phase, could have persuaded the jury that the mental health evidence had value as mitigation of punishment, and that, perhaps, [the defendant] deserved a punishment other than death for his crime." "If competent counsel had presented and explained the significance of all the available mitigation evidence, there is a 'reasonable probability that the result of the sentencing proceeding would have been different.'" Reversal was also required due to Brady error because the state failed to disclose impeachment evidence related to jailhouse snitch, which was material in sentencing.

Littlejohn v. State, 181 P.3d 736 (Okla. Crim. App. 2008) (2005 trial). Counsel found ineffective, as conceded by the state, in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. The defendant was charged with three co-defendants for felony murder arising from a car-jacking. Throughout the trial and sentencing, the defendant admitted participation but denied only that he was the triggerman. Counsel did not conduct any investigation and presented only the unprepared testimony of the defendant and his mother to testify in sentencing. Prejudice found because there was available evidence the defendant had: (1) a low IQ and attended special education classes; (2) suffered domestic abuse from his mother and step-father, who were drug dealers and users; (3) the defendant did not learn his step-father was not his father until he was a teenager; and (4) expressed remorse and suicidal ideation shortly after the crimes.

Commonwealth v. Sattazahn, 952 A.2d 640 (Pa. 2008) (retrial in 1999). Counsel ineffective in retrial for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Counsel obtained school and prison records and spoke to the defendant's mother, a prison employee, and perhaps a school teacher and then offered "brief testimony" only from the defendant's mother and a former employer. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to review the file of defendant's prior murder conviction, including the prison records, which "contained red flags concerning potential mental-health and/or cognitive impairment." Counsel also failed to investigate potential mental, cognitive, emotional and/or social difficulties despite awareness the defendant had failed several grades and was placed in special classes during early childhood development. Counsel's conduct was not justified by strategy. Prejudice found because "[t]he difference in the very nature and quality of the evidence adduced at trial versus that put forward at the post-conviction stage after a fuller investigation is substantial" and the additional evidence would have supported several statutory mitigating factors that "bore upon the degree of [the defendant's] culpability in terms of selecting between capital punishment and a life sentence." In addition to the actual evidence of difficulties in school, the available evidence included mental health experts to testify about the defendant's long history of learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, chronic brain dysfunction, Aspergers syndrome, and pervasive developmental and schizotypal personality disorders.

Commonwealth v. Williams, 950 A.2d 294 (Pa. 2008) (sentenced in June 1990). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health mitigation evidence. Previous counsel had filed a notice of intent to assert an insanity defense, which referenced two prior psychiatric hospitalizations (one involuntary) in the seven months prior to these offenses. The defendant, who was a Vietnam veteran, had been diagnosed with adjustment disorder, depression and dysthmic disorder. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to obtain these records or a mental health evaluation and failure to investigate information about the defendant's bizarre behaviors, etc. Prejudice found because the jury heard only good character evidence in mitigation rather than evidence that the defendant's mental-health condition impacted on his conduct in a way that was relevant to the assessment of the degree of his moral culpability.

Council v. State, 670 S.E.2d 356 (S.C. 2008) (sentenced in October 1996). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Defense counsel asserted during trial and sentencing that the defendant was "merely present at the time" of the crimes, which were committed by another man. The only mitigation evidence presented was "extremely limited testimony" of the defendant's mother. Counsel's conduct was deficient, as follows:

Initially, trial counsel was deficient in not beginning his investigation into [the defendant's] background once the State served its notice of intent to seek the death penalty, counsel discovered that [the defendant's] DNA was found at the scene of the crime, and counsel learned of Respondent's inculpatory statements to police indicating that he sexually assaulted the victim. Clearly counsel should have been aware that the defense accomplice theory was not that strong and that mitigation evidence was the only means of influencing the jury to recommend a life sentence.

Nonetheless, counsel sought only limited records prior to trial, did not request other records until the day jury selection began, did not have the defendant examined by a defense psychiatrist "until one month before trial," and provided the defense psychiatrist "with only limited records." "As in Wiggins, counsel's conduct fell below the standards set by the ABA." Id. at 363 (citing 1989 ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases). "Even the limited information obtained should have put counsel on notice that [the defendant's] background, with additional investigation, could potentially yield powerful mitigating evidence. “[N]ot only did counsel delay in investigating [the defendant’s] background, he failed to conduct an adequate investigation.” “Significantly,” counsel “failed to provide his only expert witness . . . with sufficient records and only directed him to evaluate . . . competency to stand trial and criminal responsibility.” The expert, “at the direction of counsel” also “only met with [the defendant] “on two occasions, the first being shortly before trial.”

Furthermore, even though the funding was available, trial counsel chose not to hire a social history investigator. Instead, he relied on his law partner and private investigator to collect potentially relevant information. However, neither of these individuals was qualified in terms of social work experience, to evaluate the information to assess [the defendant’s] background.

Finally, we believe it was unreasonable for trial counsel not to obtain . . . family records. First it is inexplicable that trial counsel deemed these records unimportant because they did not directly involve [the defendant].

Id. at 363 (citing 1989 Guidelines). Second, counsel’s “brief interviews” with family and DJJ records “should have alerted him to the fact that the family was dysfunctional, [the defendant] had been raised in a violent home environment, and experienced learning disabilities. All of these factors constituted mitigating evidence and warranted further investigation.” “Even if trial counsel’s investigation could be deemed sufficient or adequate, we believe trial counsel also failed to present any significant mitigating evidence.” Counsel’s conduct was not excused by strategy because:

[S]trategic choices made by counsel after an incomplete investigation are reasonable only to the extent that reasonable professional judgment supports the limitations on the investigation. Secondly, counsel was already aware the jury had rejected the defense theory that [the defendant] was not the actual perpetrator but was merely present. Thirdly, it would not have been inconsistent for trial counsel to present the accomplice theory during the guilt phase but mitigation evidence in the penalty phase. Finally, given the State had already presented damaging character evidence, we do not believe [the defendant’s] character could have been damaged any further by the presentation of additional mitigating evidence. Trial counsel essentially would have had “nothing to lose” and “everything to gain” by presenting this evidence.

Id. at 364-65 (citations omitted). Prejudice found despite “overwhelming” evidence of guilt and the jury’s finding of six aggravating factors because the jury did not hear “very strong mitigating evidence,” including: (1) “medical evidence or other testimony describing mental health issues or that several of his immediate family members suffered from mental illness,” such as “schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, depression, and borderline personality disorder”; (2) alcoholic father and parents’ divorce on the basis of physical cruelty; (3) “bad neighborhoods” and extreme poverty; (4) a significant drop in I.Q. between the ages of seven and ten “which may have been the result of a head injury or the onset of mental illness; (5) “began getting into trouble at the age of ten years most likely as the result of his violent family environment and negative influence of his siblings”; (6) alcohol and drug use beginning at age sixteen; (7) attempted suicide in his twenties; (8) “a borderline I.Q. and frontal lobe brain dysfunction”; and (9) “the onset of . . . schizophrenia [which is undisputed now and has rendered the defendant incompetent since at least 2001] may have begun in early adolescence or childhood.” The court concluded: “We cannot say beyond a reasonable doubt that the undiscovered mitigating evidence, taken as a whole, would not have influenced at least one juror to recommend a life sentence.”

2007: In re Hardy*, 163 P.3d 853 (Cal. 2007) (trial in 1983). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of a third party’s culpability that would have undermined the state’s theory that the defendant was the actual killer. The case involved a conspiracy headed by a man who sought to kill his wife and son for life insurance money and solicited the defendant and several others to assist him. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and not explained by strategy because counsel sought to convince the jury that Calvin Boyd was involved rather than the defendant. This was counsel’s primary strategy that he pursued in cross-examining the state’s and codefendants’ witnesses. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because adequate investigation would have revealed that Boyd made incriminating statements to a number of people, strongly suggesting he had participated in the murders. He habitually carried a knife similar to the murder weapon and did around the time of the crimes. He had previously committed several assaults and threatened people with a knife. He had cuts on his hands after the murders and made up a false story to explain them. He made up a false alibi and pressured his wife and others to support that alibi. He had a motive to commit the murder because he was a habitual drug and alcohol user, who was unemployed at the time of the murders. He testified falsely during petitioner’s preliminary hearing and trial. There was no prejudice during trial because the state argued primarily that the defendant was the actual killer but also argued conspiracy and aiding and abetting, which also allowed for the murder conviction. Prejudice established in sentencing though because, in addition, to the evidence of Boyd’s guilt, this evidence would have undermined his credibility in testifying that the husband admitted to him that the defendant was one of the conspirators and that he saw the husband and the defendant together shortly before the crimes. Without this testimony, the evidence that the defendant was the actual killer was “weak and circumstantial.” He was young and had only a minor criminal record. He had descended into despair and drug abuse following his brother’s suicide. Given these circumstances it would have made a difference if the jury heard substantial evidence that he “was likely not the actual killer, but merely participated in the conspiracy to kill for insurance proceeds.” While the state argued that he personally stabbed the victims in a “brutal and horrific manner” solely for money, this evidence would have made a difference.

“[I]f he did not kill anyone, if he merely conspired . . . , if he did not show up at the appointed hour, if he was lying passed out from drink and drugs that fateful night instead of stabbing a defenseless woman and child in the dark of night, the nature of his moral culpability is quite different. More to the point, the jury’s weighing of the relevant aggravating and mitigating factors would have been entirely different.

Ross v. State, 954 So. 2d 968 (Miss. 2007) (sentencing in October 1987). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. “[C]ounsel may be deemed ineffective for relying almost exclusively on material furnished by the State during discovery and conducting no independent investigation.” Id. at 1005. Likewise, “[i]t is not reasonable to refuse to investigate when the investigator does not know the relevant facts the investigation will uncover.” Id. at 1006 (quoting Dickerson v. Bagley, 453 F.3d 690, 696-97 (6th Cir. 2006)). Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate even though a court-appointed evaluation disclosed a “a number of potential mitigating factors, including accounts of physical and sexual abuse, possible alcoholism, accounts of visual and auditory hallucinations, and the deaths of his ex-wife and four young children in a car accident in 1985 and the brutal murder of his sister in 1982.” He was also taking anti-psychotic and anti-depressant medications at the time of the evaluation. Although counsel was aware of this information, they did not pursue mental health issues simply because the defendant informed counsel that “he wasn’t ‘crazy.’” Id. at 1006. The failure to investigate was unreasonable “given the serious mitigating issues evident.” Id. Likewise, while lay witnesses, including the defendant, testified about some of this background information “defense counsel provided no expert evidence about how these events had affected [the defendant] psychologically.” Id. Even more problematic, however, was counsel’s failure to properly investigate the defendant’s record as an inmate prior to making his adaptability to confinement a central argument in sentencing, which opened the door to rebuttal evidence that the defendant had been moved from the local jail to a more secure facility prior to trial because he possessed a hacksaw blade and planned an escape and that he had been disciplined for making alcoholic beverages during a prior confinement. “This failure falls below an objective standard of reasonableness and was undoubtedly highly prejudicial, as it tended to cast Ross as unrepentant, a habitual criminal, and a danger to society.” Id. The court also found that the defendant was entitled to a new trial due to “cumulative error,” which included counsel’s failure to object to a tainted venire panel after a venireperson stated that she had testified against the defendant in federal court that she had been the victim of a crime when counsel was aware that she was the victim in the defendant’s prior armed bank robbery. Counsel did not object to her statements, move to remove her after her initial statements, request a curative instruction, or query the remaining venire members about the possible prejudice from her statements.

Glass v. State, 227 S.W.3d 463 (Mo. 2007) (2002 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel presented the testimony of family members, friends, and former employers in sentencing, but did not investigate and present evidence from “school officials and prior professionals” who were “more ‘disinterested’ witnesses.” Prejudice found because available witnesses included a doctor that admitted the defendant to the hospital for bacterial meningitis when the defendant was less than two years old. While an aunt testified about the meningitis, she could not explain “the long-term effects of meningitis” and the impact on the defendant’s “impaired mental functioning.” Former teachers were also available to testify concerning the defendant’s impaired intellectual functioning. Former probation officers were available to testify that for about 18 months prior to the offenses the defendant had no probation violations and was cooperative. Counsel argued in closing that the crimes were “out of character” for the defendant and this testimony would have supported that argument. Counsel also failed to present the testimony of a neuropsychologist concerning the defendant's deficits even though "neuropsychological deficits have 'powerful, inherent mitigating value,'" especially in a case like this where the "jury heard from no experts." Counsel also failed to present the testimony of "a speech and language pathologist" concerning the defendant's impaired intellectual functioning, which is "valid mitigating evidence in the penalty phase of capital case, regardless of whether defendant has established a nexus between his mental capacity and crime." Finally, counsel failed to present the testimony of "a toxicologist and pharmacologist" concerning the influence of alcohol at the time of the offenses, which would have supported two statutory mitigating circumstances (substantially impaired capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct and conform to the requirements of law and extreme mental and emotional disturbance).

Marquez-Burrola v. State, 157 P.3d 749 (Okla. Crim. App. 2007) (2003 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to conduct a meaningful mitigation investigation. The defendant, a Mexican foreign national, was convicted of killing his wife of 17 years. Retained counsel had participated in one capital case but hired an associate counsel with no capital experience to prepare for sentencing. The first associate left one month before trial and a second associate who had only been an intern on one capital case was hired to prepare for sentencing. Well before trial counsel had been provided with sample funding motions for experts and other services to prepare mitigation by the Mexican Legal Assistance Program (MCLAP), counsel for Mexico. Counsel did obtain funding for a psychiatrist and an investigator but these people focused only on a "heat of passion" defense for the guilt-or-innocence stage of trial. Just days before trial, counsel for Mexico expressed concern to the trial court about the lack of preparation for sentencing because no investigation had been conducted other than speaking to a few family members one week prior to trial about testifying. The trial court told defense counsel it would be accommodating to additional request for funding but none was made. Counsel, who spoke no Spanish, also did not obtain the services of an interpreter to communicate with the defendant, who spoke very little English when an interpreter had to be used even during his interrogation. Counsel used the brother of the victim and the defendant's 12-year-old nephew to interpret even during matters of legal significance. Counsel also did not attempt to overcome the "logistical challenges" involved because almost everyone who could offer insight into the defendant's past and his school, medical, and other records were in Mexico. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[d]efense counsel has a duty to take all necessary steps to ensure that available mitigating evidence is presented, id. at 765, including "seeking funds from the court and specifying why they were necessary." Counsel's conduct was also not explained by strategy because, even with testimony from all three defense counsel, "the actual strategy with regard to mitigation remains elusive." Id. The defendant was prejudiced because "mitigation evidence can, quite literally, make the difference between life and death in a capital case." Id. at 764. "One important purpose of mitigation evidence is to humanize the defendant in the eyes of the jury and, if possible, to explain what might have driven him to commit the crime." Id. at 766. Here, the mitigation consisted of less than fifteen pages of testimony from the defendant's father, mother, and sister that the defendant had been a good man and asking the jury to spare his life. If counsel had adequately investigated, a number of witnesses, some of whom made "substantial sacrifices" to come from Mexico to testify, would have “offered unique and moving vignettes about [the defendant’s] good character.” This evidence could have made the difference because there is a qualitative difference between having a family member generally ask the jury to spare the life of the defendant, and having third parties offer the jury more objective and specific examples of why the defendant’s life should be spared. . . . Jurors may well understand that a defendant’s mother will almost always extol the virtues of her son; but they may give different treatment, and perhaps greater weight, to the testimony of less biased witnesses which illuminates the man whose life is in their hands. . . . [T]he stories of Appellant growing up and doing good things in his rural Mexican community might well have resonated with citizens of a rural Oklahoma county.

Id. at 766-67 (emphasis in original). Preparation for sentencing was especially important because “[t]his case may fairly be called a ‘second stage’ case,” where “[t]he only real question appeared to be what punishment was appropriate.” Id. at 767. With adequate investigation, the defense could also have countered the state’s argument that the defendant was “an abusive monster who was unreasonably jealous and controlling over his wife. Id. The evidence would have established that his “jealousy in the months leading up to the homicide might not have been unfounded, and that [his] marital problems may have had a marked effect on his mental health.” Id. Prejudice was also established because the jury, at some point during deliberations, which evenly split on whether life or death should be imposed. This “strongly suggest[s] how outcome-determinative a real mitigation investigation might have been.” Id. Finally, while there was argument in the case about whether a “mitigation specialist” is necessary in a capital case, the court held that “the real issue is whether defense counsel understands what kind of mitigation evidence can make a difference, what kind of mitigation evidence is available, and whether counsel makes reasonable efforts to obtain it.” Id. at 768. The court also rejected the “suggestion that it was the responsibility of [the defendant] and his family to understand the nature of mitigation on their own, and to bring relevant evidence to defense counsel’s doorstep.” Id. Although the usual remedy would be to grant a new sentencing trial, the court modified the defendant’s death sentence to life without parole because “[a]ll of the mitigating evidence, viewed together, clearly outweighed the evidence supporting the aggravating circumstances.” Id.

2006: Blackwood v. State*, 946 So. 2d 960 (Fla. 2006) (sentenced in 1997). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for murder of former girlfriend for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. During sentencing before the jury, counsel presented eleven witnesses consisting of friends and family, as well as a detention officer who testified that the defendant demonstrated good behavior while incarcerated and had become an inmate trustee. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel never even met with the retained defense expert, who had previously found the defendant incompetent, or even attempted to schedule an evaluation of the defendant for sentencing purposes until two weeks prior to sentencing. That expert notified counsel that he could not testify concerning statutory mitigating circumstances, but counsel never asked about non-statutory mitigation. Rather than ask for a continuance or contact the court-appointed doctors, who had also examined competence, counsel did nothing and presented no mental health evidence. Prejudice found because even one of the court-appointed examiners would have testified that the defendant was depressed and emotionally disturbed at the time of the offense. She would also have testified that his verbal IQ was 70, placing him in the borderline mentally retarded range of intelligence. Her testing also indicated some neurological impairment and she would have recommended a neurological evaluation had counsel asked. She also would have testified that the defendant had no prior criminal history and was a good candidate for rehabilitation. Additional available testimony, if counsel had adequately prepared and presented the evidence reflected that the defendant suffered from major depression and avoidant personality traits with masochistic features and was experiencing extreme emotional disturbance at the time of the crime. While the court-appointed examiner testified before the trial court, the court was required to give great weight to the jury recommendation, which was 9 to 3 in favor of death.

Commonwealth v. Gorby, 909 A.2d 775 (Pa. 2006) (1986 trial). Trial counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel knew the defendant behaved irrationally around the time of the offenses, had a history of drug abuse and a "rough childhood," and had been hospitalized previously for head injuries. Nonetheless, counsel did not investigate further than discussions with his client, his mother, and his step-father because he did not believe that any of this was potentially mitigating. In sentencing, counsel called only the step-father to testify that the defendant sometimes assisted him in work around the home. Prejudice found because if counsel had adequately investigated and presented the evidence the jury would have been aware that the defendant was raised in an impoverished, dysfunctional household. He endured substantial verbal and physical abuse and sexual molestation. He witnessed violent and life-threatening altercations between his mother and several husbands, in which he attempted to defend her. He would rock back and forth and bang his head against walls at times. He was also homeless during a substantial portion of his teenage years after his step-father kicked him out of the home. Mental health experts would have testified that the defendant suffered from "cognitive disorder (brain injury affecting thought process), major depression, post-traumatic stress syndrome, borderline personality disorder, and poly-substance abuse." Prejudice found.

Commonwealth v. Sneed, 899 A.2d 1067 (Pa. 2006) (sentencing in March 1985). Counsel ineffective in failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel failed to conduct any investigation or to even interview family members, with the sole exception being one of the defendant's sisters, even though the defendant informed counsel that he had a "hard childhood," had abused drugs and alcohol, and had previously been incarcerated. Counsel presented no mitigation in sentencing. Counsel's conduct was deficient.

"The onus is not upon a criminal defendant to identify what types of evidence may be relevant and require development and pursuit. Counsel's duty is to discover such evidence through his own efforts, including pointed questioning of his client." Therefore, although it is true that appellee never volunteered to counsel all of the alarming details of his childhood, it was not necessarily his responsibility to do so.

Capital Case*

Counsel is charged with the duty of asking probing questions of his client, and with the duty of discovering and developing mitigation evidence

Id. at 1083 (quoting Commonwealth v. Malloy, 856 A.2d 767 (Pa. 2004)). Prejudice found because an adequate investigation would have revealed that the defendant grew up in extreme poverty with an alcoholic mother, who drank during pregnancy and while breast-feeding the defendant. He was often abandoned as a child while his mother was on drinking binges. He was exposed to his mother's prostitution and his alcoholic grandmother's making and selling of illegal liquor. He was physically abused by his mother and grandparents and malnourished such that he was often forced to steal in order to have any food.

Ex parte Gonzales, 204 S.W.3d 391 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006) (sentencing in February 1997). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Specifically, counsel failed to ask the defendant, his mother, or his sister whether the defendant had been abused as a child. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he spoke to the mother only once before trial and the sister once during the trial but did not ask about the issue of abuse. "[A]n objective standard of reasonable performance for defense counsel in a capital case would have required counsel to inquire whether the defendant had been abused as a child." Id. at 397. The only evidence counsel presented was general background testimony from the defendant's sister. Prejudice found because, if counsel had performed adequately, the evidence would have established the defendant's childhood abuse by his father, which included forced oral and anal sex. He was physically abusive if the defendant resisted and would threaten to kill him and his mother if he told anyone about the abuse. A psychiatrist could also have testified that the defendant suffers from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder due to the repeated physical and sexual abuse he suffered. This expert would also have testified that, if treated, the defendant could perhaps become a productive, law abiding member of society.

2005: *Orme v. State, 896 So. 2d 725 (Fla. 2005) (1993 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of the defendant's mental state, including a diagnosis of bipolar disorder. Counsel were concerned the defendant was suicidal and sought treatment for him aware. He was diagnosed with bipolar disorder and medicated, but the doctor that diagnosed him died prior to trial and the initial defense counsel withdrew from the case. New counsel saw the doctor's letter and diagnosis but did not present any evidence on this issue "because he had no other information to corroborate it. As he put it, he did not want his expert to stick his neck out and get his head cut off." Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to investigate with family and friends to establish that the defendant "had exhibited behavior in accord with a bipolar diagnosis." Counsel also failed to inform his trial experts of the diagnosis or to give them the prison medical records showing the medications he had been prescribed to treat the disorder. One of the trial defense experts saw the defendant once prior to trial and was informed by the defendant of the diagnosis and medications, but he had no corroboration. He diagnosed only "mixed personality disorder with chronic intermittent depression and addiction to cocaine." In post-conviction, he was provided the prison records, the prior doctor's letter with the diagnosis, and "affidavits prepared by . . . friends and family which provide anecdotal information about . . . past behavior indicative of someone with bipolar disorder.” With this information, he diagnosed “probable bipolar in a depressed phase,” which as a “major mental illness [linked] to his drug addiction because statistically bipolars are significantly more likely to abuse drugs.” The other trial defense expert, also without the relevant information, was asked to testify about symptoms without a diagnosis and testified that the defendant was “a depressed cocaine addict,” who was “anxious about his situation.” If he had been asked a diagnosis, he would have diagnosed bipolar disorder. Prejudice established. In sentencing, evidence was presented of intoxication from cocaine, pills, and alcohol without any evidence of mental illness. The prosecution argued that the jury should not allow the defendant to “stand behind his crack pipe,” which would have been undermined by “testimony linking his drug use to his bipolar disorder.” This evidence “would explain to the jury that he was ill and that the mental illness made his addiction even greater.” Prejudice was also clear because, even without this evidence, the jury voted to recommend death only in a vote of seven to five.

*Commonwealth v. Collins, 888 A.2d 564 (Pa. 2005) (sentencing in October 1991). Counsel ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and presentation mitigation evidence. Counsel presented evidence of the defendant’s “good character” and also presented expert testimony demonstrating that the defendant had low intelligence, a history of drug and alcohol abuse, a lack of self esteem, and that he lacked a male role model in his life because his father left the family when the defendant was young. Counsel’s conduct was deficient though because counsel did not obtain a “social history” and met only briefly with the defendant’s family just prior to sentencing and told them to say “good things” about the defendant. Counsel failed to secure relevant school and mental health records, which would have demonstrated that the defendant was diagnosed with serious emotional problems from an early age and that such problems were compounded by a head injury he sustained in 1990. While the defendant had denied any head injuries, counsel had not asked anyone other than the defendant and could easily have obtained this information from family members. Prejudice found because if counsel had obtained these records and provided them to the defense psychologist at trial, he would have recommended neurological and neuropsychological testing. The evidence would have established that the defendant was abused by his father and other men as a child. He had cognitive defects and emotional problems, which supported two statutory mitigating circumstances: (1) the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance; and (2) the defendant’s capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

*Commonwealth v. Zook, 887 A.2d 1218 (Pa. 2005) (retrial in January 1990). Counsel ineffective in capital resentencing trial for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel believed that they had no significant evidence in mitigation even though counsel were aware that the defendant had suffered a head injury prior to the murders. Counsel also were provided with the defendant’s prison records, which revealed the opinion of a consulting psychiatrist that the defendant had a change in behavior consistent with post-concussion syndrome and recommending a neuropsychiatric evaluation. Counsel failed to provide these records to their experts. One of these experts was aware of the head injury from hospital records and testified that it was his general practice to recommend additional evaluation by a neurologist. If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have established that the defendant has organic brain damage, which would have exacerbated his underlying antisocial personality disorder. The defendant was unconscious for 45 minutes due to the head injury and developed seizures and post-traumatic amnesia as a result. In addition, the defendant had a “dramatic behavior change” with respect to violent tendencies which “was well-documented” in the prison records. This evidence would have supported two statutory mitigating circumstances: (1) extreme mental and emotional disturbance; and (2) substantially impaired capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of the law. “Had the jury heard this relevant evidence, there is a reasonable probability that at least one juror would have found an additional mitigating circumstance and struck a different balance in weighing the aggravating and mitigating circumstances.”

2004: In re Lucas*, 94 P.3d 477 (Cal. 2004) (1987 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation. Counsel’s conduct was deficient under the “norms prevailing in California” and the ABA standards because counsel waited until just before sentencing and then conducted only a few brief interviews of family members and did not follow up on the information they provided to conduct additional investigation and gather records. Counsel’s stated reason for failing to follow up on the information concerning the defendant’s childhood abuse and confinement and other information was that the information was too remote and trivial and would make the defendant look like a career criminal. Counsel “did not regard evidence of child abuse or alcoholism in the family as particularly mitigating—an apparently idiosyncratic view not commonly shared by contemporary capital defense attorneys.” Counsel intended only to present testimony from the defendant and his wife, but the wife refused to testify and then the defendant also refused. Thus, no mitigation evidence was presented. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by the defendant’s refusal to testify or alleged failure to provide information about his background because “the accused would not necessarily understand the significance of the information that would be uncovered by such an investigation.” There was also no evidence that counsel actually pressed the defendant for the information. Prejudice established because adequate investigation would have revealed severe emotional and physical abuse as a young child, institutionalization from age seven in a home staffed by abusive, violent adults, and then juvenile confinement in facilities known for crowding, neglect, and abuse. This evidence would have provided some “explanation for petitioner’s criminal propensities and some basis for the exercise of mercy.”

State v. Duncan, 894 So. 2d 817 (Fla. 2004) (1991 trial and sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health evidence in mitigation. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because there was a pretrial expert available, who had concluded that the defendant “suffered from a mental illness, specifically a chronic, long-lasting psychotic disturbance, and that there was evidence of delusional paranoid thinking.” The expert also found that psychological testing “suggested brain injury” and lay witnesses he interviewed “corroborated symptoms of a psychotic disturbance and significant drug abuse.” Having found deficient conduct, “[i]t was then the State’s obligation to demonstrate, either through the trial record or the testimony of . . . trial counsel, a reasonable, objective justification for counsel’s failure to present the available evidence of mental health mitigation.” Here, counsel offered no explanation and there was a “complete absence in the record . . . of any reason to support why the doctor was not called to testify). Prejudice established because there would have been substantial evidence to support two statutory mitigating circumstances considered by the trial court but rejected by the appellate court on appeal ((1) extreme mental or emotional disturbance; and (2) mental disturbance that interfered with knowledge of right and wrong).

*Hutchison v. State, 150 S.W.3d 292 (Mo. 2004), abrogated on other grounds, Mallow v. State, 439 S.W.3d 764 (Mo. 2014) (1996 trial). Counsel ineffective for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[t]hey spent nearly the entire time before trial preparing for the guilt phase and virtually no time preparing for the penalty phase." Id. at 297. They hired only one expert because the family lacked additional money and did not investigate the defendant's "life history or obtain any records documenting his troubled background and his mental and emotional deficits." In short, they "were overwhelmed, under-prepared and under-funded by the time they arrived at the penalty phase. . . . Counsel knew that they needed to prepare for the penalty phase, but they left no time to prepare adequately and to present such evidence" after they were denied a continuance which left them with only eight months to prepare for trial. Id. at 302. Counsel argued that the defendant was a "follower" influenced by his co-defendants but "failed to investigate and present testimony in support of this theory." Id. at 303.

Readily available records that trial counsel admitted they did not attempt to obtain would have documented [the defendant's] troubled childhood, mental health problems, drug and alcohol addiction, history of sex abuse, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, learning disabilities, memory problems and social and emotional problems.

Id. at 304. The one expert counsel retained provided information about the defendant's "severe psychiatric problems," that he had been hospitalized, that he had an IQ of 76 and trouble in school, and that the defendant had suffered emotional and sexual abuse. Prejudice found because counsel presented only brief testimony from the defendant's parents about his learning disability and placement in special education classes. The court rejected any requirement of "a nexus between his mental capacity and the crime to admit such mitigating evidence." Id. at 305. The court also rejected piecemeal consideration of prejudice from "each family member's testimony," because "[t]he question is whether, when all the mitigation evidence is added together, is there a reasonable probability that the outcome would have been different?" Id. at 306. The testimony of the defense expert was not sufficient because of his "reliance solely on the background information" provided by the defendant, which left him "open to impeachment at trial." He also spent less than three hours with the defendant and "his report was very short" and "did not address the effect" the defendant's deficits had on him at the time of the crimes. Id. This was caused, in part, because trial counsel had instructed him to consider only where the defendant "was competent and whether he suffered from a mental disease or defect." Id. This expert did not address any statutory mitigating factors and "gave no interpretations and provided no testimony to assist the jurors in making an educated determination about [the defendant's] mental condition and whether it mitigated the offense." Id. at 306-07. The court noted that there was no allegation that counsel should have "shop[ped] for a more favorable expert,” but alleged “only that the expert they hired should have conducted a more thorough investigation and evaluation.” Id. at 307.

Although [the defendant’s] family could not afford these experts, failure to do any follow-up cannot, under these circumstances, satisfy Wiggins’ mandate to discover all “reasonably available mitigating evidence.” The evidence, readily obtained and presented by postconviction counsel established that with adequate mental health evaluations, the jury would have heard significant evidence for mitigation.

Id.

State v. Chew, 844 A.2d 487 (N.J. 2004) (trial in June 1995). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. In preparation for sentencing, counsel retained a psychologist to assess any mitigating factors. The psychologist diagnosed: (1) personality disorder (NOS), mixed with dependent, histrionic, and antisocial features; (2) drug dependency; (3) depressive disorder; and (4) developmental reading disability. He believed there was support for the statutory mitigating factor that the “defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.” After counsel learned that the defendant had an incestuous relationship with his sister though, counsel never discussed this information with the defense expert and did not present the expert testimony because she feared that this information had been disclosed to a state examiner, who had examined the defendant’s sister, and that this harmful information would be revealed to the jury. In sentencing, counsel presented only the testimony of a social worker who described the defendant’s family background of chaos, violence, sexual abuse, sexual promiscuity, beatings, excessive drinking, and lack of love and support. Counsels’ conduct was deficient because the decision not to call the expert was not based on an adequate investigation because counsel failed to investigate to determine whether the court-appointed examiner was aware of the defendant’s incestuous relationship with his sister. They never obtained his report or interviewed him. Counsel also failed to discuss this information with the defense expert, whose opinion would have been strengthened by the incestuous relationship because it demonstrated even greater problems than he had previously realized. Prejudice was found because presentation of the expert testimony in support of the extreme mental or emotional disturbance mitigating factor would have substantially affected the jury’s deliberations at the penalty phase. While the additional mitigating evidence had a potential downside, the defense expert’s opinion would have been supported by the additional evidence of incest, along with undisclosed evidence of the defendant’s abuse of animals and sexual abuse of a child.

Commonwealth v. Moore, 860 A.2d 88 (Pa. 2004) (trial in 1983). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness for failure to prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel presented no mitigation evidence. He asserted that the defendant declined to testify and he had no other mitigating evidence. Thus, counsel presented no opening and no evidence and only referred generically to possible mitigating circumstances in closing. The jury found two aggravating circumstances and no mitigating circumstances. On appeal, counsel alleged trial counsel’s ineffectiveness but failed to specify what mitigating evidence had been available. Thus, the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness was denied on appeal. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately present the available mitigating evidence, which included testimony from the defendant's mother, sister, and wife of the defendant's traumatic and abusive childhood, including witnessing his father slash his mother's throat. The mother and sister had not been subpoenaed and had not been advised of the need for their testimony in sentencing. Although the ex-wife did appear under subpoena to testify at trial concerning an alibi, she would have testified in sentencing if counsel had explained the nature of the proceeding to her. While these witnesses were "obviously more cooperative in 2000 than in 1983," id. at 99, and the defendant was an "uncooperative client," id. at 100, counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel was not "relieved of the duty to investigate potential mitigating evidence, particularly where counsel had no other penalty phase strategy," id. at 100. Counsel's conduct was not excused by any strategic reason. Prejudice was found because without any mitigating evidence, the defendant's only chance for a life sentence would have been if the jury did not find either of the aggravating circumstances, which was unlikely based on the evidence presented by the state. New sentencing granted.

Commonwealth v. Malloy, 856 A.2d 767 (Pa. 2004) (sentencing in March 2000). Counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel met with the defendant only twice, did not apply for co-counsel or an investigator, and conducted no investigation. No evidence was presented in mitigation. Counsel's conduct was not excused by the defendant's failure to inform counsel of possible mitigation evidence and witnesses.

The onus is not upon a criminal defendant to identify what types of evidence may be relevant and require development and pursuit. Counsel's duty is to discover such evidence through his own efforts, including pointed questioning of his client.

Counsel's conduct was also not excused by the defendant's statement in sentencing that he was satisfied with counsel.

The fact that appellant was satisfied with counsel at the sentencing hearing colloquy in no way proves that trial counsel's investigation and performance satisfied Sixth Amendment standards. Appellant is not a lawyer, nor was he in a position to know whether his counsel had performed competently. The measure of effectiveness is not whether one's client appeared satisfied at the time. A client is entitled to trust in the fact that his attorney will know what investigation to undertake, what leads to pursue, and what evidence to look for.

Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately performed, the evidence would have shown that the defendant was physically abused as a child, he lived with his grandmother after his drug-addicted mother abandoned him, and he was institutionalized by age 12 because his grandmother could not control him. Although this evidence is not overwhelming, it was a "close case" and the state presented only one aggravating circumstance. On the other hand, counsel completely failed to "personalize appellant for the jury."

Capital Case*

Von Dohlen v. State, 602 S.E.2d 738 (S.C. 2004) (trial in May 1991). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. Counsel presented evidence that the petitioner was a good husband, a good father, and a dependable employee. He grew up in a poor family and had suffered physical and emotional abuse as a child. He had no prior criminal record. His brother was murdered just two weeks before the crimes and petitioner became withdrawn and depressed and began abusing alcohol and Valium. The “violent murder was completely unexpected and out of character for a man who had never displayed violent tendencies.” During sentencing, counsel presented testimony from a defense psychiatrist that petitioner suffered an “adjustment reaction with mixed features of emotions and conduct,” and pathological intoxication of alcohol and Valium abuse. The psychiatrist testified, however, that petitioner “did not have a chronic mental illness” and the prosecutor capitalized on this in closing arguments. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to provide the defense expert with available medical records and testing relating both to the petitioner, as well as his father and brother. Prejudice found because, with the available records, the defense expert would have testified that the petitioner “suffered from severe, chronic depression, a major mental illness,” 602 S.E.2d at 742, with “psychotic and suicidal tendencies.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the prosecutor’s closing argument in sentencing inviting the jurors to put themselves in the “victim’s shoes,” which was improper under state law and impermissible under Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991). Prejudice was not, however, established on this issue.

2003: State v. Williams*, 794 N.E.2d 27 (Ohio 2003), modified on reconsideration, 814 N.E.2d 818 (Ohio 2004) (trial in March 1999). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing case for failing to object to improper prosecutorial argument and an improper instruction on mitigation. The court found that the trial court erred in denying counsel’s motion to withdraw from representation after the defendant assaulted one of his attorneys in front of the jury following his conviction. After the assault, counsel had very little communication with the defendant because they were frightened of him and they were worried that their fear would be revealed to the jury.

This is particularly damaging to a defendant during the penalty phase of a capital case when counsel must humanize the defendant for the jury, show his character in the best light available, and bring his good qualities to the fore.

Id. at 50. In closing arguments in sentencing the prosecutor argued that the jury should weigh non-statutory aggravating circumstances that included the final thoughts of the murder victim, the suffering of the victim’s mother, and the death of the victim’s unborn child. All of these arguments were improper under state law. At the conclusion of sentencing the trial court instructed the jury that mitigating factors are those that are “extenuating or reducing the degree of the defendant’s blame or punishment.” This instruction was improper because mitigation is not about blame or culpability, but rather about punishment. Despite the prosecutor’s improper arguments and the improper instruction, counsel failed to object. The court found that there was no possibility, particularly in light of the prior physical assault of one counsel and the misgivings of both counsel about their ability to continue the representation of the defendant, that the failure to object was a conscious tactical decision. Prejudice was found because there was substantial mitigation in the case and the crime appeared to be a crime of passion. The defendant’s family testified that he had a strong close knit family that loved him and was willing to stand beside him. Prejudice was also found because the jury deliberated for six and a half hours before announcing a deadlock and when they were required to continue deliberations they deliberated for an additional eight and half hours before reaching a unanimous decision for death

Capital Case*

B. ONE DEFICIENCY

1. STATE AGGRAVATION EVIDENCE OR ARGUMENT

a. U.S. District Court Cases

2016: Miller v. Beard*, 214 F.Supp.3d 304 (E.D. Pa. 2016), superintendent's appeal dismissed, 16-9003 (3rd Cir. March 13, 2008) (1997 trial). In this capital case, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately investigate, prepare, and present testimony to rebut the commonwealth's allegation that the victim was raped. Following a bench trial, defendant was convicted of raping and murdering his wife, and was subsequently sentenced to death. At trial, the commonwealth relied on the testimony of Dr. Callery, who testified that due to the physical characteristics of the scene of the crime, the victim had been raped while defendant allegedly stabbed the victim with a knife. Dr. Callery's testimony provided the sole evidence to prove the victim had been raped, which was also the aggravating factor that led to the imposition of death. Trial counsel had the opportunity to cross-examine Dr. Callery at a pre-trial hearing, and again at trial. He noted several inconsistencies in his testimony and only challenged the doctor as to whether or not the possibility that the victim could not have been raped existed. Trial counsel did not consult any experts, provide a theory to undermine the doctor's crucial testimony, nor provide evidence or experts to contradict him. Trial counsel's performance was deficient. When asked why he did not consult any experts, counsel specifically noted that it was not because of a trial strategy, but rather because he thought nobody would believe Dr. Callery. First, given the scientific and technical nature of Dr. Callery's forensic testimony, and in light of the fact that this testimony formed the sole basis of the rape conviction and death sentence, consultation with an expert would "necessarily be part of a reasonable defense strategy." Id. at 337. Second, given that experts were available (two experts testified against Dr. Callery's findings during state post-conviction proceedings), and that the doctors' opinions were outside of a lawyer's expertise, not consulting with an expert to either prepare for cross examination or to present as a witness to rebut the allegation that a rape occurred during homicide was constitutionally deficient. Defendant was prejudiced by counsel's actions because Dr. Callery's testimony was the only evidence establishing the sole aggravating factor of rape, and the expert testimony during PCRA offered sound opinions, which undermined the basis of Dr. Callery's testimony. Had counsel performed competently and consulted with experts, he would have raised questions about Dr. Callery's theory, and there is a reasonable probability that the outcome regarding the rape charge would have been different.

2015: Roybal v. Davis*, 148 F. Supp. 3d 958 (S.D. Cal. 2015), appeals pending, 15-99016 & 15-99017 (9th Cir.) (1992 trial and sentencing). Under AEDPA, habeas relief granted as to the death sentence due to counsel's failure to object to the prosecution's improper closing arguments in sentencing based on "biblical law," which diminished the jury's sense of responsibility for sentencing under Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985). The state court held that the arguments were improper but found no prejudice because the bulk of the state's closing was focused primarily on the brutal circumstances of the crime" and the biblical references were brief and "amounted to little more than commonplaces, to emphasize his point that the jurors should . . . judge defendant primarily by his acts." The district court rejected this finding as objectively unreasonable because “[t]he circumstances of this case strongly suggest the prosecutor’s remarks were anything but harmless.” The prosecutor “clearly and improperly advocated that religious authority supported a death verdict” and included “direct biblical quotations demanding a sentence of death.” In finding that this argument could not have diminished the jury’s responsibility, the state court’s holding was objectively unreasonable because it focused only on the remainder of the prosecutor’s closing argument rather than reviewing the prejudice in the context of the entire trial. Considering that context, the district court noted that the state’s case on guilt was entirely circumstantial and the death verdict was “obviously close and difficult” because: (1) the jury heard substantial mitigation evidence “replete with physical and emotional abuse and neglect, substance abuse that started before age ten, and significant brain dysfunction and damage”; (2) the jury deliberated for portions of six court days, after hearing sentencing evidence for nine days, before reaching a verdict; (3) the jury requested to rehear the testimony of the defendant’s “alcoholic and neglectful mother”; (4) the jury requested to rehear the testimony of two mental health experts who testified at length about the defendant’s “brain dysfunction, long-standing substance abuse, personality disorders, and the possibility that he suffered from fetal alcohol effects from his mother’s alcohol use when pregnant”) and (5) the jury twice sent out notes “expressing their inability to reach a verdict.” “By any measure, this was an extremely close penalty phase trial where the prosecution sought to impermissibly minimize the jury’s sense of personal decision-making in violation of the Eighth Amendment.” The trial court’s general instructions that arguments of counsel were not evidence and that the jury must base the verdict on the evidence and the law were “insufficient to cure the misconduct or blunt the impact of this highly improper argument.” Counsel’s conduct in failing to object was deficient and not based on any strategy. If counsel had raised a timely objection to the prosecutor’s initial biblical argument, “he could have at the very least curtailed the remainder of the argument and requested a curative instruction neutralizing the condemnable misconduct.” Prejudice was clear.

2011: Rogers v. McDaniel*, 801 F. Supp. 2d 1049 (D. Nev. 2011), aff’d on other grounds, 793 F.3d. 1036 (9th Cir. 2015). Counsel ineffective in failing to challenge prior conviction supporting aggravating circumstance in capital sentencing. The jury found two aggravating circumstances: (1) prior violent felony conviction; and (2) torture, depravity of mind or mutilation of the victim. The state offered evidence through a probation officer of two prior felony convictions in Ohio. On one of those, the defendant pled guilty but failed to appear for sentencing. Under Nevada law at the time, this meant there was no conviction, but counsel failed to recognize that and instead conceded that there was a conviction. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in “failing to conduct even the most basic research” regarding the purported prior convictions. Prejudice also established as there were no other constitutionally valid aggravating circumstances and there was significant mitigation of mental illness and extreme mental and emotional disturbance at the time of the offenses. The state court ruling to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland. With respect to the other aggravating circumstance found by the jury, the court found that the instruction was unconstitutionally vague under Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980). With respect to cumulative error, the state court found with respect to both aggravators that the underlying evidence was admissible in sentencing regardless of whether it supported a valid statutory aggravating circumstance. As a nonstatutory circumstance, “[h]owever, such evidence does not factor into the weighing of aggravating and mitigating circumstances [under state law]; only the valid aggravating circumstances are part of that weighing.”

b. State Cases

2020: Smith v. State*, 2020 Ark. 410, 2020 WL 7253448 (Ark. Dec. 10, 2020) (not reported in S.W.3d) (2017 trial). Reversing death sentence where trial counsel was ineffective in abandoning a challenge to the aggravating factor of whether, in the commission of the capital murder, petitioner knowingly created a great risk of death to a person other than the victim or knowingly caused the death of more than one person in the same criminal episode. The jury found this circumstance to exist based on the presence of a “[f]ive-week +/- gestational age embryo” that was discovered during the victim’s autopsy. Because the definition of “person” applicable to state homicide statutes was not incorporated into the sentencing statutes, it was erroneous to apply that definition in the capital sentencing proceeding and defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to continue to pursue a challenge to the aggravating factor. Although the jury also found beyond a reasonable doubt that the murder was committed in an especially cruel and depraved manner, confidence in the death sentence is undermined by the jury’s consideration of the invalid aggravating factor.

Running v. Kelly, 475 P.3d 450 (Or. App. 2020), review denied, 488 P.3d 771 (Or. 2021) (2000 death sentence). In double murder case, petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel’s failure to present expert evidence at the sentencing phase regarding the question of whether petitioner would be dangerous in the future. (The case involves application of the Oregon Constitution’s right to effective assistance of counsel). At the time of petitioner’s capital trial, Oregon law precluded a sentence of death if the jury did not unanimously find that there was a probability that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society. During the penalty phase, the prosecution presented abundant evidence of past violent or threatening behavior by petitioner, including incidents occurring while petitioner was in custody for the capital crimes. The defense countered with testimony from Captain Hepler of the Oregon State Penitentiary (OSP) who testified about security in OSP. Notwithstanding the safety precautions taken by corrections officers, however, Hepler acknowledged that inmates had been found with weapons and drugs and that assaults on both inmates and corrections staff did happen. Further, Hepler stated that inmates serving life sentences “don’t have anything to lose” and pose a risk of escape if moved from the prison. In arguing that the prosecution failed to establish future dangerousness, defense counsel pointed in part to the absence of expert testimony offered by the prosecution on the issue. The prosecutor countered that a professional opinion was unnecessary as common sense would suffice. The jury ultimately returned a sentence of death for one of the two victims. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner presented evidence from a forensic psychologist who, after review of documents and other materials, formed an opinion that petitioner posed a “relatively low” risk or probability of “serious violence” in prison. In this appeal, the State did not contest the lower court’s finding that trial counsel performed deficiently but argued that the lower court correctly denied relief based on insufficient prejudice. The appellate court disagreed, ruling that petitioner successfully met his burden of showing “more than mere possibility” that the outcome of the penalty phase would have been different if trial counsel had called an expert on the issue of future dangerousness. The prosecutor’s argument for future dangerousness was premised on the theory that the best predictor of future behavior was past conduct. This contention found support from Captain Helper, who explained that the initial intake of prisoners assessed potential danger based on their history. An expert, however, could have explained the importance of “context” in assessing “the likelihood of violence” and that it “cannot be reliably assumed that behavior in the community will be observed in prison” given the different context. The expert could also have addressed the prosecutor’s reliance on petitioner’s bad behavior in jail as evidence of future dangerousness. The post-conviction expert opined that “misconduct in jail is not necessarily indicative of prison behavior and presented evidence that, if credited by a juror, would have demonstrated the prosecutor’s ‘nothing to lose’ argument was specious because ‘research suggests that [petitioner] as a long-term inmate would have a lower likelihood of disciplinary difficulties, despite the seriousness of his crime.’” That some of the expert’s analysis may have addressed a narrower subset of violent acts than those contemplated by the relevant statute did not itself negate the potential positive impact of the expert’s testimony on the defense case for life. Nor did any limitations of the statistical analysis performed by the expert defeat the finding of prejudice.

2019: *Commonwealth v. Montalvo, 205 A.3d 274 (Pa. 2019) (2000 trial). Affirming grant of relief as to death sentence in post-conviction proceedings based on ineffective assistance by trial counsel in failing to object to statements and instructions undermining the jury’s ultimate responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a death sentence, and ineffective assistance by appellate counsel in failing to raise trial counsel’s deficient performance on appeal. On six occasions during the opening statements and closing arguments of the penalty phase of trial, the prosecutor referred to the jury’s verdict as a “recommendation.” During defense counsel’s closing argument, the following exchange occurred:

DEFENSE COUNSEL: So don’t look at him and say I hate the guy, he’s got to get the death sentence. That is not what this is all about. And [the prosecutor] certainly gave an impassioned plea. But you don’t have to kill anybody. You don’t have to kill anybody.

PROSECUTOR: I object to that argument. They are not doing it. They are recommending the sentence.

THE COURT: Objection sustained. That is an improper statement, ladies and gentlemen. I am the sentencing person. Your decision is a recommendation to the court.

Later that same day, the trial court contradicted itself and included in its final charge to the jury the following statement: “Remember that your verdict is not merely a recommendation. It actually fixes the punishment of life or death, life imprisonment or death.” The trial court did not acknowledge the inconsistent statement made hours earlier or convey to the jury that its prior statement was erroneous. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court finds that this case demonstrates a “textbook example of Caldwell error.” The final charge to the jury did not cure the error because it failed to clarify that the earlier contradictory statement was erroneous. Trial counsel had no strategic reason “for failing to object to arguments and court instructions that constituted clear violations of both federal and state constitutions.” Trial counsel’s belief, as noted in the post-conviction proceeding, that the jury knew what it was doing because of explanations of the process given during voir dire was “unsupported by the record and [] insufficient as a matter of law, considering the pervasive nature of the misstatements of law conveyed to the jury during closing argument.” And Montalvo was prejudiced “by trial counsel’s inaction when the jury was led to believe that its sentencing verdict was not final and that the trial court would determine whether [Montalvo] received a sentence of life imprisonment or death.” Notably, this was not a case where the jury found only aggravating circumstances, thereby mandating a death sentence. Instead, the jury found both aggravating and mitigating circumstances, which it was required to weigh to determine the appropriate sentence. “Because the jury was misled regarding its most fundamental role in determining the sentence of life imprisonment or death, we conclude that the prejudice prong of the ineffectiveness test is satisfied.” In addition, the state supreme court concluded “as a matter of law that appellate counsel lacked a reasonable strategic basis in failing to raise the Caldwell claim on appeal.” Twenty of the thirty-seven claims raised on appeal involved allegations of ineffective assistance by trial counsel but none of the issues raised “involved a clear constitutional error warranting the grant of appellate relief, as does the Caldwell issue.” Such an approach to appellate advocacy does not reflect a reasonable strategy that furthered Montalvo’s interests. For the reasons given in regard to the trial IAC claim, appellate counsel’s failure to raise the Caldwell issue on appeal was prejudicial.

- 2013: Miller v. State*, 313 P.3d 934 (Okla. Crim. App. 2013), overruled on other grounds, Harris v. State, 450 P.3d 933 (Okla. Crim App. 2019) (2008 retrial). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper and misleading arguments that a life sentence would be a “freebie” since the defendant was already serving a federal life sentence. Prejudice was determined in a cumulative error analysis due to multiple other issues.
- 2010: Vasquez v. State*, 698 S.E.2d 561 (S.C. 2010) (sentenced in October 2003). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to the prosecution’s arguments referring to the Muslim defendant as a “domestic terrorist” and referencing the events of 9/11/01 during this trial, which occurred on the second anniversary of 9/11. The defendant was charged with murdering several restaurant employees after he had been fired from the restaurant. He wore “traditional Muslim headgear” during the trial. Jurors were questioned in voir dire about prejudice against Muslims. The “domestic terrorist” arguments began in the first sentence of the state’s opening statement in the trial. Both aggravation and mitigation witnesses, including an imam, testified in sentencing. Then in closing, the state continued the “domestic terrorist” argument and made the 9/11 references. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object because there was no evidentiary support for characterizing the defendant’s acts as “terrorism,” as his acts did not constitute “‘terrorism’ by the legal sense of the word.” The prosecutor was intentionally using inflammatory references that “improperly evoked religious prejudice and, thus, served only to inflame the passions and prejudice of the jury.” Prejudice was also established as the defendant’s “Muslim faith was a key theme throughout the trial proceedings which coincided with the second anniversary of September 11th.”
- 2009: Gill v. State*, 300 S.W.3d 225 (Mo. 2009) (2004 death sentence). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to discover child pornography, bestiality content, and sexually explicit instant message conversations on victim’s computer that could have been used to limit or rebut the state’s evidence of the victim’s good character. The victim’s computer was in the defendant’s car at the time of his arrest and an investigator's report included a list of instant message accounts and a list of the users with whom the accounts exchanged messages. Defense counsel reviewed the report but did not notice anything unusual even though the users the victim was communicating with had user names such as "a_slutty18girl_w38c," "daddoesme15," and "sweet_tasting_slute." Counsel's conduct was deficient as these entries "should have alerted them to the presence of pornography on the computer." Counsel also failed to interview the investigator, who became aware a few days after preparation of the report that there was pornography and sexually explicit instant message conversations referencing sex with underage girls, including a sexually explicit discussion about the victim's daughter, on the computer. Prejudice established in light of the co-defendant's ability to have the state limit the victim impact testimony to avoid opening the door to this rebuttal evidence with "good character" evidence, which resulted in the co-defendant being sentenced to life rather than death.

2007: *Malone v. State, 168 P.3d 185 (Okla. Crim. App. 2007). Counsel was ineffective in failing to object to improper victim impact testimony. Specifically, counsel failed to object when the state trooper victim's widow read from a prepared statement saying that her husband had been shown no mercy when he begged for his life and the defendant should be shown no mercy. She also cited the Bible as giving citizens duties and obligations to enforce the law. She also "beseech[ed]" and "beg[ged]" the jury to impose death. Counsel's conduct was deficient (and the trial court committed plain error) because "[t]his invocation of religious belief and obligation in the context of a capital sentencing recommendation is totally inappropriate." Id. at 210. Counsel also failed to object to the improper reading of cards the victim sent to other family members. Counsel's conduct was deficient (and the trial court committed plain error) in failing to object that the victim impact testimony was too long and overly emotional. The testimony covered 36 transcript pages, 28 of which was uninterrupted narrative.

While this Court declines to adopt specific rules governing the length of such testimony, we note that we have previously held that such statements should not be "lengthy" and that they should contain only a "quick glimpse" of the life that has been extinguished. Victim impact statements were never intended to be—and should not be allowed to become—eulogies, which summarize the life history of the victim and describe all of his or her best qualities.

Id. at 210. Here the victim impact evidence was "'too much'—both too long and too emotional." The court also failed to give an instruction on how the jury was to evaluate and consider the victim impact evidence, within the context of its overall sentencing decision even though a uniform instruction is generally given. Prejudice established even though the defense conceded the three aggravating factors as part of a reasonable strategy. The court emphasized, however, "that although a defendant's crime may make him eligible to receive the death penalty, a jury is never obligated to sentence a defendant to death, and that a single juror has the power to prevent a death sentence in a given case." Id. at 214-15. Here, the prejudice was enhanced by the prosecution's reliance on the improper victim impact testimony in the closing argument that asserted a sentence other than death would be "a travesty." Id. at 215. The court's "confidence in the jury's sentencing verdict" was also undermined by counsel's failure to prepare and present mitigation evidence from former co-workers, who could provide “powerful, varied, unbiased, and potentially result-altering mitigating evidence.” The evidence would have established the defendant had been a good and caring person as a fireman and EMT, had saved a number of lives, and was a good father prior to his descent into drugs culminating in this methamphetamine-related murder. His descent was fueled, in part, by his ex-wife’s very public affair with his supervisor in the fire department and then his mother’s death. The court did not reverse on this basis, however. It noted that the defendant would be entitled to an evidentiary hearing on this claim, but the issue was mooted because of the victim impact ruling.

2005: State v. Fudge, 206 S.W.3d 850 (Ark. 2005).* In split decisions for varying reasons, the court affirmed the trial court’s ruling finding counsel to be ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to evidence of a prior conviction the defendant did not have that was used to support an aggravating circumstance. The aggravating circumstance was that the defendant had been convicted of prior felonies “an element of which was the use of threat or violence to another person or the creation of a substantial risk of death or serious physical injury to another person.” The state submitted three exhibits in support of this factor, which were read but not given to the jury. The exhibits included prior convictions of: (1) battery in the first degree; (2) two counts of terroristic threatening; and (3) an additional two counts of terroristic threatening. The issue involved only the battery in the first degree because the lower court found that the defendant had actually only been convicted of “robbery, a less violent offense.” Three judges found no deficient conduct (based on the defendant’s statements to counsel) and no prejudice (due to the other evidence supporting the aggravating circumstance). Two judges declined to review the issue of deficient conduct because the State had not raised the issue on appeal and affirmed on the prejudice prong on the basis that the lower court’s ruling was not clearly erroneous. A third judge voted to affirm without a separate opinion stating the reason. Yet another judge voted to remand for additional fact-finding because the actual exhibit showed a conviction for battery in the first degree, but the state conceded in briefing that it was only a robbery conviction.

2004: Hall v. Catoe, 601 S.E.2d 335 (S.C. 2004).* Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to the prosecutor’s closing argument that asked the jury to compare the defendant’s worth and the victims’ worth in an emotionally inflammatory fashion unrelated to the circumstances of the crime and traditional victim impact evidence.

2. INSTRUCTIONS

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2006: Lankford v. Arave*, 468 F.3d 578 (9th Cir. 2006). Under pre-AEDPA law, counsel ineffective in capital trial for requesting a jury instruction that eliminated Idaho’s requirement that an accomplice’s testimony must be corroborated by other evidence in order to convict a defendant. Petitioner and his brother were arrested based on fingerprints in the victim’s van and other evidence. The petitioner’s brother testified against him in exchange for a life sentence and the state’s theory that petitioner was the actual killer depended heavily on his uncorroborated eyewitness testimony about the events. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. He had conducted research at a law school library and took the instruction from a collection of federal instructions because there were no model instructions for Idaho at the time. While the instruction was correct under federal law, it was clearly incorrect under Idaho law, which expressly forbids” conviction on the basis of uncorroborated accomplice testimony. “It was a young lawyer’s mistake, akin to failing to check the pocket part, but it was a mistake, plainly enough,” id. at 585, based on “a misunderstanding of the law,” id. at 584 (quoting United States v. Span, 75 F.3d 1383, 1390 (9th Cir.1996)).

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2009: Judge v. Beard*, 611 F. Supp. 2d 415 (E.D. Pa. 2009) (sentenced in April 1987). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective for failing to assert Mills error based on the trial court’s instructions that “erroneously led the jury to believe that it could not return a verdict at the penalty phase of the trial without agreeing unanimously both as to individual mitigating circumstances and the ultimate penalty.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient, even though the case was tried before the Supreme Court granted cert. or issued the opinion in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988). The case was pending on direct appeal at the time of the decision. Although the Supreme Court determined in Beard v. Banks, 542 U.S. 406 (2004) that Mills announced a new rule that could not be retroactively applied to cases on collateral, Third Circuit cases prior to Beard concluded that Mills was simply an extension of Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978) and Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982). Thus, the court held that “reasonably competent defense counsel would or should have been aware of the ongoing developments in the state of capital law in April, 1987, and subsequent thereto.” There was also no conceivable strategy for failing to object, “as the worst that could have happened would have been its denial.”

c. State Cases

2019: Commonwealth v. Montalvo*, 205 A.3d 274 (Pa. 2019) (2000 trial). Affirming grant of relief as to death sentence in post-conviction proceedings based on ineffective assistance by trial counsel in failing to object to statements and instructions undermining the jury’s ultimate responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a death sentence, and ineffective assistance by appellate counsel in failing to raise trial counsel’s deficient performance on appeal. On six occasions during the opening statements and closing arguments of the penalty phase of trial, the prosecutor referred to the jury's verdict as a "recommendation." During defense counsel's closing argument, the following exchange occurred:

DEFENSE COUNSEL: So don't look at him and say I hate the guy, he's got to get the death sentence. That is not what this is all about. And [the prosecutor] certainly gave an impassioned plea. But you don't have to kill anybody. You don't have to kill anybody.

PROSECUTOR: I object to that argument. They are not doing it. They are recommending the sentence.

THE COURT: Objection sustained. That is an improper statement, ladies and gentlemen. I am the sentencing person. Your decision is a recommendation to the court.

Later that same day, the trial court contradicted itself and included in its final charge to the jury the following statement: "Remember that your verdict is not merely a recommendation. It actually fixes the punishment of life or death, life imprisonment or death." The trial court did not acknowledge the inconsistent statement made hours earlier or convey to the jury that its prior statement was erroneous. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court finds that this case demonstrates a "textbook example of Caldwell error." The final charge to the jury did not cure the error because it failed to clarify that the earlier contradictory statement was erroneous. Trial counsel had no strategic reason "for failing to object to arguments and court instructions that constituted clear violations of both federal and state constitutions." Trial counsel's belief, as noted in the post-conviction proceeding, that the jury knew what it was doing because of explanations of the process given during voir dire was "unsupported by the record and [] insufficient as a matter of law, considering the pervasive nature of the misstatements of law conveyed to the jury during closing argument." And Montalvo was prejudiced "by trial counsel's inaction when the jury was led to believe that its sentencing verdict was not final and that the trial court would determine whether [Montalvo] received a sentence of life imprisonment or death." Notably, this was not a case where the jury found only aggravating circumstances, thereby mandating a death sentence. Instead, the jury found both aggravating and mitigating circumstances, which it was required to weigh to determine the appropriate sentence. "Because the jury was misled regarding its most fundamental role in determining the sentence of life imprisonment or death, we conclude that the prejudice prong of the ineffectiveness test is satisfied." In addition, the state supreme court concluded "as a matter of law that appellate counsel lacked a reasonable strategic basis in failing to raise the Caldwell claim on appeal." Twenty of the thirty-seven claims raised on appeal involved allegations of ineffective assistance by trial counsel but none of the issues raised "involved a clear constitutional error warranting the grant of appellate relief, as does the Caldwell issue." Such an approach to appellate advocacy does not reflect a reasonable strategy that furthered Montalvo's interests. For the reasons given in regard to the trial IAC claim, appellate counsel's failure to raise the Caldwell issue on appeal was prejudicial.

Capital Case*

2004: Thomas v. State*, 83 P.3d 818 (Nev. 2004) (1997 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to the trial court’s erroneous instruction that informed the jury that the Board of Pardons could, under certain circumstances, modify a life without parole sentence. While the Nevada Supreme Court had approved this instruction in 1985, the state statute was amended in 1995. The amendments provide that the Pardons Board cannot commute a prison term of life without possibility of parole to a sentence allowing parole. Because the Defendant’s crimes were committed in 1996, there was no circumstance or condition under which the Pardons Board could modify a life without parole sentence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the erroneous instruction to the jury. Prejudice found because the jury could have reasonably believed that a death sentence was necessary to prevent the possibility that the defendant could eventually receive parole if they returned a sentence of life without possibility of parole. Prejudice was exacerbated by the prosecutor’s future dangerousness arguments. Trial and appellate counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the prosecutor’s improper arguments in the closing argument of the penalty phase. First, the prosecutor asserted, “This is not a rehabilitation hearing. There is no program that we know of that rehabilitates killers.” This argument was based on facts and inferences not supported by the record. Second, the prosecutor argued: “The defendant is deserving of the same sympathy and compassion and mercy that he extended” to the victims. This argument was improper because it “implored [the] jury to make a death penalty determination in the cruel and malevolent manner shown” by the defendant and was calculated to incite passion rather than a reasoned moral response to the evidence. While this argument has been approved by the Nevada Supreme Court when the argument is made in response to defense counsel raising the issue of mercy, defense counsel in this case did not invoke “mercy” or “sympathy” or “compassion” in closing argument. While trial and appellate counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to these arguments, the court declined to address prejudice since a new penalty hearing was already required.

3. MISCELLANEOUS

a. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2022: *Jones v. Bradshaw, 46 F.4th 459 (6th Cir. 2022), rehearing en banc denied, 2022 WL 10219982 (6th Cir. Oct. 7, 2022) (1998 trial and sentencing). In Ohio death penalty case, trial counsel “performed ineffectively by presenting racialized evidence during the penalty phase.” Petitioner, who is Black, was convicted of killing a police officer. At the sentencing phase, trial counsel presented evidence of petitioner’s history of neglect and trauma. Trial counsel also presented expert testimony from a clinical psychologist who diagnosed petitioner with Antisocial Personality Disorder (ASPD) and then explained the negative aspects of the disorder. The diagnosis was based largely on petitioner’s criminal record. The expert opined that the best treatment for someone such as petitioner was to lock them away and throw away the key. On cross-examination, the expert agreed that one to three percent of the general population could be diagnosed with ASPD, but then added that in “urban African American males,” the percentage was much higher, “15 to 25 percent, maybe even 30 percent[.]” On re-direct, the expert opined that it was the fact that a large percentage of African American males are incarcerated or on strict probation that explained why not more of these African American ASPD men had committed murder. In closing argument, defense counsel reiterated the prevalence and incurability of ASPD in Black men. Petitioner was subsequently sentenced to death. Petitioner first raised a claim that trial counsel was ineffective in his handling of the expert in state post-conviction proceedings. The claim was denied by the state court on the procedural ground that it should have been raised on direct appeal. This was an erroneous application of state law as the post-conviction application contained new evidence supporting the claim that was not in the trial record. The new evidence was an affidavit from a psychologist who examined petitioner and concluded that he suffered from PTSD rather than ASPD. Although there was “some disconnect between the extra-record evidence and the merits of the claim presented” given that the new expert did not address race at all, the new expert did criticize [the trial expert’s] interpretation of [petitioner’s] test results and came to an alternate diagnosis. If [the trial expert] had come to the same diagnosis as [the post-conviction expert], he would not have had occasion to testify that [ASPD] is a disease that affects a large percentage of “urban African American males,” whose only chance at success is to be locked up. Put differently, if [the post-conviction expert’s] allegedly correct diagnosis was presented to the jury, [the trial expert’s] diagnosis (and the racialized testimony accompanying it) would not have been presented, thereby avoiding a potential constitutional violation. Thus, the affidavit is intertwined with the merits of [petitioner’s] ineffective-assistance claim and allows for de novo review.

The Supreme Court’s decision in Buck v. Davis, made clear that trial counsel was ineffective for allowing the jury to hear the racially prejudicial testimony. “And because, as part of the sentencing process, the jury passed judgment on whether this racist evidence itself was a mitigating factor, there is a reasonable probability that [petitioner] would have received a lesser sentence if [the expert] testimony was not introduced.”

Capital Case*

2017: Stephenson v. Neal*, 865 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2017) (1997 sentencing). The Seventh Circuit granted penalty phase relief in this Indiana capital case on the ground that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object when petitioner was required to wear a visible stun belt at trial. Having earlier determined that the Indiana Supreme Court’s rejection of this claim was inconsistent with clearly established federal law, see Stephenson v. Wilson, 619 F.3d 664, 668 (7th Cir. 2010), the Seventh Circuit concentrated its analysis on the merits of counsel’s failure to object to the stun belt:

The box on Stephenson’s belt was on his back under his shirt yet visible to the jurors as a bulge. ... [S]eeing the bulge and recognizing it as the action part of a stun belt the jurors may have thought it evidence that Stephenson was violent and unpredictable—evidence confirming the jury’s decision to convict and encouraging it to sentence such a person, already found to be a murderer, to death. It’s also possible that wearing the stun belt affected Stephenson’s demeanor and appearance throughout the trial—made him nervous and fearful, which jurors might interpret incorrectly as signs of guilt. * * * The fault is certainly not Stephenson’s; it’s his lawyer’s, for failing to object to his client’s having to wear a stun belt, given the absence of any reason to think his client would go berserk in the courtroom. The possibility that the defendant’s having to wear the stun belt—for no reason, given that he had no history of acting up in a courtroom—contaminated the penalty phase of the trial persuades us to reverse the district court’s denial of [relief]

2008: Duncan v. Ornoski*, 528 F.3d 1222 (9th Cir. 2008) (sentenced in March 1986). Under pre-AEDPA standards, counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to investigate and present evidence that the blood samples from the crime scene that did not belong to the victim, who was stabbed to death in a struggle, and also did not belong to the defendant, which supported an inference that the defendant had an accomplice and that the accomplice killed the victim. There was no prejudice during trial, but prejudice was established with respect to the special circumstance findings that required an intentional killing or an intent to kill. The state’s serologist was given no blood to compare to samples other than the victim’s and could state only what did not match the victim. The defense argued in closing that the state should have tested the defendant’s blood, but the prosecutor responded that if inconsistent blood evidence had been present, the defense would have presented this evidence.

Although it may not be necessary in every instance to consult with or present the testimony of an expert, when the prosecutor’s expert witness testifies about pivotal evidence or directly contradicts the defense theory, defense counsel’s failure to present expert testimony on that matter may constitute deficient performance.

Here, the defense argued that the defendant was not the killer, but “did not advance any plausible alternative theory or present any specific evidence that he was not the murderer.” Counsel had the serology report and understood the significance but opposed the state's motion for blood testing of the defendant and did not consult a serologist or have the defendant's blood tested.

It is especially important for counsel to seek the advice of an expert when he has no knowledge or expertise about the field. . . . Additionally, the central role that the potentially exculpatory blood evidence could have played in [the] defense increased [the] duty to seek the assistance of an expert.

Counsel did not have a valid strategy not to incriminate the defendant further because the defendant admitted presence and his fingerprints and palmprints were present at the scene. In addition, state law allowed "confidential testing by defense experts," which the prosecutor even pointed out to the jury in closing in arguing the unfavorable inferences. Even if defense counsel was concerned about maintaining confidentiality, counsel could have obtained a small sample of the defendant's saliva in a vial or cloth and used that to determine his blood type without notifying the court or the State so there was "nothing to lose by testing [the defendant's] blood, but he stood to gain crucial evidence by doing so." Prejudice found especially considering that the blood evidence was the only physical evidence that had not been linked to [the defendant] at the time of the trial. The evidence that [counsel] failed to present would have been highly significant because it would have suggested that [the defendant] had an accomplice and that the accomplice was likely the actual killer. Under the State's own theory, the small money room likely would have accommodated only one killer. Given the blood found at the crime scene that did not belong to the victim or to [the defendant] and that was likely shed in the course of the attack, it appears probable that [the defendant] was not in the money room during the murder.

Lawhorn v. Allen, 519 F.3d 1272 (11th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 562 U.S. 1118 (2010) (trial in April 1989). Counsel was ineffective in capital sentencing under AEDPA for waiving his closing argument in sentencing. Counsel's conduct was deficient and was not based on a reasonable strategy because counsel's decision was based on "a gross misunderstanding" of state law. While counsel believed that by waiving his closing, the state would be prohibited from making a closing, this was incorrect under state law and counsel had failed to adequately research the issue in preparation for trial. "Such preparation includes an understanding of the legal procedures and the legal significance of tactical decisions within these proceedings." The court reviewed Bell v. Cone but found this case factually distinguishable. The state court's decision was unreasonable because the court found that counsel had researched the issue and found a state case in support of his "strategy," which was not supported by the evidence. Prejudice was also found because counsel forfeited the opportunity to remind the jury of important mitigation evidence presented during the trial that indicated substantial domination of the defendant by his aunt, who requested that he kill the victim because she was afraid of him. Here, the jury recommended death by a vote of 11-1. Under state law, at least a 10-2 vote was required for a verdict of death, so the defendant needed only to convince two more jurors.

2005: Canaan v. McBride*, 395 F.3d 376 (7th Cir. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing for failing to advise the defendant of his right to testify. The court was not constrained in this case by the AEDPA standards because the state courts failed to address this issue even though it was “squarely presented” in state court. Thus, the issue was not “adjudicated on the merits” for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d), just as the Supreme Court’s review was “not circumscribed by a state court conclusion with respect to prejudice [in Wiggins], as neither of the state courts below reached this prong of the Strickland analysis.” (quoting Wiggins v. Smith, 123 S. Ct. 2527, 2537 (2003)). The court noted, however, that the result would be the same under the AEDPA. The court declined deference to the state court finding that counsel advised the defendant of his right to testify in sentencing because this finding was “flatly contradicted” by counsel’s testimony. In determining whether counsel’s conduct was deficient, the court “look[ed] first to the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice and the ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Defense Counsel in Death Penalty Cases.” The court noted that the 2003 ABA Guidelines for death penalty cases provide that “[c]ounsel should consider, and discuss with the client, the possible consequences of having the client testify” In failing to advise the defendant of his right to testify, “counsel also defaulted on their ‘duties to consult with the defendant on important decisions and to keep the defendant informed of important developments in the course of the prosecution.’” (quoting Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 688 (1984)). Although counsel’s advice “might go either way, . . . [t]he point here is that the final choice must be the client’s. . . .” The defendant was prejudiced because no mitigating evidence was presented. State law requires that the jury weigh aggravating and mitigating circumstances. “With nothing to put on the mitigating side of the scale, the jury was almost certain to choose a death sentence.” If counsel had performed adequately, the defendant’s testimony would have revealed “a deeply troubled history” of the kind found to be relevant in Wiggins. Id. at 386. He suffered physical and emotional abuse and struggled with drugs and alcohol.

b. U.S. District Court Cases

2019: Bryant v. Stirling*, 2019 WL 1253235 (D. S.C. March 19, 2019), aff’d, 17 F.4th 513 (4th Cir. 2021) (en banc). Habeas relief granted to South Carolina death row inmate as to his sentence because the jury included a juror who was hearing-impaired and who did not hear portions of the trial testimony. Relief is granted on the substantive claim that Bryant was deprived of his right to a competent jury, as well as his claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek a mistrial once the impairment was revealed. The state post-conviction court had denied relief on the ineffective assistance of counsel claim, finding that trial counsel had strategic reasons for not seeking the juror’s removal: (1) trial counsel didn’t like the alternate juror who would replace the impaired juror; and (2) trial counsel had been dissatisfied with the jury selection process. The district court ruled that the state post-conviction court’s finding was unreasonable and ignored trial counsel’s repeated testimony that the hearing impaired juror’s race motivated his decision to not request a mistrial. Moreover, because the issue was a mistrial – not replacement of the juror – issues with the alternates were irrelevant. And trial counsel’s dissatisfaction with the selection process actually provided a reason to seek a mistrial, not to keep the jury. It was not reasonable to retain a juror who was unable to understand the mitigation and challenges to the aggravation because of her impairment. (No prejudice is found as to the conviction because of the overwhelming evidence of guilt.)

Capital Case*

c. State Cases

2018: Reams v. State*, 560 S.W.3d 441 (Ark. 2018) (1993 trial and sentencing). Affirming decision that trial counsel was ineffective at the penalty phase for failing to call the co-perpetrator to testify that he had been the actual shooter. Petitioner was convicted as an accomplice of capital murder based on the robbery and shooting death of a victim at an ATM, and sentenced to death. The co-perpetrator had pleaded guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to life without parole shortly before petitioner's trial. During post-conviction proceedings, counsel testified that he could not talk to the co-perpetrator because he was represented by counsel, that he did not have a good relationship with the co-perpetrator's counsel, and that he did not know when the co-perpetrator pleaded guilty. He did not investigate any of this or attempt to present the co-perpetrator's testimony to corroborate petitioner's defense that he was not the shooter. At the post-conviction hearing, the co-perpetrator admitted that he was the shooter. Although this did not have legal relevance during the guilt phase, it did at the penalty phase. This testimony left the post-conviction court "with doubts that the petitioner fired the fatal shot" and "those doubts . . . would have caused at least one reasonable juror to have doubt that the petitioner should be sentenced to death, despite his unquestionable complicity in the capital murder." 560 S.W.3d at 456 (quoting post-conviction court). The state Supreme Court rejected the state's argument that there were questions whether the co-perpetrator would have testified at the trial based on his hearing testimony; it determined that the co-perpetrator had already pleaded guilty and been sentenced to life without parole by the time of petitioner's trial, so it was likely he would have testified.. (Petitioner also raised a claim that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to raise a fair cross-section challenge based on the systematic underrepresentation of African-American potential jurors under Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1979). The post-conviction court had denied that claim. The Arkansas Supreme Court reversed, finding that trial counsel was deficient but remanding for a determination of whether there was a valid Duren claim. If there was, this established the necessary prejudice for a grant of relief.)

2008: Green v. State*, 975 So. 2d 1090 (Fla. 2008) (1990 sentencing). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to investigate a prior New York robbery case used by the state in support of a prior violent felony conviction aggravating factor. Counsel challenged admissibility unsuccessfully on the basis of remoteness and the failure to offer a certified copy of the judgment. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to obtain the file from New York even though it was readily available. Counsel's conduct was not excused even though the defendant admitted to the robbery. Prejudice established because the file revealed that the defendant had pled guilty to a simple robbery when he was 18 rather than an "armed robbery" as the state's witnesses testified. The New York court then vacated the robbery conviction and entered a youthful offender finding and sentence. In short, under New York law, a youthful offender adjudication is not a "conviction" and, therefore, does not satisfy the prior violent felony conviction aggravator under Florida's death penalty statute. In addition to the prejudice of this aggravating factor, the defendant was prejudiced by the characterization of the prior as an “armed robbery” rather than a simple robbery because the capital murder was committed during the course of an armed robbery.

2006: *Commonwealth v. May, 898 A.2d 559 (Pa. 2006) (1995 resentencing hearing; 1996 post-trial motions). Trial counsel ineffective in failing to assert as error the trial court’s ruling in capital sentencing that the defendant’s proffered mitigation evidence was irrelevant and inadmissible. Specifically, the defendant sought to present evidence, under the “catchall” mitigator, that his father physically and sexually abused him and forced him to watch the physical and sexual abuse of his sisters and mother. Prejudice was clear because, with an aggravating circumstance established and no mitigating circumstances, state law required the jury to impose a sentence of death.

2005: *Salazar v. State, 126 P.3d 625 (Okla. Crim. App. 2005) (2003 mental retardation trial). Counsel ineffective in jury trial determination of whether the defendant was mentally retarded due to counsel’s failure to investigate with respect to the testing conducted by the state’s expert. Although the defendant’s IQ score fell in the mentally retarded range on his testing, the state’s expert testified that, based on two tests, the defendant was malingering.

[The state’s expert] effectively discredited Petitioner’s experts by claiming they used improper testing procedures, by using tests not “normed” for a person like Petitioner, and by not properly reporting the results. Had [he] not done the exact same things, there would be no problem.

Counsel did not cross-examine him, however, with respect to the malingering tests he conducted or other investigate to determine the nature of that testing. “One test counsel recognized as the TOMM test and the other he did not recognize but it did not occur to him to inquire into the origins of that test.” Counsel did not cross-examine the state’s expert concerning the malingering tests for strategy reasons but “it was a strategy based upon counsel’s admitted failure to recognize the significance of and determine the origins of [the expert’s] testing and raw data.”

We cannot fathom, in a case which boiled down to a battle of experts, why Petitioner’s counsel failed to research the tests [the state’s expert] performed on Petitioner to confirm the origins of and the scientific validity of those tests before Petitioner’s mental retardation hearing. The raw data was provided to counsel prior to the mental retardation jury trial. The evidence was discoverable with due diligence—that is clear from another attorney’s discovery of the information in a separate and unrelated proceeding.

If counsel had adequately investigated, he would have discovered that one of the malingering tests given by the state’s expert was a non-standardized test the expert “made up and . . . it was not administered pursuant to accepted scientific norms.” “No reasonable trial strategy would have supported a decision not to utilize this important impeachment evidence.” Prejudice found because counsel could have discredited the state’s expert in the exact same way that he had discredited Petitioner’s experts. Prejudice was also clear because “three juror surveys” revealed that the state’s expert testimony was the most credible to the jury. Because the court was “bothered that this State’s witness seemingly, intentionally, misled the trial court and the parties about the reliability of his own tests to strengthen the State of Oklahoma’s case,” the court modified the sentence to life without parole rather than remanding for a new hearing.

Morrisette v. Warden of Sussex I State Prison, 613 S.E.2d 551 (Va. 2005) (2001 trial). Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to object to verdict form that did not provide “expressly for the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment for life and a fine of not more than $100,000 when the jury finds that one or both of the aggravating factors have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the court ruled this language must be included in a case decided two months prior to this trial. Prejudice found because “a jury is likely to be confused when there is a conflict between the sentencing instructions and the verdict form” and the instructions included this language while the verdict form did not.

2004: In re Davis*, 101 P.3d 1 (Wash. 2004) (1998 trial and sentencing). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing for failing to object to the shackling of the defendant. Counsel objected to the shackling on the first day of jury selection but was overruled. A mistrial was subsequently granted due to the trial court’s poor health and an order was entered that continued all prior rulings unless modified by the new judge. Counsel did not object to the shackling during the second trial, which resulted in the defendant’s conviction and death sentence. “Assuming that the failure to object was deficient performance,” id. at 30, there was prejudice during the trial even though one juror saw the leg restraints on two occasions because there was overwhelming evidence of guilt. Prejudice was found during sentencing, however, because “placing the [D]efendant in restraints indicates to the jury that the Defendant is viewed as a ‘dangerous’ and ‘unmanageable’ person, in the opinion of the court, who cannot be controlled, even in the presence of courtroom security.” Id. at 32. Thus, even though no juror saw the shackles in sentencing, the court could not “be assured that any negative inference as to Petitioner’s character was cured” from the juror’s viewing of the shackles during trial. Id. In so finding, the court declined to consider juror testimony of no impact because of “the remoteness in time of the reference hearing from the actual verdict.” Id. at 24.

III. NON-CAPITAL SENTENCING ERRORS

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Shelton v. United States, 2024 WL 5683354 (6th Cir. Dec. 10, 2024) (not reported in Fed.Rptr.)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the trial court's determination that petitioner possessed a semiautomatic firearm capable of accepting a large-capacity magazine where the record was devoid of any evidence that he possessed such a firearm and which resulted in at least a two-level increase to petitioner's base offense level.

2023: United States v. Cannady, 63 F.4th 259 (4th Cir. 2023). In case involving drug-related charges, trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to object to reinstatement of petitioner's original sentence following reversal of a grant of relief where recent case law supported a challenge to petitioner's designation as a career offender. The mandate on remand did not preclude counsel from objecting to the career offender enhancement. The Fourth Circuit had only ruled on a Brady issue unrelated to sentencing and then issued a general remand which did not discuss sentencing. Further, petitioner could not have forfeited or waived any objection under the recent decision as the Fourth Circuit did not issue the opinion until after it had decided the government's appeal of the Brady vacatur. But even assuming the mandate rule applied, petitioner met the exception for a dramatic change in legal authority. It was irrelevant that the new decision concerned a conspiracy to commit a "crime of violence," rather than a conspiracy to commit a "controlled substance offense" as was at issue in petitioner's case. This is because the opinion's "holding regarding the generic definition of conspiracy directly applied to and undermined the district court's reason for applying the career offender enhancement here." And counsel's failure to raise the objection was deficient. Counsel's failure resulted in prejudice as petitioner's "16-year sentence far exceeded the high end of what the Guidelines range would have been without the career offender enhancement."

2022: United States v. Freeman, 24 F.4th 320 (4th Cir. 2022) (en banc). In case involving a guilty plea to possession with intent to distribute opioids where defendant was sentenced to 210 months, sentencing counsel was ineffective on the face of the record. Prior to the sentencing hearing, defense counsel made several objections to the presentence report (PSR) but then waived them at the hearing because, according to counsel at the time, they were "minimal" and ultimately would not reduce the Sentencing Guidelines range. In fact, if successful, the objections would have reduced the low end of defendant's Sentencing Guidelines range by almost ten years. On appeal, the government argued that the waiver was strategic as counsel reasonably determined that the objections had little chance of succeeding and so decided to instead focus the court's attention on mitigating factors, such as defendant's addiction and her children, and on his efforts to secure her admittance to a diversion program. But even if defendant had been a strong candidate for the diversion program, "counsel's decision to focus on her motion to enter the program at the expense of her objections to the PSR cannot have been strategic because [sentencing counsel] did not understand the potential value of the objections." Confidence in the sentencing outcome is undermined even if the reduced Guidelines range applicable to defendant's offense level still encompassed the 210-month sentence she received. As for the sentencing court's statement that it would have imposed an identical sentence as a variance, regardless of the calculated Guidelines range, such a statement can insulate a sentence from harmless error review. It will not do so, however, in the Strickland prejudice context. “Here, it is clear from the record that, but for counsel’s unprofessional waiver of [defendant’s] objections at sentencing, there is a reasonable probability that her sentence would have been different.”

2021: United States v. Parks, 995 F.3d 241 (D.C. Cir. 2021). Defense counsel was ineffective at defendant’s sentencing for failing to object when the District Court relied on the wrong provision of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines when imposing six years of supervised release following the sentence of 22 months in prison. It was conceded that defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to alert the District Court to the applicable Guidelines provision after the District Court followed the incorrect one that had been set forth in the presentence report. Prejudice was also established on the record of this case. Although the District Court rejected the request by defendant’s counsel to impose a less-than-five-year sentence under the applicable statute, “the record was ‘silent’ as to what the District Court would have done had it ‘considered the correct Guidelines range.’”

Lewis v. Zatecky*, 993 F.3d 994 (7th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S.Ct. 897 (2022). In felony-murder case involving two victims where petitioner received the maximum sentence of 130 years in prison after his attorney offered no evidence or argument at sentencing, petitioner was entitled to habeas relief without a showing of prejudice pursuant to Cronic. The state appellate court had denied relief to petitioner after concluding that petitioner was required to meet Strickland’s prejudice prong. The state court’s determination to follow Strickland and not Cronic on the facts of this case was contrary to clearly established law and, insofar as it looked to Cronic, it unreasonably applied the case by focusing on its specific facts. Cronic applied here because there was “the total absence of counsel (or its functional equivalent) at a critical stage.” Defense counsel’s “assistance” during the entire sentencing phase “[i]n essence, . . . was nothing but a statement that he was bowing out. He uttered two short sentences: ‘Judge, I’m going to defer to Mr. Lewis if he has any comments. I don’t have anything to add.’” Although the state suggested that defense counsel may have strategically decided to allow petitioner to speak for himself in the hope that he might express remorse, such a strategy was never communicated to petitioner and so he had no guidance from counsel about what he might do with his allocution when he had the chance to speak. This theory also conflicted with defense counsel’s testimony at the state post-conviction hearing where he explained his inaction on his conclusion that there were no mitigating factors in petitioner’s case, which was not surprising given counsel’s failure to even ask petitioner about his mental-health history or request his medical records. “Today’s outcome faithfully follows Cronic, because we are faced with the extraordinary situation of a lawyer’s total abandonment of his client at the critical sentencing state.”

2020: United States v. Miller, 953 F.3d 804 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (Mem.). Defense counsel was ineffective at sentencing on federal fraud charges by failing to notify the court that defendant, who was serving time in Maryland prison at the time of his federal indictment, had lost one year of Maryland state jail credits while in federal custody awaiting his federal trial. Such knowledge was necessary in order for the federal court to craft a reasonable sentence for the federal convictions.

2019: United States v. Sepling, 944 F.3d 138 (3rd Cir. 2019). In drug case where petitioner engaged in an additional drug crime while awaiting sentencing which resulted in a greater sentence for the original crime, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present evidence regarding the properties of the drug involved in the pre-sentencing crime for purposes of calculating petitioner's guideline exposure. Pursuant to a negotiated plea agreement, petitioner pleaded guilty to importing gamma butyrolactone (GBL), a schedule I controlled substance analogue. As part of the plea agreement, petitioner agreed to refrain from further violations of law while awaiting sentencing. Despite this agreement, petitioner became involved in a conspiracy to import methylone, another Schedule I controlled substance, shortly after he was released on bond. Petitioner was arrested and charged with conspiracy to import methylone. A search incident to that arrest uncovered 3 kilograms of the substance and a later investigation revealed that the conspiracy involved approximately ten kilograms of the drug. The attorney appointed to represent petitioner on the new charges negotiated an unwritten agreement with the Government in which the Government agreed to withdraw the conspiracy charge in exchange for petitioner accepting responsibility for conspiring to import methylone. In addition, the Government agreed that, rather than prosecuting petitioner on the new charges, his involvement would be factored into the sentence he would receive for his prior GBL conviction as relevant conduct. Pursuant to the initial plea agreement arising from his involvement with GBL, petitioner's unmodified Guideline range was 27 to 33 months incarceration. However, the relevant conduct involving his subsequent arrest for methylone dramatically increased his base offense level. Because methylone was not included in the relevant statute for assessing sentence, the drug conversion table in the statute was utilized to determine petitioner's sentencing exposure. The Probation Officer preparing petitioner's Pre-Sentence Report (PSR) analogized methylone to Methylenedioxymethamphetamine or "MDMA," a more common street drug known as "ecstasy," and the Guidelines specify a sentencing range for MDMA by establishing a ratio to convert it to a comparable amount of marijuana. The ratio was 500:1. The PSR held petitioner responsible for ten kilograms of methylone. Utilizing the Guidelines formula, the relevant conduct for petitioner's involvement with methylone was equivalent to conspiring to distribute 5,000 kilograms (five and a half U.S. tons) of marijuana. The resulting sentencing range was a period of incarceration between 188 months and 235 months. Sentencing counsel did not object to that sentencing calculation, nor did he file a sentencing memorandum. At the sentencing hearing, counsel did object to use of ten kilograms rather than three but did not contest the 500:1 conversion ratio. Sentencing counsel conceded that he had never heard of methylone prior to petitioner's rearrest and his efforts to learn about it were through conversations with the Government. He described it as akin to watered down ecstasy. Sentencing counsel relied on the testimony of petitioner to explain the effects of methylone, which petitioner described as a lesser version of MDMA: "It's like ecstasy. If ecstasy is a ten ... [t]his stuff is six and lasts about an hour and a half." In an exchange between the parties and the sentencing judge, it was revealed that neither the parties nor the judge had any substantive knowledge of methylone. In sentencing petitioner to 120 months, the judge noted in particular the methylone. (The judge had determined that the Guidelines were not fair and granted petitioner a substantial downward variance.) Petitioner later filed a motion to vacate alleging that sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and educate himself and the court about methylone, the substance driving his sentence, or MDMA, its guideline analogue. The district court found neither deficient performance nor prejudice. The appeals court disagreed. "Sentencing Counsel's failure to develop even a rudimentary understanding of methylone and how it compares to MDMA precluded him from assessing whether MDMA was an appropriate analogue, making a compelling, fact-based argument about the seriousness of methylone, or arguing in favor of a smaller ratio than 500:1 as a starting point for crafting an appropriate sentence.” In assessing counsel’s performance the appeals court cited to the ABA Guidelines. It also observed that while it respect[ed] and appreciate[d] the role of the Probation Office in preparing PSRs, the Probation Officer is an officer of the court and counsel cannot delegate the solemn responsibility of representing a client to a representative of the Probation Office. Because methylone is not amongst the substances listed in 2D1.1, Sentencing Counsel should have been sufficiently informed about methylone to evaluate the Probation Officer's selection of MDMA as an analogue for sentencing purposes.

After discussing what adequate research would have uncovered, the appeals court concluded: “The available evidence would have supported a well-reasoned argument from Sentencing Counsel that the 500:1 ratio was not supported by then-current scientific research and seriously overstated the societal threat of MDMA.” Further, even assuming that MDMA is the appropriate analogue for methylone, sentencing counsel, “in addition to challenging the 500:1 ratio for MDMA, could have argued for a further downward variance based on the properties of methylone.” While the district court accepted that methylone was “somewhat” less serious than MDMA, with appropriate research sentencing counsel could have forcefully argued that methylone “does not have ‘somewhat less of an impact’ than MDMA, but rather is significantly less serious.” (Emphasis in original.) In finding that sentencing counsel did not perform deficiently, the district court noted that sentencing counsel’s description of methylone as “watered down ecstasy” was consistent with petitioner’s testimony about the drug. The appeals court countered: “This misses the point. As the Drug Enforcement Agency has shown, methylone is not only less potent than MDMA, it is also structurally different from MDMA. There was no reason for Sentencing Counsel to expect [petitioner] to appreciate the pharmacological impact of the equivalent weights of the various drugs he may have consumed, or for the court to credit his untutored descriptions of methylone as scientific knowledge.”

Moreover, even absent constitutionally diligent research efforts, Sentencing Counsel could have reminded the court that there was no way to know if the street drugs [petitioner] had a history of using had been adulterated or mixed with something that enhanced or exaggerated the drug’s effect on him. There was also no way of knowing the quantity of drug required to produce equivalent effects. Finally, there was no way of knowing if a given drug’s effect on [petitioner] was typical. Yet, not only did Sentencing Counsel fail to object to the court’s reliance on [petitioner] as an expert witness, he actually encouraged his client to testify as such.

On this record, counsel’s dereliction of his duties was obvious. Regarding prejudice, the appeals court ruled: “If Sentencing Counsel had provided the kind of information referenced above comparing methylone to MDMA, we are persuaded that there is a sufficient likelihood that [petitioner] could have received a lesser sentence to undermine our confidence in the outcome of the sentencing proceeding.” Although the district court did award a downward variance to petitioner based upon the court's conclusion that the 500:1 ratio derived from using MDMA may well overstate the seriousness of methylone, that did not negate the fact that petitioner “may have received an even greater variance if Sentencing Counsel had been sufficiently informed about methylone.”

United States v. Winbush*, 922 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge petitioner’s designation as a career offender under the Sentencing Guidelines. Petitioner pleaded guilty to one count of possession with intent to distribute cocaine base. At the sentencing hearing, the district court determined that petitioner was a career offender based on two prior felony convictions of controlled substance offenses: trafficking cocaine and illegal conveyance of drugs onto the grounds of a detention facility. After his conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal, petitioner filed a motion to vacate, arguing that defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the career offender designation. In the district court, the government conceded that petitioner’s prior felony conviction for illegal conveyance of drugs onto the grounds of a detention facility was in fact not a qualifying controlled substance offense for career offender purposes. The government successfully argued, however, that petitioner remained a career offender because of a prior Ohio robbery conviction that was a crime of violence. On that basis, the district court concluded that defense counsel was not ineffective. On appeal, the government did not dispute that defense counsel performed deficiently but instead focused on the alleged lack of prejudice. Circuit precedent, however, “prohibits the government from substituting [petitioner’s] robbery conviction to maintain his career offender status when the government failed to designate that conviction at sentencing and designated other offenses instead.” See United States v. Hodge, 902 F.3d 420 (4th Cir. 2018). That Hodge involved the ACCA rather than the career offender designation did not render it inapplicable. Had defense counsel properly objected, petitioner’s Guidelines range could have been 14-41 months lower than his ultimate sentence of 151 months. The relief granted is resentencing without the career offender designation.

2018: Richardson v. Superintendent Coal Township SCI, 905 F.3d 750 (3rd Cir. 2018). In case involving numerous state court convictions, habeas relief granted on claim of ineffective assistance of post-sentencing counsel for failing to challenge the constitutionality of petitioner’s waiver of counsel during sentencing. After petitioner had been convicted, he sought to fire his trial attorney during sentencing. The sentencing judge treated this as a waiver of the right to counsel without ensuring that the waiver was knowing and voluntary. Trial counsel, unsure whether or not he had been excused from representation, remained in the court during the second day of sentencing but did not say or do anything while petitioner represented himself. After sentencing, petitioner was appointed a new attorney who, pursuant to Pennsylvania law, could file post-sentencing motions and then an appeal. This new attorney filed a post-sentencing motion that failed to raise the waiver of counsel issue and thereafter filed an unsuccessful appeal. Petitioner then filed a pro se petition for post-conviction relief, raising a claim that the sentencing judge failed to inquire whether he knowingly and intentionally waived his right to counsel. Although post-conviction counsel was appointed, he abandoned that claim explaining to the court why he thought the claim was meritless. Petitioner filed a pro se habeas petition in federal court, raising a claim that his counsel was ineffective for abandoning him at the sentencing phase, that the court did not perform a sufficient inquiry as to the waiver of counsel, and that state appellate and post-conviction counsel were ineffective. The petition was denied and the Third Circuit denied a certificate of appealability.

Capital Case*

Petitioner then filed a Rule 60(b) motion which was denied and again the Third Circuit denied a COA. SCOTUS granted certiorari, vacated, and remanded in light of Martinez. The district court held an evidentiary hearing at which all three state lawyers testified. The district court again denied the 60(b) motion, declining to entertain petitioner's Sixth Amendment claim that the sentencing judge failed to conduct a colloquy because it did not consider it to be an IAC claim; finding no prejudice from the lack of counsel at sentencing; determining that Martinez does not apply to IAC of appellate counsel claims; and rejecting the IAC claim against state post-conviction counsel because there is no right to effective counsel on state habeas. The Third Circuit this time granted a COA to determine whether state post-conviction counsel's failure to raise post-sentencing counsel's effectiveness constituted cause for the procedural default of failing to raise the claim in state court. The Third Circuit held that (1) in Pennsylvania state court, the post-sentencing motions stage is a critical stage at which defendant is entitled to the effective assistance of counsel (and petitioner was denied that right); and (2) post-sentencing motions precede the notice of appeal, and they are thus part of the trial stage (the court held that the boundary between trial and appellate counsel falls at the effective date of the notice of appeal), so when a state post-conviction lawyer fails to raise a post-sentencing lawyer's ineffectiveness, the prisoner may raise that issue for the first time in the federal petition under Martinez v. Ryan. The Third Circuit concluded that petitioner established that the procedural default of the post-sentencing counsel IAC claim was caused by ineffectiveness of post-conviction counsel; that this ineffectiveness occurred in the first collateral proceeding in which the claim could be considered; and that the underlying claim of ineffectiveness of post-sentencing counsel was substantial. The sentencing judge conducted no colloquy whatsoever when petitioner terminated his trial attorney's representation. This issue should have been raised in the post-sentencing motion, but counsel failed to do so, which was ineffective. If post-sentencing counsel had raised this issue, the proper remedy would have been to order a new sentencing hearing. Post-conviction counsel should have raised this issue, but instead he specifically told the court that it was meritless, which was also ineffective.

2017: United States v. Carthorne, 878 F.3d 458 (4th Cir. 2017). Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed the district court's dismissal of a motion for post-conviction relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 to determine whether the Fourth Circuit's decision on direct appeal, that a sentencing court did not plainly err in designating a defendant as a "career offender," required a conclusion on collateral review that trial counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to object to that designation. On appeal, the Court of Appeal had determined that although assault and battery on a police officer (ABPO) did not categorically qualify as a crime of violence under the force clause, because it did not include as an element physical force, the district court did not plainly err in applying the career offender enhancement under the United States Sentencing Guidelines (Guidelines) Section 4B1.1 because existing precedent did not require a conclusion that ABPO did not qualify as a crime of violence under the residual clause (there was a circuit split on that issue, and a district court does not commit plain error by following the reasoning of another circuit if neither SCOTUS nor this Circuit has addressed the issue directly). On this habeas review, the Fourth Circuit concluded that the standards for plain error and ineffective assistance of counsel are distinct and do not necessarily result in equivalent outcomes for the defendant. The plain error standard is statutory; the IAC standard is constitutional. While plain error review requires there to be settled precedent in order for the defendant to obtain relief, under the IAC standard, counsel may be required to raise material issues even in the absence of decisive precedent. The plain error standard thus reflects the view that the primary responsibility for protecting a defendant's interests at trial lies with his attorney rather than with the court. The Fourth Circuit therefore held that the defendant's trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to understand the required legal analysis, and by failing to make an obvious objection to the career offender designation. Counsel may be constitutionally required to object when there is relevant authority strongly suggesting that a sentencing enhancement is not proper. At the time of petitioner's sentencing, there was clear Supreme Court and Fourth Circuit precedent detailing the analytical framework for determining whether a crime qualifies as a predicate offense under the Sentencing Guidelines. Counsel's task under the categorical approach for purposes of Section 4B1.2(a) is to analyze whether the offense is necessarily a crime of violence, absent any consideration of the facts of the particular crime committed. Longstanding Virginia precedent clearly established that the ABPO could be accomplished with the slightest touching, and therefore did not categorically involve physical force or serious potential risk of physical injury, under the residual clause. Counsel should have known that the above-stated precedent raised serious questions whether ABPO qualified as a crime of violence under the Guidelines, but instead counsel only looked at the facts of petitioner's prior ABPO, during which he had been convicted of ABPO for spitting on an officer. There was no strategic reason for the failure to object; counsel did not do basic legal research (court cited Hinton v. Alabama, 571 U.S. 263 (2014)). With regard to the prejudice prong, if the district court had not found that ABPO was a crime of violence, the high end of petitioner's sentence would have been more than seven years shorter. If counsel had objected, there is a reasonable probability that the district court would not have applied the career offender enhancement. The Fourth Circuit vacated the petitioner's sentence, and remanded the case to the district court for resentencing.

Phillips v. White*, 851 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 2017) (sentenced in 2001). The Sixth Circuit granted sentencing relief in this Kentucky double murder case that was tried capitally but ended in consecutive sentences of life with parole eligibility after twenty-five years, concluding that defense counsel deficiently failed to prepare or present a defense at sentencing, and that prejudice could be both presumed under United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984), and found under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). The case arose when petitioner, who was intoxicated, shot and killed his two neighbors over a small cash debt which had led to a simmering dispute that included acts of aggression by one of the decedents. While defense counsel made an effort at the guilt or innocence phase, he made clear to the trial judge that he knew nothing about death penalty litigation and was completely unprepared to proceed with a capital sentencing. When the trial proceeded to the penalty phase, counsel declined to propose jury instructions or to object to the prosecution's, declined to give an opening statement, presented no evidence, and gave a brief closing in which he complained about his failure at the first phase and announced he did not "intend to take anymore of [the jury's] time in this part." Counsel also failed to object to or clarify the prosecutor's statements to the jury implying that the three most severe of the five sentencing options could be considered, while the other two – life with parole eligibility before twenty-five years, and twenty to fifty years – could not. After the judgment was affirmed on direct appeal, petitioner sought state post-conviction relief pro se but after six years without a state court disposition, petitioner – again pro se – proceeded to federal district court, where relief was denied. With exhaustion being excused, and no state court adjudication to review under § 2254(d), the Sixth Circuit had no difficulty finding counsel's performance deficient because he failed to investigate and present mitigating evidence and failed to clarify that the jury could sentence him to life imprisonment (with the possibility of parole before twenty-five years) or twenty-to-fifty years. With regard to prejudice, the court first determined that counsel's "performance amounted to nonperformance," thereby implicating Cronic. The Sixth Circuit added that counsel's failure to ensure the jury understood its lesser sentencing options or to present mitigating evidence also resulted in prejudice under Strickland. As for available mitigating evidence, petitioner had offered, inter alia: (1) positive character evidence from family and friends; (2) evidence that petitioner believed that the decedents posed a grave and imminent threat to his wife and stepdaughter; and (3) evidence that petitioner was intoxicated on the night of the shooting. Looking to this evidence, the court concluded that there is more than a reasonable probability that the available mitigation could have influenced the jury's assessment of petitioner's moral culpability and resulted in a different sentence.

2016: United States v. Abney, 812 F.3d 1079 (D.C. Cir. 2016). Counsel ineffective in crack cocaine case for failing to seek a continuance of the defendant's sentencing until after the Fair Sentencing Act (FSA), which lowered the mandatory minimum sentences for crack cocaine offenses, became effective. The act was passed by Congress five days before sentencing. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to seek a continuance as Presidential approval was virtually assured. In addition, it was "reasonably probable – if not more likely still – that courts would interpret the FSA's new mandatory minimums to apply to defendants sentenced after its effective date." "Any competent criminal defense attorney familiar with federal sentencing principles would have understood that" and the defense bar was universally seeking continuances in sentencing until after the FSA took effect. In short, counsel's conduct was deficient. "The FSA's impending enactment was so important and widely publicized – and the reasonable likelihood of its retroactive effect so apparent – that objectively reasonable counsel would have known about it and the open retroactivity question, irrespective of what Abney's counsel subjectively knew." Prejudice was also established in that application of the FSA cut the mandatory minimum sentence from ten years to five years.

2013: Gonzalez v. United States, 722 F.3d 118 (2nd Cir. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for failing to advocate on the defendant's behalf at all. The defendant pled guilty in narcotics and bribery case. In essence, the defendant and others were conspiring to use drugs and cash to bribe an allegedly corrupt Immigration and Naturalization (INS) official to provide certain aliens with "green cards" establishing Permanent Resident Alien status. While there were plea negotiations in which the defendant sought a sentencing reduction in exchange for cooperating with evidence against a codefendant, the final agreement simply dismissed some charges in exchange for the plea. The agreement said nothing about sentencing, although the prosecutor noted during the plea hearing that the guidelines range was 262 to 327 months. Following the plea hearing, for the 10 months until sentencing, counsel had no contact with the defendant. Counsel did not attend post-plea debriefing sessions with the government, did not attend the defendant's interview by the probation department, did not communicate with the defendant about the pre-sentence report (PSR), did not file a sentencing memorandum or respond to the government's sentencing memorandum, and did not even point out orally the feasible grounds for a departure from the Guidelines range. While the District Court, who had been the trial and sentencing judge, found deficient conduct, it found no prejudice in that the defendant was sentenced to 210 months, which was on the low end of the Guidelines range. The District Court erred, however, in simply finding "no adverse affect" due to counsel's deficient conduct. This is the wrong standard for prejudice under Strickland in that it is “a standard at least as demanding as more-likely-than-not.” The District Court also erred in considering the sentence the defendant actually received in determining whether there was prejudice from counsel’s complete failure to act as an advocate in sentencing. Indeed, counsel “did little more than simply attend” the sentencing hearing. The arguments for departure from the Guidelines advanced by 2255 counsel, some of which the District Court referred to as potentially “effective,” was sufficient to establish prejudice.

2012: United States v. Rodriguez, 676 F.3d 183 (D.C. Cir. 2012). Counsel ineffective in non-capital sentencing for distribution of 500 grams or more of cocaine for failing to assert the “safety valve provision,” which permits the court to impose a sentence below the statutory minimum if certain conditions are met when the PSR recommended a guidelines range below the statutory mandatory minimum sentence. While counsel initially asserted this provision, counsel did not do so after the defendant belatedly met all five elements required for the safety-valve provision. Prejudice found because the provision is “mandatory” and the guidelines range would have been reduced from 78-97 months to 63-78 months. Even though the actual sentence was 72 months, there is a reasonable probability that he would have received a lower sentence if counsel had performed adequately.

2010: United States v. Washington, 619 F.3d 1252 (10th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug distribution case failing to understand the impact of “relevant conduct” under the sentencing guidelines and, as a result, failing to adequately advise the defendant of the consequences. The defendant was convicted of distributing 61.98 grams of cocaine base. Another four kilograms was attributed to him by a confidential government informant. During his interview by a probation officer for his presentence report, the defendant admitted an additional 2.5 kilograms attributable to him. Thus, a total of 6.5 kilograms was considered in sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient.

The instant case is not one of misinformation by counsel; rather, the record reflects that [the defendant] was never in any way informed about the applicability or impact of relevant conduct because his counsel did not understand its significance in the sentencing scheme. As a panel of this court has pointed out, “failing to predict a sentence correctly is not the same as failing to understand the mechanics of the sentencing guidelines. . . .”

Id. at 1259. Here, “counsel failed to understand the basic structure and mechanics of the sentencing guidelines and was therefore incapable of helping the defendant to make reasonably informed decisions throughout the criminal process.” Id. at 1260. Prejudice established. The defendant’s admissions ultimately resulted in his loss of a downward adjustment in sentence under the 2007 Crack Cocaine Amendments. The two level reduction of these amendments could not be applied if the offense involved 4.5 kilograms or more. The defendant’s admissions moved his drug quantity from 4 kilograms to 6.5. If the amendments could be applied, the defendant’s sentencing range would be 324 - 405 months rather than being even above the statutory maximum sentence of 40 years.

Theus v. United States*, 611 F.3d 441 (8th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in failing to object either in the trial court or on appeal to the district court’s error in imposing a ten-year mandatory minimum sentence for a quantity of cocaine that required only a five-year minimum sentence. The defendant was charged with five co-defendants to conspiracy to distribute or possess with intent to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine. The evidence at trial established, and the district court held post-trial, that the defendant was not a member of the conspiracy charged, but he was a member of a different conspiracy with two individuals not charged in the indictment. The presentence investigation report (PSR) attributed only 1.02 kilograms of cocaine to the defendant and explicitly concluded “there is not enough evidence to support that the defendant was involved with 5 kilograms of cocaine.” The guidelines range for the defendant (at 1.02 kilograms) was 70-87 months, but the PSR inexplicably concluded that the 10 year mandatory minimum (at 5 kg) had to be applied rather than the 5 year mandatory minimum (at 1.02 kg). The district court rejected the government’s argument that the guidelines range should be based on 5 kg, but still imposed the mandatory minimum sentence based on that amount, despite announcing that the court would like to impose a sentence in the 70 - 87 month range. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial under these circumstances.

United States v. Tucker, 603 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of weapon sentencing for failing to object to the use of a prior misdemeanor conviction as a predicate violent felony conviction for purposes of designating him as an armed career criminal in sentencing. To be a felony, the crime must be punishable by imprisonment exceeding one year. Nonetheless, without objection, the prosecution relied on a common law assault and battery conviction in state magistrate court which had jurisdiction to impose punishment not to exceed 30 days in confinement. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. It was also prejudicial. The government had relied on four prior convictions and had to prove three that “arose out of a separate and distinct criminal episode” to prove the enhancement. Two of the remaining three convictions were burglaries of storage units with an accomplice on the same night. Because the evidence was insufficient to establish these offenses occurred sequentially on separate occasions rather than simultaneously with the aid of the accomplice, these two burglaries had to be considered as one offense. Thus, without consideration of the improper misdemeanor conviction, the defendant could not be punished as an armed career criminal.

2009: United States v. Polk, 577 F.3d 515 (3rd Cir. 2009). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for possession of a weapon by prison inmate for failing to object to the court’s characterization of the offense as a “crime of violence” in calculating the Guidelines range of 37-46 months. Without the enhancement, the range would have been 27-33 months.

2007: United States v. Otero, 502 F.3d 331 (3rd Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective for failing to object to improper sentencing enhancement for a prior crime of violence. The defendant’s prior was a simple assault in Pennsylvania, which does not require the “the use of force.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient just based on the statutory language but there was also available case law that should have alerted counsel to the issue. “[C]ounsel does have a duty to make reasonable investigations of the law,” including citing “favorable decisions from other courts of appeals.” Prejudice established because, absent the enhancement, the guideline range would have been only 18 to 24 months but the defendant was sentenced to 60 months.

Miller v. Martin, 481 F.3d 468 (7th Cir. 2007). Counsel in securities violations and frauds case deprived the defendant of representation by standing silent during sentencing and prejudice was presumed. The petitioner was convicted following trial in absentia. He retained new counsel for sentencing. Due to counsel's belief that the convictions would be reversed due to the absentia trial, counsel advised him to remain silent because he was concerned the court would learn that the defendant had been noticed with the trial date. Counsel also remained silent other than to inform the court that they would not participate. The state court applied Strickland and found that while counsel's choice to stand mute was "unorthodox" it was a "purely strategic decision" that was not unreasonable and not prejudicial. The court held that the state court ruling was contrary to Supreme Court precedent because the issue should have been addressed under Cronic. Even assuming that Strickland was the appropriate standard, the court held that the state court findings were unreasonable under AEDPA. Counsel's "advocacy" at sentencing was "non-existent" by his own admission. While counsel explained a "strategy" for the petitioner to remain silent during sentencing, he "never explained his own silence." Even if he had been concerned that the court would question him about his client's knowledge, he could have declined to discuss this issue. Likewise, even if he were concerned that a presentation at sentencing could have somehow prejudiced the appeal, "which is not the reason he gave the sentencing court for his decision," he was wrong and had not conducted any research or consulted the court about his concerns. The state court decision of "strategy" was unreasonable. Prejudice was presumed under Cronic. Prejudice was found under Strickland in the alternative. Counsel's silence allowed the sentencing court to rely on errors in the petitioner's criminal record, the state's aggravating factors to go unchallenged, and offered no mitigation, even though the petitioner had already paid restitution to some victims. Counsel said nothing even though the court was clearly considering imposing maximum punishments and running some of the sentences consecutively.

2003: Alaniz v. United States, 351 F.3d 365 (8th Cir. 2003). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective for failing to object to the trial court's error in adding a second uncharged drug type to the charged drug type in order to trigger a higher quantity-based statutory penalty range. The defendant was convicted of conspiring to possess marijuana with intent to distribute and distributing marijuana. In determining the penalty range for the conspiracy count, however, the trial court applied the penalty range applicable to a person with a prior felony drug conviction involving 1000 kg or more of marijuana for which the sentence was 20 years to life. The court held that the defendant had a total of almost 1150 kg of marijuana by aggravating two different drug types. The judge added the approximately 800 kg of marijuana involved in the conspiracy with 12 ounces of methamphetamine the defendant sold during the conspiracy period, which the court converted to its equivalent of approximately 340 kg. If the court had not added the methamphetamine, the defendant's statutory penalty range would have been 2 years to life as opposed to 20 years to life. Under the sentencing guidelines, there was a difference of 210 to 262 months versus 240 to 262 months. While the Eighth Circuit had not previously addressed the aggravation issue, the court noted that every circuit that has addressed the issue has concluded that a second uncharged drug type cannot be added to the charged drug type in order to trigger a higher statutory penalty range. The court, therefore, found that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to raise this issue in sentencing or on appeal. The court found prejudice because, under Glover, an error increasing a defendant's sentence by as little as six months can be prejudicial within the meaning of Strickland. If counsel had objected and the appropriate guideline range had been used, the district court would have been authorized to impose a sentence up to 30 months shorter than the one the defendant actually received. The court remanded to the district court to determine what sentence it would have imposed if it had used the appropriate guideline range and, if the sentence would have been less than the original sentence, the district court was instructed to re-sentence the defendant.

United States v. Conley*, 349 F.3d 837 (5th Cir. 2003). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in conspiracy and mail fraud case for failing to object to the defendant’s sentence, which was greater than the maximum set for the crime for which he was convicted. The defendant was initially charged in a 15-count indictment with conspiracy, mail fraud, and money laundering. he was convicted of one count of conspiracy and four counts of mail fraud, but acquitted on the 10 counts of money laundering. The conspiracy indictment and verdict were ambiguous but “a sentence imposed for a conviction on a count charging violation of multiple statutes or provisions of statutes may not exceed the lowest of the potentially applicable maximums.” Nonetheless, the judge sentenced the defendant for conspiracy with respect to the money laundering allegation to 121 months. The maximum sentence for conspiracy with respect to mail fraud though was only 60 months. Because the error “was obvious” and greatly increased the defendant’s sentence, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to assert this meritorious issue.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Morgan v. United States, 2024 WL 5054957 (S.D. Iowa Dec. 3, 2024). In case where movant was convicted of conspiracy to distribute drugs resulting in death, counsel was ineffective “in failing to raise a directly-on-point provision of the United States Sentencing Guidelines that likely would have resulted in [movant’s] federal court sentence being shorter and/or made to run concurrent to his state court sentence for the same conduct.” The movant’s state court conviction arose out of the controlled transaction that was part of the federal conspiracy as charged and proven. It therefore constituted “relevant conduct” under USSG § 5G1.3, which directs a sentencing judge to adjust a defendant’s sentence for any period of imprisonment that resulted from a separate conviction that was relevant conduct to the instant offense. Counsel was deficient in failing to raise § 5G1.3 given that its applicability was clear and there was nothing in the record suggesting a strategic basis for the omission. Respondent nevertheless argued that movant could not establish prejudice from counsel’s failure to invoke § 5G1.3 because movant’s co-defendant received the same 300-month sentence and the trial judge said the sentence was based upon the death of the victim. The fact that the trial judge clearly wanted the two defendants to receive the identical sentence actually cut against respondent’s argument because without the application of § 5G1.3, movant would serve significantly more time than his co-defendant. (Nothing in the trial judge’s sentencing statement indicated an awareness of the 25-year state sentence imposed on movant.) Given that the trial court did virtually nothing to differentiate between the co-defendants at sentencing, it is likely that it did not intend movant to be sentenced to fifty years while his co-defendant received only twenty-five. Thus, “there is at least a ‘reasonable probability’ that the sentencing judge would have adjusted [movant’s] sentence had USSG § 5G1.3 been raised to his attention.”

Capital Case*

United States v. Kimble*, 2024 WL 3950316 (N.D. Aug. 24, 2024). In case where petitioner was transferred to federal custody on a writ ad prosequendum to face a federal firearm charge after pleading guilty to a state firearm charge, plea counsel was ineffective at sentencing following petitioner's guilty plea in federal court by failing to instruct the court of the 510 days that petitioner served while on the writ ad prosequendum. Although this was time for which the BOP could not provide petitioner with credit, the federal court could consider it when imposing the sentence. (The time at the federal facility was counted for petitioner's state sentence.) Petitioner's plea attorney conceded that her failure to ask for a lower sentence to account for petitioner's time in federal custody was not strategic but instead reflected her lack of understanding of how time served while on a writ ad prosequendum counted toward a sentence. Counsel's assumption that petitioner would receive federal credit for time he served while on the writ "was unreasonable given the long-standing clearly established law stating the very opposite outcome." Prejudice is found even though the court ultimately sentenced petitioner to the low end of the guidelines. Notably, the court made clear its intent that petitioner not serve additional state time on top of his federal sentence by ordering petitioner's federal sentence to run concurrently with his state sentence. Resentencing is ordered.

United States v. Penn*, 2024 WL 3871814 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 19, 2024). Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the sentencing court's application of an improper enhancement. Petitioner was prejudiced given that the court sentenced petitioner to what it incorrectly believed was the minimum sentence under the guidelines, which was 20 months higher than the minimum under the correct guidelines range and 13 months more than the maximum permitted by the correct guideline range.

Portillo Uranga v. United States*, 2024 WL 3429502 (D. Kansas July 16, 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the aggravated-role adjustment for petitioner's money laundering offenses. The Tenth Circuit, applying plain error review, found sentencing error in a co-defendant's direct appeal for the identical calculation that was made here. The Tenth Circuit found that the error was apparent from the text of the Guidelines and prior Tenth Circuit precedent. This finding supported the conclusion that petitioner's attorney's failure to object to the money laundering aggravated-role enhancement deprived petitioner of the effective assistance of counsel. Further, the Tenth Circuit's finding that the calculation error caused the co-defendant substantial prejudice supported a finding that petitioner was prejudiced by his counsel's deficient performance given that the substantial-rights prong of plain-error review is recognized as identical in form and substance to the prejudice prong of Strickland. Although it was possible that the aggravated-role enhancement could still apply, the record lacked the specific findings necessary to make that conclusion. "Without factual findings that delineate Petitioner's relevant conduct for the money laundering offenses, separate and apart from the relevant conduct for the drug trafficking offenses, the Court's confidence in the suitability of the aggravated-role enhancement is undermined."

Ruiz v. McGinley*, 735 F.Supp.3d 540 (E.D. Pa. 2024). In case involving, inter alia, sentences of life without possibility of parole for two burglary convictions because of the application of the state's three-strikes law, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate or present any mitigating evidence at sentencing. At the sentencing proceeding, defense counsel's comments indicated that she was unaware of the relevant procedures and the peril her client faced. In denying relief on the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, the state court unreasonably applied clearly established precedent on the deficient performance prong “because no reasonable jurist could agree that [trial counsel’s] failure to inquire about mitigating evidence, and failure to raise any argument against the imposition of a life sentence, constituted reasonable performance.” Instead of looking to trial counsel’s acts and/or omissions, the state post-conviction (PCRA) court “shifted the entire burden to [petitioner] and his perceived inability to bring mitigation evidence to [trial counsel] or the trial court’s attention.” Also unreasonable was the PCRA court’s application of the prejudice prong of Strickland. The PCRA court focused on petitioner’s criminal history. And although it cited some aspects of the unrepresented mitigating evidence, it did so in a truncated fashion, simply referencing petitioner’s allegations that “he was suffering from mental illness, that he had a low IQ, that he was addicted to drugs, and that he was physically and sexually abused as a child.” But “mere recitation of potentially relevant evidence is not the same as consideration of its significance, and the balancing that Strickland requires.” Notably, the summary by the PCRA court overlooked important “context” that petitioner had set forth in his petition, “including that: his addiction began at the age of 12; he had contracted HIV as a result of sharing needles; his criminal history was directly linked to his addiction; and he was attempting to control his addiction and regain his life, but had issues accessing counseling treatment, even while incarcerated.” In sum:

A sentence of life without parole is astonishingly harsh for an offender who had only committed property crimes and minor assaults causing no injury, the most recent of which were ineptly executed while suffering from addiction and caused only minimal property loss. The sentence is particularly hard to rationalize when the statute in question explicitly provided an enhanced sentence of 25 years to address chronically recidivist offenders, a stiff deterrent in its own right. Given the nature of the offenses and the wealth of mitigating evidence, I am persuaded that a reasonable and impartial judge would not have imposed life without parole. And the PCRA court’s failure to address how the complete lack of any argument in support of mitigation – and how the type of testimony [petitioner] himself could have given – would have affected the sentence, is an unreasonable application of Strickland.

Chambers v. Lilly*, 735 F.Supp.3d 196 (E.D. N.Y. 2024). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to attempted second-degree murder based on a shooting in a park where a bullet from either petitioner’s gun or that of a co-defendant hit a three-year-old bystander and petitioner received a sentence of 18 years (two years under the agreed to maximum penalty), plea counsel was ineffective in failing to present compelling, readily available mitigation evidence during the plea bargaining and sentencing proceedings. At the time of petitioner’s plea and sentence (2013 and 2014), “the third edition of the Standards for Criminal Justice Prosecution Function and Defense Function issued by the American Bar Association memorialized important norms for criminal defense practitioners.” Also relevant in assessing counsel’s sentencing representation was

Performance Guidelines for Criminal Defense Representation, National Legal Aid & Defender Association (4d ed. 2006). Under these standards, counsel's performance was deficient. The record showed that "[t]he only advocacy trial counsel engaged in before negotiating the plea agreement with the promised twenty-year prison sentence was a single conversation at the bench." Petitioner's uncontested affidavit established that defense counsel urged petitioner in the strongest possible terms to agree to the trial court's offer right after it was extended to him. Additionally, defense counsel told petitioner that he had to "accept or refuse the plea offer immediately" even though the record and the posture of the case belied counsel's claim that the plea would be lost unless accepted then and there. At the time of this advocacy, trial counsel had spoken to petitioner only a handful of times over the nearly-year-long representation, even though his young client was facing potential decades in prison. (Petitioner was only twenty-years-old at the time of the offense.) And counsel's communications with petitioner were limited to brief encounters at court appearances, never once visiting him in jail. As for the acceptance of petitioner's account of what occurred, the record showed that respondent had been provided repeated opportunities to investigate and counter the highly specific allegations in petitioner's post-conviction motion, letters to the court, and supplemental affidavit yet presented no evidence from either trial counsel or the trial prosecutor, who had also been present for all of the plea and sentencing proceedings where the off-the-record advocacy took place, in order to dispute or justify counsel's on-the-record advocacy efforts. Because it is well established that raising a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel broadly waives attorney-client privilege as to relevant communications and counsel's strategic choices, the District Court would not assume that counsel declined to speak with respondent about his representation of petitioner on grounds of attorney-client privilege, something respondent did not affirmatively claim.

In sum, even when giving trial counsel the benefit of all advocacy he may have done to convince the trial court to offer Petitioner a lower sentence during plea negotiations, that advocacy was virtually non-existent. It consisted only of (at most) a single, brief, off-the-record conversation with a judge who had no previous familiarity with the case. And, based on the trial court's later questions to Petitioner at sentencing, it appears clear that counsel did not even provide the trial court with the most basic information about Petitioner before negotiating a decades-long prison sentence. There is also no evidence on record that in that single, brief bench conference counsel invoked any of the available mitigation that the trial court would sua sponte elicit from a direct colloquy with Petitioner himself at sentencing three weeks later – much less any of the even more compelling, equally available evidence that Petitioner and his [post-conviction] counsel would newly present to the trial court five years later.

Defense counsel was equally, if not more, deficient as to the sentencing proceeding. Although the trial court had total discretion to reduce the sentence it had promised to petitioner as part of his docket plea, "in the three weeks that elapsed between the plea and sentencing proceedings, counsel did exactly nothing." And even during the sentencing proceeding, where defense counsel was given the opportunity to make arguments on petitioner's behalf, counsel still did next to nothing. Counsel simply noted that he was asking for a modification of sentence, as he had previously requested at the bench, and then allowed petitioner to make a statement. The questions asked by the trial court based on the few basic facts in mitigation that were documented in the PSI indicated that defense counsel had provided no mitigation information to the court when at the bench. “Having done all of counsel’s work on its own, the trial court then reduced the promised sentence by two years, sentencing Petitioner to eighteen years in prison.” At the later post-conviction hearing, when learning of the readily available mitigation that defense counsel had failed to develop and present, the trial court reduced the sentence by another three years. (This reduction was later reversed by the state appellate court.) At the post-conviction hearing, the trial court was told:

Petitioner’s early life was marked by violence and traumatic loss which led, in substantial part, to his involvement in the criminal conduct at issue. Petitioner lost his father to gun violence as a child. Without a father in his life, he “found [himself] looking for a replacement in the streets” and “bought into the idea that [he] could obtain validation by showing [his] peers that [he], too, could be courageous, feared and violent.” As Petitioner acknowledged, “this thinking led [him] to commit a horrible crime.” He expressed genuine concern that his own son would have to find “examples from others on what it means to be a man” because of how much of his son’s life he would miss behind bars and his fervent hope that his son finds better examples than he did. He also demonstrated insight and took full responsibility for his actions. “I am truly ashamed of my actions; I always have been ashamed and I always will be ... I also understand that I have not only been a part of harming the victim and the community at large, but I have also let down my dear mother who only wanted the best for me. She didn’t fail me. I failed her.”

(Internal citations omitted.) Prejudice is established on this record. “[I]t is clear that counsel’s failure to adhere to basic professional norms in his sentencing investigation and advocacy created, at the very least, a ‘reasonable probability’ that Petitioner was sentenced to a longer term of imprisonment than he would have faced with adequate assistance of counsel.” Because the denial of the claim by the state court was without explanation, possible rationales were explored and rejected as unreasonable under AEDPA analysis.

Hanna v. Brown*, 2024 WL 2208128 (W.D. Mich. May 16, 2024). In case involving convictions for multiple crimes related to acts of domestic abuse by petitioner against his wife, appellate and trial counsel were ineffective for not challenging the scoring on Offense Variable (OV) 3 with respect to petitioner’s sentence for first-degree criminal sexual conduct (CSC-I). (Appellate counsel’s deficient performance in failing to raise trial counsel’s ineffectiveness on direct appeal provided the cause necessary to overcome the procedural default of the trial ineffective assistance claim.) OV 3 scores physical injuries to victims. An offender receives 5 points under OV 3 if “[b]odily injury not requiring medical treatment occurred to a victim.” But this 5 point addition is not applicable “if bodily injury is an element of the sentencing offense.” Petitioner correctly alleged he could not be scored for OV 3 with respect to his CSC-I sentence and both trial and appellate counsel performed deficiently in failing to raise the issue. Respondent argued that no prejudice could be established for two reasons. First, according to respondent, the OV 10 score was erroneously calculated as zero. If the scoring of OV 3 was challenged, additional points could have been assessed under OV 10 at resentencing and petitioner's guidelines would have remained the same. Second, the failure of petitioner's counsel to raise issues with the scoring also prevented the issue of the habitual offender status from being raised. While petitioner was sentenced as a third habitual offender, he was in fact a fourth habitual offender. Had he been sentenced as such, respondent asserted, his penalty would have increased from 1.5 times the statutorily allowed time to 2 times the statutorily allowed time. Respondent's arguments are rejected as speculative. Notably, the two presentence investigation reports (PSIRs) prepared in the case indicated that OV 10 was scored at zero for the CSC-I offense and at no time during petitioner's sentencing hearing did the prosecution object to the failure to score OV 10. Nor did the prosecution raise any arguments concerning petitioner's habitual offender status. Further, respondent did not bring these arguments up in a cross-appeal. Additionally, in the second PSIR that was prepared in conjunction with petitioner's state court motion for relief from judgment, the agent recommended that for the CSC-I conviction, petitioner be resentenced to serve a minimum of 10 years and 6 months and a maximum of 30 years—much less than the sentence he received of 16 years and 8 months (200 months) and a maximum of 60 years. And the agent also indicated that petitioner was subject to resentencing as a third-offense habitual offender. "In short, nothing in the record supports a finding that Petitioner would conclusively be subject to having OV 10 scored and be subject to the fourth-offense habitual offender enhancement upon resentencing." Prejudice is established.

United States v. Archer*, 2024 WL 2221350 (S.D. N.Y. May 15, 2024). In securities fraud case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to an erroneous Sentencing Guidelines range. Although the government conceded that two points should have been subtracted from movant's total offense level given his minor role in the offense, it disputed the assertion that counsel performed deficiently in failing to raise this at sentencing. The court found, however, that defense counsel's failure to object clearly fell below the range of competence required by a defense attorney. The court also rejected the argument by the government that because the court ultimately sentenced movant to a term below the low-end of the Guidelines range, there was no reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, movant's sentence would have been different. In finding prejudice, the court observed that the Guidelines had been the framework for its decision and the anchor for its prior decision.

Azcarate v. Williams*, 2024 WL 1660659 (D. Nev. April 17, 2024), appeals pending, 24-3174 & 3443 (9th Cir.). In first-degree murder case involving the killing of petitioner's girlfriend where petitioner was sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase for failing to present evidence that petitioner suffered from a severe drug addiction problem and had never received treatment. The prosecutor's penalty phase case included evidence of petitioner's prior convictions for drug-related offenses. Defense counsel presented no evidence but called petitioner to allocate. During his allocution, petitioner referenced his struggles with drugs. In closing argument, defense counsel told the jury: (1) petitioner "went down that road ... paved with substance abuse and violence," (2) petitioner "had a serious substance-abuse problem," (3) petitioner's prior criminal history—other than a single domestic violence incident—was all drug related, and (4) petitioner was remorseful for the victim's death. The jury sentenced petitioner to the most severe punishment available to it. Although petitioner's claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under Martinez and subject to de novo review. The record showed that defense counsel was on notice that petitioner had drug addiction issues that could be used in mitigation, e.g., pretrial competency reports documenting petitioner's extensive drug history and its deleterious impact on his mental abilities.

Without the contextual and supporting medical expert evidence regarding how [petitioner] was specifically affected by his drug usage, the bare fact of his drug usage failed to provide effective mitigation. Counsel's unsupported and generic reference to a 'drug problem,' without detailed competent expert evidence, was clearly inadequate. Moreover, it would also have provided independent corroboration of [petitioner's] own allocution regarding the negative and violence-inducing effect drugs had on his behavior and how he changed after he stopped using them. Instead, counsel discussing [petitioner's] drug usage without providing any expert medical opinion(s) of expert(s) who had examined [petitioner] meant the jury made its sentencing decision without crucial mitigating evidence. Consequently, this Court finds that, because [petitioner's] counsel provided incomplete and woefully inadequate information about his drug usage, [petitioner] demonstrates that his counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.

Regarding prejudice, it was noted that the prosecution's assessment of petitioner, as argued to the jury, was that petitioner was a man with a violent and angry disposition who was incapable of being rehabilitated. Had the readily available expert testimony been presented, the jury would have heard that petitioner, when exposed to drugs, suffered from a mental health problem which caused him to behave in a paranoid, delusional and potentially violent manner. Importantly, the expert testimony would have shown the jury that petitioner "had the capacity to benefit from treatment and medication to address his psychosis—that is the capacity to be rehabilitated with proper medical treatment." Additionally, the expert testimony would have "contextualized the aggravation evidence." Rather than the jury assuming that petitioner's mindset was purely violent at the time of the killing, the expert testimony "could have reshaped the jury's perception of [petitioner's] frame of mind at the time of the killing, explaining that [petitioner] was suffering from paranoia, hallucinations, and delusions." There is a substantial likelihood that the jury would have returned one of the two available lesser sentences (life in prison with the possibility of parole after 40 years, or a definite term of 40 to 100 years in prison) had counsel performed effectively.

United States v. Martinez*, 2024 WL 692934 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 20, 2024). In drug case involving a guilty plea, counsel was ineffective post-plea in failing to ensure sufficient time for petitioner to successfully meet the requirement of 18 U.S.C. § 3553(f)(5) and thus preventing petitioner from receiving a sentence lower than 120 months as the sentencing court desired. Counsel's unexplained delay of four months before unsuccessfully seeking a continuance to work out the safety valve issue constituted deficient performance. The failure of subsequently appointed counsel to file a motion after petitioner complied with the provisions of § 3553(f)(5) provided grounds for equitably tolling the statute of limitations for filing the motion to vacate.

Capital Case*

United States v. Simon*, 2024 WL 399803 (C.D. Ill. Feb. 2, 2024). Defense counsel was ineffective for failing to argue that movant’s Illinois cocaine conviction could not be an Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA) predicate serious drug offense. Because Illinois defines cocaine more broadly than federal law, an Illinois cocaine conviction could be based on a substance not included in the federal drug schedules and, accordingly, cannot serve as a predicate serious drug offense under the categorical approach to ACCA. At the time of sentencing, defense counsel was not aware of the potential for a categorical challenge, did not research it, and did not consider making it, and, therefore, performed objectively unreasonably. Unpersuasive is the government’s reliance on defense counsel’s post-conviction testimony that when she learned of the potential challenge from a colleague two years after movant’s sentencing she adopted a wait-and-see position before raising it in her own cases. Essentially, the government was arguing that defense counsel would have made the same decision if she learned of the argument before movant’s sentencing. But because defense counsel was not aware of the argument and did not consider it at the time of sentencing, “[h]er later thoughts about its merits do not transform her lack of consideration in 2018 into a strategic decision not to raise the issue.” Prejudice is established given the reasonable probability that movant would have been sentenced to less time if defense counsel had challenged the ACCA enhancement on the basis discussed above.

Spradley v. United States*, 2024 WL 117572 (N.D. Ala. Jan. 10, 2024). In felon-in-possession of a firearm case where the sentencing judge found that petitioner qualified for an enhanced sentence under the Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA), sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that petitioner’s prior Alabama conviction for felony murder did not constitute a crime of violence for purposes of the ACCA. In the post-conviction proceeding, the government conceded that felony murder under Alabama law is not categorically a violent felony. And looking to Alabama case law, it was determined that felony murder under the relevant Alabama statute was not divisible. Therefore, it could not be used as a predicate offense for ACCA enhancement purposes. Sentencing counsel conceded at the post-conviction proceeding that his failure to argue that the felony murder conviction did not qualify under the ACCA was not based on strategy. At the time of sentencing, it was “clear that the categorical approach and the divisibility analysis were used [to] determine whether state crimes qualified under the ‘elements’ clause of the ACCA.” Given the clarity of the law and the consequences of failing to object to the use of the felony murder conviction, counsel performed deficiently by choosing to plead for imposition of the mandatory minimum of fifteen years’ imprisonment with the ACCA applied instead of seeking application of the statutory maximum of ten years’ imprisonment without the ACCA. Prejudice is established and resentencing is ordered.

2023: Thomas v. United States, 2023 WL 8827216 (D. Del. Dec. 21, 2023). Granting motion to vacate sentence based on defense counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to object to consideration of a prior state conviction in the sentencing calculus where the conviction had been automatically expunged under a state decriminalization statute the year before. Prejudice is established given that exclusion of that prior conviction would have reduced movant’s guidelines range from 188-235 months to 168-210 months. Even though the 188-month sentence imposed by the court was still within the correct lowered range, “Movant suffered prejudice as a result of defense counsel’s deficient performance because the Court relied upon the erroneous guidelines range when it intentionally sentenced Movant to the lowest end (188 months) of that range.”

Matthews v. Carl*, 2023 WL 8519807 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 8, 2023), appeal dismissed, 2024 WL 1553786 (6th Cir. Feb. 9, 2024). In robbery case including weapons-related charges, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the prosecution’s late amendment of the fourth-offense habitual offender notice. Because the state court did not address the amendment of the habitual offender notice and trial counsel’s failure to object to that portion of the amendment, there was no state court decision for purposes of deference, and de novo review of the claim was conducted. There was no question that the prosecution filed the amendment after the time for properly doing so had expired. Additionally without question was that the amendment subjected petitioner to increased sentencing consequences. Although petitioner was on notice prior to the amendment that he faced the possibility of a life sentence, the amendment increased the minimum sentence he was exposed to. Because no fathomable reason for the failure to object to the late amendment could be discerned, deficient performance is established. And the increased minimum sentence prejudiced petitioner.

Bryant v. United States*, 2023 WL 4306041 (S.D. Ohio June 30, 2023). In healthcare fraud case involving two defendants, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to raise several important issues with the Government’s loss amount calculation at sentencing. Specifically, counsel performed deficiently in failing to present evidence that the loss amount the Government was relying on was the amount billed to Medicaid rather than the amount the defendants expected to receive. Additionally, counsel failed to present evidence distinguishing potentially legitimate prescriptions—which account for over 40% of the loss amount attributed to compound creams—from fraudulent prescriptions. Defense counsel did challenge the loss amount related to the compound creams through an expert witness who disputed the Government’s methodology. Such “meager resistance” could not be construed as effective assistance as there is “a difference . . . between attempting to poke holes in the Government’s statistical techniques and providing affirmative evidence that a substantial portion of the calculated loss amount was unproven. The former is easy to reject.” The defense approach simply suggested that the Government’s calculation was wrong without providing an alternative and failed to satisfy a defendant’s burden to prove the specific value by which the loss amount should be reduced. The cumulative effect of these failures was prejudicial to the defendants even though the sentence imposed had been below the guideline range.

United States v. Rainey*, 2023 WL 2757211 (N.D. Ill. April 3, 2023). In drug/firearm case involving a guilty plea, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the erroneous application of a sentencing enhancement on one of the counts. Although the trial court also did not catch the error, “judges do not always catch an advocate’s mistakes — in this case, the error on the part of the government in advocating for the enhancement. That’s a good part of the reason why defense counsel is there in the first place.” Clearly, as conceded by defense counsel, the failure to object was not strategic. Prejudice is established on the record of this case. “[A]n erroneous sentencing guideline range determination can establish prejudice, even when the difference between the ranges is not all that great.” There is a likelihood that the trial court would have applied the correct offense level calculation had the error been pointed out at the time of sentencing.

Guerra v. United States*, 2023 WL 6786783 (C.D. Cal. March 20, 2023). In drug case, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that movant was eligible for safety valve relief. Although the Ninth Circuit’s decision finding as a matter of first impression that the relevant statute provided for safety valve relief in a case like movant’s was issued months after movant’s sentencing, a competent attorney would have argued for the statutory interpretation later adopted by the Ninth Circuit as others were doing at the time. “Criminal defense attorneys have an obligation to make credible arguments that could lower their client’s sentence, and provide ineffective assistance of counsel when they fail to advance a potentially meritorious sentencing argument not for strategic reasons, but due to ignorance of the law.” Here, movant “provided a useful timeline of some of the relevant cases in this Circuit before and after [his] sentencing, which illustrates why an effective attorney would have raised the correct argument at the time of [movant’s] sentencing.” This is “one of the rare cases in which a lawyer provides ineffective assistance for failing to raise a claim whose merit is ‘clearly foreshadowed’ at the time.” Prejudice is also established. The district court would have ruled as the Ninth Circuit ultimately did in interpreting the statute and would have imposed a lower sentence than received at the original sentencing.

United States v. Singleton*, 2023 WL 1442837 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 1, 2023). In child sex trafficking case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate whether movant’s prior sentences on two charges should have been treated as a single sentence for purposes of calculating his criminal history score. Defense counsel conceded that he relied on erroneous statements in the PSR and a criminal history printout. “Given that U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(a)(2) clearly would have applied but for an intervening arrest, and the ambiguities in the PSR as to whether such an arrest occurred,” it was objectively unreasonable for defense counsel not to verify whether an intervening arrest had in fact occurred. Had movant’s criminal history been properly calculated, the sentencing range would have been 188-235 months rather than a range of 210-262 months. The Court had sentenced movant to the low end of the Guidelines range, 210 months, in consideration of movant’s childhood poverty and abuse and mental health condition. There is a reasonable probability it would have imposed an even lower sentence had the correct Guidelines range been shown to be applicable.

United States v. Peralta Sanchez*, 2023 WL 160233 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 11, 2023). Relief granted in drug case for ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel’s failure to request a reduction in movant’s offense level where the applicability of the statutory reduction was apparent. “The Court observes that Government counsel, Probation, and the undersigned also failed to catch the sentencing error and thus share in the responsibility for multiplying these proceedings. It is to defense counsel’s credit that he readily conceded deficient performance upon learning of the sentencing error.” Prejudice is established as there is a reasonable probability “that if the Court had considered a Guidelines range of 51-63 months rather than 70-87 months, as would have been the case but for defense counsel’s error, the Court would have imposed a shorter term of imprisonment.”

2022: Stockett v. United States, 638 F.Supp.3d 801 (N.D. Ohio 2022). Motion to vacate sentence granted on claim that defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to request that the federal sentence in this case run concurrently with a recently imposed state court sentence. There is a reasonable probability that the request would have been granted.

Nelson v. Payne, 2022 WL 2704639 (E.D. Ark. July 12, 2022), adopting report and recommendation, 2022 WL 2709197 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 25, 2022). In case involving convictions for second-degree murder and first-degree battery, granting habeas relief as to sentence enhancements as trial counsel was ineffective for failing to move for a directed verdict on the enhancements based on insufficient evidence. The enhancement at issue involved commission of a crime in the presence of a child. The trial testimony established that petitioner arrived at the scene of the crime after the children were asleep and they remained asleep when the offenses were committed. Additionally, there was no circumstantial evidence, such as toys, that would allow an inference that children were in the residence. “Thus, the State failed to sustain its burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that [petitioner’s] crimes qualified for the child enhancement.” Trial counsel was obligated to move for a directed verdict, which had a reasonable probability of being granted, and if it had not been, then the decision would have likely been reversed on appeal. Additionally, post-conviction relief counsel’s failure to raise the claim in the Rule 37 petition constituted ineffective assistance of counsel because the claim clearly had merit and it would have been procedurally defaulted if not for the exception created by Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1, 17 (2012), which “will not bar a federal habeas court from hearing the defaulted ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, as long as the defaulted claim is substantial.”

2020: McNeill v. United States, 2020 WL 6106562 (E.D. N.C. Oct. 15, 2020). In drug/firearm case where petitioner received an enhanced sentence under 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(1) of the Armed Career Criminal Act (“ACCA”), his section 2255 motion to vacate sentence is granted where sentencing counsel failed to object to application of the ACCA based on recent Fourth Circuit precedent which established that petitioner’s prior state convictions were not predicate offenses under the ACCA. Prejudice is proven given that without the ACC designation, petitioner would have faced a statutory maximum of ten years on Count Three, rather than a statutory minimum of fifteen years.

United States v. Pavlichko, 2020 WL 5224226 (M.D Pa. Sept. 1, 2020). Sentencing relief granted on claim that sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the use of petitioner’s prior Pennsylvania simple assault conviction as a predicate crime of violence for purposes of the Sentencing Guidelines. Although the sentence petitioner received still falls within the new guidelines range, “this Court cannot definitively find that his sentence would have been the same” but for counsel’s failure to object. Thus, petitioner suffered prejudice due to his sentencing counsel’s deficient performance.

United States v. Norman, 2020 WL 4043648 (D. S.C. July 17, 2020). In drug/firearm case, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object at sentencing to the six-level enhancement on the ground that petitioner’s prior conviction for a § 846 conspiracy did not qualify as a controlled substance offense. Although the issue was not clearly decided at the time petitioner was sentenced, counsel had a viable basis for objecting in light of existing precedent that supported the argument that the prior conviction did not meet the requirements for the enhancement and the lack of a specific holding by the Fourth Circuit on the issue.

Howell v. United States*, 2020 WL 3962234 (M.D. Fla. July 13, 2020). In case involving identity theft related charges where petitioner pleaded guilty, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge an enhancement that the government now conceded was inapplicable. On the facts of this case, a resentencing hearing was not required and a new, lesser sentence, was imposed.

United States v. Jones*, 453 F.Supp.3d 858 (W.D. Va. 2020). In drug case, granting Rule 60(b)(6) motion in order to address and grant relief on ineffective assistance of counsel claim concerning an overstatement in the PSR about the amount of crack cocaine sold by petitioner to an individual. (The claim had been raised in petitioner's § 2255 motion but overlooked by the district court when it ruled on the motion.) Trial counsel's failure to object to the overstatement was constitutionally ineffective and prejudiced petitioner by inflating the Base Offense Level used for sentencing.

2019: Lopez v. Filson, 2019 WL 4279029 (Sept. 10, 2019), aff'd, 845 Fed.Appx. 549 (9th Cir. 2021). In murder and attempted murder case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to call a psychologist expert at the sentencing phase who had evaluated petitioner at the request of prior counsel. Petitioner was convicted of shooting two men outside a bar after an argument with the men. One of the men died. During the penalty phase, the State presented evidence of petitioner's criminal history. This included a conviction for malicious destruction of property in connection with an uprising at a youth detention facility. Evidence was also presented that petitioner had previously been arrested for numerous charges related to a single incident, including kidnapping, sexual assault of a victim under 16, and assault with a deadly weapon. He ultimately was adjudicated of only harassment and disorderly conduct, sentenced to probation, and the remaining charges were dismissed. The defense presented a single witness, petitioner's uncle, who explained that petitioner had a hard home life because his mother used a lot of drugs, the men in her life would beat petitioner, and there were lots of fights, yelling, and screaming in petitioner's homes. The sentencing options were: (1) life without the possibility of parole ("LWOPP"); (2) life with the possibility of parole after 40 years; and (3) a definite term of 100 years with the possibility of parole after 40 years. The jury returned a verdict sentencing petitioner to LWOPP. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner alleged that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to present evidence from the psychologist who had examined him. The psychologist had described petitioner's life as "replete with mitigation," and identified five mitigating factors from petitioner's upbringing: (1) parental substance abuse; (2) parental criminal behavior; (3) abuse/neglect; (4) poor parental management; and (5) community disorganization. The psychologist ultimately concluded that petitioner was "the product of an abusive, neglectful substance abuse environment" and as such had "turned into an angry young man." Nevertheless, the psychologist opined that petitioner's risk for violence would significantly diminish after 40 years in prison. The state post-conviction court found that trial counsel made a reasonable strategic decision not to call the psychologist or utilize his report at sentencing because his report "was replete with instances of unfavorable admissions by [petitioner] to [the psychologist] of prior violent crimes committed by him that showed his propensity toward violence." In the view of the state court, the prejudicial information about petitioner's history far outweighed the expert's ultimate conclusion that petitioner would be a low risk for violence after 40 years, which the state court opined was simply common sense.

The Court finds both the state courts' conclusion and counsel's presumed strategic decision to be objectively unreasonable. While the report did contain a slew of admissions to violent, dangerous conduct, much of this came through during the penalty phase in the presentation of Petitioner's various arrests and adjudications. While the report was certainly more extensive, it is also reasonably likely that the jury had already decided Petitioner was a violent, unpredictable individual because it found him guilty of first degree, premeditated murder of a complete stranger. There was little to be lost, then, from the presentation of [the psychologist's] report and/or testimony. By the same token, there was much to be gained. First, the mitigation evidence in [the psychologist's] report was far more detailed than that provided by Petitioner's uncle. Second, [the psychologist] offered an expert opinion that Petitioner was likely to be a low risk of violence after 40 years. Where the only choice the jury had, in effect, was whether to give Petitioner the possibility of parole after 40 years, [footnote omitted] it was not a reasonable strategic decision for counsel to forgo [the psychologist's] expert opinion. The Court further concludes the state courts were objectively unreasonable in finding that counsel's performance was not deficient. The testimony of a trained professional about a reduction in violence risk over time is significantly more persuasive than a "common sense"—i.e., unsupported—notion that violence decreases with age. It was objectively unreasonable for the state courts to equate [the psychologist's] expert opinion to "common sense."

The state courts further determined that petitioner had failed to establish prejudice from counsel's omission of the expert testimony/report. The district court responded:

For much the same reasons, the state courts were objectively unreasonable in finding no prejudice from this failure. As noted, the Court is not persuaded that the damaging information in [the psychologist's] report would have had as significant an impact as the state courts found, especially because the mitigation evidence itself was also more extensive. And critically, if the jury had been given [the psychologist's] opinion regarding Petitioner's likely risk of violence, there is certainly a reasonable likelihood that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different, i.e., that the jury would have opted to give Petitioner the chance at parole. It is, furthermore and importantly, objectively unreasonable to conclude otherwise. Therefore, despite the AEDPA deference due this claim, the Court finds the state courts' resolution thereof was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.

Habeas relief is granted.

Martinez-Ayala v. Taylor*, 2019 WL 3247187 (D. Ore. Jun 19, 2019). In case involving a guilty plea to multiple counts of drug offenses and child neglect with a resulting sentence of 269 months, district court adopts the findings and recommendations by the magistrate judge recommending granting relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing. The state post-conviction court's decision was contrary to Strickland in that it focused on the motivations of the actual sentencer. "The Strickland analysis, however, is an objective one and 'should not depend on the idiosyncrasies of the particular decisionmaker.'" Looking at the claim de novo, petitioner established an entitlement to relief. The failure of trial counsel to present any testimony, affidavits, letters of support, documentary evidence, or even a sentencing memorandum fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.

Trial counsel knew that Petitioner, then 49 years old, was facing a lengthy sentence—potentially up to 25 years— and that Petitioner had a compelling personal history of law-abiding work, family support, and great personal loss. Yet, trial counsel undertook no steps, other than obtaining funding to prepare a three-page sentencing report that largely repeated Petitioner's own statements, to pursue, investigate, or present mitigation evidence in the sentencing hearing. Despite affidavits from Petitioner's family members that they were available and willing to testify, trial counsel failed to contact them.

At sentencing, the only evidence that was presented to counter the State's contention that petitioner was a long-time drug dealer was petitioner's own statements. "Had Petitioner's counsel presented evidence in the form of testimony, documents, letters of support, or a sentencing memorandum, there is a reasonable probability that a sentencing judge might have sentenced Petitioner, a first-time, non-violent offender, to a sentence lower than the 269-month sentence that he is currently serving."

United States v. Young*, 2019 WL 1928484 (D. Ore. April 30, 2019). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to Felon in Possession of a Firearm pursuant to a plea agreement, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to argue against the application of the mandatory minimum sentence under the Armed Career Criminal Act ("ACCA") on the ground that three of petitioner's state court predicate convictions did not qualify as "serious drug offenses" under the ACCA, and, without them, the ACCA criteria was not met. Defense counsel conceded that at the time of the plea he was aware of existing Ninth Circuit precedent that was relevant to the issue, although it construed Oregon law in the context of an immigration case. While defense counsel initially believed that the ACCA's definition of a "serious drug offense" was broader than the immigration statute at issue in the Ninth Circuit case, counsel became less certain of that conclusion as the time for sentencing neared. Before sentencing, defense counsel even encouraged petitioner to explore the possibility of challenging his ACCA eligibility with post-conviction counsel. Defense counsel was unaware at the time of sentencing of a then-three-day-old Oregon Federal District Court decision that applied the Ninth Circuit immigration precedent to the ACCA. Defense counsel admitted that he should have known about that decision and, if he had, he would have advised petitioner to withdraw his guilty plea. Giving particular consideration to defense counsel's declaration, deficient performance and prejudice are found.

Crowe v. United States*, 2019 WL 1619969 (E.D. Mich. April 16, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of conspiracy, bank robbery, pharmacy robbery, using or carrying a firearm during a crime of violence, and felon in possession of a firearm, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to object to/raise on appeal the sentencing of petitioner under a statutory mandatory minimum based on conduct not found by the jury. At the time of petitioner's convictions, a two-year increase in the mandatory minimum for brandishing a firearm was considered a sentencing enhancement, not a separate element, and could be found and applied by a preponderance of evidence by a sentencing court. Thus, the jury was never asked to make a finding on whether petitioner had brandished a firearm. Alleyne v. United States came out shortly before sentencing but trial counsel failed to raise the failure of the jury to make a finding on brandishing and petitioner was given the enhanced mandatory minimum by the sentencing court. "An attorney acts unreasonably when he fails to raise a Supreme Court decision that directly reduces a client's sentence." Although the sentencing court would have remained free to sentence petitioner to the same amount of time without the mandatory minimum, because petitioner was sentenced to the mandatory minimum on several other counts, it was more likely than not that he was prejudiced by the additional two-year mandatory minimum from the brandishing finding. (See subsection VII.B. regarding the finding of ineffective assistance by appellate counsel.)

United States v. London*, 2019 WL 1216736 (M.D. La. March 14, 2019). In case involving multiple drug-related charges, trial counsel was ineffective at sentencing in failing to object to the application of a two-level weapon enhancement where petitioner had already been convicted of the possession of a dangerous weapon as a substantive violation of a different statute. Petitioner established prejudice because the erroneous application of the enhancement placed petitioner in a higher guidelines range.

2018: Roy v. United States, 347 F.Supp.3d 230 (S.D. N.Y. 2018). In case where petitioner's guilty plea to conspiracy to commit theft of government funds and theft of government funds subjected him, as a non-citizen, to mandatory removal, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the court of the immigration consequences attached to its proposed sentence of six months' imprisonment and six months' home confinement as part of a term of supervised release and by failing to ask the court to remove one day from the petitioner's term of home confinement. Although counsel believed the offenses were theft offenses rather than fraud offenses, and it is not clear whether theft offenses are aggravated felonies only if they result in a sentence of a year or more, it was sufficiently clear that counsel should have brought this to the sentencing court's attention. "Effective counsel would have accounted for the possibility that the petitioner's offenses might be theft offenses, advised the Court that the petitioner could be mandatorily deportable if given a one-year sentence, and asked the Court for a one-day reduction in the petitioner's home confinement. Although petitioner might still be deportable under a reduced sentence, he would not be mandatorily deported, and he would have the opportunity to seek forms of discretionary relief from removal." That is sufficient prejudice to require relief.

Clay v. United States*, 311 F. Supp. 3d 911 (N.D. Ill. 2018). In federal drug case with a guilty plea and ultimate sentence of 168 months, sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the inclusion of petitioner's 2003 conviction under the state Aggravated Unlawful Use of a Weapon (AUUW) statute in his criminal history points, because the AUUW statute had been declared unconstitutional by Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2012) and People v. Aguilar, 2 N.E. 3d 321, 328 (2013). Pursuant to U.S. v. Jenkins, 772 F.3d 1092 (7th Cir. 2014), the court should not have included that conviction in the calculation of petitioner's criminal history points and level. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise this issue on appeal.

The court acknowledged that no one – not sentencing counsel, not the Government, not the probation department, and not the district court – had caught this issue, but determined that such a legal error cannot be excused in sentencing counsel. It did not matter that petitioner had not been successful in convincing the Illinois state court to vacate his AUUW conviction, because the district court did not know the basis for the state court's refusal to do so, and Jenkins does not require the underlying conviction to be vacated in order for the conviction to be excluded from the calculation of the criminal history points. Appellate counsel's performance was deficient for failing to raise this issue because it "would have been the strongest – and the only – argument made by appellate counsel, who filed an Anders brief representing to the Seventh Circuit that Petitioner's appeal was frivolous." 311 F. Supp. 3d at 922. Petitioner was prejudiced by counsel's errors because there is a reasonable probability that petitioner received additional prison time as a result. There is no reason to think that the court (and the Government, who recommended a reduced sentence) would not have taken the same approach to petitioner's sentence had the Guidelines been calculated properly from the start. The court therefore reduced petitioner's sentence to 151 months.

United States v. Arce-Flores*, 2018 WL 401524 (W.D. Wash. Jan. 12, 2018). Following remand from the Ninth Circuit, trial counsel was found to be ineffective at sentencing for failing to inform the district court of the potential immigration consequences of the proposed sentence. The district court had previously found that trial counsel was ineffective during the plea-bargaining stage, because counsel had failed to advise petitioner that a sentence of 180 days or greater precluded her from demonstrating good moral character and avoiding deportation. Here, the district court determined that counsel was also ineffective during the sentencing phase, because counsel failed to inform the sentencing judge that a sentence one day shorter – 179 days – would allow petitioner to demonstrate good moral character and potentially avoid deportation. Counsel's failure to do so was prejudicial because the court sentenced her to 180 days; had counsel informed the sentencing court of the important consequences of a 180-day versus 179-day sentence, there is a reasonable probability that the court would have imposed the shorter sentence. The district court determined that its authority to supply a remedy included the authority to reduce the sentence itself rather than returning the parties to the plea-bargaining stage. It therefore vacated the six-month sentence and imposed a sentence of 179 days.

2017: Porter v. Muniz, 2017 WL 3021022 (N.D. Ca. July 17, 2017), appeals dismissed, 2019 WL 3296803 (9th Cir. April 17, 2019). Trial counsel at defendant's non-capital resentencing hearing was ineffective for advising defendant to accept a sentencing agreement after an inadequate investigation. In May of 2004, defendant was 18-years-old and attending college in San Diego. He visited Monterey County to attend the funeral of a friend and a series of gatherings in his friend's honor. The evidence shows he got progressively more intoxicated as the day wore on. Defendant became ill and started walking to his grandmother's house where he was staying. Travis Williams, whom defendant did not know previously, approached defendant and offered him a ride. Williams then drove past the house of DeShawn Lee, who was a suspect in the shooting death of defendant's friend, where a group of people was smoking on the porch. Williams told defendant to "get out and start talking shit." Defendant sat in the frame of the passenger's side window and did so. Shots were fired from the car into Lee's house. No one was injured. At trial, the jury heard conflicting evidence about whether the shots came from the driver's side or the passenger's side of the car. Gunshot residue samples were taken from both defendant and Williams and both results were negative, but their clothing was not tested. Defendant was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to twenty-five years. On appeal, the state court partially reversed and returned the matter for a resentencing proceeding on sentencing enhancements related to whether the crime was connected to gang activity and whether defendant personally discharged a firearm. Public defender, James Eager was appointed to represent defendant on retrial for the sentencing enhancements. He requested GSR testing on defendant's and Williams's clothing but did not know the results when the prosecution offered a resentencing agreement that would subject defendant to nine additional years imprisonment and require him to waive his right to appeal. Eager advised defendant to accept the resentencing agreement, and defendant did so. Prior to the resentencing proceeding, however, Eager learned that the results of the GSR testing showed that no GSR was present on defendant's clothing but GSR was present on Williams's clothing. Defendant sought to withdraw his consent to the sentencing agreement, but the trial court denied this request and imposed the terms of the agreement. Counsel's performance was deficient because he failed to conduct a reasonable investigation prior to advising defendant to accept the plea agreement and prejudice was established because defendant declared under penalty of perjury that had he known of the GSR on Williams's clothing, he would not have agreed to be resentenced and would instead have gone to trial. Counsel's decision to recommend acceptance of the sentencing agreement was not reasonable merely because defendant could have faced up to eighty-five years had he gone to trial. Simply stating the fact that nine years is less than eighty-five, without more, does not make counsel's choice a reasonable strategic decision. "If this were the case, defense attorneys would have no reason to ever conduct investigations in criminal cases. They could simply sit back and wait to receive plea offers from the government, which by their very nature promise defendants less time in prison than those same defendants would receive if convicted at trial." Porter, 2017 WL 3021022 at *6.

United States v. Blount*, 2017 WL 1194230 (W.D. La. March 28, 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the court's incorrect sentencing guideline calculation. Defendant was convicted of wire fraud for defrauding more than fifty people as part of a Ponzi scheme he orchestrated. It was undisputed that the parties and the court incorrectly calculated defendant's sentencing guideline range as 188 to 235 months, whereas the correct calculation was a range of 151 to 188 months. At sentencing, the court imposed a sentence of 235 months and noted that it was the maximum sentence under the guidelines. Trial counsel did not object or attempt to appeal the improper sentence. The government agreed trial counsel's performance was deficient, but argued defendant was not prejudiced because the trial court was permitted to go outside the sentencing guidelines to impose a greater sentence. The court rejected this argument because the record was silent as to what the sentencing court might have done had it considered the correct guidelines range and did not show that defendant would have received the same sentence regardless of the error. Thus, defendant was prejudiced.

2015: Petrillo v. United States, 147 F.Supp.3d 9 (D. Conn. 2015). Counsel ineffective in sentencing of bank robbery plea case for failing to object to sentencing as a career offender, even though the plea agreement explicitly left this question open for argument. The government argued the defendant was a career offender because his two prior convictions qualified as “crimes of violence” under the statute. One of those convictions was a 1996 Connecticut conviction for attempted assault on a police officer. Under that statute, the Second Circuit had held that the actual causing of physical injury to an officer qualified as a crime of violence but no determination had been made concerning other crimes under the statute, which included throwing paint or dye or similar substances on an officer. Because it was unclear which subsection the defendant had been convicted of, counsel’s failure to challenge the career offender designation was deficient conduct. Prejudice established because the career offender designation raised the sentencing range from 151-188 months to 188-235 months.

Bowers v. McFadden*, 153 F. Supp. 3d 875 (D.S.C. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in failing to challenge imposition of mandatory life sentence under “two strikes” statute. The defendant was convicted of common law assault with intent to ravish in 1976. In 2004, he was convicted of armed robbery. In sentencing, the state asserted that the “two strikes” statute was applicable. Under the statute, only a “most serious offense” qualifies as a strike. Qualifying offenses, not including common law assault with intent to ravish, are listed in the statute, but some other criminal sexual conduct offenses (CSC) are. The CSC rubric was established by statute in 1977 and includes varying degrees of offense. First and second degree CSC offenses do qualify as a “most serious offense” under the two strikes law. Other CSC offenses do not. Trial counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to conduct any research which would have revealed that common law assault with intent to ravish included only two elements: (1) an assault by a male on a female, (2) with the intent to rape. No aggravated circumstance, such as force or coercion, was required. State v. Lindsay, 583 S.E.2d 740 (2003), which was decided just a year before trial, was all the research counsel would have needed. Nonetheless, in sentencing trial counsel conceded that assault with intent to ravish was “the same basically” as CSC 1st or 2nd and the mandatory life sentence was imposed. Prejudice was clear. Post-conviction counsel failed to raise the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness until the appeal to the Court of Appeals from the denial of post-conviction. The state court recognized that assault with intent to ravish may not be a “most serious offense” for purposes of the “two strikes” statute but declined to reach the merits because of the procedural default. After reviewing the elements of the offenses, the federal court also rejected the state’s argument that the underlying facts of the assault with intent to ravish qualified as a “most serious offense.” The indictment did not contain sufficient information to reach this conclusion and the court held that it would be improper to rely on an affidavit from an arresting officer. South Carolina courts had never relied on this type of information and federal courts would not do so in the analogous circumstance of the Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA) where only “conclusive judicial record[s]” could be considered. Finally, under Martinez v. Ryan, 132 S. Ct. 1309 (2012), the federal court held that it could reach the merits of the trial ineffectiveness claim, despite the state court procedural default, because the claim “is a substantial one that state PCR counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the issue and such failure was obviously prejudicial.”

United States v. Jones*, 114 F. Supp. 3d 310 (D.S.C. 2015). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following guilty plea to felon in possession of a firearm under the Armed Career Criminal Act

Capital Case*

(“ACCA”) for failing to object that five of the defendant’s prior convictions did not qualify as predicate offenses under ACCA. A Pre-Sentence Report (“PSR”) found that four prior convictions of South Carolina burglary third degree, as well as convictions for assault on a correctional officer and taking of hostage by inmate, all qualified as “violent felonies” under ACCA. Thus, the PSR concluded that Jones faced a minimum term of 15 years to life under ACCA, which is applicable if the accused has three or more prior felonies “violent” felonies. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the use of the third degree burglary convictions as “violent” felonies because the Supreme Court’s holding in Shepard v. United States, 544 U.S. 13 (2005), and subsequent Fourth Circuit cases made clear prior to sentencing that these convictions did not qualify as predicate offenses under ACCA. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to use of assault on a correctional officer as a predicate offense because the Supreme Court’s holding in Johnson v. United States, 559 U.S. 133 (2010), and subsequent Fourth Circuit cases made clear prior to sentencing that this offense, which “requires no contact between the victim and the perpetrator,” did not qualify as a violent offense under the “force clause” of ACCA. Prejudice established as the maximum sentence was only 10 year’s imprisonment rather than the minimum 15 years to life under ACCA.

2014: Mann v. United States, 66 F. Supp. 3d 728 (E.D. Va. 2014). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for conspiracy to distribute oxycodone case for failing to object to the calculation of the drug quantity attributable to the defendant. The drug quantity was calculated, based solely on patient prescription records, at an offense level of 34 with a sentencing range of 151 to 188 months. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to move for a reduction based on the quantity of pills consumed for personal use pursuant to valid prescriptions. Prejudice established, as the offense level likely would have been reduced to 32 or a sentencing range of 121 to 151 months.

2013: Rogers v. United States, 949 F. Supp. 2d 879 (N. D. Iowa 2013). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for bank fraud via a check cashing scheme for withdrawing his objection to a two-level sentencing enhancement for use of an “access device” and failing to present mental health evidence in mitigation. Counsel initially objected to both a two-level enhancement and a three-level enhancement, but then argued that a two-level enhancement was proper. At the time of sentencing, the Eighth Circuit had not addressed whether or not this enhancement would apply to a bank fraud scheme that originated solely from the use of fraudulent paper checks, as the scheme in this case did, but the Fifth Circuit and Tenth Circuit had ruled that the term “access device” would not apply to a fraudulent check cashing scheme. Trial counsel asserted that he withdrew the objection because he was aware that three co-defendants had made the objection unsuccessfully and that he made a strategic decision to focus his arguments on more important issues. None of the co-defendants had made this argument in the District Court. One of the co-defendants raised this specific issue, for the first time, on appeal and the prosecution conceded error. The alleged strategy, made without knowledge of the favorable rulings in the other circuits, was not “a decision based on diligent preparation and investigation.” Prejudice found. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to present evidence that the defendant had been diagnosed with intermittent explosive disorder in 2007, which causes him to engage in violent outbursts that are “disproportionate to the situation at hand.” Prejudice was clear as the District Court varied upward from the guidelines sentence, by a significant amount, based solely on the defendant’s history of violent behavior. Counsel alleged strategy not to present this evidence without even obtaining and reviewing the prior mental health records. Thus, “trial counsel did not have a sufficient record upon which to make this allegedly strategic decision.”

Carnesi v. United States*, 933 F. Supp. 2d 388 (E.D.N.Y. 2013). Counsel ineffective in conspiracy to commit money laundering case for failing to challenge the restitution order due to procedural defects under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA). The defendant was a former attorney and president of business consulting firms. His sentence included restitution to the victims of his fraudulent schemes in the amount of $5,422,000. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to the court’s failure to identify the victims and the actual amount of loss, which was required under the MVRA.

2012: Krecht v. United States, 846 F. Supp. 2d 1268 (S.D. Fla. 2012). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for failing to pursue safety valve relief. The defendant, a pharmacist with no prior criminal record, was sentenced to 210 months, which was at the bottom of guidelines range, for drug conspiracy that involved filling fake prescriptions. The defendant pled guilty pursuant to a plea agreement in which he agreed not to seek a downward departure from the guidelines range. In the PSI, the government calculated a total offense level of 37, which gave a guidelines range (considering the maximum statutory penalty) of 210-240 months. Trial counsel filed objections asserting that the defendant was entitled to a safety valve reduction, which would have reduced the total offense level by two points. The reduction was based on the defendant’s first time offender status and cooperation with the government. Counsel withdrew the objection at sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because application of the safety valve reduction is mandatory for narcotics crimes and “is an offense characteristic and not a downward departure.” Prejudice found and court ordered resentencing at a total offense level of 35.

2010: Carter v. United States, 731 F.Supp.2d 262 (D. Conn. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in robbery and other offense case sentencing for failing to challenge enhancements under career offender sentencing guidelines and the Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA). The defendant had five prior convictions in state court: (1) 1985 robbery; (2) 1988 risk of injury to minor; (3) 1992 sale of narcotics; (4) 1992 possession of narcotics; and (5) 1994 sale of narcotics. To apply the career offender sentencing guidelines, the government had to prove two prior felony convictions involving either a “crime of violence” or a “controlled substance offense.” The 1985 robbery did not qualify as a “crime of violence” because the government did not count it in the PSR in the criminal history. The 1988 conviction did not qualify as the state statute included conduct outside the guideline range. Specifically, the defendant could be convicted in state court for “psychological harm” only, when the guideline required physical force or harm. The government had not attempted to prove that the defendant’s specific facts met the standard. Of the defendant’s three drug offenses, only one qualified as a “controlled substance offense” under the guideline because again the state statute was broader and included “any form of delivery which includes barter, exchange or gift” rather than just “selling” and the like. The government had included sufficient information in the PSR to establish that the 1994 conviction qualified, but had not attempted to prove the facts of the other two. To apply ACCA, the government was required to prove three felony convictions that were either a “violent felony” or a “serious drug offense.” While the 1985 robbery qualified and the 1994 sale of narcotics qualified, the other three did not for basically the same reasons that they did not qualify under the career offender sentencing guidelines.

Parks v. United States*, 687 F. Supp. 2d 564 (W.D.N.C. 2010). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following guilty plea in drug case for failing to understand the importance of the fact that the indictment did not set forth a specific drug amount. Counsel objected to a drug quantity in sentencing but withdrew the objection without explanation. This conduct was deficient as “no matter what evidence the Government might have presented at the sentencing hearing, the fact would remain that such evidence had not been found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt.” There could be no reasonable strategy for withdrawing the objection because, in doing so, “counsel automatically increased Petitioner’s sentence 120 months beyond that to which he was otherwise exposed.” In short, the defendant was prejudiced because the court sentenced him to 360 months when the maximum statutory sentence based on the indictment was 20 years. Sentence vacated.

2009: Robinson v. United States, 638 F. Supp. 2d 764 (E.D. Mich. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy case for failing to file motion for new trial, even though the defendant filed a post-trial motion for judgment of acquittal, and for failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence of the drug quantity attributable to the defendant. The defendant, who was from Indiana, was charged with his brother and others of growing a large crop of marijuana in between rows of corn on a rural farm. The government’s only evidence connecting the defendant to the farm was in January of February, which, of course, was not in the growing season. The only other evidence connected the defendant to the operation was the testimony of the defendant’s ex-sister-in-law, whose testimony was not credible in the court’s view. Another woman had also testified that the sister-in-law bragged that she lied at trial to get even with the brothers. Despite a month long trial, the jury deliberated less than four hours before convicting all six defendants. During the trial, the defendant had moved a judgment of acquittal under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 29, which the Court took under advisement. After trial, counsel filed a brief in support of this motion but did not file a motion for new trial under Rule 33. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because, under Rule 29, the court must consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the government. Under Rule 33, the court can consider the credibility of witnesses. Counsel’s conduct was not strategy because he was unaware of Rule 33 or its standards. “A decision based on a misunderstanding of the law is not a strategic decision.” Here, “counsel’s failure to file the motion was not a strategic choice; it was based on ignorance of the law.” Prejudice found because “the present case represents one [of] those extraordinary matters in which a motion for a new trial would have been appropriately considered and granted.” Likewise, counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence of the drug quantity attributable to the defendant. “Again, it does not appear that it could have been a strategic decision to challenge guilt but not the amount for which the [defendant] was to be held accountable.” Prejudice established because “the statutory mandatory minimum sentence in this case was tied directly to the amount of drugs charged.” A successful challenged could have reduced the sentence exposure by half.

Baxter v. United States*, 634 F. Supp. 2d 897 (N.D. Ill. 2009). Counsel ineffective in sentencing of criminal tax case for failing to retain and consult with tax expert and stipulating to the tax loss compilation included in the presentence investigation report by the U.S. Probation Office. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to independently examine the loss and simply accepted the government's position. While "[d]efense counsel in criminal tax cases need not always retain a tax expert to assist, . . . [t]he tax-loss question as it relates to [the defendant] was sufficiently complicated so as to require expert assistance." Reasonable counsel would have obtained expert assistance prior to entering a plea bargain in the case, especially in light of the fact that the defendant, a CPA, believed at the time she prepared the questioned tax documents for her clients that the tax returns were lawful. When she discovered they were not, she attempted to correct the error by cooperating with the IRS, which resulted in the clients paying all of the back taxes, etc., and not being criminally charged. The defendant was "duped . . . into believing it was legal." Prejudice established. The government asserted that the defendant was responsible for more than 5 million tax-loss. The court rejected this, finding that the government had not proven that the defendant was accountable for that loss. The more than $500,000 tax-loss the defense stipulated to was included in the amount already rejected by the court but the court was not aware of that fact. Both government and defense experts in 2255 agreed the actual tax-loss related to the defendant's actions was only about $22,000. Sentence vacated.

United States v. Frost*, 612 F. Supp. 2d 903 (N.D. Ohio 2009). Counsel ineffective following plea to drug distribution for failing to object to a career offender sentence enhancement. The government sought the enhancement based on two prior convictions, one of which was for a 1996 Attempted Drug Trafficking offense under Ohio state law. Defense counsel conceded that this offense met the requirement for consideration but argued for a downward departure because the career offender designation substantially overstated the defendant's criminal record. The Court found a guideline range of 168-210 months, but granted the downward departure to 135 months. Under the guideline, a prior controlled substance offense had to involve distribution or an intent to distribute to qualify as a predicate offense for career offender status. Under the statutory definition, the defendant's state conviction involved only simple possession. There were conflicting unpublished decisions in the circuit at the time of defendant's trial as to whether the determination would be made only on the statutory language or whether the court would look through to the facts of the defendant's offense. There was a case pending in the Sixth Circuit addressing this issue. That case (Montanez), decided one month after sentencing, held that the determination would be made solely on the statutory definition. Counsel's conduct "was deficient in light of the conflicting Sixth Circuit caselaw and the pending Montanez litigation. . . . Simply put, caselaw in the Sixth Circuit at the time of . . . sentencing was conflicted and none was controlling" and there was one case squarely in the defendant's favor. Counsel's conduct was not excused by strategy because "there was nothing to lose, regardless how Montanez came out." Even if the defendant would not have succeeded in sentencing the record would have been preserved for appeal. Prejudice was thus established.

2008: Sasonov v. United States, 575 F. Supp. 2d 626 (D.N.J. 2008). Counsel in bribery of public official case ineffective for several reasons. First, counsel affirmatively misrepresented the immigration consequences of a guilty plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel informed the defendant that, as a resident alien with a green card, he would not be subject to deportation following his plea. Prejudice established because "it is likely that Petitioner would have taken his chances at trial because he faced only six to twelve months more than the sentence he received," due to his guilty plea. Second, counsel failed to conduct discovery and, thus, failed to argue petitioner's minor role in the crimes and failed to establish that the value of the benefit received from the bribe was less than $10,000, which would have prevented a four-point enhancement of the offense level. Prejudice established because the court might otherwise have reduced the sentence to less than one year or at least allowed the defendant “to negotiate a more favorable plea agreement with the Government.”

Potts v. United States*, 566 F. Supp. 2d 525 (N.D. Tex. 2008). Counsel ineffective in child pornography case for failing to object to the district court’s impermissible double counting of sentencing enhancements. Specifically, the court enhanced his offense level by two for possession of ten or more items of pornography under one section and by four for possession of more than three hundred images under another section. Guideline amendments effective in November 2004 should have alerted counsel to this problem. Prejudice established. “When the Court imposes a sentence at the bottom of an erroneously calculated sentencing range, that sentence demonstrates prejudice even when the imposed sentence also falls within the accurately calculated guideline range.” Here, the court had imposed a sentencing “at the very bottom of the erroneously calculated range.”

2007: Veal v. United States, 486 F. Supp. 2d 564 (N.D. W. Va. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following guilty plea to drug offenses for failing to review the presentence report prior to sentencing. He also did not prepare objections or even review the objections submitted by the defendant pro se.

Abraham v. United States*, 477 F. Supp. 2d 1232 (S.D. Fla. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sentencing on conspiracy, kidnaping a postal employee, and other charges for failure to assert that a prior escape conviction was a non-qualifying offense under the affirmative defense provision of the federal three strikes law. Counsel argued that the escape was not a serious violent felony, under 28 U.S.C. § 3559(c), because it did not involve weapons or violence. The court found it was and that the court was, therefore, required to impose the mandatory life sentence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to make the additional argument, under § 3599(c)(3)(A), of an affirmative defense, which allowed the defendant the opportunity to establish that the conviction was a non-qualifying conviction by showing by clear and convincing evidence that no weapons or guns were used or threatened to be used, and no injuries or death occurred in the commission of his escape. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel “failed to simply turn the page of the statute and continue the analysis under § 3599.” Prejudice found because the sentencing record made clear that the court believed it had no alternative other than to impose a mandatory life sentence. Likewise, although the court found the movant’s trial testimony to be less than truthful, it had accepted as true the proffer on this issue, which was proven by clear and convincing evidence with the supporting state court record in this proceeding. Sentence vacated and resentencing ordered.

2006: United States v. Gentry, 429 F. Supp. 2d 806 (W.D. La. 2006). Counsel ineffective following guilty plea to bank robbery for failing to file any objections to the loss calculation in the presentence report (PSR). The loss calculation included not only the robbery proceeds, but worker’s compensation indemnity and medical expenses associated with a police officer’s wounds incurred during pursuit of the defendant and co-defendants when he was shot by a co-defendant and certain home repairs that were necessary due to a co-defendant’s actions in breaking into a home during the pursuit. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because his notes indicated that he was aware of a potential issue, but he failed to object and could not articulate any strategy or rationale for the failure. Although there was no existing case authority supporting the objection at the time, the plain language of the guidelines excluded consideration of the worker's compensation payments and medical payments associated with the injuries to the police officer. Moreover, the fact that the sentencing court rejected the objections raised by co-defendants did not excuse the omission. "[R]easonably effective criminal defense counsel do not shy from confrontation and must zealously present their client's arguments." Id. at _____. Prejudice found because the defendant received a sentence that was 16 months over the guidelines maximum. If counsel had objected and appealed, as two co-defendants did, the Fifth Circuit would have held that the worker's compensation indemnity benefits and medical expenses associated with the officer's wounds were not properly included in the computation. New sentencing ordered.

2005: United States v. Holland, 380 F. Supp. 2d 1264 (N.D. Ala. 2005). Counsel ineffective in sentencing and on appeal in bank robbery case where the defendant and his co-defendant separately plead guilty and received an order of restitution payment under the Victim and Witness Protection Act (VWPA) as part of their sentence. The amount of restitution was not addressed by a jury and was based solely on hearsay in the probation officer's report. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object because "[e]verybody in the courtroom knew that this court considered the federal restitution scheme constitutionally flawed" and the court ended up imposing "an ambiguous and impossible restitution obligation" on the defendant that was also inconsistent with the terms placed on the co-defendant, even though restitution was to be "paid jointly and severally." To make matters worse, the BOP informed the defendant on numerous occasions while he was in confinement that his restitution had been paid and then 9 years later informed him that he owed the full amount without even accounting for the $999 paid by the co-defendant. While the government challenged jurisdiction, the court held that the defendant "is not barred from access to this court to right a wrong that is partly the fault of this court." The court found that the disparity in treatment between the defendant and his co-defendant "is a travesty that calls for correction," especially since the VWPA "limited the collectibility of restitution to 'five years from the date of the sentence.'" The court thus allowed equitable tolling in these 2255 proceedings. Although this case preceded Booker, Ring, Apprendi, and Jones (decided a month after this sentencing), the court found that counsel was ineffective in failing to test the constitutionality of the restitution award procedure since restitution was not charged in the indictment, not found by a jury, and the amount ordered to be paid was based on a standard other than proof by the Government beyond a reasonable doubt. Counsel "was required to recognize the potential constitutional claim" that came later in court rulings because "[t]he law has long recognized that defense counsel, both trial and appellate, is required to raise potential constitutional claims in view of developing law." Here, "this court was on record as doubting the constitutionality of the VWPA, and counsel in other cases had raised the issue in this court."

2004: Banyard v. Duncan, 342 F. Supp. 2d 865 (C.D. Cal. 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and object to the use of a prior assault conviction as a "serious felony" in sentencing the defendant to 25 years to life under the "Three Strikes Law" following a conviction for possession of a controlled substance. Appellate counsel was also ineffective for failing to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel advised the defendant to admit to two prior serious felony convictions even though the defendant's second strike was not a "serious felony," as required by state law. The second strike was for an assault conviction, "which arose from a domestic dispute and is the only arguably violent behavior in [the defendant's] record." The court found that the record on this offense revealed that, although the defendant was initially charged with a serious felony, he ultimately plead no contest only to assault, which was not a serious felony, and was sentenced to time served and probation. The court found that the state court erred in its judgment in finding that the defendant entered a no contest plea to a serious felony when the plea transcript revealed otherwise. Even if the alleged victim of the assault was believed, the "minor nature" of the defendant's "assault conviction show that it was outside the heartland of what would normally constitute assault." In addition, the "sentence of probation is not consistent with a desire to punish [the] crime as a serious felony." Without any real analysis, the court held, under the AEDPA, that the state court's decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law."

Blount v. United States*, 330 F. Supp. 2d 493 (E.D. Pa. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing on drug charges for failing to request a downward departure for time the defendant had already served in state and county custody on unrelated charges.

Garcia v. United States*, 301 F. Supp. 2d 1275 (D.N.M. 2004). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for drug conspiracy for failing to object to the pre-sentence report, which improperly calculated points based on the erroneous finding that the instant offense occurred while the defendant was a probationer for a DWI offense. The defendant was investigated by the DEA for a conspiracy to sell marijuana. Several co-defendants were arrested long before him with the last being on February 19, 1999. Following these arrests, but prior to his own arrest, the defendant was arrested and plead guilty to DWI. He was ordered to serve one-year of probation on March 8, 1999. He was indicted for these offenses in June 1999. He plead guilty pursuant to a plea agreement in which the state would recommend the lowest penalty available under the sentencing guidelines as long as the defendant participated in a "debriefing." Counsel at sentencing had not represented the defendant in the plea negotiations. During sentencing, although the petitioner asserted he was entitled to "the safety valve" downward departure, counsel asserted that he was ineligible without having a full understanding of the underlying facts. Because of the confusion, the court continued sentencing to allow counsel to investigate. Nonetheless, because the court had stated earlier that he would not give the "safety valve," counsel convinced the defendant that he was ineligible and the case proceeded to sentencing the same day. Because the court's statement of ineligibility was based on counsel's inaccurate summation of the facts, the court rejected the government's argument that the court had already exercised its discretion to reject the "safety valve." The court found a guideline range of 168 to 210 months and sentenced the defendant to 168 months. Counsel's conduct was deficient in convincing the court and the defendant that the safety valve did not apply because there was no evidence and the government never argued that the defendant was involved in any distribution after February 1999. Indeed, the pre-sentence report attributed no drug activity to the defendant after July 1998. Thus, any activity alleged preceded the defendant's DWI arrest. Thus, the defendant was entitled to application of the "safety valve," so long as the defendant participated in the agreed upon debriefing, which counsel never scheduled because of the erroneous belief that the defendant was not eligible for the "safety valve." Counsel's failure to object to the pre-sentence report was deficient because it "was based entirely on his lack of understanding of the underlying facts." Prejudice was found because absent counsel's error, under the appropriate sentencing guidelines and the government's agreement to recommend the low end, the defendant would have been given a sentence 53 months shorter than the one he actually received. The court ordered the government to afford the defendant an opportunity to comply with the debriefing requirements prior to resentencing.

2003: Somerville v. Conway, 281 F. Supp. 2d 515 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing in a burglary and assault case where he failed to challenge the legality of the defendant's sentence as a second violent felony offender. The defendant's status as a second violent offender was predicated on a previous conviction in Maryland for robbery with a deadly weapon. Under New York law, however, the Maryland offense could not be used as a first offense if the Maryland offense was not equivalent to any New York felony. In state court, the prosecution conceded that if trial counsel had raised the issue that the Maryland prior offense should not have been used. Nonetheless, the state court affirmed the sentence stating that the defendant received meaningful assistance from his trial counsel. In federal court, the state no longer conceded that the crime for which the defendant was convicted in Maryland could not be used as a predicate for the second violent felony offender status. The court found that the prior conviction from Maryland could not be used under New York law because the defendant in Maryland could be convicted of armed robbery if he used force without an intent to take property and afterwards stole from the victim. While this would be felony robbery in Maryland, it would not in New York under the statute. The court found prejudice because if counsel had raised this issue, the defendant would not have been adjudicated a second violent felony offender and would have been eligible for, although not guaranteed, a sentence far below what he was given. Even if the trial court had sentenced the defendant to the exact same sentence without finding a second violent felony offender status, the defendant was nonetheless prejudiced by being adjudicated as a second violent offender because "[i]n the event he commits another felony at some point in the future, he will be exposed to a mandatory maximum prison term of life in prison." The court also found deficient conduct because "[e]ffective counsel must be familiar with the sentencing law governing a defendant's case." Here, the New York law was manifested both in statute and in case law, and the Maryland law was clear from its case law.

Given that the only legal question open at petitioner's sentencing was his status as a second violent felony offender and that resolution of the court's adjudication of that status might have significant effects on both petitioner's current sentence and on any sentence he might receive if he were to commit a subsequent felony, defense counsel was obliged to be familiar with this law.

The court also found that counsel's failure could not have been motivated by any strategic rationale. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court's decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent as set forth in Strickland.

C. Military Cases

2006: United States v. Dobrava, 64 M.J. 503 (Army Ct. Crim. App. 2006), review denied, 65 M.J. 349 (U.S. Armed Forces 2007). Counsel was ineffective in false statement and larceny case for failing to call the accused to the stand for an unsworn statement in sentencing. The accused had been stationed in Afghanistan, near the Pakistan border, in an area where the threat level was high and several soldiers had been killed in the months prior to the accused's theft of money from a local national's house during a search of weapons. Counsel and the accused had agreed that an unsworn statement would be important but counsel did not call the accused. While the accused alleged that counsel simply forgot to call him, counsel asserted that he determined at the last moment that the statement would only dilute strong mitigation evidence and made a tactical decision not to call the accused. Regardless of the reason, counsel's conduct was deficient because the decision to make a statement or not was personal to the accused. Prejudice established because the accused's express statements of apology, contrition, and a desire to be rehabilitated might have persuaded the judge to give a lesser sentence.

2005: United States v. Davis, 60 M.J. 469 (U.S. Ct. App. Armed Forces 2005). Counsel ineffective in rape and sexual abuse of step-daughter (over a period of seven years) case for basing the entire sentencing strategy on an erroneous conclusion that the accused officer would be allowed to retire from the military with benefits if not sentenced to a dismissal. Prior to these charges, the accused had been passed over twice for promotion and, in order to avoid involuntary separation, had applied for voluntary retirement under the discretionary Temporary Early Retirement Authority (TERA). He was approved for TERA, but these charges arose before his separation and the TERA retirement was terminated. The accused plead guilty to some charges and was found guilty on other contested charges. In sentencing, counsel argued for a longer period of confinement in order to avoid a punitive discharge so the accused could obtain retirement benefits for his family. The panel sentenced the accused to life but did not order dismissal. After sentencing, counsel finally learned that eligibility for TERA required that an adverse action be "resolved in favor of the member." The accused, thus, was not eligible for TERA and was separated with an "other than honorable" discharge. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to research the TERA eligibility or to even make a phone call, which would have revealed a policy that a felony conviction disqualified the accused from TERA retirement. There was no reasonable strategy because the sentencing strategy was "fundamentally flawed from its inception because of a failure to research the critical law." Id. at 474-75. Prejudice was found because the accused would not have asked for increased confinement if he had been adequately advised. If defense counsel had not asked for the increased punishment, the panel likely would have accepted the government's recommendation of 40 years and a dismissal rather than sentencing the accused to life with no dismissal.

D. State Cases

2024: Perkins v. Fhuere, 549 P.3d 25 (Or. 2024). Petitioner was entitled to a new sentencing hearing due to trial counsel's failure to object to the trial court's imposition of enhanced sentences for four of the seven counts petitioner was convicted of based on judicially-found facts, instead of jury-found facts, as required by Supreme Court precedent. Petitioner was convicted of seven counts of various sexual crimes committed against a single victim in the same incident. At sentencing, the trial court imposed a 300-month mandatory minimum sentence on four of the counts. The court did so based on its own factual finding that one of the two rape counts involved a "separate criminal episode" from the other counts. This meant, under state law, that the rape constituted a "previous conviction of a major felony sex crime" so as to require the imposition of the mandatory minimums on the other counts under the relevant statute. Trial counsel did not object. In finding that trial counsel was not deficient, the post-conviction court had relied on the fact that at the time of sentencing in 2015, the state appellate court had not yet applied Apprendi to the statute at issue. The appellate court disagreed, pointing out that trial counsel understood that a factual determination was required for the enhanced sentencing provision to kick in. A lawyer exercising reasonable professional skill would have understood that the key principles announced in Apprendi potentially applied to the enhancement statute in this case. Further, “a lawyer exercising reasonable professional skill and judgment would have concluded that the benefits of raising the issue outweighed the risks.” As for prejudice, prevailing on the Apprendi argument could have resulted in a shorter sentence for petitioner. “[E]ven if the state had been in a position to empanel a sentencing jury to correct the problem . . . , the superintendent expressly acknowledges that ‘if the issue had been submitted to the jurors, they may have reached a different decision’ than the trial court as to whether the offenses in question involved separate criminal episodes.”

2023: People v. Simmons, 314 Cal.Rptr.3d 319 (Cal. Ct. App. 2023). In attempted murder case, trial counsel was deficient in failing to raise at sentencing the Racial Justice Act (RJA) that had become effective three days earlier even though the prosecutor’s racial comments occurred prior to the RJA’s effective date. (In the prosecutor’s rebuttal argument, she stated that appellant “bragged about all the women he was able to fool with his good looks, and he admitted to having an ambiguous ethnic presentation and that people that don’t know him think he’s something other than Black.” This violated the RJA because it equated “appellant’s skin tone and ‘ethnic presentation’ with deception, implying that he was not a credible witness because the color of his skin fooled women and confused strangers.”) The failure of defense counsel to raise the violation of the statute at the first available opportunity was objectively unreasonable and prejudicial within the meaning of Strickland. Once a violation of the statute has been established, the trial court is required to “impose a remedy specific to the violation” from a list of remedies in the statute. “Imposing any one of the enumerated remedies would have changed the result of the proceeding.”

People v. Ruiz*, 305 Cal.Rptr.3d 803 (Cal. Ct. App. 2023). At a resentencing proceeding that occurred because a portion of the original sentence was unauthorized by the relevant statute, resentencing counsel’s failure to provide any meaningful assistance amounted to the complete denial of counsel under Cronic. At a resentencing, the trial court is entitled to reconsider all prior sentencing choices. Petitioner had been convicted of carjacking, attempted robbery and arson, with gang enhancements connected to each of the three counts as well as enhancements related to a principal personally using a firearm in committing the carjacking and attempted second degree robbery. The trial court had sentenced petitioner to a total term of 26 years four months to life in state prison. At the resentencing, a different judge corrected the error but indicated she intended to remain as close as possible to the original sentence and ultimately increased the sentence by one year and four months. Petitioner was represented at the resentencing proceeding by original trial counsel but the attorney did not remember petitioner or the trial. Defense counsel did not file any documents in connection with the resentencing hearing, and spoke less than 50 words during the entire proceeding. Although eight years had passed since the original sentencing, when asked, trial counsel declined to speak on petitioner’s behalf. When the sentencing judge asked petitioner if he wished to be heard, petitioner expressed his remorse and indicated he had graduated high school in prison and was enrolled in college classes. The sentencing judge commended petitioner but noted that from her review of the probation report she would have imposed a harsher sentence had she been the original judge. At the conclusion of the hearing, trial counsel said he would prepare a notice of appeal but never did so. It turned out that trial counsel had a brain tumor which was diagnosed five months after the hearing. He died in the hospital later that same year. The complete absence of assistance from trial counsel was shown through the resentencing transcript, as well as from declarations from petitioner and trial counsel's former secretary. And this was "not a case where counsel was silent because there was nothing to say." Petitioner possessed documentation of his programming in prison, demonstrating that trial counsel would have had a basis to argue that petitioner had in fact been rehabilitating himself. Additionally, trial counsel had a legal argument to make to strike the gang enhancement.

Sease v. Commissioner of Correction*, 295 A.3d 436 (Conn. App. 2023). In robbery-murder case where petitioner maintained his innocence even at sentencing, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate petitioner's mental health background and failing to focus further on that background during his sentencing arguments. The lower court had found no deficient performance but "none of the court's possible strategic justifications for trial counsel's inactions are objectively reasonable." First, the lower court observed that "the prosecutor did not dispute the petitioner's mental health background as reported in the presentence investigation report." Although that was true, the prosecutor, who was not an advocate for petitioner, inaccurately described the mental health issues as merely "potential" issues and argued that they did not mitigate the severity of the offense. (The presentence investigation report showed actual professionally diagnosed schizophrenia, psychotic disorder, and post-traumatic stress disorder, for which petitioner was prescribed a variety of psychiatric medications.) The author of the presentence report was also not an advocate for petitioner. "It was within the duty and the province of trial counsel to present mitigating evidence at sentencing as an advocate on behalf of the petitioner." Second, the lower court pointed out that there was "zero evidence in the record that [the petitioner's] mental health issues played the slightest hand in the petitioner's actions." But this was likely attributable to the fact that the defense focused on challenging the identification of petitioner as the assailant. Nevertheless, the appellate court soundly rejected the premise implicit in the habeas court's conclusion that there must necessarily be some evidence that mental illness caused the petitioner to act as he did in order for defense counsel to have a duty to investigate the mental health history and/or argue it to the court in mitigation at sentencing. The habeas court cited no authority for its premise nor are we aware of any. Indeed, our rules of practice and the American Bar Association guidelines suggest there is such a duty and that it continues after conviction, prior to sentencing, and after receipt of the presentence investigation report.

Referencing a rule contained in a defense practice book, the appellate court found:

a defense counsel's duty to familiarize himself with any special mental health records of his client is not limited to mental health conditions that influenced in whole or in part a criminal defendant's actions at the time of the crime but that such duty extends to personal mitigation factors, including, in the present case, the petitioner's troubled and traumatic past and professionally diagnosed mental illnesses, and to any special medical or psychiatric reports.

The lower court's final point was that trial counsel was placed in a difficult position due to his client's position. "To the extent that the court's reasoning could be construed to mean that trial counsel was in a tenuous position because the petitioner maintained his innocence throughout the criminal trial, such reasoning does not provide a reasonable strategic justification for limiting sentencing comments as to the petitioner's mental health history." To the extent the lower court was relying on petitioner arguing his innocence at the sentencing hearing prior to trial counsel's sentencing comments, "the court's factual interpretation of the record in this regard is clearly erroneous." In fact, petitioner's allocution, in which he maintained his innocence, occurred after trial counsel's remarks at sentencing and there was nothing suggesting trial counsel anticipated what his client would say. In trial counsel's remarks, he noted that petitioner's innocence was no longer at issue given the jury's verdict, indicating he did not view himself constrained by petitioner's position. Importantly, "sentencing arguments concerning a defendant's mental health background as mitigation are not restricted to arguments concerning culpability but can include arguments wherein mental health concerns constitute a personal mitigation factor, which focuses on the individual defendant rather than on the offense." On the record of this case, trial counsel's failure to conduct an investigation into petitioner's mental health prior to sentencing was not consistent with established prevailing professional norms. Although trial counsel suggested in his testimony before the habeas court, as well as in his sentencing comments, that he was not able to discern from his interactions with the petitioner that he may be impacted by mental health concerns, a review of the presentence investigation report as was required by prevailing norms would have sufficiently alerted trial counsel to such possibility. And had trial counsel conducted a reasonable investigation, significant information beyond that included in the presentence report would have been discovered. Indeed, "[u]nlike the summary description contained in the presentence investigation report, [petitioner's] mental health records provide illuminating details of his battle with mental health concerns." Because of trial counsel's objectively unreasonable limits on the mental health investigation, "his decision not to present further mental health history as mitigation at sentencing is rendered uninformed." Prejudice was previously found by the court in Sease v. Commissioner of Correction, 274 A.3d 129 (Conn. App. 2022).

State v. Thompson*, 359 So.3d 1273 (La. 2023). In drug case where petitioner was sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole after being adjudicated a third-felony habitual offender, sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to file a motion to reconsider the mandatory sentence as excessive, as permitted by state law. The mandatory life sentence was excessive as applied to petitioner, whose predicate offenses were not enumerated crimes of violence under La. R.S. 14:2(B)(57) or sexual in nature.

State v. Tripplett*, 232 N.E.3d 304 (Ohio App. 2023). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to merge two of the counts appellant was convicted of -- felonious assault for causing serious physical harm, and felonious assault for causing physical harm by means of a deadly weapon -- where both counts were based on appellant hitting his sister in the mouth with a bottle. Prejudice is established as “[t]here are consequences for each felony conviction a defendant receives; the collateral consequences touch just about every facet of that felon’s life — from his or her ability to secure and maintain housing and employment, opportunities to seal or expunge convictions, ability to receive government assistance, and the right to vote or ability to own a firearm.”

State v. Murray*, 226 N.E.3d 543 (Ohio App. 2023). In drug case where the trial court imposed a mandatory $5000 fine, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to file an affidavit of indigency prior to sentencing. The presentence investigation revealed evidence of indigency, i.e., defendant was on government assistance, she had a limited educational background, and she had an extensive criminal history. Her counsel was “obviously aware of her indigency” as he was appointed counsel and informed the court at the sentencing hearing that he reviewed the PSI with defendant. There is a reasonable probability the trial court would not have imposed a fine had counsel performed effectively.

Bacon v. Cain*, 536 P.3d 634 (Or. App. 2023). In case involving multiple drug-related charges where the sentencing judge, inter alia, denied petitioner all alternative incarceration programming, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to offer any mitigating evidence other than petitioner’s testimony. Petitioner was facing a 228-month sentence. His case involved several aggravating factors that, alone, weighed in favor of finding substantial and compelling reasons to deny programming. Despite this, defense counsel called no witnesses and presented no evidence. “Even with the opportunity of a second sentencing hearing, and the knowledge that the trial court was not persuaded by counsel’s limited argument,” trial counsel still did not present any mitigating evidence. Relying on a strategy that had already failed was not reasonable. As for prejudice, the post-conviction court “erred in concluding that petitioner failed to establish prejudice because the sentencing judge was so focused on the amount of drugs involved that the additional mitigating evidence ‘would not have carried any weight with the sentencing judge.’” The correct prejudice analysis “should not involve any consideration of the individual judge or the factors that might or might not have motivated a specific judge to make a decision.” (Citation omitted.)

Weighing the mitigating evidence against the aggravating evidence, there is more than a mere possibility that a reasonable factfinder would have allowed for programming. The aggravating evidence demonstrated that petitioner was part of a large drug trafficking operation, in terms of the amount of drugs sold, and that petitioner has a history of former criminal activity and recidivism. However, the mitigating evidence paints a fuller picture of petitioner’s contributions to society over several years of sobriety and his success in helping others struggling with addiction, all while working and attending school. The declarations of Bower and Gozly evinced (1) petitioner’s participation in support groups and graduation from a drug rehabilitation program, (2) petitioner’s “noticeable” and “memorable” mentorship of peers and at-risk youth, (3) petitioner’s pursuit of higher education and goals to start a business, and (4) petitioner’s “proficient, reliable and diligent” work as an employee. Competent defense counsel could have used that information to persuasively argue that additional programming addressing petitioner’s substance abuse would contribute to his sobriety and avoidance of criminal activity which, in the past, allowed him to make sustained, positive impacts on his community. As a result, there exists more than a mere possibility that, but for counsel's failure, a reasonable factfinder would not have found substantial and compelling reasons to deny programming for petitioner.

State v. Elkface*, 527 P.3d 820 (Utah App. 2023). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to seek disqualification of the sentencing judge who, when acting as a prosecutor before his appointment to the bench, had been actively involved in the cases for which defendant was on probation at the time she was charged with multiple new crimes. The judge informed defendant at an early appearance that he “may be disqualified from presiding in this matter, based on his former office’s involvement in the case.” Without any apparent discussion with counsel, defendant waived any conflict. At the time of this waiver, however, defendant was unaware that the judge had previously sought to have defendant’s probation revoked, had filed numerous adversarial pleadings against defendant and appeared in court to argue that defendant should be held to be in violation of her probation and sanctioned. Following a negotiated resolution of the case, a presentence investigation report (PSI) was prepared that recommended a harsher punishment than appeared in the state sentencing guidelines, which presumed a probationary sentence. The judge sentenced defendant to prison in accordance with the recommendation, noting in particular defendant’s prior inability to succeed on probation. On this record, the judge was subject to disqualification based on two provisions of the state code of judicial conduct. Plea counsel’s failure to either seek disqualification or insist on a valid waiver of the issue was deficient. “[I]t was objectively unreasonable for [plea c]ounsel to conclude that [defendant] would be better served by [the sentencing judge] continuing to preside over her case rather than a new judge who had not been personally invested in seeking revocation of her probation.” Regarding the waiver, plea counsel did not (1) ensure that the judge adequately disclosed the basis of his disqualification (which counsel was on notice of, having previously represented defendant in the probation case), or (2) ask that counsel be permitted to discuss whether to waive or not outside the presence of the judge. Defendant demonstrated she was prejudiced by the deficient performance “because, considering the totality of the evidence, there is a reasonable probability that a judge who was not familiar with [defendant’s] past would have sentenced her differently.”

[T]he evidence presented at the sentencing hearing showed that [defendant] had good reason to argue for probation rather than a prison sentence. First, she was pregnant and due to deliver within a few months of sentencing. Second, the sentencing matrix recommended forty-five days in jail followed by probation. Third, the evidence presented at the sentencing hearing demonstrated that [defendant] was making efforts toward improving her behavior—she had made recent and consistent efforts at recovery, she was employed, she had ended detrimental personal relationships, and she had remained sober since the latest charges against her.

2022: State v. Weaver, 218 N.E.3d 806 (Ohio 2022). Reversing denial of postconviction relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing where petitioner was convicted of the murder of her newborn child and trial counsel made only a cursory reference to neonaticide as a mitigating factor and failed to offer an explanation of its meaning and how it applied in this case. The trial court denied relief after finding the testimony by petitioner's expert, Dr. Barnes, to be "unbelievable and biased." The lower appellate court affirmed, deferring to the trial court's credibility determination. This was error. "Had the Fifth District objectively reviewed the trial court's determination that Dr. Barnes was 'unbelievable,' it would have observed that the trial court's representation of Dr. Barnes's testimony as 'unbelievable' was based on immaterial information, its own fundamental misunderstanding of neonaticide, and its own biases pertaining to the subject of Dr. Barnes's testimony." In sum, the trial court's decision "demonstrated its arbitrary disregard of Dr. Barnes's uncontradicted expert opinion" and "was based on an unfounded and capricious credibility determination and 'an arbitrary, unreasonable attitude toward the evidence before [it]'" (Citation omitted.) This was shown in part by the trial court's "utterly inappropriate questioning of the state's witnesses." Regarding counsel's performance, no conceivable strategy could be discerned for merely mentioning neonaticide but not providing any context or potential impact of it at petitioner's sentencing, "especially in light of the two uncontradicted experts [petitioner] provided in the postconviction proceedings, who each have opined that [petitioner's] case fits into the classic personality and demographic profiles of women who commit neonaticide and that her actions were consistent with neonaticide patterns." As for prejudice, statements by the trial court indicated that it would not have changed the sentence of life without parole had the postconviction evidence been presented at sentencing. But the prejudice prong of Strickland is an objective test. The postconviction evidence "provide[d] a compelling narrative that could have framed [petitioner's] actions not as premeditated but as those of desperation and panic from an immature and isolated young woman." There is a reasonable probability that petitioner's sentence would have been different but for defense counsel's deficient performance. Because of the apparent bias by the trial court, resentencing is to be conducted by a different judge.

People v. Herring*, 216 N.E.3d 226 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Defendant, who was convicted of aggravated battery of a peace officer after he spat at a corrections officer, and was sentenced to 18 years in prison, was entitled to resentencing due to trial counsel's ineffective assistance at sentencing. Trial counsel performed objectively unreasonably by (1) failing to ascertain the accurate number of felony convictions prior to sentencing when the presentence investigation report (PSI) did not, (2) failing to move the sentencing court to vacate long-void convictions, and (3) failing to object to the State's erroneous assertion of nine felony convictions. "Ascertaining an accurate number of felony versus misdemeanor convictions is important in any sentencing but it becomes crucial when the PSI so clearly fails to do so and the main thrust of the prosecutor's sentencing remarks is defendant's 'history.'" There is a reasonable probability that the result of the sentencing would have been different, "in light of the State's repeated comments about defendant's 'history' and the court's emphasis on defendant's alleged 'nine felony convictions' and 'two pages' of criminal history, which included void convictions and misdemeanors."

People v. Carwell*, 214 N.E.3d 980 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Juvenile who was charged as an adult in criminal court and pled guilty to first degree murder and aggravated battery with a firearm received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney, following the plea, failed to seek defendant's transfer to juvenile court for sentencing. There was no plausible reason for counsel not to seek a transfer. Although the State could have then requested a return to adult court, it was not inevitable that the State would have succeeded. And a defendant who should have had a transfer hearing need not show more to establish prejudice, i.e., the defendant does not have to establish that he would have remained in juvenile court for sentencing. “Regardless of whether one describes the error here as structural error, we deem that defendant was prejudiced by the absence of the safeguards associated with a transfer hearing.”

State v. Allen*, 348 So.3d 1274 (La. 2022). In marijuana distribution case where petitioner received a mandatory life sentence following his adjudication as a habitual offender, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to apprise the trial court of its duty under state supreme court precedent to depart from the mandatory life sentence on the grounds it was excessive. Counsel also failed to present any mitigating evidence and failed to emphasize that none of petitioner’s predicate offenses were violent or sexual in nature. In the motion to reconsider the habitual offender sentence, which was filed 18 months after the initial sentencing where petitioner had received the lower end of the sentencing range, counsel failed to remind the trial court of mitigating circumstances such as that petitioner “had obtained his GED, was an employed father [of] two young children, and that he desired treatment for his dependency on marijuana.” As a result of trial counsel’s deficient performance, the trial court imposed a mandatory life sentence that was excessive as applied to defendant.

Maxfield v. Cain*, 520 P.3d 890 (Or. App. 2022). In case involving robbery convictions for five offenses occurring at different retail establishments within a period of one month when petitioner was 22 years old, trial counsel was ineffective at sentencing for failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence concerning petitioner’s background. At sentencing, the trial court imposed six sentences (one for each of the six victims), five to run consecutively, for a total of 40 years (480 months) in prison pursuant to the applicable mandatory minimum. The sole issue in this appeal was whether the lower court erred in finding that petitioner failed to establish prejudice, specifically whether there was a reasonable probability that the sentencing court would have exercised its discretion to impose concurrent rather than consecutive sentences. First, the lower court erred by focusing the inquiry on what would have impacted that particular sentencing judge. The correct prejudice test is objective and looks to the balance of mitigating evidence against aggravating evidence and determines how the new evidence could have impacted the sentencer’s discretion. At the original sentencing hearing, petitioner’s mother asked the court not to imprison her son for the rest of his life and attributed his behavior to addiction. His father ascribed his son’s behavior to bad friendships and drug addiction and asked the court to show leniency. Petitioner apologized to the victims and spoke about working on himself so that he could give back to the community and make up for his wrongdoings. The evidence presented at the post-conviction hearing contained many more details about petitioner’s difficult childhood and also described its impact on his neurological capabilities. (E.g., petitioner was born prematurely after a drug-affected pregnancy and had mild “physical deformities,” leading to difficulty assimilating socially and to a history of speech problems; both of petitioner’s parents were arrested at different times, and petitioner’s father was abusing drugs or in prison for large portions of his childhood; petitioner began using drugs in elementary school, later encouraged by some of the adults in his life; when he was 17, petitioner attempted suicide four different times; although functioning in the low average range of intellectual abilities, petitioner has extraordinary difficulties staying focused; petitioner's extremely early use of serious drugs likely changed the neurological development of his brain which, combined with the impact of drug use in-utero and petitioner's difficult childhood, placed him at a significantly higher risk of learning and mood disorders, made it difficult for him to exercise control over his behavior, exacerbated his difficulties socially and academically, and created the need for a long-term residential treatment program.) There was also substantial aggravating evidence, e.g., petitioner committed five different armed robberies over the course of a one-month period and these crimes impacted six different victims; as a juvenile he had been placed on probation for several offenses, the most serious being assault in the fourth degree, and he had committed eight probation violations; and attempts to place petitioner in residential substance abuse treatment were unsuccessful. Nevertheless, prejudice is established.

The original sentencing court heard nothing about petitioner's childhood difficulties and the impact of his early drug exposure on his mental health and behavioral regulation. That unrepresented mitigation information, combined with petitioner's youth and relatively minimal criminal history up until his month-long spree of robberies, when weighed against the aggravating circumstances in this case—petitioner's five armed robberies where nobody was ultimately physically injured and petitioner's poor record in the juvenile system—creates more than a mere possibility that counsel's deficient performance affected the outcome.

Donald v. Commissioner of Correction*, 284 A.3d 665 (Conn. App. 2022). In robbery-assault case where petitioner, who was nineteen years old at the time of the offense, shot the two victims, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and present mitigating evidence at the sentencing hearing. That petitioner's initial sentence of 75 years imprisonment was subsequently reduced by the review commission to 45 years on proportionality grounds did not render moot his claim that trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing proceeding. Immediately prior to sentencing, trial counsel had unsuccessfully sought to withdraw, explaining that petitioner had filed a grievance against him and did not want to discuss the case with counsel. The motion was denied and sentencing proceeded with defense counsel making some references to the presentence investigation report (PSI) which counsel simply assumed was correct. "Although the petitioner's relationship with trial counsel had broken down by the time of sentencing, that did not relieve counsel of his obligation to gather mitigating information from and about the petitioner prior to that time, or to present such information in support of a plea for leniency on the petitioner's behalf at his sentencing hearing." First, "counsel could and should have begun the process of compiling mitigating information about the petitioner from the petitioner himself much earlier than the day before sentencing, when the petitioner reportedly refused to speak with him." Second, the PSI indicated that petitioner had been forthcoming with the probation officer who prepared the PSI, informing her about his troubled background and treatment he received. The record thus demonstrated that trial counsel could have obtained a great deal of useful mitigating information had he spoken with his client earlier about his upbringing and himself obtained the records the probation officer had requested but did not receive for inclusion in the PSI report. In its deficiency analysis, the habeas court also credited and relied on testimony by a social worker about how petitioner's behavior as a young adult was probably affected by his troubled childhood and diminished life prospects due to the several types of risk factors that apply to persons with his background. On appeal the State argued that such evidence was not properly considered absent a showing by petitioner through expert testimony that competent counsel would have developed and presented it in aid of a client's sentencing in 2015. Because the State failed to raise this argument below, it could not be considered on appeal in contesting the habeas court's finding of deficient performance. The habeas court's findings as to deficiencies in counsel's performance were sufficiently supported, particularly "by counsel's presentation of almost no argument for the petitioner at sentencing, his near exclusive reliance on the incomplete PSI to describe the petitioner's background and social history, and his failure to investigate, to compile and to present to the trial court any of the substantial mitigating information about the petitioner's troubled background" that was presented at the habeas hearing. Regarding prejudice, the habeas court was not wrong in finding that Strickland rather than Cronic provided the governing standard. Because "the likely impact of the mitigating information that trial counsel failed to present at the petitioner's original sentencing undermines confidence in his original sentence," it therefore follows that the same deficiency undermines confidence in the review division's proportionality-based modification of the sentence given that the review division was confined to the limited mitigating evidence presented at the original trial. The particular information not available for consideration by the review division included: (1) information pertaining to petitioner's exposure to violence at a young age, both as a gang member and otherwise; (2) petitioner's frequent sexual abuse by older children when he was seven years old; (3) details concerning petitioner's troubled relationship with his drug abusing father; (4) details concerning petitioner's relationship with his mother, who frequently could not care for him herself and left him in the control of his teenage sister when she went out of town to work; and (5) details concerning the time petitioner spent at various institutions that housed and treated him in his youth.

2021: Montana v. Wright, 495 P.3d 610 (Mt. 2021). Counsel was ineffective in case involving several drug-related convictions where counsel failed to inform the sentencing court of its statutory authority to impose an alternative sentence under Alternative Sentencing Authority (ASA), § 45-9-202, MCA. In the pre-sentence report, the probation officer opined that defendant was not eligible for a deferred sentence because of defendant's prior out-of-state conviction of a non-drug-related felony. During the sentencing proceeding, in response to the State's request for a sentence of five-years, defense counsel asked for a deferred sentence of three-years, contending that this was permitted by counsel's interpretation of § 46-18-201(1)(b), MCA. The State disputed the interpretation of the statute and argued that a deferred sentence was not allowed. In fact, defense counsel's interpretation was clearly incorrect. The sentencing court ultimately sentenced defendant to a four-year DOC commitment for the felony count with all four years suspended. A suspended six-month jail sentence was also imposed for a misdemeanor count. Defense counsel had no possible justification for failing to point the sentencing court to ASA, supported by existing case law, as the appropriate authority for the requested deferred sentence. Prejudice is found even though there was the possibility of a more onerous sentence under the ASA. "Given that [defendant's] prior felony was very remote (occurring over 24 years prior to sentencing in this case), not drug-related, and the District Court's sentence was rehabilitative in nature—the court rejected the State's request for a DOC incarceration commitment — with primary intervention designed toward evaluation and treatment of a likely substance use disorder rather than punishment, certainly there was a reasonable probability the court would have deferred imposition of sentence if it believed such was an available alternative.”

State v. Gordon*, 862 S.E.2d 39 (N.C. App. 2021). Although a constitutional challenge was unavailable regarding defense counsel’s failure to object to the imposition of satellite-based monitoring (SBM) for the duration of defendant’s life, a statutory challenge was proper and meritorious. (No constitutional challenge was possible because SMB proceedings were deemed part of a civil regulatory scheme, not criminal.) “Here, trial counsel for Defendant failed to raise any objection to the imposition of lifetime SBM enrollment when the State presented no evidence regarding reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment, and Defendant was prejudiced as a result.”

State v. Spinks*, 860 S.E.2d 306 (N.C. App. 2021). Defendant was denied his statutory right to effective assistance of counsel with regard to imposition of lifetime satellite-based monitoring (SBM) where, without any discernable strategic reason, defense counsel did not object to the imposition of SBM, raise a constitutional argument regarding the imposition of SBM, or file written notice of appeal from the SBM order. “Prior to Defendant’s [SBM] hearing, our Court’s precedent had already established that, in [SBM] proceedings, the State bears the burden of establishing that the imposition of [SBM] constitutes a reasonable search under the Fourth Amendment, and that the trial court must consider the totality of the circumstances before imposing [SBM].” Prejudice was shown given precedent establishing that a trial court errs where, as in this case, it orders lifetime SBM without evidence that the enrollment constitutes a reasonable Fourth Amendment search.

State v. McElfresh*, 168 N.E.3d 71 (Ohio App. 2021). In drug case where defendant pleaded guilty and his sentence included a mandatory fine, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to file an affidavit of indigency to support a request to have the mandatory fine waived, and further for failing to move to waive the fine. Counsel was appointed for defendant based on a finding of indigency. The trial court initially indicated it would not impose a fine but was then alerted that a mandatory fine was required. This record “reflects a reasonable probability that the trial court would have found [defendant] indigent had his trial counsel filed an affidavit of indigency before sentencing and would have waived the fine [had] trial counsel moved for waiver of the fines.”

2020: Young v. State, 294 So.3d 1238 (Miss. App. 2020). Appointed counsel was ineffective in resentencing proceeding held for juvenile who had been sentenced to life without possibility of parole pre-Miller v. Alabama where counsel failed to present the circuit court with readily available evidence of defendant’s rehabilitation in prison. At the Miller resentencing hearing, counsel failed to present the certificates defendant had earned for completing or participating in rehabilitative programs in prison even though they had been attached to defendant’s PCR motion. Nor did counsel submit other mitigating evidence relating to defendant’s “capability of rehabilitation,” a factor the circuit court was required to consider under Miller. The factor went unaddressed by counsel in closing arguments and counsel offered no rebuttal to the State’s argument that the record was devoid of evidence showing defendant’s possibility of rehabilitation. On the record before the court, it was clear that there was no conceivable strategic basis for counsel's omissions and that the failure of counsel to present the evidence of defendant's successful completion of rehabilitative and educational programs plainly "had a 'reasonable probability' of affecting the outcome of the case."

State v. Gleason*, 848 S.E.2d 301 (N.C. App. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective in sentencing by failing to object to the consideration of an aggravating factor that was not properly charged under the relevant statute. "Had Defendant's counsel objected to the lack of notice, the State could not have proceeded on that aggravating factor and Defendant could not have received an aggravated sentence."

State v. Crossley*, 164 N.E.3d 585 (Ohio App. 2020). In case where defendant was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, improperly handling firearms in a motor vehicle, and receiving stolen property, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to argue that the carrying a concealed weapon and improperly handling firearms offenses should have merged as allied offenses of similar import for purposes of sentencing. Although the trial court provided defense counsel advanced warning that it was not going to merge the offenses based on outdated caselaw, defense counsel failed to submit updated research prior to sentencing. "If counsel had submitted research showing the correct analysis from [more recent precedent] and argued for merger of the offenses using that analysis, there is a reasonable probability that the trial court would have merged the offenses, thus reducing [defendant's] sentence by one year." Similarly, appellate counsel was deficient in failing to raise the merger issue where the "record clearly indicated that the trial court's allied offense determination was based on outdated caselaw that applied an obsolete allied offense analysis." Had the issue been properly raised, it would have been successful.

State v. Redden*, 152 N.E.3d 919 (Ohio App. 2020). In case involving convictions for manufacturing and sale of methamphetamine by a defendant who had been found indigent prior to trial, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to file an affidavit of indigence presentencing and to move to waive the mandatory fines. The presentence report indicated that defendant was unemployed and without assets. There was a reasonable probability that the trial court would have found defendant indigent had an affidavit been filed prior to sentencing and that the fines may have been waived.

Pike v. Cain*, 465 P.3d 277 (Or. App. 2020). Trial counsel was ineffective at sentencing in assault case where petitioner was a decorated infantryman in the Army and counsel failed to fully investigate and present evidence of petitioner's military service, and also failed to argue for a downward departure under relevant statutes based on petitioner's servicemember status. Counsel was aware that the stakes of the sentencing hearing were high--petitioner faced a presumptive 70-month sentence for second-degree assault, which would end his promising career in the military. Counsel knew that petitioner's goal was to remain in the Army. In an effort to achieve that goal, counsel tried to persuade the sentencing court to grant petitioner a downward departure to probation by presenting evidence that petitioner "had a career in the military, that he was doing well there and would continue to do well there, that the military offered structure and required accountability, and that it would best protect society if [petitioner] remained in the military and continued with his treatment.” Counsel had petitioner evaluated for fitness for probation and presented testimony from petitioner’s platoon sergeant in the Army. Counsel explained that he did not further investigate petitioner’s military service because such a strategy could have backfired if the court had asked why petitioner had been unable to behave appropriately, despite his experience as a soldier and the Army’s emphasis on honor and dignity. But the risk that the court would pose that question to petitioner would have been present with or without the evidence of petitioner’s exceptional service that was not discovered or presented. Further, having affirmatively adopted the strategy of trying to convince the court to sentence petitioner such that he could remain in the military, counsel exercising reasonable professional skill and judgment would develop a command of his client’s performance in the military. That is because the success of that strategy would necessarily depend on convincing the court that keeping the client in the military was a “substantial and compelling reason” to depart from the presumptive Measure 11 sentence. For those reasons, counsel’s limited investigation into petitioner’s military record, and, relatedly, counsel’s failure to develop that evidence, cannot be said to be the product of reasonable professional skill and judgment.

Petitioner was prejudiced by counsel’s deficient performance. An adequate investigation would have yielded information that petitioner had served in Afghanistan and received numerous commendations for his service. Such information could have substantiated the case that petitioner’s servicemember status was a substantial and compelling reason for a statutorily authorized downward departure. And there was more than a mere possibility that that information could have affected the result of the proceeding.

That is because it paints a fuller picture of both (1) the service that petitioner has provided to his country and (2) the success petitioner has had in the Army in conforming his conduct to societal expectations. Such an amplified picture of petitioner’s service, particularly combined with the testimony of petitioner’s sergeant about how the Army would help petitioner address his issues with alcohol and anger that contributed to his crime, could have caused the sentencing court to conclude that a downward departure from the presumptive 70-month sentence was a preferable and appropriate way to address petitioner’s criminal conduct in view of his service to the country and the resources available in the military.

2019: Dennis v. Commissioner of Correction, 208 A.3d 282 (Conn. Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to multiple charges in two different counties, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a stay of execution of sentence in the first county pending imposition of sentence in the second county, resulting in petitioner being deprived of sixteen days of presentence incarceration credits. Although the lower court credited trial counsel’s testimony that his choice to forgo a motion to stay the execution of the first sentence was based on a strategic decision to move through the sentencing without incident in order to not jeopardize the court’s acceptance of the plea agreement, the appellate court found that it was not reasonable for trial counsel to believe that once the court accepted the plea agreement, petitioner would have been able to withdraw it.

Capital Case*

Further, there was no reasonable basis for trial counsel to believe that the court could have modified petitioner's sentence, once imposed, in a way that would have jeopardized the plea agreement. On the record before it, the appellate court could discern no reasonable strategic basis for trial counsel to fail to request the stay.

Moultrie v. State*, 205 A.3d 65 (Md. Ct. Spec. App.), cert. denied, 216 A.3d 944 (Md. 2019). In case where petitioner, at age 16, pleaded guilty to second-degree murder and other related charges and was sentence to 30 years imprisonment, trial counsel was ineffective in: (1) failing to request a ruling or a hearing on a timely filed motion for reduction of sentence before the five-year period for reducing a sentence expired; and (2) incorrectly advising petitioner that a three-judge sentence review panel could increase his sentence. Under state law, petitioner had 30 days after imposition of sentence to file an application for review of his sentence by a three-judge panel. No application was filed. A timely motion for reduction of sentence was filed by trial counsel who asked that it be held sub curia and that the court “[g]rant a hearing upon petition of counsel.” This was consistent with counsel’s representation to petitioner that he might be able to come back in a few years with positive things to show in support of the request for sentence reduction. Trial counsel did not, however, request a hearing on the motion before the time for reducing sentence expired five years later. Regarding the reduction motion, the court held: “[W]hen counsel undertook to file the motion for modification or reduction of [petitioner’s] sentence, he undertook to ensure that the court would act on the motion before the expiration of the five-year deadline. Because of counsel's failure to fulfill that undertaking, [petitioner] is entitled to a belated hearing on his motion, provided that he requests the hearing within 30 days of the issuance of the mandate in this appeal.” Deficient performance and prejudice is also found concerning trial counsel’s mistaken advisement that a three-judge review panel could have increased petitioner’s sentence had petitioner sought review. (Because petitioner had received the maximum allowable sentence, an increase was not permissible.) “Had counsel correctly informed [petitioner] that a three-judge panel could reduce his sentence or leave it as it was, but could not increase the sentence, it is, at a minimum, reasonably probable that [petitioner] would have filed an application for sentence review: he had nothing to lose and at least some possibility of gain. In those circumstances, it is difficult to envision why any reasonable person would not have filed an application for sentence review.” As the remedy, the court holds that petitioner may pursue a belated application for sentence review provided that he files the application within 30 days of the mandate in this appeal.

Commonwealth v. Bickerstaff*, 204 A.3d 988 (Pa. Super. Ct.), appeal denied, 218 A.3d 862 (Pa. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to petitioner’s enhanced sentence for attempted murder with serious bodily injury where the Commonwealth failed to put petitioner on notice that the Commonwealth intended to prove attempted murder/serious bodily injury at trial rather than only attempted murder. The charges, complaint, information, and jury instructions for attempted murder made no mention of associated serious bodily injury. Instead, the court gave a jury instruction only on serious bodily injury related to the aggravated assault charge. Petitioner was then essentially ambushed with the verdict sheet’s special interrogatory that raised for the first time a question about serious bodily injury in connection with attempted murder. Prior to the interrogatory, [petitioner] had no warning that there was even an issue of serious bodily injury associated with attempted murder. Absent more, this surprise interrogatory was not enough to put [petitioner] on notice to defend against attempted murder/serious bodily injury.

In light of this absence of notice and petitioner's resultant inability to defend, counsel should have objected to the interrogatory before the jury deliberated. Counsel had no rational basis for failing to object to the interrogatory, given the lack of notice, and counsel's failure to object prejudiced [petitioner], because it caused [petitioner] to endure a conviction for attempted murder with serious bodily injury and set [petitioner] up to face a maximum sentence of 40 years for that offense, rather than 20 years for attempted murder generally. Moreover, when the court imposed the enhanced sentence for attempted murder/serious bodily injury, based solely on the jury's response to the interrogatory, counsel again failed to object.

That the jury did make a finding on the serious bodily injury issue through the interrogatory did not, as argued by the Commonwealth, render this a matter of harmless error.

Monfore v. Persson*, 439 P.3d 519 (Ore. Ct. App. 2019). Petitioner, a bookkeeper for two related companies, was convicted of various theft offenses after stealing from the companies and was sentenced to 23 years, nine months incarceration. The lengthy sentence was based in part on the trial court's view that petitioner's actions resulted in one of the companies, IP Koke, going bankrupt, thereby leaving 85 employees without jobs. Petitioner was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel as to sentencing "because her lawyer's decision not to investigate the state's claim that petitioner's theft caused one of the companies to fail did not comport with constitutional standards." Although petitioner and her family had asked trial counsel to investigate the prosecution's claim that petitioner was the cause of IP Koke's closure, trial counsel thought that the best strategy was to "beg[] for mercy," without suggesting that the company failed for reasons other than petitioner's conduct. Counsel said that he "had not signed up for that job of investigating whether IP went out of business because of mismanagement or petitioner's behavior, or both, and that was why [he] was so firm in refusing to get involved in such a strategy." At sentencing defense counsel argued that petitioner's thefts were the product of her gambling addiction, that her prompt confession demonstrated that she had accepted responsibility, and that the harm her addiction had caused to her own family all pointed toward lenient treatment. Counsel also provided the court with information regarding sentences imposed in other business embezzlement cases in order to persuade the court that the prosecution's proposed sentence was too long in comparison. The request for leniency was rejected in light of the harm caused to IP Koke's many employees. Although the post-conviction court found that trial counsel was not ineffective in his sentencing performance, the appellate court disagreed.

Counsel was aware that the state would claim that that harm was great because petitioner's conduct allegedly resulted in the failure of a business. Counsel also was aware from petitioner and her family that there were reasons to be skeptical of the state's claim about the extent of the harm associated with petitioner's conduct. Yet, counsel failed to look into the issue at all because that is not what he “signed up for” and because of his belief that calling into question the state’s assertions regarding the magnitude of harm would conflict with petitioner’s plea for mercy. That decision not to conduct even a rudimentary investigation into what counsel knew or reasonably should have known would be a central issue at sentencing does not reflect the exercise of reasonable professional skill and judgment. Without such an investigation, counsel did not have the facts necessary to meaningfully and reasonably evaluate whether questioning the state’s assertion about the extent of the harm would, in fact, conflict with petitioner’s plea for mercy.

Capital Case*

The appellate court also disagreed with the lower court’s finding that petitioner was not prejudiced by counsel’s failure to investigate why IP Koke went out of business.

If counsel had conducted even the simplest of investigations by reviewing local newspapers, he would have obtained quite a bit of information tending to attribute IP Koke’s closure to other causes, including the fact that its namesake owner had left for a competing company, that the printing industry had undergone substantial changes, that the economy was in decline, and that IP Koke’s customer orders had dried up. Had counsel uncovered that information, there is “more than a mere possibility” that counsel could have used that information at sentencing to counter the state’s claim that petitioner’s conduct alone caused the company’s closure There is also “more than a mere possibility” that, presented with that information, the trial court could have taken a different view of the magnitude of the harm caused by petitioner’s conduct Such a view could have persuaded the court to see petitioner’s conduct as comparable to the other examples of embezzlement cases that counsel presented to the court, resulting in a shorter sentence for petitioner. At least, there is “more than a mere possibility” that that could have happened.

State v. Hoover*, 2019 WL 5173793 (Ohio Ct. App. Oct. 10, 2019). In case where appellant was convicted of felonious assault, trial counsel was ineffective in disclosing to the trial court prior to sentencing a letter written to counsel by appellant after the verdict in which appellant complained about counsel’s representation and revealed that appellant had violated a protective order by communicating with and having sex with the victim while trial was pending. The trial court referenced the letter as one of its sentencing factors in imposing a sentence of seven years of incarceration. Appellant did not waive the attorney-client privilege when he failed to object when the letter was submitted during sentencing. Given that the trial court relied on appellant’s letter as one of its sentencing factors, there is a reasonable probability that, but for the trial court’s consideration of this letter, the outcome of appellant’s sentencing hearing would be different.

State v. Warren*, 2019 WL 3230870 (Ohio Ct. App. July 17, 2019). In drug and assault case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to file an affidavit of indigency prior to sentencing and then move for waiver of the fines. There is a reasonable probability that the mandatory fines would have been waived by the trial court if the motion had been filed given the information in appellant’s affidavit of indigency for appointment of counsel. That affidavit showed appellant was unemployed, homeless and had no income.

Capital Case*

Fulton v. State*, 576 S.W.3d 905 (Tex. Ct. App. 2019). In case where appellant was found guilty of criminally negligent homicide and given the maximum sentence of ten years imprisonment by the jury, which was three years more than requested by the prosecution, trial counsel was ineffective at sentencing in failing to impeach a prosecution witness who testified about appellant's behavior approximately one month after the offense and before appellant was indicted. On the date of the offense, appellant consumed four to five beers while playing golf at a country club. He then had dinner at the club and consumed two and one quarter 19.5 ounce beers. Approximately half an hour after leaving the club his truck crossed a double yellow line and drove into oncoming traffic, killing a driver in a head-on collision. At the scene, appellant told an officer he was distracted by a deer in the wooded area off the roadway, which caused him to drive into oncoming traffic instead of negotiating the curve in the roadway. Approximately an hour after the accident, appellant was given standardized field sobriety tests. Although the officer administering the tests noted two clues on the horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test, he did not detect any clues on the other tests and ultimately determined that appellant was not intoxicated. (Appellant refused to provide a blood or breath sample.) Data retrieved from appellant's truck indicated that he was traveling approximately fifty miles per hour at the time of the collision and that he only applied his brakes, if at all, when impact occurred. A bartender from the country club who was traveling in the same direction as the victim testified that appellant traveled into her lane immediately prior to the crash, causing her to honk her horn and swerve to avoid him. The prosecution conceded that appellant was not legally intoxicated but nevertheless argued that he was impaired from the alcohol consumption and speeding at the time of the accident. At sentencing, in addition to victim impact evidence, the prosecution called the bartender from the country club who testified that appellant came into the bar at the country club approximately a month after the accident. Appellant and his friends proceeded to order alcohol and appellant paid with his credit card. Appellant presented good character witnesses who were cross-examined about appellant's post-accident return to the country club. The prosecutor also emphasized this behavior in argument to the jury. During proceedings on appellant's motion for new trial, the trial court made a factual finding that trial counsel had received oral notice from the prosecution that an employee from the country club had indicated in response to a subpoena that there were no records corroborating appellant's alleged use of his credit card at the bar. (The issue came up as a claim under Brady, with the defense contending that this information had not been provided to the defense. The trial court's factual finding defeated that claim.) On appeal, appellant argued that trial counsel was ineffective in not using the absence of a credit card record to impeach the bartender. The State's argument that trial counsel could have reasonably decided not to use the impeachment evidence in order to instead focus on the redeeming aspects of appellant's personality was unpersuasive in light of trial counsel's testimony at the new trial hearing that he would have used the information had he possessed it. Not only did trial counsel effectively concede that the omission of impeachment was not subjectively strategic, it was also objectively unreasonable for trial counsel not to impeach the bartender or offer the available extrinsic evidence establishing appellant's credit card was not used. "During punishment, trial counsel called witnesses to testify that Appellant was remorseful about the collision. [The bartender's] testimony seriously undermined this strategy, and it was objectively unreasonable to not impeach [the bartender] with evidence that directly contradicted her testimony." As for prejudice, the prosecution made extensive use of the bartender's testimony both in argument and in cross-examination of the defense witnesses to defeat appellant's claim of remorse. Arguments about why the impeachment would have been unsuccessful are rejected.

2018: State v. Walter, 431 P.3d 22 (Mont. 2018). In drug case, trial counsel was prejudicially ineffective in failing to advise the sentencing court on the relevant law. Appellant pleaded guilty to a charge of criminal possession of dangerous drugs, criminal possession of drug paraphernalia, and obstructing a peace officer. The state sought to have appellant sentenced as a persistent felony offender (PFO), which included minimum sentencing guidelines. Appellant's counsel argued that the PFO statutes were inapplicable because a more specific statute applied, and argued that appellant should get a deferred sentence as a first-time drug offender. The sentencing court noted that two controlling statutes were in conflict, and decided that it was required to follow the PFO statute, and sentenced appellant to five years imprisonment. Appellant argued on appeal that his trial counsel's failure to cite the Alternative Sentencing Authority statute (ASA) and State v. Brendal, 276 P.3d 886 (Mont. 2006), which is a "pivotal opinion interpreting the interrelationship between the ASA and PFO statutes," 431 P.3d at 25, fell below the objective standard of reasonableness required by Strickland. The Montana Supreme Court determined that under Hinton v. Alabama, trial counsel's ignorance on this point of law "typifies" unreasonable performance. Appellant was prejudiced by his counsel's deficient performance, because the record demonstrated that the trial court wanted to avoid sentencing him under the PFO statutes and sought to prioritize treatment over incarceration, and therefore there is a reasonable probability that had his counsel called the court's attention to authority permitting it to impose a reduced sentence, it would have. The Montana Supreme Court reversed the sentence and remanded for resentencing with "effective counsel."

State v. Larsen*, 425 P.3d 694 (Mont. 2018). It was clear from the face of the record on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective for incorrectly advising the trial court that appellant's sentence could not be deferred or suspended. Appellant was convicted by a jury of felony possession of methamphetamine and misdemeanor possession of marijuana and sentenced as a persistent felony offender to ten years in prison, with none suspended. At sentencing, appellant had spoken on his own behalf and asked the court for credit for time served and a suspended sentence with a recommendation to participate in treatment court, stating that his offenses were non-violent possession charges. Counsel, however, told the court that the "bare minimum" sentence was ten years without suspension or deferment, and the court repeatedly said this sentence was inappropriate, but agreed he "must give that as a sentence" because it was required by the persistent felony offender statute. Under Strickland, it was objectively unreasonable for counsel to tell the trial court that it had no authority to impose a sentence that departed from the PFO minimum requirements. In State v. Brendal, 213 P.3d 448 (Mont. 2009), the Supreme Court of Montana determined that if incarceration of the defendant is not appropriate for a person conviction of a dangerous drug felony, the court has alternative sentencing authority. Here, the state Supreme Court rejected the state's argument that the trial court in this case did not question whether incarceration was appropriate but merely questioned the length of the prison term, calling it a "narrow construction of [the] exchange." It held that the trial court expressed frustration both orally and in writing about the sentence, and it was reasonably probable that had the court been appropriately advised, it would have suspended appellant's sentence. The Montana Supreme Court remanded for a new sentencing hearing.

2017: Richardson v. Belleque, 406 P.3d 1074 (Or. 2017). Affirming grant of post-conviction relief on claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel at a presentence hearing on whether petitioner was a “dangerous offender” where trial counsel failed to conduct an adequate background investigation and to consult with an appropriate expert. Petitioner was convicted of first-degree manslaughter and second-degree assault based on the death of an elderly man who petitioner punched, causing him to fall. The victim suffered a massive head injury and died the following day. Under Oregon law, petitioner’s sentence was subject to significant enhancement if he was proven to be a “dangerous offender,” i.e., that he suffers from “a severe personality disorder indicating a propensity toward crimes that seriously endanger the life or safety of another.” At the hearing to determine whether he met the criteria, the court-appointed psychiatrist opined, inter alia, that petitioner had an antisocial personality disorder (ASPD) and met the “dangerous offender” definition. Defense counsel cross-examined the expert but did nothing else to rebut the expert witness. His cross-examination focused on trying to undermine the expert’s conclusion that petitioner met the criteria for conduct disorder as a youth, a predicate for the ASPD diagnosis. When questioned about certain ambiguities in the record concerning petitioner’s actions, the expert explained that he was drawing conclusions about petitioner’s conduct based on petitioner’s “lifestyle” and what petitioner had told him. The jury found that petitioner was indeed a “dangerous offender,” and the trial court sentenced him accordingly. In post-conviction proceedings, a defense expert was presented who rebutted the court appointed expert’s diagnosis and opined that had that expert reviewed the actual records from petitioner’s time at a juvenile home for boys, that expert would not have been able to accurately diagnose an antisocial personality disorder. (The records at issue had not been obtained by trial counsel. They included a diagnosis of adjustment reactive disorder, rather than conduct disorder.) First, defense counsel’s decision not to investigate petitioner’s background as a juvenile was not a reasonable exercise of professional skill and judgment. Defense counsel was on notice that the court-appointed expert would rely on petitioner’s background as a juvenile to conclude that petitioner had a conduct disorder before age 15 as part of his diagnosis that petitioner had ASPD. And defense counsel was aware that petitioner had had a rough childhood and had been repeatedly exposed to domestic violence at home. Yet defense counsel unreasonably decided not to further investigate petitioner’s juvenile background, such as by securing relevant records. Second, “in light of the nature and complexity of the dangerous-offender sentencing proceeding and the information that defense counsel knew, . . . defense counsel’s decision not to consult an expert concerning [the court-appointed expert’s] diagnosis of petitioner was not a reasonable exercise of professional skill and judgment.” The argument that defense counsel reasonably pursued a strategy of cross-examining the expert to poke holes in his diagnosis fails as it was not an informed strategy. Notably, the cross-examination revealed that defense counsel had identified a significant flaw in the expert’s analysis relating to whether or not petitioner had suffered from a conduct disorder as a juvenile. There was no adequate explanation for why defense counsel failed to undertake further investigation to develop the theory that the expert’s diagnosis was incorrect and based on insufficient evidence. While ultimately choosing against presenting a defense expert might have been reasonable, it was inexplicable why defense counsel did not at least consult with an expert about the apparent weakness in the court-appointed expert’s diagnosis and its unreliability. On the record of this case, adequate counsel “would have gained further information about petitioner’s psychological conditions and juvenile history and consulted with a defense expert in the field of psychology to determine how best to counter [the court-appointed expert’s evidence that petitioner suffered from [ASPD].” In assessing prejudice under Oregon law, various ways are identified that defense counsel could have utilized the information discovered in post-conviction, e.g., counsel could have used the court-appointed expert's failure to obtain relevant records to show that the expert had not been thorough in reaching his opinion, counsel could have confronted the expert with the earlier diagnosis of an adjustment reaction of early adolescence to undermine the expert's explanation that there was indirect evidence that petitioner had a conduct disorder before age 15, and/or counsel could have presented a defense expert's testimony, "to provide the jury with the information that counsel would have learned upon investigation and consultation, including a direct rebuttal of [the court-appointed expert's] diagnosis and an explanation of petitioner's conduct that was not as damaging as [ASPD]." Given the multiple ways that counsel could have used the information developed post-conviction, "there was more than a mere possibility that the jury could have rejected the state's contention that petitioner suffered from a 'severe personality disorder'" had defense counsel performed competently.

2016: Castro v. State, 417 S.C. 77 (S.C. 2016). Trial counsel was ineffective in drug trafficking case for failing to object when the trial judge improperly considered defendant's decision to exercise his right to a jury trial as a factor in sentencing defendant. Prior to trial, defendant was offered a plea bargain that he declined. Immediately before the trial, the trial court reminded defendant that the plea offer was still on the table and remarked, inter alia, "I am inclined to sentence on a plea [to] seven years. I would not be so inclined in the event of trial." Defendant continued to decline the plea offer. He was convicted and at sentencing the trial court stated:

You are different from these other defendants in that they have cooperated and they have acknowledged their responsibility for the crimes that they have committed.

[Defendant], this is, as I said, an extremely serious offense. The State has had to take you to trial on a case where there was overwhelming evidence of your guilt. The jury has found you guilty, and I sentence you to incarceration in the State Department of Corrections for a period of fifteen years.

Trial counsel did not object. Nor did trial counsel complain in the motion for resentencing of the trial court's consideration of defendant's election for a jury trial in sentencing defendant. In denying the motion, the trial court stated, "I certainly don't penalize anybody from going to trial. . . But acceptance of responsibility is, I believe, a valid . . . consideration for [t]he Court" The state supreme court found "the statements made by the trial judge clearly reveal he improperly considered [defendant's] decision to exercise his right to a jury trial in sentencing [defendant]." That the trial court also stated valid reasons for the sentence did not establish that defendant suffered no prejudice from the trial court's improper consideration of defendant's rejection of the plea offer in favor of a trial. Because trial counsel had no strategic basis for failing to object, his performance was deficient. Remand for resentencing.

Richardson v. Belleque*, 373 P.3d 1113 (Ore. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter for failing in sentencing to consult with or call an expert witness to testify in rebuttal to the state's expert who diagnosed antisocial personality disorder. While counsel cross-examined the state's expert, in an attempt to show that the diagnosis was improper, the jury found that the defendant qualified as a dangerous offender. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate to determine what evidence was available. Prejudice was also established. A defense expert with all the available evidence would have opined that the defendant's juvenile records reflected an adjustment disorder due to his mother's abuse rather than a conduct disorder. If the jury had accepted this and not found the dangerous offender status, the defendant would not have been facing a maximum punishment of 30 years and the sentence imposed could have been much reduced.

2015: Davis v. Commissioner of Correction, 126 A.3d 538 (Conn. 2015). Counsel in manslaughter plea case ineffective in sentencing for agreeing with the prosecutor's recommendation of the maximum sentence allowed under the plea agreement even though the agreement contained a provision entitling defense counsel to advocate for a lesser sentence. The Court of Appeals denied relief by applying the prejudice test of Strickland. This was error, however, because there was a complete breakdown in the adversarial process, such that prejudice was presumed under Cronic. The defendant had been charged with murder. Believing that the defendant only had a few prior drug convictions, counsel negotiated the plea agreement to manslaughter with a range of 20-25 years punishment and each party free to argue within that range. Counsel learned from the presentence investigation report (PSI) recommending a 25-year sentence that the defendant had a much more extensive criminal record than he thought. Because counsel believed, based on this information, that 25 years was appropriate, counsel did not argue on the defendant's behalf in sentencing and, instead, affirmatively agreed with the prosecutor's recommendation of the maximum 25-year sentence. It was this affirmative agreement that distinguished this case from Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685 (2002), and revealed the lack of any strategic decision. "The petitioner's sentence was already capped at twenty-five years pursuant to the plea agreement and, thus, assenting to that sentence did nothing to advance the petitioner's interests." Under Cronic, prejudice was presumed.

Lampkin v. State*, 470 S.W.3d 876 (Tex. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in sentencing of driving while intoxicated case for failing to adequately investigate and present mental health mitigation evidence. Counsels' conduct was deficient because counsel had concerns about the defendant's mental health prior to trial, including concern about whether the defendant was competent to stand trial. While counsel's conduct was not deficient in failing to challenge trial competence, counsel was deficient in failing to discovery and present the same evidence as mitigating evidence in sentencing. Counsel did not retain an investigator or speak to family members or even inquire of any jail personnel about whether the defendant was receiving or had received mental health treatment, despite counsels' concerns. This conduct was not reasonable and was not based on strategy. Prejudice was established because the jury was precluded from considering the defendant's mental health history in mitigation where the defendant was facing up to 99 years' confinement for the non-violent offense of driving while intoxicated where no one was injured. The information that the defendant "had been homeless and impoverished, had diminished capacity, suffered from psychotic delusions and major depressive disorders, had attempted suicide, and had a long history of drug abuse" might well have influenced the jury, especially in "cast[ing] a better light" on the defendant's prior convictions.

Director of the Dept. of Corrections v. Kozich*, 779 S.E.2d 555 (Va. 2015). Counsel was ineffective in grand larceny and obtaining money by false pretenses case for failing to timely file a motion to reconsider the sentence, which had been invited by the sentencing judge. In sentencing, counsel submitted some evidence and argued that the defendant's crimes, including his extensive prior criminal record, were a direct result of his drug addictions and, therefore, he should be sentenced to a drug treatment program rather than prison. The judge sentenced the defendant to three consecutive two year terms but added that she would grant leave to file a motion to reconsider if counsel wanted to submit a specific recommendation for an appropriate treatment program. The final sentencing order was issued two and a half weeks later with no mention of leave to file a motion for reconsideration. Counsel did not file the motion to reconsider until more than three months later when the defendant had already been moved to a state penitentiary, which, under state law, deprived the sentencing court of jurisdiction. While there is no right to the effective assistance of counsel to file a post-trial motion to reconsider the sentence after a final sentencing order has been issued, there was a right in this case during the time between the sentencing and issuance of the written order two and a half weeks later. While there may not be a "categorical" right, there was in this case because the motion to reconsider was "expressly invited" by the court during sentencing. Thus, the defendant "remained in a critical stage of his criminal prosecution even after the conclusion of the sentencing hearing." Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to pursue the matter by filing a motion to reconsider and by simultaneously making efforts to ensure that the motion would be heard before entry of the final sentencing order. This could have been accomplished by delayed entry of the sentencing order or by including language in the sentencing order that leave to file a motion to reconsider had been granted and that the matter would be held in abeyance until further order of the court. Prejudice was also established even though it likely would not have been with a different post-conviction judge and just an objective record. Here, however, the post-conviction court was the sentencing court and the judge relied on her own recollections that she had intended to order drug treatment, if the motion to reconsider had been filed, and that she would have reduced the defendant's sentences and ordered his confinement in a drug treatment program, as she did in issuing the writ. While the court questioned "the propriety of a habeas court's reliance on subjective intentions of this kind for purposes of establishing prejudice," the court "accept[ed] the judge at her word" in this case because the state failed to object in post-conviction or to raise the issue on appeal.

Hillman v. Johnson*, 774 S.E.2d 615 (Ga. 2015). Counsel in armed robbery, felon in possession of a firearm, and other offenses case was ineffective in failing to challenge the trial court's imposition of the maximum punishment on the felon in possession charge under the mistaken belief that it was required under state law. While a state statute requires courts to sentence defendants with a prior felony conviction to the maximum time authorized for any subsequent conviction, this statute does not apply to the offense of felon in possession for which the statute authorized a range of one to five years imprisonment. While there was no error and no ineffective assistance of counsel in the trial court's mandatory imposition of the maximum punishments on the other offenses, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to challenge trial court's belief that the maximum sentence was also required for the felon in possession charge. Prejudice was established given the trial court's denial of the state's request for consecutive sentences and the trial court's criticism of the mandatory sentences during the sentencing hearing. Thus, there was a reasonable probability that the trial court would have sentenced the defendant to less than the maximum five years on the felon in possession conviction.

Lopez v. State*, 462 S.W.3d 180 (Tex. Ct. App. 2015). Retained counsel was ineffective in aggravated robbery plea sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. The defendant pled guilty without a recommendation of sentence and was sentenced to 30 years' confinement. Counsel's conduct was deficient. The state had offered a plea deal that included a 15-year sentence, which was the minimum available sentence. On the day of trial, counsel moved to withdraw asserting an inability to communicate with the defendant and that his legal fees had not been paid. Counsel also sought a continuance indicating a need for additional time to prepare and that the defendant had retained new counsel. The record contains no rulings on these motions before the defendant pleaded guilty without a sentencing recommendation. The court ordered a presentence investigation and scheduled sentencing for two months later. Counsel sent the client a letter telling him to collect "good guy" letters to give to the person who interviewed him for the presentence investigation and to meet with counsel 15 minutes before sentencing, along with the people who "support you." Counsel also asked that he "get current" on his fee payments. The defendant gave the investigator one letter from his girlfriend proclaiming his innocence. On the day of sentencing, counsel did not appear and it was rescheduled. Again, counsel did not appear. Without counsel, the defendant asked to withdraw his plea, his bond was revoked, and he was taken into custody to await sentencing. When the next hearing was held with counsel finally in attendance, the plea was not changed and the defendant was sentenced. No mitigation evidence was presented and counsel gave a two sentence statement informing the court that the defendant wanted the minimum sentence and believed that he could be a good "role model." After sentencing, counsel withdrew and new counsel was appointed and filed a motion for new trial alleging ineffective assistance for failure to investigate and present evidence of the defendant's mental health issues. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Trial counsel admitted that he was unaware of this information as counsel conducted no investigation. Instead, as indicated by his letter, counsel tasked the defendant with preparing his own mitigation "without any assistance of counsel." Likewise, counsel received the pre-sentence report 10 days prior to sentencing. The report indicated the defendant "had a below-normal IQ and mental-health diagnoses," but still counsel did not investigate. Even if the defendant had rounded up witnesses, counsel could not have adequately interviewed and prepared these witnesses in 15 minutes just prior to sentencing. Prejudice was also established. New sentencing ordered.

2014: People v. Speight, 174 Cal. Rptr. 3d 454 (Cal. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in murder case sentencing for failing to raise an Eighth Amendment objection to the length of the defendant's 69 years to life sentence because the murder was committed when the defendant was 17-years-old. Under state law, the sentencing court was required to consider mitigating circumstances for juvenile offenders and would have been required to consider the lack of any prior criminal history and remorse if counsel had objected on the basis of cruel and unusual punishment.

State v. Mills*, 137 So. 3d 8 (La. 2014). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for possession of cocaine and possession of drug paraphernalia in that counsel encouraged the court to take into consideration improper factors, which likely enhanced the sentence. In essence, the defendant was facing a 10-year maximum sentence. The defendant desired to avoid the Orleans Parish Prison and be housed in a facility operated by the Department of Corrections. Based on counsel's argument to this effect, the trial court imposed the maximum punishment for the expressed purpose of effectuating the defendant's desires. Prejudice established because without this improper consideration, there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would have received a sentence that was significantly less harsh.

Ex parte Howard*, 425 S.W.3d 323 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing for failing to obtain mental-health experts and present testimony in sentencing concerning the defendant's voluntary intoxication-induced psychosis during his attack of his adult son at the son's home. While the trial court initially found ineffectiveness related to the guilt-phase, the appellate court found no prejudice and remanded for a determination of whether there was prejudice in sentencing. The record supported the trial court's finding of prejudice in sentencing.

In re Williams*, 101 A.3d 151 (Vt. 2014). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following guilty plea to four counts of involuntary manslaughter for failure to provide more than just perfunctory assistance. The defendant, who was 19 years old, was initially charged with four counts of murder and arson after he intentionally set fire to paper in his waste basket in his bedroom. The fire spread and killed occupants of the apartment above, a woman and her three grandchildren. The parties entered a plea agreement amending the original charges to four counts of involuntary manslaughter with a maximum sentence of 50-60 years, but the agreement allowed the defense to argue for a sentence from 20-60 years. A pre-sentence investigation (PSI) report by a probation officer recommended a sentence of 40-60 years, which was imposed by the trial court after hearing a number of "bereaved" victims' family members express their desire for maximum punishment. The PSI had identified mitigation evidence, including petitioner's lack of a criminal record, no drug or alcohol abuse, graduation from high school as a foster child, remorse, efforts to get people out of the burning building, and descriptions by people who knew him as a good, hard-working person. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy because counsel called no witnesses and did not even submit a sentencing memorandum in advance of the hearing "to present his arguments for the minimum sentence in a less hostile and emotionally-charged atmosphere. Instead, he offered a few remarks about petitioner's childhood, essentially repeating the information in the PSI." Attorney experts testified for both the defense and state. The defense attorney expert testified that counsel's conduct was a "gross deviation from the standard of care." Remanded for new sentencing before a different trial judge.

2013: In re Brown, 160 Cal. Rptr. 3d 822 (Cal. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in vandalism case for failing to investigate the legitimacy of a prior strike before advising the defendant in sentencing to admit to the prior strike based on a juvenile adjudication for robbery. The defendant's juvenile adjudication was actually for grand theft, which did not qualify as strike. As a result of the defendant's admission of the strike, however, the trial court doubled the defendant's prison term (four years rather than two). While the state conceded that the defendant's prior did not qualify as a strike and that the defendant was prejudiced by the error, the state, nonetheless, argued that counsel was not ineffective because his investigation was objectively reasonable under prevailing professional norms. This was rejected in light of Lewis v. Lane, 832

F.2d 1446, 1458 (7th Cir.1987) (defense counsel’s conduct in stipulating in capital sentencing to four prior felony convictions based solely on information contained in an ‘FBI rap sheet’ and the defendant’s statements that it was accurate was “shockingly inferior”). Here, counsel allegedly relied on a packet of materials from the state, but neither counsel nor the state had identified the documents or produced them. “Defense counsel has a duty to investigate allegations made against his client, not merely assume their truth.” It was not reasonable for counsel “to assume that his non-lawyer client had the specialized knowledge to understand the specific crime or section of the Penal Code in his prior adjudication as a juvenile. Nor was it reasonable for trial counsel to assume his client could accurately recall exactly what offense or section of the Penal Code was sustained against him in a proceeding that occurred five years prior, when the defendant was only 16-years old.” In addition, even if trial counsel had a reasonable basis for believing the defendant could accurately recall the specific offense underlying his prior adjudication, “counsel had a duty to ensure that the prosecution possessed evidence that would be sufficient to prove the prior strike allegation.”

Johnson v. State, 120 So.3d 629 (Fla. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective murder case for failing to object to the trial court’s consideration of improper factors in sentencing in violation of due process. The trial court imposed the maximum sentence of life in prison with a minimum mandatory of twenty-five years based on the discharge of a firearm. He explained that he was doing so because the defendant, who denied guilt, had shown no remorse. “A sentencing judge may not consider a defendant’s claims of innocence or refusal to admit guilt when imposing sentence.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial. “We are unable to envision any tactical reason that trial counsel would have had for standing mute when the trial judge imposed the harshest sentence available based on improper sentencing factors.”

State v. Phillips, 130 So.3d 146 (La. Ct App. 2013). Counsel in sentencing for armed robbery was ineffective in failing to object to the state’s failure to meet its burden of proof at the habitual offender hearing. Specifically, the state relied on an out-of-state guilty plea but did not prove, as required under state law, that the defendant was represented by counsel during the plea.

State v. Guillory, 120 So. 3d 764 (La. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in possession of firearm by felon case for failing to move to quash the additional habitual offender bill under the fourth offender section. The defendant had three prior offenses but under state law the prior offense used as a basis for the convicted felon offense (possession with intent to distribute) could not also be used as a predicate for the fourth habitual offender status. The state conceded deficient conduct. Prejudice was also clear as the defendant was sentenced to mandatory life under the fourth offender section when he was only a third offender with a sentencing range of 13-40 years rather than a mandatory life sentence.

Levering v. State, 315 P.3d 392 (Okla. Crim. App. 2013). Trial counsel ineffective in sentencing of kidnapping and second-degree rape by instrumentation case for failing to object to admission of prior transactional felony convictions for enhancement purposes. During trial, propensity evidence of sexual assault was admitted, which had resulted in three convictions. These prior convictions were committed on the same day against a single victim. During sentencing these three prior convictions, as well as four additional prior convictions were admitted to enhance the sentence. “In the absence of any instruction explaining the jury’s consideration of propensity evidence in relation to transactional prior convictions, we find that counsel’s deficient performance, combined with the improper admission of all six prior sexual assault convictions, prejudiced Appellant and warrants remand for resentencing.” The jury should have been instructed that the sexual propensity evidence admitted during trial should be considered as a single conviction in sentencing and that the state was required to prove the prior convictions beyond a reasonable doubt.

State v. Phuong*, 299 P.3d 37 (Wash. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in unlawful imprisonment and attempted rape case for failing to argue that these offenses covered the same criminal conduct for purposes of sentencing. The Cambodian defendant and his wife were involved in divorce proceedings when he grabbed her outside his home, drug her inside, and attempted to rape her. During the incident, their children ran to a neighbor’s home for help. The defendant stopped only when the neighbor knocked on the door. Under state sentencing laws, these offenses should not have been considered separately because the defendant’s “objective criminal purpose” for each offense was the same, i.e., his purpose for both offenses was rape.

2012: Radmer v. State, 362 S.W.3d 52 (Mo. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in statutory sodomy sentencing for failing to present evidence of the defendant’s impaired intellectual functioning. The defendant was initially charged with statutory rape in 2003. Counsel retained a psychologist to evaluate whether the defendant had the intellectual capacity to knowingly waive his Miranda rights before confessing. The expert diagnosed adjustment disorder with depressed mood and borderline intellectual functioning. The motion to suppress the statements on this basis was denied, but the charges were dismissed anyway because the alleged victim refused to testify. Four years later, when these charges arose, the same counsel again represented the defendant. In sentencing before the jury, the state presented evidence and argument that the defendant was a pedophile. In response, counsel presented two family members and an employer to testify, but presented no evidence about the defendant’s “impaired intellectual functioning.” Before the judge, prior to imposition of the 90 year sentences, counsel argued that the pre-sentence report might be inaccurate because it was based on the defendant’s statements. He noted specifically that the defendant had a low IQ and may not have understood the questions asked of him. He also asked the judge to “remember” that the defendant has “mental deficits.” If counsel had called the psychologist that examined the defendant previously, he would have testified that the defendant has an IQ of 75 and “his functioning age was ten years old.” He also testified that “a person with borderline intellectual functioning who behaves sexually inappropriately is different than a pedophile” and would be amenable to treatment.

Ex parte Rogers*, 369 S.W.3d 858 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in jury sentencing for attempted aggravated sexual assault for failing to object to prior bad acts evidence from a former rape victim. The crime charged was essentially hiding in the women’s room of an office building and assaulting a woman who came in by pinning her against the wall with a knife to her throat. She escaped and the defendant was arrested. He possessed at the time nylon rope, duct tape, handcuffs, and gloves. During sentencing, the jury heard evidence of a similar crime in a different office building bathroom 11 years before. The jury also heard, however, about an extraneous offense where a woman was raped in her apartment after a man broke through the glass of her window from a balcony. Her arms, legs, and eyes were duct taped and she was raped twice and cleaned afterwards with bleach or a similar cleaning substance. The defendant was matched to this crime because of his possession of duct tape when arrested in the current case. He was put in a lineup and identified by the prior rape victim. At the time of sentencing in this case, the defendant had been indicted for the prior rape, but those charges were dismissed after this trial because the actual rapist in the prior case was identified through “CODIS (the FBI’s combined DNA index system).” That person pled guilty to the prior rape. Counsel’s conduct was ineffective in failing to investigate and object to this prior rape evidence in sentencing. If counsel had investigated, counsel would have learned that the defendant was wearing an electronic monitor from a deferred adjudication at the time of the prior rape. The monitoring records established that the defendant was at home five miles away at the time of the apartment rape. Prejudice established as this “emotional testimony” was “likely particularly inflammatory to the jury.”

2011: People v. Roberts, 125 Cal. Rptr. 3d 810 (Cal. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in assault on officer case for failing to object to statements from the underlying proceeding in the sentencing findings under the Three Strikes Law. The State enhanced punishment with a prior felony conviction for second degree assault from Washington. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to transcripts of unsworn statements following the defendant’s Washington plea. Enhancement required showing that the defendant had personally inflicted “great bodily harm.” When the record does not disclose the underlying facts, the court presumes the prior conviction was for the least offense punishable under the foreign law. The elements of the prior conviction in Washington were most similar to California crimes that did not qualify as a strike under the Three Strike Law. The documents showing conviction in Washington did not provide details of the underlying offense and alleged only infliction of “substantial bodily harm.” Washington law distinguishes between “substantial bodily harm” and “great bodily harm.” Even if they were the same, Washington law allows conviction for second degree assault without the defendant having personally inflicted the harm. The state thus had to rely on the specific underlying facts. Under state law, the court could consider “otherwise admissible evidence from the entire record of the conviction.” Here, the defendant’s statements, his counsel’s statements, and the alleged victim’s statements made after the court had accepted the Alford plea and were not “part of the record of conviction” and should not have been relied on to establish a strike. While counsel objected to this evidence as hearsay, he did not object of this basis even though state law had been established on this point almost three years prior to trial. As counsel did object, albeit on the wrong ground, there clearly was no tactical reason for failing to make this meritorious objection to the same evidence. Prejudice established as the evidence supporting the enhancement was clearly insufficient without this evidence.

Velazquez v. State*, 70 So. 3d 741 (Fla. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for violation of probation for failing to object when the trial court announced a sentence greater than that intended. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the trial court said several times on the record that the court intended to impose a six-year sentence with credit for three years time served. In announcing three consecutive five-year sentences with credit for three years on each, the court actually required the defendant to serve six years instead of the intended three, but counsel failed to recognize this fact and object. The prejudice was “patent.”

Capital Case*

Fegley v. Commonwealth*, 337 S.W.3d 657 (Ky. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sentencing on six counts of complicity to first-degree robbery for failing to object to erroneous testimony of a probation and parole officer that the maximum possible sentence was 120 years when it was actually “only 70 years.” The state asked for a sentence “in the middle” of 60 years, which was returned by the jury.

State v. Hess*, 23 A.3d 373 (N.J. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for aggravated manslaughter in failing to present relevant Battered Women’s Syndrome mitigation evidence and failing to object to lengthy, unduly prejudicial victim-impact video. The defendant shot and killed her husband, a police officer, in his bed. “The only issue was, why.” After going to work, the defendant called authorities. In her initial statement she described a history of domestic violence, psychological belittlement, and victimization leading up to the killing. She said that she had only intended to scare the victim by pointing a gun at his head, as he had done to her the evening before, but it went off accidentally. The day after her arrest, the defendant was admitted to a psychiatric hospital for four days due to suicidal ideations. A defense investigator interviewed nine friends and co-workers who corroborated the victim’s physical abuse, threats, and attempts to dominate and control the defendant. Nonetheless, a year and a half later, counsel allowed the prosecutor and a detective to take a second statement from the defendant in counsel’s absence. In this one, with prompting and leading by the prosecutor, the defendant “downplayed the level of abuse” and said that she had decided to kill the victim the night before. The defendant entered a negotiated plea agreement that included: (1) a 30-year sentence, subject to service of 25; (2) defendant’s concession that aggravating factors outweighed the mitigating factors; and (3) defendant’s agreement that neither she nor her attorney would seek a lesser term of imprisonment. After hearing a “tour-de-force presentation” by the state and no evidence or argument by the defense, the court imposed the agreed upon sentence. Counsel was ineffective in failing to present the substantial mitigation evidence the investigator had developed. Nothing in the plea agreement prohibited counsel from presenting the evidence or arguing that the defendant was “a physically and psychologically battered woman to explain her motivations.” In addition to the Battered Women’s Syndrome evidence, there were four other mitigating factors, including provocation by the victim, that the evidence would have supported. To the extent counsel believed he was “handcuffed by the restrictive plea agreement,” the agreement itself was improper and the court had expressly prohibited “this type of gag provision” less than a year after this plea. This type of agreement deprives the court of necessary information in order to impose an appropriate sentence. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to object to the victim-impact video. “The music [religious and pop] and the photographs of the victim’s childhood and of his tombstone, and the television segment about his funeral do not project anything meaningful about the victim’s life as it related to his family and others at the time of his death.” While the court would not have found prejudice only with respect to the video, the court discussed this in order to resolve the issue on remand. The restrictions on defense counsel in the plea agreement was stricken. The State was free to hold a new sentencing without the restrictions or to vacate the plea.

State v. Rowe*, 965 N.E.2d 1047 (Ohio Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in vehicular homicide case for failing to move the sentencing court to waive the imposition of court costs based upon the defendant’s indigence.

Capital Case*

Branch v. State*, 335 S.W.3d 893 (Tex. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for possession of cocaine with intent to deliver case for failing to object to the prosecutor's improper statements about the way in which parole law would affect the sentence during closing arguments. While the jury was instructed and the prosecutor could properly generally address parole law, the State here commented specifically on how the parole law and good-conduct time would affect this particular defendant. Instead of addressing when he would be eligible for parole, the State affirmatively argued in language of certainty that he would be released by a certain time. These comments were an inaccurate statement of the law, inappropriate, and prejudicial. Two trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object. The first testified that he recognized objectionable but did not object because second counsel was handling sentencing. The second counsel stated objectionable and that he had simply missed the argument when it was made and had no trial strategy not to object. Even if there was an alleged strategy, "[t]here can be no reasonable trial strategy in failing to correct a misstatement of law that is detrimental to the client." Prejudice established as jury was misled into believing that a life sentence would result in the defendant serving only seven to twenty years.

2010: Gonzalez v. Commissioner of Correction, 1 A.3d 705 (Conn. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in threat and violation of protective order case due to counsel's failure to take adequate steps to ensure that the defendant received sentencing credit for all time served in pretrial confinement. The defendant was initially arrested on a threat charge, but was released the same day on a $500 nonsurety bond. A month later he was arrested on a breach of peace and violation of protective order charge. Bond was set at $35,000 and he remained in confinement for several weeks until the court reduced his bond to a promise to appear. Six months later the defendant was arrested for the third time on violation of protective order and harassment charges. Bond was set at $65,000 and the defendant remained in confinement thereafter. After 73 days had passed since his third arrest, counsel moved successfully to increase the defendant's first two bonds so the defendant could get presentence confinement credit for those arrests. When the defendant entered guilty pleas on charges involved in the first two arrests and received some confinement time, counsel did not request presentence confinement credit for the 73 days counsel had waited in filing the motion to increase the bond. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, under state law, the defendant could get presentence confinement credit only if inability to obtain bail or the denial of bail was the reason the defendant remained in confinement. Thus, "a reasonably competent attorney not only would have known to ask for an increase in bond, but also would have asked for bond to be increased during the . . . third arraignment, not two and one-half months later." Prejudice established as the defendant was entitled to credit for the 73 days.

Hernandez v. State*, 30 So. 3d 610 (Fla. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to object to the trial court's reclassification of the conviction from a second-degree felony to a first-degree felony. The trial court's instructions and the jury verdict form failed to distinguish between aggravated battery causing great bodily harm and aggravated battery using a deadly weapon. Either would be a 2d degree felony, except the court can reclassify to a 1st degree felony when a firearm is used, except where the firearm is already an essential element of the crime. Here, the record was unclear and the court's reclassification resulted in an illegal sentence. Remanded for resentencing as 2d degree felony.

Patterson v. State*, 926 N.E.2d 90 (Ind. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel in drug case was ineffective in failing to move to recuse the sentencing judge, who had previously signed the information and participated in the probable cause hearing ten years before as a prosecutor. The delay was caused by the defendant's failure to appear for sentencing following his guilty plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial, as the judge should have recused himself. Likewise, even though the 10 year sentence imposed was within the maximum of 10 years agreed to in the plea agreement, the denial of the right to an impartial judge only established prejudice.

Vaca v. State*, 314 S.W.3d 331 (Mo. 2010). Counsel ineffective in robbery and assault sentencing for failing to consider whether to call a psychiatrist as a witness to present evidence of the defendant's low intelligence and mental health issues. By the time of counsel's appointment, the jail psychiatrist had already seen the defendant and prescribed medications for him because he suspected mental illness. Aware of this, counsel retained a psychologist to evaluate competence to stand trial and diminished capacity. The defendant had an IQ of 73, which was confirmed by his school records. Testing suggested the presence of schizophrenia and Social Security Administration records revealed that the defendant was on disability due in part to schizophrenia. Medical records revealed prior head traumas. Counsel knew from the beginning that the state's evidence was "substantial" and that the case "would probably be going to the sentencing phase." "Because defense counsel conceded that conviction was probable, he knew that strategy during the sentencing phase was vital to the representation of his client." Prior to the defense case, the state moved successfully to preclude any mental condition evidence due to counsel's failure to provide notice to the state. Counsel's theory during trial was complete innocence due to misidentification by key witnesses. He attempted to elicit testimony from the defendant's brother about his mental condition, however, but was prevented from doing so. Counsel never attempted to call his psychologist or present his report. During deliberations, the jury sent out four questions asking about the defendant's housing since arrest, psychological testing, and medications. These questions went unanswered. In sentencing, counsel again did not call the psychologist or submit his report. Counsel simply failed to consider whether to call the expert. "This omission, in front of this particular jury, undermines . . . confidence in the sentencing phase's outcome." In short, "the holding of this case is not that counsel was ineffective for not calling [the expert]. Rather, this case rests on the fact that the question of whether to call [the expert] was never considered."

Boan v. State*, 695 S.E.2d 850 (S.C. 2010). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct and lewd acts case for failing to move for clarification of the sentence when the trial court announced a twenty year sentence on the most serious charge but signed a sentencing order increasing the sentence to thirty years. Prejudice was clear as, ruling on this issue of first impression, the oral pronouncement controls.

DeLeon v. State*, 322 S.W.3d 375 (Tex. Ct. App. 2010). Trial counsel ineffective in sentencing of indecency with a child by sexual contact case for calling as an expert witness a probation officer who gave highly inflammatory testimony about risks posed by sex offenders on probation. Counsel was pleading for probation and presented the officer to testify about treatment for sex offenders on probation and the protections in place in the community. On cross-examination, however, he testified that a sex offender will always have the sex offender impulses and "[i]f you want to protect the public, then you put them in a situation where they can't have access to children." Counsel's conduct was deficient in calling this witness in the first place and in failing to object to this highly inflammatory testimony. Prejudice established, given the nature of this testimony, the emphasis placed upon it (with more than half of the sentencing transcript covered by this testimony), and that this witness was the only expert in sentencing.

Ex parte Harrington*, 310 S.W.3d 452 (Tex. Crim. App. 2010). Counsel ineffectiveness in felony driving while intoxicated (DWI) plea case, due to counsel's failure to investigate a prior DWI conviction used to enhance the defendant's misdemeanor DWI to a felony charge. The indictment listed prior DWI convictions in 1986 and 2003 for purposed of enhancement. The defendant informed counsel that the 1986 conviction was not his. A man who had stolen his driver's license used it when he was arrested and was convicted using his name. Nonetheless, counsel failed to investigate and the defendant pled guilty. Subsequently, a police department fingerprint analysis confirmed that the defendant was not person attached to the 1986 conviction. There was a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have entered a plea to the felony charge if counsel had performed adequately.

State v. Ott*, 247 P.3d 344 (Utah Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in non-capital murder case for failing to object to inadmissible victim-impact evidence in jury sentencing where the defendant could be sentenced to life with or without the possibility of parole. Specifically, counsel failed to object to a six-minute videotape of pictures of the victim set to "moving music," and testimony of family members about the impact on them and their opinions of the defendant's character and the appropriate sentence. The opinions of the defendant's character (i.e. that he could not be rehabilitated) and opinions on the appropriate sentence were "at odds with United States Supreme Court precedent" in Payne and Booth. Thus, counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice also established.

2009: People v. Heinz, 910 N.E.2d 610 (Ill. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in burglary and theft case for failing to object to restitution order in sentencing. The defendant was ordered to pay $7,000 in restitution following convictions from breaking into and stealing from a bowling alley. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy because the State's restitution request "was cursory at best" and the supporting evidence was inconsistent, ambiguous, vague, or completely absent. Counsel's conduct was deficient in "remaining silent under these circumstances." Prejudice found because if counsel had objected, the trial court would have held a hearing to determine the actual amount of damages.

Farris v. State*, 907 N.E.2d 985 (Ind. 2009). Counsel ineffective for failing to challenge consecutive habitual offender sentence. Defendant was initially charged with robbery and while pending trial was charged with murder committed by someone he hired and who was attempting to kill his robbery co-defendant who was cooperating with the state. The defendant was convicted first of the robbery and his sentence was enhanced by 30 years as a habitual offender. Following his murder conviction, his sentence in that case was also enhanced by 30 years and ordered to run consecutive to sentence in robbery case. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because state case law from at least seven years before the defendant's offenses or trial prohibited the state from seeking multiple enhancements by bringing successive prosecutions for charges that could have been consolidated for trial. These charges could have been consolidated because they were based on a “series of acts connected together” as required by statute.

In re A.E.*, 922 N.E.2d 1017 (Ohio Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in juvenile sex offender case for failing to advise the juvenile and the court of the proper classification procedures related to the statutory duty to register as a sex offender for the rest of the juvenile’s life and failing to advocate on the defendant’s behalf. The defendant was 15 and had no prior sex offense adjudications. Under state law, registrations requirements for a 14-15 year old with no prior sex offense adjudications was discretionary. Nonetheless, defense counsel sat silently in court when the court stated incorrectly that registration for the juvenile would be mandatory. Even assuming that counsel and the court understood the discretionary nature of the determination, counsel made no argument that the court should decline registration requirements or that the court should consider the mandatory factors listed in the state statute.

Gordon v. Hall*, 221 P.3d 763 (Ore. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in sentencing of first degree sexual abuse case where the defendant was given an enhanced sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole (LWOP). Under state law, the presumptive sentence for a felony sex crime was LWOP if the defendant had been “sentenced” for two prior felony sex crimes. The state presented evidence of two prior sex “convictions” and counsel did not challenge this evidence, despite informing the court that the defendant did not believe he had a second conviction. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to investigate the defendant’s prior criminal record and in failing to challenge the imposition of the enhanced sentence. First, the plain text of the statute required two prior “sentences” for the enhancement. Second, while counsel discussed prior “convictions” with the defendant, he did not discuss prior “sentences” with him and “failed to look beyond the face of the documents offered by the prosecutor to determine whether they had actually involved the imposition of sentences.” Third, counsel failed to object to the enhanced sentence on the basis that the state had failed to prove two prior “sentences.” The defendant was prejudiced because one of his prior convictions did not result in the imposition of a sentence because his sentence was suspended and he was placed on probation in California. At the completion of the probation, the court sentence aside the guilty plea, entered a not guilty plea, and dismissed the complaint. Thus, no prison sentence was ever imposed. Under the applicable law at the time in both California and Oregon, “probation was not a sentence.” Thus, the defendant did not have two prior sentences for felony sex offenses and the presumptive LWOP sentence did not apply to him.

Ex parte Lane*, 303 S.W.3d 702 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in methamphetamine sentencing for failing to object to improper testimony during the trial and sentencing about “the methamphetamine problem.” During trial, counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to object to an officer’s testimony “that there is a methamphetamine epidemic in Texas.” Counsel’s conduct was also deficient in failing to object to the prosecutor’s closing argument, which was not supported by evidence, asserting that the defendant was bringing methamphetamine into the county to poison the children and turn them into addicts and that children were in fact shooting up and smoking methamphetamine. The defendant suffered no prejudice during trial, but counsel’s deficient conduct continued in sentencing. Counsel failed to object to testimony by a DEA agent about the societal problems caused by methamphetamine. Counsel also failed to request pre-trial notice of the State’s experts, including the DEA agent, to properly object to his testimony about addiction and that 45,000 people could get high from the amount of methamphetamine possessed by the defendant, and to call an expert in rebuttal. The DEA agent was not qualified to testify about the addictive nature of the drug or about the number of people who could get high on the amount possessed by the defendant. Prejudice was established as the state asked for and obtained a life sentence, relying heavily on the objectionable testimony and argument in both phases of the trial.

Ramirez v. State*, 301 S.W.3d 410 (Tex. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in intoxication manslaughter sentencing for failing to elect jury sentencing based on counsel's misunderstanding of the law. The state alleged use of a vehicle as a "deadly weapon," which, if found by the jury, meant that only the jury (and not the judge) could assess a punishment of probation in sentencing. In order for the jury to be eligible to assess probation, defense counsel was required to file a sworn motion prior to voir dire that the defendant had not previously been convicted of a felony. Here, counsel filed the sworn statement, but failed to elect jury sentencing prior to voir dire, which meant under state law that the jury could assess punishment only if the prosecutor consented. Counsel did this because she believed the defendant could get probation if he had judge sentencing and she advised the defendant that he would have a better chance of getting probation before the judge. When counsel learned of her error, she met with the prosecutor in an attempt to resolve the problem. The state did consent to jury sentencing, but only on the condition the defendant waive his right to appeal on the basis that the jury had not been asked any questions relating to punishment in voir dire. Defense counsel believed she could not do this, but failed to even consult with the defendant about it. The prosecutor, who had offered a probationary sentence in pre-trial and post-guilty verdict negotiations, then agreed to a 10 year probationary sentence, but the trial court refused to accept this agreement and sentenced the defendant to 18 years' confinement. Counsel's conduct was admittedly deficient as it was "based on her misunderstanding of the law" and precluded a probationary sentence even though counsel argued that the defendant was "a good candidate for probation." Prejudice was also clear in that the jury may well have assessed probation as evidenced by the prosecutor's actions in the case in attempting to negotiate for a probationary sentence even after the guilty verdict. The prosecutor also testified in post-conviction that the victim's family agreed that probation was an appropriate punishment.

State v. Bounhiza*, 294 S.W.3d 780 (Tex. Ct. App. 2009). Trial court did not err in granting a motion for mistrial in sexual assault case based on ineffective assistance of counsel. Prior to trial, the defendant filed an application for probation. After conviction, however, the parties realized that the trial court was statutorily prohibited from considering probation as a sentence. The punishment range was 2-20 years. Counsel conceded his error and that he had incorrectly advised the defendant to choose the court rather than the jury for sentencing based on this error.

State v. Adamy*, 213 P.3d 627 (Wash. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in child rape and assault case for failing to advise the court that it could consider a special sex offender sentencing alternative (SSOSA) under state law, despite a federal immigration hold. The defendant's parents were U.S. citizens and he always believed he was as well but learned shortly before the charges were filed that he had been born during a visit to Mexico and his mother had never filled out the required paperwork for citizenship. The defendant pled guilty and the state agreed he could seek a SSOSA if he was, in fact, a citizen and eligible. The court denied the SSOSA believing it could not grant a SSOSA because the defendant was subject to a deportation order. Under state law, however, the court could have sentenced under SSOSA regardless of the defendant's citizenship or immigration status. Counsel's conduct "was deficient for failing to recognize and cite the appropriate case law . . . to the sentencing court." Prejudice shown.

In re Personal Restraint Petition of Crawford*, 209 P.3d 507 (Wash. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following robbery and assault convictions for failing to challenge the use of an out-of-state conviction in designating the defendant as a persistent offender, which resulted in a sentence of life without parole. The prior conviction was for sex abuse in Kentucky. State law required the court to classify this according to the comparable offense in Washington law, based on the elements of the offense (legal comparability) or based on the defendant's conduct as evidenced by the indictment or information (factual comparability). Here, the Washington statute included several elements that the Kentucky statute did not and, although the defendant's conduct almost certainly violated the Washington statute, the necessary information to establish the elements was not contained in the Kentucky documents. Thus, counsel's conduct was deficient and the defendant was prejudiced because the Kentucky offense was improperly counted as a strike under the persistent offender statute.

2008: Thompson v. State, 990 So. 2d 482 (Fla. 2008). Counsel ineffective in burglary, false imprisonment, and sexual battery case for failing to timely move to disqualify the presiding judge from sentencing. Prior to trial, counsel moved to withdraw stating the defendant had threatened to kill him, his family, and anyone associated with the case following conviction. The defendant denied the allegations and the motion was denied based on the court's finding that he would likely be sentenced to life and unable to carry out his threat if he was convicted. Counsel filed a motion to disqualify the court 14 days later, which was denied as untimely under state rules requiring that a motion for disqualification be made within 10 days after the discovery of the facts constituting the grounds for disqualification. Following conviction, the court sentenced the defendant to concurrent life sentences. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy. Prejudice found because "the statements made by the judge . . . sufficiently evince judicial bias and predisposition so as to undermine confidence in the eventual sentence imposed."

Robinson v. State*, 669 S.E.2d 588 (S.C. 2008). Counsel ineffective following plea to drug trafficking offense for failing to challenge the use of a prior uncounseled magistrate court conviction to enhance the sentence, which resulted in a 20 year sentence. Prejudice found even though the sentence imposed was less than the maximum allowable punishment for a first trafficking offense. No sentencing ordered.

Lair v. State*, 265 S.W.3d 580 (Tex. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sentencing in possession of ecstasy case. Counsel presented only the defendant's sister-in-law to testify, despite the availability and willingness of over twenty witnesses, including the defendant's mother, relatives, and neighbors, who would have given good character type evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he "did not even interview these witnesses, let alone present their testimony at the punishment hearing. This fact . . . necessarily defeats counsel's subsequent representation that the testimony of these additional witnesses would have been merely cumulative since, without conducting any sort of investigation into their testimony, he could not know whether the testimony was cumulative or not.” Counsel’s alleged concern about the state cross-examining these witnesses with the defendant’s prior 50-year sentence also did not explain the failure because the jurors were already aware of the prior sentence. Prejudice found because the evidence the jury heard “was brief and lacking in the detail and information that the additional witnesses would have offered.” In addition, the jury sentenced the defendant to 70 years when the State had requested only a 50 year sentence.

2007: Pettis v. State, 212 S.W.3d 189 (Mo. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following guilty plea to possession of a controlled substance within a correctional institution for affirmatively misstating the parole consequences of a consecutive sentence to the court. The defendant was serving a life sentence and had been approved for parole prior to these charges. Following these charges, his parole was cancelled and a new parole hearing was scheduled. The defendant entered a plea in this case pursuant to an agreement wherein the state agreed to maximum of five years but left to the court the determination of whether the sentence should be concurrent or consecutive to the life sentence. During the sentencing, the court inquired about the impact on parole and clearly wanted to impose a sentence with some deterrent effect but also to show some leniency to the defendant. In response to the court’s inquiries, counsel stated that his “release date is to going to be pushed backward” and urged the court not to impose a consecutive sentence. The court gave the defendant a sentence of four years consecutive. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel affirmatively misstated the real consequence, which was that a consecutive sentence of any length effectively converted the life sentence to one of life without parole. Prejudice was clear because the court had no inkling the defendant’s parole eligibility would be extinguished by a consecutive sentence when the court clearly wanted to show some leniency in sentencing the defendant to four years rather than the five recommended by the state.

State ex rel. Shelton v. Painter*, 655 S.E.2d 794 (W. Va. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sentencing of murder case for several reasons. The jury returned a verdict of murder without a recommendation of mercy, which resulted in a life sentence without parole eligibility. While the defendant testified and conceded his guilt, counsel’s conduct violated the duty of loyalty by, among other things, expressing that he “did not know” whether the defendant “even deserved mercy”; distanced himself from the defendant with suggestions that it was his duty, or his job to ask for mercy; and reminding the jury that it had no obligation to recommend mercy. The court also noted that counsel overly emphasized the defendant’s guilt in argument, failed to request bifurcation for sentencing, and failed to make even a minimal effort to obtain a life with mercy verdict. Prejudice found and remanded for a jury trial limited only to the question of whether mercy should or should not be granted

State v. Thiefaulst*, 158 P.3d 580 (Wash. 2007). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following indecent liberties and attempted rape convictions for failing to object to the sentencing court’s comparability analysis regarding the defendant’s prior Montana conviction for attempted robbery, which led to the sentencing court counting that offense as a strike under the Persistent Offender Accountability Act (allowing a life without parole sentence based on three prior convictions or “strikes”) and sentencing the defendant to life without parole. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the Montana offense was broader than its Washington counterpart because the Montana statute required a lesser mens rea.

Capital Case*

There was also insufficient evidence in the record for the court to factually compare the offense to make a proper comparability determination. Prejudice found because counting the Montana offense as a strike allowed the court to sentence the defendant to life without parole.

2006: People v. Thimmies, 41 Cal. Rptr. 3d 925 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for felony drug case for failing to advise the court that the defendant had been warned of the consequences of his prior conviction and the Three Strikes Law prior to the defendant's no contest plea in exchange for a sentence of 32 months. The strike offense admitted was a 1999 criminal threat for which the defendant was sentenced to probation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the trial court assumed that the defendant had been advised that the 1999 conviction would count under the Three Strikes Law even though criminal threat was not included for purposes of that provision until 2000. Prejudice found because the trial court was permitted to decline to apply the Three Strikes Law and had stated that the case was "a pitiful one," but applied the law based on the assumption that the defendant had previously been advised of the consequences.

People v. Le*, 39 Cal. Rptr. 3d 146 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in robbery and burglary case for failing to object based on double jeopardy to consideration of both offenses in calculating the restitution fine. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because state law precluded multiple punishment for a single act or omission and the defendant's sole intent was to steal from a drugstore. Thus, the defendant should have been sentenced solely on the robbery conviction but the burglary conviction was included, which essentially doubled the restitution fine.

Estrada v. State*, 149 P.3d 833 (Idaho 2006). Counsel ineffective in plea to rape case for failing to advise the defendant of his right to refuse to cooperate with a court-ordered psychosexual evaluation for purposes of sentencing. After accepting the plea, the trial court ordered a psychosexual evaluation of the defendant, which counsel informed the defendant must be completed, even though the defendant initially refused to participate. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to advise the defendant that he still retained his right against self-incrimination following his plea and he was not required to participate in the psychosexual evaluation. Prejudice found because the sentencing judge's specific, repeated references to the psychosexual evaluation suggest that it played an important role in the sentencing and the evaluation report included a number of unfavorable and derogatory comments, including references to the defendant's potential for future violent actions.

2005: Matthews v. State, 868 A.2d 895 (Md. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective and prejudice presumed in probation violation case for failing to file a motion for modification of sentence when requested to do so by the defendant. Defendant entitled to file a belated motion for modification of sentence.

Shanklin v. State*, 190 S.W.3d 154 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in punishment phase of non-capital murder case for failing to investigate or present evidence from at least 20 available witnesses and instead called only the defendant to testify that he was sorry. The prosecutor requested a sentence of 25 to 35 years but the jury imposed a sentence twice that length. The available witnesses would have testified that the defendant was an excellent father, helped his friends and relatives, and worked hard.

Freeman v. State*, 167 S.W.3d 114 (Tex. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in sentencing on aggravated sexual assault charge for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence of the defendant's history of mental illness. While counsel was aware that the defendant had previously been hospitalized on a couple of occasions (and the defendant testified about this during trial), counsel presented only testimony from the defendant's mother in sentencing asking the jury to take his illness into account. If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have shown that the defendant had another prior hospitalization following an attempted suicide and had been receiving regular outpatient treatment for more than a year prior to the crime. He had last been seen three weeks before the crime. Counsel's conduct was deficient under Wiggins because counsel failed to investigate and there was no strategy for this failure. Prejudice was found because counsel only presented lay testimony from the defendant and his mother on this issue. Although "it is sheer speculation" that the jury would have given a lighter sentence if additional evidence had been presented, the court found a reasonable probability of a different outcome.

Andrews v. State*, 159 S.W.3d 98 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in sentencing for indecency and sexual assault of child case for failing to object to the prosecutor's argument that the defendant's sentences could not be made consecutive, which was a misstatement of law and contrary to the state's pretrial motion asking to make the sentences consecutive or cumulative. Counsel's conduct was deficient (and could not be explained by trial strategy) because "counsel has a duty to correct misstatements of law that are detrimental to his client." Prejudice was found because the argument left the jury with the false impression that the maximum the defendant would serve was 20 years when the maximum sentence was actually 80 years.

2004: Barger v. State, 895 So. 2d 385 (Ala. Crim. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in theft case for failing to appear at the restitution hearing, which was "a component of the criminal-sentencing proceeding." Remanded for new restitution hearing.

McCarty v. State*, 802 N.E.2d 959 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in failing to prepare and present mitigating evidence in sentencing following the defendant's plea to child molestation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he met with the defendant only once, conducted no investigation, and did not retain an investigator or mental health expert. Prejudice was found because adequate investigation and presentation would have revealed that the defendant was mentally retarded, he had been molested himself as a child, there was a likelihood that he could be successfully rehabilitated, and his confession admitted acts beyond what the victims had reported. Because of the trial court's reluctance to find prejudice and grant relief, the court exercised its state constitutional authority to revise the defendant's sentence and reduced his sentence by 10 years to the presumptive term of 30 years.

Storr v. State*, 126 S.W.3d 647 (Tex. Crim. App. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in sentencing in aggravated kidnaping case for failing to obtain an instruction on voluntary release of kidnaping victim in a safe place. The defendant was charged with aggravated kidnaping, which is a felony in the first degree. Under state law, however, if the defendant raises the issue of voluntary release of the victim at the punishment stage and proves that by a preponderance of the evidence, the offense is a felony in the second degree. The first degree felony is punishable by imprisonment of 5 to 99 year. The second degree felony is punishable by a term of 2 to 20 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to request the instruction because the evidence conclusively established that the appellant voluntarily released the victim in a safe place. The victim was left in his car at a post office which is exactly the point where he had been abducted to start with. The court found that it was inconceivable that counsel had some trial strategy for not requesting an instruction on safe release given the significant difference in punishment. Prejudice found because the defendant was sentenced to 35 years which is 15 years more than the maximum imprisonment allowed for the second degree felony.

State v. Saunders*, 86 P.3d 232 (Wash. Ct. App. 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in sentencing in murder, rape, and kidnapping case for failing to argue that rape and kidnapping constituted the "same criminal conduct" for purposes of calculating offender score. "Same criminal conduct" refers to the situation where there are two or more crimes that (1) require the same criminal intent, (2) are committed at the same time and place, and (3) involve the same victim. Here, the primary motivation for sexually assaulting the victim by inserting a television antenna in her anus was to dominate her and to cause her pain and humiliation. Because this intent arguably was similar to the motivation for the kidnap, defense counsel was deficient for failing to make this argument. Prejudice was found because the case law provides strong support for this argument. New sentencing granted.

2003: Carswell v. State, 589 S.E.2d 605 (Ga. Ct. App. 2003). Counsel's performance was deficient in an aggravated assault case for failing to object to two prior convictions used by the state in aggravation of sentence because those guilty pleas may not have been entered into voluntarily. Because the court found that reversal was required on the substantive issue, the court found that the question of prejudice with respect to the ineffectiveness of counsel was moot.

IV. ADVISING CLIENT

A. GUILTY PLEA AFTER INADEQUATE INVESTIGATION OR RESEARCH

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2018: United States v. Shepherd, 880 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 2018). In case involving a guilty plea to the federal crime of failing to register and update registration as a sex offender, trial counsel was ineffective for not adequately investigating whether one of petitioner's prior out-of-state sex offenses had required petitioner to register as a sex offender in Texas where he had relocated to. In 2002, petitioner pleaded guilty in Arizona state court to a charge of attempted public sexual indecency, and was required by the terms of the plea (but not by law) to register as a sex offender. In 2006, he was charged and pleaded guilty in Nevada state court to a charge of indecent exposure, and was required under Nevada law to register for life as a sex offender. In 2011, petitioner moved to Texas and did not register as a sex offender. In 2012, a U.S. Marshal criminal investigator was notified that petitioner was an unregistered sex offender. Petitioner was not listed on Texas's registry of sex offenders, and the marshal requested documents from Arizona and Nevada regarding petitioner. The Texas Department of Public Safety (DPS) reviewed them and informed the marshal that only the Arizona offense would require registration. Petitioner was then charged with knowingly failing to register and update his registration. He pleaded guilty in September 2012, upon advice of counsel, an assistant federal public defender. Petitioner was sentenced to 24 months in prison and 30 years supervised release. After he was released from prison, petitioner attempted to register as a sex offender in Texas, but he was told by DPS that he was not required to register based on his Arizona or Nevada convictions. Petitioner then filed a motion under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 to vacate his sentence, alleging that he never was under a duty to register in Texas and that his trial attorney was ineffective for failing to raise that claim. The DPS informed the court that before August 30, 2012 (which was prior to petitioner's guilty plea), DPS determined whether an out-of-state offense was substantially similar to a reportable Texas offense by looking at both the elements and the facts of that offense, but after August 30, 2012 (at the time petitioner pleaded guilty), following the decision in Texas Department of Public Safety v. Anonymous Adult Texas Resident, DPS was restricted to comparing the elements of the out-of-state offense with the elements of the Texas reportable offense. The magistrate judge determined that petitioner would not have had to report, but the district court rejected that recommendation and denied the 2255 motion, finding that the Arizona and Texas statutes were substantially similar. The Fifth Circuit determined that counsel's performance was deficient because counsel only compared the Arizona statute with the Texas statute before recommending that petitioner plead guilty; he did not review case law, he did not know which statutes of each state to compare, and he did not talk to anyone from DPS about their determination that petitioner was supposed to register. "[C]ounsel's lack of inquiry beyond comparing the two statutes is IAC." He made no independent investigation of the facts or law, which would have led him to Anonymous Adult and the correct standard. Petitioner was prejudiced by counsel's deficient performance; counsel admitted that had he read Anonymous Adult he would have filed a motion to dismiss and if that failed, he would have advised petitioner to go to trial. This is true even though Anonymous Adult was decided in the middle of counsel's representation of petitioner. The Fifth Circuit also determined that the district court's conclusion that the Arizona and Texas statutes are substantially similar is incorrect, because there is ambiguity as to whether petitioner pleaded guilty in Arizona to public sexual indecency with a minor or simply public sexual indecency – the plea document does not mention “minor.” Petitioner’s plea was involuntary. Relief granted.

2013: Heard v. Addison, 728 F.3d 1170 (10th Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in lewd molestation case for failing to recognize a likely defense before advising the defendant to plead guilty and in failing to advise the defendant of the possibility of filing an appeal following the plea. The defendant faced two counts under a statute that criminalized “[l]ook[ing] upon, touch[ing], maul[ing], or feel [ing] [a minor’s] body or private parts.” Each count carried a 20-year to life sentence. During the plea, the defendant admitted that he positioned himself in a Walmart store so that he could look at two children under the age of 16. He wanted to “look under [their] clothes at [their] bod[ies] and at [their] undergarments.” Pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement, the defendant was sentenced to concurrent twenty-five-year prison terms. At the time of the plea, the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals (OCCA) had decided only two cases—both of which were unpublished—that addressed the scope of the lewd molestation statute “as it applies to ‘looking upon’ the ‘body or private parts’ of a minor child,” which was the critical portion in this case. See Robinson v. State, No. F-98-724 (Okla. Crim. App. July 29, 1999); Terry v. State, SR-2003-0276 (Okla. Crim. App. Mar. 30, 2004). In Robinson, the OCCA held that a lewd molestation conviction based on the “look[ing] upon” language would ordinarily require something on the order of nudity: “[w]hile the statute does not say ‘naked body’ or ‘naked private parts,’ we believe the pairing of the word ‘body’ with the term ‘private parts’ indicates the legislature intended something more than the act of staring between the legs of someone who is wearing both underwear and boxer shorts.” Similarly, in Terry, the OCCA held that secretly filming clothed minors in public for sexual gratification did not violate the statute, “[e]ven though Appellee may have had lascivious intent.” In short, Terry reinforced the rule, first articulated in Robinson, that when the Oklahoma legislature “pair[ed] the word ‘body’ with the term ‘private parts,’” in the context of a “look[ing] at” charge, it “intended something more” than the statute’s plain text suggests. Based on these cases, Heard asserted ineffective assistance because counsel “should have discovered” and advised him about these cases, which “would have provided Heard with a powerful defense.” In denying relief in this case, however, “the OCCA for the first time disapproved Robinson and Terry’s reasoning” and held that, “under a proper reading of the statute, Heard’s admitted conduct was clearly criminal.” In this context, “the extra AEDPA deference that would ordinarily be given to the OCCA is not appropriate” because the state court’s reasoning was contrary to Strickland, which prohibits the use of “hindsight” in evaluating ineffective-assistance claims. The court thus reviewed the claim de novo. The Tenth Circuit, citing amongst other sources the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, held that counsel’s conduct was deficient. “A criminal defense lawyer has a duty to conduct reasonable investigations into her client’s case, which extends to the law as well as the facts.” Id. at ____ (citing Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690–91. “Quite apart from the failure to discover the OCCA’s unpublished decisions in Robinson and Terry, we hold that, on this record, minimally competent counsel would have recognized a likely defense based on the statute’s text.”

Capital Case*

Minimally competent counsel would have realized that, without “something more,” such as a requirement that the minor’s “body or private parts” be unclothed, the statute’s sweep would extend to dance recitals, community pools, shopping malls—the list goes on—with only an officer’s personal judgment as to the lewdness of a glance as a limiting principle. A minimally competent lawyer would have identified that such unbridled police discretion in enforcing the law makes a statute constitutionally suspect.

Minimal research on this issue would have revealed the OCCA’s unpublished opinions in Robinson and Terry. These opinions would not have been difficult to find as defense counsel was a member of the Tulsa Public Defender’s office and, as such, had access to the Oklahoma Indigent Defense System (OIDS) website “which provides access to unpublished Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals decisions by case name, by date of decision, and by subject matter.” “Indeed, the OIDS website is available to the public.” Moreover, the OCCA “permits parties to cite unpublished decisions, provided that ‘no published case would serve as well the purpose for which counsel cites it.’” In short, counsel’s conduct was deficient and not “justifiable on any strategic basis.” Prejudice was also established. “[W]e have no trouble concluding that a decision to go to trial in Heard’s case would have been rational. And the evidence in the record strongly establishes a reasonable probability that Heard would have withdrawn his guilty plea if he had had timely notice from his lawyer of Robinson and Terry.” The available cases provided a strong defense. Additionally, the defendant was 48 years old and facing two 20-year to life sentences. State law required service of 85% of the sentence before parole eligibility. “Given the uncertainties associated with the possibility of parole and life in prison,” Heard was essentially already facing a life sentence. Moreover, it was uncontroverted that Heard “sought to undo his plea” immediately after learning of the Robinson decision. In short, Heard carried his burden to demonstrate “a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial.” Hill, 474 U.S. at 59. Likewise, Heard established that counsel was ineffective in failing to advise Heard of his right to appeal but “since the relief we have already afforded Heard should allow him to vacate his guilty plea that effectively moots any state-court appeal challenging that guilty plea.”

2007: United States v. Mooney, 497 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of firearm case for advising the defendant to plead guilty based on the erroneous assumption that no justification defense existed. The defendant was in his home when his ex-wife, who had been drinking and had shot or shot at several former boyfriends, put a gun to his temple. He took the gun from her, called his boss at work (7 blocks away), and told him he was coming in to turn the gun over to police. His ex-wife threatened to have him arrested for possession of the gun so the defendant attempted twice to call 911 from the home to report it himself but the wife disconnected the calls. He left then and walked the seven blocks to work where the police, who had been called by his ex-wife showed up and arrested him. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the defendant insisted from the beginning that he had done the right thing and was not guilty. Counsel told him that justification was no defense though and advised him to plead guilty. When the defendant attempted to raise this question with the court at the plea hearing, defense counsel undermined him and informed the court that justification was not a defense. This advice was clearly erroneous because every circuit to consider the issue, including the Fourth Circuit, had recognized justification as an affirmative defense to this charge.

Counsel's erroneous legal advice resulted from a failure to conduct the necessary legal investigation. Counsel in criminal cases are charged with the responsibility of conducting "appropriate investigations, both factual and legal, to determine if matters of defense can be developed."

Id. at 404. Prejudice established because it was "incontrovertibly clear" that the defendant would not have plead guilty but for counsel's erroneous advice. He even attempted to withdraw his plea at sentencing asserting his innocence in doing the right thing. Had he proceeded to trial, the court would have been required to present the defense to the jury and the jury likely would have been persuaded of justification on these facts.

2005: Maples v. Stegall, 427 F.3d 1020 (6th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in distributing cocaine case in which the defendant pled guilty following jury selection based on counsel's incorrect advice that he could retain his speedy trial claim for appeal. The defendant was prejudiced because he would not have pled guilty absent this incorrect advice. Although the case was reviewed under AEDPA, the court reviewed the merits de novo because the state court had not adjudicated the merits.

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Santiago v. Johnson, 2024 WL 4930721 (D. Nev. Dec. 1, 2024). In attempted sexual assault of a minor case, defense counsel was ineffective by erroneously informing petitioner that he would be entitled to withdraw his guilty plea if the judge refused to accept the stipulated sentence and failing to ensure that petitioner's plea was conditional so that withdrawal of the plea in that circumstance would be allowed. In 2011, petitioner had pleaded guilty to two counts of attempted sexual assault under Alford with the parties stipulating to probation with a maximum suspended sentence of 8 to 20 years on each count to run consecutive. At sentencing, however, the court indicated it did not intend to follow the negotiations. Petitioner was then allowed to withdraw his plea. The case was thereafter reassigned to a different department. The parties again stipulated to probation with a maximum suspended sentence of 8 to 20 years on each count to run consecutive, if petitioner pleaded guilty to the original two counts and a lewdness charge in a separate case. Two days before the trial was scheduled to begin, petitioner entered his guilty plea to the two counts. The new court rejected the stipulation to a suspended sentence and imposed consecutive sentences of 8 to 20 years. The court also denied petitioner's motion to withdraw his plea. In denying petitioner's claim that counsel was ineffective regarding the plea, the state court first relied on the fact that petitioner was clearly aware that the trial court was not required to accept the stipulation by the parties. The point of petitioner's claim, however, was not that he was led to believe that his sentence was guaranteed by the guilty plea agreement. Instead, the thrust of his argument was that counsel failed to warn him that, unlike what occurred with his first plea, he might not be able to withdraw his guilty plea if the trial court rejected the agreed upon sentence. The state court also erred in its analysis of petitioner's contention that trial counsel was deficient in failing to make his guilty plea a conditional plea. Although the state court was correct in its conclusion that there was not a reasonable probability that counsel could have persuaded the court to consent to a conditional plea, again the state court missed the point of the claim. Had trial counsel ensured that the plea was a conditional plea, petitioner would have had the option of proceeding to trial when the court refused to accept the stipulated sentence. “Thus, the correct prejudice inquiry was whether there was reasonable probability [petitioner] would have insisted on going to trial on the original charges rather than allow the court to sentence him on the lesser charges.” Because the state court unreasonably applied Strickland/Hill to the facts of the case when denying relief on the ineffective assistance of counsel claims, de novo review is conducted on the merits. Although respondent conceded that trial counsel erroneously advised petitioner that he would be entitled to withdraw his guilty plea if the stipulated sentence was rejected by the second judge, respondent nevertheless argued the error did not constitute deficient performance because it was premised on trial counsel’s substantial experience. “Here, however, the alleged error was not a strategic decision, but instead a fundamental misunderstanding of the law.” Trial counsel “provided ineffective assistance of counsel by advising [petitioner] that he would be permitted to withdraw his guilty plea if [the judge] rejected the stipulated sentence but failing to provide for that possibility in the guilty plea agreement.” Regarding prejudice, it had been noted by trial counsel that petitioner had maintained his innocence through the entire time trial counsel represented him concerning these charges. Further, the State’s willingness to stipulate to a suspended sentence with probation was “a clear indication of the weakness of its case against him.” And given that petitioner was 61 years old when he pleaded guilty, exposing himself to two 8 to 20 year sentences was not such a good deal. On this record, there was a reasonable probability that, had counsel properly advised petitioner about his ability to withdraw his plea, petitioner would have chosen to go to trial on the original charges rather than allow the court to sentence him on the lesser charges.

Brown v. Oliver*, 2024 WL 3202560 (D. Nev. June 26, 2024), appeal dismissed as moot, 182 F.4th 771 (9th Cir. 2026). In case where petitioner had been convicted of attempted sexual assault and, as part of his sentence, given “a special sentence of lifetime supervision . . . to commence upon release from any term of imprisonment, probation or parole,” plea counsel related to a charged violation of the lifetime supervision requirements was ineffective in several respects. First, counsel was deficient in failing to properly advise petitioner prior to the plea that amendments to Nevada’s lifetime supervision statute that were made after the underlying offense of attempted sexual assault but prior to the violation could not be applied to him under the Ex Post Facto Clause. (This mattered because, under the amendments, the violation was a felony rendering the habitual offender statute applicable to petitioner when there was new criminal conduct. Before petitioner was sentenced for the violation, he was charged with robbery and use of a deadly weapon. Petitioner was thereafter adjudged a habitual criminal and sentenced to 5 to 20 years.) In denying relief on this claim, the state court found that there was no ex post facto violation. The state court’s decision, however, was contrary to federal law, as explained in detail in the district court’s opinion. Because there was a clear basis for plea counsel to have made an ex post facto violation argument, counsel’s failure to do so—and failure to advise petitioner not to plead guilty—fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Although the record was devoid of evidence explaining the basis for plea counsel’s inaction regarding the ex post facto issue, petitioner overcame the strong presumption of adequate assistance “because there can be no reasonable professional judgment or strategic decision for failing to argue an ex post facto violation that would expose a client to a mere misdemeanor over a felony and related habitual criminal status.” As to prejudice, because petitioner’s alleged violation(s) were only chargeable as a misdemeanor under the pre-offense version of the statute, absent plea counsel’s failures, petitioner would not have been facing a new felony conviction and the State could not have sought habitual criminal status. There is a reasonable probability that, but for his counsel’s errors, petitioner would not have pleaded guilty and the result of the proceeding would have been different. Plea counsel was also deficient in failing to advise petitioner to withdraw his guilty plea prior to sentencing on the ground that of the three supervision provisions he had been alleged to have violated, two had been invalidated by a recent state supreme court decision. The state court found no deficiency given that petitioner pleaded guilty to a single violation and he admitted to violating the lawful condition. The flaw with this analysis, however, was that petitioner admitted guilt to the three conditions read in the conjunctive, leaving the possibility that counsel allowed petitioner to plead guilty to violating an invalid condition. The state court’s finding of no deficiency involved an unreasonable application of Strickland. As to the merits, even without an explanation in the record explaining plea counsel’s inaction, petitioner overcame the strong presumption of adequate assistance “because there can be no reasonable professional judgment or strategic decision behind failing to inform a client about relevant new authority and using that relevant new authority to the benefit of the client.” Regarding prejudice, it is noted that one of the two times petitioner moved to withdraw his guilty plea was post-sentencing when he learned about the recent legal precedent. This “demonstrated that the inclusion of the two unlawful conditions was a main consideration in [petitioner’s] decision to plead guilty.” On this record, there is a reasonable probability that, but for plea counsel’s deficiency, petitioner would have chosen to withdraw his guilty plea and insisted on going to trial.

Chambers v. Lilly*, 735 F.Supp.3d 196 (E.D. N.Y. 2024). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to attempted second-degree murder based on a shooting in a park where a bullet from either petitioner’s gun or that of a co-defendant hit a three-year-old bystander and petitioner received a sentence of 18 years (two years under the agreed to maximum penalty), plea counsel was ineffective in failing to present compelling, readily available mitigation evidence during the plea bargaining and sentencing proceedings. At the time of petitioner’s plea and sentence (2013 and 2014), “the third edition of the Standards for Criminal Justice Prosecution Function and Defense Function issued by the American Bar Association memorialized important norms for criminal defense practitioners.” Also relevant in assessing counsel’s sentencing representation was Performance Guidelines for Criminal Defense Representation, National Legal Aid & Defender Association (4d ed. 2006). Under these standards, counsel’s performance was deficient. The record showed that “[t]he only advocacy trial counsel engaged in before negotiating the plea agreement with the promised twenty-year prison sentence was a single conversation at the bench.” Petitioner’s uncontested affidavit established that defense counsel urged petitioner in the strongest possible terms to agree to the trial court’s offer right after it was extended to him. Additionally, defense counsel told petitioner that he had to “accept or refuse the plea offer immediately” even though the record and the posture of the case belied counsel’s claim that the plea would be lost unless accepted then and there. At the time of this advocacy, trial counsel had spoken to petitioner only a handful of times over the nearly-year-long representation, even though his young client was facing potential decades in prison. (Petitioner was only twenty-years-old at the time of the offense.) And counsel's communications with petitioner were limited to brief encounters at court appearances, never once visiting him in jail. As for the acceptance of petitioner's account of what occurred, the record showed that respondent had been provided repeated opportunities to investigate and counter the highly specific allegations in petitioner's post-conviction motion, letters to the court, and supplemental affidavit yet presented no evidence from either trial counsel or the trial prosecutor, who had also been present for all of the plea and sentencing proceedings where the off-the-record advocacy took place, in order to dispute or justify counsel's on-the-record advocacy efforts. Because it is well established that raising a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel broadly waives attorney-client privilege as to relevant communications and counsel's strategic choices, the District Court would not assume that counsel declined to speak with respondent about his representation of petitioner on grounds of attorney-client privilege, something respondent did not affirmatively claim.

In sum, even when giving trial counsel the benefit of all advocacy he may have done to convince the trial court to offer Petitioner a lower sentence during plea negotiations, that advocacy was virtually non-existent. It consisted only of (at most) a single, brief, off-the-record conversation with a judge who had no previous familiarity with the case. And, based on the trial court's later questions to Petitioner at sentencing, it appears clear that counsel did not even provide the trial court with the most basic information about Petitioner before negotiating a decades-long prison sentence. There is also no evidence on record that in that single, brief bench conference counsel invoked any of the available mitigation that the trial court would sua sponte elicit from a direct colloquy with Petitioner himself at sentencing three weeks later – much less any of the even more compelling, equally available evidence that Petitioner and his [post-conviction] counsel would newly present to the trial court five years later.

Defense counsel was equally, if not more, deficient as to the sentencing proceeding. Although the trial court had total discretion to reduce the sentence it had promised to petitioner as part of his docket plea, "in the three weeks that elapsed between the plea and sentencing proceedings, counsel did exactly nothing." And even during the sentencing proceeding, where defense counsel was given the opportunity to make arguments on petitioner's behalf, counsel still did next to nothing. Counsel simply noted that he was asking for a modification of sentence, as he had previously requested at the bench, and then allowed petitioner to make a statement. The questions asked by the trial court based on the few basic facts in mitigation that were documented in the PSI indicated that defense counsel had provided no mitigation information to the court when at the bench. "Having done all of counsel's work on its own, the trial court then reduced the promised sentence by two years, sentencing Petitioner to eighteen years in prison." At the later post-conviction hearing, when learning of the readily available mitigation that defense counsel had failed to develop and present, the trial court reduced the sentence by another three years. (This reduction was later reversed by the state appellate court.) At the post-conviction hearing, the trial court was told:

Capital Case*

Petitioner's early life was marked by violence and traumatic loss which led, in substantial part, to his involvement in the criminal conduct at issue. Petitioner lost his father to gun violence as a child. Without a father in his life, he "found [himself] looking for a replacement in the streets" and "bought into the idea that [he] could obtain validation by showing [his] peers that [he], too, could be courageous, feared and violent." As Petitioner acknowledged, "this thinking led [him] to commit a horrible crime." He expressed genuine concern that his own son would have to find "examples from others on what it means to be a man" because of how much of his son's life he would miss behind bars and his fervent hope that his son finds better examples than he did. He also demonstrated insight and took full responsibility for his actions. "I am truly ashamed of my actions; I always have been ashamed and I always will be ... I also understand that I have not only been a part of harming the victim and the community at large, but I have also let down my dear mother who only wanted the best for me. She didn't fail me. I failed her."

(Internal citations omitted.) Prejudice is established on this record. "[I]t is clear that counsel's failure to adhere to basic professional norms in his sentencing investigation and advocacy created, at the very least, a 'reasonable probability' that Petitioner was sentenced to a longer term of imprisonment than he would have faced with adequate assistance of counsel." Because the denial of the claim by the state court was without explanation, possible rationales were explored and rejected as unreasonable under AEDPA analysis.

2022: United States v. Raymond, 640 F.Supp.3d 9 (D. D.C. 2022). In sexual abuse and transportation of obscene material case, granting motion to withdraw guilty plea where plea counsel failed to investigate the circumstances surrounding the seizure of defendant's phones where there were viable concerns regarding the manner in which the warrant for seizure of the phones was executed. Although it was undecided whether a suppression motion would ultimately be successful, the grounds for such a motion were not frivolous. Counsel was not only deficient in failing "to investigate, consider, research, or explain to [defendant] these issues surrounding the seizures of his phones," they were also deficient in failing to raise the issues with the government, use them in plea negotiations, or move for suppression. As to prejudice, "[t]he Court finds convincing [defendant's] argument that he was prejudiced insofar as his ability to make a voluntary and intelligent decision regarding all his options before pleading guilty was hindered." Defendant further raised a cognizable defense to the sexual abuse charges to which he pleaded guilty.

Weaver v. Amsberry*, 583 F.Supp.3d 1334 (D. Oregon 2022), aff'd, 2023 WL 3335895 (9th Cir. May 10, 2023). In case involving charges of attempted aggravated murder, robbery, and burglary, replacement defense counsel was ineffective in failing to make significant preparations for trial and misleading petitioner about the viability of a diminished capacity defense, resulting in petitioner's acceptance of a last-minute plea offer. The state court "made an 'unreasonable determination of the facts' by failing to make any findings as to [replacement counsel's] sparse and misleading communication with his client," and "[t]hus, the state court opinion as to [replacement counsel's] deficient performance deserves no deference. Likewise, the state court's application of those facts is unreasonable and receives no deference." In finding replacement defense counsel's preparation deficient, it is noted that he failed to contact the mental health expert prior counsel had received a helpful opinion from and never spoke with petitioner about trial strategy despite petitioner's desire to take the case to trial. Regarding prejudice, the state court concluded that petitioner failed on this prong of Strickland because (1) he pled guilty without knowing that the defense expert was unavailable to testify (and so, according to the state court, this could not have impacted the decision to accept the plea); and (2) he had not shown "a decision to reject the plea offer would have been reasonable under the circumstances." Both grounds, however, were unreasonable. As to the first, although petitioner may not have known the exact details of his attorney's contacts, or lack thereof, with the defense expert, petitioner "was at least aware that—on the morning of trial—he and his attorney had yet to discuss trial strategy. . . . Having never had a meaningful dialogue with his attorney, [petitioner] had no idea what kind of trial awaited him. Had [petitioner] received adequate representation, he likely would have had more confidence in his chances at trial and thus been less likely to plead guilty." Additionally, "the state court failed to consider [replacement counsel's] representation to [petitioner] that the judge did not want to hear a diminished capacity defense. A critical basis for [petitioner's] decision to plead guilty was his belief that he could not mount the diminished capacity defense that he had worked on with his previous attorney." The state court's conclusion that rejection of the plea offer would not have been reasonable was premised on its view that a diminished capacity defense had a slim chance of success at trial. But "[w]hen assessing prejudice in the guilty plea context, courts look beyond the question of whether a defendant would have been better off going to trial." Given the significant legwork engaged in by prior counsel on the diminished capacity defense, petitioner's desire to go to trial was not irrational per se. Because the entirety of the state court's analysis of prejudice was based on unreasonable fact findings and applications of law, it was not entitled to deference. Although the chances of success were low had petitioner chosen to go to trial even with a properly prepared diminished capacity defense, prejudice from defense counsel's deficient performance is found: "Based on [petitioner's] statements and actions leading up to trial, I find that [petitioner] would not have pled guilty had he received adequate assistance of counsel. Moreover, in light of [petitioner's] expressed interest in receiving mental health treatment, his age, his likelihood of success at trial, and the sentence he faced, I cannot say that rejecting the guilty plea would have been irrational."

2020: Lopez-Correa v. United States, 537 F.Supp.3d 169 (D. Puerto Rico Aug. 27, 2020), appeal dismissed, 2021 WL4806411 (1st. Cir. May 6, 2021). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting her co-defendant in the production of child pornography, defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance "because she allowed her heavily medicated, depressed and borderline suicidal client [sic] agree into pleading guilty." If counsel had instead "focused her efforts on demonstrating [petitioner's] abusive past and concerning psychiatric condition before the change of plea hearing, then she could have 'clear[ed] [petitioner's] name completely of charges,' as [defense counsel] suggested in the sentencing memorandum." "[D]efense counsel was aware that her client lacked both mental competency (depression, anxieties and post-traumatic disorder) to understand the effects of pleading guilty and the mens rea to commit the crime charged. In spite of a strong presumption in her favor, counsel was presented with identifiable red flags that should have moved her not to advise [petitioner] to entertain a guilty plea that she would have otherwise not entered." Defense counsel's failure to pursue duress and Battered Woman Syndrome defenses prior to petitioner's change of plea hearing in order to explain the pathological relationship with her abuser/co-defendant “certainly undermined the confidence of the case’s outcome.” Petitioner’s showing of factual innocence permitted her to overcome the statute of limitations procedural bar.

2019: United States v. Crooker, 360 F.Supp.3d 1095 (E.D. Wash. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in advising petitioner to plead guilty to one count of Production of Child Pornography under 18 U.S.C. §2251(a) where petitioner’s conduct likely did not satisfy an element of the crime. Although there was very little case law interpreting the conduct required to be convicted under section 2251(a), “at a minimum, defense counsel in these situations would be expected to research how the terms in section 2251 (a) would be interpreted before advising his or her client to plead guilty to a crime.” Had counsel done the research and found the dearth of case law, he likely would have engaged in and asked for discovery on the statutory analysis of the relevant terms and advised petitioner that the prosecution may not have evidence that petitioner committed a crime. This failure on the part of defense counsel cannot be seen as a reasonably objective tactical or strategic decision. Counsel performed deficiently. As to prejudice, “it is reasonable to conclude that advising a defendant that he may not have committed the crime of which he is charged would cause the defendant not to plead guilty.” If petitioner had been properly advised as to the likelihood of acquittal, petitioner “would not have taken a guilty plea that guaranteed fifteen years of imprisonment, especially when, according to the Government, [petitioner] was facing at most thirty years in prison.” In a separate claim, the district court found petitioner actually innocent of the charged crime. Thus, the evidence obviously did not overwhelmingly establish his guilt. Petitioner therefore established the requisite prejudice. It is noted that part of the plea deal involved the dismissal of a second count, which was for the commission of a sex offense against a minor as a person required to register as a sex offender. The argument that this was a significant concession in the plea negotiation vitiating prejudice failed because conviction of the second count was dependent on conviction of section 2251(a). Under these circumstances, dismissal of the second count cannot be viewed as a significant concession. The fact that petitioner entered what was viewed at the time as a knowing and voluntary plea cannot defeat the claim for relief given the lack of adequate advice on the conduct required to support a conviction for Production of Child Pornography.

2014: Roberts v. Howton, 13 F. Supp. 3d 1077 (D. Ore. 2014). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in manslaughter case for advising the defendant to plead guilty without adequately investigating beforehand. While this issue had not been asserted in state post-conviction, the procedural default was excused under Martinez. The defendant was convicted of killing a woman, who was involved with the defendant’s ex-lover. The state’s theory was that she had been killed at the defendant’s home and then her body was dumped in the park where it was found. The state’s case was premised upon circumstantial evidence involving the volatile lesbian “love triangle,” the defendant’s history of domestic violence, incriminating threats made by the defendant prior to the murder, and cell phone tower evidence. Counsel knew that the state’s case relied significantly on the cell tower evidence and had filed a motion for funding for an expert on this issue and filed a motion to suppress this evidence. While the defendant had been prepared to go to trial, she changed her plea less than a month prior to the scheduled trial based on defense counsel’s advice. Counsel advised the plea because the prosecution informed defense counsel that the cell tower evidence would place the defendant in the vicinity of the park close to the time the pathologist believed the murder occurred.

Capital Case*

The prosecutor testified that he had a phone call with an employee of Verizon Wireless, who said that his “preliminary” review of “the call data ‘code’” might show that the defendant was near the park. After that he met with the defense team and shared this information. The lead defense counsel offered an affidavit in state post-conviction asserting that he had investigated and his investigator reached the same conclusion. The defense investigator and co-counsel, however, disputed this information. Co-counsel had contacted an expert to say that the cell tower evidence could be disputed but the expert was never retained. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in relying on the state’s representation of the evidence without adequately investigating. Counsel’s conduct was “particularly troubling” in light of the fact that the state’s representation was admittedly based on “preliminary” information about what “might” be established. Prejudice was also established as there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have pled guilty if counsel had adequately investigated. This was clear in that several defense experts, and even the state’s expert in the habeas proceedings, agreed that the state could not have pinpointed the defendant’s location based on the cell phone tower data evidence available.

2010: Cerda v. Hedgpetch, 744 F.Supp.2d 1058 (C.D. Cal. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug possession plea for failing to adequately investigate and give proper advice prior to plea. The complaint alleged a prior violent felony conviction enhancement under the Three Strikes Law. The state’s initial offer was for six years. Due to the 1993 conviction, counsel was uncertain whether the defendant would be eligible for a “Prop 36 disposition,” which would allow for drug treatment, a noncustodial sentence, and eventual dismissal of the charge. The state agreed that if the defendant was eligible, which would mean that he did not either personally use a weapon or cause great bodily injury, he could have a “Prop 36 disposition.” Counsel was aware there was a preliminary hearing transcript for the prior, but he was unsure whether this would be admissible to prove the strike. Counsel was also aware that the petitioner had been convicted of drug possession in 2003 and sentenced to 32 months, which suggested that the petitioner had admitted in 2003 that the 1993 conviction was a strike. With this information, counsel recommended an offer of four-years without a “Prop 36” recommendation. The state agreed to either of two plea options: (1) a Prop 36 referral, but 6 years if he was found ineligible; or (2) 4 years with no Prop 36 referral. The defendant chose the former. He clearly would not have done so if he had known he was not eligible for Prop 36. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as his advice was legally and factually incorrect. While he was uncertain of Prop 36 eligibility, etc., he did nothing to research or investigate to determine the correct answer. Only after the guilty plea, did counsel obtain the documents related to the 2003 conviction, which contained an admission that the 1993 conviction was a strike. Under California law, this was equivalent to a guilty plea. Aside from that, under settled state law, the preliminary hearing transcript, which contained information that the 1993 prior did involve great bodily injury, was admissible in evidence. “Competent counsel would have been aware of this law or would have taken the time to learn the answer to his discrete, uncomplicated legal question.” Likewise, the plea the petitioner entered at counsel’s advice also admitted, per the complaint, that the 1993 conviction was a strike, precluding Prop 36 eligibility. Prejudice was clear as “common sense” dictates that any defendant offered a deal for four years or six years will take the four year deal. Under AEDPA, the state court’s determination to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Supreme Court law.

Capital Case*

United States v. DeSimone*, 736 F.Supp.2d 477 (D. R.I. 2010). Counsel in mail fraud and money laundering case ineffective during plea proceedings, such that the defendant had a fair and just reason to withdraw his guilty plea. Although the defendant maintained his innocence throughout, he pled guilty the morning trial was scheduled to begin based on counsel's advice that he would likely be convicted. The problems, however, were that counsel advised the defendant he could plead guilty even if he was not and that it "happens all the time." Likewise, during the state's recitation of facts during the plea hearing, the defendant complained to counsel that the statements were "bullshit" but counsel told the defendant that he had to accept the recitation. While counsel did not explicitly tell the defendant to lie to the court in the plea colloquy, the defendant was justified in his understanding that lying was not only permissible, but even necessary, to get his plea accepted. This undermined the finding that the plea was "knowing, voluntary, and intelligent."

Williams v. United States*, 684 F. Supp. 2d 807 (W.D. Tex. 2010). Counsel ineffective in "conspiracy to attempt to possess with the intent to distribute" marijuana plea case for advising the defendant to plead guilty to a count in the indictment that failed to charge an offense. In short, under Fifth Circuit precedent and under the relevant statute, a defendant could be charged for "conspiracy" or "attempt," but not "conspiracy to attempt." Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial and relief was not barred by guilty plea.

2009: United States v. Winsor, 675 F. Supp. 2d 1069 (D. Ore. 2009). Counsel ineffective in receipt of child pornography case for allowing the defendant to plead to one count of receipt when the defendant was charged with two counts of receipt and one count of possession of child pornography. Under Ninth Circuit precedent decided more than eight months prior to the plea, convictions for receipt and possession would violate double jeopardy. Thus, counsel should have advised the defendant to plead guilty to all three charges. Counsel could then have asked the court to dismiss the receipt charges, which had a five-year mandatory minimum sentence, rather than the possession charge

Given the known general distaste for statutory mandatory minimum sentences of judges around the country, and the belief that sentences of these types of cases are too lengthy, a lawyer exercising reasonable professional skill and judgment would have counseled his client about this strategy.

Alternatively, counsel could have advised the defendant to stipulate the facts and proceed in a bench trial in order to preserve his right to appeal the denial of his motion to suppress evidence. Prejudice established as the court likely would have dismissed the receipt charge and sentenced the defendant to less than five years on the possession charge because the defendant was 62 years old and a professional engineer, the crimes were more than four years old, the defendant passed a polygraph confirming he had never had sexual contact with a child, and he had been attending therapy at the time of sentencing.

2008: McBroom v. Warren, 542 F. Supp. 2d 730 (E.D. Mich. 2008). Counsel ineffective under AEDPA in incorrectly advising the defendant of the law which resulted in a no contest plea in assault with intent to commit murder case. The state initially made a plea offer with a cap of a one year sentence, which defense counsel never advised the defendant of. The defendant indicated a willingness to accept the deal on the day of trial, but the state declared the offer was withdrawn. The defendant proceeded to trial and was convicted. Prior to sentencing, he obtained new counsel who negotiated withdrawal of the conviction, entry of a no contest plea, a sentence of 11-17 years, and a waiver of appellate issues relating to the initial representation and the trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel incorrectly advised the defendant that the state's initial offer could not be reinstated despite the ineffectiveness of his initial counsel. Prejudice established because the defendant received a much higher sentence. In ruling on this issue, the state court incorrectly viewed it as a challenge to initial counsel's actions rather than a challenge to the plea counsel's actions.

Capital Case*

3. State Cases

2024: State v. Davis, 257 N.E.3d 484 (Ohio App. 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the charged count of possessing a weapon under a disability as a fugitive from justice and instead advising defendant to plead no contest to the charge. Plea counsel, under a misapprehension of the relevant law, gave defendant the false assurance that such a plea would preserve his right to appeal his conviction of that count. This was deficient performance. Because the relevant case law did not support the count, defendant established prejudice." Trial counsel's failure to accurately advise [defendant] that a no-contest plea did not protect his ability to appeal the weapons under disability charge prejudiced his ability to receive a fair and reliable trial."

2023: Black Elk v. State, 994 N.W.2d 394 (N.D. 2023). In case involving the death of petitioner's child, S.B., affirming grant of relief where plea counsel was ineffective in advising petitioner to plead guilty to the child neglect charge prior to receiving the autopsy results. The allegation against petitioner was that she willfully "failed to provide proper parental care or control for S.B. by consuming alcohol to a level that impaired her ability to care for S.B. and S.B. died due to the lack of appropriate care." The autopsy report, which was released following the guilty plea, concluded there was "[n]o evidence of foul play or recent significant trauma" and identified the cause of death as "Unexplained Sudden Death" with the manner of death "Undetermined." The State's argument on appeal that the lower court impermissibly considered hearsay testimony by petitioner about her conversations with plea counsel was waived due to the failure to object below. Plea counsel's advice to petitioner-- that she should just plead guilty and they could deal with the autopsy result later--was deficient. "Given how difficult it would be to deal with a material piece of evidence after a defendant has been sentenced, it was not error for the district court to determine the advice Black Elk's counsel provided fell below an objectively reasonable standard." Regarding prejudice, the district court did not err in crediting petitioner's testimony that she would have rejected the plea had she been aware that she would be unable to retract it after the autopsy report was released. Notably, petitioner's "statements were consistent throughout the duration of the investigation, the charging process, and afterwards, that she wished to see the autopsy report, and wondered whether her infant died of Sudden Infant Death Syndrome." Plea counsel's legal misinformation precluded petitioner from entering an intelligent and voluntary plea.

City of Cleveland v. Wells*, 2023 WL 3531802 (Ohio App. May 18, 2023). Appellant, who pleaded guilty to aggravated disorderly conduct after her attorney failed to appear for trial and the trial court refused to grant a continuance to substitute counsel who only appeared to request a delay, was denied the effective assistance of counsel. The record showed that appellant had intended to take the case to trial, having appeared at numerous pretrial hearings and previously rejecting a plea offer. “[G]iven the totality of the circumstances under which the Appellant entered her guilty plea, we find that counsel’s ineffective assistance caused the Appellant to have not entered her plea of guilty knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily.”

2022: People v. Tiger, 207 A.D.3d 574 (N.Y. App. Div. 2nd Dept. 2022). Plea counsel was ineffective in case where defendant, a licensed practical nurse, was charged with several crimes based on a theory that she recklessly bathed the child victim in hot water, causing the child to sustain thermal burns, and plea counsel advised defendant to accept a guilty plea without having obtained the pathology report and consulted with an appropriate expert. Had counsel engaged in a reasonable investigation, counsel would have obtained evidence that the victim’s skin condition was not caused by thermal injuries but rather by toxic epidermal necrolysis, a condition associated with an allergic reaction to a medication the child had been taking. (This evidence was consistent with the defendant’s statement that she had checked the bath water before immersing the child and it was not that hot.)

State v. Moore*, 185 N.E.3d 216 (Ohio App. 2022). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to bring a motion to dismiss a rape charge on statute of limitations grounds. Plea counsel’s failure to do so caused his advice to be outside the range of competency that is demanded in criminal cases and resulted in defendant’s guilty plea not being voluntarily made. Given the evidence in the record of defendant’s reluctance to plea, had defense counsel raised the issue of the statute-of-limitations with defendant prior to the plea hearing, defendant would not have pled guilty and instead insisted that his lawyer pursue that defense. The rape occurred in 1995. The statute of limitations was 20 years. The state filed a John Doe-DNA indictment eight days before the limitations period expired. This would suffice to toll the limitations period if the state used reasonable diligence in ascertaining defendant’s identity at the time of filing. There was nothing in the record, however, to suggest that the state used reasonable diligence to ascertain defendant’s identity before the expiration of the statute-of-limitations. There was a reasonable probability that a motion to dismiss highlighting the lack of investigation and the 23-year delay in identifying defendant would have been granted.

2020: People v. O’Hearn, 270 Cal.Rptr.3d 901 (Cal.App. 2020). Reversing the denial of defendant’s motion to withdraw his plea of guilty to the making of criminal threats and a probation violation where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate either his client’s mental health or the facts and circumstances of the charged offense (which could have supported defenses to the charge), despite having been told of defendant’s prior mental problems and having his own immediate doubts whether defendant was competent to stand trial. (The charges in this case were based on defendant yelling at and threatening to kill two of his elderly neighbors.) The deficient investigation was prejudicial because evidence of defendant’s substantial history of serious mental illness could have been used to negate the intent element of the criminal threats charge. In addition, had defense counsel conducted a reasonable investigation, he would have recognized the potential for arguing that the victims were familiar with defendant’s frequent unconventional behavior and aware it had never resulted in violence, which would have eliminated or at least diminished their fear for their own safety. (The criminal threat statute required proof that the threat at issue “was so clear, immediate, unconditional, and specific that it communicated to the victim a serious intention and the immediate prospect that the threat would be carried out;” that “[t]he threat actually caused the victim to be in sustained fear for her own safety;” and that “the victim's fear was reasonable under the circumstances.”) Finally, defense counsel’s failure to inform defendant that he was pleading to a strike, which exposed him to future confinement in state prison, deprived defendant of information necessary to making an informed decision.

Nelson v. Wilkey*, 845 S.E.2d 566 (Ga. 2020). In case where defendant pleaded guilty on the third day of trial to possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and prior to sentencing learned that his codefendant had an outstanding arrest warrant for the sale of methamphetamine, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to inform defendant of his statutory right to withdraw the guilty plea at any time prior to sentencing. At the sentencing hearing, plea counsel notified the sentencing court of the new information “that certainly would have an effect” on her advice to defendant but rather than ensuring that defendant had the benefit of that different advice before he lost the absolute right to withdraw his guilty plea for any reason, plea counsel allowed the sentencing hearing to proceed. “[N]o reasonable attorney providing constitutionally effective representation would fail to inform a client of an absolute statutory right to withdraw a plea when the attorney had obtained new information that changed the attorney’s assessment of the client’s case and had not yet fully discussed that information and its relevance with the client.” Counsel’s failure resulted in placing a burden on defendant when seeking to withdraw the guilty plea post-sentencing. The habeas court’s finding that defendant would have withdrawn his guilty plea prior to sentencing had he known that he could was supported by substantial evidence.

Barber v. State*, 609 S.W.3d 795 (Mo. App. 2020). Plea counsel was ineffective for failing to tell petitioner before his case had been finally disposed of, and, before petitioner agreed to be charged with felony receiving stolen property and to serve a three-year sentence, that he had a statute-of-limitations defense to the original charge of felony stealing under a recent state supreme court decision that rendered the crime a misdemeanor and that the amended charge was also subject to a statute-of-limitations defense. Plea counsel appeared to understand that the State could not proceed on a felony stealing charge in light of the state supreme court decision, but failed to investigate further to determine whether a charge filed under a different criminal statute more than four years after the offense occurred might not be tolled.

2019: Merriweather v. State, 2019 WL 4257010 (Tenn. Crim. App. Sept. 6, 2019). In carjacking/aggravated robbery case, reversing the denial of relief by the post-conviction court and holding that trial counsel was ineffective in advising petitioner to plead guilty. When combined with misstatements by the trial court, the guilty plea was not knowing or voluntary. The post-conviction court had found that trial counsel and co-counsel were both prepared, informed and had communicated with petitioner. The record, however, “preponderate[d] against the findings of the post-conviction court.” According to trial counsel, the only time he met with petitioner was the day of the scheduled trial and that meeting lasted approximately half an hour. “Regardless of trial counsel’s other preparations in this case, we cannot say that trial counsel was adequately prepared for trial having never spoken with the petitioner before the day of trial.” And although trial counsel testified that he negotiated the final plea offer with the State, considering that trial counsel had never before spoken to petitioner, trial counsel could not have told him about the State's first plea offer. Further, given that petitioner did not even know that trial counsel was one of his attorneys, having retained co-counsel to represent him, petitioner could not have consented to trial counsel's negotiating a plea agreement on his behalf. Although co-counsel had met with petitioner earlier, the record established that co-counsel had little to no involvement in the negotiations with the State and engaged in no trial preparation. The appellate court was unable to say that trial counsel's dismissal of petitioner's alibi defense was strategic because trial counsel did no investigation of it. Additionally, at the time trial counsel urged petitioner to accept a plea deal, trial counsel had no knowledge of whether co-counsel had challenged the admissibility of certain evidence and did not know what, if any, pretrial motions had been filed. The divided labors between co-counsel and trial counsel left other important gaps in petitioner's representation, including trial counsel's ignorance of petitioner's mental health issues. Trial counsel was also unaware that one of the two co-defendants had not implicated petitioner and counsel erroneously informed petitioner that not only had the co-defendant implicated petitioner but that he would be called as a witness against petitioner at trial. Petitioner asserted that he had not wanted to enter a guilty plea, but concluded that he had no other option because both attorneys told him that he would receive the maximum sentence if convicted at trial, a sentence that he erroneously believed to be as much as 30 years, and because he did not believe that they would defend him if he elected to go to trial. The petitioner testified that he would have declined the plea offer had he understood the consequences of his plea and the risks of trial.

On this record, deficient performance is established. "In effect, in this case, the performance of two attorneys equaled less than one." Compounding the errors by defense counsel was the trial court's misstatement of petitioner's sentencing exposure during the plea colloquy. The trial court informed petitioner three times that he faced up to 30 years incarceration. But because petitioner had no prior felony convictions, he actually faced a sentence of eight to 12 years. The trial court further erred when it told petitioner that aggravated robbery was a non-parolable offense when in fact it carried a release eligibility of 85 percent. "We conclude that the combined effect of the deficient representation provided by the petitioner's attorneys and the misinformation provided by the trial court rendered the petitioner's guilty plea unknowing and involuntary." Petitioner's guilty-pleaded conviction of carjacking is vacated, and the case is remanded for trial.

State v. Wright*, 442 P.3d 1185 (Utah Ct. App. 2019). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to numerous charges related to his assault on his mother, trial counsel performed deficiently as to the aggravated kidnapping conviction by failing to advise petitioner that the evidence was insufficient to support the "detection" element of the crime. The plea agreement was negotiated at petitioner's request after a video recording of the assault was played to the jury and petitioner's mother had testified. Although petitioner pushed his mother back into a chair at one point during the incident, "[t]he push was incident to the ongoing assault" and did not amount to detention. The evidence before the jury showed no action by petitioner suggesting he intended to impair his mother's ability to move. The record did not support respondent's contention that petitioner prevented his mother from leaving the house and going to the hospital until she promised to lie about how she sustained her injuries. "Given that the factual basis for [petitioner's] plea rested on the evidence presented at trial, a reasonable defense attorney would have objected to the aggravated kidnapping charge and informed his client that an insufficient factual basis supported the element of ‘detention.’” Had petitioner been properly advised, the appeals court is confident he would have not pleaded guilty to the charge and would have gone to trial or, more likely, the charge would have been eliminated from the plea agreement after trial counsel shared an adequate analysis of the evidence with the prosecutor.

Mellott v. State*, 435 P.3d 376 (Wyo. 2019). In Medicaid fraud case, trial counsel was ineffective in advising defendant to plead guilty to ten felony charges for which no factual basis existed. The ten felony counts were for submitting false statements for more than $500 of medical assistance. But the charges were based on the aggregated values of multiple reimbursement claims of less than $500 each. (Each felony count related to a particular client and the claims for each client over a course of years were added together to make up that count.) The Wyoming Supreme Court agreed with petitioner that the statute did not allow for the aggregation that occurred here. During the plea proceeding, because the district court, trial counsel, and the prosecutor proceeded under the shared misunderstanding that petitioner could be convicted of a felony based on the client-aggregated values of multiple Medicaid claims, no one presented or requested evidence of the value of individual, allegedly-unlawful Medicaid claims. As a result, petitioner admitted only that, for each of the relevant counts, the total aggregated value of medical assistance for each client was $500 or greater. Trial counsel therefore recommended that petitioner “plead guilty to charges with no factual basis to support them under the plain meaning of the statutes. As such, [petitioner] has established that her trial counsel performed deficiently.” Given the unique circumstances of this case, the Wyoming Supreme Court finds inapplicable the usual prejudice analysis for cases involving deficient advice to accept a plea, i.e., whether the properly advised petitioner would have gone to trial. The Wyoming Supreme Court also found a presumption of prejudice inappropriate here. Instead, it applied a material prejudice analysis, determining whether the record, viewed in its entirety, contained a factual basis to support petitioner’s guilty plea as to the ten felony counts under the correct interpretation of the statute. Respondent presented a spreadsheet and testimony from a Department of Health employee to support its argument that petitioner could properly have been charged with eleven felony and 278 misdemeanor false statements. But respondent’s evidence included clear contradictions that precluded any reasonable inference that petitioner submitted eleven false claims of $500 or more. Nor did respondent’s evidence show there was a false statement of $500 or more for each of the ten clients identified in the ten counts at issue. Therefore, petitioner was materially prejudiced by her trial counsel’s deficient performance because the district court could not have entered judgment based on petitioner’s guilty plea as to the ten counts.

2017: State v. Riddle, 88 N.E.3d 475 (Ohio Ct. App. 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective in advising defendant to plead guilty to aggravated robbery given insufficient evidence of the “deadly weapon” element of the crime. Defendant had threatened the victim with a fake gun and did not use it as a bludgeon at the time of the offense. “[T]he facts recited by the State at the plea hearing do not support the ‘deadly weapon’ element required for aggravated robbery.” Defendant’s plea was rendered less than knowing, intelligent, and voluntary as a result of trial counsel’s failure to recognize that the “deadly weapon” element of aggravated robbery was not satisfied, and in advising defendant to plead guilty despite this deficiency. As for prejudice, the record showed that the guilty plea had not been the result of an underlying agreement with the prosecution, thereby refuting any speculation that defendant knowingly pleaded guilty to a crime despite the lack of proof of an element in return for some benefit such as the dismissal of additional charges. Thus, there was a reasonable likelihood that defendant would not have entered his guilty plea to aggravated robbery had he understood from counsel that a fake gun (used in the manner that he used it) would not satisfy the deadly weapon element of aggravated robbery.

Ex Parte Lewis*, 537 S.W.3d 917 (Tex. Crim. App. 2017). Petitioner pleaded guilty to obtaining a controlled substance through the use of a fraudulent prescription form under state law. Petitioner's attorney did not advise him prior to the plea that the prosecution would be unable to prove the offense as alleged, because the state was required to prove that the prescription form itself was fraudulent, and not merely that it was forged. The Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas held, following an evidentiary hearing in the habeas court, that the plea was invalid due to the ineffective assistance of his counsel. Under Strickland, an attorney is required to be familiar with applicable law and to keep abreast of legal developments. The habeas court found petitioner credible when he said that when he entered his plea he was unaware that the state was required to prove he had used a fraudulent prescription form, and that the form the state alleged he used was not fraudulent. This conclusion is inconsistent with trial counsel's affidavit stating that although she was not aware of case law holding that the statute required proof of a fraudulent form, she independently warned petitioner that if he went to trial the state might recognize its mistake in the indictment and seek to correct with. Petitioner did not receive advice that fell within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance under Strickland because he was not told that well-settled caselaw precluded his conviction as to the charge as alleged. Under Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (2015), in order to show prejudice, petitioner needed only to show that there was a reasonable probability that absent the deficient performance, he would not have pleaded guilty. This he did.

2016: State v. Schlemmer, 58 N.E.3d 573 (Ohio Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in plea to sex offense with sexually violent predator (SVP) specification case for advising the defendant to plead guilty to the SVP specification without adequately researching the issue. The defendant was charged with five counts of gross sexual imposition with the SVP specification and, on the advice of counsel pled guilty to one count with the SVP specification, which required a mandatory two years to life imprisonment sentence, and the state dismissed the other four counts. Counsel's conduct was deficient because gross sexual imposition did not constitute a "violent sex offense" that allowed for the SVP specification. Prejudice was clear as the maximum punishment for gross sexual imposition was 18 months. Thus, even if the defendant had pled guilty to all five counts and the sentences were made consecutive, the sentence would have been much less than the two years to life imprisonment mandatory sentence the SVP specification required. While the defendant asked the court to vacate just the SVP specification, the court held that since it was part of a plea deal the whole deal was vacated. Thus, a new trial was ordered.

People v. Armstrong*, 50 N.E.3d 745 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in failure to register as a sex offender case for advising the defendant to plead guilty without adequately researching or investigating the issue first. The defendant's obligation to register was allegedly triggered by his 1997 conviction of unlawful restraint. As unlawful restraint was not inherently a sex offense, he was required to register as a sex offender only if the victim was under 18 years-of-age. Thus, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to examine the record of the 1997 case. The record revealed that the complaint, nor testimony in the preliminary hearing, nor the facts as agreed upon in the defendant's plea agreement mentioned the victim's name. Likewise, neither the judge nor the written judgment mentioned the victim's age or a requirement that the defendant register as a sex offender. Thus, the defendant was not required to register as a sex offender based on the 1997 conviction. Prejudice established because the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea to failure to register as a sex offender if counsel had investigated and adequately advised him.

State v. Diaz-Bonilla*, 495 S.W.3d 45 (Tex. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in failing to adequately the defendant of possible defenses prior to the defendant's guilty plea to engaging in organized criminal activity. In order to be guilty of that offense, was required to show that the defendant be a member of a criminal street gang, who conspired to commit the offense, and performed an "overt act" in pursuit of the agreement. Here, the defendant was a member of the MS-13 street gang. He was present when the gang leader ordered that the victim be murdered. He rode in the backseat of the leader's car to the crime scene but only watched the murder without participating. He then rode away still in the backseat of the car until he was dropped off at home. Counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the defendant of this possible defense or the possibility of challenging the sufficiency of the evidence on appeal if convicted. The state conceded prejudice.

2015: Commonwealth v. Tigue, 459 S.W.3d 372 (Ky. 2015). Prejudice was presumed in murder case from counsel's complete failure to advocate for the defendant in his request to withdraw his guilty plea in murder case. Just as it is the defendant's decision to enter a plea, counsel must abide by a defendant's decision to seek to withdraw a plea. Counsel also had an actual conflict of interest because the primary argument for withdrawing the guilty plea was that the defendant was forced to enter a plea due to counsel's refusal to prepare a defense for him. And, here, counsel did not just remain silent but responded to the court's questions in a way that "weighed against and undermined" the defendant's arguments. While the remedy for this error would be simply to remand for a determination on the motion to withdraw the plea with the defendant represented by adequate counsel, the court's review did not stop there as the defendant had also asserted ineffective assistance. Counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately investigate the possibility of an alternative perpetrator before advising the defendant to plead guilty in order to avoid a possible death sentence. The case involved the murder of a woman in her home with a shotgun, along with the theft of her purse, several drug prescriptions, a shotgun, and a canvas bag. The defendant was arrested based on a neighbor's testimony that his truck had been seen in the victim's driveway. The victim's drug prescriptions and canvas bag were found in his truck. While the defendant initially denied guilt, he later said that he had obtained the prescriptions and bag from his neighbor, Danny Smith, who offered him part of the drugs in order to get rid of the bag. After detectives left in search of Smith, the defendant asked to speak again and confessed to the crimes, along with taking detectives to the location of the hidden murder weapon, as well as other evidence. Thereafter, the defendant maintained his innocence. He told defense counsel he knew who the killer was, but would not name the killer. Later, he told defense counsel that he had entered the victim's home and committed theft only after Smith had killed her. He claimed to have withdrawn his statement that Smith was the killer due to fear that Smith would retaliate against his family. "Leaning heavily on the confession,

Capital Case*

Tigue's counsel was quite candid and unambiguous about the fact that their entire pretrial strategy had been geared solely toward brokering a plea deal with the Commonwealth to avoid the possibility of a death sentence." The defendant refused to consider entering a plea for ten months, but ultimately "capitulated to the pleas of family members and his defense team" and entered a plea in exchange for a life sentence with no parole eligibility for 25 years. Shortly afterwards, however, he sought to withdraw his plea. His defense counsel ignored his requests and filed no written motion on his behalf. Prior to sentencing, the defendant argued on his own behalf, but the trial court declined to address the arguments because no motion had been filed by defense counsel. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate the possibility that Smith was the actual perpetrator. While the defendant never named Smith to his counsel, he had provided this information to the police which counsel could easily have discovered with even cursory investigation. If counsel had investigated, they would have discovered that another of the victim's neighbors heard the gunshot and saw Smith in the victim's driveway two hours before a different neighbor saw the defendant's truck at the victim's house. Counsel's conduct was also deficient in advising the plea prior to lab testing of clothing fibers found in the broken kitchen door of the victim's home where entry was forced. Police believed these fibers came from the defendant's shirt, but the actual testing revealed that his shirt was not the source of the fibers. Other evidence, such as hair evidence, proved to be inconclusive as to the defendant. One counsel conceded that no trial preparations had been conducted other than talking to the defendant and his mother. The other recalled investigating, including interviewing the neighbor who saw Smith, but her testimony was contradicted by answers she provided on "a form filled out in conjunction with the Kentucky DPA Capital Litigation Persuasion Institute's training workshop she attended in October 2003 in preparation for Tigue's trial." Her answers indicated disdain for the client, even going so far as to state, "I hate my client." Also clear from her answers was "her steadfast refusal to acknowledge his claims of innocence or possible weaknesses in the Commonwealth's evidence that might in fact have supported such claims."

The clear implication of [her] responses and non-responses is that she had no intention of making any significant investigation or preparation for the guilt phase of the trial.

She listed a motion to suppress the confession as the most important trial issue, but counsel filed a suppression motion only "as a token concession" to the defendant's insistence and then withdrew it without argument only two weeks later.

We can think of few examples better encapsulating deficient pre-trial performance than determining that an issue is the most important one in a case, and then totally failing to pursue it.

In sum, defense counsel was prepared only to concede guilt and pursue their sole goal of avoiding a death sentence. And although brokering a plea deal to avoid a possible death sentence is certainly a reasonable strategy for a capital defense lawyer, it is unreasonable to do so while disregarding counsel's duty to investigate and prepare for trial. . . . And Tigue's counsel's outright refusal to consider pursuing any strategic goal other than avoidance of a possible death sentence through pleading guilty ran afoul of their “duty to consult with the client regarding ‘important decisions,’ including questions of overarching defense strategy.” Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187, 125 S. Ct. 551, 160 L.E.2d 565 (2004). . . .

Id. at 396-97 (citations omitted). Counsel’s conduct was deficient in “dismiss[ing] out of hand his claim of innocence without making any effort to investigate the legitimacy of that claim.” “We cannot allow the presumption of innocence enjoyed by all accused to be so unceremoniously tossed aside by the very individuals tasked with zealously defending that presumption.” Prejudice established as the defendant would not have pled guilty if counsel had performed competently.

2014: Soucy v. State, 22 N.E.3d 683 (Ind. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in intimidation plea case for advising the defendant to plead guilty when the evidence was insufficient to establish the communication of threats such as to influence a witness’s conduct or place her in fear of retaliation. In order to be guilty under the intimidation statute, “communication such as to influence conduct or place a person in fear of retaliation is required,” although communication need not be direct to the intended victim. The state’s case was based on telephone calls the defendant made to his mother. During these calls, in referring to a witness that had provided information to the police resulting in the defendant’s arrest for probation violation, the defendant insisted that his mother contact the witness and relay threats. The defendant’s mother refused, however, and the record was completely devoid of any evidence that the witness was aware of the threats. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in advising a plea in these circumstances and prejudice was clear in that there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would have prevailed if he had proceeded to trial.

2013: Bodie v. State, 143 So. 3d 420 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in advising the defendant to plead “no contest” to an offense for which there was no factual basis established at the plea hearing. The defendant was arrested for trafficking methamphetamine, which required proof that he possessed at least 14 grams, but the State mistakenly tracked the language of a different statute in the charges, which required possession of only 10 grams of other substances, including phenethylamines. The judgment of the court indicated that the defendant had pleaded guilty to trafficking in phenethylamines. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Shorter v. State*, 113 So. 3d 940 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in violation of conditional release case for affirmatively misadvising the defendant that the trial court had no jurisdiction to order that the sentence run concurrently with the defendant’s prior sentence for sale of cocaine. Thus, the defendant was entitled to withdraw his “no contest” plea to the sale of cocaine charge.

Privette v. State*, 108 So. 3d 1155 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in simple robbery case for providing misadvice to the defendant, resulting in a guilty plea. In order to induce a guilty plea, the prosecution threatened to amend the charge to armed robbery if the defendant did not enter a guilty plea to simple robbery. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in advising the defendant to enter the plea because “[s]uch an amendment would not have been justified under the facts of this case.” Prejudice was established in that the defendant would not have pled guilty otherwise.

2012: State v. Moser, 822 N.W.2d 424 (Neb. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in drug manufacturing case for failing to advise the defendant of the possibility of suppressing evidence seized following a traffic stop which resulted in the defendant pleading guilty to the charge. The officer testified that he stopped the defendant's vehicle because of a damaged windshield, even though he had never stopped a vehicle on this basis before and he did not ticket the defendant for this offense. Following the traffic stop, the defendant was arrested for driving under suspension. An inventory of the vehicle revealed incriminating evidence. An officer recognized the defendant's name as someone who had been purchasing unusual amounts of pseudoephedrine. The defendant confessed to manufacturing methamphetamine. A search of his home revealed 374 grams of the drug and other incriminating evidence. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to adequately advise the defendant that having a damaged windshield is "not necessarily indicative of a traffic violation" under state law. Prejudice established as there is a reasonable probability the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea had he been advised of the possible defense that probable cause was lacking for the traffic stop.

2011: Harley v. State, 952 N.E.2d 301 (Ind. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in non-support of child case for failing to inform the defendant and court prior to entry of guilty plea that the defendant's sole income was from SSI. SSI is a federal social welfare program and is specifically excluded from a parent's income for the purpose of computing child support under state law. Thus, the defendant had a defense that he was unable to pay child support.

People v. Edmonson*, 946 N.E.2d 997 (Ill. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in burglary and stolen vehicle for misinforming the defendant prior to his negotiated plea for a 20-year-sentence cap that he would be able to challenge his sentence on appeal. The defendant faced a sentencing range of 12 to 60 years. The state recommended a 20 year sentence and the court imposed a 15 year sentence. The defendant sought to appeal this sentence. While the court and prosecutor also did not recognize it, state law was clear that the defendant could not challenge a negotiated sentence as excessive on appeal. Prejudice found, as the defendant would not have pled guilty had he been adequately advised.

State v. Utter*, 803 N.W.2d 647 (Iowa 2011). Counsel ineffective in supplying alcohol to person under the legal age for failing to move to dismiss the charge and permitting the defendant to plead guilty after the speedy indictment term expired. Under state law, the state had 45 days after arrest to indict the case, absent good cause shown for delay or waiver by the defendant. A citation in lieu of arrest is deemed an arrest for purposes of speedy indictment. The state did not indict the defendant until 18 days after the 45 day period expired and the charge should have been dismissed and the state made no claim of good cause. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "a competent practitioner must be aware of and vigilantly protect his or her client's speedy trial rights." Prejudice was clear as the defendant was entitled to dismissal of the charge with prejudice and a bar to reindictment.

2010: Garcia v. State, 237 P.3d 716 (N.M. 2010). Counsel ineffective for erroneously advising the 18-year-old defendant prior to his plea to intentional child abuse resulting in death that he could be convicted even if the child's death was "an accident." In essence, counsel advised the defendant that both negligent and intentional child abuse resulting in death were punishable by 30 years. While counsel's advice was correct based on the law prior to 2005, it was not correct at the time of trial, which was almost two years after the statutes had been amended. Under correct law, when intentional child abuse is charged, there is no lesser included offense. Thus, if the defendant acted only negligently, he must be acquitted. The defendant was charged here with only intentional child abuse. Nonetheless, counsel even informed the court at the time of the plea that the defendant had been advised that even negligent abuse and "an accident" was sufficient to establish guilt. Counsel's advice about sentencing was also incorrect as negligent abuse was punishable only up to 24 years, while intentional was punishable up to life with a mandatory minimum of 30. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice established as a conviction of intentional child abuse resulting in death "was by no means a foregone conclusion." Thus, there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would have proceeded to trial if he had been adequately advised. Alternatively, with adequate advice, the defendant may have sought a more favorable plea arrangement. Regardless, the defendant's plea was not knowing or voluntary.

Kolle v. State*, 690 S.E.2d 73 (S.C. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug trafficking plea case for advising the defendant to plead guilty without sufficiently investigating and arguing the motion to suppress evidence seized from an apartment in which the defendant was an invited guest. Police officers testified that they received a call about loud music from the apartment. When an officer arrived, he heard music and observed fresh "forced entry marks" on the door, but no one responding to knocking. Believing there were exigent circumstances, officers entered and observed powder cocaine and materials used for processing and manufacturing cocaine in plain sight. The officers seized the powder cocaine and obtained a search warrant, which yielded a find of 63 grams of cocaine in the apartment. Counsel moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied, due to the court's finding of exigent circumstances followed by plain view. The defendant pled guilty the same day. Counsel's conduct was deficient during the motion hearing, because counsel had failed to obtain discovery and, therefore, failed to question the officers about time discrepancies, such as the warrant being issued and executed even before the initial "loud music complaint." Likewise, counsel failed to point out that the arrest and search warrant affidavits and incident reports referred to crack cocaine rather than powder and made no reference to "fresh damage" or "forced entry." If counsel had adequately performed, there is a reasonable probability that the court would have granted the suppression motion. Even if the trial court had ruled erroneously, counsel could have advised the defendant to proceed to trial and then challenge the denial of the suppression motion on direct appeal.

2009: Berry v. State, 675 S.E.2d 425 (S.C. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug case in failing to inform the defendant who pled guilty to a drug charge of a potential challenge to the use of his prior conviction for possession of drug paraphernalia for sentencing enhancement purposes. Counsel's conduct was deficient because a conviction for possession of drug paraphernalia may not be used for enhancement purposes as it does not "relate to" drugs as statutorily mandated. Nonetheless, counsel did not challenge the State's reliance on the paraphernalia conviction for enhancement purposes or inform the defendant of the potential challenge. Indeed "counsel never gave any thought to the issue." While the validity of the legal challenge may have been "unclear" at the time of the plea, "uncertainty concerning a potential legal challenge may well provide a defendant a catalyst in plea negotiations with the State." Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[s]imply saying 'I never gave it a thought' falls short of the Sixth Amendment guarantee of effective assistance of counsel." Prejudice established because the defendant testified in PCR that he would have gone to trial if he had known that his paraphernalia conviction did not qualify as a prior offense for enhancement purposes.

Ex parte Imoudu*, 284 S.W.3d 866 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in plea to murder case for failing to investigate the possibility of an insanity defense prior to advising the defendant to plead guilty. Six months prior to the crimes, the defendant had been in jail for a month for misdemeanor theft. During that time, he was prescribed an antipsychotic medication. The murder consisted of the defendant stealing a car and driving into oncoming traffic (causing a death) in the ensuing chase. In confinement, his family and a social worker at the jail immediately noted mental health problems. Both attempted to contact court-appointed counsel without success and the family retained private counsel, based on the advice of the social worker. Both retained counsel observed that the defendant seemed "incoherent" and there was "something wrong" with him and asked for a competence evaluation. A month after the defendant was found competent by court-appointed examiners, he plead guilty. Despite counsel's knowledge of the defendant's problems, counsel did not review the jail records, including those following arrest in this case that reflected numerous referrals for mental health services and evaluation, a determination of "mental illness," antipsychotic medications, and housing in an area used to house the mentally ill inmates. Counsel also never spoke to any jail personnel, did not request an insanity evaluation, did not hire a psychiatrist to evaluate the defendant, and did not advise the defendant of the insanity defense. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice established because "there is a reasonable probability that if his attorneys had informed him of the possibility of pursuing an insanity defense, he would not have pled guilty and would have gone to trial."

2008: Stewart v. State, 987 So. 2d 729 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in failing to advise the defendant of a statute of limitations defense prior to entry of plea. The defendant had five charges relating to non-dwelling burglaries, felony theft, and auto thefts and pled guilty as charged in exchange for a five year sentence for burglary and probation on all other charges. The statute of limitations had already passed on all of the charges except the felony theft by the time of the plea regardless of the prior placement of detainers on the defendant, who was already serving a prison sentence when the charges arose.

Knight v. State*, 983 So. 2d 348 (Miss. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in manslaughter and carrying concealed weapon case for allowing the defendant to plead guilty to carrying a concealed weapon, which resulted in a sentence to five years of confinement. The defendant had a pistol in a motor vehicle only, which is not illegal under Mississippi law.

2006: State v. Hunter, 143 P.3d 168 (N.M. 2006). Counsel ineffective in custodial interference case for failing to adequately advise the defendant prior to his no contest plea. Custody of the defendant's children had been granted to him in Missouri in 1992. He moved to New Mexico in 1994. His ex-wife, who had lived in Texas since prior to 1992, sought a change in custody in Missouri in 1997. Because the defendant objected to jurisdiction in Missouri and did not appear, the Missouri court granted custody to the ex-wife. She did not attempt enforcement through the New Mexico courts, but sought the help of the local police in taking physical custody. They declined. In 2001, she again sought the help of the local police and the defendant was charged with custodial interference. He plead no contest because counsel advised him incorrectly that he had no viable argument for a motion to dismiss due to the Missouri court's lack of jurisdiction and counsel's failure to discuss a conditional plea with the defendant that would have preserved that issue for appeal. This was deficient conduct because it was clear under Missouri law that the court lacked proper jurisdiction with neither of the parties or the children living outside that state for years. This would have been a viable basis for the motion to dismiss because the criminal custodial interference statute applies only to custody orders issued by a court of competent jurisdiction. The defendant was prejudiced because he would likely have refused the no contest plea and accepted a conditional plea if counsel had performed adequately.

2005: Julien v. State, 917 So. 2d 213 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in grand theft plea case for failing to inform the defendant of his option to apply for the pretrial intervention (PTI) program. The defendant was a first-time offender charged with shoplifting a pair of shoes. He pled guilty and was given probation, but then the government commenced removal proceedings to rescind his permanent residence status and remove him to Haiti. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the state rules of criminal procedure required counsel to advise the defendant of "any possible alternatives that may be open to the defendant" and the defendant was eligible for PTI, which would have resulted in dismissal of the charges if the program was successfully completed. Prejudice found because, if he had been adequately advised, the defendant would not have pled guilty but would have applied for the PTI program instead.

Petty v. Smith*, 612 S.E.2d 276 (Ga. 2005). Counsel ineffective in felony murder and aggravated assault case for inadequate advice to the defendant that resulted in a guilty plea. The defendant was charged with (1) malice murder; (2) felony murder; and (3) aggravated assault. All three indictments were based on the defendant shooting the victim with a shotgun after a codefendant beat him. Counsel believed, however, that the assault charge was based on the codefendant beating the victim. Counsel believed that, if convicted, the defendant would be sentenced to life and 20 years consecutively. Based on counsel's advice, the defendant plead guilty to felony murder and aggravated assault and received life and a concurrent 20 year sentence. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the indictment clearly revealed that the alleged assault was shooting the victim. Thus, the aggravated assault count merged into the murder count and the accused could not be separately convicted of this offense. Counsel's conduct was deficient because "[a]ny reasonably competent attorney" would have realized this fact and that the defendant did not benefit from the plea agreement. The defendant was prejudiced because he would not have plead guilty and would not have received a harsher sentence than could legally be imposed on him if had been gone to trial and been convicted on all counts.

Stevens v. State*, 617 S.E.2d 366 (S.C. 2005). Counsel ineffective in plea to receiving stolen goods case where the defendant was charged and pled to eighteen counts. If counsel had adequately investigated and researched the issue, counsel could have challenged the number of indictments because, under the "plain meaning of the statute," the receipt of multiple items in a single transaction or event constitutes a single offence. Prejudice found because the defendant likely would not have pled guilty to 18 counts and may well have received a lighter sentence if the court had 4 or 5 counts before it rather than 18.

Ex parte Briggs*, 187 S.W.3d 458 (Tex. Crim. App. 2005). Counsel ineffective in felony injury to child case for failing to adequately investigate prior to the seventeen- year- old defendant's guilty plea. The defendant was charged in the death of her two- month old son, who had been very sick from the time of his birth. The defendant took him to doctors and hospitals five different times in two months. Ultimately on the day of his death, the defendant called 911 and attempted mouth-to-mouth when she found him blue and limp. The admitting diagnosis at the hospital was hypoxia (lack of oxygen to the brain). Emergency room personnel tried to intubate and placed the tube in the baby's esophagus instead of his trachea, which was not discovered for 30 minutes. By the time it was discovered, the baby was brain dead. He died seven days later. The original autopsy report concluded that the death was a homicide. After the defendant was charged, she retained counsel, but could only pay $10,400 of the $15,000 fee. He threatened to withdraw and stated that he could not retain experts without an additional $2500-$7500 for experts. He did not withdraw, did not obtain experts or adequately investigate, and advised the defendant to plead guilty. Counsel was aware of the child's medical history. His conduct was deficient in failing to consult with experts and "[t]his was not a 'strategic' decision, it was an economic one."

Counsel is most assuredly not required to pay expert witness fees or the costs of investigation out of his own pocket, but a reasonably competent attorney—regardless of whether he is retained or appointed—must seek to advance his client's best defense in a reasonably competent manner.

Here, counsel had several options that could have been pursued: (1) subpoena the doctors that had previously treated the child and offer their records and opinions into evidence; (2) counsel could have withdrawn and requested appointment of counsel for the indigent defendant; or (3) remained as counsel, but requested investigatory and expert witness fees from the trial court due to the defendant's indigency. "If any reasonable attorney appointed to represent an indigent defendant would be expected to investigate and request expert assistance to determine a deceased infant's cause of death, a privately retained attorney should be held no lower standard." If counsel had adequately investigated, substantial testimony from a number of doctors would have revealed that there was no medical evidence of child abuse and that the child died from an undiagnosed birth defect, which led to a urinary infection, sepsis and severe pneumonia, which was made worse by the faulty intubation which led to brain death. Prejudice found because, absent counsel's deficient conduct, there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have pled guilty.

2004: Gerisch v. Meadows, 604 S.E.2d 462 (Ga. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to recognize and adequately advise the defendant concerning a valid double jeopardy claim prior the defendant's guilty plea on the charge. The defendant was involved in a fight. He was initially charged in municipal court and plead guilty to disorderly conduct by fighting and public drunk. He was sentenced to probation. He was subsequently indicted for aggravated battery, arising from the same fight, and additional charges. The defendant accepted the prosecution's plea agreement to plead guilty in exchange for a sentence of 20 years (10 in prison and 10 on probation) for aggravated battery and concurrent sentences for the remaining offenses. On the day of the plea, the defendant, who was functionally illiterate, told counsel that he had been convicted in municipal court and asked why he was charged with the same offenses. Counsel discussed the issue with the prosecutor, who asserted that a double jeopardy claim would have no merit. Counsel also verified the city court convictions, but assumed there was no double jeopardy because the prior prosecution was under a municipal ordinance rather than state law. Counsel thus advised the defendant that a double jeopardy claim would be fruitless and would cause the state to withdraw the plea recommendation and to seek greater punishment. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel did not adequately research or evaluate the issue and instead relied on the advice of the prosecutor and her own misunderstanding of the law when the defendant did have a viable double jeopardy claim. Prejudice was found because, but for counsel's error, the defendant would not have pled guilty to the charge of aggravated battery.

Heath v. State*, 601 S.E.2d 758 (Ga. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in injury by vehicle case for wholly failing to prepare or investigate prior to advising the defendant to plead guilty. The defendant had no memory of the collision, but he and his niece advised counsel that a co-worker may have been driving. Counsel did not investigate, conduct any research, or even consult with the defendant in person during the 13 months between arraignment and plea. Prejudice found because the defendant would not have plead guilty if counsel had performed adequately.

Heyward v. Humphrey*, 592 S.E.2d 660 (Ga. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in aggravated assault case for failing to adequately investigate prior to advising the defendant to plead guilty and failing to advise the defendant to withdraw from the plea agreement once it became apparent in the plea hearing that the state's case was unraveling. The defendant was charged with shooting a lounge owner. The state's case depended on the victim and four eyewitnesses. At the plea hearing, the prosecutor disclosed that one of these witnesses had given a written statement asserting that the alleged victim drew his weapon on the defendant before the defendant fired. The state also disclosed that one of the witness' could not be located even though he had a probation violation charge pending. Another witness was reluctant to testify and failed to appear the last time the case had been scheduled. Another witness had recanted her initial version of events. Even the alleged victim was reluctant to testify. Despite this information, counsel did not advise the defendant to withdraw from the plea agreement. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and to pursue the defense of justification prior to the plea hearing. Even during the hearing, counsel did not attempt to subpoena the witness that had stated the victim pulled his weapon first. There could be no valid strategy for counsel's action because counsel's action "was based on a lack of vital information." Counsel's conduct was also deficient in failing to reassess the plea agreement and advise the client to withdraw from the agreement when it was apparent that the state would have grave difficulties if the defendant went to trial. Prejudice found because, if counsel had adequately investigated and adequately advised the defendant, the defendant would have insisted on going to trial.

State v. Henderson*, 93 P.3d 1231 (Mont. 2004). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to adequately consult with client, investigate, or conduct any research prior to advising defendant to plead guilty. Counsel "did nothing more than request a plea agreement and facilitate the conviction of his client without a trial." Prejudice found because there was at least a colorable argument and the defendant maintained his innocence in Alford plea. Had counsel performed adequately, the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea.

B. ERRONEOUS ADVICE (OR FAILURE TO ADVISE) ON SENTENCING OR COLLATERAL CONSEQUENCES THAT LEADS TO PLEA

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2019: Velazquez v. Superintendent, 937 F.3d 151 (3rd Cir. 2019). In case involving charges of burglary, intimidating a witness, terroristic threats, and harassment for incidents involving petitioner's paramour, and a charge of aggravated assault for an incident with a correctional officer, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the defective plea procedure which resulted in petitioner being deprived of the opportunity to enter a Guilty But Mentally Ill ("GBMI") plea. In exchange for a waiver of the right to a jury trial, Pennsylvania law permits a defendant to enter a GBMI plea. If the plea is accepted, the defendant has the opportunity to receive mental health treatment while serving his sentence. The waiver and entry of the plea are not enough to secure this opportunity, however. Instead, the trial judge must first examine certain reports, hold a hearing on the sole issue of the defendant's mental illness, and determine that the defendant was mentally ill at the time of the offense(s). After this process, if the trial judge does not accept the GBMI plea, the defendant's right to trial is returned. If the GBMI plea is accepted, the defendant may still have any sentence imposed on him which may lawfully be imposed on any defendant convicted of the same offense. However, the defendant has the opportunity for a hearing and a finding on the issue of whether he is severely mentally disabled and in need of treatment at the time of sentencing. The consequence of a severely-mentally-disabled-at-sentencing finding is that the defendant would be provided with mental health treatment while serving the sentence. In this case, given petitioner's history of mental illness, he agreed to enter a GBMI plea. Entry of the plea failed to proceed as required by statute, however. Instead, during the plea colloquy, the judge announced that he would go through the "guilty plea portion" that day, and then resolve the mentally ill aspect "most likely prior to the date set for sentencing" Understanding that this was anticipated to be a GBMI plea, he directed counsel to schedule the requisite hearings. Trial counsel agreed to this process, whereby after taking the plea, the judge would later hold a hearing with regard to the GBMI aspect of the plea. But trial counsel did not secure the requisite medical records or examinations for a GBMI plea, and no mental health hearing was held. He also did not object when the trial judge ultimately sentenced petitioner without holding the hearing to which the judge initially alluded. Nor did he take issue when the trial judge recorded the plea as "Guilty Plea," rather than "Guilty Plea/Mentally Ill" after both the plea hearing and sentencing. This first issue before the appeals court was whether it had jurisdiction to consider the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. The district court had ruled there was no federal habeas jurisdiction because petitioner's claim seeking mental health treatment during incarceration did not imply a change to the fact or duration of confinement. The appeals court disagreed, observing that granting the petition with respect to the GBMI claim "requires concluding that [petitioner's] guilty plea was invalid. Challenges to the validity of a guilty plea are among those that make up 'th[e] traditional scope of habeas corpus.'" Although petitioner sought access to mental health treatment as the appropriate remedy, in fact the appropriate remedy would be vacation of the judgment thereby allowing petitioner access to the process by which the opportunity to receive mental health treatment would be revived. As to the merits of the claim, it was reviewed de novo because the state courts failed to adjudicate it on the merits due to a misunderstanding of the allegations. Regarding deficient performance, the appeals court held:

Capital Case*

There is ample basis in the record to conclude that trial counsel was ignorant of the GBMI-plea procedures prescribed by Pennsylvania law. He concurred in the trial judge's suggestion that he would procure the necessary records and facilitate the requisite hearing, but failed to assure that this procedure was followed and failed to verify that the plea documents reflected the plea his client sought to enter. This falls below the performance expected of the counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment.

As to how prejudice can be established for a claim of this sort, the appeals court found that the combined effect of its decision in Vickers v. Superintendent Graterfors SCI, 858 F.3d 841 (3rd Cir. 2017), and the Supreme Court's decisions in Lee v. United States, 137 S.Ct. 1958 (2017), and Garza v. Idaho, 139 S.Ct. 738 (2019) is that petitioners alleging ineffective assistance of counsel resulting in a deprivation of process need not show that the decision to undergo the process would have resulted in a more favorable outcome. Instead, they need only demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's error(s), they would have made the decision—that is, chosen to exercise the right or take advantage of the opportunity of which they were deprived.

On the record in this case, prejudice is found because there is a reasonable probability that, but for trial counsel's failure to object to the defective plea procedure, petitioner would have taken advantage of the process of which he was deprived. There was no need to demonstrate that petitioner's GBMI plea was likely to be accepted or that a favorable finding of severe mental illness would result.

Doe v. United States*, 915 F.3d 905 (2nd Cir. 2019). Granting writ of coram nobis to petitioner whose trial counsel misadvised him on the immigration consequences of his guilty plea and relief under § 2255 was precluded. Although the Supreme Court had not yet issued Padilla v. Kentucky at the time of petitioner's plea, the Second Circuit had already held that an affirmative misrepresentation by counsel as to the deportation consequences of a guilty plea was objectively unreasonable. Indeed, the Government conceded both below and in the court of appeals that defense counsel performed deficiently by misadvising petitioner. Defense counsel admitted that he was unaware that deportation was mandatory for the offense to which Doe was considering pleading guilty. Rather than research the issue, defense counsel relied on the Government's assurance that it would do everything it could to keep Doe from being deported. Regarding prejudice, the record of petitioner's dealings with defense counsel demonstrated his concern about his immigration situation. Likewise, evidence about petitioner's background buttressed his later assertions that his focus was on remaining in the United States. Adding to his claim was what transpired at the plea hearing. Although petitioner was informed that deportation was possible, he was not told that he was pleading guilty to an aggravated felony or what the mandatory consequences of pleading guilty to an aggravated felony would be. Looking to the record, the court of appeals finds a reasonable probability that, had all parties been aware of the possibility of mandatory deportation, the Government would have been willing to charge Doe with [redacted] based on one or more specific transactions with a total loss amount under $10,000—rather than the higher loss and restitution amounts actually charged—in exchange for the cooperation that Doe promised in his plea deal. Given Doe’s promised cooperation, as well as the Government’s assurances during plea negotiations that it would do everything it could to prevent Doe’s removal, there is a reasonable probability that the Government would have accepted charging a lower loss amount.

There was also a reasonable probability that, had Doe known of the mandatory removal provision, Doe would have litigated an available defense.

There were ways for Doe to challenge both the charges themselves and the loss amount. Doe provided some of the evidence against himself during his proffer sessions, which Doe claims he would not have undertaken had his attorney told him about the possibility of mandatory deportation. Doe also might have contested intent, as he believed he had a good argument that he did not know the purpose of the [redacted] and was just [redacted].

Importantly, in assessing prejudice, there is more to consider than simply the likelihood of success at trial. Rather, the inquiry focuses on the defendant’s decision-making process. “Here, even if Doe were likely to lose, it would be far from irrational for Doe to litigate either the entire charge or the loss amount, given his strong interest in remaining in the country....As Doe can show that he had a reasonable probability either of negotiating a different plea or of going to trial or litigating the loss amount, he has proven that his counsel’s immigration misadvice was prejudicial.” To receive coram nobis relief, Doe also had to show sound reasons for his delay in seeking to vacate his conviction. On this record, Doe provided sufficient reasons to justify his delay. He relied on representations by his handlers that his immigration status would be taken care of. Once he finally realized that his handlers could not in fact assist him in gaining citizenship, he diligently pursued relief in the courts. The relief granted is vacation of the conviction and the guilty plea.

2015: United States v. Rodriguez-Vega, 797 F.3d 781 (9th Cir. 2015). Trial counsel ineffective in plea to misdemeanor attempted transportation of aliens case for failing to inform the defendant of the virtual certainty of her deportation following the plea. The defendant, who was born in Mexico, came to the United States with her family in 2001 when she was 12 years old. She became a lawful resident in 2002. She was charged in 2012 and initially rejected a plea agreement requiring her to stipulate to deportation following her criminal sentence. The revised plea agreement that she accepted included a general statement that “pleading guilty may have consequences with respect to her immigration status,” including the possibility of “automatic removal.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately advise the defendant. Counsel recognized and stated in sentencing that the misdemeanor plea would “probably” be considered an aggravated felony under immigration law and, therefore, there was “a high likelihood” of deportation. Nonetheless, counsel failed to investigate or research further, which would have revealed that deportation was a virtual certainty. The general provisions in the plea agreement and the trial court’s general warnings during the plea hearing were “simply irrelevant to the question whether counsel’s performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.” Prejudice was also established. If counsel had adequately advised the defendant, she could have negotiated a plea agreement not requiring removal, as four similarly situated defendants in the same district (S.D. Cal.) had been allowed to do. Even without a plea agreement, it was clear that the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea if she had been adequately advised. This was clear from her rejection of the initial plea offer.

United States v. Bui*, 795 F.3d 363 (3rd Cir. 2015). Counsel ineffective in guilty plea to manufacturing or distributing drugs in proximity to a school or college due to counsel’s erroneous advice on the statutory minimum. The defendant was charged with (1) conspiracy, (2) manufacturing more than 100 marijuana plants, (3) using the house he purchased near the school to manufacture and distribute; and (4) manufacturing and distributing in proximity to the school. The defendant pled guilty to counts one and four as part of a plea agreement in which the other charges were dismissed. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because he advised the defendant that he would receive a reduced sentence if he pled guilty pursuant to the “safety valve” provision. Consistent with these statements, counsel filed a motion prior to sentencing seeking a sentence reduction. At sentencing, however, counsel withdrew the motion because he realized Third Circuit precedent made convictions for manufacturing or distributing in proximity to a school ineligible for a safety valve reduction. The defendant received the mandatory minimum sentence. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. “Counsel’s lack of familiarity with an eighteen-year-old precedent and his erroneous advice based on that lack of familiarity demonstrate counsel’s performance fell below prevailing professional norms.” The court’s plea colloquy did not cure the err. Instead, the court’s statements “reinforce[d]” counsel’s incorrect advice by indicating the court had discretion to vary from the mandatory minimum without ever advising the defendant that he was ineligible for the safety valve reduction. Prejudice also established as the defendant would not have pled guilty if he had been accurately advised. Indeed, without a safety valve reduction, he “gained no benefit from his plea agreement,” as the dismissed charges were lesser-included offenses, “the elimination of which did not impact Bui’s sentencing exposure.”

2012: United States v. Akinsade, 686 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2012). Counsel ineffective in embezzlement by bank employee case for misadvising the defendant concerning immigration consequences of his guilty plea. The defendant was a Nigerian citizen who legally entered the U.S. in July 1988 at the age of 7. At age 19, he worked for the bank and embezzled funds. He self-reported his crimes and agreed to cooperate and provide evidence against others involved. Counsel’s conduct was deficient. The defendant asked on at least two different occasions if there would be deportation consequences to a guilty plea. Both times counsel informed the defendant that he could only be deported if convicted of two felony convictions, which was incorrect as deportation was mandatory for the plea to fraud which caused a loss of over $10,000. Thus, one conviction in this case as a result of a guilty plea would not require deportation. The plea agreement made no mention of possible deportation. The plea court advised the defendant that he “could be deported” based on the conviction. The defendant received the minimum sentence possible under the guidelines. Nine years later, after his three years supervised release was completed, he obtained college and Masters degrees and a high level job, the government instituted deportation proceedings. He brought a petition for writ of error coram nobis, which the Fourth Circuit found, in the circumstances of this case, to be an appropriate vehicle. Prejudice also established as the defendant would not have pleaded guilty if accurately advised. In addition, he was ordered to pay only $8,000 in restitution as he had a valid dispute about one check which placed him over the $10,000 amount. Thus, a choice to go to trial rather than enter a plea would have been “rational.”

United States v. Juarez*, 672 F.3d 381 (5th Cir. 2012). Counsel ineffective in failing to research and investigate the facts and law concerning a derivative citizenship defense prior to advising the defendant to plead guilty to lying about his United States citizenship and illegal re-entry after deportation following conviction for an aggravated felony. Citizenship is a defense to both of these offenses. It is “plausible,” however, that the defendant derived citizenship when his mother became a naturalized citizen in 1999, when he was 16 years old. Counsel was aware of the mother’s citizenship, but never heard of “the derivative citizenship defense.” The defense is applicable to the defendant: (1) if one parent is naturalized and the other is deceased; (2) the naturalization occurred when the defendant was under 18; and (3) the defendant began “to reside permanently” in the U.S. while under 18. Here, the only question was the latter as the defendant remained in the U.S. until he was deported in 2002 and even married a U.S. citizen prior to turning 18. The Fifth Circuit had not interpreted the provision before and declined to do so here because “[b]ased on the legal authority available at the time” of the guilty plea, “a derivative citizenship defense was plausible.” Counsel “had a duty to independently research the law and investigate the facts.” If counsel had performed adequately, “there is a reasonable probability that [the defendant] would have been dissuaded from pleading guilty.”

2011: United States v. Bonilla, 637 F.3d 980 (9th Cir. 2011). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of firearm case for failing to advise the defendant of immigration consequences of a plea. The 33-year-old Mexican-born defendant had been a lawful permanent resident for over 30 years and his wife and children were U.S. citizens. The defendant’s wife often spoke for him “due to his mental health condition.” Prior to the plea she asked counsel about immigration consequences of a plea. Counsel told her he would look into it but never did until after the plea hearing. When the defendant’s wife asked again, counsel informed her of the immigration consequences, which was that deportation was “presumptively mandatory.” Counsel stated that, at the time of the plea, she believed the defendant was a U.S. citizen. This was not just a case of “inadequate legal advice.” Here, the defendant “received no advice about immigration consequences of his plea.” “A criminal defendant who faces almost certain deportation is entitled to know more than that it is possible that a guilty plea could lead to removal; he is entitled to know that it is a virtual certainty.” It was reasonable for the defendant here “to have inferred that he likely would not be deported if he pled” from the fact that counsel did not say differently after having been asked the question by the defendant’s wife.

2010: Tovar Mendoza v. Hatch, 620 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in kidnapping, criminal sexual penetration and aggravated battery case for making blatant and significant misrepresentations regarding the sentence the petitioner would receive if he entered a no contest plea. Counsel had only a brief phone call with the petitioner and then met with him briefly prior to three scheduled plea hearings. Counsel informed petitioner that he had a special relationship with the judge and that the judge had agreed to sentence the petitioner to only three years. The defendant signed a plea agreement, which was in English, at counsel's instruction. Petitioner, a native Spanish speaker, could not read the agreement and it was not translated for him. Petitioner entered no contest pleas and faced up to 30 years confinements. He answered the court's questions during the plea colloquy with counsel instructing him how to answer each question. He was sentenced to 25 years. The court did not apply AEDPA standards because the federal court had held an evidentiary hearing while the state court had decided the issue without a hearing despite petitioner's diligence in attempting to develop the factual basis for his claims in state court. Thus, the court reviewed the claims de novo and held that the no contest pleas were involuntary and therefore constitutionally invalid.

Bauder v. Dept. of Corrections, State of Florida*, 619 F.3d 1272 (11th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in aggravated stalking of minor plea for affirmatively misinforming petitioner that his no contest plea would not expose him to subsequent sexually violent predator civil commitment proceedings. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the law was clear. Even assuming it was unclear, counsel did not inform petitioner that there was a possible risk of civil commitment, or that the law was unclear, or that counsel simply did not know. Rather counsel affirmatively advised petitioner incorrectly that his plea would not subject him to civil commitment exposure. Prejudice established because the evidence of guilt was not overwhelming, petitioner maintained his innocence throughout, and petitioner would not have entered a no contest plea if he had been correctly advised on the potential for civil commitment.

2005: United States v. Kwan, 407 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2005). Counsel in bank fraud case ineffective for affirmatively misleading the defendant as to the immigration consequences of his conviction. Counsel advised the defendant that deportation was not a "serious possibility." After the plea but prior to sentencing, statutory amendments, however, resulted in the guilty plea "almost certainly" resulting in deportation. "[W]here, as here, counsel has not merely failed to inform, but has effectively misled, his client about the immigration consequences of a conviction, counsel's performance is objectively unreasonable under contemporary standards for attorney competence."

That counsel may have misled [the defendant] out of ignorance is no excuse. It is a basic rule of professional conduct that a lawyer must maintain competence by keeping abreast of changes in the law and its practice. See, e.g., ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.1[6]. Although counsel was a criminal defense attorney and not an immigration attorney, counsel made an affirmative representation . . . that he had knowledge and experience regarding the immigration consequences of criminal convictions; as a result, counsel had a professional responsibility to inform himself and his client of significant changes in the law that drastically affected the immigration consequences of his client's plea. See generally ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.1. . . . If counsel did not have the requisite competence in immigration law, or if counsel did not plan on maintaining the requisite competence, he should not have advised [the defendant] regarding the immigration consequences of his plea without referring [him] to an immigration lawyer or consulting himself with an immigration lawyer in the first place. See id.

Capital Case*

“Counsel’s representations regarding the deportation consequences of [the] plea may not have been erroneous at the time he made them, but he failed to correct those representations when they became grossly misleading, and when counsel still had the opportunity, and responsibility, to do so.” Prejudice established because, if counsel had adequately advised the defendant and the court of the deportation consequences if sentenced to confinement for more than one year (rather than five as before), “there is a reasonable probability that the court would have imposed a sentence of less than one year.” Alternatively, there is a reasonable probability the defendant would have moved to withdraw his guilty plea and then gone to trial or renegotiated his plea agreement to avoid deportation.

2003: Moore v. Bryant, 348 F.3d 238 (7th Cir. 2003) (affirming 237 F. Supp. 2d 955 (C.D. Ill. 2002)).

Counsel was ineffective in murder case for giving erroneous advice on sentencing to the defendant prior to entry of his guilty plea. The defendant was fifteen years old and charged as an adult with first degree murder. Although the defendant maintained his innocence, counsel recommended that the defendant enter a plea in order to receive a recommendation of a 20- year sentence, which was the minimum allowed. Counsel informed the defendant that if he plead guilty he would only be required to serve fifty percent of the 20-year sentence, but that if he went to trial he would be given a higher sentence and would be subject to the new state statute that would require that the defendant serve at least 85 percent of his sentence. Although the defendant was very reluctant he followed counsel’s advice. Counsel’s advice was wrong because the new statute did not become effective until after the defendant’s trial and did not apply retroactively. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “[a] reasonably competent counsel will attempt to learn all of the facts of the case, make an estimate of a likely sentence, and communicate the results of that analysis before allowing his client to plead guilty.” Here, counsel recognized that his understanding of the statute might be incorrect, but he did not review the statute or case law to research the issue. Prejudice was found because the defendant, while maintaining innocence throughout, plead guilty solely because of counsel’s advice that he would only have to serve 10 years as opposed to 22 to 27 years if he went to trial and was found guilty. The state court’s decision was rejected under AEDPA for two reasons. First, the state court’s reliance on the adequacy of the plea judge’s colloquy was irrelevant to the underlying question of counsel’s effectiveness and, thus, was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Second, the state court’s finding that the record did not show that the defendant relied on counsel’s bad advice contradicted the testimony of the defendant and his counsel and, thus, was an unreasonable application of the facts to the law.

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Vincent v. Terra, 2024 WL 5008499 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 6, 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to advise petitioner of the possible immigration consequences of his guilty plea, i.e., the loss of citizenship and deportation to Haiti, a country petitioner left approximately thirty years earlier at age 9. Petitioner’s guilty plea encompassed crimes committed both before and after he applied for and was granted citizenship. Five months after his plea, petitioner was indicted on charges related to his denial of a criminal past in his naturalization application. If convicted of procuring citizenship unlawfully, his naturalization would automatically be revoked and, as a lawful permanent resident, he would be subject to deportation because of his felony record. First, any statute of limitations defense to the federal habeas petition was deliberately waived by respondent. Second, the procedural default of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim was excused by the ineffectiveness of state post-conviction counsel in failing to raise the claim. (In post-conviction proceedings, post-conviction counsel challenged the adequacy of the trial court's plea colloquy rather than counsel's performance.) In finding post-conviction counsel's performance deficient it is noted: (1) "[b]y omitting [petitioner's] Padilla claim and instead pursuing a claim that the guilty plea colloquy was deficient for failing to advise naturalized citizens of immigration consequences, PCRA counsel traded a claim that applied Supreme Court precedent for a claim that he knew was grounded in no precedent at all; (2) there was no reason that PCRA counsel could not have argued the claim that he raised in addition to petitioner's Padilla claim; and (3) although PCRA counsel initially prevailed on the novel theory that was raised, this victory was subsequently reversed due to lack of preservation. Regarding the merits of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim, the undisputed fact that plea counsel did not advise petitioner that he could possibly be deported was enough for a finding of deficient performance and any failure by petitioner to fully inform his plea attorney of his circumstances did not justify counsel's omissions. "Even assuming that it is true that [petitioner] never disclosed to counsel his immigration status or the representations he made during his naturalization process, Strickland and cases that interpret it do not impose that obligation on the client. They impose it on the attorney." And the fact that the precise immigration consequences of the plea may have been unclear did not absolve counsel of the duty to inform his client of the potential immigration ramifications. As to prejudice, petitioner was not required to show he would have turned down the plea and gone to trial had he received accurate advice. Rather, he only needed to establish that he would not have accepted the plea that was offered. Had petitioner known about the risk of deportation, "it is reasonably likely that he could have negotiated a different plea, such as the plea that [petitioner] negotiated with [respondent] in habeas litigation," a plea that removed the admission to commission of crimes that preceded the naturalization process. Even assuming that petitioner was required to show he would have gone to trial rather than accept the plea with the deportation consequences, he met that standard as well.

United States v. Ruel*, 2024 WL 4169547 (D. Nebraska Sept. 12, 2024). In drug trafficking/firearm case where petitioner turned down a binding 240-month plea agreement and was instead sentenced to 320 months after trial, trial counsel was ineffective for failing to advise petitioner during the plea-negotiation process of the possibility that he could be sentenced as a career offender. (Counsel conceded his deficient performance in failing to consider the United States Sentencing Guidelines career-offender enhancements or discuss those potential enhancements with petitioner at any time during the plea-negotiation process.) Prejudice is established as petitioner reliably asserted that he would have accepted the plea had he received correct advice. The remedy is for the government to reoffer the plea proposal that involved fewer offenses than petitioner was ultimately convicted of. The district court will then determine whether to exercise its discretion to vacate petitioner's earlier convictions

Brown v. Oliver*, 2024 WL 3202560 (D. Nev. June 26, 2024), appeal dismissed as moot, 182 F.4th 771 (9th Cir. 2026). In case where petitioner had been convicted of attempted sexual assault and, as part of his sentence, given "a special sentence of lifetime supervision . . . to commence upon release from any term of imprisonment, probation or parole," plea counsel related to a charged violation of the lifetime supervision requirements was ineffective in several respects. First, counsel was deficient in failing to properly advise petitioner prior to the plea that amendments to Nevada's lifetime supervision statute that were made after the underlying offense of attempted sexual assault but prior to the violation could not be applied to him under the Ex Post Facto Clause. (This mattered because, under the amendments, the violation was a felony rendering the habitual offender statute applicable to petitioner when there was new criminal conduct. Before petitioner was sentenced for the violation, he was charged with robbery and use of a deadly weapon. Petitioner was thereafter adjudged a habitual criminal and sentenced to 5 to 20 years.) In denying relief on this claim, the state court found that there was no ex post facto violation. The state court's decision, however, was contrary to federal law, as explained in detail in the district court's opinion. Because there was a clear basis for plea counsel to have made an ex post facto violation argument, counsel's failure to do so—and failure to advise petitioner not to plead guilty—fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. Although the record was devoid of evidence explaining the basis for plea counsel's inaction regarding the ex post facto issue, petitioner overcame the strong presumption of adequate assistance “because there can be no reasonable professional judgment or strategic decision for failing to argue an ex post facto violation that would expose a client to a mere misdemeanor over a felony and related habitual criminal status.” As to prejudice, because petitioner's alleged violation(s) were only chargeable as a misdemeanor under the pre-offense version of the statute, absent plea counsel's failures, petitioner would not have been facing a new felony conviction and the State could not have sought habitual criminal status. There is a reasonable probability that, but for his counsel's errors, petitioner would not have pleaded guilty and the result of the proceeding would have been different. Plea counsel was also deficient in failing to advise petitioner to withdraw his guilty plea prior to sentencing on the ground that of the three supervision provisions he had been alleged to have violated, two had been invalidated by a recent state supreme court decision. The state court found no deficiency given that petitioner pleaded guilty to a single violation and he admitted to violating the lawful condition. The flaw with this analysis, however, was that petitioner admitted guilt to the three conditions read in the conjunctive, leaving the possibility that counsel allowed petitioner to plead guilty to violating an invalid condition. The state court's finding of no deficiency involved an unreasonable application of Strickland. As to the merits, even without an explanation in the record explaining plea counsel's inaction, petitioner overcame the strong presumption of adequate assistance “because there can be no reasonable professional judgment or strategic decision behind failing to inform a client about relevant new authority and using that relevant new authority to the benefit of the client.” Regarding prejudice, it is noted that one of the two times petitioner moved to withdraw his guilty plea was post-sentencing when he learned about the recent legal precedent. This “demonstrated that the inclusion of the two unlawful conditions was a main consideration in [petitioner's] decision to plead guilty.” On this record, there is a reasonable probability that, but for plea counsel's deficiency, petitioner would have chosen to withdraw his guilty plea and insisted on going to trial.

United States v. Williams*, 2024 WL 1639012 (N.D. Ohio April 16, 2024). In case where movant was a minor participant in a multi-defendant drug trafficking conspiracy, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to properly calculate the applicable guidelines range and by recommending that movant sign a plea agreement to the incorrect range which the sentencing court relied upon when imposing sentence.

Hubbard v. Ransom*, 2024 WL 1118978 (M.D. Pa. March 14, 2024). Plea counsel performed deficiently by informing petitioner that, per the plea deal, his new sentence would run concurrently to his backtime for the sentence petitioner was already serving. Pursuant to state law, this was not permissible. Post-conviction (PCRA) counsel was thereafter deficient in advising petitioner on the potential consequences of a grant of relief on the claim, which led petitioner to withdraw his PCRA petition and receive a procedural default of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim. (PCRA counsel told petitioner that receiving a new trial or new guilty plea could not result in a concurrent sentence, as that was barred by statute.) Under existing state law, there was a remedy for petitioner's predicament that PCRA counsel did not advise petitioner of. If a defendant, like petitioner, reasonably relied upon the advice of his counsel and the expression of that specific promise stated in open court by the assistant district attorney, he was entitled to the benefit of the plea bargain irrespective of the statute otherwise prohibiting it. Under Martinez, the default is excused and merits relief is granted.

2023: Rucker v. Warden, 2023 WL 2599519 (N.D. Indiana March 21, 2023). In child molestation case, trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by not informing petitioner that his guilty plea would result in his classification as a sexually violent predator by operation of law, which entailed a mandatory lifetime term of parole. (Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was overcome under Martinez because petitioner was not provided with post-conviction counsel in state court.) Regarding prejudice, the record indicated that petitioner "entered a guilty plea with minimal confidence in his decision and particularly concerned with the continued threat of reincarceration following his release from physical custody." It was therefore found "that, if [petitioner] had been informed that he would necessarily be subjected to lifetime parole, he would not have pleaded guilty." And although obtaining a favorable jury verdict would not have been easy in light of the evidence in the case, the incriminating evidence was not so overwhelming as to call a decision to decline the plea offer irrational.

2020: United States v. Ferrera, 2020 WL 7342673 (S.D. N.Y. Dec. 14, 2020). In drug case, granting writ of error coram nobis on claim that petitioner's attorney provided erroneous advice with respect to the immigration consequences of petitioner's guilty plea. Because petitioner, a Cuban citizen and legal permanent resident of the United States, was no longer in custody at the time deportation proceedings were initiated against him, a petition for writ of error coram nobis was the only vehicle to challenge his conviction. Plea counsel's advice to petitioner concerning the potential impact of the guilty plea on petitioner's immigration status was premised on counsel's understanding that the United States had a longstanding policy of not deporting Cuban nationals. However understandable it was for counsel to view deportation as unlikely, "his failure to clearly inform [petitioner] that his guilty plea would subject him to mandatory deportation constitutes objectively unreasonable representation." Prejudice is established because petitioner (1) "placed particular emphasis on immigration consequences in deciding whether to plead guilty," (2) had "a strong connection to the United States" in that he had lived in the U.S. for eighteen years, his wife and son were U.S. citizens, he had been gainfully employed by the same company for the last eighteen years, and he paid taxes, and (3) there were possible deals that might have been negotiated that increased time of incarceration but eliminated mandatory deportation or petitioner would have been willing to take the risk of a trial. That petitioner's plea agreement stated that his "guilty plea and conviction make it very likely that his deportation from the United States is presumptively mandatory" did not cure trial counsel's deficient representation. Nor did the advice of rights given by the judge at the plea colloquy. In both instances, petitioner may have interpreted the deportation provisions as not applying to him given counsel's advice about the special status of Cuban nationals. In addition, the language used in both the agreement and the advice of rights was not completely accurate.

Klaiber v. United States*, 471 F.Supp.3d 696 (D. Md. 2020). In drug/firearm case, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to advise petitioner that "he had likely not obtained derivative citizenship and, relatedly, that if he were not a citizen, pleading guilty to aggravated felonies would result in his certain deportation." Plea counsel sought out and received advice from an immigration attorney who informed counsel on the elements of derivative citizenship and how petitioner likely failed to meet them. Rather than communicate to petitioner such information clearly and succinctly, plea counsel instead informed petitioner that his citizenship was an "open question," and that in her view, petitioner "was a U.S. citizen until proven otherwise." She further told him that he "potentially" could be deported if he pleaded guilty in accordance with the plea agreement and did not explain that deportation was a mandatory consequence for a non-citizen. Prejudice is established from counsel's deficient representation. Petitioner had been in the United States since he was eight-years old, having come with his parents from Guyana where he now knows no one. His entire nuclear and extended family are United States Citizens. For nearly four decades, he had embraced the United States as his home. The record reflected that in order to avoid the catastrophic result of deportation, petitioner was prepared to defend vigorously against the criminal charges. Neither the plea agreement nor the Rule 11 proceeding – which generally warned that petitioner "may be subject to deportation or other loss of immigration status" --corrected counsel's errors. If anything, the Rule 11 proceeding supported a showing of prejudice. (During this proceeding petitioner affirmed his belief that he was a citizen, an assertion that was then corroborated by his defense counsel and the PSR, and not challenged by the Government.)

Khatkarh v. Becerra*, 442 F.Supp.3d 1277 (E.D. Cal. 2020). Defense counsel performed deficiently in failing to advise petitioner that by pleading no contest to assault with a firearm, petitioner would face mandatory deportation if he received a sentence of 365 days or more, counting the initial sentence and in the aggregate time served upon any violation of probation or parole. On the record of this case, petitioner established that, absent his trial counsel's deficient performance, there was a reasonable probability he would have taken his case to trial if he could not secure a plea deal that protected him against deportation. Supporting this finding was the fact that petitioner has resided in the United States since the age of three years old, his entire family, including his mother, father and sister, reside in the United States and petitioner has no relatives or friends remaining in India. In addition, petitioner, who has borderline intellectual functioning, is completely dependent upon his family for support.

2019: United States v. Young, 2019 WL 1928484 (D. Ore. April 30, 2019). In case where petitioner pleaded guilty to Felon in Possession of a Firearm pursuant to a plea agreement, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to argue against the application of the mandatory minimum sentence under the Armed Career Criminal Act (“ACCA”) on the ground that three of petitioner’s state court predicate convictions did not qualify as “serious drug offenses” under the ACCA, and, without them, the ACCA criteria was not met. Defense counsel conceded that at the time of the plea he was aware of existing Ninth Circuit precedent that was relevant to the issue, although it construed Oregon law in the context of an immigration case. While defense counsel initially believed that the ACCA’s definition of a “serious drug offense” was broader than the immigration statute at issue in the Ninth Circuit case, counsel became less certain of that conclusion as the time for sentencing neared. Before sentencing, defense counsel even encouraged petitioner to explore the possibility of challenging his ACCA eligibility with post-conviction counsel. Defense counsel was unaware at the time of sentencing of a then-three-day-old Oregon Federal District Court decision that applied the Ninth Circuit immigration precedent to the ACCA. Defense counsel admitted that he should have known about that decision and, if he had, he would have advised petitioner to withdraw his guilty plea. Giving particular consideration to defense counsel’s declaration, deficient performance and prejudice are found.

Hampton v. United States*, 2019 WL 931922 (E.D. Mo. Feb. 26, 2019). Petitioner, who pleaded guilty to one count of Discharging a Firearm in Furtherance of a Crime of Violence Resulting in Murder in violation of 18 U.S.C §§ 924(c) and (j), received ineffective assistance by his defense counsel who erroneously advised him that his sentence could run concurrently with the other sentences he was currently serving. In fact, a statute mandated that the sentence run consecutively. Deficient performance is established, as is prejudice as the district court found credible petitioner’s testimony that but for his counsel’s erroneous advice, he would not have pled guilty and would have insisted on proceeding to trial.

2018: United States v. Hernandez, 283 F. Supp. 3d 144 (S.D. N.Y. 2018). Writ of coram nobis is granted to petitioner based on trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to advise petitioner that her guilty plea to a charge of conspiracy to distribute cocaine rendered her removable from the country. Petitioner was a legal permanent resident (LPR) when she was charged with conspiracy to commit narcotics trafficking. She retained counsel and informed him that she would not plead guilty to any charge if the plea would cause her to lose her LPR status. After being assured that the guilty plea would not have immigration consequences, petitioner accepted the offered plea deal. She was sentenced to time served and three years of supervised release. Almost three years later, the Department of Homeland Security issued a Notice to Appear and said petitioner was removable as a consequence of her conviction. Retained counsel’s ineffectiveness demonstrated circumstances compelling the issuance of the writ to achieve justice. Counsel failed entirely to inform petitioner of the immigration consequences of her guilty plea, and she did not receive information about those consequences from any other source. There were two immigration statutes that set forth the basis for petitioner’s removability; at least one of those statutes clearly and definitely established the removal consequences for her underlying plea. Although counsel was dead at the time of the filing of petitioner’s motion for a writ of coram nobis, it was appropriate to accept petitioner’s testimony about her counsel’s failure to inform her of the immigration consequences because the Board of Immigration Appeals had already found her counsel ineffective in a similar legal context. (Petitioner’s retained counsel had represented her in the removal proceeding. After being ordered deported, petitioner retained new counsel who successfully moved to reopen the removal proceedings based on the ineffective representation of the prior attorney. At the time of this decision, petitioner’s asylum application remained pending.) Petitioner also demonstrated a reasonable probability that she would have rejected the plea had she known it would lead to mandatory deportation. She had maintained LPR status in the U.S. since 1992, residing in the U.S. for 11 years prior to taking the plea and for 26 years total. She had four children residing in the U.S. By pleading guilty she certainly was exposed to mandatory deportation; by going to trial, even if she was likely to be convicted, she only almost certainly was exposed to deportation. Lee v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1958, 1968-69 (2017). Petitioner also showed sound reasons for failing to seek a writ of coram nobis earlier – her ineffective counsel continued to represent her and continued to fail to render effective counsel throughout the immigration proceedings. Petitioner continues to suffer legal consequences from her conviction, and therefore has met all the requirements of a petition for writ of error coram nobis.

2017: Tzen v. United States, 2017 WL 4233077 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 22, 2017). Petitioner, a citizen of the U.K., pled guilty in federal court after being charged with conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, and she was sentenced to 12 months and one day, 3 years supervised release, and ordered to pay restitution. She filed a motion under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 alleging that her counsel was ineffective for (1) failing to investigate the law and facts before advising her to plead guilty, since she never joined the conspiracy; (2) failing to inform her that the guilty plea would result in mandatory deportation; (3) misadvising her regarding her sentencing exposure; and (4) failing to investigate and object to the loss amount that exceeded that attributable to petitioner. The court focused only on the second claim that her counsel failed to inform petitioner that the guilty plea would result in mandatory deportation. Under Lee v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1958 (2017), petitioner is entitled to relief on this claim. The focus of her decision-making in whether to accept a plea was whether she would be deported; she consulted another lawyer at the time of trial to advise her on this issue. Both her lawyers consulted together on this issue, and the lawyer sent the prosecutor an email stating that petitioner is not to be deported. Although petitioner was advised she “may” be deported, she was not informed that she “would” be deported. The advice she was given “was confusing, conflicting, and wrong.” She did not make a rational decision to plead guilty as a result of the IAC, and relief is granted.

Jenkins v. Plumley*, 2017 WL 1091791 (N.D. West Virginia, March 23, 2017), appeal dismissed, 700 Fed.Appx. 278 (4th Cir. 2017). Resentencing counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately advise defendant as to the consequences of resentencing. Defendant was convicted of breaking and entering and sexual assault. The State requested that he be designated as a recidivist based on his two prior felony convictions, permitting the imposition of a life sentence. The jury determined defendant was a recidivist under the statute, and the State requested that he be sentenced to three separate life sentences to run consecutively. Instead, the trial judge announced his belief that the recidivist statute required him to sentence defendant to a single life sentence. The State then sought to withdraw the recidivist request, noting that defendant would be eligible for parole after fifteen years under a single life sentence, but not until after twenty-one years if he were sentenced individually on each charge. The trial court granted the motion to withdraw and sentenced defendant to individual, consecutive sentences as to each charge for a total sentence of twenty-one to sixty-five years. Defendant filed a pro se motion to correct his sentence and counsel was appointed to represent him. Counsel failed to advise defendant that he would be resentenced to a longer sentence than he originally received if he pursued resentencing. Defendant was resentenced as a recidivist to twenty-six years to life. Resentencing counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately advise defendant of the consequences of pursuing resentencing. Respondent argued that defendant suffered no prejudice because his original sentence was illegal and had to be corrected. However, “[h]ad [defendant’s] counsel advised him that his total sentence could increase if his motion to correct his sentence were granted, he could have explored advocating for other sentencing options regarding which sentence should be enhanced and whether his sentences should run concurrently or consecutively.” Jenkins, 2017 WL 1091791 at *3. Thus, defendant was prejudiced because he could have received a different sentence had competent counsel been provided.

2013: Ross v. Wolfe, 942 F. Supp. 2d 573 (D. Md. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in assault case “when he lied to his client in order to persuade him to accept a plea bargain.” The defendant was charged with assaulting five people, “apparently while he was high on PCP.” Counsel did not think the case was triable and he urged a guilty plea. The defendant, however, wanted to proceed to trial with a voluntary intoxication defense. Ultimately, counsel had the defendant to sign two “memoranda of understanding” that essentially indicated that the defendant was accepting “a proposed plea agreement” to plead guilty to four charges. Although the maximum sentence was 100 years, the memoranda informed the defendant that the “typical disposition” was a guideline range of 45-100 years but that there was “a binding recommendation” from the prosecutor to require drug treatment but then the defendant would be “safe to resume life in the community” in less than ten years of confinement. The defendant entered Alford pleas and was sentenced to 70 years. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in that counsel “affirmatively misled” the defendant as there was no agreement with the prosecution to make a sentence recommendation. This “error” was compounded by counsel’s “misleading advice” as to his own expectations of the likely sentence. This case thus involved not just “gross information” from defense counsel of the likely sentence which “were unrealistic and bordered on fantasy,” but also “the additional element of intentional misrepresentation by defense counsel as to the prosecutor’s expectations.” Prejudice was established as “[t]he evidence is unrefuted that [the defendant] would not have pleaded guilty if he had thought he would wind up with the lengthy prison sentence he received following his plea. And a choice to go to trial would have been rational” as the defendant was 55 years old at the time of his plea and “honestly could expect to breathe his last breath either way while in prison.” “In short, he had nothing to lose by going to trial.” The state court’s conclusion that counsel was not ineffective “rested upon ‘thin air’” in that the court made “no factual findings as to whether the material misadvice . . . ‘was within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases.’”

Bluntly, defense counsel may not lie to his client to persuade him to do what counsel “knows” is in the client’s best interest. And fair-minded jurists could not disagree about that standard of professional conduct. Moreover, the record evidence commands a conclusion of ineffective assistance of counsel. Therefore, the state court’s conclusion to the contrary is objectively unreasonable.

Because the state court never addressed the prejudice question, “no deference is owed to the state court on that point” and the issue was reviewed de novo.

2009: Alam v. United States, 630 F. Supp. 2d 647 (W.D.N.C. 2009). Counsel ineffective in illegal gambling case for failing to adequately advise the defendant on deportation consequences prior to entry of the plea and failing to seek to withdraw the plea after counsel learned his previous advice to the defendant was erroneous. The defendant, a Pakistani citizen with permanent legal resident status, was one of 41 defendants indicted in a public corruption case. From the beginning he informed counsel that he was concerned about the impact of a conviction on his immigration status. Counsel allegedly contacted several immigration attorneys and personally researched the issue prior to advising the defendant that he would not be deported following a plea. Based on this advice, the defendant pled guilty. Prior to sentencing, counsel received a letter from one of those immigration lawyers alerting him to the fact that the conviction would result in deportation. Nonetheless, counsel advised the defendant not to move to withdraw the plea because it might impact his usefulness to the government at the upcoming trial of the former County Sheriff. Counsel suggested that he would take up the deportation issue with the prosecutors, who had no desire for the defendant to be deported, after sentencing and the trial of the Sheriff in which the defendant testified. The question of deportation was not even addressed in court until the court made an inquiry in a hearing related to the government's subsequent motion to reduce the defendant's sentence. Original trial counsel had been replaced by that point and this 2255 was then filed. Regardless of whether counsel consulted with other attorneys, his "advice regarding the immigration consequences of petitioner's plea was undeniably grossly inaccurate, given that the governing statute . . . explicitly enumerates" petitioner's crime as one requiring removal. "[T]he plain language of the applicable immigration statutes compels the conclusion that Counsel grossly misinformed petitioner on this subject." Counsel also "grossly misinformed" the defendant that he could prevent deportation later by obtaining the government's cooperation when "the government has no such discretion" in cases of conviction of these crimes. Prejudice established because the defendant provided a credible affidavit stating that he would not have pled guilty if he had been adequately advised. The court also found no reason to doubt this where the defendant had been a U.S. resident for 25 years, was married to a permanent legal resident, had children that were native-born U.S. citizens, had a successful business independent of the illegal gambling, and had few, if any, remaining ties to "Pakistan, a currently unstable country."

2008: United States v. Choi, 581 F. Supp. 2d 1162 (N.D. Fla. 2008). Counsel ineffective in relying on the advice of an employee of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement that the defendant would probably not be deported if he pled guilty. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, "under the facts of this case, relying on a government agent's advice rather than performing one's own legal research fell short of an objective level of reasonableness. The governing statutes made clear on their face that this conviction would result in [the defendant's] mandatory deportation, subject only to narrow exceptions that [the defendant] plainly could not meet."

Sasonov v. United States*, 575 F. Supp. 2d 626 (D.N.J. 2008). Counsel in bribery of public official case ineffective for several reasons. First, counsel affirmatively misrepresented the immigration consequences of a guilty plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel informed the defendant that, as a resident alien with a green card, he would not be subject to deportation following his plea. Prejudice established because "it is likely that Petitioner would have taken his chances at trial because he faced only six to twelve months more than the sentence he received," due to his guilty plea. Second, counsel failed to conduct discovery and, thus, failed to argue petitioner's minor role in the crimes and failed to establish that the value of the benefit received from the bribe was less than $10,000, which would have prevented a four-point enhancement of the offense level. Prejudice established because the court might otherwise have reduced the sentence to less than one year or at least allowed the defendant “to negotiate a more favorable plea agreement with the Government.”

2007: United States v. Marcos-Quiroga, 478 F.Supp.2d 1114 (N.D. Iowa 2007). Counsel ineffective in guilty plea to drug trafficking offense for erroneously advising the defendant he would not qualify for sentencing as a career offender. The court’s ruling was entered based on a motion to withdraw the guilty plea and a pro se motion for appointment of new counsel prior to sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the defendant had prior convictions in Iowa for felony delivering cocaine and misdemeanor assault with intent to commit sexual abuse. “[T]here should have been no doubt . . . [that the] two prior convictions . . . would qualify him for career offender status. Thus, counsel certainly could have predicted with a fair degree of certainty that [he] would be sentenced as a career offender.” Id. at 1135 (emphasis in original). Prejudice found because the defendant likely would not have plead guilty absent counsel’s erroneous advice. Motion to withdraw guilty plea and for appointment of new counsel granted.

3. Military Cases

2012: United States v. Rose, 71 M.J. 138 (C.A.A.F. 2012). Counsel ineffective in indecent assault plea for failing to adequately advise the accused of sex offender registration consequences of the plea. The accused faced a number of charges. His first proposed pretrial agreement sent to the prosecution offered to plead guilty to all charges except the three specifications of indecent assault. He made clear to counsel that he was concerned about the possibility of having to register as a sex offender. Counsel did not believe it would be “a registerable offense” but never learned the answer. He conceded, however, that he would not have advised the accused to plead guilty to those charges if offender registration was required. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as counsel violated the professional duty to “promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.” Prejudice was clear as the accused would not have pled guilty to these charges if adequately advised.

4. State Cases

2024: State v. Clayton, 405 So.3d 592 (La. App. 2024). Trial court abused its discretion in denying defendant’s post-sentencing motion to withdraw his guilty plea where text messages supported his claim that his retained attorney, who was suspended from the practice of law during some of his communications with defendant, had erroneously advised him that the plea deal included probation instead of prison. Although defendant was accurately advised of the sentencing range during the plea colloquy, defendant demonstrated trial counsel induced his misunderstanding of the possible sentence and that trial counsel’s representations rendered the guilty pleas involuntary and uninformed. Defendant established that, but for trial counsel’s errors, he would not have pled guilty and would have gone to trial.

Commonwealth v. Ramirez-Contreras*, 320 A.3d 756 (Pa. Super. 2024). In case where petitioner, a lawful permanent resident of the United States, pleaded guilty to sex-related crimes on the advice of counsel and was subject to deportation upon release from prison, counsel was ineffective in failing to ascertain the potential immigration consequences of the plea. “Plea counsel’s casual advice that [petitioner] ‘could’ speak to an immigration attorney, without even alerting [petitioner] that his charges ‘may’ carry a risk of adverse immigration consequences, falls short of the responsibilities of competent counsel.” The written guilty plea colloquy—asking “If you are not a citizen of the United States, do you understand that entering a guilty plea may result in certain immigration consequences and that an attorney would be able to advise you on those issues?”---was insufficient to show petitioner received adequate advice. Indeed, the record indicated that petitioner was misled to believe that he would be eligible for work release and be able to continue living as before, outside the requirements of probation and sex offender registration. “Considering the severity of the consequences of deportation, [petitioner’s] and plea counsel’s demonstrated lack of knowledge of the impact of his guilty plea on his immigration status, and [petitioner’s] statement that he would not have accepted the plea agreement had he known that it would lead to his deportation, we find that he made a sufficient showing of prejudice to satisfy his burden.”

2023: Stephenson v. Commissioner of Correction, 305 A.3d 266 (Conn. App. 2023). In case involving two counts of larceny in the sixth degree, affirming grant of habeas relief on claim that plea counsel was ineffective for failing to properly advise petitioner that the negotiated plea deal would render petitioner, a citizen of Jamaica and a lawful permanent resident of the United States, subject to mandatory deportation.

The fact that [plea counsel] consulted with an immigration expert, who either gave him incorrect advice or whose advice [plea counsel] simply misunderstood, cannot excuse [plea counsel’s] failure to advise the petitioner accurately regarding the immigration consequences of his guilty pleas, as required under Padilla. We are not aware of any exception to the requirement set forth in Padilla for such situations. The fact remains that the petitioner was entitled under the sixth amendment to be informed accurately of the immigration consequences of his guilty pleas.

Key v. State*, 357 So.3d 1227 (Fla. App. Ct. 2023). In attempted murder case where trial counsel misadvised petitioner on his sentencing exposure, leading petitioner to reject a 15-year pre-trial offer and receive a post-trial sentence of 30 years in prison because of his status as a habitual felony offender, the post-conviction court erred in finding that petitioner failed to establish a reasonable probability that the plea would have been accepted by the trial court. “[A]n objective assessment of the circumstances at the time of the plea offer does not reveal any particular fact that would have caused the prosecutor to withdraw the offer or the judge not to accept the plea.” On remand, the post-conviction court shall determine the proper remedy.

People v. Lee*, 239 N.E.3d 597 (Il. App. 2023). In case where defendant pleaded guilty to aggravated vehicular hijacking and was then sentenced to a mandatory term of natural life pursuant to the Habitual Criminal Act, plea counsel was ineffective for having led his client to believe that the life sentence was discretionary. Although defendant, in moving to withdraw his guilty plea, had not submitted a supporting affidavit or given testimony directly asserting that his counsel advised him the sentence was discretionary, the record supported this conclusion. Prior to sentencing, defendant had prepared a written letter in which he implored the court to impose a term less than natural life. This revealed that defendant entered the plea hearing believing the court had discretion and suggested his lawyer had advised him so. Additionally, during the sentencing proceeding, defendant's attorney effectively advised defendant that the court had sentencing discretion, stating, "I submit it's not mandatory, that the Court still has discretion to not sentence him to life." Notably, counsel said this after the court read the governing statute aloud, counsel asked to view the statute, and the court explained, "a mandatory life sentence must be imposed in this case." That defendant met the criteria under the Habitual Criminal Act and that, therefore, a life sentence was mandatory, was clear on the facts of this case. "Thus, counsel's failure to inform [defendant] he faced a mandatory life sentence if he pled guilty was objectively unreasonable." Prejudice is established by the record evidence indicating that defendant "placed paramount importance on avoiding a natural life sentence." Although defendant faced long odds had he chosen to go to trial, given a certain life sentence versus an almost certain life sentence, it cannot be said that "the choice to go to trial would have been irrational." That defendant received nothing for the guilty plea further supported the finding of a reasonable probability defendant would have rejected the plea had he been correctly advised of its consequences. The trial court's comment/question to the prosecutor during the plea colloquy—"It's my understanding that because of your extensive background, you're mandatory life. Is that correct?"—did not cure the prejudice given that "the trial court never directly informed [defendant] that a mandatory life sentence applied if he pled guilty or inquired whether [defendant] understood that would be the consequence of his plea." The trial court's finding that defendant understood a mandatory life sentence applied if he pled guilty "is against the manifest weight of the evidence" and "the trial court abused its discretion by denying [defendant's] motion to withdraw his guilty plea."

2021: Hefley v. State, 626 S.W.3d 244 (Mo. 2021). In driving while intoxicated case where petitioner was sentenced to nine years imprisonment, plea counsel was ineffective in misadvising petitioner prior to his guilty plea that he would be eligible for a long-term treatment program when in fact petitioner was statutorily ineligible for such treatment. At the post-conviction hearing, plea counsel testified that petitioner had agreed to the plea based on counsel's representation that he would argue for long-term treatment. Although there was no guarantee that petitioner would ultimately be accepted into long-term treatment, petitioner was affirmatively told he was eligible for that program and it was not until after petitioner was sentenced that plea counsel discovered petitioner's ineligibility. Petitioner testified that he would not have pleaded guilty had he known that long term treatment was not an option. In seeking to withdraw his plea, petitioner acknowledged that having his plea set aside could subject him to the full range of punishment of which he would have to serve 85 percent as a habitual offender. Prejudice is established from counsel's deficient advice as the record shows that, but for plea counsel's error, petitioner would not have entered the guilty plea and would have insisted on proceeding to trial.

People v. Saunders*, 193 A.D.3d 766 (N.Y. App. Div. 2nd Dept. 2021). Affirming finding that defendant, a citizen of Jamaica and lawful permanent resident of the United States, was denied effective assistance of counsel by his attorney's erroneous advice that a plea to criminal contempt in the second degree would not render defendant deportable. Prejudice was established, despite the absence of testimony by defendant, given the testimony by defense counsel and defendant's former immigration counsel who both testified that defendant had been focused on the immigration consequences of his plea and he decided to plead guilty only after receiving the incorrect advice. There was no error in the lower court's determination that defendant could have rationally decided to forgo the plea and proceed to trial notwithstanding the apparent strength of the case against him. Of note was the evidence that defendant had resided in the United States since 1988 and had five children, all citizens of the United States, whose care and well-being were priorities for him. Finally, the fact that the immigration court had earlier ordered defendant deported without relying exclusively on the defendant's conviction of criminal contempt in the second degree was not dispositive of the issue of prejudice.

2020: People v. O'Hearn, 270 Cal.Rptr.3d 901 (Cal.App. 2020). Reversing the denial of defendant's motion to withdraw his plea of guilty to the making of criminal threats and a probation violation where trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate either his client's mental health or the facts and circumstances of the charged offense (which could have supported defenses to the charge), despite having been told of defendant's prior mental problems and having his own immediate doubts whether defendant was competent to stand trial. (The charges in this case were based on defendant yelling at and threatening to kill two of his elderly neighbors.) The deficient investigation was prejudicial because evidence of defendant's substantial history of serious mental illness could have been used to negate the intent element of the criminal threats charge. In addition, had defense counsel conducted a reasonable investigation, he would have recognized the potential for arguing that the victims were familiar with defendant's frequent unconventional behavior and aware it had never resulted in violence, which would have eliminated or at least diminished their fear for their own safety. (The criminal threat statute required proof that the threat at issue "was so clear, immediate, unconditional, and specific that it communicated to the victim a serious intention and the immediate prospect that the threat would be carried out;" that "[t]he threat actually caused the victim to be in sustained fear for her own safety;" and that "the victim's fear was reasonable under the circumstances.") Finally, defense counsel's failure to inform defendant that he was pleading to a strike, which exposed him to future confinement in state prison, deprived defendant of information necessary to making an informed decision.

Harrison v. State*, 595 S.W.3d 879 (Tex. App. 2020). Where, pursuant to a plea agreement, defendant pled no contest to a charge of injury to a child by omission and guilty to a charge of tampering with evidence, plea counsel violated defendant's constitutional rights by failing to inform the defendant of a pre-conviction/sentence comment by the trial judge about possible sentencing. The defendant owned a daycare business where a baby died in her care and defendant destroyed certain evidence concerning phone calls made and texts she sent prior to calling 911. After defendant entered her pleas, the judge initially stated he would find the defendant guilty of the first charge. Plea counsel replied that deferred adjudication was available for that charge, leading the judge to not make the finding of guilt and instead reset the case for a sentencing hearing the next week. Prior to the hearing, plea counsel was in the judge's chambers when the court coordinator asked the trial judge if he wanted to see caselaw on the permissibility of a deferred adjudication as a sentence in this case. The judge responded: "A deferred on an injury to a child case where there's a dead baby? I don't think so." Plea counsel decided not to inform defendant of this exchange and defendant subsequently received the maximum sentence, 20 years, on the injury-to-a-child charge, and 2 years on the tampering charge. With new counsel, defendant moved for a new trial, stating that she would not have gone to the judge for punishment if she had known that deferred adjudication would not be considered. The presiding judge heard and denied the motion following a hearing. The appellate court reversed, ruling that “the proper application of McCoy under these facts is to ask whether [defendant] was deprived of the opportunity to ask to withdraw her plea or for a jury trial, which was her right.” On this record, where plea counsel knew that the defendant would have changed her position had she known about the judge’s comment, “defense counsel were deficient when they failed to tell [defendant] of the judge’s statement implicating his ability to consider the full range of punishment, thus depriving [defendant] of the opportunity to maintain her innocence. Accordingly, counsel’s representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.” And because defendant “demonstrated that if she had all the information, she would have asked to withdraw her plea and for a jury trial, she has demonstrated prejudice.”

2019: Merriweather v. State, 2019 WL 4257010 (Tenn. Crim. App. Sept. 6, 2019). In carjacking/aggravated robbery case, reversing the denial of relief by the post-conviction court and holding that trial counsel was ineffective in advising petitioner to plead guilty. When combined with misstatements by the trial court, the guilty plea was not knowing or voluntary. The post-conviction court had found that trial counsel and co-counsel were both prepared, informed and had communicated with petitioner. The record, however, “preponderate[d] against the findings of the post-conviction court.” According to trial counsel, the only time he met with petitioner was the day of the scheduled trial and that meeting lasted approximately half an hour. “Regardless of trial counsel’s other preparations in this case, we cannot say that trial counsel was adequately prepared for trial having never spoken with the petitioner before the day of trial.” And although trial counsel testified that he negotiated the final plea offer with the State, considering that trial counsel had never before spoken to petitioner, trial counsel could not have told him about the State’s first plea offer. Further, given that petitioner did not even know that trial counsel was one of his attorneys, having retained co-counsel to represent him, petitioner could not have consented to trial counsel’s negotiating a plea agreement on his behalf. Although co-counsel had met with petitioner earlier, the record established that co-counsel had little to no involvement in the negotiations with the State and engaged in no trial preparation. The appellate court was unable to say that trial counsel’s dismissal of petitioner’s alibi defense was strategic because trial counsel did no investigation of it. Additionally, at the time trial counsel urged petitioner to accept a plea deal, trial counsel had no knowledge of whether co-counsel had challenged the admissibility of certain evidence and did not know what, if any, pretrial motions had been filed. The divided labors between co-counsel and trial counsel left other important gaps in petitioner’s representation, including trial counsel’s ignorance of petitioner’s mental health issues. Trial counsel was also unaware that one of the two co-defendants had not implicated petitioner and counsel erroneously informed petitioner that not only had the co-defendant implicated petitioner but that he would be called as a witness against petitioner at trial. Petitioner asserted that he had not wanted to enter a guilty plea, but concluded that he had no other option because both attorneys told him that he would receive the maximum sentence if convicted at trial, a sentence that he erroneously believed to be as much as 30 years, and because he did not believe that they would defend him if he elected to go to trial. The petitioner testified that he would have declined the plea offer had he understood the consequences of his plea and the risks of trial.

On this record, deficient performance is established. “In effect, in this case, the performance of two attorneys equaled less than one.” Compounding the errors by defense counsel was the trial court’s misstatement of petitioner’s sentencing exposure during the plea colloquy. The trial court informed petitioner three times that he faced up to 30 years incarceration. But because petitioner had no prior felony convictions, he actually faced a sentence of eight to 12 years. The trial court further erred when it told petitioner that aggravated robbery was a non-parolable offense when in fact it carried a release eligibility of 85 percent. “We conclude that the combined effect of the deficient representation provided by the petitioner’s attorneys and the misinformation provided by the trial court rendered the petitioner’s guilty plea unknowing and involuntary.” Petitioner’s guilty-pleaded conviction of carjacking is vacated, and the case is remanded for trial.

State v. Nunez-Diaz*, 444 P.3d 250 (Az. 2019). In drug case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise petitioner, an undocumented immigrant, that his negotiated guilty plea would result in a conviction that rendered him ineligible for discretionary relief from removal and would permanently prevent him from ever returning to the United States. Deficient performance was conceded in this case. Prejudice is established regardless of whether winning at trial was unlikely because it would not have been irrational for petitioner to nevertheless reject the plea given his desire to remain in the United States. Although petitioner established a constitutional violation, Arizona law precluded post-conviction relief if the State could establish the violation was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The State argued the violation was harmless because petitioner was deportable irrespective of the guilty plea. The Arizona Supreme Court disagreed, noting that petitioner would not necessarily have been removed had he gone to trial and been acquitted. “Deportable immigrants are potentially eligible for cancellation of removal or adjustment of status under § 1229b(b)(1), but persons with a drug conviction under § 1227(a)(2)(B) are not eligible for such discretionary relief.” Additionally, the plea resulted in a permanent ban on returning to this country, whereas an unlawfully present person who is removed may ordinarily seek readmission after a period of three or ten years. “Such a consequence can hardly be called harmless.”

Alsubaie v. State*, 268 So.3d 1013 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2019). In case involving a no contest plea to drug possession charges and driving without a license, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise petitioner, a lawful, permanent resident, that the plea would result in mandatory deportation. As for prejudice, petitioner “presented uncontested testimony that he would have gone to trial but for his counsel’s failure to inform that his plea would lead to certain deportation. Coupled with the limited additional consequence of a potential jury verdict of guilt,” likely a year in county jail, “and even a slight possibility of an acquittal, we hold that there was a reasonable probability that he would have risked proceeding at trial to avoid mandatory deportation.”

Parsons v. State*, 574 S.W.3d 810 (Mo. Ct. App. 2019). Petitioner was prejudiced by defense counsel’s deficient performance in failing to recognize that double jeopardy precluded conviction and sentence on both of the two pending charges and misadvising petitioner regarding the potential sentence he could receive if convicted at trial. Petitioner, while intoxicated, crashed his vehicle into a stationary police vehicle injuring the officer inside. He was charged with driving while intoxicated (DWI) and second-degree assault of a law enforcement officer. Both offenses carried punishment ranges of five to 15 years in prison. During plea negotiations, the State offered to recommend sentences of 11 years on each charge in exchange for a guilty plea. Petitioner rejected the offer. He then entered blind guilty pleas to both charges and received concurrent sentences of 12 years on each conviction. Later, defense counsel discovered that the DWI charge was an included offense of the assault charge and, therefore, the guilty plea on the DWI charge violated petitioner's constitutional right against double jeopardy. Petitioner was permitted to withdraw his guilty plea to the DWI charge and that charge was dismissed, but his guilty plea and 12-year sentence on the assault charge remained in place. Defense counsel advised petitioner not to seek resentencing on the assault charge because the court might be inclined to increase the punishment rather than decrease it. Petitioner later moved for post-conviction relief from the assault conviction based on ineffective assistance of counsel. He alleged that counsel's erroneous advice caused him to plead guilty to the assault charge unknowingly and involuntarily and that had counsel correctly advised him that he legally faced only the assault charge and its 15-year maximum sentence—not both the assault charge and the DWI charge with its additional 15 years—he would have gone to trial. Defense counsel conceded that he had informed petitioner he faced the possibility of 30 years imprisonment prior to the guilty pleas. Although the post-conviction court agreed with petitioner that counsel's advice was deficient, it found no prejudice. The court of appeals reversed.

First, [petitioner] testified that had he been given accurate advice, he would have gone to trial. Second, we find it significant that [petitioner] rejected the State's offer of 11 years on each count even when he thought—incorrectly—that he faced up to 30 years if he proceeded to trial. This shows that if [petitioner] had properly faced only one possible conviction and a maximum sentence of 15 years, there is at least a reasonable chance that he would have insisted on a trial. Finally, [petitioner] testified that while he entered blind pleas of guilty, those came only after he concluded based on counsel's advice that he had no other realistic option. In light of these facts, we find [petitioner] has demonstrated a reasonable probability that, wisely or not, he would have insisted on a trial in the absence of counsel's error.

To establish prejudice, petitioner “did not have to show that he would have been better off going to trial than pleading guilty.”

Bobadilla v. State*, 117 N.E.3d 1272 (Ind. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly advise petitioner about the immigration consequences of his guilty plea. Petitioner was arrested after shoplifting a pack of underwear and a pack of t-shirts from a Walmart. When he was searched incident to arrest, the officer found a small plastic bag containing marijuana, a pipe smelling of burnt marijuana, and one Vicodin tablet, which defendant admitted had not been prescribed to him. When booked into custody, petitioner listed his birthplace as Cuernavaca, Mexico. Petitioner was charged with four counts: Theft and Possession of a Controlled Substance, both Class A Misdemeanors; Possession of Marijuana, a Class B Misdemeanor; and Possession of Paraphernalia, a Class C Misdemeanor. Trial counsel received the booking information, as well as other things, during discovery. He negotiated a plea agreement whereby petitioner agreed to plead guilty to two counts in exchange for dismissal of the remaining counts, but he would receive the maximum sentence allowed —albeit a completely suspended sentence. In the standard advisement of rights form, trial counsel marked as not applicable the portion of the advisement for non-United States citizens. Trial counsel did so without speaking to petitioner, who was not a U.S. citizen but instead a member of the DACA program. Petitioner read and signed the form, pleaded guilty and received the promised suspended sentence: one year for A-Misdemeanor Theft and 180 days for B-Misdemeanor Marijuana Possession. Following a probation violation, petitioner consulted different legal counsel and learned his A-Misdemeanor Theft conviction and its concomitant one-year sentence amounted to an “aggravated felony” under federal immigration law, making him deportable. Petitioner immediately thereafter sought post-conviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The post-conviction court denied relief, finding that trial counsel had no reason to suspect that petitioner was a non-citizen and so did not have a duty to provide advice on possible immigration consequences. Faced with imminent deportation, petitioner filed an emergency motion to correct error in the post-conviction court, attaching the booking information that trial counsel had been provided. The motion was swiftly denied without explanation. Petitioner was deported and his whereabouts were unknown during the following appeal which was initiated by appellate counsel. The intermediate appellate court affirmed the denial of relief not on the performance prong of Strickland but based on its conclusion petitioner could not establish prejudice. The Indiana Supreme Court ruled first that trial counsel did indeed perform deficiently. Although there may not be a per se requirement that a defense attorney ascertain a client’s citizenship, there was such a requirement here given the inclusion of immigration consequences on the plea form. “At the very least, counsel need only read the form to his client or stand by patiently while the client reads the unmarked form to satisfy Padilla’s mandate. . . . Reading the form puts the client on notice that a guilty plea amounts to a criminal conviction that might have immigration consequences and the client should consult an attorney.” Here, trial counsel made the affirmative decision that the immigration warning was not applicable to petitioner without asking petitioner his status. Further, the booking slip provided a clue that petitioner was not in fact a U.S. citizen. Regarding the post-conviction court’s reliance on defendant’s name (not obviously Hispanic), his lack of accent, his familiarity with U.S. customs, and his ability to read and speak English as supporting trial counsel’s failure to inquire about citizenship, the Indiana Supreme Court noted: “Since we live in a diverse country, these simplistic observations lose probative value in a citizenship inquiry. . . . The best practice is to never assume a client’s citizenship status: always ask.” Trial counsel performed deficiently in independently marking “not applicable” on the immigration portion of the plea form without consulting petitioner. As to prejudice, the Indiana Supreme Court disapproved of prior precedent which required courts to look to a hypothetical-reasonable-defendant standard in assessing what a petitioner would likely have done if properly advised. The United States Supreme Court adopted a this-rational-defendant inquiry in Lee v. United States. Applying that test was difficult because the post-conviction court denied relief on deficient performance and there were not findings on prejudice. Nevertheless, the Indiana Supreme Court found enough evidence in the record for it to “draw conclusions about [petitioner’s] special circumstances, particularly how they would have led him to reject a guilty plea resulting in deportation and to insist on going to trial.” It pointed to: (1) at his guilty-plea hearing, petitioner was a teenager facing his first criminal charges, which were four low-level misdemeanor charges that would likely not result in significant jail time, considering the many sentencing options available to trial courts; (2) petitioner was gainfully employed; (3) petitioner had lived in the United States since he was a young boy—at least ten years; and (4) during his ten years in the United States, petitioner requested and received the

Capital Case*

DACA benefit from the United States government. “With just these few facts, we conclude that [petitioner’s] special circumstances revealed he had significant ties to the United States, not Mexico. Therefore, there is a reasonable probability that he would have rejected a guilty plea that could subject him to deportation and insisted on going to trial instead.” Additionally, had petitioner gone to trial and lost, his counsel (a veteran attorney) likely could have secured a different sentence for his young, inexperienced client—a different outcome that would not expose [petitioner] to deportation. Remarkably, to avoid making his client deportable, counsel would have only needed to convince the judge at sentencing to impose a sentence of 364 days rather than 365 days. Just one day would have taken deportation off the table for this young defendant. Given the wide array of sentencing alternatives available to this nineteen-year-old with no criminal history, it appears reasonable that he would’ve taken a chance at trial rather than enter a plea agreement that ensures deportation.

2017: People v. Olecki, 57 Misc. 3d 698 (N.Y. Crim. Ct. 2017). Defendant was charged with operating a motor vehicle while intoxicated and operating a vehicle while ability impaired, and she pled guilty to the second charge. She was sentenced to a one-year conditional discharge, with conditions that she pay a fine and surcharge, attend the impaired driver’s program, and have a 90-day license suspension. Defendant’s trial attorney told her she would be able to get a conditional license if she pleaded guilty, but this advice was incorrect; in fact, the law was that defendant was ineligible for a conditional license and her conviction also resulted in her license being automatically revoked for five additional years. The Criminal Court of the City of New York held that “Since counsel gave the defendant incorrect advice regarding the relicense consequences of her guilty plea, and defendant has convincingly established that she would not have pleaded guilty but for that advice, she is entitled to relief for ineffective assistance of counsel” under both the state and federal constitutions. [Court noted that the New York state IAC standard – whether the defendant was afforded meaningful representation, and if not, whether the ineffectiveness had an impact on the plea bargaining process – is less onerous than the federal standard.] Defendant provided an affidavit in which she said she was a dancer and her main concern was her ability to drive to work, and she pleaded guilty because she believed that this plea was the only way she could obtain a conditional license.

People v. Sifuentes*, 410 P.3d 730 (Colo. Ct. App. 2017). In a case where defendant pleaded guilty to a class four felony drug distribution charge in exchange for the dismissal of class three felony charges, plea counsel was ineffective in providing defendant with erroneous information about the immigration consequences of the plea. The defendant was a lawful permanent resident who came from Mexico at age two, close to forty years before the charges at issue. Defendant had significant ties to the United States and no familial or other ties with Mexico. Following his guilty plea, he was sentenced to Community Corrections (Comcor). Comcor rejected him, however, when Immigration and Customs Enforcement placed him on an immigration detainer after his conviction. Defendant was resentenced to forty-two months in prison followed by three years mandatory parole. The conviction, unbeknownst to defendant and his attorney, had triggered mandatory deportation along with mandatory detention throughout the ensuing deportation proceedings. When defendant sought to withdraw his guilty plea in post-conviction proceedings, it was found that plea counsel had performed deficiently by misadvising defendant that deportation was not mandatory if he pleaded guilty but instead that he might be allowed to remain in the country in light of his strong ties to the United States. The post-conviction court, however, concluded that defendant could not show prejudice because there were audio and video recordings of the offense. The court reasoned that it would not have been rational to reject the plea even had defendant known of the actual immigration consequences. Further, even if prejudice was found from the erroneous advice, the post-conviction court found that defendant still was not entitled to relief because he had signed an advisement indicating, among other things, that the guilty plea would result in deportation. The appellate court, in contrast, ruled that the signing of the advisement was irrelevant as to the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel as it did not show that defendant actually understood the consequences of the guilty plea. Regarding Strickland prejudice, in determining the likelihood that defendant would have rejected the plea had he been properly advised, the appellate court found that the lower court placed too much weight on the strength of the prosecution's case and the sentencing differential between the initial charges and that involved in the plea offer. Rather, "a court must consider all relevant factors — especially the defendant's ties to the United States and the resulting severity of deportation — before reaching a conclusion about prejudice." When considering the relevant factors, the appellate court observed that the record did not include the audio and video recordings of the drug sale thereby rendering a determination about the actual strength of the prosecution's case problematic. Nevertheless, the appellate court accepted in its analysis that the prosecution's case was formidable. It noted, however, that "the strength of the evidence against defendant is not as probative of rationality as it would be in a nonimmigration case." Further, the more favorable sentencing range under the plea was not necessarily that much better than defendant could have received if convicted of the original charges. In addition, defendant suffered from significant health problems. The likelihood of medical treatment in prison might be seen as preferable to earlier deportation where medical care was uncertain. Finally, defendant's strong ties to the United States and complete absence of ties to Mexico made removal from the United States the equivalent of banishment. On this record, rejection of the guilty plea had defendant been properly advised would be rational and defendant established prejudice from plea counsel's deficient performance.

Blackwood v. State*, 217 So.3d 1146 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to warn defendant, a Jamaican citizen legally in the United States, that he would be eligible for automatic deportation as a result of pleading guilty to aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. Although the post-conviction court found that counsel had failed to advise defendant about automatic deportation and that defendant would not have entered the plea had he known of the consequences, the post-conviction court nevertheless denied relief on the ground that defendant had failed to prove that he was in fact subject to automatic deportation under the federal immigration statute. It was error to add this third requirement in a case like this, where defendant did not receive a warning about potential deportation from the court during the plea colloquy. "[I]t is irrelevant whether [defendant] is subject to automatic deportation under the federal immigration statutes; there was no record evidence that [defendant], a noncitizen, received any warning of potentially adverse immigration consequences before entering his plea. Defendant was entitled to relief under Strickland."

Diaz v. State*, 896 N.W.2d 723 (Iowa 2017). “[Defendant’s] attorney failed in his duty to advise his client of the direct and severe immigration consequences of pleading guilty to the crime of aggravated misdemeanor forgery, leading [defendant] to plead guilty and subject himself to automatic and permanent removal.” The case is remanded to permit withdrawal of the guilty plea. Defendant had been living in the United States since 2002. He had arrived from Mexico without examination of the Department of Homeland Security. Prior to this case, he had no criminal history and was the primary caretaker of his U.S. citizen daughter. In early 2013, an officer responded to a call of domestic disturbance. The mother of defendant’s child reported that she felt threatened by defendant during an argument although the altercation did not involve physical violence. When defendant was placed in a squad car, he was asked for identification. He produced a Texas identification card that bore his name but was registered to someone else. Defendant was taken to the station for further questioning about the identification card even though he was not arrested for the domestic incident. Defendant claimed to have purchased the card in Texas and had been advised he could use it to open bank accounts and drive a motor vehicle. The interaction between the officer and defendant ultimately led to defendant’s admission that he had not entered the country legally. ICE was contacted and removal proceedings begun. Defendant was charged with forgery as a class “D” felony under state law. Defendant initially received bail but ended up in custody after missing both an immigration hearing and a plea hearing in state court. Defense counsel informed defendant that he was probably going to be deported no matter what happened given his failure to appear at the immigration hearing. Defendant signed a written plea to aggravated misdemeanor forgery and received a two-year suspended sentence. Based on the conviction, he was removed to Mexico. Defendant subsequently returned to the United States in the custody of Homeland Security and moved for post-conviction relief, alleging that his defense attorney was ineffective in failing to inform him that the charge he pleaded guilty to foreclosed “cancellation of removal,” a proceeding by which the Attorney General may adjust the status of a removable alien to that of a lawful permanent resident. Additionally, he argued his counsel should have advised him that his physical presence in the United States for more than ten years and his good moral character would have allowed him to seek this relief if he could establish his removal would result in “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” to his daughter. Looking to the professional norms as expressed by the ABA and reference guides produced following the Supreme Court’s Padilla decision, the Iowa Supreme Court held that “counsel has an obligation to inform his or her client of all the adverse immigration consequences that competent counsel would uncover. We do not believe clients expect their counsel to only advise them that the chances of deportation are certain or possible.” Here, even if removal was highly likely following defendant’s failure to appear, defense counsel never mentioned the crime constituted an aggravated felony “and never attempted to explain the sweeping ramifications of that classification.” Counsel’s failure to do so constituted deficient performance. Defendant’s asserted that he would not have pleaded guilty had he been properly informed of the consequences. Such a decision would have been rational given everything defendant had to lose by pleading guilty. Further, the evidence against defendant was not overwhelming on the forgery charge. Prejudice is established.

People v. Abdallah*, 153 A.D.3d 1424 (N.Y. App. Div. 2017). Granting the motion of defendant, a citizen from Barbados, to vacate his conviction for grand larceny in the second degree based on misrepresentations by defense counsel concerning the immigration consequences of defendant's guilty plea. Defense counsel incorrectly informed defendant that the guilty plea would preserve his eligibility to apply for cancellation of removal. Defense counsel had received the erroneous information from an immigration attorney he had consulted with. Defense counsel nevertheless performed deficiently given that the text of the relevant immigration statute made clear that a conviction of the charge would render defendant mandatorily deportable and ineligible for cancellation of removal. In finding prejudice, it was noted that defense counsel did not pursue a plea to criminal possession of stolen property in the second degree with the same sentence, which was charged in the indictment and would not have carried any immigration consequences to defendant. Notably, the prosecutor testified below that she was unconcerned about immigration consequences in negotiating a deal and had believed that the plea agreement defendant received permitted the possibility of cancellation of removal. Although the People asserted that the case against defendant was strong, defendant had a large incentive to remain in the country, including that he was 62 years old with health issues and had been in the country for 25 years. In addition, he had been married to a United States citizen for over 20 years, who suffered from multiple sclerosis, and had two children who are citizens of the United States. On this record, defendant established prejudice from the misadvice of his counsel.

Ex Parte Evans*, 537 S.W. 3d 109 (Tex. Crim. App. 2017). Applicant was charged with causing serious bodily injury to a child under Texas state law. The state abandoned a deadly weapon allegation, and applicant pled guilty with a 50-year cap and was sentenced to 50 years in prison. He then claimed that his plea was involuntary because his attorney misadvised him about the effect of the deadly weapon finding on his parole eligibility. The court, applying the federal standard for ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland and Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (2015), determined that applicant was entitled to relief because Hill v. Lockhart, protecting a defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel in connection with a guilty plea, predated the finality of applicant's conviction. [There is no further discussion of the merits of the IAC claim.]

State v. Hutton*, 806 S.E. 2d 777 (W.Va. 2017). Petitioner, native to Jamaica, was indicted on charges of malicious assault and three counts of second degree sexual assault. He entered a Kennedy plea to the felony of unlawful assault in exchange for the dismissal of the charges in the indictment (under W. Va. state law, a defendant may plead guilty while asserting innocence if he believes it is in his interest to nevertheless plead guilty). He served his sentence in state prison and was then turned over to the federal government for deportation proceedings. He filed a writ for writ of error coram nobis, alleging that his trial counsel had failed to inform him that his guilty plea would result in his deportation. After being ordered by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia to conduct a hearing on the merits of the claim, the trial court conducted the hearing and denied relief. Reviewing the trial court's denial under an abuse of discretion standard, the underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard, and questions of law de novo, the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia reversed, finding IAC under Padilla v. Kentucky, 559 U.S. 256 (2010). The four requirements for coram nobis in West Virginia were established: (1) a more usual remedy was not available; (2) valid reasons existed for not attacking the conviction earlier – petitioner only learned that he might be deported when he was served with a deportation warrant after serving his state sentence; (3) there existed a substantial adverse consequence from the conviction (deportation); and (4) the error presented a denial of a fundamental constitutional right – the effective assistance of counsel (which in West Virginia is the federal Strickland test). Under Padilla, the Sixth Amendment requires counsel to warn an immigrant client of the deportation consequences of a guilty plea. Counsel here did not do this, and made no investigation into immigration consequences for his client, and so deficient performance is established. With regard to prejudice, Padilla does not require petitioner to show that he would have prevailed had he gone to trial; it merely requires that a reasonable person in the petitioner's shoes would have chosen to go to trial had he been properly advised. See U.S. v. Swaby, 855 F.3d 233, 240 (4th Cir. 2017). Petitioner had evidence that he was not guilty of the charged crimes, and he entered a plea of guilty protesting that he was actually innocent. He was brought to the U.S. at the age of nine, had not returned to Jamaica since then, and his immediate family members all lived in the United States. See Lee v. United States, 137 S.Ct. 1958 (2017) (counsel's erroneous advice that defendant would not face deportation if he pleaded guilty was prejudicial because avoiding deportation was the determinative fact for defendant and the smallest chance of being acquitted to avoid deportation would have changed his mind about the plea).

2016: State v. Tapia-Cortes, 75 N.E.3d 878 (Ohio Ct. App. 2016). In domestic violence case involving a Mexican citizen who was a legal resident in the United States, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise defendant that he would be eligible for deportation if he pleaded guilty. The statute that governed defendant's situation was clear and straightforward. Trial counsel could have easily determined that defendant's guilty plea would make him eligible for deportation by simply reading the text of the federal statute. Because the deportation consequences of defendant's guilty plea were truly clear, defense counsel was constitutionally obligated to advise defendant that as a result of his guilty plea, his deportation would be "presumptively mandatory." In finding a reasonable probability that defendant would not have pleaded guilty had he been properly advised, the following was considered by the court: (1) defendant expeditiously moved to withdraw his plea seven weeks after pleading guilty to domestic violence; (2) defendant averred that he would never have pleaded guilty had he known deportation was mandatory; (3) defendant was originally admitted in the United States in 2008 as a temporary nonagricultural worker; at the time of the plea, defendant was employed, was married to a U.S. citizen with whom he has children, and had been a legal resident in the United States since 2013; and (4) defendant received little benefit from the guilty plea. As for the trial court's general advisement to defendant that deportation was possible, this was insufficient to cure the prejudice from trial counsel's deficient performance.

Ingram v. State*, 790 S.E.2d 641 (Ga. Ct. App. 2016). In case involving gang, drug and firearm charges, defense counsel performed deficiently in misadvising defendant that he was subject to treatment as a recidivist, which would have meant a sentence of 75 years with no parole. The prosecutor had included a recidivist notice in the charges. This was premised on three prior felony "convictions." In one of the three cases, however, defendant had received first offender treatment, which meant that his guilty plea in that case did not result in a conviction for purposes of the recidivist provision. Unaware that he was not be subject to the recidivist law, defendant accepted the deal defense counsel negotiated whereby the prosecutor dropped some charges and the recidivism component. Defendant was sentenced to 35 years, 20 in confinement and the rest on probation. Prejudice from defense counsel's erroneous advice is found as both defense counsel and defendant maintained that avoiding the recidivism provision was the most important factor in the plea deal.

State v. Antuna*, 144 A.3d 1255 (N.J. Super. App. Div. 2016). In case involving a Cuban native who did not speak or read English and who was subject to deportation following his guilty plea to a drug-related charge, trial counsel was ineffective in the drug case for failing to read the plea form to defendant or have him complete it himself. (The drug conviction occurred prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Padilla v. Kentucky so the rule of that case did not govern here.) Trial counsel filled out the plea form himself, leaving blank the question that asked: "Do you understand that if you are not a United States citizen or national, you may be deported by virtue of your plea of guilty? [YES] [NO] [N/A]." Trial counsel did not read the plea form to defendant and no mention of possible deportation occurred during the plea colloquy. Although trial counsel did not provide misinformation to defendant concerning the potential immigration consequences of the plea, trial counsel nevertheless performed deficiently in failing to have defendant review every question on the plea form. Knowledge about the possibility of deportation was necessary to a knowing, intelligent and voluntary guilty plea.

State v. Gallegos-Delgado*, 392 P.3d 200 (N.M. Ct. App. 2016). In case where undocumented immigrant's guilty plea ultimately led to deportation, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to inform defendant that he would be forever barred from reentry into the United States as a result of the plea. Defendant's attorney was required not just to inform defendant about the specific consequence of deportation but also of the other immigration ramifications of a guilty plea involving drug charges. That defendant would have rejected the plea had he been properly advised of the potential consequences was supported by the fact that defendant had attempted to engage an immigration attorney prior to the plea, showing that immigration consequences were important to him, and that he got married on the advice of an immigration attorney in order to avoid deportation. That the State's case against defendant was strong did not establish that he would have accepted the plea in light of the harsh consequences he faced from doing so. Defendant's connections to the United States and his post-conviction behavior also supported a finding that defendant would not have accepted the plea had he received adequate advice.

State v. Gutierrez*, 380 P.3d 872 (N.M. Ct. App. 2016). Affirming the grant of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea to a drug charge based on trial counsel's failure to adequately advise defendant on the immigration consequences associated with the plea. Supporting the lower court's order was defendant's statement during that plea colloquy that she understood that deportation was a "possibility." In fact, given the charge she was pleading guilty to, deportation was a "virtual certainty." Although trial counsel informed the plea judge that defendant understood there was a "high likelihood" of deportation, the plea judge did not inquire into the discrepancy between that statement and what defendant had stated. In addition, trial counsel filed an affidavit recounting that he could not recall a conversation with defendant where he explained to defendant with specificity that she would without a doubt be removed from the United States. On this record, the lower court could have reasonably concluded that defendant's lack of understanding was due to her counsel's failure to explain the consequences to her well or clearly enough. Statements at the sentencing hearing further supported a finding that defendant was not properly advised of the ramifications of the guilty plea. There, defense counsel represented that defendant's immigration attorney had informed him that a guilty plea should not impact defendant's then pending request for citizenship provided she was not imprisoned. The efforts on defendant's part to receive citizenship, based in part on the fact that her father and two of her children were United States citizens, helped establish a distinct possibility that defendant would not have pleaded guilty to the drug charge had she received accurate advice on the immigration consequences.

Clarke v. Galdamez*, 789 S.E.2d 106 (Va. 2016). In hit and run/DWI case, trial counsel was ineffective in providing erroneous advice to defendant concerning the immigration consequences of the plea agreement. Defendant, a native of El Salvador with Temporary Protected Status (“TPS”), was charged with felony hit and run and DWI. The felony hit and run charge carried a maximum sentence of ten years imprisonment. During plea discussions, defendant explained to his attorney that retaining his immigration status was his priority. (Defendant was the sole financial support for his young daughter, all of his extended family were in the United States, and, inter alia, he feared for his safety if he was returned to El Salvador.) The negotiated plea lowered the hit-and-run charge to a misdemeanor with a stipulated sentence of 180 days of incarceration with 170 days suspended on the hit and run conviction and 90 days, suspended, on the DWI conviction. Defendant accepted the plea agreement and did not appeal. Sometime later, the United States Department of Homeland Security notified defendant that his TPS would be revoked as a result of his criminal convictions. Under federal immigration regulations, a noncitizen forfeits his TPS after a conviction of either one or more felonies or two or more misdemeanors. Defendant filed for habeas relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel based on erroneous advice and prevailed in the lower court. At issue in the appeal was whether the lower court erred in finding that defendant established prejudice. The Director contended that it would not have been rational for defendant to have turned down the deal as there was no defense to the felony hit and run charge. The lower court found, and the state supreme court agreed, that defendant’s contention that he had not realized he had been in an accident until he arrived at his destination and saw damage to his vehicle, if believed, could provide a defense under the relevant statute. Notably, defendant did return to the scene of the accident before the police arrived. The plausibility of defendant’s account could be tested by a fact-finder, an opportunity defendant was denied. Defendant showed that had he been properly advised, he would have rejected the plea offer and such a decision would have been rational.

Van Sellner v. State*, 787 S.E.2d 525 (S.C. 2016). Counsel ineffective for advising the defendant to enter plea agreement and plead guilty to armed robbery for which a 12-year sentence was imposed. Counsel advised the defendant that, because of his prior convictions in New Jersey and New York for robbery and various drug offenses, he faced a possible life without parole sentence under S.C. Code § 17-25-45. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because there was no evidence that the defendant displayed a weapon or alleged that he had a weapon and displayed an object a person would reasonably believe to be a deadly weapon as required by S.C. Code § 16-11-330(A) for an armed robbery conviction. While the defendant passed the bank teller a note saying that if she did not provide the money he would shoot her, under state law, “words alone” are insufficient to support a conviction of armed robbery. Prejudice established.

2015: Commonwealth v. Steckley, 128 A.3d 826 (Pa. 2015). Counsel ineffective in possession of child pornography case for failing to inform the defendant of the possibility of a mandatory minimum sentence during plea negotiations. Prior to trial, the prosecutor provided the defense with sentencing guideline range worksheet showing a sentencing range of nine to sixteen months. Just prior to jury selection, the state offered a to recommend a sentence of three to six years in exchange for guilty pleas. After the defendant rejected this offer, the state offered a term of two to six years, which was also rejected. Prior to sentencing, due to the defendant's prior conviction, the state served notice, under the state sentencing scheme for repeat sex offenders, of its intent to seek imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence of twenty-five years' imprisonment. The court imposed the mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years. Counsel was unaware of the mandatory sentencing requirements under state law and, therefore, did not advise the defendant of this possibility during plea negotiations. Because of counsel's deficient conduct, and believing, based on the state's pretrial sentencing guidelines worksheets, that the sentencing range was nine to sixteen months, the defendant rejected the state's plea offers. Prejudice established. "A defendant's assertion of innocence does not necessarily belie his later claim that he would have accepted a guilty plea offer." While the initial prosecutor was also unaware of the mandatory sentencing statute, this did not negate prejudice because the prosecution did not discover its error until seven months after the defendant rejected the plea offer and proceeded to trial. Thus, the defendant would have been allowed to plead guilty under the state's pretrial offer if the deal had been accepted. There was also no reason to believe that the court would have rejected the offer. Resentencing under the terms of plea offer previously rejected by the defendant.

State v. Favela*, 343 P.3d 178 (N.M. 2015). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery and driving under the influence plea case for failing to explain to the defendant, a Mexican national lawful permanent resident of the U.S., that he would certainly be deported as a result of his plea and conviction.

2014: State v. Kostyuchenko, 8 N.E.3d 353 (Ohio Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in operating a vehicle under the influence of alcohol or drugs for failing to inform the defendant of the deportation consequences of his guilty plea. Counsel testified that he had informed the defendant only that he "could get deported." The plea form and the court's advice also informed the defendant only that he "may" get deported when "federal immigration law plainly mandates deportation" for the defendant.

People v. Dodds*, 7 N.E.3d 83 (Ill. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in possession of child pornography plea for erroneously advising the defendant with respect to the sex offender registration requirements of his conviction. The defendant entered a negotiated plea in exchange for a sentence of 18 months probation and registration as a sex offender for 10 years. Shortly after sentencing, his probation officer informed him that he was required to register for life and the defense filed a motion to clarify and was again informed that he would be required to register for only 10 years. At the end of the 10 years, he was again informed that registration was for life and brought this action. Under state law, the conviction qualified him as a "sexual predator," which meant mandatory registration for life. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

People v. Guzman-Ruiz*, 6 N.E.3d 806 (Ill. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in plea to possession of 2000-5000 grams of cocaine for failing to advise the defendant of the deportation consequences of her plea. While counsel and the court informed her that there may be consequences this was inadequate where she was informed that deportation was "very unlikely" when, in fact, it was required. Prejudice established in that there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have plead guilty even though she had faced a potential 30 year sentence and was sentenced to only 180 days incarceration and 30 months of probation under the plea agreement.

State v. Tejeiro*, 345 P.3d 1074 (N.M. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the Cuban defendant of the deportation consequences of his guilty plea to drug trafficking. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. The defendant had been a political prisoner in Cuba. He had lived in the U.S. with his family for over a decade. The evidence essentially established that the defendant was a "drug mule," possibly acting under duress. Even if this would not have served as an affirmative defense, it certainly was substantial mitigation. The defendant's motion to withdraw his plea because it was not knowing and voluntary should have been granted.

Ex parte Leal*, 427 S.W.3d 455 (Tex. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in no contest plea to second charge of simple possession of marijuana for failing to advise the defendant of the mandatory deportation consequences of his plea. Counsel told the defendant only that his plea would result in "deportation proceedings," which "is not the equivalent of advising the defendant that his conviction will result in deportation."

State v. Chetty*, 338 P.3d 298 (Wash. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in plea to possession of cocaine with intent to deliver for failing to consult with the defendant about the adverse immigration consequences of conviction. An attorney, who was an "immigration law expert," testified.

Ortega-Araiza v. State*, 331 P.3d 1189 (Wyo. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in strangulation of household member case for failing to advise the defendant of the deportation consequences of his guilty plea. The defendant was a resident alien, living in the United States legally since 1980 who entered a guilty plea. Prior to sentencing, however, defense counsel learned for the first time of his alien status and the deportation consequences and moved to withdraw the guilty plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient. The trial court's "generic advisement" and the language in the plea agreement that a plea could make him deportable "could not compensate" for the deficiency. Prejudice established because "a reasonable person" in the defendant's shoes would have demanded trial knowing the deportation consequences of a plea. He had lived in this country for nearly 35 years; had two grown children, who were born here; and he buried his wife and a daughter in this country. Moreover, even though the defendant was already a "Level 2 offender" who was deportable based on three or more misdemeanor crimes, the plea to the felony in this case moved him to Level 1, which was the "highest priority for deportation."

2013: Scott v. State, 986 N.E.2d 292 (Ind. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in fatal driving under the influence and resisting arrest case for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the correct maximum sentence he faced if convicted following trial, which resulted in an unintelligent guilty plea. The defendant was driving under the influence when he fled a police officer and lost control of the vehicle, killing another. Counsel informed the defendant that he faced a maximum 30 year sentence, which was the sentence imposed following his guilty pleas. Under state law, however, "the same harm cannot be used to elevate multiple convictions." Here, the victim's death was used to elevate both of the defendant's convictions. If the defendant had been convicted of both offenses at trial, state law required that the resisting law enforcement conviction would have been reduced to avoid punishing him twice for the death. Thus, the maximum sentence the defendant actually faced was 23 years. Sentence reduced to 23 years.

Commonwealth v. Barndt*, 74 A.3d 185 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in possession with intent to deliver drug case for providing inaccurate advice concerning maximum setback for street time accumulated against defendant's parole for prior offense, which led to a guilty plea. The defendant was charged, along with his son and his girlfriend. The weight of the drugs and the defendant's prior criminal record exposed him to the prospect of a mandatory minimum sentence of five years' incarceration. At the time of his arrest, the defendant had served approximately thirty months of parole related to a prison sentence for a separate drug charge. During plea negotiations with the Commonwealth, the defendant emphasized his competing concerns for his codefendants' exposure to substantial prison sentences, his own exposure to a mandatory minimum five-year sentence, and the effect of a guilty plea upon his parole status from the prior offense. Specifically, the defendant did not want to lose the approximately thirty months of "street time" that he had accumulated against his parole sentence (a penalty referred to as a "setback"). The prosecutor informed defense counsel that she had been advised by the defendant's parole officer that the defendant would only lose "approximately 11 months of street time, not 30 months; however they could not give me a guarantee on the exact amount of street time he will lose." Defense counsel, however, informed the defendant that it was essentially a certainty that he would lose only 11 months of "street time." Relying on this information, the defendant agreed to a negotiated sentence of forty-eight to ninety-six months' incarceration for him, while his girlfriend and son were given probation and accelerated rehabilitative disposition, respectively. Following his plea, however, the Parole Board ordered him to serve approximately forty-one months in prison, which corresponded to the sum of his street time up to the point of his guilty plea to the PWID charge. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. Remanded in order to permit the defendant to withdraw his guilty plea.

2012: Padilla v. Commonwealth, 381 S.W.3d 322 (Ky. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the deportation consequences of a guilty plea. The state conceded deficient conduct, but argued that there was no prejudice. Prejudice was clear as the defendant, a Honduras native, had been a lawful permanent resident of the U.S. for over 40 years and had served honorably in the U.S. military during the Vietnam War. During that 40 year period, he had spent only two weeks in Honduras. While evidence of guilt was strong, it was "far from conclusive," such that acquittal at trial was a possibility.

People v. Burgos*, 950 N.Y.S.2d 428 (N.Y. Sup. 2012). Counsel ineffective in sale of controlled substance case for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the immigration consequences prior to entry of a guilty plea. The defendant was from the Dominican Republic and was seeking Licensed Permanent Residence (LPR) status at the time of his arrest based on his wife's LPR status. The defendant was charged with sale of one tinfoil of cocaine (taken from a hole in a wall) to an undercover officer. A few minutes later a backup team arrested the defendant and found two additional tinfol of cocaine from the wall. A few minutes later the undercover buyer identified him, but no drugs or pre-recorded buy money was found in his possession. The defendant claimed mistaken identity and maintained innocence. He pled guilty, however, based on counsel's advice and belief that his sentence would not include incarceration. He would not have pled guilty if adequately advised and would have proceeded to trial. He had no priors and a "strong possibility" of acquittal on the sale charge and possibly the possession charge.

Ex parte Moussazadeh*, 361 S.W.3d 684 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective for providing inaccurate advice on parole eligibility, which led the defendant to plead guilty to murder. The defendant, a juvenile who served as a "look-out" for three men, was charged with capital murder. He agreed to a plea offer to plead to the lesser offense of murder without a deadly weapon without a sentencing recommendation and to testify against a co-defendant. He was sentenced to 75 years. Prior to the plea, counsel advised the defendant that he would be eligible for parole basically after he served 25% of his sentence or 15 years. Unbeknownst to counsel, however, his advice was incorrect because the "parole law had changed dramatically" just 11 days before the murder in this case, which meant that the defendant would not be eligible for parole until he served 50% of his sentence or 30 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the parole statute was "succinct and clear." Prejudice established because the defendant would not have pled guilty if had known the time he would have to serve.

2011: Frost v. State, 76 So.3d 862 (Ala. Crim. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sodomy and sexual abuse of child plea case for failing to advise the defendant that he would not be eligible for parole if he pled guilty. Counsel gave his standard advice that parole was "up to the Department of Corrections." The statutes were clear, however, that a defendant convicted of these crimes "shall not be eligible for parole." "The effect of a sentence is one of the most important matters about which a criminal defense lawyer should be cognizant." Here, counsel's advice was incorrect in implying that parole was a possibility at the discretion of the Department of Corrections. Prejudice established as the defendant would not have pled guilty knowing that the required sentence was life without the possibility of parole.

Stith v. State*, 76 So.3d 286 (Ala. Crim. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sodomy plea for failing to inform the defendant that "good time" or "correctional incentive time" was not available for a Class A felony. The defendant turned down a plea agreement to a "20-year sentence, split to serve 5 years, day for day," and insisted on a plea to a 10-year "straight" sentence, which he believed would require service of less than 5 years due to "good time" eligibility. A simple reading of the statute, however, would have informed counsel that incentive time deductions were not available. Thus, counsel's statement that only the Department of Corrections could calculate or determine application of "good time" was "incorrect and amounted to a misrepresentation regarding the law."

It is axiomatic that the reason why counsel is appointed is to advise a client about the law. The effect of a sentence is one of the most important matters about which a criminal-defense lawyer should be cognizant. . . . The fact that Stith, being ignorant of the law, instigated a renegotiation of his plea that effectively doubled the duration of his imprisonment is not a factor that prevents him from pleading or prevailing on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Capital Case*

Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Booth v. State*, 262 P.3d 255 (Id. 2011). Counsel ineffective in non-capital murder case for inadequate advice leading to plea. Although the state was not seeking the death penalty, the prosecutor gave notice pretrial that he intended to request a special verdict form in sentencing to submit statutory aggravators found in the capital statute to the jury. The statute provided that if death was sought and the jury found statutory aggravators, but did not return a death sentence, the court was to impose a fixed life sentence. If the jury did not find aggravators when death was sought or if death was not sought, the court would impose an indeterminate life sentence with a minimum period of at least ten years to be served. The prosecutor interpreted this statute to mean that in a non-capital case if aggravators were found the court had to impose a fixed life sentence. Defense counsel agreed with this interpretation. Counsel thus convinced the defendant to plead guilty in exchange for the state not pursuing statutory aggravating circumstances and an indeterminate life sentence with thirty years fixed. Counsel's conduct was deficient as his advice regarding potential penalties was "contrary to the plain and unambiguous language of the statute." Statutory aggravating circumstances were relevant only if death was sought. Counsel's "blatantly erroneous reading" of the statute was not made "reasonable" simply because the prosecutor and the judge made the same mistake. Prejudice was clear.

Denisyuk v. State*, 30 A.3d 914 (Md. 2011). Counsel ineffective in second-degree assault case for failing to advise the defendant, a Latvian citizen, of the deportation consequences of a guilty plea. Prejudice also established. While the State argued that there was "overwhelming evidence" of guilt, such that the defendant's conviction was inevitable, this is not the standard. Reversal was required because there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have pled guilty if adequately advised.

People v. Fonville*, 804 N.W.2d 878 (Mich. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in child enticement plea bargain, which included provision that the trial court would sentence the defendant at the low end of the sentencing guidelines or 51 months or allow the defendant to withdraw his plea. Defendant had been babysitting for his girlfriend and failed to timely return the children for a day as he had been out drinking and drugging. The children were not harmed in any way. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel had failed to advise the defendant that his plea would require him to register as a sex offender. As the statute was "succinct, clear, and explicit," as in Padilla v. Kentucky, 130 S. Ct. 4235 (2010), counsel had a duty to advise the defendant that registration would be a consequence of his guilty plea. "[G]iven the lack of any sexual component to [the defendant's] conduct, it was all the more imperative that his counsel advise him of the unique registration consequences of his plea."

People v. De Jesus*, 935 N.Y.S.2d 464 (N.Y. 2011). Counsel ineffective in drug sale case for failing to advise the defendant of the immigration consequences of a guilty plea. Counsel did not advise her of the immigration consequences which clearly were significant and "loomed quite large" for the defendant. She was born in the Dominican Republic but had been in the U.S. for most of the past six years. She worked selling perfume and as a waitress, which "allowed her to earn more than she would have earned in her native country." She was married to a U.S. citizen, and had obtained lawful permanent residence for herself and visas for her five children, who had initially remained in the Dominican Republic. Most of her immediate family was in the U.S. The only remaining ties she had in the Dominican Republic were an abusive ex-husband and a half-sister with whom she was not close. The state's case was "not impermeable" as it involved an observed street buy at night. While the defendant had drugs on her when she was later arrested and more were recovered from the patrol car she was placed in, she could have attacked the eyewitness' credibility and argued mistaken identity or she could have argued that she was the buyer and not the seller in the transaction. Regardless, counsel told her "that everything would be all right and that she did not have to worry" because he could obtain a plea deal that would not result in incarceration (five years' probation with intensive supervision). If counsel had adequately advised her, she would not have pleaded guilty. There was "a chance, however slight" that she would have been acquitted at trial. More importantly, given her circumstances, "it would have been rational for a person in defendant's position, made fully aware of the consequences of her guilty plea, to have chosen to reject the plea bargain and proceed to trial." This finding was buttressed by the fact that, right after her plea, she contacted her family attorney because she "remained unsettled about the plea, not relieved about it."

Elizondo-Vasquez v. State*, 361 S.W.3d 120 (Tex. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in possession of 50-2000 pounds of marijuana case for failing to inform the defendant, a citizen of Mexico legally residing in Texas that a guilty plea would result in deportation. Counsel advised the defendant that deportation was a possible consequence but did research the law or definitively answer the question. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as the defendant would not have pled guilty but for the deficient advice.

Salazar v. State*, 361 S.W.3d 99 (Tex. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in theft case for failing to correctly advise the defendant of the deportation consequences of a guilty plea. Counsel advised the defendant of the "possibility" of deportation. Likewise, the court's written admonishments included a warning that a guilty plea "might result" in deportation. Counsel's conduct was deficient in not accurately advising the defendant that deportation was a "certainty" following a guilty plea in this case. Prejudice established in that the defendant may well have chosen to stand trial if adequately advised. The defendant faced a possibility of two years' confinement and a fine. He was an 18-year-old high school student with no prior criminal record, which made him a good candidate for deferred adjudication or community supervision if convicted. Although he was a citizen of Mexico and had only been a legal resident for a short time, he had been raised in the U.S. by his mother. "It would be perfectly rational to take the chance of acquittal at the risk of a maximum of two years" in this case.

Calvert v. State*, 342 S.W.3d 477 (Tenn. 2011). Counsel ineffective in sex offense case for failing to advise the defendant about the mandatory lifetime community consequence of his pleas prior to entry of the pleas. The defendant pled guilty to multiple counts and was sentenced concurrently so that he effectively received a 10 year sentence suspended to probation upon service of nine months. On the judgment forms, he was also sentenced, as required by law due to the nature of his offenses, to lifetime community supervision, including the payment of supervision fees and regular reporting to a parole officer who has the discretion to impose conditions of supervision. This part of the sentence was never discussed with him by counsel or the court, however. Counsel's conduct was deficient as the law was clear from “the plain language of the community supervision statute” that lifetime community supervision would be a consequence of the plea. Prejudice established as the defendant would not have pled guilty if he had been adequately advised.

State v. Martinez, 253 P.3d 445 (Wash. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel ineffective in plea case for failing to adequately warn the defendant of the deportation consequences of his plea to possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver. Because the law “is clear” that this is a deportable offense, under Padilla and subsequent state rulings, counsel’s conduct was deficient. Deficient conduct found even though the paperwork associated with the plea and the trial court informed the defendant that deportation may be a consequence of the plea. These warnings were not a substitute for the advice of counsel. Likewise, prejudice established even though “it may not seem rational that [the defendant] would refuse a very favorable plea offer,” he claimed he would not have pled guilty if he had known deportation was a consequence and his counsel conceded that deportation was a “material factor” in the defendant’s consideration. This was enough to establish prejudice.

State v. Sandoval, 249 P.3d 1015 (Wash. 2011). Counsel ineffective in third degree rape case for giving erroneous advice regarding deportation consequences of a plea. The noncitizen permanent resident defendant expressly told counsel that he did not want to plead guilty if the plea would result in deportation. Counsel told him that he would not “be immediately deported,” that he would have time to retain an “immigration counsel to ameliorate any potential immigration consequences of the plea.” During the plea hearing and signed plea statement, the defendant was warned that a guilty plea is “grounds for deportation.” Predictably, before he was released from jail, Customs put a “hold” on him and deportation proceedings began. Counsel’s conduct was deficient as “the law was straightforward enough for a constitutionally competent lawyer to conclude” that a guilty plea would subject the defendant to deportation. Therefore, “counsel was required to correctly advise, or seek consultation to correctly advise” the defendant of the deportation consequences. The court’s and plea statement warnings did not resolve the matter as counsel’s advice impermissibly left the defendant with the impression that deportation was a remote possibility. With respect to prejudice, it did not matter that the plea made the sentencing range 6-12 months, while without a plea the sentencing range would have been 78-102 months with life as a maximum. The defendant “had earned permanent residency and made this country his home.” Although he would have risked a longer prison term by going to trial, the court held: “Given the severity of the deportation consequence, we think [the defendant] would have been rational to take his chances at trial.”

2010: Greene v. Commissioner of Correction, 2 A.3d 29 (Conn. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in theft of weapons case for advising the defendant to plead guilty but failing to ensure that the State would not be allowed to introduce the guilty pleas in evidence in the defendant’s murder and conspiracy trial. While counsel’s strategy was to preclude the jury in the murder case from learning of the earlier theft of weapons, counsel failed to take any action to prohibit the state’s use of the guilty pleas. Prejudice established as the defendant would not have pled guilty to the weapons charges if he had been adequately advised.

Capital Case*

Johnson v. State*, 318 S.W.3d 313 (Mo. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case for incorrectly advising the defendant that, as part of his negotiated plea agreement, that he could get sentence credit for time he spent on bond pretrial. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel made positive misrepresentations suggesting that bond time credit was available when it clearly was not under state law. The defendant was entitled to rely on counsel's advice, especially because the prosecutor and the trial court agreed with counsel and the trial court pronounced he would receive credit toward his sentence for the time he spent on bond. Prejudice was clear, as the decision to plead guilty rested on the mistaken belief that both the written agreement and the bond credit agreement would be honored.

People v. Garcia*, 907 N.Y.S.2d 398 (N.Y. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in misdemeanor drug plea case for failing to advise the defendant, a native of the Dominican Republic, of immigration consequences of his guilty plea. The defendant was charged with multiple drug counts, but pled guilty to a single misdemeanor charge in exchange for dismissal of the remaining charges. Prior to his plea, he asked counsel about immigration consequences, but counsel admitted his ignorance concerning immigration law, declined to research the issue, and informed the defendant that he should seek advice from an immigration specialist. The defendant paid "an immigration paralegal to assess his situation and was erroneously informed that a single misdemeanor conviction would have no adverse immigration consequences." Counsel's conduct was deficient. Padilla v. Kentucky, 130 S. Ct. 4235 (2010), did not create a new rule of law as Padilla merely applied Strickland precedents to a new set of facts. Here, the immigration consequences were readily ascertainable and "merely advising a client to seek outside immigration advice, without more, now fails to meet the affirmative duty set forth in Padilla, at least where the immigration implications of the plea were fairly straightforward, . . . and where the 'specialist's' advice was wrong." Garcia, 907 N.Y.S.2d at 405. Prejudice was established because the defendant likely would not have pled guilty if he had been accurately advised. He clearly was concerned enough to ask counsel and to follow counsel's advice to get further guidance from an immigration specialist. "That defendant went to a paralegal does not alter this Court's finding that defendant would not have pleaded guilty but for the deficiencies in the representation by his counsel." The more difficult issue was that during the plea hearing, the trial court had advised the defendant that, while he did not know for certain, conviction could lead to deportation and that he should "assume that he's deportable" if convicted. "[W]here, as here, defendant is found in fact to have been misled by bad advice from a so-called retained specialist and by a lack of advice from his defense attorney, the Court's general warning will not automatically cure counsel's failure nor erase the consequent prejudice." Id. at 407.

State v. Powell*, 935 N.E.2d 85 (Ohio Ct. App. 2010). Counsel was ineffective in providing inadequate and inaccurate advice concerning sex offender registration requirements that resulted in the defendant pleading guilty to voyeurism. The defendant was charged with obstructing official business, criminal trespass, and voyeurism, all of which were misdemeanors. The state initially offered to allow a plea to the obstruction and trespass charges in exchange for dismissing the voyeurism charges. This was rejected on the advice of counsel to litigate mental health issues and attempt to gain dismissal. After the court found the defendant competent, counsel advised him to accept the state's offer to plead guilty to voyeurism in exchange for dismissing the remaining charges. The possibility of required registration was never mentioned to the defendant until the middle of the plea hearing. The court allowed a brief recess for counsel to discuss the issue with the defendant. Counsel informed the defendant that he would have to register but that he would only have to be on the list for a year or so. Almost a year after sentencing and having completed his probation, the defendant sought relief. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, under applicable state law at the time, the defendant was exempt from registration (because he had no prior offenses and the victim was over age 18) unless the trial court may findings and entered an order removing the exemption. Further, counsel misadvised the defendant that the registration could be expunged within a brief time. Prejudice established and the plea vacated.

Hart v. State*, 314 S.W.3d 37 (Tex. Ct. App. 2010). Counsel ineffective in sexual assault of child plea for advising the defendant that he was eligible to receive community supervision if he pled guilty. The defendant was 19 and mentally retarded, as he had an IQ between 47-52 and a mental age of a six-year-old. "Even a person of genius status requires somewhat correct data in order to make an informed decision." Here, under state law the defendant was not eligible for community supervision due to the nature of the convictions. Prejudice established as the defendant would not have pled guilty absent the erroneous advice.

State v. A.N.J.*, 225 P.3d 956 (Wash. 2010). Counsel ineffective in juvenile case where defendant pleaded guilty to first degree child molestation. Counsel erroneously advised the defendant and his parents about the consequences of the plea by advising them that the conviction could be removed from the defendant's record when he turned 18 or 21. While the court has discretion to relieve the requirement to register as a sex offender, the conviction never goes away. Based on counsel's ineffectiveness, the defendant was entitled to withdraw his guilty plea.

2009: State v. Nunez-Valdez, 975 A.2d 418 (N.J. 2009). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual contact plea for providing false or misleading information as to the deportation consequences of the plea. Retained counsel advised the defendant to plead guilty in exchange for five years of probation or he would get a 10 year sentence. When the defendant asked about immigration consequences, counsel informed him "nothing like that" would ever happen. A different attorney appeared for the actual plea and conferred with the defendant through an interpreter. At best, he informed the defendant that deportation was a "possibility." The trial court found that deportation consequences were a central concern for the defendant, who had been in the U.S. for 18 years with his wife and children. The appellate court decided the case under the state constitution "because we recognize that a federal remedy may depend on whether deportation is a penal or collateral consequence." The trial court's finding that the defendant would not have pled guilty if properly advised was supported by sufficient credible evidence.

Grindstaff v. State*, 297 S.W.3d 208 (Tenn. 2009). Counsel ineffective in aggravated sexual battery plea case for advising the defendant incorrectly that he would be eligible for probation if he pled guilty. Under state law, the defendant could not be given probation and was subject to a sentence of not less than eight nor more than twelve years on each of the five counts. The court gave the defendant an effective sentence of thirty years confinement without parole eligibility. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the defendant was not eligible for probation under state law, even though counsel submitted evidence and argued for imposition of probation at sentencing. Counsel "obviously did not know" the law on this point and the prosecutor and court never corrected him.

Capital Case*

The court cited the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice as “guidelines” for gauging counsel’s conduct. “Criminal defense attorneys must conduct adequate legal research in order to meet the required range of competence.” Absent counsel’s deficient advice, the defendant would not have plead guilty, which was evidenced by his rejection of prior plea offers by the state, which demanded a period of confinement.

- 2008: Polite v. State, 990 So. 2d 1242 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in robbery, carjacking, and violation of probation plea for incorrectly advising the defendant of the maximum sentence he could receive upon revocation of the community control/probation when the plea entailed a sentence of two years in prison followed by two years of community control with the possibility of conversion to probation. Counsel advised the defendant that the maximum would be six years upon revocation, which was incorrect.
- 2007: Sial v. State, 862 N.E.2d 702 (Ind. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in theft case for failing to advise the defendant that his guilty plea carried possible deportation consequences. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and he admitted—“with admirable candor”—“that he dropped the proverbial ball.” Id. at 707. The fact that the probation officer preparing the presentence investigation report may have advised the defendant of the deportation causes a month after the plea was irrelevant to what the defendant knew at the time of the plea. Prejudice found because the defendant, a native of Pakistan, had been in the U.S. for 20 years and had a wife and 13-year-old daughter, who was presumably born here and a U.S. citizen. Thus, sufficient circumstances existed to establish a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have plead guilty if he had been adequately advised.
- 2006: State v. Patel, 626 S.E.2d 121 (Ga. 2006). Counsel was ineffective in sexual battery plea of nolo contendere for making affirmative misrepresentations to the defendant with respect to the effect of the plea on the defendant’s future participation as a physician in federal health care programs, such as Medicare and Medicaid. The defendant entered a plea only after specifically asking counsel about this issue. Without conducting “the basic research” necessary, counsel incorrectly advised the defendant that there would not be any long-term consequence when, in fact, the defendant was prohibited from participation in these programs for 10 years. Although there is no constitutional requirement to advise defendants of collateral consequences of a plea, counsel here made an affirmative misrepresentation in response to the defendant’s specific inquiries. Prejudice found because the defendant would not have entered a plea of nolo contendere if he had been properly advised.
- 2005: Davis v. Murrell, 619 S.E.2d 662 (Ga. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in armed robbery plea case. The defendant was charged with six armed robberies and other offenses and plead guilty to one armed robbery in exchange for dismissing the other charges and a sentence of 20 years that was made concurrent to a sentence he was serving in Florida. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel affirmatively misinformed the defendant that he would be eligible for parole and sentence review when neither was true. Prejudice found.

Capital Case*

2004: Cobb v. State, 895 So. 2d 1044 (Ala. Crim. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in driving under the influence case for failing to adequately investigate and advise the defendant prior to his entry of a guilty plea. The defendant plead guilty under the assumption that he would be accepted into drug court and would receive no prison time. Because of a prior conviction of which counsel was unaware, the defendant was ineligible for drug court. Counsel admitted in his post-trial motions and conceded that his conduct was deficient. Prejudice found because the defendant consistently maintained innocence and would not have plead guilty if he had been adequately advised.

Hernandez v. Commissioner of Correction*, 846 A.2d 889 (Conn. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in murder nolo contendere plea case for erroneously advising the defendant concerning parole eligibility. During the first day of trial, the defendant withdrew his not guilty plea and entered a nolo plea in exchange for a 25 year sentence. He had been informed by counsel that he would be eligible for parole after serving half of the sentence, when the defendant was ineligible for parole under state law. Counsel's conduct was deficient and the defendant was prejudiced because he likely would not have entered the plea absent counsel's misadvice because the defendant had a plausible self-defense argument and the court had already excluded the testimony of the only state's witness that could testify about the defendant's motive to commit murder.

Rollins v. State*, 591 S.E.2d 796 (Ga. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in drug plea for giving the defendant erroneous advice concerning the collateral consequences of pleading guilty, which resulted in the defendant pleading guilty. The defendant was a native of Barbados and a resident alien when she entered a first offender guilty plea to a drug charge based on trace amounts of cocaine discovered on a dollar bill in her purse. Although the defendant maintained her innocence and the state's evidence was very weak, she entered a plea on the advice of counsel. Prior to entry of the plea, the defendant asked counsel if there would be any negative repercussions from the plea that would affect the defendant's desire to go to law school and become a lawyer and her INS status. Without conducting any research, counsel advised the defendant that there would be no repercussions. Counsel's conduct was deficient because basic research would have revealed that the defendant was subject to deportation upon a drug conviction. Basic research also would have revealed that it is standard practice for any state bar to require the applicant to provide information concerning prior convictions. Prejudice was found because both the defendant and counsel testified unequivocally that the defendant would not have entered a plea had she known of the adverse impact on either her intension to become a lawyer or her immigration status.

State v. Lamb*, 804 N.E.2d 1027 (Ohio Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in sexual imposition plea for failing to object to the trial court's failure to inform the defendant, at the time of his guilty pleas, that he was subject to a mandatory five-year post-release control period, due to a prior felony sex offense and the determination that he was a sexually oriented offender. Prior to accepting a guilty plea, state law requires the trial court to inform the defendant of the maximum penalty involved. Post-release control is part of an offender's sentence. Thus, the trial court's failure to provide any explanation of the mandatory period of post-release control at the time of the plea was error. Without the proper instruction, the defendant here could not have fully understood the implications of the plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to object to the trial court's error.

C. FAILURE TO INFORM DEFENDANT OR STATE OF PLEA OFFER

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2019: Byrd v. Skipper, 940 F.3d 248 (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S.Ct. 2803 (2020). In felony-murder case where petitioner was convicted as an aider and abettor and received a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to initiate plea negotiations. Petitioner, who had no prior criminal record, suggested to his then-girlfriend that they rob a man at an ATM and provided a gun. At the last minute, however, petitioner had a change of heart. Armed with the gun, the girlfriend approached the victim and demanded his money. The victim resisted and the gun went off during a struggle. The victim suffered a fatal wound to his head. Petitioner and the girlfriend were charged in Wayne County with first-degree premeditated murder, first-degree felony murder, assault with intent to rob while armed, and possession of a firearm while committing a felony. The girlfriend negotiated a plea agreement with the prosecution, allowing her to plead guilty to charges of second-degree murder and felony firearm. She received a sentence of 30 to 50 years in exchange for providing testimony in petitioner's trial. This disposition accorded with Wayne County's record of preferring plea deals over trials. At an evidentiary hearing in district court, the prosecutor in the case explained that the county practice was for prosecutors to wait for offers from defense attorneys before beginning negotiations. The prosecutor further noted that once a principal defendant has pleaded guilty, prosecutors have even more incentive to reach plea agreements with aiders and abettors. In addition, in the prosecutor's experience, judges in the jurisdiction rarely rejected plea agreements. In this case, trial counsel never initiated plea negotiations with the prosecution. According to petitioner, trial counsel only met with him for approximately 30 minutes before the preliminary hearing and another 30 minutes the night before trial. There was also a single phone call between those two meetings. Petitioner stated that defense counsel was determined to go to trial and assured petitioner that he would be acquitted. Petitioner also claimed that during their meetings, trial counsel did not review the sentencing guidelines with him and did not explain aiding and abetting or other legal concepts underlying petitioner's case. Although trial counsel baldly denied these allegations, he also testified that he did not remember his conversations with petitioner "precisely" or "particularly" and in much of his testimony he simply discussed his usual practices as a defense attorney. When petitioner broached the possibility of a guilty plea, trial counsel convinced petitioner that would be against his interest given that his abandonment of the crime rendered him not guilty as a matter of law. But trial counsel's reliance on the abandonment defense either reflected confusion or abject ignorance about Michigan law. Case law showed that in similar circumstances the provision of the murder weapon to the principal evidenced an intent sufficient to support a felony-murder conviction. In addition, trial counsel's argument to the jury showed that he also failed to understand accomplice liability when he told the jury it was irrelevant whether petitioner knew his girlfriend planned to commit the offense when he gave her the gun. In assessing petitioner's claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to initiate plea negotiations, a majority of the court of appeals panel rejected the position of the dissent that there could be no Sixth Amendment violation here because there is no constitutional right to a plea bargain. Instead, the panel majority interpreted Supreme Court precedent as requiring that "where a petitioner alleges ineffective assistance of counsel prevented plea negotiations, demonstrating prejudice requires that he establish a reasonable probability that but for counsel's errors, the petitioner would have received a plea offer.” And then, the petitioner must also establish “that he would have accepted the offer, the prosecution would not have rescinded the offer, and that the trial court would not have rejected the plea agreement.” On the facts of this case, trial counsel showed “blatant incompetence” through his ignorance of the law, inaccurate advice to petitioner about his chances for acquittal, and failure to inform petitioner of the risks of proceeding to trial. As to prejudice, petitioner established through the prosecutor’s testimony that the State was willing to extend a plea offer to petitioner and, by pointing to the bargain the co-defendant reached as a comparator, “that an available plea would have provided favorable terms and would have been approved by the trial court.” Indeed, the warden on appeal chose not to contest the availability of a plea or the court’s probable acceptance of a deal. Instead, the warden challenged petitioner’s contention that he would have accepted a plea deal, pointing to petitioner’s professions of innocence, his desire to be acquitted and his inconsistent testimony about when he asked trial counsel about the possibility of a plea. The appeals court was bound by the lower court’s determination that petitioner did not want to plead guilty. Because, however, petitioner had lacked the requisite information to weigh the options in front of him, “whatever desire he exhibited before trial is not dispositive of what he would have done if he were properly educated about the charges against him.” Petitioner’s post hoc assertion that he would have accepted a plea finds support in the fact that he specifically asked trial counsel about plea options. The panel majority concludes:

Byrd has sufficiently shown that there is a reasonable probability that, with competent counsel, he would have availed himself of Wayne County’s fair and regular pretrial process and would have successfully negotiated a favorable plea. Byrd has therefore established that his counsel’s deficiencies prejudiced him.

2006: Satterlee v. Wolfenbarger, 453 F.3d 362 (6th Cir. 2006) (affirming 374 F. Supp. 2d 562 (E.D. Mich. 2005)). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy case for failing to inform the defendant of the prosecution’s plea offer on the day of trial to allow the defendant to plead guilty in exchange for a sentence of six to 20 years so the defendant proceeded to trial and received a sentence of 20 to 30 years. The defendant was facing up to life imprisonment on the indicted charges and from the beginning cooperated with police in order to obtain release on bond. Prior to counsel’s retainer, the government had offered a deal to 12 to 20 years. The defendant rejected this offer but continued cooperating with the police. Ultimately, prior to trial, the prosecutor offered a deal of 7 to 20 years, but this was never conveyed to the defendant. On the day of trial, the prosecutor offered 6 to 20, but again this was not conveyed to the defendant. In finding counsel’s conduct deficient the court found the defendant’s testimony to be more credible than counsel’s because it was supported by the defendant’s mother and the prosecutor. The district court granted a conditional writ ordering reinstatement of the plea offer. When the state failed to reinstate the plea offer, the district court ordered immediate release and expungement of the record of conviction. The Sixth Circuit affirmed.

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2016: Green v. Attorney General, State of Florida, 193 F. Supp. 3d 1274 (M.D. Fla. 2016). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in escape case in failing to adequately communicate favorable plea offer. The defendant was charged with escape when he failed to return to community transition center from work release. Counsel was appointed the next day. Under state law, the State had 40 days after the arrest to file an information formally charging the defendant. After about a month, appointed counsel's associate visited the defendant and informed him that the state had offered a plea deal of twelve months, consecutive to the sentence he was already serving, but that the offer would expire in 40 days. The defendant told associate counsel he was very interested in accepting the deal but wanted to talk to his mother first. The associate counsel promised to return the next day for his decision, but did not. Neither appointed counsel nor his associate communicated the defendant again until after the offer had expired and the state had filed both the information and notice of intent to seek habitual felony offender status. The defendant was brought before the Repeat Offender Court and pled guilty with no plea agreement with the state. The court held that he was a habitual offender. The state asked for a 15-year sentence while defense counsel asked for a 12-month sentence. The court imposed a 10-year sentence. The state conceded that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to follow-up with the defendant, failing to communicate the defendant's interest in accepting the offer to the state, and allowing the plea offer to lapse without further communication with the defendant. On prejudice, the state conceded that the prosecution would not have withdrawn the offer and the defendant would have accepted, but argued, as the state post-conviction court had found, that the state court would not have accepted the plea agreement because defense counsel's request for a 12-month sentence had been rejected. This ignores the context, however, because if the plea agreement had been entered the defendant would have been in regular felony court (not Repeat Offender Court) in an uncontested hearing with a jointly recommended 12-month sentence. The state post-conviction's court failure to consider "the relevant context" was an unreasonable determination of the facts. "Rejecting a defendant's request for a particular sentence is not the same as rejecting a plea agreement specifying the same sentence." Having found the state court's determination unreasonable under AEDPA, the court conducted de novo review, and found prejudice. Because the defendant had already served more than five years more than the plea offer contemplated and "[n]o court is able to turn back the clock and effectuate a twelve-month sentence," the remedy ordered was for the state to resentence the defendant to time served and release him.

2015: United States v. Merlino, 109 F. Supp. 3d 368 (D. Mass. 2015). Counsel in Hobbs Act and firearms offenses case was ineffective in failing to advise the defendant of the government's plea offer. The defendant was convicted, along with three co-defendants following a month-long jury trial, of attempting to rob an armored car facility. On the weapons charges, the most serious involved the possession of a live hand grenade of which the others were convicted but the trial court entered a judgment of acquittal for the defendant on that count, which would have required a mandatory thirty year consecutive sentence. Prior to trial, the prosecutor had offered the defendant a plea bargain because he was less culpable than the other participants, the principal of which was his uncle. The government offered to dismiss the hand grenade count in exchange for a guilty plea on the other counts with no departure below the minimum guidelines range. Thus, the plea offer proposed a recommended sentence of 17 years versus 21 years, if acquitted on the hand grenade charge, or 40-50 years if convicted on all counts. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. Sentence vacated and the government was ordered to extend the offer of 17 years previously made.

Capital Case*

United States v. Sain*, 79 F. Supp. 3d 696 (E.D. Mich. 2015). Counsel was ineffective in drug case in failing to research Sain's sentencing exposure and failing to inform Sain of the government's plea offers, which resulted in Sain proceeding to trial and being sentenced to 168 months of imprisonment. Sain was indicted in June 2007, along with his brother and other codefendants on drug charges. Attorney Short represented Sain and his brother. Subsequently, in December 2007, Sain was indicted for possession with intent to distribute marijuana and other crimes. Short also represented Sain in this case. Counsel failed to advise Sain of the government's plea offers. The first plea offer would have reduced the sentencing range to 87 to 93 months. The second plea offer would have dismissed one count and reduced the sentencing range to 41 to 51 months. Counsel believed erroneously that Sain would be sentenced to no more than two to five years and completely failed to advise the defendant about the advisability of a plea or the government's plea offers. Prejudice was clear given "the substantial disparity between the Government's plea offers . . . and his ultimate sentence."

2014: United States v. Miranda, 50 F. Supp. 3d 85 (D. Puerto Rico 2014). Counsel was ineffective in plea negotiations in drug and weapons conspiracy case arising from "a large-scale undercover investigation targeting corrupt law enforcement officers in Puerto Rico." The defendant was an officer in the Puerto Rico Department of Corrections, who was charged with eight co-defendants in a 30-count indictment. The defendant faced a potential life sentence on multiple charges and communicated to counsel from the beginning of the case his desire to enter a plea agreement. Following trial, he was sentenced to a total term of 811 months (over 67 years) when he could have entered into a plea agreement for 20 years. The record established that the government first extended a plea offer for 14 years, which counsel did not disclose to the defendant. The government then made an offer of 15 years on which counsel "stalled the negotiations" and "misled the Court and the prosecution" before finally informing the government that the defendant rejected the offer. [Notably, it is questionable whether the defendant was adequately advised before rejecting this deal but the Court passed over this question to the very clear question of the final offer.] Even on the day the trial began, the government offered a 20-year deal and the defendant was still expressing his desire to enter a deal. "All that was needed was the defense counsel's active participation in getting the deal finalized." The Court likely would have accepted this deal as another co-defendant was allowed to plead to 12 years. New trial granted and the government was ordered to reinstate the 20-year offer.

Jacobs v. United States*, 10 F. Supp. 3d 272 (D. Conn. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute 1000 grams or more of heroin for failing to inform the defendant of the government's plea offer and proposed cooperation agreement before it expired. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Prejudice was also established because the agreement would have resulted in a sentencing range of 360 months to life when the defendant faced a mandatory life sentence if convicted at trial. The defendant had been convicted at trial and sentenced to life.

2008: Leatherman v. Palmer, 583 F. Supp. 2d 849 (W.D. Mich. 2008), aff'd, 387 Fed. Appx. 533 (6th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in criminal sexual conduct case for failing to properly advise the defendant of the government's plea offer for probation and up to one year of confinement when the defendant faced a possible life sentence. Prejudice established.

Capital Case*

2004: Shiwlochan v. Portuondo, 345 F. Supp. 2d 242 (E.D.N.Y. 2004), aff'd, 150 Fed. Appx. 58 (2nd Cir.2005). Counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the defendant of the court's plea offer in second degree murder case. Although the prosecution never made a plea offer, the trial court offered to impose a sentence of 15 years to life—the minimum sentence for second degree murder—if the defendant plead guilty to the charge of second degree murder and the other offenses included in the indictment. [It is common practice in New York for trial courts to engage in plea offers independent of the prosecution.] Following conviction, the defendant was sentenced to 41 2/3 years to life, which was the maximum possible sentence. Counsel did not inform the defendant of the offer because counsel: (1) did not think the defendant would accept the offer since he maintained innocence; (2) believed that there was a viable defense of misidentification; and (3) did not believe that the defendant would receive a “severe sentence” if convicted. Counsel's conduct was deficient and the state court's finding to the contrary was, under the AEDPA standard, an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented. The state court's finding that counsel did convey the offer was contradicted by counsel's affidavit. Moreover, even though counsel knew the maximum sentence, he never informed the defendant of the actual maximum sentence or that he could be sentenced consecutively because counsel did not believe the defendant would receive a “severe sentence” if convicted. Instead, he left the defendant with the impression that the maximum sentence he faced was 25 years to life. The state court's finding that counsel's conduct was reasonable was an unreasonable application of Strickland under the AEDPA because

By underestimating petitioner's exposure, [counsel] breached his duty ‘to advise his client fully on whether a particular plea to a charge appears desirable. . . . Merely advising petitioner as to possible sentences rather than advising him on his full sentencing exposure is insufficient.

Despite the defendant's assertion of innocence, the court found a reasonable probability that the defendant would have accepted the plea offer for 15 years had he known of the court's offer. The court thus ordered resentencing according to the plea offer.

3. State Cases

2021: State v. King, 2021 WL 653192 (Tenn. Crim. App. Feb. 19, 2021). Reversing denial of relief on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately advise defendant of favorable plea offer of 8 years where defendant was facing a mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years in child rape/sexual assault case involving multiple victims. Following the hearing on defendant's motion for a new trial, the trial court concluded that the offer had in fact been conveyed to defendant by trial counsel and that defendant's testimony that he had not been informed of the offer was not credible. The trial court's finding was premised on trial counsel's testimony. Trial counsel, however, lacked a distinct memory of discussing the offer with defendant and his testimony on the subject contained many inconsistencies. “[The evidence preponderates against the trial court's finding that the eight-year plea offer was conveyed to the Defendant.” Defendant's sister had been present at each of the meetings with trial counsel and defendant that occurred after the prosecutor conveyed the plea offer to trial counsel and she testified that trial counsel did not inform defendant of the offer. Notably, the trial court made no adverse credibility determination concerning the sister's testimony. "Based upon this evidence, along with [trial counsel's] inability to confirm the offer had been conveyed to the Defendant, we conclude that the trial court erred by determining that the Defendant failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the offer was not conveyed." The record further showed that trial counsel misadvised defendant about the potential sentence he was facing and the percentage of the sentence he would be required to serve. Given defendant's actual sentencing exposure, and trial counsel's testimony that the plea negotiations were initiated at the behest of defendant and that he might have accepted a plea notwithstanding the resistance of his family, the record supported a conclusion that defendant would have accepted the offer if trial counsel had accurately explained defendant's sentencing exposure, conveyed the eight-year offer to defendant, and explained the offer significantly reduced the defendant's required service in confinement.

The record reflects that the Defendant was a young adult who had no previous involvement with law enforcement and the criminal justice system, that he had a documented history of mental illness, and that he did not have the opportunity to weigh a possible fifty-year sentence at 100% service against the offer of eight years at 100% service. As a result, the trial court erred by concluding that the Defendant failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence that he would have accepted the eight-year offer if he had known of its existence and of the significant sentencing exposure he faced if convicted as charged in the indictment.

The case is remanded to the trial court "with instructions for the State to reinstate the eight-year offer and to negotiate in good faith."

2016: Helmedach v. Com'r of Corrections, 148 A.3d 1105 (Conn. Ct. App. 2016). In robbery-murder case where defendant was convicted and sentenced to thirty-five years, defense counsel was ineffective in waiting until after defendant testified to convey the prosecution's offer of ten years. The defendant had initially given her assent to an offer to plead guilty to robbery with a sentencing range of fifteen to twenty years. The offer was withdrawn, however, after the prosecutor consulted with the victim's family. Defendant's boyfriend/co-defendant then went to trial separately and was convicted of all charges and sentenced to eighty-five years. A motion to compel specific performance of the initial offer to defendant was denied and the case proceeded to trial. During jury selection, the prosecution offered defendant a deal of twenty-two years, suspended after seventeen years of incarceration. The offer was rejected. A third offer of fourteen years to serve was also rejected. The second and third offers were rejected because the key witness against defendant tying her to the robbery had changed his story. The final offer of ten years to serve came the morning the defense case was to begin with defendant's testimony. Defendant's counsel asked the prosecutor if he could delay informing defendant of the offer until after her testimony, fearing defendant would become flustered if she was told prior to testifying. The prosecutor agreed. Defendant's counsel relayed what had occurred to his law partner who advised defendant's counsel to inform defendant of the offer immediately. Defendant's counsel decided not to heed the advice. Defendant then testified for two and one-half days, after which she was informed of the offer. She expressed a desire to accept the offer and indicated she wished to discuss it with her mother. When defense counsel approached the prosecutor and informed him that defendant was interested in the offer, the prosecutor responded that the offer was withdrawn. In subsequent habeas proceedings, relief was granted to defendant on her claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. On appeal, prejudice was not disputed. The sole issue was deficient performance. The court ruled: “Because defense counsel’s actions prevented [defendant] from properly exercising her constitutional right to plead guilty and to make a fully informed decision as to whether to testify on her own behalf, we agree with [defendant] that [defense counsel’s] decision may not properly be viewed as trial strategy at all, much less a reasonable trial strategy.” But even if the delay in conveying the offer could properly be considered as strategy, it was not reasonable in this case. Defense counsel did not withhold the offer because he thought a more favorable offer could result or there was an enhanced chance of acquittal. Further, given the history of plea negotiations in the case, which included the withdrawal of the initial offer after defendant’s acceptance, defense counsel acting unreasonably in waiting to inform defendant of the offer. That defense counsel had rejected his law partner’s advice was additional evidence rebutting any presumption that defense counsel’s delay was reasonable.

2015: Woods v. State, 48 N.E.3d 374 (Ind. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel was ineffective in robbery case for failing to inform the defendant of a favorable plea offer prior to trial. The fifteen-year-old defendant was charged as an adult, along with a codefendant, of robbery resulting in serious bodily injury, a Class A felony. He already had pending charges: carjacking (Class B), auto theft (Class D), and drug possession charges (Class D). The state made a written plea offer. In exchange for the defendant’s pleas of guilty to robbery (Class B), and the Class D auto theft and drug charges, the state would dismiss the carjacking charge. The sentence would be left to the Court’s discretion. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to inform the defendant of this offer. The defendant subsequently rejected an offer to plead to Class A robbery and proceeded to a bench trial in which he admitted to Class B robbery. He was convicted of Class A robbery and sentenced to 45 years with 10 suspended. Prejudice was established. The maximum sentence under the proposed plea agreement was 20 years for the Class B robbery and an aggregate sentence of 26 years for all three offenses. The fact that the defendant would have accepted this offer was clear as he conceded guilt of the Class B offense in his bench trial. There was also no evidence of intervening circumstances like an arrest that would have led the state to retract the offer or the trial court to reject the plea agreement. The plea offer was reinstated. If the defendant rejected it, he was entitled to a new trial.

2014: Bell v. State, 765 S.E.2d 4 (S.C. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to inform the defendant of a ten-year plea offer from the state. The defendant filed a grievance against his initial counsel and the file was passed to another public defender in the same office with a note that the solicitor offered a ten-year plea deal. New counsel never discussed this the defendant (or the solicitor apparently) and the case proceeded to trial. During sentencing, counsel informed the judge that the defendant had been offered a 10-year deal but the solicitor denied any offers. The judge sentenced the defendant to 20 years. In post-conviction, the defendant testified that the sentencing discussion was the first he had heard of a plea offer and that he would have taken the deal. The post-conviction judge found his testimony credible and granted relief. The court of appeals affirmed noting: “[W]e are mindful of our standard of review, and we find evidence to support the PCR court’s decision.” “Although self-serving, the [defendant’s] statement is also evidence supporting the PCR court’s finding of prejudice. Deferring credibility matters to the PCR court, we find evidence to support the finding.” (Citations omitted).

2011: Johnson v. State, 712 S.E.2d 811 (Ga. 2011). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery and aggravated assault case for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the state's plea offer of 25 years. A series of public defenders did not advise the defendant for various reasons. Thus, the defendant was not advised of the offer or that he was facing a mandatory sentence of life without parole if convicted until two days before trial. The defendant proposed a counteroffer of 20 years to serve 10, which was conveyed to the state. When that offer was rejected, within minutes, the defendant agreed to accept the 25-year offer. This was rejected due to the standing policy of the prosecutor that plea offers were closed after the docket call when the defendant pled not guilty. While there was conflicting evidence of whether the defendant was ever advised of the 25-year offer prior to two days before trial, it was undisputed that no one attempted to negotiate a plea prior to the docket call. Likewise, counsel made no investigation and did not advise the defendant of the mandatory life sentence, prior to the docket call. Final counsel did not even meet with the defendant until after the docket call, even though he was aware of the prosecutor's docket call deadline for plea offers. Prejudice established as there is a reasonable probability the defendant would have accepted the state's offer if he had been adequately advised.

2009: Carmichael v. People, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009). Counsel ineffective in case involving numerous charges related to child sexual assault for inadequately advising the defendant about the state's plea offer. The defendant faced a sentence of 20 years to life. The state offered a plea bargain that included an indeterminate sentence of probation with a minimum of ten years. On counsel's advice, the defendant rejected this offer. He was ultimately sentenced to twenty years of probation. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel never informed the defendant he faced two indeterminate life sentences if convicted. He also did not inform the defendant that the minimum length of probationary supervision he would receive if convicted at trial would be twenty years, twice the minimum he would be facing if he accepted the plea offer. Instead, counsel incorrectly advised the defendant he would "end up with the same probationary sentence offered in the plea bargain" if convicted at trial. Counsel "fundamentally misunderstood the potential consequences of the charges" and was "unaware of the specialized sentencing requirements for sex offenders" under state law. Counsel mistakenly believed the defendant "would be subject to general felony sentencing guidelines. This mistake, combined with a failure to conduct adequate research," led counsel to incorrectly advise the defendant, who as a result "was unable to properly evaluate the attractiveness of" the state's offer and did not have "an opportunity to make a reasonably informed decision regarding the relative benefits of the offered plea bargain." Prejudice established because there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would have accepted the plea offer if he had been adequately advised. Indeed, the defendant, "though his counsel, was affirmatively pursuing a plea bargain despite his proclamations of innocence." "[A] defendant's protestations of innocence, standing alone, are insufficient to support a finding of no prejudice when weighed against objective evidence of prejudice."

A large number of defendants will enter into the criminal justice system maintaining their innocence, only to later admit to the criminal acts they have committed. In addition, a defense attorney's accurate presentation of available outcomes may encourage a defendant to admit his actions and face the applicable consequences.

New trial granted without any order to reinstate the plea offer.

Davie v. State*, 675 S.E.2d 416 (S.C. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug trafficking case for failing to inform the defendant of the state's initial written plea offer in which the State offered a fifteen-year sentence in exchange for a guilty plea. Counsel was unaware of the state's offer until after its expiration because counsel was relocating his office and changing his mailing address. Ultimately, the defendant entered a "straight up" plea to eight charges in return for the state dismissing three charges and the state recommended life without parole. The defendant was sentenced to 27 years. Even though counsel may not have been aware of the plea offer until after the expiration date, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object at the plea hearing to lack of notice of the first offer when it was mentioned by the state. "Had counsel done so, he might have been able to convince the solicitor to reinstate this plea offer or persuade the circuit court judge to impose a fifteen-year sentence." Prejudice established based on the difference in the sentence the defendant received and that offered by the state initially and the fact that counsel and the defendant testified that he would have accepted the initial plea offer if it had been communicated to him. Remanded for resentencing not to exceed the original twenty-seven-year sentence.

2006: Jiminez v. State, 144 P.3d 903 (Okla. Crim. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in second-degree burglary and other offenses case for failing to inform the defendant of a plea offer until the day set for trial. Prejudice found because the plea offer was not open when defense counsel did inform the defendant about it and the defendant probably would have accepted the offer and received a sentence of five years in prison rather than the 12-year sentence assessed by jury. Sentence modified to five years.

2004: Sanders v. Commissioner of Correction, 851 A.2d 313 (Conn. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel ineffective in robbery and conspiracy case for failing to meaningfully advise the defendant of a plea offer from the state. The defendant rejected an initial plea offer by the state and the state made a second offer. Although counsel informed the defendant of the offer, counsel did not inform the defendant of the statements of the witnesses against him or advise him of the likely outcome if the case proceeded to trial. Although Strickland presumes counsel's conduct to be reasonable,

Nowhere is it said, though, that such a presumption is irrebutable. As with any refutable presumption, the petitioner may rebut the presumption on adequate proof of sufficient facts indicating a less than competent performance by counsel. In determining whether the presumption should apply, . . . other acts of ineffective assistance in the same matter may be considered in making that determination.

Prejudice found because the defendant would have accepted the second plea offer limiting his sentence if it had been meaningfully explained. Although the only evidence of this was the defendant's testimony, this was sufficient because the court assessed the defendant's demeanor and credibility.

D. BAD ADVICE LEADING TO REJECTION OF PLEA OFFER

1. U.S. Supreme Court Cases

2012: Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156 (2012). In this assault with intent to commit murder case, counsel was found to be ineffective in advising respondent to reject the state's plea offer and proceed to trial. The prosecution twice offered to dismiss two of the charges and to recommend a sentence of 51 to 85 months for the other two charges in exchange for a guilty plea. Respondent initially indicated a willingness to enter the deal, but later rejected the offer because counsel convinced him that the prosecution would be unable to establish his intent to commit murder on the basis that the victim had been shot below the waist. After a full and fair trial, respondent was convicted on all four counts and received a mandatory minimum sentence of 183 to 360 months. Respondent asserted ineffective assistance of trial counsel for advising him to reject the state's plea offer. Rather than applying Strickland as was inappropriate in this circumstance, the state court simply found that respondent's rejection of the plea offer was knowing and voluntary. "By failing to apply Strickland to assess the ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim respondent raised, the state court's adjudication was contrary to clearly established federal law." The Supreme Court again rejected the argument that Lockhart v. Fretwell modified Strickland. The Court also reiterated the desirability of pleas as "criminal justice today is for the most part a system of pleas, not a system of trials. Ninety-seven percent of federal convictions and ninety-four percent of state convictions are the result of guilty pleas." On deficient performance, the Supreme Court noted that "an erroneous strategic prediction about the outcome of a trial is not necessarily deficient performance," but the State conceded that counsel's conduct was deficient in this case. Thus, the only question before the Court was how to apply Strickland's prejudice test where counsel's ineffectiveness resulted in rejection of a plea offer.

In these circumstances a defendant must show that but for the ineffective advice of counsel there is a reasonable probability that the plea offer would have been presented to the court (i.e., that the defendant would have accepted the plea and the prosecution would not have withdrawn it in light of intervening circumstances), that the court would have accepted its terms, and that the conviction or sentence, or both, under the offer's terms would have been less severe than under the judgment and sentence that in fact were imposed.

Respondent established a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the plea offer and the court would have accepted the guilty plea. In addition, prejudice was shown as respondent received a sentence 3 ½ times more severe than he likely would have received by pleading guilty. In fashioning a remedy, the Court noted that "a remedy must 'neutralize the taint' of a constitutional violation."

The correct remedy in these circumstances . . . is to order the State to reoffer the plea agreement. Presuming respondent accepts the offer, the state trial court can then exercise its discretion in determining whether to vacate the convictions and resentence respondent pursuant to the plea agreement, to vacate only some of the convictions and resentence respondent accordingly, or to leave the convictions and sentence from trial undisturbed.

In short, “[t]oday’s decision leaves open to the trial court how best to exercise that discretion in all the circumstances of the case.”

2. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Baker v. United States, 109 F.4th 187 (3rd Cir. 2024). In bank robbery/firearms case, trial counsel was ineffective for miscalculating petitioner’s sentence exposure as petitioner weighed the plea offer. After petitioner was charged with bank robbery with use of a firearm, he was offered a deal whereby he could plead guilty to the charges and admit to two other armed bank robberies without being charged for them. Defense counsel advised petitioner that he faced a total of 15-17 years if he accepted the plea. If he did not accept it, defense counsel warned him, the Government would also charge him in connection with the two other armed bank robberies, in which case he faced a consecutive term of 21 years on the three counts of use of a weapon during a robbery. This calculation was erroneous, however, and in fact petitioner faced a consecutive 57-year mandatory minimum sentence under the statute’s “stacking” provision then in effect. Petitioner rejected the plea offer and was convicted of the three armed bank robberies. His sentence was 57 years on the armed robbery counts plus 87 months on the bank robbery charges. In denying relief on the claim of ineffective assistance, the district court had assumed counsel’s performance was deficient but concluded that petitioner failed to establish prejudice. The appeals court easily finds deficient performance. Regarding prejudice, the first part of the appeals court’s analysis is on what it deems the most significant factor: “the substantial disparity between [petitioner’s] sentence exposure under the plea and actual sentence as well as his counsel’s glaring miscalculation as to his actual sentence exposure.” The great sentence-exposure disparity weighed heavily in favor of prejudice. The district court, however, found no prejudice in part because it concluded that petitioner was not credible in asserting that he would have accepted the plea offer if given accurate information. The first reason given for finding petitioner lacked credibility was an inconsistency between petitioner’s allegations, whereby he claimed to have told counsel he was innocent of the charges, and his testimony at the evidentiary hearing, where he stated that he informed counsel of his complete guilt. But even if this contradiction concerning his guilt undermined petitioner’s general credibility to some degree, it did “not weigh heavily against the likelihood he would have pleaded guilty pursuant to the plea agreement but for his counsel’s error.” Counsel confirmed at the hearing that petitioner had in fact admitted his guilt to her before trial and this tended to support the existence of a reasonable probability that he would have been willing to plead guilty in order to accept the Government’s plea offer. “In any event, these inconsistent statements do not outweigh the prejudice of the significant sentence-exposure disparity resulting from his counsel’s error and its likely effect on his plea calculus.” The district court also looked to testimony by petitioner related to a different ineffectiveness claim about his criminal history category where petitioner stated he would have accepted a plea lower than the 15-17. But petitioner “did not make any hard-and-fast statement that he would not have accepted a 15-17 year plea offer” and “[e]xtrapolating from this comment to draw the conclusion that [petitioner] would not have accepted the plea offer in any case, even if he knew he was facing a consecutive 57-year mandatory minimum, stretches his words too far. To the extent [petitioner’s] comments weigh against the likelihood he would have accepted the plea deal—inasmuch as they suggest he wanted a better deal—they are, at most, slightly probative. But they do not outweigh the prejudice caused by his counsel’s large miscalculation of his possible sentence and his great sentence-exposure disparity.” Also rejected are the Government’s arguments that the following facts that were not relied upon by the district court further undermined petitioner’s assertion that he would have accepted the plea offer: (1) petitioner erroneously believed there was a separate plea offer for criminal possession of stolen property; (2) petitioner’s testimony regarding his separate claim that his counsel misadvised him on his criminal history category contained contradictions; (3) a contradiction between petitioner’s claim that counsel provided him a range of 31-51 years on all six counts and counsel’s handwritten notes from their plea discussion, which suggest she told him a range of 36-56 years; and (4) record evidence indicating petitioner was determined to go to trial. The appeals court explains why these reasons are not persuasive and it credits petitioner’s testimony that he would have accepted the plea offer if given accurate advice. That petitioner maintained his innocence after rejecting the plea was not entitled to the weight accorded to this fact by the lower court. The appeals court sets forth the numerous reasons why claiming innocence at trial “is not wholly at odds with a defendant’s claim that he would have been willing to plead guilty pursuant to an agreement but for his counsel’s error.” And the timing of any claim of innocence is relevant to the weight it should be accorded. “[I]nsistence on innocence in proceedings after the denial of a plea agreement is less likely to be probative of the defendant’s state of mind and calculus during plea negotiations.” Additionally, a significant disparity in the comparative sentence exposures between accepting a plea and going to trial provides an objective figure that may be “even more probative of whether the defendant would have taken a plea agreement but for counsel’s error than any implications that can be drawn from his assertions of innocence.” On the facts of this case, defendant’s insistence on innocence in his criminal proceedings “is, at best, weakly probative of the likelihood he would have accepted a plea agreement but for his counsel’s error” given: (1) defendant’s testimony that he maintained his innocence after rejecting the plea based on the advice of his counsel; (2) defendant’s admission of guilt to his counsel before trial, as she corroborated. Although defendant’s repeated remarks on his innocence at sentencing might suggest a general unwillingness to admit his guilt, that inference was rebutted by the circumstances noted above. But even were the court to draw a negative inference from defendant’s insistence on innocence after he rejected the plea, its effect on prejudice is significantly outweighed by the substantial disparity in his potential sentence exposure between accepting the plea and going to trial, the magnitude of which defendant did not understand due to his counsel’s erroneous miscalculation of his possible sentence. Looking at the available evidence, defendant demonstrated a reasonable likelihood he would have taken the plea offer but for his counsel’s error in calculating his sentence exposure.

United States v. Kearn*, 90 F.4th 1301 (10th Cir. 2024). In child pornography case involving petitioner’s daughters, affirming grant of relief where defense counsel was ineffective by inadequately advising petitioner on a plea offer. Petitioner was charged with three counts of child pornography offenses—producing, distributing and possessing—with an upper exposure of 30 years’ imprisonment. The government offered a plea agreement for a 10-year sentence in exchange for a guilty plea to the possession count. Defense counsel had a six-minute conversation with petitioner about the offer, which petitioner rejected, asserting his innocence. He was then convicted on all three counts at trial and sentenced to 24 years in prison. Counsel’s performance was deficient in a number of respects. First, he did not adequately explain the plea arrangement, which required the judge to accept the 10-year sentence or permit petitioner to withdraw the plea. Counsel also did not discuss or propose a solution to petitioner's "dilemma," i.e., he did not want to supply the factual basis for the plea. In fact, counsel instead overstated the plea requirements by incorrectly informing petitioner he would have to personally supply the factual basis for the guilty plea in court. Counsel failed to inform petitioner that the factual basis to validate his plea could come from the government or the presentence report. Counsel's admission that he believed petitioner might still accept the plea after initially rejecting it refuted the government's assertion that the quick plea discussion was "strategic," permitting counsel to focus on trial preparation. Furthermore, "it is certainly not a strategic choice to provide incomplete or inaccurate advice." Additionally, counsel had an obligation to effectively assist petitioner in deciding whether to plead guilty. An attorney testified on petitioner's behalf in the lower court, explaining that it is common for defendants to maintain their innocence when charged with sensitive crimes, like child abuse. The job of the attorney in such a situation is to adequately explain the plea and to help lower that "psychological hurdle." In any event, petitioner proceeded to trial because counsel failed to adequately explain the benefits of accepting the plea offer and incorrectly advised him about the factual basis component of pleading guilty. "In sum, the district court did not err in finding that counsel's representation of the plea bargain, when viewed in the aggregate, fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. As for prejudice, the lower court credited petitioner's testimony that he would have accepted the plea so long as he did not have to supply the factual basis for his plea. The government's reliance on petitioner's pre-trial statements about refusing to plead guilty are unpersuasive because they were made in response to the ineffective advice. Also rejected is the government's argument that sentencing disparity is irrelevant in the prejudice analysis because petitioner was dead set against pleading guilty. Notably, because petitioner was not adequately informed that the district court would have been bound by the agreed-upon sentence, "counsel improperly skewed [petitioner's] attention away from the sizeable sentencing disparity he faced in favor of the need for him to personally supply a factual basis." Given the overwhelming evidence of guilt, the disparity between the potential sentence and the plea offer weighed in favor of the district court's finding of prejudice.

2020: United States v. Knight, 981 F.3d 1095 (D.C. Cir. 2020). In robbery-kidnapping case, defense counsel was ineffective in erroneously advising defendant that the plea offer was for 10 years in prison rather than the likely sentence of between two and six years, and failing to advise defendant that additional charges could be brought with serious sentencing consequences if the plea was rejected. (The generous plea offer allowed the defendant to plead guilty to a single count of assault with a deadly weapon in D.C. Superior Court. It was a wired offer, requiring that both defendant and his co-defendant accept. After the plea was rejected, the defendants were indicted in federal court on additional charges. Defendant was ultimately sentenced to more than 22 years incarceration and his co-defendant received 25 years.) It was undisputed that defense counsel's performance was deficient. It was also established that the co-defendant, who had been properly advised, would have accepted the plea offer. In finding no prejudice, the district court looked to defendant's statements at the time of the offer. But in order to accurately assess prejudice those statements and preferences had to be evaluated in view of defendant's erroneous understanding of his circumstances. "[T]he contemporaneous evidence before the district court suffices to show a reasonable probability that [defendant] would have accepted the plea offer if he had been advised of its leniency and the sentencing exposure he would face as a consequence of rejecting it.” That the co-defendant, who received proper advice, wanted to accept the plea was further evidence supporting a finding of a reasonable probability defendant would have done the same if adequately advised. Although defendant did indicate at the time of the plea offer that he wanted to be present for the birth of his child, something acceptance of the plea would have precluded, and that he was hopeful the victim would not testify at trial, these facts did not negate a finding of prejudice. “[N]one of this evidence precludes there being a reasonable probability that [defendant], upon being properly advised by counsel, including a realistic assessment of whether a key government witness would not testify at trial, would have accepted the generous plea offer. . . . [¶] Furthermore, to the extent some evidence suggests that [defendant] was not inclined to accept the Superior Court plea offer, it is of limited value because it is infected by counsel’s deficient performance.” That defendant rejected a plea offer in federal court also was not dispositive of the prejudice question. (The plea offer required defendant to plead guilty to three counts carrying a mandatory minimum sentence of five years and a cumulative maximum sentence of 45 years.) Notably, the co-defendant, who would have accepted the Superior Court plea offer, also rejected the federal plea.

2019: Byrd v. Skipper, 940 F.3d 248 (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S.Ct. 2803 (2020). In felony-murder case where petitioner was convicted as an aider and abettor and received a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to initiate plea negotiations. Petitioner, who had no prior criminal record, suggested to his then-girlfriend that they rob a man at an ATM and provided a gun. At the last minute, however, petitioner had a change of heart. Armed with the gun, the girlfriend approached the victim and demanded his money. The victim resisted and the gun went off during a struggle. The victim suffered a fatal wound to his head. Petitioner and the girlfriend were charged in Wayne County with first-degree premeditated murder, first-degree felony murder, assault with intent to rob while armed, and possession of a firearm while committing a felony. The girlfriend negotiated a plea agreement with the prosecution, allowing her to plead guilty to charges of second-degree murder and felony firearm. She received a sentence of 30 to 50 years in exchange for providing testimony in petitioner’s trial. This disposition accorded with Wayne County’s record of preferring plea deals over trials. At an evidentiary hearing in district court, the prosecutor in the case explained that the county practice was for prosecutors to wait for offers from defense attorneys before beginning negotiations. The prosecutor further noted that once a principal defendant has pleaded guilty, prosecutors have even more incentive to reach plea agreements with aiders and abettors. In addition, in the prosecutor’s experience, judges in the jurisdiction rarely rejected plea agreements. In this case, trial counsel never initiated plea negotiations with the prosecution. According to petitioner, trial counsel only met with him for approximately 30 minutes before the preliminary hearing and another 30 minutes the night before trial. There was also a single phone call between those two meetings. Petitioner stated that defense counsel was determined to go to trial and assured petitioner that he would be acquitted. Petitioner also claimed that during their meetings, trial counsel did not review the sentencing guidelines with him and did not explain aiding and abetting or other legal concepts underlying petitioner’s case. Although trial counsel baldly denied these allegations, he also testified that he did not remember his conversations with petitioner “precisely” or “particularly” and in much of his testimony he simply discussed his usual practices as a defense attorney. When petitioner broached the possibility of a guilty plea, trial counsel convinced petitioner that would be against his interest given that his abandonment of the crime rendered him not guilty as a matter of law. But trial counsel’s reliance on the abandonment defense either reflected confusion or abject ignorance about Michigan law. Case law showed that in similar circumstances the provision of the murder weapon to the principal evidenced an intent sufficient to support a felony-murder conviction. In addition, trial counsel's argument to the jury showed that he also failed to understand accomplice liability when he told the jury it was irrelevant whether petitioner knew his girlfriend planned to commit the offense when he gave her the gun. In assessing petitioner's claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to initiate plea negotiations, a majority of the court of appeals panel rejected the position of the dissent that there could be no Sixth Amendment violation here because there is no constitutional right to a plea bargain. Instead, the panel majority interpreted Supreme Court precedent as requiring that "where a petitioner alleges ineffective assistance of counsel prevented plea negotiations, demonstrating prejudice requires that he establish a reasonable probability that but for counsel's errors, the petitioner would have received a plea offer." And then, the petitioner must also establish "that he would have accepted the offer, the prosecution would not have rescinded the offer, and that the trial court would not have rejected the plea agreement." On the facts of this case, trial counsel showed "blatant incompetence" through his ignorance of the law, inaccurate advice to petitioner about his chances for acquittal, and failure to inform petitioner of the risks of proceeding to trial. As to prejudice, petitioner established through the prosecutor's testimony that the State was willing to extend a plea offer to petitioner and, by pointing to the bargain the co-defendant reached as a comparator, "that an available plea would have provided favorable terms and would have been approved by the trial court." Indeed, the warden on appeal chose not to contest the availability of a plea or the court's probable acceptance of a deal. Instead, the warden challenged petitioner's contention that he would have accepted a plea deal, pointing to petitioner's professions of innocence, his desire to be acquitted and his inconsistent testimony about when he asked trial counsel about the possibility of a plea. The appeals court was bound by the lower court's determination that petitioner did not want to plead guilty. Because, however, petitioner had lacked the requisite information to weigh the options in front of him, "whatever desire he exhibited before trial is not dispositive of what he would have done if he were properly educated about the charges against him." Petitioner's post hoc assertion that he would have accepted a plea finds support in the fact that he specifically asked trial counsel about plea options. The panel majority concludes:

Byrd has sufficiently shown that there is a reasonable probability that, with competent counsel, he would have availed himself of Wayne County's fair and regular pretrial process and would have successfully negotiated a favorable plea. Byrd has therefore established that his counsel's deficiencies prejudiced him.

2016: Sullivan v. Secretary, Florida Dept. of Corrections, 837 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2016). After upholding the district court's determination that inadequate assistance of post-conviction counsel constituted "cause" to overcome procedural default, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the grant of relief on the uncontested merits of petitioner's claim that trial counsel was ineffective for advising him to reject a generous plea offer in favor of going to trial with a defense which – unbeknownst to trial counsel – had been legislatively abolished. The charges against petitioner arose out of his involvement in a high speed police chase while under the influence of (and in possession of) cocaine. Although he faced a thirty year sentence if convicted, the prosecution offered twelve years in exchange for a guilty plea. Trial counsel advised petitioner to reject the offer on the belief that he would likely be acquitted under a defense of voluntary intoxication, and petitioner followed that advice. Near the end of trial, however, petitioner and his counsel learned for the first time that voluntary intoxication had been legislatively eliminated as an available defense five years earlier. As a result, petitioner was left with no viable defense, found guilty, and sentenced to thirty years. At an evidentiary hearing on the resulting ineffectiveness claim (which had been rejected as untimely by the state courts), trial counsel testified that he had been ignorant of Florida's abolition of voluntary intoxication as a defense, that petitioner (whom he had represented before) always followed his advice, and that, had he been properly informed on the law, he would have advised petitioner to accept the plea offer. The trial prosecutor also testified, confirming that a plea offer had been made. The federal magistrate credited the testimony of trial counsel and petitioner, and recommended that relief be granted, and the district court adopted the recommendation and granted the writ. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the only matter challenged by the state was the district court's determination that petitioner had shown "cause" to overcome default, resolved that issue against the state, and affirmed the grant of relief.

2009: Dasher v. Attorney General, Florida, 574 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug case for advising client to reject plea offer from judge and to plead guilty without any agreement on sentence. The prosecutor offered the defendant a two year sentence, which was rejected. Due to a huge backlog of cases and overflowing jails, the trial court, who rarely involved himself in plea negotiations, made his own offer of 13 months in a Florida State prison. The defendant, however, preferred a 12 month sentence that could be served in a county jail. Counsel advised the defendant that if he rejected the plea offer, pled straight up, and offered mitigation evidence, the trial court likely would not sentence the defendant to more than 13 months. The defendant pled guilty the same day and, considering a presentence report prepared by defense counsel that revealed numerous juvenile and adult priors, the court sentenced the defendant to 10 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in that "the advice he gave . . . was a piece of foolishness," because, with the 13 month offer, the judge was already "giving away the store." Once the defendant rejected the judge's offer and pled straight up, the judge "had no reason to give him the thirteen month sentence he offered to induce a plea." In addition, although counsel suggested presenting mitigation to convince the judge, "it was obvious that he was not then aware of any."

We do not suggest that there are no circumstances where it would be reasonable for a lawyer to advise his client to plead guilty without an agreement and throw himself at the mercy of the judge. But this was not such a case. Whether or not he had a lengthy prior criminal record, [the defendant] was clearly risking a sentence of substantially more than thirteen months, and there was certainly no reason to believe he would do better.

Because the defendant had served all but 5 months of his sentence, the sentence was modified to time served.

Williams v. Jones*, 571 F.3d 1086 (10th Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 560 U.S. 952 (2010). The state court failed to fashion a constitutionally permissible remedy following a finding of ineffective assistance in rejecting a plea offer in first-degree murder case. The Oklahoma prosecutor offered the defendant a 10-year sentence in exchange for a plea to second-degree murder. Believing the defendant was innocent, counsel threatened to withdraw if the defendant accepted the offer. Against his own desires and following counsel's advice, the defendant proceeded to trial, was convicted, and sentenced to life without parole. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals found ineffective assistance and, as a remedy, modified the defendant's sentence to life with parole eligibility, which was the minimum punishment allowed under state law for first-degree murder. The federal court declined to determine whether deference was due under AEDPA or whether review was de novo "because even under a deferential standard of review the remedy was objectively unreasonable." "[A]ny correction for a federal constitutional violation must be consistent with federal law," which requires "a remedy that comes as close as possible to remedying the constitutional violation, and is not limited by state law." Remanded to District Court to determine remedy.

2007: Julian v. Bartley, 495 F.3d 487 (7th Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective in plea negotiations for incorrectly advising the defendant on the maximum punishment he could receive if he did not accept the state's proposed plea offer, which led the defendant to reject the plea offer. The defendant was charged with two robberies and faced a maximum sentence of 60 years. The state offered a concurrent 23 year sentence for both. Just before entry of a plea, the court informed the defendant that his sentence would have to be served consecutive to his separate sentence imposed for parole violation. The defendant conferred with counsel, who informed him that under the recent decision in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), he could only be sentenced to 30 years because the indictments did not mention the prior conviction. The defendant then rejected the plea and proceeded to trial and got 40 years concurrent. Counsel's conduct was deficient and the state court's determination to the contrary was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in state court. The state court decision was also an unreasonable application of Strickland. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, in the context of advice concerning a plea agreement, "[a] reasonably competent attorney will attempt to learn all the facts of the case, make an estimate of the likely sentence, and communicate the result of that analysis before allowing the client to plead guilty." Id. at 495. Here, counsel's advice was plainly wrong because "the holding of Apprendi is clear on first, second, or third glance that the fact of a prior conviction need not be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. at 497. Thus, counsel's interpretation of Apprendi "simply cannot constitute an objectively reasonable analysis of the law." Prejudice established because the information counsel provided was "precisely the type of information that is likely to impact a plea decision." The defendant might risk seven extra years in prison for a chance at acquittal, but a reasonable defendant would not risk an extra 37 years for this gamble. In addition, the defendant rejected the plea immediately after counsel's erroneous advice. While the defendant argued that the remedy was to reinstate the state's initial plea offer, the court rejected this as inappropriate because "the State had no hand in denying [the defendant] his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, and [the defendant] never actually accepted the terms of the original plea offer." Id. at 500. New trial granted.

2006: United States v. Morris, 470 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2006) (affirming in part 377 F. Supp. 2d 630 (E.D. Mich. 2005)). Counsel was ineffective in felon in possession of a firearm case brought under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a joint program of the federal and state prosecutors in Michigan, for failing to adequately advise the defendant with respect to the state's plea offer. The defendant was initially charged in state court and offered a deal for one to four years on a marijuana charge and two additional years on the weapons charge. The state prosecutor required an immediate decision, however, and the defendant was informed that if he declined the deal, he would be transferred to federal court which could result in a more severe sentence. Counsel, who did not have complete discovery at that time, was able to speak only briefly with the defendant in the “bull pen” with others present and no ability for privileged communications prior to a hearing. State counsel was not familiar with the federal sentencing guidelines and relied on what the state prosecutor told her based on his information from the federal prosecutor. She, thus, informed the defendant that if transferred to federal court, he could receive a sentence of 62 to 68 months when he actually faced 101 to 111 months under the federal guidelines. The defendant rejected the deal and was transferred to federal court where he filed a motion to dismiss the federal indictment and to “remand” him to state court and to reinstate the plea. The District Court granted the motion on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Sixth Circuit found that it was proper to dismiss the indictment because the federal prosecutor was involved in the state court plea offer, which included dismissal of the federal charges as part of the agreement, but the federal court could not remand to state court and order reinstatement of the plea offer. The court held that the defendant was constructively denied counsel under United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984), and prejudice was presumed.

The fact that . . . counsel gave him some advice does not preclude a finding of constructive denial of counsel under this standard. Rather, the circumstances, such as the lack of time for adequate preparation and the lack of privacy for attorney-client consultation, would have precluded any lawyer from providing effective advice. This is demonstrated here in part by the fact that . . . counsel was precluded from taking basic preparatory steps such as looking at his prior record in conjunction with the federal sentencing guidelines so as to make an accurate prediction of his guideline range, and instead had to rely on the erroneous estimate provided by an Assistant United States Attorney. . . .

Alternatively, the court held that counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to adequately inform the defendant of the likely consequences of rejecting the plea offer and being transferred to federal court. Prejudice found because the defendant would likely have accepted the plea offer and entered a plea of guilty if he had been adequately advised.

2004: United States v. Grammas, 376 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in altering vehicle identification number case for failing to realize (and, therefore, failing to advise the defendant) that his prior convictions were crimes of violence that raised the base offense level for sentencing. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because failure to properly advise the defendant of the maximum sentence that he could receive falls below an objective standard of reasonableness. The defendant was prejudiced because there is a reasonable probability that if he had known of the greater sentencing exposure, he would have plead guilty and availed himself of a guidelines reduction for acceptance of responsibility.

Capital Case*

2003: Nunes v. Mueller, 350 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in second degree murder case for giving the defendant incorrect information and advice concerning the state's plea offer, which resulted in the defendant rejecting the offer. The defendant was initially charged with murder during the first two trials, the jury hung. After the third trial, the defendant was convicted of second degree murder but that conviction was reversed on appeal. Prior to the fourth trial, the state offered the defendant a sentence of eleven years in exchange for a guilty plea to voluntary manslaughter. Counsel met only briefly with the defendant and did not adequately explain the offer. The defendant believed the offer was for a 22 year sentence. The first time the defendant was able to talk to counsel again and clarify the offer was on the day of trial when the offer had expired. The defendant was convicted of second degree murder and received a 15 year to life sentence. Without holding an evidentiary hearing, the state court held that the defendant had not made out a prima facie case for prejudice and denied relief. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the Ninth Circuit found that the state court decision was an unreasonable application of the law to the facts and an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court law. The court held that there was ample evidence in the record to establish a prima facie. The state court also unreasonably required the defendant to prove prejudice with absolute certainty when he needed only to demonstrate that there was a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the plea offer. Here, the defendant met that burden. To the extent the state court demanded more, it applied the Strickland test unreasonably. To the extent that the state court had made findings of fact, the court held that deference was not required because the state court did so without holding a hearing. Prejudice was clear here in that the defendant's strategy through all four trials was to argue that he was guilty only of voluntary manslaughter. Thus, the court found that it was reasonable to infer that he would have accepted an offer to plead guilty to voluntary manslaughter. To the extent that the state court made contrary inferences without a hearing, the court found that the state court decision was objectively unreasonable because there were equally valid inferences that could have been drawn in the defendant's favor. The court ordered the defendant released unless the state made an identical plea offer to the defendant.

3. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Robinson v. Zaken, 2024 WL 2883658 (E.D. Pa. June 7, 2024), agreeing with F&Rs, 2023 WL 11806867 (E.D. Pa. October 23, 2023). In murder case where petitioner turned down a plea offer for third degree murder with a sentence of 25-50 years and received a mandatory life without possibility of parole sentence after his conviction at trial, defense counsel was ineffective for failing to competently advise petitioner on whether or not to accept the Commonwealth's plea offer. When defense counsel conveyed the plea offer to petitioner in a brief phone call, counsel advised petitioner to accept the offer. Defense counsel did not, however, discuss with petitioner the weight of the evidence in the case, the likelihood of a favorable verdict, or whether counsel believed it was a good offer. Petitioner told defense counsel that he would not accept that agreement but would take the plea if the offered sentence was shorter because he had heard of prisoners in other cases getting lighter sentences. Defense counsel did contact the prosecutor to see if a better offer could be made. After being told that there would not be a better offer, defense counsel failed to relay the response to petitioner and did not speak to petitioner further until the start of trial, where a strong case was presented by the Commonwealth.

Capital Case*

That [defense] counsel never told [petitioner] that this was the best offer he would receive, that the prosecution's case was particularly strong and likely to result in a conviction, that other inmates receiving more favorable plea terms is irrelevant to his case and based on facts specific to their own cases, and that he believed that this was a good offer raises significant doubt as to whether [petitioner] made an informed decision to reject the plea offer. The lack of any consultation regarding the relative strength of the Commonwealth's case and the likelihood of conviction renders this performance particularly deficient.

The significant disparity between the sentence that was offered and the sentence ultimately imposed weighed towards a finding that petitioner was prejudiced by the deficient performance, "particularly because [petitioner] had expressed a willingness to plead guilty." There is a reasonable probability that petitioner would have accepted the plea offer had he received adequate advice. "The appropriate relief is that the Commonwealth present the original plea offer and allow [petitioner] the opportunity to accept it."

Cottier v. United States*, 2024 WL 1905252 (D. S.D. April 30, 2024). In second-degree murder case where movant withdrew his agreement to a negotiated plea and went to trial, defense counsel was ineffective in misrepresenting the risks of proceeding to trial due to counsel's failure to understand the law of aiding and abetting second-degree murder. The court credited movant's testimony that he would have accepted the plea offer had he been properly advised of the elements of second-degree murder. Although movant ultimately received the same sentence as his co-defendants, his USSG guideline range would have been notably lower under the rejected offer. "Because judges often sentence within the advisory guideline range, the court finds that a reasonable probability exists that the result would have been different absent counsel's error." Regarding the remedy, had movant accepted the plea agreement, he would have been convicted only of aiding and abetting second-degree murder. By proceeding to trial, he was also convicted of conspiracy to commit assault. But because this additional conviction was not for a more serious offense, nor did it impose an otherwise unavailable mandatory minimum term of imprisonment, it was not necessary to require the prosecution to reoffer the plea proposal. Rather, the court would simply conduct resentencing.

2022: Alexander v. Williams, 641 F.Supp.3d 1082 (D. Colo. 2022). In case involving assault-related convictions where petitioner was given a mandatory sentence of 64 years as a habitual offender, trial counsel was prejudicially ineffective in failing to accurately advise petitioner of his sentencing exposure when petitioner was offered a plea deal with a 16-year maximum sentence. Although the state court agreed that counsel performed deficiently, it ruled that petitioner was not prejudiced. This finding, however, was based on an unreasonable determination of the relevant facts. The state court erred in its assessment of what defense counsel actually knew and when he knew it, in finding that a third plea offer had been made and rejected by petitioner, and in finding that petitioner was uninterested in any plea offer which included a sentence of incarceration. On de novo review, counsel is found deficient in failing to advise petitioner that if he rejected the plea offers, he could be adjudicated as a habitual criminal and receive a mandatory custodial sentence of 64 years. Instead, defense counsel erroneously advised petitioner that if convicted at trial he risked receiving a sentence in the range of 10 to 32 years. This was below the standard of care, as opined by an attorney expert in the state post-conviction proceeding and under the relevant ABA guidelines. Regarding prejudice, the “vast chasm” between the sentence available to petitioner from the plea offer, and the actual sentence imposed upon him after his conviction at trial, “constitutes compelling objective evidence that [petitioner] would have accepted the plea offer but for his counsel's deficient and erroneous advice.” The record also provided no reason to believe the prosecutor would have withdrawn the offer or that the trial court would have rejected it. As to remedy, the record did not establish the terms of the offer with sufficient precision to require that the offer be reinstituted. Therefore, “the only practical way to place [petitioner] in the position he would have been had he received adequate legal counsel during prior plea negotiations is to order Respondents to grant to him a new trial.” It is anticipated that during the course of the new proceeding, petitioner “will be presented with the opportunity to newly negotiate a plea agreement with the benefit of effective counsel.”

United States v. Kearn*, 578 F.Supp.3d 1221 (D. Kansas 2022), aff'd, 90 F.4th 1301 (10th Cir. 2024). In child pornography case where petitioner rejected a plea offer with a ten year sentence and instead went to trial where he was convicted and received a sentence of more than 24 years, trial counsel was ineffective in the conveyance of the plea offer by not explaining the binding nature of the agreement on the trial court and the actual burdens imposed by the relevant rule’s factual-basis requirement. Trial counsel discussed the plea offer in this case for a mere six minutes. During that time, trial counsel failed “to convey the extraordinary value” of the agreement to petitioner, “who was facing enormous sentencing exposure and overwhelming evidence of guilt.” Instead, trial counsel provided petitioner “only with the downsides of such agreements.” He correctly informed petitioner that the court did not have to accept the agreement, and so there was not an absolute guarantee of a 10-year sentence. “But he didn't clarify that [petitioner], by accepting the plea agreement, either would receive the agreed-upon 10-year sentence, or he would have the opportunity to withdraw his guilty plea and return to the status quo. In other words, trial counsel didn’t advise [petitioner] about the certainty the government’s plea agreement offered.” The failure of trial counsel to provide the full picture about the benefits of the offer under Rule 11(c)(1)(C) “deprived [petitioner] of a meaningful chance to assess the government’s plea offer.” Trial counsel’s advice “also materially overstated the burdens imposed on [petitioner] to provide the factual basis for a guilty plea under Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(b)(3). This errant advice imposed an unnecessary roadblock in [petitioner’s] assessment of the government’s plea offer.” The record indicated that trial counsel informed petitioner that he would need to set forth the factual basis for the guilty plea, which conflicted with petitioner’s assertion of innocence. But the law did not require defendants to admit the facts. “Relevant here, the government could’ve satisfied the factual basis requirement by reciting a summary of the evidence it had adduced of [petitioner’s] guilt. [Petitioner] then could’ve acknowledged that the government possessed evidence sufficient to support a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt.” Notably, petitioner’s attorney expert witness, an experienced federal defense attorney, explained that he regularly follows such a process for establishing a factual basis when a client maintains innocence even after receiving a favorable plea offer. Trial counsel’s “failure to advise adequately about any alternatives to supply the factual basis closed [petitioner’s] narrow path to a guilty plea before he even knew it existed.” On this record, deficient performance is established and each of the four elements of prejudice is satisfied, i.e., with adequate advice, there is a reasonable probability that: (1) petitioner would have accepted the plea; (2) the prosecution would not have withdrawn it in light of intervening circumstances; (3) the court would have accepted its terms; and (4) the conviction and sentence under the offer's terms would have been less severe than under the judgment and sentence that in fact were imposed. Although petitioner lacked contemporaneous evidence suggesting he was amenable to pleading guilty, nothing in the record suggested that he was "dead set on going to trial and that no plea offer, no matter how advantageous, could deter him." The remedy is to require the prosecution to reoffer the plea agreement.

2020: Ruiz v. Spearman, 2020 WL 4726625 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 13, 2020), order clarifying remedy, 2024 WL 1421256 (N.D. Cal. April 1, 2024). In double murder case with multiple enhancements, defense counsel was ineffective in his advice to petitioner to decline a plea offer for two second degree murder convictions. The advice was premised in part on trial counsel's erroneous belief, conveyed to petitioner, that if petitioner took the plea of 15 years to life he would have no chance of parole. (Trial counsel's advice reinforced the similar erroneous advice petitioner had received from his pre-trial attorney.) That this prediction of parole possibility was erroneous was established by evidence presented at the post-conviction proceeding. The advice petitioner received undermined his ability to make an intelligent decision whether to accept the plea. "It thus constituted ineffective assistance under Strickland. To conclude that [petitioner] did not receive such advice would have been an 'unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding,' 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2), and a conclusion that such advice did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel would have been 'an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law.' §2254(d)(1)." (Trial counsel did not affirmatively state in the post-conviction proceeding that he had provided the advice at issue but he did not deny it and other evidence made it unreasonable to have found that trial counsel had not advised petitioner that he had no real possibility of future parole under the plea offer.) Also deficient was trial counsel's mistaken advice that petitioner would be entitled to a lesser-related offense instruction, thereby providing the jury with an alternative between conviction on the charged offenses and complete acquittal. The record evidence showed that trial counsel's advice on the availability of jury instructions on a lesser offense was "so incorrect and so insufficient that it undermined [petitioner's] ability to make an intelligent decision about whether to accept the plea offer." Even if trial counsel's erroneous advice about parole chances alone did not constitute ineffective assistance, when combined with the erroneous advice about the availability of a jury instruction on the middle option of accessory after the fact, petitioner's ability to make an intelligent decision about the plea was substantially undermined. Under AEDPA, "it would have been an 'unreasonable determination of the facts,' (citation omitted), if the state court concluded that [petitioner] was not erroneously advised on the issue of the lesser-included instruction. It would also have been 'an unreasonable application of [Strickland],' (citations omitted), to conclude that such advice — especially combined with the misadvice on the possibility of parole if he took the plea — did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel." Through his declaration, petitioner established a reasonable likelihood that he would have taken the plea offer but for the erroneous advice by counsel. That petitioner had maintained his innocence did not defeat his claim given that "the decision whether to accept a plea offer often turns on more than an individual's guilt or innocence.” A conclusion that petitioner was not prejudiced would have been an “unreasonable determination of the facts.”

Brinson v. Nicholson*, 2020 WL 4015325 (N.D. Ill. July 16, 2020). In case where petitioner was convicted of possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver and given a mandatory life sentence as a habitual criminal, trial counsel acted unreasonably in failing to determine petitioner’s sentencing exposure prior to advising petitioner to turn down a plea offer of twenty-six years. (The plea offer encompassed the drug charge as well as an unrelated attempted murder charge.) In denying relief, the state appellate court found that petitioner failed to establish prejudice because: (1) petitioner would not have accepted the plea offer, and (2) the trial court would not have accepted the plea offer. The first finding was premised in part on the state appellate court’s conclusion that petitioner “should have known” that he likely would have faced the equivalent of a life sentence if he went to trial on the drug charge because he might later be tried and convicted of the attempted murder charge and then receive consecutive sentences. The consideration of what petitioner “should have known” was clearly unreasonable in this scenario as it was “neither the correct legal standard nor a reasonable application of federal law to [petitioner’s] particular facts.” (Because the state appellate court relied on what it concluded petitioner should have known rather than the lower court’s factual finding that petitioner’s contention that he would have accepted the plea was not credible, that credibility determination is not considered by the federal habeas court.) The correct legal standard involves a comparison of the plea offer to the sentence the petitioner actually received in the case. The state appellate court’s analysis was also flawed in that it ignored the significant legal and practical differences between the possible consecutive sentences petitioner allegedly should have known about and a natural life sentence under Illinois law. Even if petitioner received the state appellate court’s hypothetical consecutive sentences, he would have been eligible for sentencing credits and early release, whereas with a natural life sentence there was no possibility of parole. The state appellate court further found that petitioner’s assertion of innocence and his vigorous defense at trial undermined his post-conviction claim that he would have accepted the plea offer if he had known of the mandatory life sentence possibility. This finding was unreasonable given petitioner’s willingness to engage in the plea negotiations and his actual acceptance of an earlier plea offer that was withdrawn only after the attempted murder charge was filed against him. An argument made by the State for the first time in the federal habeas proceeding – that it would have withdrawn the plea offer after learning of petitioner’s complete criminal history – is rejected on the ground that (1) “the State’s own failure to thoroughly investigate [petitioner’s] file cannot serve as a defense to [petitioner’s] ineffective assistance of counsel claim, and (2) the State had been willing to offer a twenty-six year sentence despite knowing of one prior conviction and that additional charges were pending. Finally, the state appellate court misapplied the Strickland prejudice prong when it relied on the trial court’s statement at the post-conviction proceeding that it probably would not have accepted the plea agreement. Prejudice is established because there is a reasonable probability that an objective decision-maker would have accepted the plea agreement.

Under the agreement, [petitioner] would have been sentenced to serve a substantial sentence of twenty-six years. His twenty-year plea for attempted murder is at the high end of the statutory range of six to thirty years imprisonment for that offense.

Capital Case*

[Citation omitted.] Additionally, at the time of the plea offer, [petitioner] was fifty years old and had significant health issues. His two earlier convictions that qualified him for the habitual criminal statute were committed in 1978 and 1986, decades before his 2007 conviction. It is reasonably probable that a trial court would have accepted a plea agreement that resolved two separate trials and imposed six years on the drug charge consecutive to twenty years on the attempt murder charge.

As the remedy, the State is required to reoffer petitioner the plea agreement made pre-trial.

2019: Barnes v. Warden of Green Haven Correctional Facility, 416 F.Supp.3d 152 (E.D. N.Y. 2019). Trial counsel was ineffective in plea negotiations where counsel failed to correct the prosecutor's mistaken view of petitioner's status as a mandatory persistent violent felony offender rather than a second violent felony offender. Petitioner stabbed his girlfriend thirteen times, killing her. Seven of the stab wounds were individually fatal. Petitioner surrendered himself to police the following morning. He was bleeding from his arm and claimed he stabbed his girlfriend after she came at him with a knife. He took the weapon from her and "lost it." He was charged with second-degree murder and fourth-degree criminal possession of a weapon. In a letter to the trial court prior to trial, petitioner stated that he was "willing to take ten or twelve [years] flat with five years parole supervision." On the eve of jury selection, the trial prosecutor represented that the People would not make a plea offer other than murder. The prosecutor explained that the 10 year sentence sought by petitioner was not legally permissible because of his status as a persistent violent felony offender. At trial, the jury was instructed on the lesser included offense of first-degree manslaughter and that is what petitioner was convicted of. At sentencing, the prosecutor conceded she had been mistaken about petitioner's status and in fact he did not qualify as a mandatory persistent violent felony offender. Petitioner was then sentenced as a second violent felony offender to a prison term of 25 years followed by five years post-release supervision. The district court in federal habeas proceedings easily found that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to accurately calculate petitioner's sentencing exposure. As for prejudice, the district court first noted significant disparity between petitioner's actual sentencing exposure upon a conviction for first-degree manslaughter (10 to 25 years) and what petitioner was told and everyone apparently believed (20 years to life). In addition, the prosecutor's assertion that it was legally impermissible for her to offer a plea deal with the sentence of ten or twelve years that petitioner sought suggested that the prosecutor would have been willing to offer petitioner a lesser sentence if she had understood that the law allowed it. Statements by the prosecutor in response to defense counsel's request for instructions on first-degree manslaughter further supported an inference that she would have accepted a plea to that charge. Also bolstering the prejudice showing was the fact that petitioner had not asserted innocence and had affirmatively expressed a desire to reach a plea agreement.

Under these circumstances, defense counsel's failure to correct the prosecutor's mistaken view of Petitioner's status as a mandatory persistent violent felony offender—rather than a second violent felony offender—undermines the Court's confidence in the outcome of the proceedings. ... Had defense counsel corrected the prosecutor's mistake, there is a reasonable probability that further plea negotiations would have been pursued, that the People would have made a plea offer with a sentence of 10 to 12 years, and that Petitioner would have accepted it. Accordingly, Petitioner has established both prongs of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel.

The district court concluded by ruling that petitioner satisfied 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1).

2018: United States v. Hamilton, 326 F. Supp. 3d 354 (E.D. Ky. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately advise petitioner on the mechanics of a plea offer. Petitioner was indicted on one count of conspiring to defraud the government, four counts of wire fraud, and two counts of aggravated identity theft. He ultimately pleaded guilty to the conspiracy and one count of wire fraud and one of aggravated identify theft. He was sentenced to 82-months imprisonment. During plea negotiations, counsel failed to inform petitioner of the terms and mechanics of the offer from the government, including the import of the prosecutor’s plea deadline, which caused petitioner to forego a plea deal including a third-point reduction in the sentencing guidelines for timely acceptance of responsibility (the plea offer lapsed). Counsel failed to convey the possibility of the irrevocable third-point loss and ineffectively advised petitioner that the prosecutorial deadline was not controlling. The government repeatedly advised counsel that petitioner would get the third point for acceptance of responsibility if he signed a plea agreement on or before a particular date, but otherwise the agreement would expire. Counsel acknowledged in an email to the government that “it would appear that denial of the third point is my responsibility.” Petitioner established a reasonable probability that, if accurately advised, he would have accepted the plea offer before it lapsed. He ultimately accepted and was sentenced based on a plea offer that was different than the lapsed offer only by omitting the third point reduction.

Contreras v. United States*, 2018 WL 1166311 (S.D. Texas, Mar. 6, 2018). Trial counsel performed deficiently during plea negotiations by failing to learn the mandatory sentence on one of the charges. Petitioner was found guilty in federal district court by a jury on a number of counts, including two counts of knowingly using and carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug-trafficking crime, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c). The Presentencing Report incorrectly stated that the second of these two counts carried a mandatory sentence of 5 years, when in fact it carried a mandatory sentence of 25 years. Post-trial, but presentencing, counsel continued to refer to the count as carrying a 5-year sentence. It was not until the probation officers issued an addendum to the PSR correcting the sentence that counsel became aware of the 25-year sentence. Thus, it is clear that counsel did not advise petitioner of the mandatory 25-year sentence during plea negotiations with the government. Although the district court reviewing petitioner’s motion to vacate under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 observed that because even the government and the probation officer “were mistaken until the eleventh hour as to the correct sentence,” and counsel’s “conduct does not present the glaring examples of ineffective assistance of counsel that typically succeed on habeas review,” 2018 WL 1166311 at *3, nevertheless, counsel’s conduct did meet the ineffective assistance of counsel standard. The court, under Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156, 171 (2012), ordered the government to reoffer petitioner the plea agreement it offered prior to trial. If petitioner accepts the offer, the court will decide whether to accept the plea and vacate petitioner’s current convictions and sentence.

Capital Case*

- 2017: Byrd v. United States, 2017 WL 3605333 (N.D. Ala., August 22, 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective during plea negotiations for failing to provide adequate and proper advice in multiple respects. Trial counsel undertook his representation of defendant in violation of his terms of employment with the Legal Aid Society. This was his first time representing anyone on criminal charges in federal court. Counsel told defendant his chances at trial were 50-50 because that was what he told all of his clients about their chances at trial. This ignored the fact that the government had a strong case against defendant, including video evidence and testimony from two cooperating witnesses. Trial counsel also incorrectly told defendant he faced a possible sentence of ten years if convicted when, in fact, he faced a mandatory minimum of thirty-two years. Finally, the government offered a plea agreement that would have dropped one of the charges against him and removed a twenty-five-year mandatory minimum sentence. Trial counsel failed to convey this offer to defendant until the day of trial (even though counsel promised the court he would convey the offer immediately up to a week before trial) and then further failed to advise defendant that the agreement did not require his cooperation or testimony against a co-defendant at trial. Defendant rejected the plea offer because he did not want to be a “snitch.” The government conceded trial counsel’s conduct was deficient but argued defendant could not establish prejudice because he testified that he was satisfied with his attorney’s performance and understood the plea offer at a pretrial colloquy. The court rejected this argument, finding that defendant simply responded “yes” to all of the court’s questions on the advice of his trial counsel when, in fact, counsel had failed to provide adequate and proper advice. Had defendant been aware that his plea agreement did not require his cooperation or that he was facing a mandatory thirty-two-year sentence, he would have accepted the plea.
- 2015: United States v. Cobb, 110 F. Supp. 3d 591 (E.D. Pa. 2015). Counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy and distribution case for advising the defendant inaccurately with respect to the possible maximum sentence, which resulted in the defendant rejecting a favorable plea offer. Prior to trial, counsel repeatedly recommended a guilty plea with continued cooperation with the government and a sentence range of 100 to 125 months if he pleaded guilty. Counsel, however, incorrectly believed that the defendant “was a career offender – a designation that would increase his Guidelines range from 130-162 months to 360 months to life.” The defendant proceeded to trial and was sentenced (with an upward departure) to 24 years. Even if the court still would have applied the upward departure following a guilty plea, it is reasonably probable that the sentence would have been shorter than that given. While the defendant sought a new trial, the court found this would be an inappropriate “windfall” because the defendant had been convicted at a fair trial. The court noted its discretion in the matter and ordered additional briefing on the appropriate remedy.
- 2011: Young v. Zon, 827 F. Supp. 2d 144 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). Counsel ineffective in attempted murder case in failing to render any advice concerning state’s plea offer. The state made an offer of a maximum of seven years in exchange for a guilty plea when the defendant was facing a possible sentence of 25 years. While retained counsel sent his associate to inform the petitioner of the offer, counsel did not advise the defendant “about the pros and cons” or whether he should accept or reject the plea and gave his standard answer that “it was not his policy to recommend to his client whether a sentence [sic] offer should be accepted or rejected.” The court found this “extremely troubling,” as counsel’s policy applied “especially when the potential sentence was ‘significant’—a situation where the defendant is arguably in the most need of an attorney's professional recommendation." Counsel's conduct was deficient.

[T]his is not a case where trial counsel's advice about the wisdom of accepting a plea could be placed on a continuum of reasonableness because, as trial counsel admitted, he gave no advice whatsoever. The failure to give any advice was entirely contrary to the minimum professional norms of practice.

There was also prejudice. There were eyewitnesses that positively identified the petitioner as the shooter, he had a motive, he was arrested shortly after the crime in a police chase, GSR results were "inconclusive" but did not exclude him as the shooter, and he had made statements to a jailhouse snitch. Under AEDPA, the state court unreasonably applied clearly established Supreme Court law.

2010: Wolford v. United States, 722 F. Supp. 2d 664 (E.D. Va. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to adequately advise the defendant during plea negotiations, which resulted in the defendant rejecting a very favorable plea agreement. The defendant was initially charged with several co-conspirators on one count of conspiracy to distribute drugs over a five year period out of the defendant's house, which was located within 1,000 feet of an elementary school. The majority of the controlled substances involved were pain medications the defendant and her boyfriend obtained through the use of physician-issued medical prescriptions. A search of the house revealed nearly 100 empty prescription bottles, totaling more than 8,000 pills, and other evidence. While there was substantial evidence of distribution, significant quantities of the substances were also used by the defendant and her boyfriend, as both were addicted to prescription pain killers. Counsel was appointed in February 2006. Several weeks later, while the defendant was in an inpatient drug treatment program, the government extended its first written plea offer, which would have allowed the defendant to plead to conspiracy at a base level of 28 to 30 and health care fraud. In exchange the government would agree not to charge her with distribution within a school zone and would not seek any additional adjustments or enhancements to the offense level. There is no evidence that counsel informed the defendant of this initial offer. Several months later, in May 2006, the defendant and counsel met with government agents for a "de-brief and proffer session" where the defendant signed an immunity agreement and agreed to show an undercover agent how she obtained the prescriptions from various doctor's offices. Several weeks later, counsel finally spoke with the defendant about the government's plea offer. Only a few days after this, the defendant and counsel met with the government and covered the plea offer with the defendant in detail. The offer was the same, except the health care fraud charge was eliminated at counsel's request. The defendant was "not comfortable" with the offer. While she did not dispute that she had distributed some drugs, she contested the amount of drugs she would be held responsible for under the plea. She also did not accept the plea because she sought probation and no jail time if she entered a plea. A few days after this, the prosecution renewed the offer, which would expire in two weeks. While could discussed the offer with the defendant, he did not inform her of the expiration date. The offer expired and the government indicted on the initial charge, on two counts of distribution, and distribution within a school zone. The next day, the defendant and counsel again met with the prosecution to discuss a plea. She remained reluctant about the quantity of drugs, although she understood the government agent's explanation that if you distributed one pill out of a bottle the whole bottle was counted in the charge. The government suggested they meet again in two weeks, presumably to continue plea discussions, and the defendant agreed. Afterwards, counsel advised her, however, that the government would never agree to anything she wanted. Nonetheless, at the end of August 2006, the government extended the same offer without a deadline attached to it. Counsel informed the defendant of the offer and continued to discuss the offer, trial strategy, etc., with her but had no additional plea discussions with the government before a superceding indictment in October 2006 that added additional drugs to the conspiracy charge, which now was charged as within the school zone, and added six additional counts for distribution. Following this indictment, the government extended no additional offer and the case was set for trial. She was ultimately convicted of the conspiracy and two substantive counts of distribution. In sentencing, the court found her accountable for more than 21,000 kilograms of marijuana placing her base offense level at 36. With enhancements, she was sentenced at a base level of 42, with a guidelines range of 360 months to life. The court sentenced her, however, to concurrent 108 month sentences. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel advised the defendant throughout that there was a "household or family member" defense. In essence, she believed, based on counsel's bad advice and his "faith" in the defense that it was legal to distributed prescription drugs to family and household members if no money was exchanged. She also believed, based on counsel's bad advice, that she could not be held responsible for any drug quantity that she personally ingested. There was clear Fourth Circuit precedent contrary to counsel's advice. Counsel also never advised the defendant of his belief that she would be convicted of conspiracy. He also never advised her that conviction on the conspiracy charge would render her accountable for all "reasonably foreseeable" controlled substances that she and her co-conspirators distributed and possessed with intent to distribute during the course of the conspiracy. Counsel also never informed her that the trial judge would make this finding based on a preponderance of the evidence and could consider amounts even from substantive charges of which she was acquitted. In short, there were "no viable defenses" available to the defendant, but, based on counsel's bad advice, the defendant believed she did have viable defenses.

This incorrect and incomplete advice, in turn, prevented [the defendant] from making a knowing and voluntary decision whether to accept the government's plea offer rather than proceed to trial. Of course, it is important to note that the Sixth Amendment does not require defense counsel to be 100% correct or perfect in advising his or her client in the course of a criminal prosecution, as such a standard would sometimes be impossible to meet. Indeed, defense counsel, on occasion, must make predictions in areas of unsettled law or perhaps make new arguments in areas of unsettled law, and in both of these instances, defense counsel will likely be unable to be 100% accurate. Yet where, as here, the legal advice at issue involves areas of settled law and no reasonable arguments could be made to alter these settled rules, defense counsel clearly has an affirmative duty to advise his or her client correctly in all material respects. And significantly, the incorrect and incomplete legal advice trial counsel provided [the defendant] in this instance was not only material, it was indeed central to [her] decision whether to accept the government's plea offer or instead proceed to trial.

Capital Case*

Prejudice established because “there is ample objective evidence establishing a reasonable probability” the defendant would have accepted the plea offer if she had “received complete and accurate advice from trial counsel.” The defendant never disputed that she distributed some quantity of drugs. “[T]he most compelling objective evidence in the prejudice analysis is the significant—indeed striking—disparity between the government’s plea offer and [her] sentencing exposure were she to be convicted at trial.” In essence, there was about 17 levels difference, which would have given her a guidelines range of 63-78 months rather than 360 months-life.

United States v. Wilson*, 719 F. Supp. 2d 1260 (D. Ore. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case in failing to adequately advise the defendant in pretrial negotiations. At the time of arrest, the defendant had 116 ecstasy pills, scales, and drug packaging materials in his home. He confessed involvement in smuggling more than 100,000 ecstasy pills on the day of arrest. He cooperated with law enforcement for three weeks, including recording phone calls, and assisting agents in seizing additional drugs and locating his co-defendant in Amsterdam. The defendant believed the agents had offered him an immunity agreement. When he insisted on speaking to the prosecutor about a “deal” in exchange for his cooperation, the AUSA facilitated the appointment of counsel for him. The AUSA offered a pre-indictment plea bargain of six years with a one day time limit and no discovery. Despite counsel’s awareness of the evidence seized in the defendant’s possession, his confession, and his cooperation for weeks, counsel refused to advise the defendant on whether to accept the offer because counsel could not do so without obtaining discovery. Counsel made a counter “offer” of continued cooperation in exchange for full immunity, which the AUSA rejected immediately. Without even informing the defendant that immunity had been rejected, counsel informed the AUSA that the six year offer was rejected. Post-indictment, counsel did not pursue any plea negotiations other than continuing to push for full immunity. Due to counsel’s grossly inadequate advice, the defendant went to trial believing that he faced between 30-80 months in prison when he actually faced a possible 20 year sentence. The Court rejected the government’s argument that there was no right to the effective assistance of counsel pre-indictment. This was a “critical stage of the criminal process” that was “the functional equivalent of the initiation of formal adversarial proceedings.” Moreover, when counsel was appointed at the request of the government, a finding that there was no right to effective assistance of that counsel “would make a mockery of the judicial appointment of counsel.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. He failed to inform the defendant that he could be held liable for all the ecstasy imported or delivered during the conspiracy. He failed to inform the defendant he was facing a much longer possible sentence than 6 years and that acquittal was unlikely given the evidence against him. Counsel also provided inaccurate advice by informing the defendant the guideline range at that time was 41-51 months, which was based on an outdated version of the Sentencing Guidelines. These errors were compounded by counsel’s failure to advise the defendant that full immunity in these circumstances was extremely unlikely. Even assuming the defendant was not entitled to effective assistance pre-indictment, counsel was ineffective post-indictment in failing to aggressively pursue a plea agreement comparable to the initial six year offer. He never accurately advised the defendant of his sentencing exposure. At the time of trial, the defendant believed he faced 30-80 months when he faced 20 years. Prejudice established. The Court found the defendant’s testimony that he would have taken the six year deal if adequately advised to be credible and validated by the objective circumstances. Counsel’s affidavit was rejected as incredible, where the affidavit contradicted counsel's notes and correspondence at the time. The remedy ordered was reinstatement of the government's initial six- year plea offer.

Harris v. United States*, 701 F. Supp. 2d 1084 (S.D. Iowa 2010). Counsel ineffective in cocaine distribution case for incorrectly advising the defendant, which resulted in the defendant rejecting the government's offer to plead guilty and accept responsibility for 100 grams of cocaine in exchange for a 10 year sentence. The defendant was charged with distributing on four occasions a total amount of 7.5 grams, but a superseding indictment included special findings that she was responsible for 500 grams to 1.5 kilograms. Due to counsel's misunderstanding of the role of "relevant conduct" under the sentence guidelines and his belief that the defendant could not be held responsible for more than 7.5 grams if she plead guilty, the defendant rejected the plea offer and entered an open guilty plea. Over her objection, the court accepted the PSI finding that she was responsible for 315 grams and sentenced her under the guidelines to 151 months, which was later reduced to 121 months. Counsel's conduct was deficient as counsel did not understand the application of Booker or the sentencing guidelines to the case.

The court recognizes that counsel cannot be expected to predict the eventual sentence that a defendant will receive. Counsel should be expected, however, to advise a defendant on at least the fundamental provisions of the guidelines so that she can make an intelligent decision whether to accept or reject a plea.

Id. at 1094. Prejudice found as the defendant would have accepted the government's plea offer if she had been adequately advised. The remedy granted was reinstatement of the offer to plead to 100 grams of cocaine base for a 10 year sentence.

2009: Carrion v. Smith, 644 F. Supp. 2d 452 (S.D.N.Y. 2009), aff'd, 365 Fed. Appx. 278 (2nd Cir. 2010). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in drug and attempted murder case for inadequately advising the defendant, which resulted in rejection of the state's pre-trial plea offer. The defendant had numerous charges arising from a shootout with the police, in which he was shot twice, and possession of five kilograms of cocaine. Conviction of just the least serious offence required a mandatory sentence of 15 years to life. Conviction on all carried the potential of 125 years to life. While the defendant was still hospitalized following his arrest, counsel informed him that the prosecution would agree to 10 years to life in exchange for pleas on all, which counsel thought was a "good officer." Counsel did not, however, inform the defendant of these sentencing ranges or discussion the strength of the state's case.

When a plea offer is made and there is a reasonable probability that the defendant is uncertain about the sentencing exposure he faces, whether or not he accepts the plea, a lawyer unquestionably has a duty to inform his client of the sentencing exposure he faces if he accepts the plea offer and if he does not.

Counsel "knew that an acquittal on the drug charge was virtually impossible." As a matter of practice, counsel never made recommendations to his clients on whether to accept or reject plea offers. "Under these unique circumstances, where nothing could be gained by proceeding to trial, counsel should have made an explicit recommendation to take the plea offer, at the very least.” Prejudice was clear in that the defendant had proceeded to trial and received a sentence of 125 years to life. There was sufficient objective evidence to support the conclusion that there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would have accepted the offer if properly advised. The state court decision to the contrary unreasonably applied Strickland. Court ordered reinstatement of plea offer.

United States v. Kimes*, 624 F.Supp.2d 565 (W.D. La. 2009). Counsel ineffective in methamphetamine and conspiracy case for failing to advise the defendant of the potential sentencing benefits of pleading guilty. Counsel failed to advise the defendant of how the Sentencing Guidelines might affect his sentence or that he could potentially receive a three-point reduction in sentence for acceptance of responsibility if he pled guilty. Although the government never made a specific plea offer, the prosecutor did state that a general offer of sentence reduction was made if the defendant pleaded guilty prior to one of his co-defendants. Regardless of whether the government officially made a plea offer to the defendant, counsel’s conduct was objectively unreasonable. Because he was not adequately advised, the defendant was “under the impression” that he was going to be sentenced in the same fashion whether he pled guilty or proceeded to trial. Prejudice established because the court found the defendant’s testimony that he would have pled guilty if he had been adequately advised to be “credible and substantially uncontradicted.” Although the defendant had denied guilt in one letter to counsel prior to trial, this did not refute his credible testimony that he would have plead guilty. “An individual whose lawyer, through action or inaction alike, has left him with the impression that there is no benefit to a guilty plea would certainly be more inclined to rely on claims of actual innocence once resigned to the fact that trial was imminent.” Prejudice found because the court routinely granted sentence reductions for acceptance of responsibility, even though not required to do so under the Guidelines. Thus, it was “reasonably likely” that the defendant would have received a lower sentence if he had been adequately advised and pled guilty. Sentence vacated and resentencing ordered as if the defendant had plead guilty.

2006: United States v. Hernandez, 450 F.Supp.2d 950 (N.D. Iowa 2006). Counsel ineffective in conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine case for failing to adequately advise the defendant concerning the possible sentence, which resulted in the defendant declining to plead guilty and testifying during the trial rather than just relying on his pretrial statement, which had negative consequences under the Guidelines due to an obstruction of justice enhancement. While counsel believed that the defendant should plead guilty, even without a plea agreement, he never told the defendant that he believed he would be convicted and did not lean on him to plead guilty. He simply advised the defendant incorrectly that he would likely get a sentence of about 14 years rather than the 360 months to life range of the guidelines and the 360 months the defendant got. Prejudice established because the defendant would have entered a guilty plea, if counsel had performed adequately, and would have received a lesser sentence. At minimum, he would not have had the obstruction of justice enhancement because he would not have testified at trial, falsely or otherwise, and would have received a reduction for acceptance of responsibility. The court ordered resentencing based on a guilty plea with no plea agreement, with a range of 210 to 262 months of imprisonment.

Capital Case*

2005: United States v. White, 371 F. Supp. 2d 378 (W.D.N.Y. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in drugs and weapons case for failing to know of and to adequately advise the defendant of the consequences of a second conviction of possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug crime, which resulted in the defendant rejecting a plea agreement. Counsel's conduct was deficient, because even conviction of more than one count of the statute, even if contained in a single indictment, required a 30-year mandatory consecutive sentence. If the defendant had been adequately advised, he most likely would have accepted the plea offer that would have required a plea to only one count of this offense and would have required a sentence of 147 to 168 months under the Sentencing Guidelines. Although the defendant had been convicted at trial, but not yet sentenced, the court found that habeas review under 28 U.S.C. 2241(c) was appropriate. The court ordered that the rejected plea agreement would be enforced and set aside the convictions not in line with that agreement and scheduled sentencing for a later date.

4. State Cases

2023: Alexander v. State, 361 So.3d 942 (Fla. App. Ct. 2023). In case where trial counsel's misadvice to petitioner concerning what the State needed to prove in order to secure a conspiracy conviction resulted in petitioner rejecting a pre-trial offer of a six-year prison term and receiving a 20 year sentence following conviction, the post-conviction court erred in its remedy to the ineffective assistance by trial counsel. After finding that petitioner would have accepted the six-year offer, the State would not likely have withdrawn the offer, and the court would probably have approved it, the post-conviction court nevertheless ordered that petitioner be retried on the charges against him. The proper remedy is for the post-conviction court to order the State to reoffer the rejected plea deal. If petitioner accepts, the post-conviction court must then "exercise its discretion by determining whether to vacate [petitioner's] conviction and to then resentence him pursuant to the plea agreement or to leave the conviction and original sentence undisturbed."

2022: Barlow v. Commissioner of Correction, 273 A.3d 680 (Conn. 2022). In attempted murder case where petitioner rejected a plea offer by the trial court involving nine years of actual incarceration and was ultimately convicted and sentenced to thirty-five years of prison time, petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance in failing to give petitioner her professional advice and assistance concerning, and her evaluation of, the trial court's plea offer. (Trial counsel, a judge at the time of the habeas hearing, explained that her practice was to simply inform defendants about the facts of the offer but not to recommend a specific course of action or to assist a client in weighing the options.) Regarding the showing required to establish prejudice when the issue is a rejected plea, it is acknowledged that the federal courts are split as to whether a petitioner must present contemporaneous evidence supporting the petitioner's post-trial assertion that the plea offer would have been accepted had the petitioner been adequately advised of the offer by competent counsel. Even assuming contemporaneous evidence is required, "the record in the present case contains sufficient contemporaneous evidence to substantiate the petitioner's after-the-fact testimony that he would have accepted the plea deal but for his attorney's deficient performance." The contemporaneous evidence was: (1) the generosity of the trial court's nine year plea offer compared to the petitioner's thirty-five year sentence; (2) the petitioner's willingness to plead guilty to a sentence with incarceration of six or seven years; (3) the relatively minor difference between the trial court's plea offer and the petitioner's counterproposal, and the strength of the state's case.

State v. Dorsey*, 875 S.E.2d 900 (Ga. App. 2022). Trial counsel was deficient in case involving multiple felony charges where, in conveying the plea offer to defendant, he failed to “take into account both of the recidivist-sentencing statutes at play in this case and by subsequently misadvising [defendant] that the trial court was not required to impose a life sentence when, in fact, the court had no discretion to do otherwise given [defendant's] status as a recidivist.” As for prejudice, the record supported the trial court's finding that, had defendant been properly advised, he would have accepted the State's plea offer and that the offer would not have been withdrawn. (The State had offered twenty years to serve seven with no recidivist treatment. Defendant ultimately received a life sentence without the possibility of parole after trial.) The trial court's finding, however, that a new trial was mandated was error. The case is remanded for determination of the appropriate remedy.

2021: People v. Nicholson, 173 N.E.3d 1002 (Ill. App. Ct. 2021). Trial counsel was ineffective when conveying a plea offer of six-years in failing to advise petitioner that he would be subject to Class X sentencing (up to 25 years imprisonment) if convicted of aggravated domestic battery. Petitioner had been charged, inter alia, with attempted murder (which carried a potential 30 year sentence), and aggravated domestic battery. When conveying the plea offer, which included dismissal of all charges but aggravated domestic battery, defense counsel opined that the State could not meet its burden of proving the attempted murder and explained why. This assessment proved correct when petitioner was acquitted of the charge at trial. Regarding the aggravated domestic battery count, however, trial counsel erroneously told petitioner that probation was a possibility and that he was facing a maximum of 14 years. In post-conviction proceedings, trial counsel admitted that he was unaware that petitioner would be subject to Class X sentencing for that crime which ultimately resulted in a 25-year sentence after petitioner was convicted. The only real question in this case was whether there was a reasonable probability that petitioner would have accepted the State's offer but for counsel's erroneous advice. The lower court had concluded prejudice was not shown given that petitioner had rejected the 6-year offer when he knew he was facing a potential 30-year sentence on the attempted murder charge. But this analysis was faulty because it failed to consider petitioner's understanding that conviction on that charge was unlikely. The appellate court concludes that counsel's erroneous advice was the deciding factor leading him to reject the State's 6-year plea offer. “Absent counsel's advice, which subjectively affected his decision-making, we find it objectively rational that [petitioner] would have accepted the guilty plea offer—and thus, was prejudiced by counsel's advice.”

2020: State v. Elma, 325 So.3d 139 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). Affirming grant of relief on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel regarding plea advice that led petitioner to reject the plea offer but reversing lower court's ruling that a new trial was the appropriate remedy. Rather, petitioner was entitled to have the State reoffer the original agreement.

State v. Fitzgerald*, 243 A.3d 1206 (N.H. 2020). Where defendant was convicted of five counts of unauthorized taking from his elderly father and was sentenced to 9 ½-25 years in prison, trial counsel was ineffective in plea negotiations for failing to adequately assess and convey the potential sentence the defendant faced and the merits of the State’s plea offer. Although defense counsel informed defendant that he could receive a “pretty severe” sentence if convicted at trial, “counsel testified that he gave the defendant the impression that the sentence he might receive after trial would be significantly less than it actually was — likely three years or less.” Further, the record indicated that counsel neglected to explain to defendant that he faced a significant sentencing enhancement because of the victim’s age. As to prejudice, defendant had been seriously considering an offer that included two years imprisonment even without knowing that his actual sentencing exposure was 150 years. “Given the evidence of the defendant’s willingness to consider the State’s plea offer in this case, and counsel’s errors in advising the defendant, we conclude that, but for counsel’s deficient performance, there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would have accepted the plea offer.” Defendant demonstrated a reasonable probability that the State would not have withdrawn the plea offer by showing that the offer had remained open through the second day of the settlement conference. The final prong of the prejudice test was whether there was a reasonable probability that the trial court would have accepted the plea deal. In assessing this prong, it was not proper to look at the lengthy sentence actually imposed or at the prior sentence imposed by the same judge in a similar case. “As the Supreme Court has explained, the prejudice inquiry under Strickland is an objective one that should not consider a particular judge’s sentencing practices.” Therefore, “[a]bsent some intervening circumstance, or evidence in the record, to suggest that the court would have rejected the plea agreement in the normal course, we conclude that there is a reasonable probability that the court would have accepted the plea agreement if it had been presented.” On remand, the trial court is to decide the appropriate remedy for counsel’s ineffectiveness: (1) impose the term of imprisonment the State offered in the plea; (2) reimpose the sentence defendant received at trial; or (3) impose a sentence somewhere in between.

2019: Urquhart v. State, 203 A.3d 719 (Del. Supr. 2019). In armed robbery case where petitioner was convicted and sentenced to fifteen years in prison, the Delaware Supreme Court grants post-conviction relief and holds: “[A] defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel in a serious felony trial requires more than the mere presence of a defense attorney the day of trial.” Following petitioner’s indictment, he was represented by three different public defenders at preliminary court hearings in the five months prior to trial. A fourth public defender was assigned to represent petitioner at trial. Because, however, of other commitments, trial counsel did not meet with petitioner to prepare for trial. On the morning of trial, petitioner for the first time was shown the key evidence against him – surveillance footage and photographs. (The discovery had been mailed to petitioner but it had not been received prior to the trial date.) Petitioner was offered a five-year plea deal that he turned down. Petitioner expressed to the trial court his confusion and frustration about essentially seeing his defense counsel for the first time on the day of trial along with the evidence. Petitioner denied that he was dissatisfied with counsel, but instead maintained he needed help and did not understand what was happening. When asked if he wanted to delay the trial, petitioner said he did not. Trial counsel did not ask for a continuance and the trial went forward. In post-conviction proceedings, petitioner raised a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel under Cronic rather than Strickland. The lower court denied relief, agreeing with the State that Cronic required that defense counsel be “completely absent” from representation to forgo Strickland’s prejudice requirement. Because trial counsel supposedly met with petitioner once, spoke on the telephone with him twice, and sent him five letters before trial, the lower court found that trial counsel was not completely absent during the pretrial proceedings. Before addressing the merits of the claim, the Delaware Supreme Court rejected the State’s argument that petitioner had waived the claim by informing the trial court that he was not dissatisfied with counsel and did not ask for a delay. The Court explained: “Viewed in the context of [petitioner’s] overall response to the court’s questions —repeated requests for help and clarification—and trial counsel’s failure to speak up and request a continuance for the benefit of his client, we find that [petitioner] did not knowingly and intelligently waive his right to later appeal his trial counsel’s failure to provide effective assistance of counsel.” As to the merits, the Court dissected the actual communication that occurred between petitioner and trial counsel and concluded: “The grim reality is, in the critical pretrial phase when trial counsel must meet with his client to review the evidence, develop strategy, and prepare for trial, that did not occur.” Regarding whether Chronic or Strickland should apply, the Court held:

Under the stark facts in this appeal—no advance discussion with [petitioner] of trial strategy, what witnesses to call, how to respond to the State’s evidence, whether [petitioner] should testify, and no sober conversation with counsel outside the distractions of the morning of trial whether to enter into plea negotiations and accept a plea— [petitioner] should not have to point to any specific event of prejudice and disprove the State’s contention that trial counsel was able to “wing it” enough at trial to satisfy the Sixth Amendment.”

In the alternative, Strickland prejudice was shown as to trial counsel’s deficiency in handling the plea offer.

[W]e think it is obvious that had the objective circumstances—the evidence the State was going to present, the length of time [petitioner] faced if he went to trial and was convicted, and the likelihood of an acquittal—been the subject of professionally adequate consultation between client and counsel, there is a “reasonable probability” that [petitioner] would have accepted the plea.

As for the remedy, although petitioner had asked for a new trial, it was left to the lower court to decide whether a new trial should be ordered, or the State and petitioner agree on another remedy, i.e., reinstating the plea offer.

2018: State v. Drath, 431 P.3d 1098 (Wash. Ct. App. 2018). Trial counsel was ineffective during plea negotiations in failing to accurately inform appellant of the possible sentence she was facing. At trial, appellant was convicted by a jury of residential burglary, first degree burglary, first degree theft, theft of a firearm, first degree unlawful possession of a firearm, second degree unlawful possession of a firearm, first degree trafficking in stolen property, and bail jumping arising out of repeatedly breaking into a neighbors’ home and stealing 75 firearms and a number of knives and swords, and then selling some of these. The court sentenced her to 128 months incarceration and ordered her sentences for first degree unlawful possession of a firearm and theft of a firearm to run consecutively. She moved for a new trial, alleging that she was drastically misinformed about possible sentencing ranges if she went to trial. She was provided a worksheet by her counsel that said that if she was found guilty of all charges, she would face between 87 and 116 months, and that did not show that the unlawful possession of the firearm and the theft of the firearm sentences would run consecutively. An evidentiary hearing was held with new counsel representing appellant. At the hearing, five attorneys who had represented appellant at various times while the case was pending testified about the numerous offers that had been received and appellant's rejection of them. The last attorney was the one who provided appellant with the 87 to 116 months range. At that time, the attorney had received an offer of 50 months that appellant rejected. Appellant testified that had she known her true sentencing range, she would have considered the 50-month plea offer, but was not sure she could answer whether she would have accepted it. After the hearing, the trial court found that appellant's last trial counsel rendered deficient performance by failing to take into account the consecutive nature of the sentences when advising appellant, but did not find prejudice because appellant was not able to say that she would have accepted the final 50-month plea offer if she had known the correct sentencing range, and denied the motion for new trial. The court of appeals reversed, finding that the lower court erred in determining appellant failed to establish prejudice. This was because defense counsel not only failed to convey crucial information to appellant, but actually misinformed her as to the sentencing range she faced if convicted at trial. Because of this information, appellant was denied the ability to make an informed decision about whether to accept the state's final 50-month offer. It is of no moment that appellant rejected four plea offers in the five years that her case was pending; she considered them and discussed them with her attorneys, and she said she would have considered the 50-month offer had she known her true sentencing range. "[I]t is reasonably probable that had [she] known she faced a maximum sentence that was 20 months longer than her attorney advised, the result of the proceeding would have differed." 431 P.3d at 1105. Any amount of additional jail time has Sixth Amendment significance under Lafler, 566 U.S. at 165. The court of appeals remanded and ordered the prosecution to reoffer the final 50-month plea offer which entailed appellant pleading guilty to counts other than what she was convicted of at trial, in order to put her back in the position she would have been in had counsel been effective.

2017: Lindsey v. State, 71 N.E.3d 428 (Ind. Ct. App. 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective in advising defendant to scrap a plea agreement that had been worked out with the prosecution that had a thirty-two-year sentence. Defense counsel informed defendant that the longest sentence defendant could receive from an open guilty plea was thirty years. Defendant ultimately received a sentence of forty years. Defendant had been charged with one count of attempted criminal confinement and a second count of criminal confinement. The charges involved separate victims but occurred between half an hour to two hours apart as defendant attempted to force each of the two victims to drive him out of town. Defense counsel had concluded that the crimes were part of a single episode of criminal conduct, thereby limiting defendant's liability to thirty years. The trial court, however, prior to accepting the open guilty plea, informed defendant that the determination of whether defendant's conduct was part of a single episode of criminal conduct was fact-intensive and that defendant faced a maximum of forty years. Defendant nevertheless stuck with the open plea. The trial court rejected defense counsel's argument that the crimes were part of a single episode and then sentenced defendant to twenty-years for each offense, to be served consecutively. Although the trial court misapprehended the holding of the case defense counsel relied on, nevertheless it was not reasonable for trial counsel to have concluded that the case was analogous to the facts of defendant's case. Even if defense counsel had only told defendant that a single criminal act was the best prediction of what the trial court would find, rather than guaranteeing the result, it was nevertheless unreasonable. Regarding prejudice, the appellate court noted that defendant and the prosecutor had been moments away from submitting a mutually agreed upon plea deal when, at the last instant, defense counsel gave defendant erroneous advice that caused him to plead guilty without any set sentence. Further, the difference between the thirty-two year sentence offered and the forty-year sentence imposed was not so significant as to cast doubt upon the trial court's willingness to have accepted the plea agreement. "Under these facts, we have little doubt that, but for trial counsel's ineffectiveness, [defendant] would be serving a thirty-two-year sentence today. [Defendant] has met his burden of showing that he was prejudiced."

2016: State v. Estes, 372 P.3d 163 (Wash. Ct. App. 2016). Counsel ineffective in assault and felony harassment case for failing to investigate the impact of the deadly weapon enhancements on the defendant's persistent offender status and failing to adequately advise the defendant to enter plea negotiations. Prior to trial, the state served a persistent offender notice indicating that the defendant faced a third strike, as he already had two violent offense convictions, which were strikes. Prior to sentencing, the state again mentioned that the defendant had three strikes. Defense counsel erroneously argued that the defendant had not been convicted of a strike offense without realizing that the deadly weapon enhancements were strikes. The court thus imposed the mandatory life without the possibility of release sentence. At the conclusion of sentencing, the prosecutor noted that it was their possibility to seek something other than "third strike resolution" but the defendant had "declined to enter into any negotiations." Counsel's conduct was deficient: "Where an attorney is ignorant of a point of law that is fundamental to the case and fails to perform basic research on the point, his conduct is unreasonable." Here, counsel clearly did not realize until after conviction that the defendant faced mandatory life imprisonment. As a result, counsel failed to adequately advise the defendant. "Representation must include not only communicating actual offers, but discussion of tentative plea negotiations and the strengths and weaknesses of a defendant's case so that the defendant knows what to expect and can make an informed judgment whether or not to plead guilty." Prejudice established. "Where the failure to plea bargain is based on ignorance of the law and, consequently, a failure to advise a client of the potential consequences of failing to negotiate, prejudice is demonstrated." New trial ordered.

Beavers v. State*, 495 S.W.3d 76 (Ark. 2016). In case where defendant was charged with rape, trial counsel was ineffective for providing erroneous information regarding defendant's parole eligibility under a plea offer, causing defendant to reject the plea and ultimately receive a less-favorable outcome after a jury trial. The minimum sentence for the rape charge that defendant faced at trial was 25 years, and 70 percent of the term of imprisonment would have to be served to be eligible for parole. On the day the case was originally set for trial, defendant's attorney informed the court that the State had offered to reduce the rape charge to second-degree sexual assault and recommend a sentence of 20 years. While reporting that the plea offer had been rejected, defense counsel's statements indicated his misapprehension about whether the plea offer fell above, rather than below, the seriousness line, which related to parole eligibility. "[D's] testimony that he would have accepted the more lenient plea offer had it been explained to him along with the imposition of a more severe sentence demonstrated that he suffered prejudice from the deficient performance.”

2015: Rodriguez v. State, 424 S.W.3d 153 (Tex. Crim. App. 2015) (reversing in part 424 S.W.3d 155 (Tex. Ct. App. 2014)). The Court of Appeals held that counsel was ineffective for advising the defendant to reject a plea offer of ten years in sexual assault of child and indecency with child case where the defendant was sentenced to multiple life sentences following conviction. On motion for new trial, the trial court granted the motion due to counsel’s admission of ineffectiveness in that this was his first criminal jury trial and that he provided inadequate advice due to his lack of experience and knowledge in criminal law. The trial court rejected the subsequent plea agreement instead advising the defendant that he had the option to withdraw his guilty plea and proceed to trial or to accept a sentence of years. The defendant filed a motion to recuse, which was granted. The new trial judge believed she was bound by the initial court’s ruling and denied the defendant’s request that the State be required to reinstate the offer of ten years. She accepted the subsequent negotiated plea of 25 years. While the initial trial court correctly found that the defendant refused the 10-year offer prior to trial, the Court of Appeals did not find the earlier refusal to accept a plea determinative in this case because he was relying upon trial counsel’s improvident opinion that an acquittal would be easy to obtain at the time. “We cannot allow the same incompetent advice that rendered trial counsel’s assistance ineffective to be used as a means of preventing appellant from demonstrating that counsel’s ineffective assistance was prejudicial.” Because the defendant accepted a plea agreement with a 25 year sentence when new counsel was obtained, the court concluded that there is a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the original ten-year plea-bargain offer if he had received competent advice prior to trial. On remand, the defendant was entitled to have the original plea offer re-instated. The Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the finding of ineffective assistance of counsel but reversed the Court of Appeals’ finding that the defendant was entitled to have the original plea agreement reinstated. In reaching this finding, the Court of Appeals assumed that the original trial judge recused herself on the basis of prejudice when there was no evidence in the record to support that assumption. The trial judge was within her discretion to reject the 10-year sentence and the 25-year sentence she imposed was still at the low range for the charged offenses. When the new judge was assigned, “the slate [was] wiped clean” meaning “the case started over from the beginning, and it was as if no plea negotiations had ever occurred.” The 25-year sentence imposed as a result of the proceedings before the second judge was reinstated.

2013: H.P.T. v. Commissioner of Correction, 79 A.3d 54 (Conn. 2013) (affirming, in part, 14 A.3d 1047 (Conn. Ct. App. 2011)). The Court of Appeals held that counsel was ineffective in pretrial negotiations which resulted in the defendant rejecting a plea offer in sexual assault on child case. In a pretrial conference, the prosecutor made an offer, including a recommendation of a 25 year sentence, suspended after 12 years. The trial court made its own offer, which the prosecutor acquiesced to by silence, of a 20 year sentence, suspended after 9 years. Counsel did not retain the services of an interpreter, even though the defendant’s native language was Vietnamese, and did not advise the petitioner to accept the court’s offer. After the defendant rejected the offer, initial counsel withdrew and the case proceeded to trial. Following conviction, the defendant was sentenced to 23 years, suspended after 13 years. The court of appeals affirmed the lower court’s finding of ineffective assistance and remanded for sentencing only not to exceed the court’s pretrial plea offer of 20 years, suspended after 9. The Supreme Court, however, held that the proper remedy under Lafler v. Cooper, 132 S. Ct. 1376 (2012), was to remand to the trial court “to consider whether it should vacate the convictions and accept the plea offer, leave the original convictions intact or otherwise modify the convictions and sentence.”

2012: Ebron v. Commissioner of Correction, 53 A.3d 983 (Conn. 2012). Counsel ineffective in failing to advise the defendant to accept the state’s plea offer which resulted in the defendant entering an open plea and receiving a higher sentence. The defendant was charged with a variety of offenses, including drugs, assault, and weapons, and faced total sentence exposure of over 41 years. During a hearing, the state formally offered a plea deal with a 10-year-sentence suspended after 6 years, which the hearing judge agreed was appropriate. Counsel recommended rejection of the offer and an open plea before a different judge. The defendant received an 11-year-sentence. Prejudice established. While the focus in determining whether the plea offer would have been accepted by the court is on “what a reasonable court would have done” rather than what the hearing judge would have done, this evidence is “probative” absent any evidence that this judge’s practice deviated significantly from the normal practice.

2010: Kolle v. State, 690 S.E.2d 73 (S.C. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug trafficking plea case for failing to adequately advise the defendant with respect to the state’s initial plea offer of ten years suspended on service of five. The defendant was facing a sentence of 7-25 years, but counsel advised the defendant the offer was not a “good deal.” Counsel also misinformed the defendant that the offer would still be open after the suppression hearing, when it was not. If the defendant had been aware that the state would withdraw the offer after the suppression hearing, he may have decided to accept it and receive a lower sentence.

2009: Lester v. State, 15 So. 3d 728 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel was ineffective in robbery case for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the potential sentence, which led the defendant to reject a favorable pretrial plea offer. The defendant was initially charged with robbery by sudden snatching. The state offered a deal for 41.7 months, but this offer was rejected after counsel advised the defendant of the five year maximum punishment. Just before trial, the state amended the charge to indictment by force. The deal was still rejected after counsel advised the defendant of the possible fifteen year sentence and recommended the defendant take the deal. Counsel did not, however, advise the defendant of the possibility that the state would seek habitual felony offender status, which happened prior to sentencing. The defendant was thus subject to a 30 year mandatory sentence. The remedy ordered was that the state could elect whether to retry the defendant or simply to withdraw the habitual offender notice, subjecting the defendant only to the fifteen year maximum.

Holmes v. State*, 277 S.W.3d 424 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009). Counsel ineffective in misdemeanor assault on wife case where the wife refused to testify for failing to investigate and discover evidence (including the 911 and patrol car tapes), failed to develop a trial strategy, failed to be prepared for trial, and failed to object to admission of the 911 and patrol car tapes, or seek a continuance. Prejudice established during pretrial negotiations, including an offer of 120-days in exchange for a plea after jury selection began, because the defendant was “unable to make an informed decision regarding plea offers.” Prejudice also established during the trial itself.

- 2008: Revell v. State, 989 So. 2d 751 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in driving while license suspended or revoked case for failing to advise the defendant, who had two prior felony convictions, that he was eligible for habitual felony offender (HFO) enhanced sentencing prior to the State withdrawing its plea offer. The state offered nine months in the county jail in exchange for a plea; counsel advised the defendant he faced a maximum sentence of five years; and the defendant rejected the plea offer. The state then withdrew the offer and two weeks later filed a notice of intent to seek enhanced sentencing. The defendant was sentenced to ten years. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel conceded he was not aware of the possibility of an enhanced sentence until after the state's notice was filed. "Counsel's failure to accurately advise his client of the maximum sentence he faced when considering the offer of a plea negotiation amounts to ineffective assistance."
- 2006: Hall v. State, 929 So. 2d 1148 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in advising client prior to guilty pleas to various property crimes because counsel erroneously believed and advised the defendant that he would be sentenced to no more than seven years of confinement and that he was eligible for probation. Prejudice found because the defendant had been offered a plea agreement for 10 years in prison and five years of probation, but turned it down and then inexplicably pled guilty and got the mandatory 15 year prison sentence due to his prison releasee reoffender status.
- 2004: McKeeth v. State, 103 P.3d 460 (Idaho 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in sexual exploitation by a medical care provider for failing to draft the conditional plea agreement in accordance with the terms that he and the defendant intended. The defendant, a licensed professional counselor, was charged with sexual contact with six patients. He offered a conditional plea agreement that was intended to reserve his right to appeal the denial of pre-trial motions and to withdraw all of his guilty pleas if he prevailed on appeal with respect to even one count. The defendant entered Alford pleas to all six counts. On appeal, three counts were dismissed but the court did not allow the defendant to withdraw his guilty pleas on the remaining three counts because the language of the plea agreement only allowed the defendant to withdraw his plea to those counts on which he prevailed on appeal. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to draft the conditional plea agreement according to the terms that he and the defendant intended to proffer. The defendant was prejudiced because but for counsel's error the defendant would have pleaded not guilty to all the offenses. The defendant's guilty pleas to the remaining three counts were vacated.

E. ERRONEOUS ADVICE ON RIGHT TO SILENCE OR TO TESTIFY, LEADING TO DETRIMENTAL OUTCOME

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2016: Casiano-Jimenez v. United States, 817 F.3d 816 (1st Cir. 2016). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to inform the defendant of his right to testify on his own behalf. The defendant was one of seven defendants tried for smuggling narcotics by ship into the country. Defense counsel conceded that the lawyers for all the defendants collectively decided that rather than have the defendants testify they should retain a single expert to present a “lack of knowledge” defense. The expert thus testified that – based on the hidden location of the contraband– it was possible that none of the crew members were aware that drugs were on board. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel did not inform the defendant, who was “an alien who had limited proficiency in English and no experience with the American criminal justice system,” as well as no criminal history, of his right to testify or have any discussion that would “enable the defendant to make an informed decision about whether to take the stand.” Prejudice was established as the government’s case was entirely circumstantial and three of the codefendant’s, who were “all ordinary seamen,” were acquitted. If defendant had testified, he could have explained that he was new to the crew; had never been on the ship before; signed on as an ordinary seaman; was pressed into service as “first officer,” as the government portrayed him, after he was on board; and had no knowledge of the drugs. This testimony would have been far more exculpatory than the expert’s testimony and “could have been a game changer.”

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2011: Credell v. Bodison, 818 F. Supp. 2d 928 (D.S.C. 2011). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for inadequately advising the petitioner prior to advising him to testify, which resulted in him testifying and introducing evidence of prior bad acts. The petitioner was charged with “a violent, unexplained home invasion leading to the execution murder” of the victim. Because the public defender had a conflict, the Clerk of Court appointed private counsel, whose only criminal law experience as one plea in a DUI case. Counsel primarily practiced in bankruptcy and family law, but did not ask the court to appoint more experienced counsel to replace or assist her and did not seek assistance of other counsel at trial. Counsel’s conduct was ineffective in advising the petitioner to testify because of her “profound ignorance of the law of evidence, particularly regarding the admissibility of such ‘bad act’ evidence as a prior history of drug dealing, previous misdemeanor convictions and prior arrests which did not lead to a felony conviction.” Counsel believed “in [her] gut” that all of this information was admissible regardless of whether the petitioner testified. Because of this, she failed to advise the petitioner that this evidence would not be admissible if he chose not to testify. She did not inform him that if he did testify, the court would instruct the jury “not to hold this against him.” She did not request an in camera hearing to obtain a ruling on what portions of the petitioner’s history would be admissible if he testified. The prejudice was clear as the petitioner testified.

Capital Case*

Moreover, because of the mistaken belief that “bad act” evidence was generally admissible, trial counsel had the Petitioner disclose to the jury on direct examination that he was a drug dealer, had been involved in the drug trade with the victim, had been convicted of several misdemeanors (including possession of marijuana) and had numerous prior arrests.

This led to cross-examination, without objection, on these topics, that the drug trade was a “violent business,” and that the petitioner had spent his “entire life in trouble.” The state’s evidence otherwise was based on an eyewitness whose “credibility and reliability” were in question. There was “no direct evidence of motive and little context for what ultimately resulted in an execution style murder.” No evidence connected the petitioner to the crime scene, although his fingerprints were on the outside of a vehicle that had been observed near the crime scene. The “bad acts” evidence provided motive and context, even though the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) as the petitioner did not have a prior felony conviction. Likewise, the evidence was not proper impeachment material under Rule 609.

[H]ad defense counsel possessed a rudimentary knowledge of the law of evidence and provided competent advice to her client, he most probably would not have taken the stand. . . .

[E]ven if the Petitioner had taken the stand, a competent counsel providing professionally reasonable advice under no circumstances would have advised the Petitioner to volunteer his history of drug dealing, prior association in the drug trade with the victim, misdemeanor convictions and arrests. The voluntary introduction of this profoundly prejudicial evidence by defense counsel was the direct result of her ignorance of the most basic precepts of the law of evidence.

The state court’s finding that counsel had “a professionally reasonable trial strategy” was based on an unreasonable application of the facts in light of the evidence presented. The state court did not address “the direct relationship of this purported strategy to trial counsel’s seriously deficient knowledge and application of evidence law.”

3. State Cases

2019: Ford v. State, 205 A.3d 896 (Me. 2019). Reversing the partial denial of post-conviction relief where trial counsel precluded petitioner from testifying on his own behalf. Petitioner had been approached by police who suspected that the concrete well tiles in the bed of petitioner’s truck had been stolen. Petitioner sped off and a chase ensued, during which petitioner repeatedly used his truck to ram police vehicles. Petitioner eventually surrendered after being shot and crashing his vehicle. Petitioner was charged with aggravated attempted murder, two counts of aggravated criminal mischief, two counts of reckless conduct with a dangerous weapon, one count of eluding an officer, and one count of theft by unauthorized taking or transfer. He presented a mental state defense through expert testimony. The defense was unsuccessful and petitioner was convicted of all counts. In post-conviction proceedings, he alleged that trial counsel was ineffective, inter alia, for refusing to allow him to testify. “The post-conviction court found that [petitioner’s] trial counsel failed to prepare [petitioner] to testify, failed to inform [petitioner] of his right to testify, and in fact prevented [petitioner] from testifying by stating, in no uncertain terms, “[t]here is no fing way you’re going to testify.” The post-conviction court ruled, however, that this deficiency by trial counsel only prejudiced petitioner on the theft count. The finding was based on a receipt for the well tiles and the testimony petitioner would have offered. The post-conviction court’s ruling was erroneous because the theft conviction was “inextricably intertwined with the other charges, and the prejudice that [petitioner] suffered also affected his other convictions.” The prosecution’s theory was that petitioner was a thief who was attempting to avoid being caught. Petitioner’s version of events, in contrast, began with his claim that he was not a thief, and that, in response to an unwarranted confrontation with the police, he was reliving traumatic experiences from his military service. According to [petitioner], when he was confronted by the police with sirens and flashing lights, his PTSD caused a “flashback” that made him believe that he was back in a combat zone.

If petitioner had not believed he had stolen the tiles, there would have been no reason for his flight, making the prosecution’s explanation for his actions less plausible. “Because [petitioner] was prevented from testifying, the jury did not hear crucial testimony that would have borne directly on the pivotal issue in this case—whether [petitioner] was suffering from an abnormal state of mind.”

2007: Reeves v. State, 974 So. 2d 314 (Ala. Crim. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in burglary case for preventing the defendant from testifying on his own behalf after the defendant insisted that he wanted to do so. The defendant was charged with entering the home of his wife’s ex-husband and had made a statement to police that he had gone to the home but he did not enter the home. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “[a] defendant has a fundamental right to testify on his own behalf, that right is personal to the defendant, and defense counsel may not waive that right.” Counsel’s conduct was not explained by strategy to avoid cross about the defendant’s prior actions and stalking his wife because she had already testified to these events and the existence of a restraining order against the defendant. The denial of the right to testify was not “harmless,” even though the defendant’s testimony to police was admitted into evidence because he implied in the statement that he did not enter the home but did not specifically state that and because his testimony would have allowed the jury to “judge[] his credibility against the victim’s,” who was the only person to testify that he entered the home. Even without the defendant’s testimony the jury had sought additional instruction on the elements of the charge and reached a verdict only after receiving an Allen charge.

Visger v. State*, 953 So. 2d 741 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in burglary and battery case for advising the defendant not to testify. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the defense theory was that the defendant was invited into the home, but without the defendant’s testimony there was no evidence to support that theory. Counsel’s strategy to keep out information concerning the defendant’s prior conviction of aggravated battery was not reasonable under these circumstances, particularly where there was already evidence that the state’s two primary witnesses had drugs in their home and one of them was a convicted felon “thus reducing any effect of appellant's convictions on his credibility, as compared to that of the state's witnesses." Id. at 744. Strategic decisions must be informed decisions, where the alternatives have been considered and rejected. Where those decisions are uninformed, counsel's judgment may be deficient. That is the case here." Id. It was also not "strategy" that counsel believed that some of the defendant's version of events was "preposterous," but counsel failed to investigate.

Furthermore, we find it unreasonable and deficient performance to believe that counsel could argue to the jury a theory that appellant was invited in without any evidence whatsoever to support it and all the evidence clearly contrary to that theory. Such an argument amounts to sheer speculation.

Id. at 745. Prejudice found in light of the inconsistencies in the state witnesses' testimony, the fact that some of their testimony "strains credulity," and the fact that much of the actions of the state witnesses, even according to their own testimony, "may appear more consistent with having been involved in an attack on the appellant [who was shot in the encounter] rather than the other way around." Id. at 746.

2006: People v. Whiting, 849 N.E.2d 125 (Ill. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for advising the defendant, who desired to testify, that she could not do so. The defendant was charged with assaulting an investigator of the Department of Children and Family Services who was in the defendant's home to investigate an incident between the defendant's son and local police days before. While the defendant's husband and son testified, the defendant was prejudiced because she did not herself testify.

F. ERRONEOUS ADVICE ON RIGHT TO JURY OR BENCH TRIAL

- 2012: Moore v. State, 732 S.E.2d 871 (S.C. 2012). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for waiving the defendant's right to a jury trial and opting for a bench trial. The trial court found that counsel had "detailed" and "at length" discussions with the defendant concerning the waiver, but the "[r]ecord is devoid of any evidence" supporting these findings. Counsel could not specifically recall discussing the issue with the defendant and there was no colloquy between the court and counsel or the defendant regarding the waiver.
- 2011: State v. Sampson, 24 A.3d 1131 (R.I. 2011). Counsel ineffective in child abuse case for refusing to comply with the defendant's request to waive a jury and proceed to a bench trial. Under state law, the defendant had the right to waive the jury and proceed with a bench trial. Moreover, the Rhode Island Supreme Court had "explicitly stated that the decision whether or not to waive the jury is ultimately the decision of the defendant and not of counsel." Here, however, counsel mistakenly informed the court that it was his decision and the court accepted this. Faced with this, the defendant waived counsel and proceeded pro se to his bench trial. The court offered the defendant two choices: (1) trial by jury, against his wishes, represented by counsel; or (2) a pro se bench trial. The correct, third option of a bench trial, in accordance with his wishes, represented by counsel was never offered or considered by the court. Thus, the defendant's waiver of his right to counsel was not knowing, voluntary, or intelligent.

G. INADEQUATE ADVICE ON RIGHT TO APPEAL

1. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: United States v. Tighe, 91 F.4th 771 (5th Cir. 2024). Reversing denial of section 2255 motion on claim that plea counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with petitioner about his right to appeal after sentencing. Petitioner pleaded guilty without a written plea agreement to conspiracy to possess stolen firearms, possession of stolen firearms, and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. He was sentenced to serve a total of 150 months in prison, which was within the guidelines range of 121-151 months. Petitioner was also charged in state court with engaging in organized criminal activity related to the same activity as his federal convictions and later received 15 years on those charges. On the record of this case, counsel's failure to consult with petitioner about an appeal was unreasonable. A rational defendant in petitioner's situation would have wanted to appeal, and petitioner reasonably demonstrated that he was interested in appealing. Both petitioner and plea counsel were shocked by the court's sentence. Additionally, petitioner had asked plea counsel to request the district court to run his federal sentence concurrent with his state sentence but she failed to do that. "Those are all indications that [petitioner] would be interested in appealing." Plea counsel excused her failure to directly ask petitioner whether he wanted to appeal because she provided him his notice of right to appeal prior to sentencing. This established, however, that plea counsel could not have properly consulted with petitioner about an appeal because she would not yet have known the "advantages and disadvantages of taking an appeal" at that time. Petitioner established that but for plea counsel's deficient performance, he would have appealed.

2020: United States v. Akande, 956 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 2020). In bank fraud case where petitioner pleaded guilty in an open plea after defense counsel erroneously informed him that his plea would preserve his ability to appeal the denial of his suppression motion, petitioner was prejudiced by counsel's deficient advice. The admonishment by the trial court about the waiver of appellate rights in the plea colloquy was too general to cure the mistaken advice concerning the appealability of the suppression ruling. The record provided "clear contemporaneous evidence of [petitioner's] overarching desire to preserve his appellate options" and there was a reasonable probability petitioner would not have pleaded guilty had he received accurate advice.

2013: Heard v. Addison, 728 F.3d 1170 (10th Cir. 2013). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in lewd molestation case for failing to recognize a likely defense before advising the defendant to plead guilty and in failing to advise the defendant of the possibility of filing an appeal following the plea. The defendant faced two counts under a statute that criminalized "[l]ook[ing] upon, touch[ing], maul[ing], or feel [ing] [a minor's] body or private parts." Each count carried a 20-year to life sentence. During the plea, the defendant admitted that he positioned himself in a Walmart store so that he could look at two children under the age of 16. He wanted to "look under [their] clothes at [their] bod[ies] and at [their] undergarments." Pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement, the defendant was sentenced to concurrent twenty-five-year prison terms. At the time of the plea, the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals (OCCA) had decided only two cases—both of which were unpublished—that addressed the scope of the lewd molestation statute "as it applies to 'looking upon' the ‘body or private parts’ of a minor child,” which was the critical portion in this case. See Robinson v. State, No. F-98-724 (Okla. Crim. App. July 29, 1999); Terry v. State, SR-2003-0276 (Okla. Crim. App. Mar. 30, 2004). In Robinson, the OCCA held that a lewd molestation conviction based on the “look[ing] upon” language would ordinarily require something on the order of nudity: “[w]hile the statute does not say ‘naked body’ or ‘naked private parts,’ we believe the pairing of the word ‘body’ with the term ‘private parts’ indicates the legislature intended something more than the act of staring between the legs of someone who is wearing both underwear and boxer shorts.” Similarly, in Terry, the OCCA held that secretly filming clothed minors in public for sexual gratification did not violate the statute, “[e]ven though Appellee may have had lascivious intent.” In short, Terry reinforced the rule, first articulated in Robinson, that when the Oklahoma legislature “pair[ed] the word ‘body’ with the term ‘private parts,’” in the context of a “look[ing] at” charge, it “intended something more” than the statute’s plain text suggests. Based on these cases, Heard asserted ineffective assistance because counsel “should have discovered” and advised him about these cases, which “would have provided Heard with a powerful defense.” In denying relief in this case, however, “the OCCA for the first time disapproved Robinson and Terry’s reasoning” and held that, “under a proper reading of the statute, Heard’s admitted conduct was clearly criminal.” In this context, “the extra AEDPA deference that would ordinarily be given to the OCCA is not appropriate” because the state court’s reasoning was contrary to Strickland, which prohibits the use of “hindsight” in evaluating ineffective-assistance claims. The court thus reviewed the claim de novo. The Tenth Circuit, citing amongst other sources the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, held that counsel’s conduct was deficient. “A criminal defense lawyer has a duty to conduct reasonable investigations into her client’s case, which extends to the law as well as the facts.” Id. at 1179 (citing Strickland, 466 U.S. at 690–91. “Quite apart from the failure to discover the OCCA’s unpublished decisions in Robinson and Terry, we hold that, on this record, minimally competent counsel would have recognized a likely defense based on the statute’s text.”

Minimally competent counsel would have realized that, without “something more,” such as a requirement that the minor’s “body or private parts” be unclothed, the statute’s sweep would extend to dance recitals, community pools, shopping malls—the list goes on—with only an officer’s personal judgment as to the lewdness of a glance as a limiting principle. A minimally competent lawyer would have identified that such unbridled police discretion in enforcing the law makes a statute constitutionally suspect.

Minimal research on this issue would have revealed the OCCA’s unpublished opinions in Robinson and Terry. These opinions would not have been difficult to find as defense counsel was a member of the Tulsa Public Defender’s office and, as such, had access to the Oklahoma Indigent Defense System (OIDS) website “which provides access to unpublished Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals decisions by case name, by date of decision, and by subject matter.” “Indeed, the OIDS website is available to the public.” Moreover, the OCCA “permits parties to cite unpublished decisions, provided that ‘no published case would serve as well the purpose for which counsel cites it.’” In short, counsel’s conduct was deficient and not “justifiable on any strategic basis.” Prejudice was also established. “[W]e have no trouble concluding that a decision to go to trial in Heard’s case would have been rational. And the evidence in the record strongly establishes a reasonable probability that Heard would have withdrawn his guilty plea if he had had timely notice from his lawyer of Robinson and Terry.” The available cases provided a strong defense. Additionally, the defendant was 48 years old and facing two 20-year to life sentences. State law required service of 85% of the sentence before parole eligibility. “Given the uncertainties associated with the possibility of parole and life in prison,” Heard was essentially already facing a life sentence. Moreover, it was uncontroverted that Heard “sought to undo his plea” immediately after learning of the Robinson decision. In short, Heard carried his burden to demonstrate “a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial.” Hill, 474 U.S. at 59. Likewise, Heard established that counsel was ineffective in failing to advise Heard of his right to appeal but “since the relief we have already afforded Heard should allow him to vacate his guilty plea, that effectively moots any state-court appeal challenging that guilty plea.”

United States v. Cong Van Pham*, 722 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2013). Counsel was ineffective following negotiated plea in drug case for failing to advise the defendant about his right to file a direct appeal.

Pham is a refugee from Vietnam, speaks no English, and, until the events leading to this appeal, had no criminal record. When his wife was diagnosed with a brain tumor, Pham began cultivating marijuana to raise money for her medical treatment. The government found over seven hundred marijuana plants in Pham’s “grow house” and charged him with one count of manufacturing a controlled substance. Because of the large number of his marijuana plants, Pham faced a mandatory minimum sentence of five years.

Pham pleaded guilty pursuant to a plea agreement that contained an appeal waiver but did not contain any agreement concerning the sentence. Despite counsel’s warnings that Pham would likely receive the mandatory minimum sentence, Pham continued to hope for a sentence of probation so that he could care for his wife. When he was sentenced to five years, Pham was visibly upset and told counsel he “wanted to do something to get less time.” “[A] lay defendant, particularly one who speaks no English,” is not required to “incant the magic word ‘appeal’ to trigger counsel’s duty” to advise the defendant of his right to appeal. Here, Pham’s “statement to counsel, when viewed in context, was enough to trigger counsel’s constitutional duty to consult with Pham about an appeal,” but counsel did not “mention or discuss the possibility of a direct appeal, and no notice of appeal was filed.” Counsel’s performance was objectively unreasonable under Flores–Ortega. The government did not even argue the lack of prejudice so prejudice was easily established.

2009: Bostick v. Stevenson, 589 F.3d 160 (4th Cir. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective following murder trial in failing to consult with the defendant about filing an appeal. While the defendant had told counsel prior to trial that he would be satisfied with the jury’s verdict, he told his daughter in open court prior to sentencing not to worry because he would “get an appeal.” Counsel did not speak with the defendant about an appeal after that, but he told the defendant’s then-wife, who inquired about an appeal, that there were no possible grounds for an appeal. Counsel’s failure to consult with the defendant was deficient and “flew in the face of a duty to do so.” Id. at 166.

Capital Case*

An attorney must consult with a client about filing an appeal either where a reasonable defendant would have wanted to appeal, typically because there were non-frivolous grounds to pursue, or because the particular defendant adequately demonstrated to counsel an interest in appealing. Though there is no per-se rule, a lawyer who fails to consult with a defendant about an appeal following a jury trial almost always acts unreasonably.

Id. at 166-67. “Here, trial counsel had a duty to consult with [the defendant] because he went to trial, there were non-frivolous grounds to pursue, and, most importantly, [the defendant] unequivocally demonstrated his interest in an appeal post-verdict.” Id. at 167. He did so “in open court, which was sufficient, in and of itself, to implicate his attorney’s duty to consult.” Id.

2007: Thompson v. United States, 504 F.3d 1203 (11th Cir. 2007). Trial counsel ineffective following plea to conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute for failing to adequately advise the defendant of the right to appeal. The defendant and his two codefendants were sentenced the same day and the codefendants, who had filed motions for reduction based on “minor rule,” were given lesser sentences than the defendant, whose counsel made only an oral motion, which was denied. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel did not adequately advise the defendant concerning the right to appeal following the trial court’s advice to the defendant and the defendant’s question to counsel about a possible appeal. Counsel told the defendant, in a five minute conversation, only that he could appeal but counsel did not think an appeal would be successful or worthwhile. Counsel had a duty to consult with the defendant because the defendant “demonstrated an interest in an appeal by asking his attorney about that right.” Counsel’s advice was deficient because the defendant was given no information from which he could have intelligently and knowingly either asserted or waived his right to appeal. Prejudice established because there is a reasonable probability the defendant would have appealed if he had been adequately advised.

2. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: United States v. Stricker, 2024 WL 4349442 (D. Montana Sept. 30, 2024). In case where the plea agreement expressly waived the right to appeal sentence, plea counsel was nevertheless ineffective in his post-sentencing failure to consult with petitioner about an appeal. The circumstances demonstrating a need to consult were identified as: (1) counsel’s knowledge that petitioner harbored arguably unrealistic expectations of what his sentence would be; (2) petitioner’s personality was such that he may well want to pursue further options, regardless of how ultimately detrimental they would be to him; and (3) petitioner’s then-wife contacted counsel the day after sentencing and asked about an appeal and the associated options. (Although petitioner’s claim to have expressly directed counsel to file an appeal was found not to be credible, the court acknowledged that it was “very possible that he attempted to contact counsel and was unable to do so.”) On this record, counsel was deficient in failing to consult with petitioner about an appeal and prejudice is shown in that petitioner established that he would have appealed had counsel adequately consulted with him.

Banks v. United States*, 2024 WL 5710718 (C.D. Ill. July 16, 2024). In possession of firearm case, although the parties presented conflicting and inconsistent testimony about whether petitioner had requested an appeal be filed, the court ultimately found that, at the very least, trial counsel “failed to accord with his usual practice of explaining appellate rights to criminal defendants following the final resolution of a case.” The record in the case suggested a rational basis for an appeal: a critical suppression motion had been denied regarding the firearm at the heart of the charge against petitioner. Although defense counsel contended that petitioner was happy with his sentence and did not request an appeal, any such satisfaction did not alone absolve counsel from his duty to discuss petitioner’s appellate rights with him, “particularly when Petitioner had chosen to litigate his case through trial rather than pleading guilty.” Petitioner received ineffective counsel and this deficiency prejudiced petitioner because his appellate rights on critical legal issues were not appropriately preserved.

Yohey v. Breitenbach*, 2024 WL 581279 (D. Nev. Feb. 12, 2024). In case involving a negotiated guilty plea to numerous felonies, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately consult with petitioner about his right to appeal. The Nevada Supreme Court decision affirming denial of the claim was contrary to Flores-Ortega when it stated that “[i]t is a defendant’s burden to inform counsel that he wants to appeal.” Applying de novo review, it is found that although a rational defendant in petitioner’s position may not have wanted to appeal, the circumstances following petitioner’s sentencing would have put a reasonable attorney on notice of the duty to consult with his client about the benefits and drawbacks of filing a notice of appeal. Specifically, “before his window for filing a notice of appeal had closed, [petitioner] drafted and mailed a three-paragraph letter to the public defender’s office, asking for someone to look at his case for a possible appeal. This letter—the contents of which were emailed to [] trial counsel—sufficiently demonstrates [petitioner’s] interest in an appeal, triggering his trial counsel’s duty to consult with him.” Trial counsel’s failure to do so constituted deficient performance. Prejudice is established given that petitioner inquired about filing an appeal before his 30-day deadline expired and filed a pro se notice of appeal upon receiving the public defender’s appellate deputy’s response letter a mere 12 days after his 30-day deadline expired.

2023: United States v. Labit, 2023 WL 7655715 (W.D. La. Nov. 14, 2023). In drug case resolved via a plea bargain, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately consult with petitioner about an appeal of the sentence. Although the district court was not persuaded by petitioner’s claim that he explicitly instructed his attorney to file an appeal, the testimony at the evidentiary hearing convinced the district court that defense counsel failed to adequately discuss the issue of filing an appeal with his client. “Among other things, the subsequent attempts of [petitioner] and his mother to contact [defense counsel] to discuss the status of his appeal and [defense counsel’s] failure to return their phone calls, convince the Court that [petitioner] would have timely appealed but for counsel’s deficient failure to consult with him.” The judgment is reinstated for purposes of allowing an appeal.

2020: Castillo v. United States, 2020 WL 5577877 (D. Idaho Sept. 17, 2020). In drug case where petitioner pleaded guilty and waived her right to appeal, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with petitioner after she demonstrated her desire to appeal. The record supported a finding that petitioner would have appealed had counsel consulted with her on the issue.

United States v. Nguyen*, 2020 WL 4370139 (W.D. Tex. July 30, 2020). Granting out-of-time appeal where sentencing counsel acted unreasonably by failing to consult with Nguyen about an appeal, and this prejudiced Nguyen by depriving him of an appeal he otherwise would have taken. Although Nguyen explicitly waived his right to appeal, and he received the 108-month sentence that he bargained for, Nguyen demonstrated an interest in appealing when, right after sentencing, he asked counsel about an appeal. At that point, counsel had a duty to consult with Nguyen about an appeal. The conversations that took place instead involved counsel indicating that Nguyen's chances of prevailing on appeal were low and informing him that winning on appeal could result in a trial where he could end up with a harsher sentence. This did not constitute the required consultation. "If Nguyen had known about the time limit for filing an appeal, that counsel would be provided for him on appeal, or that it would be possible to appeal his sentence without necessarily risking going to trial, perhaps his wishes as expressed during the critical phone call would have been different. In other words, counsel's efforts were not enough to reasonably discover whether Nguyen wished to appeal under the law of this Circuit." Prejudice is found given: (1) Nguyen's § 2255 motion of 90-plus pages showed that Nguyen had grievances about his case that he was interested in challenging, even though they were frivolous; (2) Nguyen demonstrated his interest in an appeal to counsel right after sentencing.

United States v. Greenley*, 2020 WL 4049893 (D. Kansas July 20, 2020). Granting motion to vacate where plea counsel either failed to comply with an express directive to file an appeal or failed to properly consult with petitioner concerning an appeal. Counsel's advice to petitioner that there was nothing to appeal did not constitute the required consultation after petitioner expressed an interest in an appeal.

2019: Crew v. United States, 2019 WL 414879 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 1, 2019). Although petitioner did not specifically request that trial counsel file a notice of appeal, based on petitioner's communication to trial counsel, "this was the type of case where counsel had a duty to consult the defendant about an appeal" Petitioner pleaded guilty to one count of illegally reentering the country after having been deported for an aggravated felony. The guilty plea was without any plea agreement. Petitioner was sentenced to 48 months in prison. Four days after judgment was entered, counsel wrote to petitioner and advised him of the deadline for filing a notice of appeal and giving petitioner a deadline to contact counsel should petitioner want a notice of appeal to be filed. Three days later, petitioner wrote to counsel expressing his confusion about why he did not receive credit for the time between when an immigration detainer was placed on him and the judgment in this case, and questioning why the U.S. Attorney for the Middle District of Florida accepted jurisdiction in this case. Counsel did not respond to the letter or file a notice of appeal. Petitioner later sent a follow-up letter with counsel asking, inter alia, about the status of his appeal and suggesting additional objections to the 48-month sentence. Counsel responded with a letter explaining that no notice of appeal had been filed, noting that petitioner's initial post-judgment letter had not requested that an appeal be filed, and reiterating the points made by counsel in prior discussions with petitioner about the sentencing credits issue. In addressing the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, the district court first rejected the government's position that the post-judgment letter from counsel to petitioner satisfied the requirement that counsel adequately "consult" with a defendant about the possibility of an appeal. While the letter advised petitioner he had 14 days from the entry of judgment to file a notice of appeal, and to contact counsel if he wished to do so, the letter did not discuss the advantages or disadvantages of taking an appeal, nor did the letter advise petitioner that he had the right to take an appeal. And after receiving petitioner's response to the letter, counsel again did not consult with petitioner about a possible appeal despite the fact that the letter demonstrated an interest in filing an appeal. "A defendant need not say the magic word 'appeal' to reasonably demonstrate to counsel an interest in pursuing an appeal." Here, petitioner's letter indicated dissatisfaction with the sentence and suggested he believed there was a jurisdictional issue. "It is unclear whether there is any merit to the claims [petitioner] appears to be suggesting, but what is apparent is that [petitioner] was unhappy and he believed there were errors in his conviction and sentence." Also important is the context of petitioner's initial letter – it was sent within the timeframe specified by counsel if petitioner wished to file a notice of appeal. On this record, counsel should have consulted with petitioner about an appeal. And the record demonstrates a reasonable probability that petitioner would have pursued an appeal if counsel had adequately consulted with him, thereby establishing prejudice irrespective of the potential merits of any appellate issues. Petitioner is allowed an out-of-time appeal.

2010: United States v. Iberson, 705 F. Supp. 2d 504 (W.D. Va. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to adequately consult with the defendant during plea negotiations regarding the true advantages of appealing his sentence enhancement, which rendered the plea agreement waivers of appeal rights and collateral rights invalid. Prior to trial, the defendant unsuccessfully challenged a sentence enhancement based on prior felony drug convictions that increased the statutory mandatory minimum sentence from 10 to 20 years. The defendant wanted to appeal, but counsel believed the chances of the Fourth Circuit reversing the trial court were not great. "Advice regarding an appeal's chances for success is not the equivalent of discussing the advantages and disadvantages of appeal." Counsel advised the defendant his only other chance to reduce the length of the sentence was to offer substantial assistance to the government in hopes of achieving a motion for reduction below the statutory minimum. Based on counsel's advice, the defendant entered a plea agreement in which one charge was dismissed, the government recommended credit for acceptance of responsibility, and the defendant waived appeal and collateral attack rights. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to advise the defendant of the possibility of pleading guilty "straight up" without a plea agreement. This would not have exposed the defendant to a greater sentence, would have allowed the defendant to appeal the sentence enhancement, and left open the possibility of seeking a sentence reduction based on substantial assistance. Likewise, counsel did not "fully explore" the "minimal benefit" the defendant got from the plea agreement, which dismissed one count "but did not reduce his sentence exposure in the least." Likewise, "the reduction for acceptance of responsibility was swallowed up" by the sentence enhancement. Prejudice established as the defendant had expressed his dissatisfaction and desire to appeal the sentencing enhancement. There was a reasonable probability that if adequately advised the defendant would have entered a "straight up" plea to both counts and pursued an appeal. Judgment reentered and appeal allowed.

Capital Case*

2009: United States v. Purcell, 667 F. Supp. 2d 498 (E.D. Pa. 2009). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to adequately consult with the defendant about filing an appeal. Prior to sentencing, counsel spoke to the defendant and told the defendant he did not see any meritorious issues for appeal. Nonetheless, the defendant said he wanted to file an appeal. Counsel's failure to follow through on this was deficient and prejudicial, despite the defendant's failure to identify any specific appealable issues. Direct appeal allowed.

Walton v. Hill*, 652 F. Supp. 2d 1148 (D. Ore. 2009). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to notify the defendant about the amended judgment following resentencing imposed without a hearing following remand. Counsel attempted to notify the defendant by letter, but the initial letter was "refused" by the prison mail room because counsel's secretary failed to put a return address on the envelope. After that counsel forgot to resend it. Thus, the defendant did not learn of the amended judgment until after the time to appeal had expired. The state court decision was contrary to established federal law under Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 486 (2000) because "[t]he question is not, as the PCR judge framed it, whether the appeal might have had merit, but instead, 'but for counsel's deficient conduct [the petitioner] would have appealed.'" Here, the defendant had taken a "pro-active role in his defense at all stages of this case, over the course of many years." Counsel had a constitutional duty to confer with him about an appeal, because he had "reasonably demonstrated to counsel that he was interested in appealing" and would have if counsel had performed adequately. "[R]egardless of the apparent lack of non-frivolous grounds for appeal," habeas relief was required to allow the defendant to prosecute an appeal.

3. State Cases

2024: State v. Davis, 257 N.E.3d 484 (Ohio App. 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the charged count of possessing a weapon under a disability as a fugitive from justice and instead advising defendant to plead no contest to the charge. Plea counsel, under a misapprehension of the relevant law, gave defendant the false assurance that such a plea would preserve his right to appeal his conviction of that count. This was deficient performance. Because the relevant case law did not support the count, defendant established prejudice." Trial counsel's failure to accurately advise [defendant] that a no-contest plea did not protect his ability to appeal the weapons under disability charge prejudiced his ability to receive a fair and reliable trial."

2020: Cole v. State, 2020 WL 3288180 (Tenn. Crim. App. June 17, 2020). In case involving multiple crimes including attempted murder for which petitioner received a sentence of 26 years, trial counsel performed deficiently in advising petitioner post-sentencing to waive an appeal without any discernible benefit to petitioner. The post-conviction court erred in applying the Strickland prejudice standard to the claim. "Because the Petitioner testified that he would have pursued a direct appeal but for the deficient advice of trial counsel, we must presume prejudice." Post-conviction relief is granted and the case is remanded to allow petitioner to file a motion for new trial.

2017: Commonwealth v. Rivera, 154 A.3d 370 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2017). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to sua sponte consult with defendant about whether he wanted to appeal following his guilty plea. At the time, although no state court had applied the recent Supreme Court decision in Alleyne v. United States, 133 S.Ct. 2151 (2013) to the mandatory minimum sentencing scheme involved in defendant's sentence, the case raised a non-frivolous issue for appeal that defendant was unaware of. While counsel was not at fault for failing to anticipate a change in the law, counsel failed to provide defendant with all the relevant information he needed to determine whether to file a direct appeal. Because counsel's ineffectiveness tainted defendant's direct appeal rights, the case is returned to the status quo after defendant was sentenced, and before counsel neglected to consult with him regarding his right to file post-sentence motions, and/or a direct appeal expired.

2016: State v. Shelly, 371 P.3d 820 (Kan. 2016). Counsel's advice on the right to appeal sentence following a no-contest plea was inadequate. Following sentencing, the defendant asked counsel what his appeal options were, but counsel advised him there was nothing to appeal. Later, the defendant again asked the defendant about appeal based on a Kansas Supreme Court decision that came out the day of his sentencing, which if applicable would reduce his sentence. The defendant's pro se appeal was found to be untimely by the Court of Appeals. The Kansas Supreme Court held that counsel's conduct was deficient. Because a rational defendant in the defendant's place would want to appeal on the basis of the decision released by the Kansas Supreme Court on the day of sentencing, counsel had a duty to consult with the defendant about his right to appeal. "The minimal advice given – that there was nothing to appeal – unreasonably overlooked at least potentially meritorious grounds for appeal and did not allow Shelly to knowingly and intelligently waive his right to appeal." Prejudice established as the defendant had expressed interest in appealing several times. A belated appeal allowed and remanded to the Court of Appeals for consideration of the merits of the issue raised.

State v. Perry*, 370 P.3d 754 (Kan. 2016). Counsel's advice on the right to appeal sentence following a no-contest plea was inadequate. Following sentencing, the defendant asked counsel what his appeal options were, but counsel advised him there was nothing to appeal. The defendant untimely appealed based on a Kansas Supreme Court decision that came out the day of her sentencing, which if applicable would reduce her sentence. The Court of Appeals held that she was entitled to a belated appeal. The Court of Appeals also determined that her claim was meritorious and that she was entitled to a reduction in sentence. The Kansas Supreme Court considered only the issue of whether she was entitled to a belated appeal. The court held, as in Shelly (below), which was the case of her husband and co-defendant, counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to advise the defendant "of the current state of the law so that she could make an informed decision about whether to take an appeal."

2015: Anderson v. State, 183 So. 3d 1146 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in DUI manslaughter case for incorrectly advising the incompetent defendant to enter a "conditional" plea of no contest in order to preserve the right to appeal the trial court's competency determination. The defendant suffered traumatic brain injury in the car wreck in 2000 that formed the basis of the DUI manslaughter. Over the next ten years, he was examined multiple times and found to be incompetent. He was committed to the state hospital for treatment for three months but still found to be incompetent with experts agreeing that he would likely remain incompetent. Nonetheless, the trial court found him competent based on a limited in-court appearance. In order to preserve the issue, trial counsel recommended the “conditional” plea. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because this advice was “patently wrong.” Under state law, a trial court’s finding of competence is generally not reviewable until after a conviction at trial. Where the defendant enters a plea of guilty or no contest, the competence finding is not a dispositive order and can be reviewed only if the defendant first files a motion to withdraw his plea. When the issue was raised on direct appeal, relief was denied because there had been no motion to withdraw the plea. Afterwards, counsel filed a motion to withdraw the plea, which was denied. On appeal, the court denied relief because the motion to withdraw was untimely. Post-conviction relief was denied because the trial court held that counsel’s failure to timely file the motion to withdraw was a strategic choice. “Assuming arguendo that the decision to enter a plea rather than proceed to trial was a strategic choice, there was nothing strategic about failing to file a timely motion to withdraw the plea in order to preserve the issue for appellate review.”

Strategy presupposes a course of action that, at least theoretically, would be of benefit to the client. The course of action taken by Anderson’s counsel did nothing more than ensure he would not obtain the review Anderson desired; it was in all respects ineffective.

Prejudice established. Plea set aside.

H. MISCELLANEOUS

1. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: Jackson v. United States, 2023 WL 2330365 (W.D. Wash. March 2, 2023). In conspiracy to engage in sex trafficking case, plea counsel was ineffective in failing to inform movant that the government's assurance during plea negotiations that movant's coconspirator would not receive a more favorable deal than movant was not binding. Movant proved both through his testimony and that of plea counsel that he would not have accepted the plea absent the government's assurances concerning the coconspirator. Prejudice is also established given that movant "abandoned his suppression motion, pled to a higher charge than [the coconspirator], agreed to a much higher custodial and supervised release term than [the coconspirator], and has already served significantly more prison time than [the coconspirator] did." Ruling on remedy is deferred pending discussions by the parties.

2. State Cases

2024: State v. Ellison, 241 N.E.3d 349 (Ohio App. 2024). In murder case where the state withdrew its plea deal with appellant after he refused to testify against the co-defendant as required by the plea agreement and appellant received a significantly harsher sentence than originally agreed to following a second plea deal, prejudice was presumed where appointed counsel was absent during a critical stage of the proceedings – when prosecutors met with appellant about his expected testimony against the co-defendant and again after appellant's initial refusal to testify in accordance with the agreement. At the time of the two meetings between the prosecutors and appellant, the criminal proceedings against appellant remained pending, as he had not been sentenced. Further, the prosecutors' office retained sole discretion to determine whether appellant had complied with the signed plea agreement. If there was a failure to comply, the prosecutors were permitted pursuant to the agreement to reinstate the charges against appellant and use his recorded proffer, in which he confessed his involvement in the murder, in their case-in-chief. In this case, the interactions between the state and appellant during the cooperation period made this distinguishable from cases concerning a non-adversarial, presentence interview, usually conducted by a "neutral" probation officer, which several courts have concluded is not a critical stage. "Encounters between the government and the defendant during the cooperation period remain 'essentially adversarial.'" The adversarial meetings between prosecutors and appellant constituted per se violations of appellant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel, under Cronic. This denial of counsel was not assuaged by the appointment of a new attorney, who knew nothing more than "a summary of the facts" provided by the prosecutors, who advised appellant and represented him at the hearing on the prosecution's motion to withdraw the plea agreement. The new attorney was not only unfamiliar with the details of appellant's case and lacked any established trust with appellant, the attorney was not privy to information appellant had shared with initial counsel regarding the charges against him or regarding his agreement to testify against the co-defendant.

He was, therefore, in no position to respond to or ease any anxiety or fear that [appellant] may have had about testifying. These circumstances are such that, although [new counsel] spoke with [appellant] in the hours leading up to the vacation of his guilty plea and stood beside [appellant] in the hearing at which that occurred, the likelihood that any replacement lawyer, even a fully competent one, could have provided [appellant] with effective assistance is so small that a presumption of prejudice is appropriate under Cronic.

Regarding the appropriate remedy, the trial court must proceed on remand from the time of the violations, i.e., prior to the revocation of appellant's original plea agreement. Although this provides appellant with the full benefit of his plea agreement despite his refusal to fulfill his obligations thereunder, the timing of the prosecution's and trial court's actions were what rendered it impossible for appellant to fulfill his obligations under the plea agreement. (Before formally moving the trial court to withdraw appellant's original guilty plea and to reinstate the charges against him, the prosecution resolved the charges against the codefendant via a plea agreement and proceeded immediately to sentencing. Thus, by the time the state moved to vacate appellant's plea agreement based on his refusal to testify against the codefendant and before the court confirmed with appellant that he would not testify, there were no pending proceedings against the codefendant for appellant to testify in.) Under these circumstances, the vindication of the Sixth Amendment violation requires the reinstatement of appellant's original plea agreement and sentencing thereunder.

2014: State v. Hatton, 143 So. 3d 1006 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2014). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the defendant that he could receive a harsher punishment on retrial if he was successful in motion for new trial. In the first trial, the defendant was sentenced to 30 years for sexual activity by a person in familial authority and 15 years for lewd and lascivious exhibition with the sentences to run concurrently. A motion for new trial was granted. Following conviction, the defendant was sentenced by a different trial judge who imposed the same sentences but ordered that the sentences run consecutively. The post-conviction counsel, finding ineffectiveness in failing to advise the defendant that he could receive a harsher punishment on retrial, ordered a third trial. The appellate court, however, held that the appropriate relief was only reinstatement of the original judgment and concurrent sentences.

3. FAILURE TO COMPEL COMPLIANCE WITH PLEA AGREEMENT

2021: Gonzales v. State, 492 P.3d 556 (Nev. 2021). Plea counsel was ineffective at post-plea sentencing hearing for three stalking convictions where the plea agreement included the prosecution's agreement that the sentences would run concurrently but at sentencing, with no objection from plea counsel, the prosecution concurred in the recommendation in the presentence investigation report (PSI) that only two of the three sentences run concurrently. The lower court erred in concluding that state law precluded sentencing challenges in cases where a knowing and intelligent plea of guilty occurred. "[W]here a petitioner argues that he or she received ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing, he or she could not have raised that claim before entering his or her plea. It would violate the spirit of our habeas statute and the public policy of this state to prohibit him or her from ever raising that claim in state court." Here, the record established that the prosecution materially breached the terms of the plea agreement and counsel's failure to object was not strategic but rather deficient performance that prejudiced petitioner. "While the district court retained discretion in imposing the sentences, the State's recommendations often carry significant weight. [Citation omitted.] Further, trial counsel's failure to object meant that the district court could very well have believed that the PSI was an accurate representation of the sentences agreed to by the parties—which it was not. Under these circumstances, we do not have confidence in the reliability of the outcome at sentencing."

2015: State v. Lopez, 872 N.W.2d 159 (Iowa 2015). Counsel ineffective in plea to child endangerment causing bodily injury for failing to object to the prosecution's breach of the plea agreement. The defendant was charged with abusing the two-year-old son of his girlfriend after she discovered bruises, a bite mark, and a cigarette burn on her son. The parties entered an agreement in which the prosecution agreed that, in exchange for the guilty plea, the prosecution jointly recommended probation, fines, mental health evaluation and treatment, and no contact orders. A presentence investigation report (PSI) recommended a five-year suspended prison sentence. In sentencing, the child's father and the child's guardian ad litem gave victim-impact statements recommending harsh punishment. The prosecution offered into evidence pictures of the child's injuries and cross-examined defense witnesses with these photographs "in a manner suggesting a more onerous sentence was warranted" than the probation supported by the defense witnesses. In argument, however, the prosecutor correctly cited the terms of the plea agreement, never overtly advocated for a tougher sentence, and never referred to the PSI report recommendation. The trial court rejected the joint recommendation of probation and imposed an indeterminate prison term of up to five years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the prosecution's breach of the plea agreement. While the prosecutor has no right or duty to prevent victim-impact statements, the prosecutor cannot solicit such statements in order to evade its obligations under the plea agreement. Here, however, the prosecutor did not solicit the victim-impact statements, did not examine the father or guardian, and made no argument concerning these statements. With respect to the photographs, however, the prosecutor did violate the plea agreement. The sentencing judge would not otherwise have had access to the photographs. Additionally, the defendant did not deny the injuries, thus, "[t]he introduction of the photos was unprovoked and unnecessary." And, of course, the prosecutor did not stop there but also used the photographs to cross-examine the defense witnesses. In short, "[t]he prosecutor's conduct was flatly inconsistent with the State's plea agreement to recommend probation." Counsel's conduct in failing to object was deficient.

Capital Case*

Prejudice is presumed when the state violates a plea agreement. Thus, the defendant was entitled to resentencing before a different judge and the state's compliance with the agreement.

State v. Sidzyik*, 871 N.W.2d 803 (Neb. 2015). Counsel ineffective in second degree sexual assault no contest plea case for failing to object to the state's breach of the plea agreement. The defendant was charged with first degree sexual assault. In the plea agreement, the state agreed to reduce the charge to second degree and to "stand silent" on sentencing. In sentencing, however, the prosecutor endorsed the recommendation of the presentence investigation report (PSI), which recommended "a substantial period of incarceration." Counsel did not object. Counsel testified that he did not think the state had violated the plea agreement, as it was common for the state to endorse the recommendations of the PSI. Counsel also stated that he did not object because he thought the only option was to withdraw the plea, which would have subjected the defendant to trial on the greater charge and the risk of greater punishment. "Counsel was mistaken on both counts." First, the state clearly violated the agreement. Second, state law provided two options to remedy the violation: (1) withdraw the plea; or (2) demand specific performance of the plea agreement before a different judge.

We realize that even seasoned criminal attorneys . . . are not walking repositories of the entire body of the criminal law. But trial strategy based on a misunderstanding of the law is not reasonable.

Prejudice was established. The defendant did not have to show that he would have received a lesser punishment. "Instead, the focus is whether counsel's silence sacrificed Sidzyik's ability to protect the bargain he struck with the State, thereby making the proceedings unfair." Remanded with instructions to allow the defendant to withdraw the plea or to be sentenced before a different judge.

2014: Smith v. State, 754 S.E.2d 900 (S.C. Ct. App. 2014). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following negotiated plea to voluntary manslaughter for failing to object to the state's violation of the plea agreement in recommending the maximum sentence. The defendant was charged with murder. He agreed to plead to manslaughter and testify against his codefendant and the state agreed to remain silent as to sentencing.

2011: State v. Fannon, 799 N.W.2d 515 (Iowa 2011). Counsel ineffective in negotiated plea to sexual abuse for failing to adequately address the prosecutor's breach of the agreement during the plea hearing. The initial prosecutor agreed to make no sentencing recommendation during the sentencing hearing. A different prosecutor argued for up to ten year terms on both counts and asked for consecutive sentences before defense counsel interrupted for a bench trial. Following this, the prosecutor attempted to withdraw his statements in compliance with the plea agreement and the case proceeded to sentencing. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move to withdraw the plea, failing to move for specific performance before a different judge, and failing to even consult with the defendant on these matters. While the court recognized the sentencing court's ability to disregard the improper argument, the court found it appropriate in light of the interests of justice to remand for sentencing before a different court with strict compliance by the state with the agreement.

Capital Case*

- 2008: Baldrige v. Weber, 746 N.W.2d 12 (S.D. 2008). Counsel ineffective in sentencing following drug charge plea for failing to object to the state's failure to comply with the plea agreement. The agreement required, among other things, that the defendant cooperate in the investigation and reveal sources, contacts, and associates and that the state would inform the sentencing judge of the level of his cooperation. The defendant complied with other terms and provided information about people in the Aberdeen area. The prosecution indicated that they wanted information only on people in the Watertown area. The defendant was not from the area, but obtained information from his girlfriend about people in the Watertown area and supplied this as well. Without any allegation that his information was untruthful or his cooperation insufficient, the state failed to inform the sentencing court of the cooperation as required. This information was also not included in the presentencing report. Defense counsel did not object and the court sentenced the defendant to the maximum sentence. Counsel's conduct was deficient and not based on strategy. With respect to prejudice, the court held that "[i]t is immaterial that the sentencing judge may not have been influenced by the State fulfilling its end of the bargain." Prejudice was presumed because the defendant "had a substantial right to the fulfillment of the terms of his plea agreement" and the court viewed this as an instance whether there was an "[a]ctual or constructive denial of the assistance of counsel."
- 2007: Custodio v. State, 644 S.E.2d 36 (S.C. 2007). Counsel ineffective in burglary and grand larceny case for failing to have the defendant's plea agreement enforced based on detrimental reliance. Shortly after his arrest, the defendant met with police and two assistant prosecutors and was promised a 15 year cap if he would cooperate with officers. He did so in admitting to "a string of at least seventy-five burglaries" and assisting in the recovery of a half million dollars worth of property. Following his cooperation, the elected prosecutor chose not to honor the initial agreement and the defendant pled guilty and was sentenced to 45 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to pursue enforcement of the initial agreement, which the defendant told her about and the police and the assistant prosecutors confirmed it. The lower court's finding that there was no agreement was "without any evidence of probative value" because the defendant and his counsel testified and the state presented no contrary evidence. Thus, "[t]he only evidence presented was that an agreement in fact existed." Prejudice established because the defendant was entitled to enforcement of the deal. "[T]he State may withdraw a plea bargain offer before a defendant pleads guilty, provided the defendant has not detrimentally relied on the offer." Here, the defendant had detrimentally relied on the offer. Initial plea bargain enforced.
- 2006: Taylor v. State, 919 So. 2d 669 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in negotiated plea drug case for failing to ensure enforcement of the plea agreement. The agreement had a maximum of nine months confinement, but defense counsel and the prosecutor that negotiated the agreement were not present for sentencing. New defense counsel informed the court that it was a "straight up plea" and the prosecution sought confinement resulting in two concurrent five year prison sentences.
- Eskridge v. State*, 193 S.W.3d 849 (Mo. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to inform the sentencing court that the negotiated plea agreement had been for concurrent time and failing to object to imposition of consecutive sentences.

Capital Case*

2005: Barber v. State, 901 So. 2d 364 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel in unlawful sex with child case was ineffective in failing to move to withdraw the defendant's guilty plea. The defendant had a deal to plead guilty in exchange for the state's recommendation of a sentence of 15 years, but the defendant failed to appear at sentencing. The state recommended a sentence of 30 years and the court sentenced the defendant to 22 years. Counsel did not move to withdraw the guilty plea even though the state violated the plea agreement, which did not include any agreement concerning the defendant's appearance for sentencing. Under state law, if the trial court declined to honor the terms of the agreement, the defendant was entitled to withdraw the plea. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

4. PERFECTING APPEAL

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

- 2019: Rojas-Medina v. United States, 924 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2019). In case involving a plea agreement which included a waiver-of-appeal provision, trial counsel was deficient in failing to adequately consult with petitioner about a possible appeal after petitioner expressed interest in challenging the sentence he received. As for whether counsel's constitutionally deficient performance prejudiced petitioner by depriving him of an appeal that he otherwise would have taken, the court of appeals found that prejudice was shown by: (1) petitioner's prompt expression of a desire to appeal and his swift perfection of a section 2255 petition after learning that no appeal had been taken; and (2) petitioner had at least one nonfrivolous ground for appealing, notwithstanding his appeal waiver, i.e., the district court's determination that his sentence should run consecutive to, not concurrent with, any state sentence.
- 2012: Glover v. Birkett, 679 F.3d 936 (6th Cir. 2012). Counsel ineffective in assault case for failing to timely file notice of appeal. Prejudice presumed.
- 2011: Hardaway v. Robinson, 655 F.3d 445 (6th Cir. 2011). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to file an appellate brief and depriving the petitioner of his direct appeal. While collateral proceedings and appeal was allowed, this was different than direct appeal and not an adequate substitute. Prejudice presumed under Flores-Ortega.
- 2009: Hodge v. United States, 554 F.3d 372 (3rd Cir. 2009). Counsel ineffective following murder plea for failing to file a timely appeal. Counsel filed numerous post-trial motions alleging that the government violated the plea-agreement, but his conduct was deficient because he "failed to file an appeal only because he mistakenly believed his motions practice had put off the pertinent deadline." Although the record was unclear about discussions between counsel and the defendant, the court could not "envision a scenario, aside from following a client's thoroughly informed and perfectly explicit direction, where it would be reasonable for an attorney not to appeal the life sentence of a client with a nonfrivolous argument as to why the sentence is unlawful." The prejudice "is manifest" in that there was a nonfrivolous argument that the government had breached its plea agreement and a codefendant with the same issue had timely appealed and won on this issue. Sentence vacated and ordered to be reentered so the defendant would have another opportunity to file a timely appeal.
- 2007: Corral v. United States, 498 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective following drug plea for failing to perfect appeal. The defendant entered a conditional plea agreement reserving his right to appeal the adverse ruling on the motion to suppress seized evidence. Shortly before sentencing the defendant indicated that he did not desire to appeal and counsel indicated that he would no longer be representing the defendant. Afterwards, while still in time to file the notice of appeal, the defendant changed his mind and attempted to call counsel but counsel blocked prison calls. The defendant's family members also left messages for counsel, in addition to contacting the court and the public defender about getting an attorney appointed for the appeal. Counsel's conduct was deficient in not “remaining available” and taking “affirmative steps to prevent his client from reaching him” by not returning the calls from family members. Prejudice was clear because the defendant would otherwise have filed the appeal as his father-in-law/co-defendant did with success.

United States v. Poindexter*, 492 F.3d 263 (4th Cir. 2007). Counsel ineffective following guilty plea to narcotics trafficking for disregarding the defendant’s unequivocal instruction to file a notice of appeal, even though the defendant had executed an appeal waiver as part of his plea agreement and appealing could be “harmful to the client’s interests” in the long run.

2005: Frazer v. South Carolina, 430 F.3d 696 (4th Cir. 2005). Counsel ineffective in plea to trafficking and weapon case where the court rejected the state’s offer of concurrent five years sentences and gave consecutive sentences of five years each and a $100,000 fine. While counsel moved for reconsideration, counsel failed to consult with the defendant concerning his right to appeal. Flores-Ortega was not a new constitutional rule for Teague purposes because it only applied Strickland. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “[w]here, as here, the defendant has not specifically requested an appeal, counsel is under a professional obligation to ‘consult’ with the defendant regarding that fundamental decision, unless the circumstances demonstrate that consultation is unnecessary.” Under AEDPA, the state court’s holding was an unreasonable application of Strickland. “[W]hen there are non-frivolous issues to appeal or the defendant has manifested an interest in appealing, Strickland requires that counsel consult with the defendant in deciding whether to go forward . . . even if the defendant has pled guilty.” Here, the defendant had two non-frivolous issues: (1) the maximum possible fine was only $25,000; and (2) an allegation that the court’s unexpectedly harsh sentence was impermissibly motivated. The written form the defendant signed notifying him of his right to appeal was insufficient to relieve counsel of the obligation to “consult” with the defendant because “[t]he duty to consult identified in Strickland is broader than the narrow obligation to inform a defendant of his right to appeal.” Prejudice found because the defendant “need only demonstrate an interest in appealing.” Here, the defendant’s interest was unwavering and ongoing.

United States v. Sandoval-Lopez*, 409 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2005). Counsel was ineffective for refusing to comply with the defendant’s specific instructions to file a notice of appeal, even though the defendant had a “remarkably favorable” plea agreement in which he waived his right to appeal. Counsel’s conduct was deficient, even though the court recognized that “[s]ometimes demanding that one’s lawyer appeal is like demanding that one’s doctor perform surgery, when the surgery is risky and has an extremely low likelihood of improving the patient’s condition.” Although the court only remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether counsel did refuse, the court made it clear that the state could choose not to oppose the petition and to allow the appeal, which would free the state from the plea agreement, and “because getting the appeal dismissed would be less work than an evidentiary hearing.”

2004: Lewis v. Johnson, 359 F.3d 646 (3rd Cir. 2004). Counsel ineffective in robbery plea case for failing to file a notice of appeal, even though the defendant filed a pro se motion challenging the validity of his pleas on multiple grounds, including ineffective assistance of counsel. As the court noted, Petitioner relied on Flores-Ortega for his assertion that counsel had a constitutional duty to consult and advise him of his appellate rights, even though Flores-Ortega was decided after Petitioner's appeal. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court held that Flores-Ortega did not create a "new rule" under Teague because "Flores-Ortega's application of the Strickland standard was dictated by precedent and merely clarified the law as it applied to the particular facts of that case." Id. at 655. Thus, the holding in Flores-Ortega was applicable to the claim of ineffectiveness. The state court had applied a state court opinion holding, as a matter of law, that counsel acts reasonably in all cases where a notice of appeal is not filed and the defendant is silent. Application of this state law was "contrary to" clearly established law in Strickland and Flores-Ortega. Because counsel never met with Petitioner or filed an appeal, even though Petitioner clearly indicated an interest in challenging his conviction, counsel's conduct was objectively unreasonable. No strategic reason could excuse this conduct because even if counsel "concluded that any appeal would be frivolous," he could not disregard Petitioner's desire to appeal. Prejudice found because Petitioner was denied his appeal. First appeal of right reinstated.

2003: United States v. Snitz, 342 F.3d 1154 (10th Cir. 2003). Appellate counsel's failure to perfect the appeal requested by his client in a drug case was presumptively prejudicial.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: United States v. Leach-Hilton, 2024 WL 4309968 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 26, 2024). Where petitioner expressly instructed plea counsel to file a notice of appeal despite the waiver of appellate review in the plea agreement, plea counsel was ineffective. Plea counsel's "prognosis of the merits of Defendant's appeal" were "irrelevant" and he "was obligated to execute the ministerial task of noticing appeal upon his client's clear demand." Plea counsel's failure to do so was objectively unreasonable and prejudiced petitioner per se. The government argued, however, that petitioner withdrew his request for an appeal after plea counsel responded to the request with "No can do." Even assuming that petitioner failed to clearly provide specific instructions that plea counsel file an appeal, counsel then breached his duty to consult with petitioner about filing an appeal.

Armstead v. United States, 2024 WL 4009663 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 30, 2024). Granting relief on claim that plea counsel was ineffective in failing to file a notice of appeal as instructed by petitioner immediately following sentencing. Petitioner's testimony that he made the request for an appeal was not directly contradicted by plea counsel who did not recall whether or not that conversation occurred.

United States v. Boria, 2024 WL 81407 (S.D. N.Y. Jan. 8, 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to file a timely notice of appeal, as requested by his client, irrespective of the appeal waiver provision in the plea agreement. Petitioner's motion is granted to the extent that the judgment is vacated, a new one will be entered with the identical sentence, and petitioner may then timely appeal.

Capital Case*

2023: United States v. Cottone, 2023 WL 7131793 (M.D. FL October 30, 2023). Where there was a conflict in the evidence regarding whether movant changed his mind about waiving an appeal, in the interest of judicial economy the motion to vacate is granted on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to file a notice of appeal.

United States v. Sinisterra*, 2023 WL 6676604 (M.D. Fla. October 12, 2023). Granting motion to vacate and allowing a delayed appeal where petitioner claimed that plea counsel failed to appeal the sentence as requested by petitioner. (Plea counsel disputed the allegation but relief was granted nevertheless for purposes of judicial economy.)

Scott v. United States*, 2023 WL 5003346 (S.D. N.Y. Aug. 4, 2023). Granting habeas relief based on claim that defense counsel failed to file a notice of appeal after receiving a request by defendant to do so.

United States v. Cuevas*, 2023 WL 3485271 (S.D. Miss. May 16, 2023). In drug/firearm case with plea agreement including a waiver of appeal, out-of-time appeal granted after defense counsel failed to file a notice of appeal as requested by defendant.

Schaeffer v. United States*, 2023 WL 3480892 (M.D. Pa. May 16, 2023). In drug case with negotiated plea, relief granted on claim of ineffective assistance regarding the adequacy of consultation following defendant's question about an appeal. Defendant's allegations suggested that the conversation with counsel about the possibility of appeal left her confused and unaware of her rights. Counsel's affidavit, in contrast, suggested he advised her of her rights and was never told to file a notice of appeal on her behalf. Given that counsel was now deceased, any evidentiary hearing would involve only defendant's account. "Because any doubt on an attorney's behalf as to a defendant's wishes 'should [be] resolved in favor of appeal,' [plea counsel's] failure to file a notice of appeal 'fell below an objective standard of reasonableness.'" (Internal citation omitted.)

Nelson v. United States*, 2023 WL 2854433 (S.D. Fla. April 10, 2023). In drug/firearm case where defendant waived his right to appeal as part of the plea agreement, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately consult with defendant about his right to appeal. During the plea discussions, defense counsel did not explain the appeal process and simply informed defendant he would be waiving an appeal. And although the post-sentencing email messages between defendant and his counsel showed that counsel asked defendant repeatedly whether he would like to take an appeal, they did not demonstrate that counsel advised defendant "about the advantages and disadvantages of taking an appeal" or provided defendant with the necessary information regarding his appellate rights and how to pursue an appeal. In light of statements by defendant at sentencing unsuccessfully disputing the applicability of an enhancement, a duty to consult about appeal was established. Prejudice is shown by defendant's expressed dissatisfaction with his sentence and his desire to continue with the case, creating a reasonable probability that he would have appealed had there been adequate consultation.

Dwyer v. Clarke*, 2023 WL 2309796 (W.D. Va. March 1, 2023). State prisoner was entitled to federal habeas relief based on his appellate counsel's failure to perfect the appeal after the notice of appeal was filed. Filing a notice of appeal, but then failing to perfect the appeal, leads to the forfeiture of a petitioner's appellate rights just the same as failing to notice the appeal and the presumption of prejudice applies equally here. Although the appellate ineffectiveness claim was procedurally defaulted because the state supreme court found the habeas petition in which it was raised was untimely, cause and prejudice is shown to overcome the default. "[Petitioner's ability to file a state habeas petition expired before he could reasonably learn of his attorney's malfeasance]" establishing cause and the prejudice to petitioner from the claimed violation infected his entire appeal with error of constitutional dimension.

2021: Hayes v. United States, 535 F.Supp.3d 844 (N.D. Iowa 2021). Appointed counsel was ineffective in failing to comply with petitioner's directive to file a notice of appeal and instead moving to withdraw. (Counsel believed an appeal was ill-advised as it would expose petitioner to a substantially longer sentence.) That another attorney was appointed who also failed to file a notice of appeal did not absolve the first attorney of the finding of deficient representation. The remedy in the Eighth Circuit for failure to file the notice of appeal is vacating the sentence.

2020: Joaquin-Del Orbe v. United States, 2020 WL 7480663 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 18, 2020). In drug case where petitioner pleaded guilty, sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to file a notice of appeal as directed by petitioner irrespective of the waiver of appeal in the plea agreement.

2019: Fabian-Baltazar v. United States, 2019 WL 7282046 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 27, 2019). In drug case with a negotiated guilty plea that included an appeal waiver, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with petitioner regarding an appeal following conviction and sentencing. On the day of sentencing, petitioner expressed his displeasure to counsel at the sentence recommended in the pre-sentence report as it was higher than the sentence counsel had told petitioner was typical in a case like this one. When petitioner indicated he wanted to continue to fight, counsel advised him to wait to see what sentence was actually imposed. Although petitioner was ultimately sentenced to less time than was recommended in the pre-sentence report, it was still approximately 25% more than estimated by counsel and petitioner stated on the record that he wanted help because he felt what happened was unfair. The trial court responded by noting the appeal waiver, showing that the court interpreted petitioner's comment as an expression of a desire to appeal. Defense counsel nevertheless did not consult with petitioner about the possibility of an appeal.

When Petitioner's presentence request to appeal/continue fighting his case, his statements to the Court about further help because what happened to him was not fair, and the Court's reference to an appeal are all taken together, it is clear to the Court that Petitioner reasonably demonstrated his interest in appealing. [Footnote omitted]. . . . Because [defense counsel] did not "consult" with Petitioner about an appeal, his performance was deficient.

Prejudice is also established.

From the arguments expressed by Petitioner in his petition, Petitioner's statements before and at the sentencing hearing demonstrating his dissatisfaction with his sentence, as well as the extensive post-sentencing and appellate history of this matter, the Court concludes that, if [defense counsel] had consulted with Petitioner, Petitioner would most likely have expressly directed [defense counsel] to file an appeal. As a result, the Court is satisfied that Petitioner has sufficiently demonstrated that [defense counsel's] failure to consult with him about an appeal caused Petitioner to lose an appeal that he would have otherwise taken. . . . That is, the Court is satisfied that Petitioner has demonstrated prejudice.

Knox v. United States*, 2019 WL 7037413 (D. S.C. Dec. 20, 2019), appeal dismissed, 819 Fed.Appx. 174 (4th Cir. 2020). In drug-firearm case, although petitioner waived his right to appeal in the plea agreement and at sentencing, his §2255 motion is granted based on his allegation that defense counsel failed to file a requested appeal and a belated appeal is authorized. Even though petitioner's signed appeal waiver suggested he did not want to appeal, "the Court is constrained by Petitioner's sworn statement that he requested that an appeal be filed anyway, and would require an evidentiary hearing. See United States v. Poindexter, 492 F.3d 263, 273 (4th Cir. 2007). Under the mandates of Poindexter and the unique circumstances of this case, the Court sees little harm in forgoing an evidentiary hearing on this issue and simply granting Petitioner a belated appeal."

Gamble v. United States*, 2019 WL 5698093 (D. S.C. Nov. 4, 2019). In robbery-firearm case, although petitioner waived his right to appeal in the plea agreement and at sentencing, his §2255 motion is granted based on his allegation that defense counsel failed to file a requested appeal and a belated appeal is authorized. Even though petitioner's signed appeal waiver suggested he did not want to appeal, "the Court is constrained by Petitioner's sworn statement that he requested that an appeal be filed anyway, and would require an evidentiary hearing. See United States v. Poindexter, 492 F.3d 263, 273 (4th Cir. 2007). Under the mandates of Poindexter and the unique circumstances of this case, the Court sees little harm in forgoing an evidentiary hearing on this issue and simply granting Petitioner a belated appeal."

Mulkey v. United States*, 2019 WL 4016485 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 26, 2019), appeal dismissed, 2020 WL 1068170 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2020). In drug case where petitioner pleaded guilty pursuant to a negotiated plea and alleged in post-conviction proceedings that he asked defense counsel to file an appeal but defense counsel failed to do so, petitioner is given the opportunity to file a delayed appeal; defense counsel was deceased and petitioner's allegations were not inherently incredible.

United States v. Whaley*, 2019 WL 3288828 (D. S.C. July 22, 2019), appeal dismissed, 800 Fed.Appx. 198 (4th Cir. 2020). On remand from the Fourth Circuit in drug-firearm case, granting §2255 motion on claim that defense counsel was ineffective in failing to file an appeal as instructed by petitioner. Although petitioner waived his right to appeal in the plea agreement, he claimed that he nevertheless instructed defense counsel to file an appeal because of his dissatisfaction with the sentence imposed. An evidentiary hearing was held at which defense counsel and petitioner presented conflicting accounts about whether petitioner had asked that an appeal be filed. Applying the preponderance of the evidence standard petitioner's testimony is credited over that of defense counsel. This was in part because defense counsel's earlier affidavit addressing the issue failed to include his assertion at the hearing that petitioner affirmatively agreed that no appeal would be filed. The original judgment is vacated and a new one entered from which petitioner can appeal.

Risjan v. Wetzel*, 2019 WL 3146207 (M.D. Pa. July 15, 2019). Petitioner was entitled to reinstatement of his direct appeal based on trial counsel’s egregious conduct in failing to file a direct appeal as petitioner desired. The merits of the claim are only considered after petitioner established a basis for equitable tolling of the AEDPA limitations period based on misleading communications from trial counsel about an appeal, as well as ineffective assistance by initial post-conviction counsel which provided cause to overcome the procedural default of the trial ineffectiveness claim. Although the state post-conviction court in a second post-conviction proceeding found that initial post-conviction counsel had not been ineffective, petitioner rebutted the second post-conviction court’s finding of a certain deadline that formed the basis of concluding initial post-conviction counsel had not been ineffective. (The second post-conviction court had concluded, based on an incorrectly calculated deadline, that the time for filing a timely post-conviction petition had expired before initial post-conviction counsel were retained, thereby precluding a finding that they were ineffective in failing to timely file the post-conviction petition.) Supporting the finding that initial post-conviction counsel understood that a petition could be filed meeting an exception to the timeliness rule at the time they accepted the case is the fact that the post-conviction attorneys entered into an agreement to file such an application and charged a $30,000 retainer. “[A]ttorneys acting ethically and competently would not take a $30,000 non-refundable retainer to pursue a claim unless they believed it to have substantive merit and the possibility of success. This means they would have concluded that time remained on the sixty-day § 9545(b)(2) period at the time they entered into the Agreement and accepted the fee.” Reasonably competent post-conviction counsel would have known they had a very limited amount of time to file a petition in which to plead and prove an exception to the time bar. Yet, initial post-conviction counsel accepted $30,000 from petitioner’s grandmother to pursue petitioner’s rights but did nothing for over a year after they were retained. By the time they got around to filing the post-conviction petition, the sixty-day time for invoking an exception to the time bar had long since passed. Post-conviction counsel were deficient in their representation of petitioner and, because the defaulted ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim was substantial, the Strickland test was satisfied for purposes of Martinez. Petitioner prevails on the merits as counsel’s failure to file an appeal was objectively unreasonable and petitioner made it abundantly clear that he desired to appeal his convictions.

Silas v. United States*, 2019 WL 2617243 (S.D. Miss. June 26, 2019). In drug case where petitioner pleaded guilty in a negotiated deal, waived his right to appellate/post-conviction challenges other than related to ineffective assistance of counsel, and defense counsel submitted affidavits stating, inter alia, that petitioner never requested that an appeal be filed, petitioner’s § 2255 motion is nevertheless granted in part. “Through his Motion, which he filed under penalty of perjury, Silas has arguably created a question of fact as to whether he demonstrated that he desired to file an appeal and whether counsel sufficiently consulted with him about an appeal. Because Silas’ allegations are not fully refuted by the record, the Court will permit him to pursue an out-of-time appeal.”

Capital Case*

Wheeler v. United States*, 2019 WL 2368464 (D. S.C. June 4, 2019). Petitioner granted a belated appeal even though he waived his right to appeal in the plea agreement and at sentencing and his signed appeal waiver suggested he did not want to appeal. In petitioner's sworn statement, he contended that he nevertheless asked counsel to file an appeal. Given the circumstances of the case, the court sees little harm in forgoing an evidentiary hearing on the issue and simply grants the belated appeal.

Martinez v. United States*, 2019 WL 2373198 (S.D. Miss. June 5, 2019). Granting motion to vacate where petitioner alleged that trial counsel failed to file a requested notice of appeal even though petitioner waived his right to a direct appeal.

Gibbons v. United States*, 2019 WL 1243109 (S.D. Ind. March 18, 2019). Permitting petitioner who pleaded guilty and waived the right to appeal her sentence under certain circumstances to file a direct appeal after she alleged that trial counsel failed to file a notice of appeal as requested irrespective of the waiver provision.

2018: Cagle v. United States, 2018 WL 2024490 (E.D. Tex. April 30, 2018)(adopting Findings and Recommendations, 2017 WL 9249494 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2017)). Petitioner pleaded guilty in federal court to a charge of conspiracy to engage in monetary transactions in property derived from specified illegal activity, and waived his right to appeal. Petitioner filed a motion under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 alleging multiple claims of ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel, most importantly, according to the court, a claim that his lawyer failed to file and perfect an appeal after petitioner asked him to. The record showed that a notice of appeal was filed, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of prosecution due to counsel's failure to make financial arrangements with the court reporter. There was nothing in the record (or from counsel) that rebutted petitioner's allegation that he asked his counsel to file and prosecute the appeal. Under Fifth Circuit law, prejudice to petitioner is presumed, regardless of the merit of any potential claims on appeal, and regardless of petitioner's waiver of appeal in his plea agreement. Also under Fifth Circuit law, the remedy for the Sixth Amendment violation here is for the court to grant an out-of-time appeal. That is what the court did here.

2016: Kelly v. Director, 2016 WL 4702476 (E.D. Va., Sept. 6, 2016). Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to file a direct appeal as instructed by defendant. Defendant was convicted of robbery and use of a firearm in the commission of a robbery. Following the conviction, defendant requested that trial counsel file an appeal. Trial counsel failed to do so. Respondents conceded they were "not able to dispute the denial of appeal claim." Id. at *7.

2015: Bell v. United States, 116 F. Supp. 3d 900 (N.D. Ill. 2015). Counsel in crack distribution case abandoned his client and failed to perfect the appeal. Following trial and sentencing, counsel filed a notice of appeal. The Seventh Circuit affirmed the convictions, but ordered a limited remand for resentencing. Following resentencing, in which the court imposed the same sentence, counsel sent a letter to the defendant advising him of the order, that he had a right to appeal, and that counsel would not represent him, despite a retainer agreement that "expressly contemplated" that counsel would represent the defendant on appeal. The Seventh Circuit invited additional submissions before affirming, expressly noting that it had received no submission from the defendant. The defendant had, however, submitted a pro se filing after the due date of which the court was apparently unaware. Counsel's conduct was deficient in "abandon[ing] the client altogether," which "denied Petitioner access to the appellate proceeding." Prejudice was presumed, as the petitioner clearly desired to appeal and filed his own pro se pleading just 20 days after the due date. New appeal allowed.

2014: Bowling v. United States, 31 F. Supp. 3d 863 (N.D. Miss. 2014), aff'd, 609 Fed.Appx. 235 (5th Cir. 2015). Counsel was ineffective in obstruction of justice and transportation of a minor in interstate commerce with intent to engage in sexual activity for failing to file notice of appeal. At the time, the defendant was facing multiple federal criminal charges, multiple state criminal charges, multiple state civil suits, as well as divorce proceedings. Counsel in this case, also represented the defendant in his divorce and state civil suits and was coordinating with counsel on state charges, as well as attending those proceedings. Following his plea in this case, while facing a guideline range of 135-168 months, the court departed upwards and sentenced the defendant to 300 months. Both counsel and the defendant were surprised and the defendant asked counsel to appeal before the exchange became heated such that the defendant even "lunged" at counsel before law enforcement restrained him. In separate state court proceedings sometime afterwards, the defendant again shouted and "lunged" at his federal counsel and told her that he did not want her to file "another paper on his behalf." The same day, federal counsel filed a motion to substitute counsel, which was denied well after the time for appeal had passed. Six days later counsel filed the untimely notice of appeal. The appeal was dismissed as untimely and this 2255 was filed. While there was some understandable confusion about when the defendant "fired" counsel and on what matters he "fired" her, it was indisputable "that he always wanted to appeal, counsel knew it, and she nonetheless failed to seek an appeal on his behalf." It was also undisputed that she was "court-appointed" in these proceedings. Thus, neither the defendant nor counsel "had the authority to determine when counsel's representation ended. That decision rest[ed] entirely with the Court." While counsel did file a motion to substitute counsel, she did not include the true nature of the "strained" relationship including "the heated exchanges leading nearly to fisticuffs," or "the substantial breakdown of communication." Moreover, when the court did not rule prior to the time for the notice of appeal to be filed, counsel failed to file the notice in order to protect the defendant's rights. Thus, counsel was ineffective, although the court made very clear that "[t]his is not a case of incompetence or wilful neglect of a client's interests," but simply a case involving "a misunderstanding of the law – coupled with several miscommunications between attorney and client." In short, the court found that counsel "ably and zealously represented her clients" for 20 years before the court, but in these circumstances she was ineffective in failing to file the notice of appeal. Out-of-time appeal granted.

United States v. Harrison*, 48 F. Supp. 3d 381 (N.D.N.Y. 2014). Pro se defendant challenging his drug conspiracy convictions established that counsel was ineffective in failing to file a notice of appeal as the defendant requested. While the defendant and counsel gave conflicting affidavits about whether the defendant desired to appeal, the court found that the evidence established the defendant's desire to appeal even though he had been sentenced to the mandatory minimum of 120 months under his plea agreement. Although his views were erroneous, the defendant had consistently maintained that the mandatory minimum was 60 months because a prior drug conviction was improperly used to enhance the sentence. These consistent arguments and the filing of this 2255 motion only six months after sentencing revealed that the defendant did desire to appeal. Amended judgment filed with order for counsel to file the notice of appeal and, as a sanction, counsel was required to pay the filing fee. Counsel relieved following the filing of the notice.

2013: Randle v. United States, 954 F. Supp. 2d 339 (E.D. Pa. 2013). Counsel ineffective in drug distribution case for failing to move the withdraw the guilty plea or file an appeal due to the court's sentence that breached the defendant's negotiated plea agreement. The plea agreement specified a sentence of 96 months imprisonment and a $100 special assessment. It made no mention of a fine or a required period of at least four years supervised release as required by statute. The court sentenced the defendant to 96 months imprisonment, five years of supervised release, a $1,000 fine, and a $100 special assessment. Within several days, the defendant wrote to counsel asking for an appeal because the sentence exceeded that in the plea agreement. The defendant's friend also called and spoke to counsel about an appeal. Counsel took no action. Thereafter, the defendant paid fees to two other lawyers to file an appeal and both of these took no action. After attempting to retain at least five other attorneys, the defendant, forced to proceed pro se signed up for law library privileges. After a wait of three weeks, he was given access but the library had no materials on 2255 petitions, as the defendant was confined in a state prison. Ultimately, he obtained the form from the District Court and filed his pro se petition four months after the AEDPA statute of limitations expired. The District Court held that equitable tolling was applicable and counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial. New appeal granted.

2012: St. George v. District Attorney of County of Philadelphia, 884 F.Supp.2d 298 (E.D. Pa. 2012), aff'd, 529 Fed.Appx. 226 (3rd Cir. 2013). Counsel ineffective in kidnaping and robbery case for failing to fail a notice of appeal, even though counsel told the sentencing judge in court that he would. Counsel said that after that time, he spoke to the petitioner's "friend or girlfriend" and assumed from the conversation that new counsel would be retained. Counsel's conduct was deficient in relying on this "vague and inconclusive" information rather than making an effort to contact the petitioner directly and consult with him about his appellate rights. It was also clear that the petitioner desired to appeal as he rejected a plea offer and insisted on trial. Counsel's statements on the record also made it clear that counsel believed there were "meritorious issues for appeal." While petitioner sought the remedy of merely excusing the need to exhaust his claims in state court, the District Court ordered that he be allowed his state court appeal and that the state court address the merits of the claims.

2010: Brown v. United States, 707 F. Supp. 2d 1009 (E.D. Mo. 2010). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to file a notice of appeal. The defendant sent counsel a letter the day after sentencing requesting that he file a notice of appeal, but counsel never received it. The defendant also called counsel's office and spoke with his assistants, and counsel conceded this was possible. New appeal granted.

2009: Richardson v. United States, 612 F. Supp. 2d 709 (N.D. W. Va. 2009). Retained counsel per se ineffective in drug case for failing to file a notice of appeal. The defendant plead guilty, pursuant to a plea agreement that included a waiver of appeal. Following sentencing and while still timely, the defendant sent counsel a letter asking that he file an appeal of the sentence. Counsel responded with a letter to the defendant stating that he was no longer the attorney as the defendant terminated his services after sentencing and that he would have to pay counsel if he wanted him to do the appeal, as the appeal was not included in the retainer agreement. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel is still obligated to protect the interests of the client upon termination. Here, counsel's proper course was to file the notice of appeal and then inform the defendant the attorney client relationship had been terminated. This would have "adequately protect[ed] petitioner's interests 'to the extent reasonably practicable' until such time as petitioner was able to retain other counsel or determine what other documents needed to be filed in conjunction with his appeal." In short, until it is clear to both counsel and the defendant that the relationship has terminated, "the prudent and professionally responsible action is to presume that the relationship is still intact."

2008: Rivera v. Goode, 540 F. Supp. 2d 582 (E.D. Pa. 2008). Appellate counsel ineffective under AEDPA for failing to perfect the direct appeal. Although a notice of appeal and appellate brief was filed, counsel failed to file a statement of issues for appeal in the trial court as required by state law, which resulted in appellate issues being procedurally barred.

2007: Espinal-Martinez v. United States, 499 F. Supp. 2d 213 (N.D.N.Y. 2007). Counsel was ineffective in failing to timely notify the defendant that the court had declined to resentence him after the appellate court remanded after the decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), allowing the court that option. By the time, the petitioner got notice, he was time-barred from direct appeal. Prejudice established because the petitioner would have filed an appeal, which was evidenced by his initial appeal of the sentence. Leave to file a direct appeal granted.

Del Valle v. United States*, 497 F. Supp. 2d 346 (D.R.I. 2007). Counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with the defendant about appealing. Prior to sentencing, the defendant informed counsel of his objection to enhancement based on a codefendant's possession of a gun and the possibility of appeal was discussed but no decision made since the court had not ruled yet. Following sentencing and the application of this enhancement the defendant and his wife attempted to contact counsel but counsel did not return their calls until after the time for filing a notice of appeal had passed. Prejudice established because the defendant would have filed an appeal. Judgment reentered in order to allow direct appeal.

2004: Waldron v. Jackson, 348 F. Supp. 2d 877 (N.D. Ohio 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in rape case for filing the notice of appeal four days late, which caused the defendant's appeal to be dismissed as untimely. Although more than one year passed before the filing of a habeas corpus petition, the court found that the petition was timely filed under 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(1)(B) because of "the impediment to filing an application created by State action." Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to perfect a timely appeal in direct contravention of the petitioner's wishes and this ineffective assistance is "imputed to the state, and constitutes an impediment to filing an application created by the state." This state action "reverberate[d] over time" and prevented a timely habeas petition because counsel's failure could only be cured by requesting a delayed appeal in order to exhaust the issues in state court, which necessarily delayed the filing of the federal habeas petition. Thus, the "habeas clock did not begin until the disposition of his motion for leave to file a delayed appeal.” On the merits, the court held that because the failure to perfect the appeal was caused by appellate counsel’s ineffectiveness, the state courts refusal to allow a delayed appeal amounted to a due process violation. Writ granted on condition of the state courts allowing a delayed appeal in forma pauperis and with court-appointed counsel.

McIntyre v. Klem*, 347 F. Supp. 2d 206 (E.D. Pa. 2004). Counsel was ineffective in failing to file a notice of appeal. Trial counsel was informed by the defendant’s parents following the trial that a new lawyer would be retained to represent the defendant. Counsel withdrew without following a notice of appeal. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel knew or reasonably should have known that the defendant desired to appeal and only had a few weeks to file the notice of appeal. Nonetheless, counsel failed to consult with the defendant about his desires. While the Pennsylvania courts held that counsel could not be ineffective for failing to file an appeal unless the client had asked counsel to do so, this holding was contrary to the Supreme Court’s holding in Strickland and did not consider whether counsel had an obligation to consult with counsel as required by Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470 (2000). Thus, under the AEDPA, the state court ruling did not preclude habeas relief. The court held that counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to consult with the defendant because he knew that the defendant wanted to pursue an appeal and knew that the period to file an appeal might expire before the defendant’s parents could retain new counsel. Counsel also knew that the defendant had contested guilt and been given a severe sentence and, therefore, had “every incentive to pursue an appeal.” Under these circumstances, counsel should have consulted with the defendant and filed the notice of appeal and then moved to withdraw, which was permitted by state law. While the state court found that the defendant refused to speak to counsel, this finding did “not bar a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel” in light of the facts of Roe itself. Furthermore, the state court’s finding was an unreasonable determination of the facts” because counsel testified that the defendant’s parents informed him that the defendant refused to talk to him but counsel never attempted to contact the defendant directly. Prejudice was found because the evidence established that the defendant would have timely appealed but for counsel’s failure to consult with him. The writ was granted conditioned upon the state allowing a new appeal.

Linen v. United States*, 337 F. Supp. 2d 403 (N.D.N.Y. 2004). Counsel ineffective in felon in possession of firearm plea case for failing to file a notice of appeal as requested by the defendant. Although the court found that the “appeal likely has no merit,” prejudice was presumed and the sentence reimposed in order to allow an appeal.

United States v. Edwards*, 297 F. Supp. 2d 813 (E.D. Pa. 2004). Counsel was ineffective following guilty pleas to conspiracy and firearm offenses for failing to file a notice of appeal as his client specifically requested. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because “[t]he decision to file an appeal is the petitioner’s and counsel must complete this ‘purely ministerial task’ even if he disagrees with his client’s decision.” The court granted the petitioner leave to file a notice of appeal.

2003: Bishawi v. United States, 292 F. Supp. 2d 1122 (S.D. Ill. 2003), aff’d, 109 Fed. Appx. 813 (7th Cir. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to file a consolidated appeal raising issues from both a new trial motion and from the conviction and sentence. Petitioner was convicted of narcotics trafficking charges and filed an appeal. While the direct appeal was pending, counsel learned that the trial court may have had ex-parte communication with the jury during its deliberations. The Seventh Circuit issued a general remand to the district court and included in its order the directive that, a new notice of appeal had to be filed by any party dissatisfied with the district court's judgment. The district court initially granted a motion for new trial. The Seventh Circuit vacated the district court opinion because the district court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing to determine prejudice. Following an evidentiary hearing, the district court denied the motion for new trial. Petitioner appealed but appellate counsel raised only the issue concerning the denial of new trial. Petitioner filed a 2255 petition asserting numerous issues some of which had been raised on appeal. The government conceded and the court held that appellate counsel had been ineffective in failing to file a consolidated appeal as had been clearly directed by the seventh circuit. Counsel's failure was not a strategic decision because counsel incorrectly believed petitioner could later challenge his conviction and sentence on direct appeal if his appeal from the denial of the motion for new trial was denied. Prejudice was found because counsel's failure was the equivalent of the failure to file a notice of appeal under Flores-Ortega. Prejudice was presumed. The court vacated the judgment and reimposed the sentence in order to permit petitioner to file an appeal. In essence, the court found that appellate counsel's ineffectiveness established cause and prejudice for the petitioner's failure to raise the substantive issues on direct appeal.

C. State Cases

2023: Ingalls v. State, 213 N.E.3d 544 (Ind. App. 2023). In misdemeanor criminal mischief case, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to submit a timely request for a jury trial pursuant to petitioner's request, and appellate counsel was ineffective in missing the filing deadline for the appeal, resulting in its dismissal. At petitioner's initial hearing, the case was set for a bench trial. After petitioner expressed his desire for a speedy jury trial, the trial court responded that petitioner's newly appointed counsel would have to file a motion making such a request. This attorney, however, quickly withdrew due to a conflict. Successor counsel did not learn of petitioner's desire for a jury trial until after the filing deadline had passed. His motion was denied as untimely. The record suggested that both initial and successor counsel failed to file the jury trial request because they were unaware that petitioner wanted a jury trial. But it was the inaction by both of his trial attorneys that prompted such ignorance. There was no evidence that initial counsel contacted petitioner about his withdrawal or the appointment of successor counsel. And successor counsel waited more than three weeks after his appointment and two weeks after his appearance to contact petitioner for the first time. By such time, the deadline for filing the jury request had passed. "The failure of trial counsel to discuss [petitioner's] constitutional right to a jury trial or to act to preserve that right before the Criminal Rule 22 deadline constituted deficient performance." Because the deficient performance resulted in the loss of a fundamental right, no showing of prejudice is required. Regarding appellate counsel's clearly deficient performance, "the error was particularly prejudicial here, where the appeal would have revealed that [petitioner] had not properly waived his fundamental right to a jury trial."

Capital Case*

2020: Jernigan v. State, 2020 WL 4728117 (Tenn. Crim. App. Aug. 14, 2020). In prosecution for aggravated sexual exploitation of a minor, trial/appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately preserve the record regarding the prosecution's failure to disclose pre-trial voluminous text messages between petitioner and the victim that were introduced at trial. The prosecution's failure to disclose, while not amounting to Brady error, did violate state discovery rules. And, although there was a substantial amount of proof establishing petitioner's guilt in this case, this was due, in large part, to the prosecution's failure to comply with its statutory discovery obligations. "To allow the State to capitalize on a situation it created, in our view, would defeat the very purpose of the rules of discovery." Had trial/appellate counsel adequately preserved this issue on direct appeal by including in the record the motion for discovery and the compilation of the text messages, petitioner would have established that he was prejudiced by the discovery violation.

2019: Ruby-Ruiz v. State, 2019 WL 4866766 (Tenn. Crim. App. Oct. 2, 2019). Petitioner, who was convicted of multiple sex-related offenses, was denied the effective assistance of appellate counsel as a result of appellate counsel's failure to file a timely application for permission to appeal to the Tennessee Supreme Court after the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed his convictions. In finding petitioner entitled to post-conviction relief, the appellate court rejected the State's argument that petitioner could not establish prejudice because the state supreme court, in denying the application to accept a late-filed application, had examined the issues and determined they were without merit.

The supreme court's order simply states that the application was untimely, that the court denied the motion to accept the proposed late-filed application, and that the court would not waive the timely filing in the interest of justice. The order does not state that the court considered the merits of the allegations or engaged in any type of substantive review. This court will not speculate what our supreme court considered in summarily dismissing the proposed application. We conclude that the order does not reflect the court engaged in any substantive review.

Also rejected was the State's argument that petitioner could not establish prejudice because he failed to show the state supreme court would have granted his application if it had been timely. "[A] petitioner is not required to show 'actual prejudice' when counsel fails to file a timely application for permission to appeal in the supreme court. Therefore, the Petitioner is not required to show that . . . he would have prevailed had the application been timely." The remedy is the granting of a delayed appeal for purposes of seeking supreme court review.

2016: State v. Jones, 139 A.3d 1234 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2016). Counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to file a notice of appeal, despite the defendant's request that he do so. While the trial court found deficient conduct, it found no prejudice under Strickland because the defendant failed to present any claim that would have been meritorious on appeal. Prejudice was presumed, however, under Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 483 (2000). Appeal reinstated.

2012: Gosch v. State, 294 P.3d 197 (Idaho Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in drug case for failing to file notice of appeal when client informed counsel after the jury verdict but before sentencing that he wanted to “appeal everything.” It was irrelevant that the client did not schedule a follow-up meeting or respond to counsel’s correspondence following sentencing. Absent an express withdrawal of the request by the client, counsel was obligated to file the appeal.

Harvey v. State*, 285 P.3d 295 (Alaska Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case for failing to preserve the defendant’s right to appeal after the defendant was sentenced to seven years following plea even though prosecutor had allegedly made oral promise to recommend a sentence of no more than six years. Counsel had been retained solely for the trial proceedings. While there were discrepancies between counsels asserting that he consulted with the defendant concerning a possible appeal but was not told to appeal and the defendant saying he explicitly told counsel he wanted to appeal, either way counsel was ineffective. Under Flores-Ortega, filing a notice of appeal is part of trial counsel’s duties if counsel is aware of the defendant’s desire to appeal and the client will not otherwise be able to obtain substitute counsel to appeal in a timely fashion.

Ewing v. Denney*, 360 S.W.3d 325 (Mo. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in failing to timely perfect appeal in murder case. Counsel timely filed a notice of appeal, but did not pay the required filing fee until four months later. After the appellate court dismissed the appeal as untimely, counsel did not notify the defendant or seek leave to file out of time as could have been done under the court rules. The defendant had been attempting to contact counsel “to no avail,” and did not learn of the dismissal until he wrote to the Missouri Supreme Court. Counsel for the court notified him by letter of the dismissal. By that time, he was out of time to file a motion for leave to file out of time and out of time to file a motion alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The State conceded that the defendant was entitled to relief. Sentences vacated in order to allow for new sentencing and a new period in which to timely file appeal.

2011: Albright v. State, 251 P.3d 52 (Kan. 2011). Appointed post-conviction counsel ineffective in failing to timely file notice of appeal in murder case. As there was a statutory right to counsel, the court found there was “a right to receive effective assistance of counsel” and applied Flores-Ortega. Appeal allowed.

2008: Andrades v. Commissioner of Correction, 948 A.2d 365 (Conn. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to file application for sentence review by the “sentence review division,” as allowed by state law, when counsel had told the defendant he would do so.

People v. Ross*, 891 N.E.2d 865 (Ill. 2008). Counsel ineffective for failing to file a timely notice of appeal in armed robbery case when the defendant had communicated his desire to appeal to counsel. Prejudice presumed and appeal allowed.

State v. Patton*, 195 P.3d 753 (Kan. 2008). Counsel ineffective following plea in drug case for failing to perfect direct appeal when the defendant clearly expressed a desire to appeal his sentence.

Capital Case*

- 2007: King v. State, 154 P.3d 545 (Kan. Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective following no contest plea to second-degree murder for failing to timely file the appellate brief which resulted in dismissal of the appeal of a sentence that was twice the guidelines range. Appeal reinstated.
- 2006: Woeppel v. City of Billings, 146 P.3d 789 (Mont. 2006). Appellate counsel ineffective in assault case for failing to perfect the appeal by filing a brief. Prejudice found because the defendant clearly indicated an intent to appeal by filing a notice of appeal. Appeal reinstated.
- 2005: Louberti v. State, 895 So. 2d 479 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Trial counsel ineffective for failing to file defendant's post-trial motion with 10 days. Although the trial court had allowed counsel 30 days, the time for post-trial motions under state law could not be extended. Counsel's conduct was prejudicial because of a double jeopardy violation that required reversal. The defendant was convicted of organized scheme to defraud but acquitted on two counts of grand theft based on the same alleged conduct. Acquittal on the theft charges required reversal and dismissal of the fraud charge.
- 2003: Wallace v. State, 121 S.W.3d 652 (Tenn. 2003). Counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to file a timely motion for new trial which resulted in the waiver of all issues on direct appeal except for sufficiency of the evidence. Counsel had been retained for representation solely at trial. After conviction, counsel sent the defendant a letter instructing him on preparation of a motion for new trial and advising him of the legal issues to raise. Because counsel had not been given court approval to withdraw as attorney of record, the court refused to consider the defendant's timely filed pro se motion for new trial. Trial counsel later filed a motion for new trial and the defendant filed a second pro se motion for new trial, but these motions were denied as untimely. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel failed to file a timely motion for new trial or a motion to withdraw so the defendant could file his own pro se motion. While the retainer agreement purported to limit counsel's representation to trial work, "Taking necessary steps to preserve post-trial remedies, including filing of a motion for new trial are clearly responsibilities of counsel." Id. at 657. Prejudice found because counsel failure amounted to a denial of appeal, with the exception of sufficiency of the evidence claim. Prejudice presumed and a delayed appeal allowed.

5. APPEAL

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2024: Herrington v. Dotson, 99 F.4th 705 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 145 S.Ct 442 (2024). Where respondent conceded that appellate counsel performed deficiently in failing to argue that the jury was erroneously instructed on the requirements for a conviction for failure to file a tax return and that, applying the proper law, petitioner could not be convicted of that crime, the relief granted is a conditional writ allowing the state court to remedy the constitutional violation. Rejected is petitioner’s argument that the federal court should vacate the conviction itself.

2021: Flores-Rivera v. United States, 16 F.4th 963 (1st Cir. 2021). In drug-trafficking case, ineffective assistance by appellate counsel provided the cause and prejudice necessary to excuse the default of petitioner’s meritorious Brady claim. Petitioner and three others were jointly tried for a drug trafficking conspiracy in Puerto Rico. After the group was convicted, the government belatedly disclosed documents that could have been used to impeach the three cooperating witnesses who provided the bulk of the evidence against the defendants. Petitioner and two of her co-defendants moved for a new trial based on Brady but their motions were denied. The two co-defendants successfully raised the Brady claim in their appeals but petitioner’s appellate counsel did not include the issue. In finding the co-defendants entitled to relief, the appellate court had concluded the withheld evidence was material because it could be interpreted as showing one of the cooperating witnesses coached the other witnesses and that these other witnesses lied when they denied that any coordination of their testimony had occurred. In arguing that the withheld evidence was not material as to petitioner, the government pointed out that additional evidence was presented against her – surveillance video and entries from a notebook. But the inculpatory value of that evidence was largely dependent on explanatory testimony from the very witnesses whose credibility could have been challenged through the suppressed evidence. “In short, the government’s case against [petitioner] depended quite heavily on the largely uncorroborated testimony of the three cooperators. Hence, she would have prevailed on the Brady issue just like her co-defendants had she raised the issue. And for that reason, she establishes prejudice under Strickland.” Deficient performance is also shown on the record of this case. “Appellate counsel opted to forgo an obviously serious, preserved Brady claim in favor of two dubious plain-error challenges, one of which was foreclosed by binding precedent. That choice resembles rejecting a lifeboat in favor of two lily pads.” Additionally, appellate counsel did not need to choose among the various potential challenges to the conviction. “The short brief had plenty of room. And counsel could have adopted the bulk of the co-defendants’ briefs on this point had counsel wished to do so.” In short, “[f]ecklessness is not a strategy.”

2020: Chase v. MaCauley, 971 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. 2020). Ineffective assistance by appellate counsel provided the cause and prejudice necessary to overcome the procedural default of petitioner’s Alleyne claim. Because the IAC claim is used to overcome a default, not as an independent basis for relief, it is reviewed de novo instead of with AEDPA deference. In petitioner’s pre-Alleyne sentencing, the sentencing court increased his minimum sentencing range based on offense variables that had not been found by the jury. Alleyne was issued shortly thereafter, prior to appellate counsel's appointment. At the time petitioner's appellate brief was filed, there was binding caselaw from an intermediate appellate court ruling that Alleyne was inapplicable to the sentencing scheme at issue in petitioner's case and no Alleyne argument was raised by appellate counsel. Another panel of appellate judges in a second case, however, had criticized that binding precedent and other appellate lawyers were continuing to raise the issue. Three months after petitioner's appellate brief was filed, the state supreme court granted review in the second case in order to resolve the question of whether Alleyne applied to the relevant sentencing statute. Although the lower appellate court decision finding Alleyne inapplicable remained in effect, more defendants raised the Alleyne issue in hopes that it would ultimately prevail. In cases where no Alleyne issue was raised prior to the state supreme court's grant of review, the intermediate appellate court granted requests to file supplemental appellate briefs preserving the claim. Petitioner's appellate attorney did nothing to include the claim. After petitioner's direct appeal was denied, the state supreme court declined appellate counsel's application for leave to appeal the non-Alleyne argument that had been raised. In contrast, attorneys that had properly preserved the Alleyne claim and sought review in the state supreme court received holds pending resolution of the issue. The state supreme court eventually confirmed that Alleyne was in fact applicable to the state sentencing scheme, leading to a slew of reversals. On this record, appellate counsel was deficient in failing to raise the "significant and obvious" Alleyne claim which was clearly stronger than the single issue counsel did brief in the appeal. That there was adverse binding precedent during petitioner's direct appeal did not defeat petitioner's assertion of deficiency. Given the history described above, the change in state law was clearly foreshadowed at the time of petitioner's direct appeal. And that history establishes a reasonable probability that the claim would ultimately have prevailed had appellate counsel taken the steps to preserve it. With the procedural default overcome, relief is granted on the merits of the Alleyne claim.

Ramirez v. Tegels*, 963 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 2020). In case involving charges of the sexual assault of petitioner's minor stepdaughter where hearsay evidence was admitted pursuant to Ohio v. Roberts, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a Confrontation Clause argument based on the post-trial Supreme Court decisions in Crawford v. Washington and Davis v. Washington. Because the state appellate court appeared to have inadvertently overlooked the IAC claim, it was entitled to de novo review in federal habeas proceedings. Regarding deficient performance, "an attorney exercising reasonable professional judgment would have recognized that the confrontation claim was clearly stronger than the claims [appellate counsel] raised." The record provided appellate counsel with an argument that most of the out-of-court statements by the alleged victim and her brother that were admitted against petitioner were made for the primary purpose of prosecution, including some of the statements made to medical personnel who examined the alleged victim at the behest of the police. Further, given that trial counsel made confrontation objections at trial, appellate counsel could have made strong arguments that petitioner was entitled to relief on the merits of the confrontation claim. And even assuming the claim was forfeited, there was precedent for merits consideration of an unpreserved claim premised on new law. As for prejudice, "[i]f [appellate counsel] had raised a confrontation claim during direct review, there is a reasonable chance that the Wisconsin courts would have concluded that at least some of the probative out-of-court statements were inadmissible, and that the admission of those statements was not harmless error." Although some inadmissible statements could be considered duplicative of admissible statements, that did not negate prejudice as “Wisconsin courts may well conclude that the jury would have assigned less weight to the properly admitted statements if it had not heard that those statements had been repeated to different persons in different contexts.” Finally, the existence of certain inculpatory DNA evidence was not dispositive in light of the trial testimony of the alleged victim’s mother admitting to have fabricated the accusations against petitioner and who the defense argued planted the DNA evidence.

2016: Loher v. Thomas, 825 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2016). Affirming grant of habeas relief in attempted sexual assault case on claim of ineffective assistance by appellate counsel for failing to raise a challenge to the trial court’s order requiring petitioner to testify before his other witnesses. Petitioner’s trial began at 9:06 a.m. Although the prosecution had quite a number of witnesses on its witness list, only four were called before it rested at around 2:15 p.m. Following a fifteen minute recess, defense counsel asked for a continuance until the next court day to begin the defense. Defense counsel explained that he had anticipated the prosecution calling additional witnesses and so had not secured the presence of his defense witnesses for that day. The continuance motion was denied and the court ordered petitioner to take the stand if he wanted to testify, followed by any defense witnesses defense counsel was able to get to come in that day. The remaining witnesses could then testify on the next court day. Defense counsel objected, arguing that the decision whether petitioner should take the stand needed to be made after hearing the testimony of the defense witnesses. The objection was overruled, with the court expressing skepticism that defense counsel had not already determined whether petitioner should testify and criticizing defense counsel’s failure to consult with the prosecution in advance in order to determine when the defense witnesses would likely be needed. Petitioner went on to testify and the prosecutor elicited damaging testimony on cross-examination. On appeal, no argument was included concerning the trial court’s ruling requiring petitioner to testify before his witnesses. The issue was raised for the first time in post-conviction proceedings, along with a claim of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. Petitioner relied on Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), where the Supreme Court struck down a statute that required a defendant to testify before his or her witnesses. The claims were denied. The federal district court, in contrast, found both claims to be meritorious, along with an Apprendi claim not relevant here. The Ninth Circuit reversed the grant of relief on the Brooks claim finding that fairminded jurists could disagree whether Brooks controlled given the facts of this case. With regard to the appellate ineffectiveness claim, the circuit court explained that although it had already held that the Brooks claim could not succeed on the merits under § 2254(d), that conclusion did not foreclose relief under an “independent” Strickland v. Washington analysis. And “[b]ecause Hawaii has failed to argue this independent IAAC issue specifically and distinctly, it ... waived its challenge to the district court’s grant of relief.” 825 F.3d at 1121.

Overstreet v. Warden*, 811 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2016). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in armed robbery and kidnapping case for failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence on the kidnapping convictions under the Georgia Supreme Court’s decision in Garza v. State, 670 S.E.2d 73 (Ga. 2008). The defendant was convicted of 35 counts arising from his role in the armed robberies of five fast-food restaurants. The four kidnapping convictions were based on the defendant leading the restaurant manager to the restaurant safe in a back room or office and then ordering the manager to open the safe. On two of the four occasions, the defendant led the restaurant manager back to the front of the restaurant, where the remaining employees were being held. At the time of conviction in 2007, this was sufficient to satisfy the asportation element of kidnaping. In 2008, however, the Georgia Supreme Court decided Garza, which held that “movement of a victim that is ‘part and parcel’ of an independent crime, such as armed robbery, would generally not be considered asportation.” Id. at 1285. In 2009, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the new rule of Garza was applicable to any kidnaping conviction that had not yet been adjudicated on direct appeal. Thereafter, appellate counsel filed the direct appeal brief challenging, among other things, the sufficiency of the evidence without any citation or argument under Garza. Thereafter, the defendant challenged the sufficiency of the evidence under Garza in pro se petitions but was denied relief in state habeas and in federal habeas. Appellate counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to assert the Garza issue. “[H]e either failed to recognize or elected not to raise this strong basis for reversal of four criminal convictions. Either way, counsel’s performance is patently deficient.” Counsel’s conduct was not excused as a reasonable strategy because “[e]ven if meritorious, none of appellate counsel’s arguments was as compelling as Garza, which almost certainly would have resulted in reversal of the kidnaping counts.” Id. at 1287. Prejudice also established. “The state court’s determination to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland.”

2015: Lynch v. Dolce, 789 F.3d 303 (2nd Cir. 2015). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in first-degree robbery case for failing to assert the trial court’s error in failing to instruct the jury, as requested by trial defense counsel, that in order to convict of first-degree robbery by using or threatening the immediate use of a dangerous instrument, it had to find that the defendant actually possessed a dangerous weapon at the time of the crime. The law in New York was clear on this for “a generation by the time of Lynch’s trial” and trial counsel had cited to the controlling case in requesting the instruction. Prejudice was also established because while the defendant had threatened to shoot the victim, neither the victim nor two eyewitnesses saw a weapon, and during a struggle with the victim for her purse, the defendant held the purse with one hand and punched the victim with the other. From these facts, the jury could have inferred that the defendant did not actually possess a weapon during the crime. The state court’s conclusion to the contrary was an unreasonable determination. While the defendant had other valid convictions for which he was sentenced to 10 years, he received an additional two years for this conviction. The remedy was to grant a new appeal on this issue, but the court also ordered the release of the defendant from confinement pending the new appeal as he had already served more than 10 years of confinement.

2014: Payne v. Stansberry, 760 F.3d 10 (D.C. Cir. 2014). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to seek plain error review of the trial court’s instruction that the jury must find the defendant guilty even if the government failed to prove any element of a charged offense beyond a reasonable doubt. The government argued that there was a transcription error, but proffered no evidence. Likewise, even if the error was simply “a slip of the tongue,” it was still an obvious error. Thus, counsel’s conduct was deficient and counsel acknowledged that there was no strategic reason for the failure to assert this issue on appeal. Although the court could not be certain that the D.C. Court of Appeals would have found plain error, “the question before this court is limited to whether there is a reasonable probability that the outcome of his appeal would have been different.” The appropriate relief was a belated appeal on this issue.

2013: Shaw v. Wilson, 721 F.3d 908 (7th Cir. 2013), cert. denied, 573 U.S. 916 (2014). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to assert on appeal that the state's amendment of the information to elevate the charge was barred by state law. The defendant was charged, along with two other men, with aggravated battery. After the two other men agreed to plead guilty and to testify against the defendant, the state moved to amend the information to charge murder. Trial counsel objected correctly that this was prohibited by a 1982 state statute and an explicit holding by the Indiana Supreme Court three years before, which prohibited amendments of "substance" after 30 days before the omnibus date. Here, the omnibus date was July 31, 2000, and the state's amendment was not proposed until 17 months later. Four years after the defendant's trial, the Indiana Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding on this issue in another case. The state legislature thereafter amended the statute to allow substantive amendments at any time prior to trial if not prejudicial. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to raise this obvious claim that was clearly stronger than the sufficiency of the evidence claim asserted, which was "dead on arrival." The claim was obvious as it was carefully preserved by trial counsel. The fact that intervening appellate courts had rejected similar claims also did not excuse the deficient conduct. Prejudice was clear as the amendment increased the defendant's maximum sentence exposure from 20 years to 65 years. The state court's holding to the contrary was an unreasonable application of Strickland and Smith v. Robbins. Finally, this case was not impacted by Lockhart v. Fretwell because "[a] legislative repeal of a statute does not present the same situation as the one in which a court mistakenly recognizes a right for some period of time and then corrects itself (or is corrected by a reviewing court)." New direct appeal granted.

2011: Showers v. Beard, 635 F.3d 625 (3rd Cir. 2011). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to assert ineffectiveness of trial counsel in failing to prepare and present rebuttal expert testimony regarding the properties of Roxanol or liquid morphine. The defendant was convicted of murdering her husband, who died from oral consumption of a lethal dose of the drug. The state's case was built on circumstantial evidence and testimony of a forensic pathologist that Roxanol is capable of being masked. The defense argued that the deceased committed suicide. Counsel consulted a psychiatrist prior to trial, who recommended that counsel secure an expert to address the impossibility of disguising Roxanol. This expert gave counsel, the names and contact information for three qualified experts but counsel did not pursue this. Instead, counsel presented a lay witness friend on this issue. Counsel failed to establish key facts that would have established that a large dose of Roxanol cannot be masked without a large amount of liquid or food, if at all, and that no such substance was found in the deceased's stomach. Counsel explained that he did not ask some questions on this of the state's expert "because he feared asking questions for which he did not know the answers." While "it may be risky for an attorney to ask questions for which he believes the answer may be harmful," this "is no excuse for failing to elicit significant evidence when the risk of an adverse response has been created by counsel's failure to conduct a thorough investigation or understand key, undisputed facts in the record." "Even the most minimally competent attorney here would have consulted at least one of the experts suggested to him" by the defense psychiatrist. While not dispositive, the court noted the 1989 Guidelines calls for retention of necessary expert witnesses. Prejudice established as rebuttal expert testimony would have injected significant doubt of guilt. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial as he relied solely on the record, did not conduct an independent investigation, and failed to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness. Under AEDPA, the state court's conclusion to the contrary was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.

Capital Case*

2010: Ramchair v. Conway, 601 F.3d 66 (2nd Cir. 2010) (affirming 671 F. Supp. 2d 371 (E.D.N.Y. 2009)). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in robbery case in failing to assert as error the trial court's denial of a motion for mistrial. During trial, the defense argued that the line-up conducted pretrial with the sole identification witness was suggestive, as the defendant was South Asian and the others in the line-up were Hispanics and an African-American. In response, although it had not done so during the suppression hearing or the first two trials, the state elicited evidence that defense counsel had been present at the line-up and failed to object, which cast the defense counsel as a witness against his client on the central issue in the case. Counsel requested permission to testify, but the court refused believing that counsel should have anticipated this prior to trial and sought to withdraw. Counsel then sought a mistrial, which the court denied without explanation. Appellate counsel asserted only that the trial court erred in refusing to allow counsel to testify. Counsel believed the mistrial claim was not separately preserved and was only another way of preserving the denial of the right to testify. Thus, she believed erroneously that relief could be granted only if the appellate court found that counsel should have been allowed to testify. The state court decision denying relief was an unreasonable application of Strickland. Rather than granting a new appeal, the court granted a new trial because it had already been almost 13 years since the defendant's trial.

Goff v. Bagley, 601 F.3d 445 (6th Cir. 2010). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in capital case ineffective for failing to assert the trial court's state law error in failing to afford the petitioner his right to allocution prior to sentencing. Although "there is no right to allocution under the federal constitution, there is a constitutional right to the effective assistance of appellate counsel," id. at 464 (internal quotations and citations omitted), "regardless of the fact that counsel's underlying failure is a matter of state law," id. Here, Ohio law provides the right of allocution prior to sentencing. State law also required reversal and resentencing if the trial court failed to address the defendant concerning this right. Thus, this was "an obviously winning claim" and counsel's failure to assert it on appeal was deficient and prejudicial. Although the defendant was advised of and waived his right to make an unsworn statement to the jury, this is "not equivalent" and is not a substitution for the right of allocution. The state court's denial of relief was an unreasonable application of federal law.

Theus v. United States*, 611 F.3d 441 (8th Cir. 2010). Counsel ineffective in failing to object either in the trial court or on appeal to the district court's error in imposing a ten-year mandatory minimum sentence for a quantity of cocaine that required only a five-year minimum sentence. The defendant was charged with five co-defendants to conspiracy to distribute or possess with intent to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine. The evidence at trial established, and the district court held post-trial, that the defendant was not a member of the conspiracy charged, but he was a member of a different conspiracy with two individuals not charged in the indictment. The presentence investigation report (PSR) attributed only 1.02 kilograms of cocaine to the defendant and explicitly concluded "there is not enough evidence to support that the defendant was involved with 5 kilograms of cocaine." The guidelines range for the defendant (at 1.02 kilograms) was 70-87 months, but the

Capital Case*

PSR inexplicably concluded that the 10 year mandatory minimum (at 5 kg) had to be applied rather than the 5 year mandatory minimum (at 1.02 kg). The district court rejected the government's argument that the guidelines range should be based on 5 kg, but still imposed the mandatory minimum sentence based on that amount, despite announcing that the court would like to impose a sentence in the 70 - 87 month range. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial under these circumstances.

King v. United States*, 595 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in drug plea case where the defendant was sentenced as a career offender. Under the defendant's plea agreement, he was to be sentenced using a base offense level of 32 and he was waiving his right to appeal. Based on the PSR, which concluded he was a career offender, the court actually used a base offense level of 34. The defendant appealed and filed a pro se brief asserting that, under the sentencing guidelines, he did not qualify as a career offender. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to rebut the state's argument that the appeal had to be dismissed due to the pretrial agreement. In short, because the defendant had not been sentenced in accord with the agreement, the provision that he waived appeal was not valid. If appellate counsel had adequately asserted this basis, the defendant's pro se brief would have been considered. The issue asserted had merit and required that the sentence be vacated.

2008: Suggs v. United States, 513 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 2008). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the enhancement of the defendant's sentence based on possession of a dangerous weapon during a drug conspiracy. Counsel sent the defendant a letter outlining three issues he intended to assert on appeal, which included the enhancement issue, but then inexplicably raised only one of the other issues. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert the two-point enhancement issue. The witness testified only that he had seen the defendant with "weapons," but the district court concluded that the witness testified he had seen the defendant with a "gun." This was error because the testimony about weapons was not sufficient to establish a "dangerous" weapon as required for the enhancement. This error was "obvious" and had been objected to by trial counsel. The issue was also "significant" and "clearly stronger" than the indictment variance issue argued on appeal. Prejudice established because the enhancement put the guideline range from 292-365 months and the defendant was sentenced to 300 months. Without the enhancement the range was reduced to 235-293 months "[t]hat could very well net [the defendant] a much shorter sentence on the conspiracy count."

2006: Franklin v. Anderson*, 434 F.3d 412 (6th Cir. 2006), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1156 (2007). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert as error the trial court's failure to excuse a biased juror. While this issue was defaulted, cause and prejudice was also established due to the ineffectiveness of counsel. The voir dire indicated that the juror "so completely misunderstood the presumption of innocence and burden of proof that she could not have made a fair assessment of the evidence of . . . guilt." "Even after she was corrected three times by the judge, she still insisted with her last statement that the defendant had to be proven innocent." Because the seating of a biased juror can never be harmless, "the State can make no argument that . . . trial counsel acted strategically" in not excusing this juror. "To permit this would be to allow trial counsel to waive the defendant's right to an impartial jury." Aside from this issue, "counsel did not meet the ABA standards in their dealings with him concerning his appeals,” including failing to meet with the defendant or even have phone conversations.

2005: Cirilo-Munoz v. United States, 404 F.3d 527 (1st Cir. 2005). Appellate counsel ineffective for failing to assert sentencing error on charge of aiding and abetting the murder of an on-duty policeman. The trial court found that the murder was motivated by the officer’s status, which elevated the defendant’s sentence range from 27-34 years to life. Trial counsel objected because there was no evidence the defendant knew the victim was a police officer. Appellate counsel was ineffective because the jury had made no determination on this issue and the trial court’s finding was not supported by the evidence. The court rejected the government’s argument of strategy because this issue would have “built upon” the issues raised challenging the conviction and because “[o]ne would need a potent reason for omitting the enhancement argument” when the difference in potential sentences was so great.

Assuming that the omission of the argument was deliberate, the best one can say for counsel is this: that in some situations lawyers think—usually in error—that by omitting a good argument, they can thereby increase the chance of prevailing on a more doubtful argument directed to a more far-reaching result. However, in this instance, such a calculation would have been manifestly unreasonable. . . .

Prejudice found because reversal would have been required if the issue had been raised on direct appeal. Remanded for new sentencing.

Ballard v. United States*, 400 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2005). Appellate counsel ineffective in conspiracy to distribute drugs case for failing to challenge the defendant’s sentence. The evidence established that the defendant had been a “mule” involved in transporting cocaine and marijuana. The jury returned only a general verdict of guilt, which did not specify what substances the defendant had transported. The court found that the evidence established only that she had transported cocaine and sentenced her accordingly. While her case was pending on appeal, the Sixth Circuit held in another case that when a general verdict was returned in a conspiracy involving multiple drugs, the defendant should be sentenced only as if he had distributed only the drug carrying the lower penalty. After the Supreme Court’s decision in Apprendi, the Circuit also held that failure to instruct the jury to determine both the type of drug and the drug quantity involved amounts to plain error. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in not raising this issue. “[W]hile we do not require attorneys to foresee changes in the law, once a change—particularly an important and relevant change—does come about, we do expect counsel to be aware [of] it.” Id. at 408. Counsel’s conduct was also deficient because counsel was aware that one of the co-defendant’s won on appeal on these same issues. “There is simply no rational basis for completely foregoing an argument that was not only potentially, but actually, successful.” Id. at 409. The court found Strickland prejudice by applying a plain error standard to determine whether the trial court improperly determined the sentence.

Sanders v. Cotton*, 398 F.3d 572 (7th Cir. 2005). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to challenge on appeal the trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on the elements of murder, which required that the state prove the absence of sudden heat. The trial court’s instructions on murder did not mention sudden heat. The instructions on voluntary manslaughter allowed conviction if the state proved the defendant was acting under sudden heat. Trial counsel proposed an instruction that would have properly required the State to prove the absence of sudden heat for murder. On appeal, trial counsel did not raise this issue, but counsel did not state a strategy. Instead, counsel could not remember why he did not raise the issue. In addressing the substantive due process claim, the court held that the issue was not procedurally defaulted in state court and even if it was the default was overcome because appellate counsel's ineffectiveness established cause and prejudice for the default. Under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court's finding that the instructions were adequate was unreasonable because the jury instructions not only failed to properly state the burden of proof, but affirmatively misstated it when the manslaughter instructions included the element of proving the existence of sudden heat rather than proving the absence of it for murder. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel raised three issues concerning instructions on transferred intent, admission of prior bad acts, and abuse of discretion in ordering consecutive prison terms. The sentencing issue was clearly weaker because the trial court was given "wide discretion." The two other issues were also weaker because "neither argument relied on controlling Indiana precedent that would have warranted a new trial." This issue was "an obvious and stronger argument than the arguments" made by appellate counsel. With respect to prejudice, the court held that the state court's finding that trial counsel's proposed instruction was a misstatement of the law was also an unreasonable determination of the facts, thus requiring no deference. The state court also unreasonably applied the law because "Indiana law requires reversal and a new trial" under the facts of this case. If the issue had been raised, the state court "would have been bound by law" to grant a new trial.

2004: United States v. Reinhart, 357 F.3d 521 (5th Cir. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in conspiracy to commit sexual exploitation of children case for failing to assert the trial court's sentencing error on appeal. The district court held the defendant accountable in sentencing for two minor males depicted in a pornographic videotape created by the defendant's co-conspirator prior to the formation of the conspiracy. Counsel objected during sentencing to the court's consideration of these two minors, but did not challenge the district court's action on appeal. The court held that consideration of these two minors was inappropriate under the sentencing guidelines, because the defendant played no part in the creation of the videotape, which was created well before the conspiracy began. Counsel was deficient for failing to assert this meritorious issue on appeal. Prejudice found because the appropriate sentencing guideline range would have resulted in a sentence shorter by five years than the sentence imposed on the defendant, which is sufficient to establish prejudice under Glover v. United States.

Mapes v. Tate, 388 F.3d 187 (6th Cir. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in capital case for failing to assert on appeal that the trial court erred in instructing the jury in sentencing that it was not permitted to consider mitigating evidence related to a prior murder conviction used in aggravation. Trial counsel objected to this instruction, but appellate counsel asserted only trial phase issues and one unrelated sentencing issue on appeal. In determining whether an attorney on direct appeal performed in a competent fashion, the court listed eleven factors to be considered. In applying the factors to this case, the court held that the issue not raised was "significant and obvious" because the jury was not allowed to consider mitigation in violation of the holding of Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455

U.S. 104 (1982), which had been decided a year before this trial. The omitted issue was also much stronger than any of the issues raised, which mostly challenged the trial phase despite evidence of overwhelming guilt and in some instances “were asserted in the face of established law to the contrary.” The court also discussed other factors before concluding that “[n]o competent attorney, in the circumstances of this case, would have failed to raise this issue.” The court also found a reasonable probability that the defendant would have prevailed on appeal and conditioned the writ on the state courts allowing a new direct appeal.

2003: Caver v. Straub, 349 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2003). Appellate counsel was ineffective in assault with intent to commit armed robbery case for failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffective assistance. On appeal, counsel asserted a claim of instructional error and insufficiency of the evidence. Following affirmance, the petitioner filed a pro-se application to the state Supreme Court asserting generally that appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert the claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. In state post-conviction, the petitioner asserted appellate ineffectiveness for failing to raise trial counsel ineffectiveness because trial counsel was not present during a jury question and re-instruction of the jury. The state court held that the petitioner had not demonstrated good cause to excuse the failure to present the issue in his direct appeal. The state court also found that appellate counsel was not ineffective. On appeal, the petitioner asserted appellate counsel ineffectiveness for failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness for different specific reasons. The Sixth Circuit first held that the claim of appellate ineffectiveness was not procedurally defaulted due to failure to fairly present the claim in state court because the state did not raise the issue of default before the district court and instead argued only the merits. The petitioner also did not procedurally default his claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel because, while it was not raised in his direct appeal, he did raise it in his pro se appeal to the state Supreme Court in a general fashion. Because it was a pro se application and less stringent standards apply the court found that the issue was fairly presented to the state court. Deficient conduct found because the issue of trial counsel’s absence during the jury re-instruction was a much stronger issue than the two plain error issues asserted by appellate counsel. Prejudice was found because, if the issue had been raised on appeal, there is a reasonable probability that the result of the state appeal would have been different. In finding prejudice, the court noted that the Supreme Court has not expressly considered whether jury instruction is a critical stage that requires the presence of counsel. The Sixth Circuit held, however, that it is a critical stage. Therefore, trial counsel’s absence required a presumption of prejudice. In analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court’s decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law in Strickland. In essence, the court characterized the finding of appellate counsel’s ineffectiveness as both cause and prejudice for failure to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness on appeal and as a free standing constitutional error.

Joshua v. Dewitt*, 341 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2003). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in drug case for failing to move to suppress evidence. The defendant was stopped by a highway patrolman for speeding. The highway patrolman did a license check on the defendant and learned that there was an entry in the station’s “read and sign” book, which contained police intelligence information. The entry in the book reported that the defendant was a known drug courier who transported illegal narcotics between several cities. Based on this information, the defendant was detained for approximately forty-two minutes in order to allow time for a drug dog to come to the scene. When the dog arrived, it alerted, and a large quantity of cocaine was found. The defendant's girlfriend then told the police that the drugs belonged to the defendant. Prior to trial, counsel moved to suppress the evidence solely on the basis that the length of the traffic stop alone required suppression. The trial court denied the motion, and the defendant entered a no contest plea. The court found that counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to move for suppression under United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985), which held that reliance on a flyer or bulletin can justify a brief detention but can do so only if the officer who issued the flyer or bulletin had articulable facts supporting reasonable suspicion that the person wanted had committed an offense. The court found a reasonable trial attorney would have raised the Hensley issue at trial. Prejudice was found because the state failed to offer any evidence from the officer who provided the information from the "read and sign" book and because the state had never contended that there was a justifiable basis for the entry. The court likewise found appellate counsel ineffective for failing to raise the issue on appeal under the state plain error rule. Prejudice was found because Hensley bars the admissibility of the evidence seized at the scene of the defendant's arrest, including both the drugs and his girlfriend's statement. Without this evidence, there was a substantial probability that the defendant would not have been convicted. Analyzing the case under the AEDPA, the court found that the state court decision was contrary to clearly established Supreme Court precedent in Hensley.

United States v. Skurdal*, 341 F.3d 921 (9th Cir. 2003). Appellate counsel was ineffective in drug case for failing to file a proper Anders brief in support of his motion to be relieved as counsel. In the § 2255 proceeding, the district court found that all issues raised were procedurally barred because the defendant had failed to raise them on direct appeal. The ineffectiveness of appellate counsel was found to excuse the procedural default and the district court was ordered to address the issues.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Urenda-Bustos v. Oliver, 2024 WL 4119333 (D. Nev. Sept. 6, 2024). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a Batson argument concerning the excusal of an African-American prospective juror. Although the state supreme court reasonably determined that appellate counsel was not ineffective in failing to pursue a Batson claim regarding the excusal of three other African American prospective jurors, the state supreme court's determination that appellate counsel was not ineffective in failing to pursue a Batson claim concerning venireperson Nock was, "by clear and convincing evidence contained in the state court's record, based on an unreasonable determination of fact in light of the evidence presented in the state court's proceedings." The state supreme court had credited the race neutral explanation provided by the prosecutor for the strikes and so concluded a Batson claim could not have succeeded on appeal. The record showed, however, that the reasons given for striking Nock were pretextual. The first reason involved Nock's poor body language—her scowl and failure to laugh during lighter moments of jury selection—and the second was Nock being a fan of CSI. Trial counsel responded that other prospective jurors indicated that they watched CSI and did not laugh during jury selection. The trial court overruled the Batson objection, finding no violation and no reason to declare a mistrial and start over. In denying the objection, the trial court made no findings concerning Nock's demeanor and expressed no reliance on that justification as distinct from the CSI-related rationale for the strike. "Consequently, the state supreme court's determination that the trial court credited the state's race-neutral explanation based on Nock's demeanor is an unreasonable determination of fact" Having surmounted § 2254(d)(2) and (e)(1), petitioner was entitled to de novo review of the claim. At the time of petitioner's direct appeal, the Supreme Court had held in Snyder v. Louisiana, "that a trial court's rejection of a Batson objection was clearly erroneous where, as here, the trial court made no determination regarding the state's demeanor-based justification and the state's second justification for excusing a juror was implausible based on the record of the proceedings." The topic of CSI and related programs came up only twice during the voir dire. First, by the trial court during questioning of non-African American juror Tapper and second, during the state's questioning of Nock. In the questioning of Tapper, who admitted to watching shows with trials like Law and Order, and who was familiar with CSI, Tapper acknowledged the scripted nature of fictional crime shows and their limited relevance to the trial at hand. Later that same day, the state raised the topic of shows such as CSI to the entire venire. No prospective juror, including Nock, raised their hand when asked by the state whether anyone could not separate reality from television. The state went on to question only Nock about CSI and related television shows and whether they created expectations of what evidence should be presented. Notably, the state did not question Tapper as he did Nock about why a case might not require forensic analysis. "An objectively reasonable appellate attorney would have realized that the record reflects the state's disparate questioning of African-American venireperson Nock raises an inference of racial discrimination in the jury selection." Further, "an objectively reasonable appellate attorney would have concluded that a side-by-side comparison with the only similarly-situated venireperson, Tapper, raises an inference of racial discrimination in the exercise of the peremptory challenge of venireperson Nock." An additional circumstance undermining the state's reliance on Nock's affinity for CSI as a purportedly race-neutral basis for the excusal was "the state's complete failure to question Nock concerning the other justification for excusing her, i.e., her demeanor." On the record of this case, no reasonable strategic basis could justify appellate counsel's failure to raise a Batson claim.

[G]iven the record here and the Supreme Court's ruling in Snyder, there is a reasonable probability that appellate counsel would have succeeded with a claim that the trial court clearly erred in overruling the Batson objection as to venireperson Nock. At the very least, the appeal would have resulted in a remand for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the trial court relied on Nock's demeanor for its decision to overrule the Batson objection.

Habeas relief is granted on the claim of appellate counsel ineffectiveness and a new trial is required. Due to the passage of more than a decade since trial, "there is no realistic possibility the question whether the state engaged in purposeful discrimination in jury selection could be profitably explored on remand."

Hearn v. Warden*, 2024 WL 3982215 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 28, 2024). Petitioner was denied the effective assistance of appellate counsel due to counsel's failure to challenge petitioner's guilty plea as involuntary and unintelligent. The finding of ineffective assistance provided the necessary cause to overcome the procedural default of the underlying challenge to the plea and prejudice was found from petitioner's demonstration of a reasonable probability that he would not have entered his guilty plea but for his insufficient awareness “of the relevant circumstances and likely consequences.” Cause and prejudice was also found to excuse the procedural default of the appellate ineffective assistance claim. Regarding the merits of the plea challenge, due to incorrect information in the written plea agreement, petitioner pleaded guilty believing he would be eligible for statutory sentence-reduction opportunities, such as a judicial release and credit for program participation. But due to his criminal history, petitioner was in fact categorically ineligible for such programs, and he thus received sentences that could not be so reduced. The state court’s conclusion that petitioner received sufficient explanation of the actual sentencing consequences within the plea agreement was not fairly supported by the record. Petitioner established deficient performance on the part of his appellate counsel because the challenge to the plea at issue here was clearly stronger than the arguments appellate counsel actually raised on direct appeal. And there was a straightforward body of caselaw in the appellate court hearing the appeal that supported the plea challenge. Thus, petitioner demonstrated a reasonable probability that the claim would have succeeded on appeal, supplying the prejudice showing needed to overcome the default of the claim. Cause to overcome the default involved prison mailroom delays.

Torres-Olan v. Attorney General*, 2024 WL 3330304 (W.D. Pa. July 8, 2024). In criminal case where trial court allowed appointed counsel to withdraw after agreeing with counsel that petitioner’s lack of cooperation and abusive behavior forfeited his right to counsel, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise on appeal the adequacy of the trial court’s colloquy with petitioner when granting appointed counsel leave to withdraw and permitting petitioner to proceed pro se. The state appellate post-conviction court rejected the finding by the trial and lower post-conviction courts that petitioner had forfeited his right to counsel. It nevertheless affirmed the denial of relief on the appellate ineffectiveness claim based on lack of prejudice. The ruling was premised on the state court’s application of a heightened prejudice standard because the claim was raised in post-conviction proceedings rather than on direct appeal. Under that standard, petitioner had to show not a reasonable probability that he would have prevailed on appeal due to the inadequacy of the colloquy under state law, but rather that structural error or a constitutional error occurred. This was a significantly more demanding standard of prejudice than the standard outlined in Strickland and Robbins, and, accordingly, the state court decision was contrary to clearly established federal law. Under de novo review, petitioner was entitled to relief. Because the trial court failed to comply with the colloquy set forth in relevant state rules, petitioner’s challenge to the sufficiency of the colloquy had obvious merit. And no reasonable professional in appellate counsel’s position could have concluded from the record that the trial court’s colloquy adequately protected his client’s rights. Prejudice is established given well-established Pennsylvania law providing for reversal on direct appeal where a trial court allowed a defendant to proceed to trial pro se after failing to conduct a thorough, on-the-record colloquy.

MacKenzie v. Morrison*, 2024 WL 3040912 (W.D. Mich. June 18, 2024). In attempted murder case where petitioner was sentenced under now-unconstitutional mandatory guidelines, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a Sixth Amendment challenge to the sentence under Alleyne v. United States, 570 U.S. 99 (2013), and People v. Lockridge, 870 N.W.2d 520 (Mich. 2015). Although Alleyne had been decided at the time of sentencing, state law precedent found it inapplicable to the mandatory guidelines applied in petitioner’s case. While petitioner’s appeal was still pending, however, the state supreme court issued Lockridge which held that Alleyne was in fact applicable to the mandatory guidelines and it applied to cases pending on appeal. Appellate counsel therefore could have moved to supplement petitioner's brief to raise the Alleyne/Lockridge argument. Had appellate counsel done so, it is likely that the appellate court would have remanded the matter for the trial court to conduct a resentencing or a hearing in accordance with Lockridge. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to raise petitioner's Sixth Amendment sentencing challenge on direct appeal, and petitioner is entitled to federal habeas relief with respect to that claim.

Hanna v. Brown*, 2024 WL 2208128 (W.D. Mich. May 16, 2024). In case involving convictions for multiple crimes related to acts of domestic abuse by petitioner against his wife, appellate and trial counsel were ineffective for not challenging the scoring on Offense Variable (OV) 3 with respect to petitioner's sentence for first-degree criminal sexual conduct (CSC-I). (Appellate counsel's deficient performance in failing to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness on direct appeal provided the cause necessary to overcome the procedural default of the trial ineffective assistance claim.) OV 3 scores physical injuries to victims. An offender receives 5 points under OV 3 if "[b]odily injury not requiring medical treatment occurred to a victim." But this 5 point addition is not applicable "if bodily injury is an element of the sentencing offense." Petitioner correctly alleged he could not be scored for OV 3 with respect to his CSC-I sentence and both trial and appellate counsel performed deficiently in failing to raise the issue. Respondent argued that no prejudice could be established for two reasons. First, according to respondent, the OV 10 score was erroneously calculated as zero. If the scoring of OV 3 was challenged, additional points could have been assessed under OV 10 at resentencing and petitioner's guidelines would have remained the same. Second, the failure of petitioner's counsel to raise issues with the scoring also prevented the issue of the habitual offender status from being raised. While petitioner was sentenced as a third habitual offender, he was in fact a fourth habitual offender. Had he been sentenced as such, respondent asserted, his penalty would have increased from 1.5 times the statutorily allowed time to 2 times the statutorily allowed time. Respondent's arguments are rejected as speculative. Notably, the two presentence investigation reports (PSIRs) prepared in the case indicated that OV 10 was scored at zero for the CSC-I offense and at no time during petitioner's sentencing hearing did the prosecution object to the failure to score OV 10. Nor did the prosecution raise any arguments concerning petitioner's habitual offender status. Further, respondent did not bring these arguments up in a cross-appeal. Additionally, in the second PSIR that was prepared in conjunction with petitioner's state court motion for relief from judgment, the agent recommended that for the CSC-I conviction, petitioner be resentenced to serve a minimum of 10 years and 6 months and a maximum of 30 years—much less than the sentence he received of 16 years and 8 months (200 months) and a maximum of 60 years. And the agent also indicated that petitioner was subject to resentencing as a third-offense habitual offender. "In short, nothing in the record supports a finding that Petitioner would conclusively be subject to having OV 10 scored and be subject to the fourth-offense habitual offender enhancement upon resentencing." Prejudice is established.

2020: Nguyen v. Barrett, 2020 WL 9600819 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 1, 2020). Where Judge-found facts were used to increase the mandatory minimum sentence petitioner received, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a challenge to the sentence under Alleyne, which was decided by the Supreme Court after petitioner was sentenced but while the direct appeal was pending. Prejudice is established because there is a reasonable probability that petitioner would have received a new sentencing hearing had the claim been raised. Appellate counsel's prejudicial ineffectiveness allows consideration of the merits of the defaulted Alleyne claim on which relief is granted.

2019: Ramirez v. Tegels, 413 F.Supp.3d 808 (W.D. Wisc. 2019), aff'd, 963 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 2020).

In case involving convictions for sexual crimes against a child, appellate/post-conviction counsel was ineffective in failing to raise Confrontation Clause challenges to admission of testimony by police officers and hospital personnel about statements made by the child and the child's brother. (At trial, the child's mother recanted her prior statements implicating petitioner and did not bring her daughter, the alleged victim, to court despite a subpoena ordering her to do so.) Initial appellate counsel had filed a no-merits brief which was ultimately rejected. Crawford was decided during the no-merit proceedings. Post-conviction counsel was then appointed. Under state law, a direct appeal can be initiated through a post-conviction petition. Although an argument was raised in the post-conviction petition challenging the admission of hearsay testimony under state law, post-conviction counsel neglected to invoke Crawford. On appeal, counsel, inter alia, repeated the claims raised in the post-conviction motion. Counsel did not argue that the out-of-court statements by the child and her brother failed the confrontation test in Crawford, even though petitioner wrote two letters to counsel asking her to make a Crawford argument. Petitioner's convictions were affirmed. He subsequently filed a pro se challenge in state court to the effectiveness of post-conviction counsel but this was rejected on the ground that Crawford did not exist at the time of trial and did not apply retroactively in post-conviction proceedings. But because Crawford was decided before petitioner's direct appeal became final, the district court ruled he was entitled to the benefit of that decision. Appellate counsel's failure to raise it could not be deemed reasonable strategy. The statements made by the child and her brother to police officers were properly characterized as testimonial, while statements made by the child to medical personnel presented a closer question. Although some of those statements appeared to be in response to questions related to medical treatment, others, tended towards testimonial. That the law on this area was not settled at the time of the appeal did not preclude a finding of deficient performance. "The question is whether the confrontation claim was 'nonfrivolous' and 'clearly stronger' than the claims appellate counsel did raise. . . . In this instance, the confrontation claim was 'genuinely arguable' and clearly stronger than the claims appellate counsel chose to raise." Additionally, the Crawford claim was obvious at the time of the post-conviction petition and when appellate/post-conviction counsel subsequently filed the direct appeal brief. Prejudice is easily found as to two counts where the only evidence presented were statements by the child to police and medical personnel. As to petitioner's other convictions, prejudice is also found. "If the jury had not heard the multiple statements from [the child] describing the assault, the jury might have credited the defense's theory that [the child's mother] had lied about everything, had planted the DNA evidence in her daughter's underwear, and then had told her daughter to wipe herself with toilet paper."

Fontenot v. Allbaugh*, 402 F.Supp.3d 1110 (E.D. Okla. 2019), aff'd on other grounds, 4 F.4th 982 (10th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S.Ct. 2777 (2022). In procedurally complicated murder case, habeas relief is granted to former Oklahoma death row inmate on numerous claims, including ineffective assistance of appellate counsel for failing to raise substantial and cognizable state and federal constitutional issues, and fail[ing] to raise all available grounds, on his direct appeal to the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals. There was no strategic or tactical reason for not presenting these claims in Mr. Fontenot's second direct appeal brief. Had appellate counsel raised these issues, it is likely that the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals would have reversed his conviction and ordered a new trial. Because appellate counsel failed to raise substantial and cognizable constitutional claims Mr. Fontenot was deprived of appellate review of the constitutional errors inherent in his trial, and the reliability of the judgment and sentence.

Crowe v. United States*, 2019 WL 1619969 (E.D. Mich. April 16, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of conspiracy, bank robbery, pharmacy robbery, using or carrying a firearm during a crime of violence, and felon in possession of a firearm, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to object to/raise on appeal the sentencing of petitioner under a statutory mandatory minimum based on conduct not found by the jury. At the time of petitioner's convictions, a two-year increase in the mandatory minimum for brandishing a firearm was considered a sentencing enhancement, not a separate element, and could be found and applied by a preponderance of evidence by a sentencing court. Thus, the jury was never asked to make a finding on whether petitioner had brandished a firearm. Alleyne v. United States came out shortly before sentencing but trial counsel failed to raise the failure of the jury to make a finding on brandishing and petitioner was given the enhanced mandatory minimum by the sentencing court. "An attorney acts unreasonably when he fails to raise a Supreme Court decision that directly reduces a client's sentence." Although the sentencing court would have remained free to sentence petitioner to the same amount of time without the mandatory minimum, because petitioner was sentenced to the mandatory minimum on several other counts, it was more likely than not that he was prejudiced by the additional two-year mandatory minimum from the brandishing finding. Regarding appellate counsel, it was only after oral argument that appellate counsel attempted to raise the Alleyne error by incorporating the co-defendant's brief. Because the co-defendant and petitioner had liability for brandishing under different theories – the co-defendant as a principal and petitioner as an aider-and-abettor -- the appellate court declined to address the issue as to petitioner because a different analysis would be required. Although the government conceded that appellate counsel performed deficiently, it contested prejudice. The district court responded: "Mr. Crowe was certainly prejudiced by the omission, for in the interim between his sentencing and his appeal, the Supreme Court issued a ruling clarifying aider-and-abettor liability in his favor" by finding that intent was required. And while the jury clearly found that petitioner knew that the principals were carrying firearms based on its convictions, it could not be said that the jury certainly would have found that petitioner knew that the principals would brandish their weapons during the robberies. Notably, the jury acquitted petitioner of several counts, and clearly rejected at least some of the government witness's testimony. Had appellate counsel properly briefed the issue, it is unlikely that the Court of Appeals would have been able to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained.

2018: Clay v. United States, 311 F. Supp. 3d 911 (N.D. Ill. 2018). In federal drug case with a guilty plea and ultimate sentence of 168 months, sentencing counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the inclusion of petitioner's 2003 conviction under the state Aggravated Unlawful Use of a Weapon (AUUW) statute in his criminal history points, because the AUUW statute had been declared unconstitutional by Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2012) and People v. Aguilar, 2 N.E. 3d 321, 328 (2013). Pursuant to U.S. v. Jenkins, 772 F.3d 1092 (7th Cir. 2014), the court should not have included that conviction in the calculation of petitioner's criminal history points and level. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise this issue on appeal.

The court acknowledged that no one – not sentencing counsel, not the Government, not the probation department, and not the district court – had caught this issue, but determined that such a legal error cannot be excused in sentencing counsel. It did not matter that petitioner had not been successful in convincing the Illinois state court to vacate his AUUW conviction, because the district court did not know the basis for the state court's refusal to do so, and Jenkins does not require the underlying conviction to be vacated in order for the conviction to be excluded from the calculation of the criminal history points. Appellate counsel's performance was deficient for failing to raise this issue because it "would have been the strongest – and the only – argument made by appellate counsel, who filed an Anders brief representing to the Seventh Circuit that Petitioner's appeal was frivolous." 311 F. Supp. 3d at 922. Petitioner was prejudiced by counsels' errors because there is a reasonable probability that petitioner received additional prison time as a result. There is no reason to think that the court (and the Government, who recommended a reduced sentence) would not have taken the same approach to petitioner's sentence had the Guidelines been calculated properly from the start. The court therefore reduced petitioner's sentence to 151 months.

Mendoza v. Holland*, 2018 WL 540095 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2018). In case where petitioner was convicted in California state court of a total of 11 charges of committing a lewd or lascivious act against three minors under the age of 14, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to raise a claim that petitioner's Miranda rights had been violated. This ineffectiveness provided cause to overcome the procedural default of the Miranda claim in state court. Looking to Visciotti v. Martel, 862 F.3d 749, 768 (9th Cir. 2016), the district court independently determined whether there was IAC and did not defer to the state court's determination of this issue. Petitioner unambiguously invoked his Miranda rights as soon as the detective started talking to him, saying "No way" did he want to discuss anything with the detective. Nevertheless, the interview continued for an hour thereafter. This was not an implied waiver of his Miranda rights; petitioner only answered later questions because the detectives had ignored his response and continued questioning him. The admission of his statements at trial was thus a constitutional violation. In its harmless error analysis, the court did not review petitioner's testimony at trial given that petitioner only testified because of the confession. The direct and graphic statements he gave to the police about two of the three victims had a substantial and injurious effect, because the independent evidence as to petitioner's guilt of those was less strong; with regard to the third victim, there was evidence obtained from a taped pretext call between petitioner and the victim that was damaging, and so his admissions to the police about that victim did not have a prejudicial effect under Brecht. Notably, the prosecution emphasized the confession in closing argument. Both trial and appellate counsel were deficient for failing to present this meritorious Miranda claim. There is a reasonable probability that had trial counsel raised it, the trial court would have suppressed the interview and an acquittal was possible, at least on the charges against two of the victims. There is also a reasonable probability that if appellate counsel raised it on appeal, petitioner would have prevailed then. Thus, cause and prejudice for the procedural default was established. Furthermore, the state superior court's denial of the IAC for failure to raise the Miranda claims involved an unreasonable application of Strickland's prejudice prong, because although the superior court articulated the correct standard (reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different), it then conflated that with a sufficiency of the evidence test. So AEDPA deference to the state court's decision did not apply.

2017: Termitus v. Secretary, Dept. of Corr., 245 F.Supp.3d 1322 (M.D. Florida 2017). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue that defendant's attempted robbery convictions violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. Defendant was indicted and convicted of murder, two counts of attempted robbery and related charges stemming from his armed robbery of a bank during which he ordered two employees to open the bank vault and then shot and killed one of the employees when they were unable to get it open. The Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits multiple punishments for the same offense. Florida law provides that separate convictions for different offenses involving multiple victims who are killed or injured during the same episode do not violate double jeopardy. However, to convict a defendant of two attempted robberies, there must also be two separate takings. According to the evidence presented at trial, defendant only committed one attempt to forcefully take money from the bank. Thus, his two convictions for attempted robbery violated double jeopardy and appellate counsel's failure to raise this claim on direct appeal resulted in prejudice "because the claim would have been successful on appeal." Id. at *4.

2016: Lee v. Haas, 197 F.Supp.3d 960 (E.D. Mich. 2016). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to raise defendant's self-representation claim under Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). Defendant sent at least two letters to the trial judge prior to trial invoking his right to self-representation and attempting to present the issue in open court. In one letter, Defendant stated "not only do I want to represent myself, it is my right." Id. at 973. The trial judge actively avoided entertaining his invocation of the Sixth Amendment right, and allowed trial counsel to continue with the proceedings. Appellate counsel failed to raise this claim on appeal. Defendant sought permission to add to the claim to his brief, but the state court of appeals denied this request. Prejudice established because defendant's self-representation claim "almost certainly would have been found meritorious." Id. at 974. Defendant "repeatedly invoked his right to self-representation" and thus "no explanation appears to justify counsel's determination to forego a very strong Faretta claim." Id.

2014: Loher v. Thomas, 23 F. Supp. 2d 1182 (D. Haw. 2014), aff'd, 825 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2016). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel ineffective in attempted sexual assault and kidnapping case for failing to assert trial court error in forcing the defendant to testify first in his defense case rather than granting a reasonable continuance request so that other defense witnesses could be called before the defendant made the decision whether to testify or not. This was a structural error and prejudice was presumed.

2013: United States v. Ocampo, 919 F. Supp. 2d 898 (E.D. Mich. 2013). Appellate counsel ineffective for failing to assert a double jeopardy violation due to the defendant's convictions, based on the same conduct, for felon in possession of firearm and possession of firearm by an unlawful user of controlled substances. Prejudice established, even though merging the offenses had no impact on the amount of time petitioner would spend in prison.

2010: United States v. Monnier, 718 F. Supp. 2d 1040 (D. Neb. 2010). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the defendant's sentence imposed prior to Booker. The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine and distribution of less than 50 grams that resulted in death. The court found the guidelines range to be 360 months to life. The court invited argument on a downward-departure based on the victim's contributory conduct, but ultimately concluded there was no authority for a downward departure on that basis. The court sentenced the defendant to 360 months on each count to be served concurrently. Appellate counsel did not appeal the denial of the downward departure or otherwise address sentencing issues, even though the appellate court had invited supplemental briefing after the Supreme Court's decision in Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), and cert. had been granted in Booker several weeks prior to oral argument in this case. Worse yet, in response to court questions, counsel reported that there was nothing in the trial record to indicate the court would have imposed a lower sentence if the Guidelines were advisory only. Counsel still did nothing even after Booker was decided, even though this case remained pending for another six months. Counsel's conduct was deficient as "[c]ounsel was aware, or should have been aware" of the trial court's reluctance to impose the "then-mandatory" sentence of 360 months, as "the record contained numerous indications that the court was predisposed to give a lower sentence if possible," including referring to the mandatory minimum sentence as "harsh" and "too long," stating the court had no other choice, urging counsel to pursue the downward departure issue on appeal, and urging the defendant to pursue his is 2255. Counsel was also ineffective in failing to appeal the denial of the downward departure based on the victim's contributory conduct. Even before Blakely or Booker, this was appealable and the court urged him to appeal. Sentence reimposed at the statutory mandatory minimum of twenty years.

Contreras v. United States*, 682 F. Supp. 2d 771 (S.D. Tex. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in failing to file a Booker claim on appeal in drug trafficking case. The defendant was sentenced prior to Booker under the mandatory sentencing guidelines. His appeal was filed ten months after Booker, which allowed re-sentencing from cases decided prior to Booker but still on direct appeal. Nonetheless, counsel failed to assert this issue on appeal. Remanded for resentencing.

2009: Hicks v. Howton, 675 F. Supp. 2d 1050 (D. Ore. 2009). Under AEDPA, trial and appellate counsel ineffective in sexual abuse case. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert error in the trial court's overruling objection to the prosecutor's improper arguments in closing. The prosecutor repeatedly argued that if the jury believed the alleged victim's testimony, it had to convict. This argument was outrageous and misleading as a required element of the offense was that the touching had to be for the purpose of sexual gratification or arousal. Counsel erred in filing a "no merits" brief, as this issue was meritorious. In addition, by filing a "no merits" brief, "appellate counsel put a client with significantly impaired reading, writing and reasoning skills in the position of having to formulate and write legal claims and supporting arguments for his appeal, something he was incapable of. This in effect denied [the defendant] his right to appeal."

Albrecht v. Beard, 636 F. Supp. 2d 468 (E.D. Pa. 2009) (Sentencing in August 1980). Under AEDPA, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert Mills error. Because the state appellate court did not reach the merits of the question, review was de novo. Even though trial counsel did not assert this issue, “[i]n 1986, Pennsylvania courts applied a relaxed waiver doctrine in capital cases on direct appeal.” Thus, appellate counsel could have asserted this issue and obtained merits review. Although Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988) was decided after the direct appeal, “Mills is not a substantial departure from the principle announced in the Lockett line of cases, and competent appellate counsel could have, and should have, recognized and litigated the mitigation unanimity issue based on established U.S. Supreme Court precedent.” Likewise, “there was no conceivable strategic basis for failing to do so.” Prejudice was also established.

[T]here is a reasonable probability that competent appellate counsel would have persuaded the court that the Lockett line of cases rendered the sentencing-phase jury instructions unconstitutional. Even if the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had denied the claim, the United States Supreme Court granted certiorari on an identical claim only months later. Accordingly, it is reasonable to presume Petitioner would have obtained relief on direct review on the mitigation unanimity issue had it been raised.

Judge v. Beard, 611 F. Supp. 2d 415 (E.D. Pa. 2009) (sentenced in April 1987). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective for failing to assert Mills error based on the trial court’s instructions that “erroneously led the jury to believe that it could not return a verdict at the penalty phase of the trial without agreeing unanimously both as to individual mitigating circumstances and the ultimate penalty.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient, even though the case was tried before the Supreme Court granted cert. or issued the opinion in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988). The case was pending on direct appeal at the time of the decision. Although the Supreme Court determined in Beard v. Banks, 542 U.S. 406 (2004) that Mills announced a new rule that could not be retroactively applied to cases on collateral, Third Circuit cases prior to Beard concluded that Mills was simply an extension of Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978) and Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982). Thus, the court held that “reasonably competent defense counsel would or should have been aware of the ongoing developments in the state of capital law in April, 1987, and subsequent thereto.” There was also no conceivable strategy for failing to object, “as the worst that could have happened would have been its denial.”

2008: United States v. Stover, 576 F. Supp. 2d 134 (D.D.C. 2008). Appellate counsel ineffective in drug conspiracy case for failing to challenge the drug quantity calculation. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the court calculated the sentence based on an understanding that the heroin involved was diluted to 20% purity. The co-defendants challenged this because the heroin that was actually seized had purity levels between 27%-29%. Prejudice established.

Flowers v. United States*, 560 F. Supp. 2d 710 (N.D. Ind. 2008). Counsel ineffective in possession with intent to distribute drugs “within 1,000 feet” of a school, playground, or public housing. Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective for not challenging the government’s failure to prove that the defendant’s house was within 1,000 feet of a protected area. At trial, Officer Cameron testified that the residence was within 1,000 feet of “a public park in the South Bend Parks Department.” There was no other evidence on the point even though the statute requires that the government prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the area is: 1) an outdoor facility, which is 2) intended for recreation, 3) open to the public, and 4) includes three or more separate apparatus intended for the recreation of children. Counsel's conduct was objectively unreasonable and prejudicial for failing to challenge the government's inadequate proof. The court set aside the conviction on this offense and entered a conviction on the lesser included offense (omitting the "within 1,000 feet" element) and ordered resentencing.

Showers v. Beard*, 586 F. Supp. 2d 310 (M.D. Pa. 2008), aff'd, 635 F.3d 625 (3rd Cir. 2011). Under AEDPA, trial counsel was ineffective in murder trial for failing to present rebuttal expert testimony and appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert this issue on direct appeal. Petitioner was charged with the murder of her husband, who died from ingestion of liquid morphine Roxanol. The defense asserted that his death was a suicide. The state presented an expert who testified: (1) the taste of Roxanol could be disguised in food or drink, and (2) there was no evidence of forced swallowing. While counsel attempted to refute this in cross and in closing argument, the only evidence the defense presented was a lay witness to testify that the taste of Roxanol could not be masked. Counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel had retained a forensic psychiatrist prior to trial to review the victim's state of mind. The psychiatrist interviewed pharmacists and nurses that administered the drug, along with the pharmacist that prescribed the medication used in this case, and learned that it is difficult to disguise the taste. He informed counsel that they needed to call an expert to testify about the drug, which he could not do because he was not a toxicologist, and gave the expert names of three possible experts. "[W]hile . . . this case does not involve the death penalty, the guidelines associated with defending a death penalty case are nevertheless instructive as to the role of defense counsel in preparing a defense in a criminal case potentially involving the use of a medical expert." Counsel failed to adequately investigate here. Id. (citing ABA Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases (1989)). Counsel knew the administration of the Roxanol was a crucial issue, but did not present a rebuttal defense expert. The cross-examination and counsel's arguments "did nothing to negate" the state evidence because the jury was instructed that counsel's arguments do not constitute evidence. The state court finding to the contrary "cannot be reasonably justified under Strickland" and the factual determination that counsel adequately performed "is plainly controverted by the evidence." Prejudice found because counsel could have presented the testimony of a forensic pathologist to establish: (1) the taste of the Roxanol could be disguised only in a large amount of a sweet-tasting or bitter substance; (2) the autopsy report showed no evidence of any such diluting or masking substance; and (3) the autopsy report did not indicate forced swallowing. Thus, the pathologist concluded the Roxanol was swallowed voluntarily. This testimony "would have been more convincing than testimony from a close family friend" and would have made the "innocence claim . . . considerably more compelling than a simple denial of guilt." The state court's finding of no prejudice "cannot be reasonably justified under Strickland." Appellate counsel's decision to pursue only eight issues on appeal, excluding this issue, was deficient and prejudicial.

2007: Richardson v. United States, 477 F. Supp. 2d 392 (D. Mass. 2007). Appellate counsel ineffective in perjury case for failing to file supplemental briefs on appeal concerning the sudden change in law caused by the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), in which the mandatory nature of the Sentencing Guidelines was found to be unconstitutional and the Guidelines were made advisory. Counsel's conduct was deficient because, under Circuit law, the issue had been preserved at trial due to Apprendi arguments. Counsel's conduct was also unreasonable given the "sea change" in the law caused by Booker, which could not be explained by a tactical decision. Prejudice found. Even though the 2255 judge was the trial judge, the court declined comment on whether he would give the same sentence after Booker and noted that it was his practice, because of a prior "professional rebuke" discussed in detail in the opinion, to reassign cases to a different court when remanded to him for resentencing. While he found it difficult to determine a reasonable probability of a different sentence "from publicly available materials" of a different District Court judge in Boston, he found, based on confidential data that he was "privy to," "a slightly less than even chance of obtaining a reduced sentence" from another judge and, therefore, vacated the sentence and ordered the case be reassigned to another judge.

Hays v. Farwell*, 482 F. Supp. 2d 1180 (D. Nev. 2007). Under AEDPA review, trial/appellate counsel was ineffective for numerous reasons in case where the petitioner was convicted of four counts of sexual assault on a minor and four counts of lewdness with a minor for alleging sexually abusing his oldest daughter, who was then eight years old. While many of the petitioner's claims had not been presented in state court and there was no showing of cause and prejudice, "the default was forgiven based on his preliminary evidence demonstrating to this court that he is actually innocent of the charges against him." Most of the claims were reviewed de novo because they had not been raised in state court or had been procedurally barred in state court. The charges arose because the petitioner's wife, who "was an abusive and neglectful mother" of their five children, "wanted desperately to be released from the responsibility of her five young children and from her marriage." In order to achieve her goals, she "schooled and coached eight-year old Jennifer about adult sexual behavior and then threatened and coerced her into making accusations of sexual abuse against her father," who was not himself abusive to the children but "was unable, or unwilling to stop his wife's actions" in general. Before reaching the issues related to counsel, the court granted relief on the bases of: (1) insufficient evidence to support the convictions; (2) improper denial of a new trial when the daughter, who was no longer in her mother's custody, immediately confessed after the trial that her testimony was false and had been coerced; (3) double jeopardy; and (4) prosecutorial misconduct. Counsel was also held to be ineffective during trial for: (1) failing to request an evidentiary hearing on the motion for new trial in order to present the daughter's testimony concerning the recantation; (2) failing to seek an independent medical expert to challenge the testimony of the examining nurse, which would have resulted in testimony (supported even by the state's expert in habeas) that the photographs taken of the girls genitalia revealed no evidence of abuse or anything abnormal; (3) conceding guilt in closing argument; (4) failing to challenge the veracity or expertise of the social worker and the examining nurse called as state's witnesses and "merely enhancing the State's evidence by reinforcement"; (5) failing to object to the prosecutor's improper argument denigrating the presumption of innocence; and (6) failing to argue on the defendant's behalf at sentencing. The same counsel was also ineffective on direct appeal because counsel challenged only the sufficiency of the evidence and the denial of the motion for new trial. While the defendant personally filed a supplemental brief asserting additional errors, including the prosecutorial misconduct and double jeopardy, "[t]hose claims received little consideration by the state high court.” Because those claims were also meritorious, as reflected in the district court’s holdings, counsel was ineffective on appeal.

2004: Banyard v. Duncan, 342 F. Supp. 2d 865 (C.D. Cal. 2004). Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and object to the use of a prior assault conviction as a “serious felony” in sentencing the defendant to 25 years to life under the “Three Strikes Law” following a conviction for possession of a controlled substance. Appellate counsel was also ineffective for failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel advised the defendant to admit to two prior serious felony convictions even though the defendant’s second strike was not a “serious felony,” as required by state law. The second strike was for an assault conviction, “which arose from a domestic dispute and is the only arguably violent behavior in [the defendant’s] record.” The court found that the record on this offense revealed that, although the defendant was initially charged with a serious felony, he ultimately plead no contest only to assault, which was not a serious felony, and was sentenced to time served and probation. The court found that the state court erred in its judgment in finding that the defendant entered a no contest plea to a serious felony when the plea transcript revealed otherwise. Even if the alleged victim of the assault was believed, the “minor nature” of the defendant’s “assault conviction show that it was outside the heartland of what would normally constitute assault.” In addition, the “sentence of probation is not consistent with a desire to punish [the] crime as a serious felony.” Without any real analysis, the court held, under the AEDPA, that the state court’s decision was an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.”

Casey v. Frank*, 346 F. Supp. 2d 1000 (E.D. Wis. 2004). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in sexual assault case for failing to obtain the case file from the defendant’s previous attorney, which contained numerous witness statements undermining the credibility of the alleged victims and an alleged corroborating eyewitness. The defendant was initially charged in 1993 for sexually assaulting a girl in the neighborhood. He was represented by a public defender, who assigned an investigator to interview potential witnesses. The investigator took a number of statements that raised questions about the credibility of the alleged victim and the prosecutor ultimately dismissed the charge without prejudice. A year later, the defendant’s step-daughter alleged that the defendant sexually assaulted her, but the prosecutor brought no charges. In 1997, the stepdaughter alleged that the defendant had assaulted her in 1992 and that she witnessed the defendant assaulting the neighbor girl in the same time period. The defendant was charged with both assaults and retained counsel. Counsel requested two specific documents from the defendant’s prior counsel, but did not request the entire file, which contained numerous witness statements challenging the credibility of both alleged victims and an alleged corroborating eyewitness. He also failed to independently discover the witnesses that previously gave exculpatory statements. As discussed in the section on numerous deficiencies by trial counsel, the court found that trial counsel was ineffective. New appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to obtain the file and to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in a post-conviction motion. Unconstrained by the AEDPA because the state court did not address the issue raised before it, the court held that counsel knew the prior attorney’s file contained witness statements but chose to proceed without obtaining them. This conduct was unreasonable because “[a] lawyer may not make a strategic decision of such significance without conducting an investigation.” While counsel faced a filing deadline, counsel did not request an extension to obtain the file, when such requests were routinely granted, or discuss the matter with the defendant. Although the state court did not specifically address the prejudice analysis under Strickland and it was “debatable whether AEDPA applies to the court’s determination on this point,” id., the court applied the AEDPA standard. The state court’s determination was unreasonable because the court “turned a blind eye to the potential impact of the witnesses who gave statements” to prior counsel. Indeed, the state court failed even to mention most of the statements, much less analyze their potential significance. The critical issue in the case was credibility, and a number of the statements severely undercut the credibility of the state’s principal witnesses. . . .

Moreover, many of the statements would have been admissible and none were cumulative. Thus, there was “more than a negligible chance that the statements counsel failed to obtain would have affected the outcome of the trial.” Id.

C. State Cases

2024: Moore v. White, 907 S.E.2d 902 (Ga. 2024). In case involving, inter alia, a first-degree burglary charge, reversing the denial of habeas relief on claim that appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue on appeal that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failure to challenge the first-degree burglary count in the indictment. The indictment charging the first-degree burglary count alleged only that petitioner committed that crime by entering (without authority and with the intent to commit a felony) a “business.” It failed to allege an essential element of the crime: that petitioner entered a “dwelling house” or a building “designed for use as [a] dwelling.” The evidence at trial established that the crime occurred in a building that was originally designed as a residential home but was used as a business office by one of the victims for the restaurants he owned. The building contained only office furniture, and no evidence was presented indicating that anyone lived there. The jury instruction on the burglary charge referenced entry into a building or dwelling. No objection was made by trial counsel and appellate counsel did not raise trial counsel’s ineffectiveness on appeal. The statutory requirement that the defendant entered or remained within a type of “dwelling” of another person was found in the plain language of the statute. Thus, no reasonably competent lawyer would have failed to file a special demurrer challenging the first-degree burglary count and trial counsel performed deficiently in this omission. Absent trial counsel’s failure to file a special demurrer, it is reasonably probable that the result of the trial would have been more favorable to petitioner. Had it been filed, the demurrer should have been granted. If this had occurred, the State would have had the option to amend the first-degree burglary count to allege the essential element that petitioner entered a building “designed for use as the dwelling of another” when he entered the building that was originally designed as a residential home. Alternatively, the State could have charged petitioner with second-degree burglary by entering a building, or the State could have dismissed the charge. The Warden’s concessions in this case concerning the ineffectiveness allegations establish that it is reasonably probable that the State would have elected to charge petitioner with second-degree burglary. (The Warden, represented by the office of the Attorney General, admitted that the evidence at trial “d[id] not satisfy the statutory requirement for the offense of burglary in the first degree,” and that petitioner should have been convicted of and sentenced for second-degree burglary, rather than first-degree burglary.) Because petitioner showed the trial result was prejudiced by trial counsel's deficient performance, any deficiency in appellate counsel's failure to raise that ineffectiveness-of-trial-counsel claim prejudiced the appeal. And because there was "no good reason why a competent appellate lawyer would have failed to raise such an obviously meritorious claim under these circumstances," petitioner established that his appellate counsel was ineffective for not raising the issue of trial counsel's ineffectiveness.

Ortiz v. State*, 545 P.3d 1142 (Nev. 2024). Reversing denial of relief in case involving, inter alia, sexual assault charges where appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence for three of the six sexual assault counts petitioner was convicted of. Four of the sexual assault counts arose from an incident during which petitioner subjected the victim to intercourse in different sexual positions. Under existing precedent, a change in sexual position alone is insufficient to show that the resulting sexual acts constitute more than one sexual assault offense. Although appellate counsel raised that precedent to unsuccessfully challenge jury instructions, appellate counsel failed to challenge the multiple convictions for the same incident. "[T]he fact that appellate counsel identified the relevant authority but failed to make the argument that most logically flowed from it cannot be explained by the size limit placed on appellate briefs given that the opening brief fell approximately 2,000 words short of that limit." Appellate counsel's omission of a sufficiency challenge to the multiple convictions fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. And because the sufficiency challenge stood a reasonable probability of success had it been raised on appeal, petitioner was prejudiced by appellate counsel's omission of that challenge.

2023: Smith v. Chandler, 888 S.E.2d 171 (Ga. 2023). In child molestation case, appellate counsel was ineffective at the new trial stage and on appeal by failing to raise and prove a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failing to impeach the alleged victim's testimony with evidence that she had made prior inconsistent statements about the alleged abuse. The alleged victim, N.C., was the oldest daughter of petitioner's live-in girlfriend. N.C. was 14 years old when she informed her mother that petitioner had been "touching on" her for years. At petitioner's trial, N.C. testified that petitioner had licked her vagina and breasts and put something inside her vagina when he was on top of her. According to N.C.'s medical records, however, she made statements at the hospital that she had "only [been] touched" by petitioner, that "no sexual penetration occurred," and that she denied there was "any oral contact." Although trial counsel briefly cross-examined N.C. at trial, trial counsel did not ask her a single question about her statements at the hospital as reflected in the medical records. In the state habeas proceeding, trial counsel explained that the defense strategy was to show that N.C. was lying and that her accusations were made because she did not like petitioner.

Impeaching N.C. with her own prior statements and denials as reflected in the medical records would have strongly supported the defense strategy by putting evidence before the jury that she had been significantly inconsistent in her allegations of abuse, information that the jury did not otherwise have. Although the scope of cross-examination will rarely support a claim of deficient performance, under these circumstances, no reasonably competent defense attorney would have decided against presenting this impeachment evidence to cast doubt on the credibility of the State's key witness.

Because the entire case was built on N.C.'s statements about her alleged abuse, and on N.C.'s credibility, prejudice is established. Although the jury heard evidence that N.C. was sometimes untruthful, "it did not hear that, according to her medical records, she had been significantly inconsistent in the very allegations of abuse that formed the basis for the charges against petitioner." The warden's contention that prejudice was not shown because petitioner failed to show how N.C. would have responded to the impeachment is rejected.

Whatever N.C. might have testified on cross-examination could not have had the effect of erasing that evidence entirely: even if she could have cast doubt on or contested the accuracy of the statements, they remained the only evidence of her denying the allegations at issue and thus were still of substantial importance to a defense grounded in trying to discredit N.C. Under these circumstances, calling N.C. to testify at the habeas hearing was not necessary to establish prejudice.

Having shown that trial counsel provided ineffective assistance, petitioner further established that any deficiency in appellate counsel's failure to raise and prove that ineffectiveness-of-trial-counsel claim prejudiced petitioner's appeal. And deficiency by appellate counsel is shown by the record. The trial counsel ineffectiveness claim was clearly stronger than what appellate counsel did raise. No reasonable appellate attorney would have omitted the meritorious trial counsel ineffectiveness claim.

People v. Caldwell*, 242 N.E.3d 987 (Il. App. 2023). Appellate counsel performed deficiently by failing to raise the argument that petitioner's conviction for armed violence was not supported by the evidence. The conviction at issue required that petitioner have committed a felony not exempted by statute while armed with a dangerous weapon. The predicate felony in this case was aggravated fleeing which is committed when a person, having been given a visual or audible signal to stop by a peace officer in police uniform, flees from or attempts to elude the officer and drives at a rate of speed at least 21 miles per hour over the speed limit. In this case, the weapon had been discarded from the vehicle before it reached a speed of at least 21 miles per hour over the speed limit. The post-conviction court had denied relief on the claim, reasoning that appellate counsel could have reasonably concluded that petitioner was engaged in a continuous flight from the police, and that since petitioner reached a speed of 21 miles per hour over the speed limit at some point during that flight, the entire flight must be considered an "aggravated fleeing." But this interpretation of the statute, according to the appellate court, was not supported by the clear language of the statute that required that the felony be committed while armed with a dangerous weapon. Appellate counsel's decision on direct appeal not to argue for the reversal of the armed violence conviction "was objectively unreasonable under the facts of the case and any reasonable interpretation of the armed violence statute." The failure to raise the issue on direct appeal also was prejudicial because, had the argument been made, the only reasonably probable outcome was reversal of the conviction. "[A]lthough counsel is not required to brief every conceivable issue on appeal, he renders ineffective assistance where his appraisal of the merits of an issue is patently wrong, such that the raising of the issue would have resulted in a different result on appeal.” Regarding the contention that appellate counsel could not be deemed deficient for failing to raise a “novel” argument, the appellate court responded: “this is a simple sufficiency of the evidence issue. There is nothing novel about it.”

State v. Brodie*, 2023 WL 6798840 (Ohio App. Oct. 16, 2023). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise on appeal that defendant’s sentence was contrary to law in that it was based on an amended statute that was enacted after the date of defendant’s offenses.

2022: People v. Gerson, 296 Cal.Rptr.3d 576 (Cal.App. 2022). Granting motion to recall the remittitur based on ineffective assistance by appellate counsel where the state legislature passed a bill providing a potentially beneficial sentencing change after briefing was completed and appellate counsel failed to file a supplemental brief or a petition for rehearing asking for a remand for the trial court to consider the new law. The changed law required the sentencing court to impose a lower term where trauma experienced by the defendant contributed to the offense and aggravating circumstances did not outweigh mitigating circumstances. Although the sentencing court had considered and rejected evidence concerning defendant’s alleged bipolar disorder when ruling on defendant’s request for diversion, this did not establish that the sentencing court would have imposed the same sentence notwithstanding the new law. Notably, the probation report that was prepared well before the bill passed indicated that defendant had diagnosed mental disorders and suffered a traumatic brain injury during the crimes. At the time of his sentencing, however, “the trial court had no statutory reason to make, and [defendant] had no reason to seek, a finding that past psychological or physical trauma was a contributing factor to his commission of any of his offenses.”

Ray v. State*, 280 A.3d 627 (Del. 2022). Petitioner was entitled to post-conviction relief as to his felony-murder and related gun charge convictions as a result of trial counsels’ failure to object to an instruction that failed to embody an accurate statement of the law or to raise the error on direct appeal. None of the key actors in petitioner’s trial—not the trial judge, not the prosecutors, and not the defense lawyers—noticed that the instruction was outdated and no one compared the felony-murder instruction to the felony-murder count in the indictment or the text of the applicable felony-murder statute. Reasonably competent defense counsel would have spotted the error in the instruction. In addition, because the instruction introduced a theory of criminal liability, i.e., accomplice liability, that ran contrary to the defense’s theory of the case and was, according to the trial judge, unsupported by the record evidence, trial counsel’s failure to object to the instruction was objectively unreasonable. The failure of counsel to raise the issue on appeal could not have been the product of a considered judgment about its merit. “Because the instruction was so obviously incorrect and this issue was clearly stronger than those [petitioner’s] counsel actually presented on appeal,” the presumption that counsel was effective on appeal was overcome. Prejudice is found because the language of the erroneous instruction failed to clarify that the murder must have facilitated commission of the underlying felony (robbery), or “help[ed] to move the felony forward.” In addition, the instruction allowed the jury to convict petitioner if it found his accomplice had caused the death of the victim but the trial judge declined to provide the jury with complete accomplice liability instructions. (The co-defendant, who testified against petitioner, had been designated by the trial judge as an accomplice when the trial judge instructed the jury on consideration of accomplice testimony.)

2021: Phelps v. State, 317 So.3d 1207 (Fla. Ct. App. 2021). In felony-murder case, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the omission of the standard instruction on the presumption of innocence and the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in the jury charge. Because the appellate court had earlier recognized the same error to be fundamental, i.e., not forfeited by trial counsel's failure to object, appellate counsel's failure to raise the error in the direct appeal, fell outside the range of professionally acceptable performance. Prejudice is established because a new trial would have been granted had the claim been raised on appeal.

Bell v. State*, 173 N.E.3d 709 (Ind. Ct. App. 2021). In robbery-murder case where petitioner admitted to his prior convictions following his conviction on the new charges and was then sentenced as a habitual offender, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a claim that the trial court committed fundamental error by not advising petitioner of his right to a jury trial on the habitual offender allegation. "Had appellate counsel raised the invalid jury-trial waiver on direct appeal, this Court would have been obliged to reverse; and neither the State nor this Court could have disposed of the issue on direct appeal via a harmless error analysis. Thus, under Strickland's prejudice prong, the outcome of [petitioner's] direct appeal would have been different had the jury-waiver issue been raised."

Absher v. State*, 162 N.E.3d 1141 (Ind. Ct. App. 2021). In case where petitioner was convicted of three counts of child molestation, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a claim that the evidence was insufficient to support his conviction for the count involving petitioner having placed his mouth on the victim's sex organ. Although the victim never stated that such contact occurred, the prosecution relied on testimony from a forensic expert to support the charge. At best, however, the expert's testimony showed that it was merely within the realm of possibility that amylase found on the victim's underwear could have come from saliva, and if there was saliva it could have come from petitioner. That a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence was significant and obvious from the record is shown in part by trial counsel's unsuccessful motion for direct verdict on the count. The sufficiency of the evidence claim was also stronger than the single claim raised on appeal because that issue involved an unpreserved error by the trial court. Thus, the failure to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence could not be explained as a strategic choice. Prejudice is established. "Given the paucity of probative evidence, it is clearly more likely that the court on direct appeal would have concluded that the evidence was insufficient to support Count 2 and would have reversed [petitioner's] conviction on that count."

People v. Louis*, 200 A.D.3d 1008 (N.Y. App. Div. 2nd Dept. 2021). Where defendant was charged and convicted of rape, burglary and two counts of endangering the welfare of a child after DNA inculpated defendant many years after the offenses, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to contend on appeal that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to move to dismiss the misdemeanor child endangerment counts of the indictment as time-barred. Defendant established that there was no strategic basis for not seeking dismissal of the two counts.

People v. Davis*, 197 A.D.3d 659 (N.Y. App. Div. 2nd Dept. 2021). As conceded by the People, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to contend on appeal that the defendant's convictions of murder in the second degree, and the sentences imposed thereon, must be vacated, and those counts of the indictment dismissed, because those charges were inclusory concurrent counts of the conviction of murder in the first degree.

2020: In re Hampton, 261 Cal.Rptr.3d 907 (Cal.App. 2020). In second- degree murder case, appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue that petitioner was entitled to an instruction on heat of passion voluntary manslaughter based on the same facts petitioner relied on at trial to support instructing the jury on imperfect self-defense. Although the claim was raised for the first time in a second state habeas petition, the delay in bringing the claim was justified by petitioner's prompt filing of the successor petition after reviewing a recent appellate decision demonstrating his entitlement to such an instruction. Prior to reading that opinion, petitioner was unaware that he had a viable issue that his appellate counsel had failed to raise. Given petitioner's trial testimony, which described an attempted robbery by the victim and a struggle between the two men that resulted in petitioner shooting the victim with the victim's own gun, the trial court had a sua sponte duty to instruct on heat of passion voluntary manslaughter. As for prejudice, it was notable that the jury rejected the prosecution's theory of first-degree murder that was premised on the theory that petitioner shot the victim intentionally during a robbery of the victim. And although the jury did not accept petitioner's claim to have shot the victim in the actual (whether reasonable or unreasonable) belief he needed to do so to defend against imminent harm, "[t]here is at least a reasonable possibility the jury believed enough of [petitioner's] testimony to conclude that while he did not kill [the victim] in self-defense, either perfect or imperfect, his judgment was so obscured by intense emotion that he fired the gun without thinking, acting from passion rather than judgment." Because the omitted instructional issue had merit, appellate counsel was deficient in failing to raise it.

Julian v. State*, 302 So.3d 1048 (Fla. Ct. App. 2020). Petitioner was entitled to sentencing relief on his second degree murder conviction where appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a claim that the sentence was improperly reclassified as a life felony based on the jury's finding that a firearm was used in the killing but the jury verdict form failed to specify whether it was defendant or the codefendant who actually used the weapon.

People v. Jenkins*, 187 N.E.3d 111 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). Criminal convictions reversed where post-trial counsel failed to preserve issue that the trial court committed constitutional error by denying then-pro se petitioner free access to the transcript of his co-defendant's earlier trial, and then failed to raise the issue on appeal. No showing of prejudice was required on the Equal Protection Claim given that it was "impossible to measure, with any degree of precision, the actual negative impact" the denial of the transcript had on petitioner's preparation of his defense.

State v. Crossley*, 164 N.E.3d 585 (Ohio App. 2020). In case where defendant was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, improperly handling firearms in a motor vehicle, and receiving stolen property, trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to argue that the carrying a concealed weapon and improperly handling firearms offenses should have merged as allied offenses of similar import for purposes of sentencing. Although the trial court provided defense counsel advanced warning that it was not going to merge the offenses based on outdated caselaw, defense counsel failed to submit updated research prior to sentencing. “If counsel had submitted research showing the correct analysis from [more recent precedent] and argued for merger of the offenses using that analysis, there is a reasonable probability that the trial court would have merged the offenses, thus reducing [defendant’s] sentence by one year.” Similarly, appellate counsel was deficient in failing to raise the merger issue where the “record clearly indicated that the trial court’s allied offense determination was based on outdated caselaw that applied an obsolete allied offense analysis.” Had the issue been properly raised, it would have been successful.

Wilson v. State*, 157 N.E.3d 1163 (Ind. 2020). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a challenge under the state appellate rules to the appropriateness of juvenile petitioner’s 181-year sentence for crimes including a gang-related double murder. Indiana Appellate Rule 7(B) provided that “[t]he Court may revise a sentence authorized by statute if, after due consideration of the trial court’s decision, the Court finds that the sentence is inappropriate in light of the nature of the offense and the character of the offender.” At the post-conviction hearing, appellate counsel conceded both that an Appellate Rule 7(B) challenge was clearly stronger than the issues he raised on appeal and that at the relevant time he was unfamiliar with recent decisions from the state supreme court reducing long sentences for juvenile double murderers. Although requesting review of the sentence for appropriateness would have risked the appellate court imposing a greater sentence, “even an upward revision of his sentence by an appellate court would have put [petitioner] in no worse position since he was already going to die in prison.” Thus, on this record, appellate counsel performed deficiently in failing to raise the issue and his failure to do so prejudiced petitioner by depriving him of a fair appeal. Rather than remand for consideration of the Rule 7(B) request by the lower appellate court, for reasons of judicial economy the state supreme court performs the appropriateness analysis in the first instance and revises petitioner’s sentence to an aggregate 100 years.

State v. Fitzgerald*, 158 N.E.3d 664 (Ohio App. 2020). In case where defendant pleaded no contest to a charge involving driving while having used marijuana, and defendant’s initial appeal of the denial of his motion to suppress evidence was rejected because of appellate counsel’s failure to make the relevant hearing transcript a part of the appellate record, appellate counsel was found to have been ineffective. Although the officer who detained defendant properly stopped him for speeding, the State failed to produce sufficient “competent, credible evidence to show that the [officer] possessed a reasonable suspicion, based on specific articulable facts, that [defendant] was operating his vehicle under the influence of marijuana, necessary to detain him in order to conduct field sobriety testing.” In addition, the totality of the circumstances did not support the trial court’s determination that probable cause existed to arrest defendant for operating a vehicle under the influence, thereby rendering the evidence obtained as a result of the arrest inadmissible. Because the suppression motion was meritorious, defendant was prejudiced by appellate counsel’s deficient failure to file the hearing transcript.

People v. Shipp*, 155 N.E.3d 1138 (Ill. App. Ct. 2020). In case involving convictions for armed violence, unlawful possession of a controlled substance with intent to deliver, and unlawful possession of a firearm by a felon, where the physical evidence was obtained as a result of a pedestrian stop by police, affirming grant of post-conviction relief on claim that appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the pre-trial denial of a motion to suppress. Petitioner's act of walking in a residential area without behaving suspiciously or being tied to a crime was insufficient to support the stop. And a protective search was improper, because the only basis to believe that petitioner was armed was a subjective hunch or speculation. The State's contention that the police had an alternative valid ground to stop petitioner because he was illegally walking in the street failed for lack of supporting evidence concerning the condition of the sidewalk. In addition, nothing showed that appellate counsel declined to raise the matter because he believed that there was evidence that use of the sidewalks was practicable.

Miske v. State*, 142 N.E.3d 439 (Ind. Ct. App. 2020). In case involving charges of, inter alia, rape and criminal deviate conduct, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a challenge to two of the convictions based on the reasonable possibility that the jury impermissibly used the same evidence of deadly force to enhance all three, rather than just one, of the charged offenses. Appellate counsel's claim that he did not raise the issue to avoid the "ugly facts" of this case did not insulate him from a finding of deficient performance given that the facts were unavoidable in raising virtually any issue in this case. "Omitting it therefore served neither appellate counsel's stated strategy nor any other reasonable strategy." Further, there was a greater likelihood of success on the issue that wasn't raised than the ones appellate counsel did raise. And had he prevailed on the claim, petitioner's sentence would have been reduced by 45-years. "[Petitioner] has shown that he would have been entitled to relief on a common law double jeopardy claim challenging his multiple Class A felony enhancements, and that such relief would have resulted in a substantial reduction in his sentence, thereby showing by a preponderance of the evidence that his appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to raise the issue." For similar reasons, appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to challenge petitioner's convictions for strangulation, domestic battery, and battery on the ground that those acts were also the basis for the Class A felony enhancement and therefore the convictions could not stand independently.

In the Matter of the Adoption of a Child by C.J.*, 231 A.3d 765 (N.J. Super. App. Div. 2020). Appellate court sua sponte determines that appellate counsel was ineffective and new appellate counsel must be assigned in this contested stepparent adoption matter. "We write to emphasize that an attorney has an obligation to inform the court if he or she is not able to handle an assigned matter professionally due to a lack of expertise and inability to obtain sufficient knowledge to represent the client effectively, and is also unable to retain a substitute attorney knowledgeable in the area." Here, appointed appellate counsel filed a five-page brief that relied on an inapplicable statute and cited to no cases, failed to exercise his client's right to reply to respondent's brief, which had pointed out that the governing statute provided a different standard than that erroneously relied on by appellate counsel in the initial brief, and never questioned the lack of judicial findings in the transcripts supplied. "This level of representation is tantamount to a total lack of appellate counsel, a structural defect."

2019: Pantovich v. State, 832 S.E.2d 596 (S.C. 2019). In case where petitioner was charged with the murder of his ex-girlfriend and was convicted on the lesser-included offense of voluntary manslaughter, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that the trial court erred in failing to give the good character instruction requested by defense counsel. Petitioner defended against the murder charge by contending that his ex-girlfriend had been physically abusive throughout their years-long relationship and that he acted in self-defense when he struck her repeatedly with a baseball bat. He also called five character witnesses who testified to his kind and caring nature. Several of these witnesses further described observing the victim act violently toward petitioner with petitioner not reacting in kind. Defense counsel requested an instruction describing how good character evidence could be used. This included the provision that “Good character evidence alone may create a reasonable doubt as to the commission of the crime charged.” The prosecutor responded by requesting a balanced instruction allowing the jury to determine whether evidence constituted good character. The trial court ultimately gave no instruction on good character. The state supreme court observed that the law at the time of the appeal supported giving the instruction requested by the defense. It also acknowledged, however, that the “modern trend . . . has cast doubt upon the validity of charges instructing juries on how to interpret and use evidence.” The supreme court agrees with the State that the requested instruction constitutes an improper comment on the facts. But that does not mean that petitioner is not entitled to relief. “Fundamentally, a collateral review proceeding is ill-suited for announcing a new rule of substantive law pertaining to an underlying trial; appellate courts are to do so only in the rarest of circumstances.” The post-conviction court therefore did not err in finding deficient performance based on the law that existed at the time. As to prejudice, the majority of the state supreme court rejects that dissent’s contention that had appellate counsel raised the issue, it would not likely have prevailed given the trend to prohibit jury charges instructing juries on how to interpret and use evidence. “[T]he overwhelming weight of the precedent facing the appellate court on this issue in 2011 provided that failure to give the ‘good character alone’ charge was reversible error.” Notably, the state supreme court had upheld the precise charge just one year earlier. On remand, should good character evidence again be presented, petitioner would be entitled to a non-offending good character charge.

Cartwright v. Caldwell*, 825 S.E.2d 168 (Ga. 2019). Reversing denial of habeas relief in case involving murder and other crimes committed in connection with the killing where appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to present the evidence required to substantiate a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. On direct appeal, petitioner claimed that his trial counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to challenge Detective Tyner’s testimony that petitioner had not mentioned his alibi during his post-arrest police interview. Petitioner contended that during a preliminary hearing, Detective Spicer, the lead investigator in the case, testified that Detective Tyner told him that petitioner had mentioned his alibi during the interview. The claim was rejected for lack of prejudice given petitioner’s failure at the motion for new trial hearing to call Detective Spicer as a witness or introduce a transcript of the detective’s preliminary hearing testimony. In habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged that appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to present the Spicer evidence at the new trial hearing. In support, he introduced the relevant preliminary hearing transcript, as well as an affidavit from Detective Spicer reiterating that Detective Tyner had told him of petitioner providing an alibi and stating that neither trial nor appellate counsel ever contacted him. The habeas court denied the claim on the ground that petitioner did not establish prejudice given that he presented, albeit unsuccessfully, his alibi defense at trial through other witnesses. The Georgia Supreme Court first addressed the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim.

Capital Case*

Trial counsel never claimed to have had a strategic basis for not presenting Detective Spicer's account and the Georgia Supreme Court found that it appeared from the record that "trial counsel simply whiffed on this issue." It further noted that "[a]lthough the scope of cross-examination will rarely support a claim of deficient performance, no reasonably competent defense attorney would have decided to forgo presenting this evidence to cast doubt on the credibility of the State and one of its key witnesses and to bolster [petitioner's] alibi defense." As to prejudice, the Georgia Supreme Court finds that the habeas court's reliance on the alibi witnesses petitioner presented at trial to have "misse[d] the point for which the defense would have offered Detective Spicer's testimony. The detective's testimony would have been relatively insignificant to bolster the credibility of the five witnesses who testified that [petitioner] was at his family's apartment on the night of the shooting—but it was critical to rebut the State's vociferous assertion that [petitioner] invented that alibi after his post-arrest interview." Notably, "[t]he prosecutor had Detective Tyner testify repeatedly and definitively that [petitioner] had not mentioned his alibi in any way during the interview" and "the prosecutor then relied on that 'undisputed evidence' during closing argument to assert repeatedly that petitioner invented his alibi defense after the interview and then convinced his alibi witnesses to testify on his behalf" The invented alibi narrative was "particularly significant in light of the nature of the evidence against [petitioner]. There was no physical evidence linking him to the shooting, and although the State presented four witnesses who said that they saw [petitioner] shoot [the victim], the defense substantially impeached each of them." The Georgia Supreme Court concluded: "Given the less than overwhelming evidence of [defendant's] guilt, his affirmative defense of alibi supported by multiple witnesses, and the importance of Detective Tyner's testimony to the State's efforts to disprove that defense, we conclude that trial counsel's failure to introduce Detective Spicer's contrary testimony had a reasonable probability of affecting the outcome of the trial." Having found the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim meritorious, the only issue left was whether appellate counsel performed deficiently at the habeas hearing. The state supreme court found: "No reasonable attorney would have failed to present the readily available evidence from Detective Spicer, which was essential to proving trial counsel's ineffectiveness."

State v. Casey*, 823 S.E.2d 906 (N.C. App. 2019). In case involving charges of sexual offenses against a minor, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge on appeal testimony by a prosecution expert that the alleged victim had in fact been sexually abused. Petitioner lived with the alleged victim, Kim, and her mother, who was petitioner's girlfriend, for nine years before petitioner broke up with the girlfriend and moved out. Two days after petitioner moved out, Kim told her mother, who was upset by the break-up, that petitioner had molested her during the time he lived with them. (Kim was five years of age when petitioner moved in and fourteen years of age when he left.) There was no physical evidence corroborating Kim nor evidence that she had shared her account with anyone prior to telling her mother. At trial, a clinical psychologist testified on behalf of the State. During direct examination the expert opined that Kim showed signs of sexual abuse. Defense counsel objected to the testimony but was overruled. On cross-examination, the expert went further and made statements that Kim had in fact been sexually abused. Defense counsel did not move to strike those statements. The expert continued to essentially vouch for the victim's credibility in re-direct and re-cross-examination with no objection. Petitioner was convicted of the charges. On appeal, appellate counsel unsuccessfully challenged the opinions offered by the expert during direct examination, claiming they amounted to impermissible vouching. Appellate counsel made no argument concerning the statements made under cross-examination, re-direct and re-cross-examination. The failure to contest the admissibility of those statements constituted ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. (Petitioner's claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel is waived because it could have been raised by appellate counsel on direct appeal.) "We have reviewed the testimony of the State's expert and conclude that in the absence of physical evidence of sexual abuse, this testimony was not admissible under our Rules of Evidence." That one of the statements came on cross-examination did not mean appellate counsel could not raise a challenge on the ground that it would be barred as invited error. The response by the expert to defense counsel was outside the scope of counsel's question. But even if it was invited error, appellate counsel should have raised it as an ineffectiveness of trial counsel claim. The failure by appellate counsel to challenge the expert's statements was prejudicial.

Commonwealth v. Montalvo, 205 A.3d 274 (Pa. 2019) (2000 trial). Affirming grant of relief as to death sentence in post-conviction proceedings based on ineffective assistance by trial counsel in failing to object to statements and instructions undermining the jury's ultimate responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a death sentence, and ineffective assistance by appellate counsel in failing to raise trial counsel's deficient performance on appeal. On six occasions during the opening statements and closing arguments of the penalty phase of trial, the prosecutor referred to the jury's verdict as a "recommendation." During defense counsel's closing argument, the following exchange occurred:

DEFENSE COUNSEL: So don't look at him and say I hate the guy, he's got to get the death sentence. That is not what this is all about. And [the prosecutor] certainly gave an impassioned plea. But you don't have to kill anybody. You don't have to kill anybody.

PROSECUTOR: I object to that argument. They are not doing it. They are recommending the sentence.

THE COURT: Objection sustained. That is an improper statement, ladies and gentlemen. I am the sentencing person. Your decision is a recommendation to the court.

Later that same day, the trial court contradicted itself and included in its final charge to the jury the following statement: "Remember that your verdict is not merely a recommendation. It actually fixes the punishment of life or death, life imprisonment or death." The trial court did not acknowledge the inconsistent statement made hours earlier or convey to the jury that its prior statement was erroneous. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court finds that this case demonstrates a "textbook example of Caldwell error." The final charge to the jury did not cure the error because it failed to clarify that the earlier contradictory statement was erroneous. Trial counsel had no strategic reason "for failing to object to arguments and court instructions that constituted clear violations of both federal and state constitutions." Trial counsel's belief, as noted in the post-conviction proceeding, that the jury knew what it was doing because of explanations of the process given during voir dire was "unsupported by the record and [] insufficient as a matter of law, considering the pervasive nature of the misstatements of law conveyed to the jury during closing argument." And Montalvo was prejudiced "by trial counsel's inaction when the jury was led to believe that its sentencing verdict was not final and that the trial court would determine whether [Montalvo] received a sentence of life imprisonment or death.” Notably, this was not a case where the jury found only aggravating circumstances, thereby mandating a death sentence. Instead, the jury found both aggravating and mitigating circumstances, which it was required to weigh to determine the appropriate sentence. “Because the jury was misled regarding its most fundamental role in determining the sentence of life imprisonment or death, we conclude that the prejudice prong of the ineffectiveness test is satisfied.” In addition, the state supreme court concluded “as a matter of law that appellate counsel lacked a reasonable strategic basis in failing to raise the Caldwell claim on appeal.” Twenty of the thirty-seven claims raised on appeal involved allegations of ineffective assistance by trial counsel but none of the issues raised “involved a clear constitutional error warranting the grant of appellate relief, as does the Caldwell issue.” Such an approach to appellate advocacy does not reflect a reasonable strategy that furthered Montalvo’s interests. For the reasons given in regard to the trial IAC claim, appellate counsel’s failure to raise the Caldwell issue on appeal was prejudicial.

Hounihan v. State*, 592 S.W.3d 343 (Mo. 2019). In case involving, inter alia, conviction for felony driving while revoked, appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue there was insufficient evidence to enhance petitioner’s driving while revoked misdemeanor to a felony because the evidence did not establish (1) petitioner was represented by counsel or filed a written waiver of counsel before his prior municipal court conviction and (2) whether petitioner had served more than 10 days on either of the prior convictions for driving while revoked. In an affidavit submitted in post-conviction proceedings, appellate counsel conceded he should have raised the insufficiency of evidence argument on appeal. His failure to do so was not based on strategy, but instead on his “mistaken understanding of the quantum of proof necessary” for the trial court to enhance petitioner’s driving while revoked misdemeanor to a felony. The lower court nevertheless denied relief, implying that appellate counsel’s failure to raise the claim was reasonable because the issue was overlooked by the trial court, the prosecuting attorney, and trial counsel. “But appellate counsel’s failure to recognize and raise this issue on appeal is not reasonable merely because the issue was overlooked by others at trial.” In finding that a reasonably competent attorney should have reviewed both the relevant law and the record and recognized this meritorious claim, it is noted that the claim was ascertainable after review of one statute — the statute that defines the crime of driving while revoked — and one exhibit — the sole evidence concerning petitioner’s prior driving while revoked convictions. Further, reasonable counsel would not have chosen to forgo the meritorious sufficiency of evidence claim to focus on other claims. And, in fact, the appellate brief was well below the word maximum under the relevant court rule. “Accordingly, appellate counsel’s failure to raise the sufficiency of evidence claim constituted deficient performance.” Prejudice is established because, had appellate counsel raised the sufficiency of evidence claim, the driving while revoked conviction likely would have been vacated, and the case would have been remanded for resentencing.

State v. Hardnett*, 2019 WL 3493876 (Ohio Ct. App. July 31, 2019). Granting motion to reopen appeal based on appellate counsel’s ineffective assistance in failing to argue on appeal a sentencing error that was conceded by the State in the reopening proceeding.

2018: Lopez v. Junior, 259 So.3d 202 (Fla. Ct. App. 2018). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to seek discretionary review in the Florida Supreme Court so that petitioner could receive the benefit of a case then pending in the Florida Supreme Court if it resolved an issue present in petitioner's case in a favorable manner. Petitioner was convicted of attempted first-degree murder of one victim and kidnapping of and aggravated battery upon another. The jury found that with regard to the attempted first-degree murder he used and discharged a firearm, and with regard to the kidnapping and aggravated battery, petitioner actually possessed a firearm. Petitioner was sentenced to 25 years on the attempted murder count with a 25-year mandatory minimum; 30 years on the kidnapping count, with a 10-year mandatory minimum, and 10 years on the aggravated battery count with a 10-year mandatory minimum. The trial court determined that under the then-controlling decision in Morgan v. State, 137 So.3d 1075 (Fla. 3d DCA 2014), each of the mandatory minimum sentences had to be served consecutively – aggregate mandatory minimum sentence of 45 years. Petitioner appealed, represented by counsel. Appellate counsel challenged the consecutive nature of the mandatory minimum sentences, acknowledging that Morgan was in conflict with another District's decision, and stating that the other decision represented a better analysis. Counsel also requested that if this court affirmed, it certify conflict with the other decision. The District Court of Appeal for the Third District affirmed the conviction and sentence, citing to Morgan. But before the District Court released its opinion in petitioner's case, the Florida Supreme Court had already entered a stay of proceedings in Morgan pending disposition of its review. Appellate counsel should have sought, but did not, discretionary review in the Florida Supreme Court in order to place petitioner in the pipeline so he would receive the benefit of a favorable resolution of Morgan. The Florida Supreme ultimately Court approved the other District's decision, and quashed the decision in Morgan, holding that consecutive mandatory minimum sentences are not required, but are permissible, under the 10/20/Life statute. Appellate counsel then filed a new timely but successive habeas corpus petition alleging his own ineffectiveness. The State conceded that petitioner was entitled to relief on the merits. Both deficient performance and prejudice are clear – had appellate counsel sought discretionary review, there is a reasonable probability that the Florida Supreme Court would have done what it did in Morgan, entered a stay and placed petitioner in the pipeline, giving him the opportunity to obtain the same outcome. The District Court of Appeal granted the petition, reversed the portion of the sentencing order directing that the mandatory minimum sentences be served consecutively, and remanded for a resentencing hearing.

Marshall v. State*, 241 So.3d 969 (Fla. Ct. App. 2018). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge on appeal the trial court's oral pronouncement that two of the sentences imposed were to run consecutively. Petitioner was convicted of armed robbery based on the robbery of an acquaintance at gunpoint. The court sentenced him to 33 years in prison as a habitual violent offender. As part of that sentence, the court imposed a 15-year mandatory-minimum term. It also imposed a ten-year mandatory-minimum term for the possession of a firearm during the robbery. Over defense counsel's objection, the court orally imposed the two mandatory-minimum terms to run consecutively. Petitioner's conviction was affirmed on appeal. Under state law, the consecutive sentences were not permitted. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to move to correct the sentence, and if that failed, raising the issue on direct appeal. Although the written judgment imposed the two mandatory-minimum terms concurrently, petitioner was nevertheless prejudiced because under state law the oral pronouncement of sentence controls.

Marshall v. State*, 240 So.3d 111 (Fla. Ct. App. 2018). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge a jury instruction where a recent case from another district had found the same instruction to be flawed. Petitioner was charged with second degree murder for strangling a victim to death in the presence of two bystanders and police who arrived at the scene with guns drawn. The trial court instructed the jury on the elements of second degree murder and, without objection, to the lesser included offenses of manslaughter by act and manslaughter by culpable negligence. The jury convicted petitioner of second degree murder and the court sentenced him to 45 years in prison. Petitioner appealed, but his counsel did not challenge the validity of the manslaughter by act jury instruction, even though another District Court of Appeal decided during the pendency of the appeal that the standard manslaughter by act jury instruction erroneously suggested that intent to kill was an element of that crime (that case was Montgomery I). The District Court of Appeal affirmed petitioner's conviction. Following the affirmance, the Florida Supreme Court affirmed Montgomery I in State v. Montgomery, 39 So.3d 252, 260 (Fla. 2010) (Montgomery II). Petitioner alerted his appellate counsel of the decision, and appellate counsel acknowledged his failure to challenge the instruction was an oversight, and sent petitioner a motion for post-conviction relief alleging IAC of both trial counsel and appellate counsel for petitioner to file pro se. The trial court denied the motion on the ground that trial counsel could not have anticipated the holding in Montgomery I, and that the motion was an improper mechanism for raising ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. Petitioner later filed a post-conviction petition using the proper mechanism for raising a claim of IAC of appellate counsel. Petitioner alleged that appellate counsel's ineffectiveness in failing to raise the instructional issue prejudiced him by causing him to miss an opportunity to be placed in the Montgomery pipeline and thereafter to obtain relief under Montgomery II. While the petition was pending, petitioner filed a notice of supplemental authority and moved to stay the consideration of the petition pending resolution by the Florida Supreme Court of Haygood v. State, which was to consider whether a trial court committed fundamental error by giving the flawed manslaughter by act instruction where the manslaughter by negligence instruction was also given. The District Court of Appeal denied the stay motion and denied his petition. The Florida Supreme Court then decided in Haygood v. State, 109 So.3d 735, 736 (Fla. 2013), that it was fundamental error to give the improper manslaughter by act instruction even where the manslaughter by negligence instruction was also given, and where the defendant was convicted of a crime not more than one step removed from manslaughter (such as second degree murder) and the evidence supported a finding of manslaughter by act but not by negligence, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. Petitioner filed another pro se habeas petition, acknowledging that it was successive but arguing that it would be manifest injustice not to grant it. The District Court of Appeal agreed, and granted relief. The fact that petitioner choked the victim over a period of at least four minutes, resisting attempts by the victim, two bystanders, and the police to stop him, demonstrated that the evidence in the case did not reasonably support a finding that the victim's death occurred due to culpable negligence. Giving the jury the erroneous manslaughter by act instruction constituted fundamental error. Although at the time of the filing of the direct appeal in his case, no appellate court had held that the standard instruction for manslaughter by act was erroneous, such a case was decided while petitioner's case was pending on appeal. The District Court of Appeal compared petitioner's case to another case, Nieves v. State, in which the issue was raised on appeal at the time Montgomery I was pending, and in which Nieves eventually obtained relief – reversal and remanding for a new trial. The court here determined that if petitioner “had been placed in the Montgomery pipeline when this Court affirmed his conviction and sentence for second degree murder on direct appeal, we find it extremely likely, if not virtually certain, that [he] ultimately would have been granted the new trial that he now seeks in his instant petition.” Therefore, the court found appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to file a supplemental brief citing to Montgomery I, and that petitioner was prejudiced by that failure.

Calhoun v. State of Kansas*, 426 P.3d 519 (Kan. Ct. App. 2018). In case involving charges of multiple offenses allegedly committed by movant and three others, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the instruction that the jury could convict movant of the aiding and abetting specific intent crimes if it found that the specific intent crimes were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the intended crime of aggravated robbery. Appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise the trial IAC claim on direct appeal. Movant was convicted by a jury of aggravated kidnapping, aggravated criminal sodomy, attempted voluntary manslaughter, aggravated burglary, criminal threat, two counts of aggravated robbery, and two counts of aggravated battery. The charges arose from an incident in which movant and three others broke into a family’s home, demanded money, pointed a gun at and threatened to kill a baby who was present, kicked, stomped on, and shot the father, and raped, sodomized, beat the mother and forced her to perform oral sex. Movant testified that he was at the house, that he and the others planned to rob the father who had sold him marijuana in the past, and that he participated in the robbery. He denied that he had committed any of the violent crimes against the mother, father, and baby. A minor who participated in the crimes testified that movant actively participated in the sexual assaults of the mother and punched the father in the head. After movant’s convictions were affirmed on direct appeal, he filed a motion raising numerous claims, including ineffective assistance by trial and appellate counsel. The motion was denied and he appealed. The appellate court pointed out that Kansas state law (State v. Overstreet, 200 P.3d 427 (2009)) requires that in order to be convicted of a specific intent crime under an aiding and abetting theory, the defendant must have the same specific intent as the principal. Thus, when a defendant is charged with specific intent crimes under an aiding and abetting theory, the jury must be given the “same mental culpability” instruction, rather than the “foreseeability” instruction, which is only applicable to aiding and abetting general intent crimes. Here, trial counsel failed to object to the instruction that the jury could convict movant of the aiding and abetting specific intent crimes (aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat) if it found that the specific intent crimes were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the intended crime (aggravated robbery). Appellate counsel also failed to raise the trial IAC claim on direct appeal. Both trial and appellate counsel’s performance was deficient in this way, and both were prejudicial, given that “the prosecutor’s entire rebuttal during closing arguments hinged on telling the jury that they could convict [movant] of all of the crimes charged because they were reasonably foreseeable consequences of the intended robbery,” 426 P.3d at 531, that the jury asked questions about the reasonable foreseeability portion of the aiding and abetting instructions, and that the jury acquitted movant of rape and three counts of aggravated criminal sodomy (indicating that it did not believe he aided and abetted all of the crimes). [NOTE: Jurors had provided statements indicating that half the jurors believed he was guilty of all, and half the jurors believed he was guilty of none, one of the jurors had a planned vacation, and they decided to convict of some and acquit of some. The appellate court ruled that it was precluded from considering these statements, but it appears nevertheless that they may have had some effect on the court.] There was a real possibility that the jury would not have found movant guilty of aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat if it had been properly instructed. Under Kansas law, if a movant makes more than conclusory contentions and an evidentiary basis supports movant’s claims, the movant is entitled to an evidentiary hearing. In addition, when ineffective assistance of counsel and prejudice is readily apparent from the motion, files, and records of the movant's case, the appellate court has exercised its de novo review and reversed the defendant's conviction and remanded for a new trial without first remanding for an evidentiary hearing. Here, the court decided that this was such a case. The court thus reversed his aggravated kidnapping, attempted voluntary manslaughter, and criminal threat charges and remanded for a new trial.

Seals v. State*, 551 S.W.3d 653 (Mo. Ct. App. 2018). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue for reversal of a conviction that was linked to a separate conviction that had been reversed. Movant was convicted by a jury of second-degree domestic assault, third-degree domestic assault, and attempted victim tampering under state law. On appeal, the Missouri Court of Appeals reversed the conviction on the first count and remanded for a new trial because the trial court plainly erred by failing to instruct the jury about self-defense on that count. The movant then filed an unsuccessful motion alleging, inter alia, IAC of appellate counsel. On appeal, the appellate court agreed with movant that appellate counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to request that the Court of Appeals reverse and remand his conviction for attempted victim tampering as well as his conviction for second-degree domestic assault. Movant argued that the attempted victim tampering charge was based on the assertion that movant had attempted to prevent the victim from assisting in the prosecution of the first charge, domestic assault in the second degree. Because the Court of Appeals reversed the first charge based on faulty jury instructions, and the conviction for victim tampering was contingent upon there being a victim of second-degree domestic assault, the conviction for victim tampering should also have been reversed and appellate counsel should have raised that issue. Appellate counsel conceded that he had no strategic reason for failing to raise that issue, and the claimed error was sufficiently serious that it created a reasonable probability that had it been raised, the outcome of the appeal would have been different. Movant's conviction and sentence for attempted victim tampering were vacated and remanded for a new trial.

State v. Asadi-Ousley*, 120 N.E.3d 520 (Ohio Ct. App. 2018). In case involving convictions of two counts of rape, felonious assault, and two counts of kidnapping, based on the sexual assault of a victim more than seven years prior to the trial, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that trial counsel was deficient in not moving to dismiss the charge of felonious assault based on the expiration of the six-year statute of limitations. After the convictions were affirmed on appeal, appellant had applied to the Court of Appeals to reopen the direct appeal in order to raise the argument that his appellate counsel had been ineffective. Although the state conceded the error, it argued that appellant's IAC claim should be rejected on the basis of waiver. The Court of Appeals granted the application and remanded for the trial court to reverse the felonious assault conviction. The court held that this is not a case where appellant pleaded guilty to the offense where the SOL had run (such a plea constitutes a waiver), or where appellant absconded and purposely avoided prosecution. The fact that appellant sought to avoid identification by coming upon the victim from behind did not constitute behavior tolling the SOL. Appellant was prejudiced as a result of his conviction of this crime even though his sentence was ordered to run concurrently with his sentences on the other charges; "a defendant is prejudiced by having more convictions than are authorized by law." 2018 WL 5734660 at *6 (internal quotation omitted). Appellant was denied the effective assistance of appellate counsel by counsel's failure to argue ineffective assistance of trial counsel on this issue. Had trial counsel moved to dismiss the felonious assault charge, the charge would have been dismissed; had appellate counsel raised this issue on appeal, there is a reasonable probability the outcome of the appeal would have been different as to the felonious assault conviction.

State v. Baskins*, 818 S.E.2d 381 (N.C. Ct. App. 2018). In drug trafficking case, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to argue all of the grounds on which the stop of petitioner’s vehicle and the search thereof was unlawful. Although appellate counsel did raise the lawfulness of the search and seizure, appellate counsel did not challenge the trial court’s finding that the arresting officers stopped and searched the vehicle because the vehicle had an inspection violation, even though the arresting officers had no information regarding the vehicle’s inspection status at the time of the stop and search. The trial court had denied petitioner’s motion to suppress on the basis of three independent grounds, so appellate counsel was tasked with reviewing the sufficiency – both legal and evidentiary – for each of those grounds. But appellate counsel had failed to do so, only mentioning the issue briefly in her reply brief after the state noted that she had not challenged it. This performance was deficient. The error was prejudicial because, had appellate counsel challenged the findings of fact, there is a reasonable probability that the appellate court would have concluded that the trial court’s finding that the stop was initiated because of the inspection violation was not supported by competent evidence.

2017: Weitz v. State of Florida, 229 So. 3d 872 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2017). The District Court of Appeal granted relief on claim raised in postconviction petition that appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue that petitioner’s dual convictions for transmitting material harmful to minors and unlawfully using a two-way communication device under two separate state statutes violated double jeopardy. Under Florida law, a double jeopardy violation constitutes fundamental error that may be raised for the first time on appeal; so the failure to raise the violation when it exists may be ineffective assistance. At the time appellate counsel filed the initial brief in the direct appeal, the Florida courts applied the same-elements test under Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), to hold that multiple convictions under the two-way communication device statute and three other statutes, all similar to the transmitting material harmful to minors statute, violated double jeopardy when the charges arose from the same episode, as they did here. The court noted that “[a]lthough [the cases interpreting the three other statutes] did not address a charge of transmitting harmful material to a minor . . . the question of whether the statutory elements of that offense are subsumed by the statutory elements of unlawful use of a two-way communications device is so close to the questions answered [in those other cases] that a reasonable appellate lawyer would have raised the argument in [petitioner’s] direct appeal.” This was particularly true because the trial lawyer stated on the record during petitioner’s sentencing that the double jeopardy argument should be raised on appeal. The error was prejudicial because it “compromised the appellate process to such a degree as to undermine confidence in the correctness of the result” under Florida law. [Note that there is no reference to Strickland or the Sixth Amendment in this case.]

Johnson v. State of Florida*, 226 So.3d 908 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2017). District Court of Appeal of Florida granted writ of habeas corpus and vacated petitioner’s conviction and sentence for second-degree murder on the grounds of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. The District Court of Appeal had reversed petitioner’s codefendant’s conviction on appeal on the basis that the trial court erred in denying the codefendant’s motion to suppress evidence, because the denial resulted in manifest injustice. It was therefore ineffective assistance for defendant's appellate counsel not to have raised this issue on appeal. "Failing to grant [defendant] the same relief afforded to [codefendant], under virtually identical circumstances, would be an 'incongruous and manifestly unfair' result."

Williams v. State*, 215 So.3d 642 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2017). Where the trial court denied defendant's motion to withdraw his guilty plea and defendant's two motions for post-conviction relief in a single omnibus order, appellate counsel was ineffective on appeal from those denials for failing to argue that the motions for post-conviction relief had been premature given the absence of a final judgment due to the then-pending motion to withdraw the guilty plea. The remedy is remand with directions to vacate the portion of the prior order which denied the motions for post-conviction relief and entry of an order dismissing the motions without prejudice.

2016: Daugherty v. State, 52 N.E.3d 885 (Ind. Ct. App. 2016). Appellate counsel was ineffective in multiple charge case for failing to argue that the defendant's aggregate sentence of 33 years exceeded the statutory limitation for consecutive sentences arising out of a single episode of criminal conduct. The defendant was stopped for driving under the influence and found to have weapons in the car. He was tased during the arrest and taken to the hospital where he threatened officers. Under the statute, which limits the trial court's ability to impose consecutive sentences arising out of a single episode, the trial court was prohibited from imposing an aggregate sentence of more than 30 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to raise this issue as "a single episode includes 'a connected series of offenses that are closely related in time, place, and circumstance.'" Even though there was a change of location, this was a single episode. Prejudice established.

Whitfield v. State*, 202 So.3d 456 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2016). Defendant was denied the effective assistance of appellate counsel where appellate counsel failed to raise a double jeopardy challenge to defendant's convictions for domestic battery by strangulation and battery of a person sixty-five years or older. (Both crimes occurred during the infliction of multiple crimes by defendant on his grandmother.) The dual convictions violated double jeopardy because both domestic battery by strangulation and battery on a person sixty-five or older are aggravated forms, or higher degrees, of simple battery. The remedy was remand with directions to vacate the "lesser" offense based here on levels for scoresheet purposes.

Branton v. State*, 187 So. 3d 382 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2016). Appellate counsel ineffective in robbery resentencing case for failing to assert the trial court's error in refusing to consider evidence of the defendant's rehabilitation and mitigation during the 10-year period from the time of the initial sentencing to the resentencing. While the trial court "applauded" the defendant for his exceptional behavior in confinement, including completion of vocational and drug programs, and his Christian "redemption," the court stated that it was precluded from considering evidence from the period after the initial sentence and reimposed the 40-year sentence initially given. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert this error because Florida law is clear that in a new sentencing proceeding there is a "clean slate" and the court should proceed "de novo on all issues."

Capital Case*

Prejudice established as the trial court refused to consider the defendant's case in mitigation prior to imposing the sentence.

Grant v. State*, 189 So. 3d 878 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2016). Appellate counsel ineffective in attempted armed robbery with a firearm for failing to assert as error on appeal the trial court's failure to instruct on the lesser-included offense of attempted armed robbery with a weapon. Counsel's conduct was deficient as this issue had been preserved at trial. Prejudice also established as automatic reversal would have been required on direct appeal for the failure to charge the lesser-included offense. New trial granted.

Taylor v. Metoyer*, 788 S.E.2d 376 (Ga. 2016). In case involving convictions for multiple armed robberies, appellate counsel, who represented defendant in a motion for new trial and in the ensuing appeal, was ineffective for: (1) raising untenable claims on appeal; (2) inadequately raising an IAC of trial counsel claim based on trial counsel's failure to investigate defendant's report to trial counsel that the testifying co-defendants had asserted during Jackson-Denno hearings that their police statements implicating themselves and defendant were untrue; and (3) failing to competently assert that trial counsel was unprepared for trial. Regarding the Jackson-Denno hearings claim, appellate counsel presented a single sentence argument on appeal and failed to support the claim with either the transcripts from the hearings or an explanation of what they would have shown. As to trial counsel's lack of preparation, appellate counsel focused solely on the amount of time spent with defendant pre-trial and made no showing of prejudice. A stronger claim of ineffectiveness had been available to appellate counsel. In addition to the failure to obtain the transcripts to use as impeachment, trial counsel also failed to cross-examine the testifying co-defendants on both the actual terms of their plea agreement and on the fact that the two men had misrepresented the nature of their agreements with the State. (Both plea agreements reflected that the State anticipated future cooperation at defendant's trial from both men and that, following that cooperation, the State would not oppose sentence remolding. At trial, however, both men repeatedly denied that they had received "a special deal" or "special treatment" in exchange for their testimony.) Given that the key evidence against defendant was the testimony of the co-defendants, prejudice was shown.

Commonwealth v. Rosado*, 150 A.3d 425 (Pa. 2016). Filing an appellate brief which abandons all preserved issues in favor of unpreserved ones is ineffective assistance by appellate counsel per se. "[E]rrors which completely foreclose appellate review amount to a constructive denial of counsel and thus ineffective assistance of counsel per se, whereas those which only partially foreclose such review are subject to the ordinary Strickland/Pierce framework." (Here, appellate counsel mistakenly believed issues could be preserved through an attachment to the filing specifying the issues raised. This resulted in the waiver of the only issue appellate counsel sought to argue on appeal.)

Commonwealth v. Williams, 141 A.3d 440 (Pa. 2016). In triple murder case, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness in not cross-examining the prosecution's expert or calling a defense expert concerning inconsistencies between the key prosecution witness's testimony and the forensic evidence. At trial, the prosecution relied primarily on the testimony of White, a purported eyewitness to two of the murders and an accomplice in all three. White testified that the three victims had arranged to purchase weapons from Williams, the leader of a gang that sold weapons and drugs. Williams had planned to rob the men when they met to receive the guns. When the groups met, Williams and members of the gang, including White, held the victims at gunpoint and demanded their money. After the purchase money was turned over, Williams continued to demand additional money from the three victims. When one of the men admitted he had additional money at another location, he was taken by Williams and two other gang members to retrieve the money. Williams and the gang members returned without the victim. White testified that one of the two gang members who accompanied Williams informed White that Williams had shot the victim in the head. The remaining two victims were then loaded in the back of a stolen van. Williams and another gang member were in the back with the victims and continuing to demand more money. White was in the front passenger seat. White testified that he saw Williams shoot the smallest of the three victims in the face while the victim looked at Williams and the gun. A short time later, the van slowed and this victim was thrown out of the back of the van into the street. White then saw Williams put his gun in the face of the remaining victim. White turned to face front and heard two gunshots and the back of the van open. When he next looked back, the third victim was gone, presumably also thrown out of the van. When the victims were later found by authorities, none were in a street but instead on a sidewalk or in a driveway. And each had sustained gunshot wounds but none had other injuries to their bodies, such as bruises or abrasions. Defense counsel did not ask any of the prosecution's expert witnesses a single question. Counsel for one co-defendant did cross-examine two of these witnesses about the absence of non-gun-related injuries to the victims but the witnesses opined that the lack of additional injuries did not establish that the victims had not fallen. Defense counsel argued to the jury that common sense showed that the location and conditions of the bodies were inconsistent with White's account of what occurred. In post-conviction proceedings, defense counsel conceded he had no strategic reason for failing to consult with or present testimony from a medical or forensic expert in order to highlight the problems with White's testimony. Post-conviction counsel presented testimony from an expert in the field of homicide investigation, crime scene analysis and blood spatter analysis. This expert, who was credited by the post-conviction court, opined that the medical and forensic evidence was inconsistent with White's testimony. In finding that this expert's testimony would have been helpful to defendant at trial, the state supreme court noted in particular the expert's opinion that "the blood flow evidence was [] wholly incompatible with White's testimony that the victims were shot and thrown from a moving van." Additionally, the expert testified that none of the victims sustained gunshot wounds consistent with White's testimony that the victim was looking at the shooter's gun when he was shot. As for prejudice, it was noted that although White was subject to significant impeachment, "the cross-examination of White left his story about the three murders at issue largely unscathed." If the jury believed the post-conviction expert's testimony, coupled with other evidence impeaching White's credibility, it is likely the jury would have acquitted defendant of the three murders. Finally, the record supported the post-conviction court's "factual findings and legal conclusion that appellate counsel had no reasonable basis for failing to raise the claim of trial counsel's ineffectiveness for not calling an expert to testify or cross-examining the Commonwealth's experts regarding the blood flow evidence and gunshot wound evidence." (Appellate counsel testified that he had no independent recollection of the appeal but that confining his claims to those appearing on the record, as occurred in defendant's appeal, was consistent with his practice at the relevant time.) Prejudice is established because there was a substantial likelihood that the outcome of defendant's appeal would have been different if the trial counsel ineffectiveness claim had been raised there.

State v. Johnson*, 60 N.E.3d 661 (Ohio Ct. App. 2016). Appellate counsel ineffective in passing bad checks and theft case for failing to assert on appeal the trial court's error in failing to apply new sentencing laws that had been in effect for more than six months when the defendant was sentenced. Even though trial counsel had not raised the objection, appellate counsel's conduct was deficient because compliance with the sentencing law was mandated regardless of whether an objection had been raised. Prejudice was also established as the court's charge and verdict forms under the old law made 17 of the 18 counts of a more serious degree than they were under the new sentencing law. The higher degrees allowed for imposition of greater punishment. Remanded for new sentencing on the 17 counts impacted.

2015: Paul v. State, 183 So. 3d 1154 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2015). Appellate counsel ineffective in 2009 murder case for failing to assert on appeal that the trial court fundamentally erred in giving the manslaughter by intentional act instruction disapproved of in State v. Montgomery, 39 So. 3d 252 (Fla 2010). Defendant's brother, who was his codefendant tried separately, raised this issue on appeal. While the District Court of Appeals denied relief, the brother appealed to the Florida Supreme Court, which accepted jurisdiction. Following its decision in Haygood v. State, 109 So. 3d 735 (Fla. 2013) holding that this instruction was reversible error in the circumstances of this case, the brother's case was remanded to the District Court of Appeals for reconsideration and the brother was granted a new trial. The defendant's counsel did not raise this issue on appeal. The issue was first raised in a petition for writ of habeas corpus before the District Court of Appeals, which was denied without opinion. A second habeas, denied without opinion, was filed before the District Court after the brother was granted a new trial. The issue of trial counsel's ineffectiveness for failing to object to the instruction was timely raised in post-conviction. Relief was denied because no prejudice could be established given the past two denials of relief. Exercising its power to reconsider and grant relief to avoid "manifest injustice," relief was granted.

2014: Molina v. State, 150 So. 3d 1280 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2014). Appellate counsel was ineffective in second-degree murder case for failing to assert on appeal the trial court's erroneous jury instructions on the elements of manslaughter by act. A case directly on point, State v. Montgomery, 39 So. 3d 252 (Fla. 2010), was decided more than a year prior to the direct appeal. While a different district had reached a contrary conclusion, at minimum, the court would have at least certified a conflict. New trial granted.

Gallien v. State*, 19 N.E.3d 303 (Ind. Ct. App. 2014). Appellate counsel ineffective in case of two burglaries and two thefts separated by less than 15 minutes and 3 miles for failing to assert that this was a single episode in which the consecutive sentencing limitations imposed by state statute applied. Appellate counsel, who was also trial counsel, had raised this issue in sentencing but argued only sentence appropriateness during the appeal. The statute at issue limited the maximum consecutive sentences from a single episode to one class higher than the most serious felony involved in the case. In this case, the statute limited the sentence to 10 years, but the defendant received two consecutive 8 year sentences on the burglary charges for a total of 16 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert this issue, which was much stronger than the one issue raised on appeal, which had “little likelihood of success.” Prejudice was also established as the statutory sentencing limitation was applicable.

Miller v. State*, 318 P.3d 155 (Kan. 2014). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to assert error in a written instruction: “If you have a reasonable doubt as to the truth of each of the claims required to be proved by the State, you must find the defendant not guilty.” The word “each” was substituted for “any” and effectively told the jury that it could acquit the defendant “only if it had a reasonable doubt as to all of the elements the State was required to prove—rather than acquitting him if it had a reasonable doubt as to any single element.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. While the state asserted “strategy,” the evidence was “uncontroverted” that counsel “simply did not notice the error.” This was structural error and prejudice was established.

State v. O’Neil*, 99 A.3d 814 (N.J. 2014). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case where the defendant was convicted of manslaughter for failing to challenge the trial court’s failure to charge self-defense related to manslaughter. Based on dicta in a 1999 case (Moore), the trial court instructed on self-defense for murder but not manslaughter. This case was tried in 2003. A panel of the Appellate Division held in 2007 (Rodriguez) that self-defense applies to manslaughter as well. The appeal of this case was still pending then but appellate counsel still failed to assert the issue. Likewise, counsel did not assert the issue even after the Supreme Court granted certification in Rodriguez. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to “bring to the court’s attention controlling law that [would] vindicate her client’s cause.” In addition, the plain language of the self-defense statute indicates that self-defense applies to manslaughter. Case law prior to 1999 held that self-defense applied in manslaughter cases. Thus, the dicta in Moore was determined in Rodriguez in 2008 to be a “‘mistaken assertion’ limited to the peculiar facts in Moore.” Even prior to this trial, “a widely read commentator” foreshadowed that the court would again hold that self-defense applied to manslaughter. Even without this backdrop, at minimum, counsel should have informed the appellate panel in this case of the Rodriguez decision from another panel, which was “controlling law unless overturned by this Court.” Even if counsel did not know of the Rodriguez decision that was inexcusable. “If every person is presumed to know the law, no exception can be made for appellate counsel.” There was no strategy because “appellate counsel could have no strategic reason for not raising a ruling that presumably would lead to a new trial for his client.” Prejudice was clear because the jury, having been instructed on self-defense to murder, acquitted the defendant of murder.

Wilds v. State*, 756 S.E.2d 387 (S.C. Ct. App. 2014). Appellate counsel in murder and armed robbery case was ineffective in failing to assert error in the trial court’s instruction on accomplice liability. The state presented evidence of the victim’s DNA in blood on the defendant’s shoe and testimony from two co-defendants who both testified that the defendant carried out the armed robbery and murder and their only participation was in hitting the victim after being ordered to do so by the defendant. During deliberations, the jury sent out a note asking, “[I]f we say [Wilds is] guilty of murder, are we saying he of the three [alone] actually pulled the trigger?” In response, and over trial defense counsel’s objection, the trial court instructed on accomplice liability, i.e., the hand of one is the hand of all. This instruction should not have been given because there was no evidence that another co-conspirator was the shooter. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient. The only issue asserted on appeal "was unpreserved and the State presented no testimony indicating counsel made a tactical decision not to appeal this issue."

2013: Long v. United States, 83 A.3d 369 (D.C. 2013). Appellate counsel in murder case ineffective for failing to challenge the defendant's life without parole sentence due to error under Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), which was decided while the direct appeal was pending. The sentence was based on the trial court's finding of an aggravating circumstance – that the murder was especially heinous, atrocious, and cruel – not found by the jury. "In a series of cases, beginning with Keels v. United States, 785 A.2d 672 (D.C. 2001), this court applied plain-error review to sentences of LWOP imposed prior to the issuance of Apprendi." The defendant advised counsel of these rulings and suggested an Apprendi challenge before filing his own pro se motion to correct his sentence on this basis. Under these circumstances, counsel's conduct was deficient for failing to assert the challenge. This conduct was not excused by strategy, as "[w]e . . . cannot conceive of any reasonable "professional judgment" which would lead an attorney to disregard an issue which, at the time of appeal, would likely have resulted in the vacating of appellant's LWOP sentence and the remand of the case for resentencing." Prejudice established because "reasonable minds could well have disagreed about whether this murder was 'especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel,' a standard that requires a conclusion that this murder was worse than most first-degree premeditated murders." This case involved "an [escalating] armed feud between two groups of young men that had been going on for several weeks" before the victim was shot. "Considering that the courts deal with a significant number of seemingly more inhumane crimes, we cannot conclude that a jury would have agreed with the conclusion the trial court reached on this factor, even if we cannot label the trial court's decision 'wrong.'"

Martinez v. State*, 123 So. 3d 701 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to challenge the sentence on the ground that the trial court relied on unsubstantiated allegations of drug possession in sentencing. While the state alleged that the murder was drug-related, "[t]he state introduced no evidence in the present case that drugs had anything to do with petitioner's crime." A law enforcement officer testified only that the defendant's "bag contained 'stuff,'" but the prosecutor argued in support of a maximum sentence that the witness testified the "stuff" was "two and a half pounds of marijuana." "[T]he sentencing judge plainly proceeded on the assumption that a drug transaction had been in progress when the charged offense took place." Trial counsel challenged the sentence in a timely fashion. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

Hankins v. State*, 123 So. 3d 666 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to challenge on double jeopardy grounds defendant's convictions for armed burglary with assault or battery, aggravated battery with a firearm, and aggravated assault with a firearm. The evidence at trial showed that Hankins set a fire outside of his ex-girlfriend's house, injured the ex-girlfriend by firing shots through the front door of her house, entered the residence without permission by kicking in the front door, threatened the ex-girlfriend with a firearm while following her through the house, and struck the ex-girlfriend on her forehead with the firearm. Prejudice established even though Hankins received a life sentence on a valid attempted first-degree murder charge so relief from the invalid convictions would not result in a reduction of the overall sentence. New appeal allowed.

Lee v. State*, 115 So. 3d 1119 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2013). Appellate counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to assert a meritorious preserved argument, which the codefendant won on in direct appeal. Specifically, the trial court erred in denying the defense peremptory strike a white potential juror when the defense had valid race-neutral reasons in that the juror and his wife had been victims of a burglary and had connections to law enforcement.

Sullivan v. Kemp*, 749 S.E.2d 721 (Ga. 2013). Appellate counsel in aggravated assault case ineffective for failing to assert error in trial court's instructions that permitted conviction for aggravated assault based upon criminal negligence. The defendant was convicted based on evidence that a one-year-old child in his care suffered serious brain injuries that were consistent with shaken baby syndrome. The defendant testified that the child fell off a couch and then he shook the child "try[ing] to get him to laugh." While aggravated assault requires a "criminal intent to injure," the trial court charged the jury that a crime involves "a joint operation of an act, or omission to act, and intention." The trial court went on to instruct that intent or criminal negligence is an essential element of any crime and that intent or criminal negligence may be shown in many ways, before also defining criminal negligence. Trial counsel objected. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient, not based on strategy, and prejudicial because the jury could have been misled into believing it could convict for aggravated assault even if the evidence showed only criminal negligence rather than an intent to injure. The prejudice was exacerbated by the prosecutor's repetitive arguments in closing that "[t]his is a criminal negligence case," and conviction could be based on criminal negligence.

2012: Dill v. State, 79 So. 3d 849 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2012). Appellate counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to seek supplemental briefing based on new case that held that the standard instruction on attempted voluntary manslaughter "improperly imposed an additional element of intent to kill and was therefore fundamentally erroneous."

Gregg v. State*, 279 P.3d 396 (Utah 2012). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in rape case for failing to adequately present a defense. The defendant and the victim both testified that they met on an "online dating service." They first met in person around 2:20 a.m. when the alleged victim invited the defendant to her apartment. According to her, they engaged in consensual kissing until 3:20 a.m. when a friend of the victim called. Thereafter, they resumed consensual kissing and "progressed to foreplay." According to the victim, she said no but was raped. According to the defendant, it progressed to consensual sex, which was interrupted by the friend, who was waiting outside with his girlfriend, calling again at 4:07 a.m. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to investigate and present evidence of the alleged victim's continued activity on the dating site after the alleged rape and in failing to elicit information about the 47 minutes between the calls. In her testimony, she said that she only logged back into the site to pull information about the defendant for the police. In reality, only two days after the alleged rape she had contacted four other men in "cheerful, light-hearted emails" saying she was leaving site to avoid charges but inviting them to contact her privately. These emails would also have undermined her credibility regarding the severe anxiety and panic attacks she claimed to suffer following the alleged rape. Counsel failed to subpoena these records. Likewise, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to present evidence of the actual time line of events. While the alleged victim claimed the calls were only minutes apart, the phone records and the police report revealed that, even according to her testimony, there was "nearly an hour of [consensual] sexual foreplay" before intercourse. While counsel did make a vague reference in closing to a 45-minute time period, counsel presented no evidence supporting this argument. Prejudice was also established as consent was the only issue. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness on appeal.

In re Morris*, 288 P.3d 1140 (Wash. 2012). Appellate counsel in sexual molestation case ineffective in failing to assert violation of right to public trial under clear state law. Specifically, the trial court conducted part of individual juror voir dire in chambers. While in chambers and off the record 14 prospective jurors were questioned and 6 were excused for cause. Prejudice established as prejudice would have been presumed on direct review.

2011: Mauricio v. State, 941 N.E.2d 497 (Ind. 2011). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to assert sentencing error in direct appeal. At the time of trial, there were two conflicting statutory amendments on the books: one providing a presumptive sentence of 50 years and the other a presumptive sentence of 40 years. The court applied the 50 year amendment here and sentenced the defendant to 50 years. Appellate counsel clearly should have raised this issue on appeal. As the court and the legislature later determined that the 40 year presumptive sentence was the appropriate one, case remanded for resentencing.

Commonwealth v. Fink*, 24 A.3d 426 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2011). Appellate counsel in murder case ineffective for failing to sufficiently brief the circumstances of the defendant's confession. Trial counsel filed a pre-trial motion seeking suppression. While this issue was raised on appeal, counsel failed to provide adequate citation to authority and analysis in briefing, which resulted in waiver and no merits review. Prejudice was presumed under Cronic.

2010: Whitmore v. State, 27 So. 3d 168 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to assert as error the trial court's consideration of the defendant's continued protestation of innocence against him in sentencing, which was error under state law.

Brown v. Baskin*, 690 S.E.2d 822 (Ga. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness during direct appeal. At the time of trial, the alleged victim was facing criminal charges for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute and counsel sought to cross-examine him on that issue. The trial court ruled initially that the cross would not be permitted absent proof of conviction, but allowed counsel the opportunity to establish an entitlement to cross on the basis of a pending indictment. Trial counsel failed to pursue the issue further and appellate counsel failed to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness. Prejudice established because the victim was a key witness and the jury had indicated a deadlock at one point prior to conviction.

Rhoiney v. State*, 940 N.E.2d 841 (Ind. Ct. App. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder and criminal confinement case for failing to assert error in court imposing consecutive sentences. The defendant was sentenced prior to 2005 statutory amendment changing presumptive sentences to advisory sentences. Under state law the court could impose the sentences consecutively only if the court found at least one aggravating circumstance and found that the aggravating circumstances outweighed mitigating circumstances. Here the court found the aggravating and mitigating factors to be in equipoise so state law required that the sentences run only concurrently. Appellate counsel should have recognized this error as significant and asserted the issue on appeal.

State v. Aberegg*, 945 N.E.2d 1148 (Ohio Ct. App. 2010). Appellate counsel ineffective in telecommunications harassment case for failing to challenge the defendant's overbroad and unreasonable conditions on probation. The defendant was convicted for harassing calls to the prosecutor's office. As part of the probation conditions, he could not be on any property owned or operated by the City of Wadsworth, which could include any street or sidewalk of the city, and could not call any city office. The only exception was the Probation Department. Appellate counsel's conduct deficient and prejudice established.

2009: Powers v. State, 38 So. 3d 764 (Ala. Crim. App. 2009). Appellate counsel in theft of property case was ineffective for failing to challenge the trial court's denial of the defendants' request to withdraw their waiver of the right to counsel. The defendants, husband and wife, initially waived counsel but then sought to withdraw the waiver. The trial court offered to appoint counsel for them but they declined while still saying they wanted to withdraw the waiver. The trial court took no other action and proceeded to trial with them representing themselves. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to challenge this issue because a state criminal rule allows a waiver of counsel to be withdrawn at any time and for any reason. The defendants were thus entitled to counsel from that point forward. Although they declined court-appointed counsel, the trial court never offered them the other options under state law of a continuance to obtain retained counsel or appointment of a standby counsel. "Unless a defendant has or waives assistance of counsel, the Sixth Amendment is a jurisdictional bar to a valid conviction and sentence." "Appellate counsel's failure to challenge a jurisdictional defect was deficient performance and per se prejudicial." The court also reversed on the substantive issue of deprivation of the right to representation at trial.

Ex parte Miller*, 330 S.W.3d 610 (Tex. Crim. App. 2009). Appellate counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to assert, for purposes of habitual offender sentencing, that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant's 1976 burglary conviction was for an offense committed after his 1972 possession of heroin conviction became final. Counsel's conduct was deficient because the state's proof was based only on the defendant's penitentiary packet, which did not contain the indictment or offense report for the 1976 judgment, "so it is impossible to tell from the face of the burglary judgment exactly when this second offense was committed." While there was evidence available to show that the burglary was committed in November 1975, this evidence was not presented in sentencing. Thus, if counsel had asserted this error, reversal of sentence was required.

2008: Wright v. State, 881 N.E.2d 1018 (Ind. Ct. App. 2008). Appellate counsel ineffective in attempted rape case for failing to assert the ineffectiveness of trial counsel or the fundamental error in the sentence enhancement for being “a repeat sex offender.” Under the plain language of the statute and prior state law interpreting similar language in other statutes, a rape conviction could be used to apply the “repeat” enhancement but an attempted rape conviction could not. Thus, appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert the ineffectiveness of trial counsel in eliciting an admission from the defendant that he was a repeat sex offender and failing to argue that the sentencing enhancement was fundamental error. Prejudice was clear since the enhancement had added eight years to the defendant’s sentence.

2007: Mintun v. State, 168 P.3d 40 (Idaho Ct. App. 2007). Appellate counsel ineffective in sexual abuse of a minor case for failing to challenge one of the convictions, which required a solicitation “to participate in a sexual act.” On this charge, the defendant had asked a 10 year old boy to watch him and to take pictures of him masturbating, which “although repugnant, is not prohibited by the statute in question.”

Harris v. State*, 861 N.E.2d 1182 (Ind. 2007). Appellate counsel ineffective for failing to provide the appellate court with an adequate record to support a valid claim raised on appeal but unsupported by the record provided. Here, following the testimony of both victim’s and his own testimony, the defendant changed his plea and entered pleas of guilty to two counts of sexual misconduct with minors. He was sentenced to twenty years on each count to be served consecutively for a total of 40 years. At the time of trial, state law limited the aggregate for crimes “arising out of an episode of criminal conduct.” In this case, the limit was 30 years if found and appellate counsel asserted that the crimes were in a “single episode” of criminal conduct but did not include in the appellate record the trial testimony prior to the guilty plea. Based just on the record before it, the court rejected the argument. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to include the necessary record and was not based on any strategy. Counsel had simply not read the trial testimony because he believed it unnecessary given the guilty plea. This was deficient because the issue on appeal required a factual record and the necessary facts were in the portion counsel did not read or provide to the court. Prejudice found because the testimony of the two victims provided the necessary facts to support a “single episode” where the crimes occurred 5 minutes apart in the same bed and both victims were induced by the same need for a place to stay. The court revised the aggregate sentence to 30 years.

Yecovenko v. State*, 173 P.3d 684 (Mont. 2007). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in sexual abuse and sexual assault case for failing to adequately assert a motion for severance. The sexual assault charges alleged offenses involving the daughters of the defendant’s former girlfriend. The sexual abuse charges were based on ten unrelated child pornography pictures. Trial counsel moved to sever but did not provide any specific detail to allege prejudice even after the state noted the deficiency and the court denied on this basis. While appellate counsel asserted error in the denial of the motion, counsel did not assert the ineffectiveness of trial counsel as a basis. Thus, the appellate court also denied on a procedural basis. Trial and appellate counsel’s conduct was deficient. Specifically, with respect to appellate counsel: “Presenting new arguments on appeal without justification for doing so, in light of the volume of cases holding that such arguments will not be entertained, falls short of reasonable professional assistance.” Prejudice was found with respect to the sexual assault conviction because the unrelated pictures “were, quite simply, horrific,” such that the trial court had cleared the courtroom and allowed each image to be displayed to the jury for only five seconds.

State v. Loftin, 922 A.2d 1210 (N.J. 2007). Trial and appellate counsel were ineffective in failing to adequately address the presence of a possibly racially biased juror, who had predetermined guilt before hearing all the evidence, in the jury panel during the trial although he ultimately served as an alternate and did not deliberate on findings and a separate jury was empaneled under state law for sentencing. The juror, who was white and worked at the post office, admitted making comments early in the trial to other postal workers that he was “going to buy a rope to hang” the defendant, a black man charged with killing a white man. He denied, however, that the comments were intended to be racist or that he had already formed an opinion of guilt. Trial counsel sought to remove the juror, which was denied, but failed to request that the remainder of the jury be questioned to determine whether this juror had made similar comments to other jurors. The trial court ultimately ordered that the juror would serve only as an alternate. Appellate counsel failed to assert error in the trial court’s failure to remove the juror and to assert as plain error the court’s failure to question the remaining jurors. Under state law, the court found “a decided racial undertone [in the juror’s comments] that evokes an era of vigilante and mindless mob justice that reigned during a dark period in American history.” Id. at 1219. Likewise, even without racial bias, the juror violated the court’s instructions not to discuss the case with others and not to determine guilt prior to deliberations. The court held that prejudice would be presumed and that “even allowing a non-deliberating juror suspected of racial bias to sit on a panel will lead to a presumption that other members of the panel may have been tainted.” Id. at 1222. Thus, the court presumed that the biased juror shared his views with fellow jurors and, thus, it did not matter that he did not deliberate. Although trial and appellate counsel’s ineffectiveness was asserted under both the state and federal constitutions, the court addressed the merits under only the state constitution but still applying the Strickland standard. Deficient conduct found because the need for the removal of the predisposed juror and a voir dire of the remaining jurors should have been self-evident.” Counsel’s conduct was not excused by strategy. Appellate counsel was also ineffective because failure to assert these issues on appeal deprived the court of the opportunity to address the issue, which would have required reversal on direct appeal.

Commonwealth v. Williams, 936 A.2d 12 (Pa. 2007) (sentenced in August 1993). Appellate counsel ineffective in capital case for failing to challenge the defendant’s conviction under the state Corrupt Organizations Act. Under the statute applicable at the time of the 1993 trial, the court had interpreted the statute to include only legitimate organizations and the defendant’s “organization” was a wholly illegitimate enterprise. This issue was decided approximately a year before the direct appeal was filed. Although the legislature had shortly afterwards amended the statute and a lower court had held the amendment was retroactive, counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial for failing to assert this issue, because the Supreme Court had ultimately ruled that the amendment was not retroactive. Only the Corrupt Organizations Act conviction was reversed leaving intact the murder and criminal conspiracy convictions, which were remanded for consideration of other issues asserted.

Capital Case*

2006: Burnside v. State, 858 N.E.2d 232 (Ind. Ct. App. 2006). Appellate counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to assert as error the trial court's instructions on self-defense and the lesser-included offense of reckless homicide. Trial counsel requested jury instructions on both self-defense and reckless homicide and the trial court instructed the jury regarding both theories. The State objected to the instruction because it intermingled the self-defense and reckless homicide theories but trial counsel did not object. Appellate counsel's conduct was deficient because the instructions improperly required a finding of self-defense as a precondition to a reckless homicide verdict, which deprived the defendant of his right to have the jury consider his guilt on reckless homicide as a lesser-included offense. This issue was significant and obvious from the face of the record and was clearly stronger than the issues raised in the direct appeal. Prejudice found.

Reed v. State*, 856 N.E.2d 1189 (Ind. 2006). Appellate counsel ineffective in attempted murder case for failing to assert that the imposition of consecutive sentences for convictions arising out of a single "episode of criminal conduct," contravened the state sentencing statute. The defendant was convicted of two counts of attempted murder for firing a weapon at police officers during a car chase. Although the issue was a novel one under a new sentencing statute, a plain reading of the statute revealed that the issue was a clear winner and was a much stronger issue than those raised on appeal. Prejudice found, because based upon the state of the law at the time of the direct appeal, this claim would more than likely have resulted in reversal.

Grinstead v. State*, 845 N.E.2d 1027 (Ind. 2006). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder, theft, and conspiracy case for failing to make a double jeopardy objection under the state constitution. The state law had been interpreted to prohibit conviction and punishment for the crime of conspiracy where the overt act that constitutes an element of the conspiracy charge is the same act as another crime for which the defendant has been convicted and punished. Under this standard, the convictions for conspiracy to commit theft and theft in this case violated double jeopardy. The theft conviction was vacated.

Taylor v. State*, 840 N.E.2d 324 (Ind. 2006). Appellate counsel ineffective in murder case for failing to challenge the imposition of an enhanced sentence of 60 years. At the time of trial, the presumptive sentence for murder under state law was 40 years. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial because the trial court improperly considered a number of aggravating circumstances contrary to state law and contrary to the presentence report, which recommended the presumptive sentence.

Commonwealth v. Gorby, 909 A.2d 775 (Pa. 2006). Trial counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigation evidence. Appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to assert the issue of trial counsel's ineffectiveness during direct appeal. In sentencing, counsel called only the step-father to testify that the defendant sometimes assisted him in work around the home. Appellate counsel was also ineffective in failing to assert this issue on appeal because the "claim merited exploration based on the apparent weakness of trial counsel's penalty-phase presentation alone, as reflected on the face of the trial record." Prejudice found. (Facts discussed in the summary of trial counsel's ineffectiveness, supra).

Capital Case*

Ex parte Owens*, 206 S.W.3d 670 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006). Appellate counsel was ineffective in aggravated sexual assault of a child case for failing to inform the defendant that he had a right to file a pro se petition to the Court of Criminal Appeals after counsel had filed an Anders brief in the court of appeals. Prejudice found because the petitioner had filed a pro se brief in the court of appeals. It was, therefore, likely that he would have filed the petition for discretionary review. Leave granted for an out-of-time petition.

2005: Shepard v. Crosby, 916 So. 2d 861 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Appellate counsel was ineffective in murder case and aggravated battery case for failing to assert on appeal the issue of the trial court's erroneous self-defense instruction, given over objection by trial counsel, which "was circular in nature and, thus, vitiated his defense." The trial court instructed the jury that the defendant's use of force against the victim was not justifiable if the jury found that the defendant was attempting to commit, committing or escaping after the commission of a murder or aggravated battery with a firearm. This instruction is not to be given "in cases where the defendant is charged with an offense as to which the defendant relies on self-defense." Prejudice found.

Laymon v. State*, 122 P.3d 326 (Kan. 2005). Appellate counsel ineffective in conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine case where the defendant pled guilty and was sentenced based on "a drug severity level 1 felony." Two lines of argument were being pursued under state law at the time challenging sentences for this offense. One asserted that sentencing should occur under a misdemeanor provision and the other asserted that sentencing should occur under the drug severity 3 statutes. Appellate counsel raised only the first of these arguments, which was ultimately rejected by the state courts. The other argument, not raised by counsel, was ultimately accepted by the state courts. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert this issue "despite the icy reception that had been given both lines of argument by the Court of Appeals" because the Supreme Court "had not finally rejected either." Id. at 328. Counsel's conduct could not be explained by any plausible strategy or "avoidance of a 'shotgun' approach" because counsel's entire appellate brief was only five pages long. Moreover, counsel was in the same state office with the lawyer who initially asserted the ultimately successful argument. Thus, "we should charge his direct appeal counsel with knowledge that the McAdam issue was worthy of preservation and pursuit. Although McAdam was not yet the law of Kansas, the line of argument was in no worse position than the misdemeanor/felony line argument . . . counsel did pursue." Id. at 334.

People v. Turner*, 840 N.E.2d 123 (N.Y. 2005). Trial and appellate counsel ineffective in manslaughter case for failing to assert a statute of limitations defense. The defendant was arrested 16 years after the crime and charged with second degree murder, which has no statute of limitations. During trial, the prosecutor requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of manslaughter. Counsel objected only on the basis of not offering the jury a compromise. The jury convicted only on manslaughter, which had a five year limitations period. Although the statute allows some tolling, the maximum period for tolling is an additional five years. Trial and appellate counsel's conduct was deficient because there was case law from 1914 supporting the argument, which was old but still valid. In addition, while there was some contrary precedent and the law may not have been definitively settled at the time of trial, "[a] reasonable defense lawyer at the time of defendant's trial might have doubted that the statute of limitations argument was a clear winner—but no reasonable defense lawyer could have found it so weak as to be not worth raising.” Trial counsel should have asserted the issue. Appellate counsel should have asserted the ineffectiveness of trial counsel on this point.

2004: Davis v. State, 886 So. 2d 332 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in aggravated battery of elderly person over age 25 case for failing to assert as error the trial court’s improper instruction on the use of force, which effectively negated the defense of self-defense. Although the defense of self-defense was prohibited only if the person claiming self-defense was engaged in the commission of another independent forcible felony, the trial court informed the jury, over trial counsel’s objection, that a finding of the very act of aggravated battery the defendant sought to excuse on the basis of self-defense precluded a finding of justification. Appellate counsel’s conduct was deficient because this instruction was circular and improper and the issue was preserved for appeal. Although no case had clearly held that this instruction was error under the circumstances at the time of the defendant’s appeal, this holding was “clearly foreshadowed” by earlier case law and had been addressed previously in a “compelling dissent.” “Where a preserved issue such as this appears in the appellate record, has facial merit, has some support in the case law, and is not foreclosed by controlling case law, it should be raised.” The court, thus, granted a belated appeal on this issue.

Bruce v. State*, 879 So.2d 686 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to assert as fundamental error the trial court’s erroneous charge on burglary that failed to include the necessary of element of an intent to commit a crime within the structure or conveyance.

Hickson v. State*, 873 So. 2d 474 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel ineffective in aggravated battery of police officer case for failing to assert fundamental error with respect to the trial court’s instruction on forcible felony, which essentially negated his only defense (self-defense). Belated appeal allowed.

Smith v. Crosby*, 872 So. 2d 279 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel ineffective in attempted murder, attempted burglary, and attempted robbery case for failing to challenge the attempted burglary conviction. Appellate counsel asserted only that the trial court erred in denying Petitioner’s motion to suppress his statements. At the time of the appeal the Florida Supreme Court required reversal of the attempted burglary conviction because a conviction could not be sustained on a “remaining in” theory where the defendant initially entered the premises lawfully and then later formed a criminal intent to commit a crime therein. (Although the legislature subsequently nullified the Supreme Court’s ruling, the legislation does not apply to the defendant in this case). Appellate counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to challenge the validity of the attempted burglary conviction because the evidence presented at trial showed that the defendant entered the premises with the victim’s consent and remained there openly. Since any alleged intent to rob or assault was formed subsequent to his consensual entry, the defendant could not be convicted of burglary or attempted burglary. Although trial counsel did not preserve the issue, a fundamental error occurs when the evidence is insufficient to show that a crime was committed at all and the appellate court will review the legal sufficiency of the conviction on appeal. A belated appeal allowed only on this issue.

Crawford v. Thompson*, 603 S.E.2d 259 (Ga. 2004). Appellate counsel ineffective in armed robbery case for failing to assert that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately assert a speedy trial motion. Counsel raised the speedy trial issue, but the appellate court found that it was procedurally defaulted because not addressed fully at trial under the applicable statute. Prejudice found because reversal would have been required if the issue had been asserted as an ineffectiveness of trial counsel claim.

Carew v. State*, 817 N.E.2d 281 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to challenge the trial court's exclusion of expert's opinion testimony that tactics used by the police during the defendant's interrogation would increase the likelihood of a false confession from someone with the defendant's low IQ. Trial counsel preserved this issue by proffering expert testimony on this issue. While appellate counsel asserted five issues on appeal, including the involuntariness of the defendant's confession, counsel did not assert the issue of the trial court's exclusion of the expert testimony. Appellate counsel did not raise this issue because he did not believe the issue to be meritorious. Counsel's conduct was unreasonable because the issue was meritorious as subsequently found by the court in Miller v. State, 770 N.E.2d 763 (Ind. 2002). Although Miller had not been decided at the time of the defendant's direct appeal, the case the Miller court "relied on extensively" had been decided. Prejudice was found, even though the interview techniques and the defendant's IQ were already before the jury, because "an expert's opinion is helpful to the jury to tie up the relationship between the police interview techniques and individuals with diminished intellectual functioning, which is outside the common knowledge and experience of jurors." Prejudice was also apparent based on Miller. Although the two cases were not identical, they were similar enough to establish that the defendant—like the defendant in Miller—would have received a new trial if the issue had been raised on appeal. New trial granted.

Haggard v. State*, 810 N.E.2d 751 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). Appellate counsel ineffective in multiple charge case starting with attempted suicide by use of cocaine, which precipitated violent resistance to officers upon their arrival. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert that the trial court erred in determining that the sentence for one of the five resulting charges (unlawful use of body armor) should be served consecutively. Because the time, place, and circumstances of the criminal acts were causally related and the evidence overlapped, state law prohibited consecutive sentences. Prejudice found even though the direct appeal opinion implied that the sentence was appropriate. The court held that it was "a gratuitous comment upon an issue not before the court. As such, it is not res judicata and does not control this decision."

Browning v. State, 91 P.3d 39 (Nev. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the court's instruction on the "depravity of mind" aggravating circumstance, which did not include any reference to torture or mutilation. Although the Nevada court had rejected two challenges to instructions on "depravity" previously, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert the issue in this case based upon Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980), because the other rejected state cases both included references to torture in the instruction and one of them also referenced mutilation. In both cases, there was also evidence of torture and mutilation, which was also lacking in this case. Prejudice found even though four other aggravating factors were present because the state's closing argument focused primarily on the "depravity of mind" aggravator.

State v. Madan*, 840 A.2d 874 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in murder case for failing to assert on appeal that the trial court abused its discretion in rejecting the defendant's plea agreement. The defendant was charged with murder and entered an agreement with the state to plead guilty to aggravated manslaughter in exchange for a state recommendation for a 20 year sentence with 7 years of parole ineligibility. A pre-sentence report recommended that the plea agreement be accepted. The defendant admitted stabbing the victim, but disputed some of the surrounding circumstances, which revealed that the victim may have well been the initial aggressor. At the hearing, the trial court discussed the issue with the victim's father and learned that the victim's family was opposed to the plea agreement. The court rejected the pre-trial agreement. Following trial, the defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment with 30 years of parole ineligibility. The trial court abused its discretion in rejecting the plea because this case is a classic case for an aggravated manslaughter plea. The reasons listed by the trial court for rejecting the plea were inadequate and based upon incorrect statements concerning the potential length of sentences. The exercise of discretion to reject the plea was erroneous under these circumstances. Although the views of the victim's family may be taken into consideration, the victim's family's dissatisfaction with the plea cannot be controlling.

A defendant may not be entitled to an offer of a plea bargain from the prosecutor, but when such an offer is made, accepted, and entered on the record, a defendant is entitled to a judicial assessment of that agreement grounded in a correct understanding of the law and the proper exercise of that discretion.

The court reinstated the defendant's plea agreement.

Garrison v. State, 103 P.3d 590 (Okla. Crim. App. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately preserve the issue that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately prepare and present mitigation. The defendant was convicted, on largely circumstantial evidence, of the murder and subsequent dismemberment of a thirteen-year-old boy. On appeal, appellate counsel asserted the issue of ineffectiveness of counsel supported by affidavits and records and the court remanded for an evidentiary hearing. Because the trial court held the hearing only two weeks after the remand and the defendant's primary expert witness was unavailable to testify due to stage four cancer, appellate counsel presented no evidence at the evidentiary hearing and refused to even question trial counsel concerning the mitigation case. Thus, the court found, "[u]nder these unique and utterly bizarre circumstances," that appellate counsel "effectively waived" the issue of trial counsel's ineffectiveness. Id. at 619. Nonetheless, the court found that the defendant "was likely denied the effective assistance of trial counsel" with respect to sentencing and ordered a new sentencing trial. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient because the case in mitigation was limited to a single counseling psychologist who spent less than four hours with the defendant and had not reviewed the defendant's medical, psychiatric, or school records. The court did not condemn the expert, but noted that "[i]t appears he did what he was asked to do in the brief amount of time he was asked to do it.” His testimony, which covered only nineteen pages of the transcript, provided “a quick overview” of the defendant’s background, but he “did not go over any of these matters in any detail. He simply mentioned them casually in a sentence or two, without amplification.” Id. at 617. Because this expert spent an “extremely short amount of time” with the defendant and lacked “access to key records and people familiar with” the defendant, he “was vulnerable to attack by the State on cross-examination. The State was thus able to point out that most of the mitigation case was based upon a short interview, i.e., Appellant’s own self-reporting.” Overall, this “testimony did little to educate the jury about Petitioner’s adolescent life or give jurors any mitigating reason to render a verdict less than death.” Id. at 617. If counsel had adequately investigated, the evidence would have established that the defendant never knew his father; was abandoned by his mother, who tried to abort him; was raised by his verbally abusive grandmother; was abused by a schizophrenic and alcoholic uncle; was abused by his alcoholic, abusive mother after she moved back in to the extent of smothering him until he passed out; was sexually abused by his brother beginning at age 3-4, including “anal rapes,” pulling his testicles and twisting his penis with pliers, binding him hand and foot, hanging him from a tree, and beating him to the point he required hospitalization. When he was thirteen, the defendant killed his four-year-old step-cousin and was committed to a hospital for 19 months. During this time, his brother was found dead from burning and a possible drug overdose. When the defendant was released on a pass from the hospital, he smothered a 3-year-old neighbor boy and severed the boy’s penis post-mortem. In short, the defendant is “a thrice-convicted child-killer” and counsel’s best hope after avoiding conviction “was to focus on the reasons why anyone would commit such inconceivable atrocities. And this would have necessarily required a close examination of Appellant’s horrendous past.” Id. at 619.

Commonwealth v. Moore, 860 A.2d 88 (Pa. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert trial counsel’s ineffectiveness for failure to prepare and present mitigation evidence. Counsel presented no mitigation evidence. He asserted that the defendant declined to testify and he had no other mitigating evidence. Thus, counsel presented no opening and no evidence and only referred generically to possible mitigating circumstances in closing. The jury found two aggravating circumstances and no mitigating circumstances. On appeal, counsel alleged trial counsel’s ineffectiveness but failed to specify what mitigating evidence had been available. Thus, the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness was denied on appeal. Appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately present the available mitigating evidence, which included testimony from the defendant’s mother, sister, and wife of the defendant’s traumatic and abusive childhood, including witnessing his father slash his mother’s throat. The mother and sister had not been subpoenaed and had not been advised of the need for their testimony in sentencing. Although the ex-wife did not appear under subpoena to testify at trial concerning an alibi, she would have testified in sentencing if counsel had explained the nature of the proceeding to her. While these witnesses were “obviously more cooperative in 2000 than in 1983,” id. at 99, and the defendant was an “uncooperative client,” id. at 100, counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel was not “relieved of the duty to investigate potential mitigating evidence, particularly where counsel had no other penalty phase strategy,” id. at 100. Counsel’s conduct was not excused by any strategic reason. Prejudice was found because without any mitigating evidence, the defendant’s only chance for a life sentence would have been if the jury did not find either of the aggravating circumstances, which was unlikely based on the evidence presented by the state. New sentencing granted.

In re Orange, 100 P.3d 291 (Wash. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert as error the trial court's closure of the courtroom during more than half of the voir dire, which violated the defendant's constitutional right to a public trial. Counsel's conduct was deficient because there was no compelling reason to close the proceedings. Even assuming that a compelling reason existed, the trial court did not narrowly tailor its order or consider alternatives to full closure. The trial court's actions thus violated the state constitution. In addition to denying the public's right to presence, the court denied the defendant's family the opportunity "to contribute their knowledge or insight to the jury selection" and denied the jury the opportunity "to see the interested individuals." What the jury saw instead was the "conspicuous" absence of the defendant's family. Because of the denial of the right to a public trial, prejudice would have been presumed had the issue been raised on appeal. Thus, prejudice was found and a new trial ordered.

In re Personal Restraint Petition of Dalluge*, 100 P.3d 279 (Wash. 2004). Appellate counsel was ineffective in rape case for failing to assert that the adult court had no jurisdiction to try and convict the defendant, who was seventeen years old at the time. The state initially charged the defendant with first degree rape, which automatically gave the adult court exclusive jurisdiction. The state later reduced the charges to second degree rape and a charge of third degree rape by complicity. Although these charges no longer resulted in automatic adult court jurisdiction and rested jurisdiction solely in the juvenile court unless the juvenile court declined jurisdiction "in the best interest of the juvenile or the public," the trial court did not remand to the juvenile court and the defendant was tried and convicted in adult court. Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to raise this "meritorious issue." Because the defendant had since turned 18, the appropriate remedy was remand to the adult court for a hearing on whether declination by the juvenile court would have been appropriate. If so, the conviction would stand. If not, a new trial would be granted.

2003: Estevez v. Crosby, 858 So. 2d 376 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2003). Appellate counsel was ineffective in aggravated battery case for failing to assert on appeal the issue of the trial court's erroneous self-defense instruction. The trial court instructed the jury that the defendant's use of force against the victim was not justifiable if the jury found that the defendant was attempting to commit, committing or escaping after the commission of an aggravated battery. This instruction is only to be given when the accused is charged with at least two offenses, the one for which the accused claimed self-defense as well a separate forcible felony. Although trial counsel did not object to this instruction, appellate counsel's conduct was deficient because counsel should have raised this issue as a fundamental error on direct appeal. Appellate counsel's failure to raise the issue in direct appeal prejudiced the defendant. As a result, the court reinstated the defendant direct appeal.

Milliken v. Stewart*, 583 S.E.2d 30 (Ga. 2003). Appellate counsel was ineffective in kidnapping case for failing to assert on appeal that the trial court had improperly intimated his opinion on the evidence and guilt of the accused. Because the trial court's actions were not harmless, the appropriate remedy was a new trial rather than a new appeal.

Capital Case*

Minor v. State*, 792 N.E.2d 59 (Ind. Ct. App. 2003). Appellate counsel ineffective for failing to cite recent case establishing defendant's entitlement to 12-person jury (rather than 6) on felony count of carrying a handgun without a license. While appellate counsel had already completed briefing, the controlling case was decided two months before the appeal was decided. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to read the Advance Sheets and bring the case to the court's attention. Prejudice established because reversal was required.

6. POST-CONVICTION

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2023: Leeds v. Russell, 75 F.4th 1009 (9th Cir. 2023). In murder case where the killing occurred in the garage of the residence petitioner shared with his ex-wife, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that the prosecution’s theory of felony-murder, which was premised on burglary, was legally incorrect. Post-conviction counsel’s (PCC) ineffectiveness in failing to raise the claim in state court provided cause under Martinez v. Ryan to overcome the procedural default of the claim. Although at the time of trial, in 2006, the Nevada Supreme Court had not yet definitively decided the legal issue involved in this case—whether one can burglarize their own home--the absence of such precedent did not make trial counsel’s failure to raise the issue reasonable. “Because Nevada’s burglary statute was susceptible to two interpretations, a reasonable counsel would have argued for the interpretation that would preclude her client from facing a felony-murder charge.” When the Nevada Supreme Court decided the issue in petitioner’s favor in 2014, concluding that “one cannot burglarize his own home so long as he has an absolute right to enter the home,” the Nevada Supreme Court “considered the purposes of common law burglary, the legislative intent of Nevada’s burglary statute, and California’s approach to the issue.” These same arguments were available before 2014 “and it does not take the benefit of hindsight to realize the obvious strength of the approach.” Notably, the burglary theory argument was not far-fetched and was supported by Nevada precedent, as well as case law from states with similar burglary statutes.

[Trial] counsel was “obliged to make, or at least to evaluate, an argument that [wa]s sufficiently foreshadowed in existing case law.” Bridges v. United States, 991 F.3d 793, 804 (7th Cir. 2021). Because Nevada law could always have reasonably been interpreted to mean a person could not burglarize his own home (as the Nevada Supreme Court concluded in [2014]), competent counsel would have been expected to make that argument.

Regarding prejudice, the State argued the deficiency was harmless under two theories. First, the State asserted that petitioner lacked an unconditional right to enter the home, which actually belonged to his ex-wife, thus supporting a burglary conviction. The district court did not err, however, in finding from the record that petitioner had a right to enter the home as a joint occupant. Second, the State contended that the evidence of premeditation and deliberation, which the jury was instructed on as an alternative basis for the first degree murder verdict, was overwhelming. (The verdict form did not indicate which theory was the basis for the first degree murder conviction. The jury did convict petitioner of burglary.) The appeals court responded: “Because the jury had to reach a unanimous verdict and the evidence towards any single theory was not overwhelming, the district court correctly concluded that a reasonable juror could have believed that [petitioner] acted in the heat-of-passion or that the State had not proved the premeditation theory beyond a reasonable doubt.” Regarding PCC’s failure to raise the claim before the 2014 state supreme court decision, “[j]ust as trial counsel could have made the burglary theory argument in 2006, PCC could have made the argument in 2013 by relying on a common understanding of the definition of ‘burglary,’ basic statutory interpretation principles, and the law of other states with similar criminal statutes. The failure to do so was unreasonable.” That PCC “filed a 60-page habeas petition that identified many claims of error at the trial level,” did “not negate PCC’s failure to recognize a potentially dispositive claim.” It is reasonably probable that a Nevada court would have granted petitioner’s post-conviction petition if PCC had properly asserted the claim at issue.

2021: Stokes v. Stirling*, 10 F.4th 23 (4th Cir. 2021), judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Shinn v. Martinez, 142 S.Ct. 2751 (2022), judgment granting relief reinstated on remand, 64 F.4th 131 (4th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S.Ct. 377 (2023) (1999 trial and sentencing). In South Carolina death penalty case where petitioner confessed to the rape-murder of a woman he had been hired to kill, trial counsel’s mitigation investigation and choice not to present any personal mitigation evidence was unreasonable and prejudicial. Although the claim of trial ineffective assistance was procedurally defaulted, the ineffective assistance by state post-conviction relief (PCR) counsel in failing to develop and raise the claim provided cause to overcome the default. PCR counsel had initially raised the claim of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness as to the case in mitigation but withdrew the claim from the post-conviction petition. The federal district court found that PCR counsel performed reasonably because they had investigated petitioner’s background “to some extent” prior to “intentional[ly]” withdrawing the mitigation claim. “But intentionality does not guarantee reasonableness,” and the presumption that counsel had a tactical basis in omitting the claim in favor of others is rebuttable. “The adequacy of counsel’s investigation informs the strength of the presumption of strategy.” Here, PCR counsel’s investigation of the claim was inadequate because they ignored the valuable leads they uncovered. They knew about adversity in [petitioner’s] background from trial counsel’s cursory investigation. They hired their own investigator, whose additional interviews generated rich leads about [petitioner’s] psychological, educational, and familial history. At that point, an objectively reasonable attorney would be prompted to investigate further. . . . Yet PCR counsel conducted essentially no investigation beyond the investigator’s interviews. They did not re-interview any of the witnesses themselves or seek out corroborating documentary evidence. They did not speak to or request files from the social worker retained by trial counsel. While they interviewed the neurologist, who had found indicators of brain damage, they did not obtain his files or his testing results.

And, perhaps most consequentially, they did not retain an expert capable of applying their investigator’s findings. Because “psychological and social history” and “emotional and mental health” are often of “vital importance” to a mitigation defense, “the defense team should include at least one person qualified to screen for mental or psychological defects.” (Citation omitted). That duty was certainly implicated in this case when the investigator found reports of [petitioner’s] childhood experiences of physical and sexual abuse and neglect, domestic violence, and substance abuse. Without consulting an expert capable of analyzing these significant “red flags,” counsel did not make “efforts to discover all reasonably available mitigating evidence.”

(Emphasis in original; citations omitted). PCR counsel admitted at the federal evidentiary hearing they had no tactical basis for the failure to consult with an expert and explained that “they neglected the mitigation theory after becoming preoccupied with other claims.” This preoccupation was not strategic. “Rather, counsel testified that their prioritization of other claims was uninformed and happenstance, the product of distraction, inexperience, and carelessness.” The other claims that were included, some of which also were abandoned, refuted any argument that PCR counsel was “strategically winnowing the claims, selecting only those few deemed most meritorious.” Given the extraordinary facts of this case, the trial ineffective assistance of counsel claim was “substantial” and PCR counsel’s failure to pursue it was unreasonable, providing cause to overcome the procedural default and permit merits consideration of the otherwise defaulted claim.

2018: Richardson v. Superintendent Coal Township SCI, 905 F.3d 750 (3d Cir. 2018). In case involving numerous state court convictions, habeas relief granted on claim of ineffective assistance of post-sentencing counsel for failing to challenge the constitutionality of petitioner’s waiver of counsel during sentencing. After petitioner had been convicted, he sought to fire his trial attorney during sentencing. The sentencing judge treated this as a waiver of the right to counsel without ensuring that the waiver was knowing and voluntary. Trial counsel, unsure whether or not he had been excused from representation, remained in the court during the second day of sentencing but did not say or do anything while petitioner represented himself. After sentencing, petitioner was appointed a new attorney who, pursuant to Pennsylvania law, could file post-sentencing motions and then an appeal. This new attorney filed a post-sentencing motion that failed to raise the waiver of counsel issue and thereafter filed an unsuccessful appeal. Petitioner then filed a pro se petition for post-conviction relief, raising a claim that the sentencing judge failed to inquire whether he knowingly and intentionally waived his right to counsel. Although post-conviction counsel was appointed, he abandoned that claim explaining to the court why he thought the claim was meritless. Petitioner filed a pro se habeas petition in federal court, raising a claim that his counsel was ineffective for abandoning him at the sentencing phase, that the court did not perform a sufficient inquiry as to the waiver of counsel, and that state appellate and post-conviction counsel were ineffective. The petition was denied and the Third Circuit denied a certificate of appealability. Petitioner then filed a Rule 60(b) motion which was denied and again the Third Circuit denied a COA. SCOTUS granted certiorari, vacated, and remanded in light of Martinez. The district court held an evidentiary hearing at which all three state lawyers testified. The district court again denied the 60(b) motion, declining to entertain petitioner’s Sixth Amendment claim that the sentencing judge failed to conduct a colloquy because it did not consider it to be an IAC claim; finding no prejudice from the lack of counsel at sentencing; determining that Martinez does not apply to IAC of appellate counsel claims; and rejecting the IAC claim against state post-conviction counsel because there is no right to effective counsel on state habeas. The Third Circuit this time granted a COA to determine whether state post-conviction counsel’s failure to raise post-sentencing counsel’s effectiveness constituted cause for the procedural default of failing to raise the claim in state court. The Third Circuit held that (1) in Pennsylvania state court, the post-sentencing motions stage is a critical stage at which defendant is entitled to the effective assistance of counsel (and petitioner was denied that right); and (2) post-sentencing motions precede the notice of appeal, and they are thus part of the trial stage (the court held that the boundary between trial and appellate counsel falls at the effective date of the notice of appeal), so when a state post-conviction lawyer fails to raise a post-sentencing lawyer's ineffectiveness, the prisoner may raise that issue for the first time in the federal petition under Martinez v. Ryan. The Third Circuit concluded that petitioner established that the procedural default of the post-sentencing counsel IAC claim was caused by ineffectiveness of post-conviction counsel; that this ineffectiveness occurred in the first collateral proceeding in which the claim could be considered; and that the underlying claim of ineffectiveness of post-sentencing counsel was substantial. The sentencing judge conducted no colloquy whatsoever when petitioner terminated his trial attorney's representation. This issue should have been raised in the post-sentencing motion, but counsel failed to do so, which was ineffective. If post-sentencing counsel had raised this issue, the proper remedy would have been to order a new sentencing hearing. Post-conviction counsel should have raised this issue, but instead he specifically told the court that it was meritless, which was also ineffective.

Barnett v. Roper, 904 F.3d 623 (8th Cir. 2018) (1997 trial). Affirming grant of habeas relief on claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel in failing, inter alia, to investigate and present information about petitioner's biological mother and her family, an issue not contested in the state's appeal. Also affirming the ruling that post-conviction counsel's ineffectiveness provided cause to overcome the procedural default of the trial ineffectiveness claim. Petitioner was convicted in Missouri state court of two counts of first degree murder, one count of first degree robbery, and two counts of armed criminal action based on the robbery and murder of his grandparents. A jury sentenced him to death. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner raised eight allegations of IAC, including that his penalty phase trial counsel failed to investigate and provide the jury with information about his biological mother, her family, and the environmental and genetic factors that affected his development. The Missouri courts denied the post-conviction motion on the basis that it was insufficiently pleaded. In federal habeas corpus proceedings, petitioner alleged that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present information about petitioner's biological mother and her family. The district court and Eighth Circuit determined that the claim was procedurally barred for not having been adequately presented in state court. Thereafter, SCOTUS decided Martinez v. Ryan, but when petitioner moved for relief under Rule 60(b), the court denied it, ruling that Martinez was not retroactive and that the motion was actually a successive petition. Petitioner then filed a Rule 59(e) motion, and the district court ordered an evidentiary hearing on petitioner's claim of IAC at the penalty phase, concluding that the Rule 60(b) motion did not state a new claim for relief, but rather that the claim had never been addressed on the merits. Following the hearing, the district court concluded that petitioner established that his counsel was ineffective for failing to investigate and present mitigating evidence at the penalty phase. The state appealed. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the grant of relief. It noted that the district court properly found cause for the procedural default because state post-conviction counsel was ineffective by (1) insufficiently pleading the claim, (2) failing to follow specific state requirements for pleading in a post-conviction motion, and (3) choosing not to file a response when the state moved to dismiss. Notably, post-conviction counsel admitted to now taking care to follow the specific rules they violated in petitioner's case, including identifying witnesses with descriptions of their proposed testimony, showing that the witnesses are available to testify, and demonstrating that the witnesses would have been discovered at trial through proper investigation. The Eighth Circuit rejected the state's argument that the district court exceeded its jurisdiction in hearing evidence broader in scope than that limited to petitioner's biological background as initially pleaded, noting that the State had conceded to the expansion of the claim. The Eighth Circuit agreed that the Rule 60(b) motion was not a successive claim under 28 U.S.C. § 2244(b).

2017: Bey v. Superintendent, Greene SCI, 856 F.3d 230 (3rd Cir. 2017), cert. denied sub nom. Gilmore v. Bey, 138 S.Ct. 740 (2018). The Third Circuit granted relief in this Pennsylvania non-capital murder case, finding that trial counsel was ineffective for failing to object to an erroneous jury instruction on eyewitness testimony, and that state post-conviction counsel's inadequate failure to assert that claim in state court constituted "cause" to overcome the resulting procedural default. Petitioner was charged with the shootings of two people, one fatal and one non-fatal. The "key witness" at his trial was a police officer, whose "certain and unequivocal" eyewitness identification of petitioner was the prosecution's strongest evidence. 856 F.3d at 233. The claim addressed by the Third Circuit arose when the trial court agreed to give a "Kloiber charge" concerning eyewitness testimony, then – without objection from trial counsel – gave a version of the charge that was "critically inconsistent with" state law. Id. at 234. "A proper charge under Kloiber," the Third Circuit explained, "informs the jury that it has the ultimate discretion of deciding whether to credit positive eyewitness testimony. Instead, the trial court's instruction essentially required the jury to accept positive eyewitness testimony as true by directing that 'testimony as to the identification may not be received with caution.'" 856 F.3d at 238 (emphasis by the court); see also id. at 239-40 ("The charge removed the discretion that the jury could otherwise have exercised that may have raised a reasonable doubt in the mind of one or more jurors about the identity of the shooter."). When petitioner later sought state post-conviction relief, his post-conviction counsel alleged that trial counsel had been ineffective for failing to object to three other aspects of the charge, but not the "may not" language targeted in the federal habeas petition that followed. On appeal from the denial of federal habeas relief, the Third Circuit accepted and agreed with petitioner's concession that the "specific ineffective assistance claim" he advanced was procedurally defaulted notwithstanding the state court's adjudication of three other claims based on the same defective jury charge. The court then examined the merits of the ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim to determine whether it was "substantial," such that post-conviction counsel's failure to raise it constituted "cause" under Martinez v. Ryan, and if so, whether it required a grant of habeas relief. Both inquiries were resolved in petitioner's favor. After explaining that "the faulty Kloiber instruction deprived [petitioner] of his due process right to have the prosecution prove every element beyond a reasonable doubt," 856 F.3d at 241, the Third Circuit held that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to object: "Clearly, this instruction could be reasonably understood as requiring the jury to accept an eyewitness's identification of [petitioner] as the shooter. Indeed, that was what the jurors were told. We can think of no strategic reason for defense counsel not to object to a charge that raises such due process concerns." Id. With regard to prejudice, the court rejected the state's contention that the prosecution had presented an "overwhelming case," explaining that, "[a]t [petitioner's] first trial, nearly identical evidence resulted in a hung jury," and that two jury questions at petitioner's second trial (which yielded the judgment at issue here) indicated that the officer's eyewitness "testimony may well have been a source of concern." Id. at 243. Because the erroneous charge left the jury with "no room ... to conclude that [the officer], though certain, was wrong," the court added, "the prosecution was unconstitutionally relieved of its burden of proving [petitioner] was the shooter beyond a reasonable doubt,” and petitioner was prejudiced by trial counsel’s failure to object. Id. Finally, returning to the question of “cause” under Martinez, the Third Circuit concluded that petitioner had made the requisite showing. See 856 F.3d at 244.

2016: Sullivan v. Secretary, Florida Dept. of Corrections, 837 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2016). After upholding the district court’s determination that inadequate assistance of post-conviction counsel constituted “cause” to overcome procedural default, the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the grant of relief on the uncontested merits of petitioner’s claim that trial counsel was ineffective for advising him to reject a generous plea offer in favor of going to trial with a defense which – unbeknownst to trial counsel – had been legislatively abolished. The charges against petitioner arose out of his involvement in a high speed police chase while under the influence of (and in possession of) cocaine. Although he faced a thirty year sentence if convicted, the prosecution offered twelve years in exchange for a guilty plea. Trial counsel advised petitioner to reject the offer on the belief that he would likely be acquitted under a defense of voluntary intoxication, and petitioner followed that advice. Near the end of trial, however, petitioner and his counsel learned for the first time that voluntary intoxication had been legislatively eliminated as an available defense five years earlier. As a result, petitioner was left with no viable defense, found guilty, and sentenced to thirty years. At an evidentiary hearing on the resulting ineffectiveness claim (which had been rejected as untimely by the state courts), trial counsel testified that he had been ignorant of Florida’s abolition of voluntary intoxication as a defense, that petitioner (whom he had represented before) always followed his advice, and that, had he been properly informed on the law, he would have advised petitioner to accept the plea offer. The trial prosecutor also testified, confirming that a plea offer had been made. The federal magistrate credited the testimony of trial counsel and petitioner, and recommended that relief be granted, and the district court adopted the recommendation and granted the writ. On appeal, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the only matter challenged by the state was the district court’s determination that petitioner had shown “cause” to overcome default, resolved that issue against the state, and affirmed the grant of relief.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2024: Vincent v. Terra, 2024 WL 5008499 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 6, 2024). Plea counsel was ineffective in failing to advise petitioner of the possible immigration consequences of his guilty plea, i.e., the loss of citizenship and deportation to Haiti, a country petitioner left approximately thirty years earlier at age 9. Petitioner’s guilty plea encompassed crimes committed both before and after he applied for and was granted citizenship. Five months after his plea, petitioner was indicted on charges related to his denial of a criminal past in his naturalization application. If convicted of procuring citizenship unlawfully, his naturalization would automatically be revoked and, as a lawful permanent resident, he would be subject to deportation because of his felony record. First, any statute of limitations defense to the federal habeas petition was deliberately waived by respondent. Second, the procedural default of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim was excused by the ineffectiveness of state post-conviction counsel in failing to raise the claim. (In post-conviction proceedings, post-conviction counsel challenged the adequacy of the trial court’s plea colloquy rather than counsel’s performance.) In finding post-conviction counsel’s performance deficient it is noted: (1) “[b]y omitting [petitioner’s] Padilla claim and instead pursuing a claim that the guilty plea colloquy was deficient for failing to advise naturalized citizens of immigration consequences, PCRA counsel traded a claim that applied Supreme Court precedent for a claim that he knew was grounded in no precedent at all; (2) there was no reason that PCRA counsel could not have argued the claim that he raised in addition to petitioner’s Padilla claim; and (3) although PCRA counsel initially prevailed on the novel theory that was raised, this victory was subsequently reversed due to lack of preservation. Regarding the merits of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim, the undisputed fact that plea counsel did not advise petitioner that he could possibly be deported was enough for a finding of deficient performance and any failure by petitioner to fully inform his plea attorney of his circumstances did not justify counsel’s omissions. “Even assuming that it is true that [petitioner] never disclosed to counsel his immigration status or the representations he made during his naturalization process, Strickland and cases that interpret it do not impose that obligation on the client. They impose it on the attorney.” And the fact that the precise immigration consequences of the plea may have been unclear did not absolve counsel of the duty to inform his client of the potential immigration ramifications. As to prejudice, petitioner was not required to show he would have turned down the plea and gone to trial had he received accurate advice. Rather, he only needed to establish that he would not have accepted the plea that was offered. Had petitioner known about the risk of deportation, “it is reasonably likely that he could have negotiated a different plea, such as the plea that [petitioner] negotiated with [respondent] in habeas litigation,” a plea that removed the admission to commission of crimes that preceded the naturalization process. Even assuming that petitioner was required to show he would have gone to trial rather than accept the plea with the deportation consequences, he met that standard as well.

Cardenas v. Garrett*, 2024 WL 3293813 (D. Nev. July 2, 2024). In sexual assault case, habeas relief granted on claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to excuse one of the jurors for presumptive bias after the juror disclosed during trial that he was personally acquainted with the alleged victim. Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, Martinez provided the necessary cause to overcome the default. The alleged victim was the key witness in the prosecution’s case and the jury was instructed it could convict petitioner based solely on the alleged victim’s uncorroborated testimony if it was believed. During trial, the juror at issue disclosed he and the alleged victim had cordial interactions a few times a month for nearly three years at their mutual place of employment, and that he had seen her there the night before she testified at trial. Reasonable jurists could conclude that these facts presented the type of rare and extraordinary circumstance in which bias must be presumed. Additionally, fairminded jurists could conclude there was no basis to find that trial counsel’s failure to seek removal of the juror had a reasonable strategic purpose. Although it was true that the trial court denied defense motions for cause to excuse two prospective jurors who were friends with witnesses, the state anticipated neither witness would be called to testify and trial counsel used peremptory challenges to excuse those prospective jurors. That the first alternate juror who would have replaced the juror at issue had family in law enforcement did not supply an inference that defense counsel made the strategic choice to keep that alternate juror from sitting on the jury. This was because defense counsel had previously had the opportunity to utilize a peremptory challenge on the alternate juror but declined to do so. Additionally, trial counsel waived five peremptory challenges leaving several jurors with family members who were in law enforcement. But even if it was strategic to not seek excusal of the co-worker/juror, it could not be considered sound strategy on this record. Fairminded jurists could conclude trial counsel's failure to move to excuse the juror for presumptive bias was prejudicial under Strickland because the record supports a conclusion that the juror was presumptively biased. And postconviction counsel's failure to raise trial counsel's ineffectiveness was deficient performance. As to prejudice, in the context of a Martinez analysis, the question whether postconviction counsel's performance was prejudicial is not based on whether the particular postconviction review court would have rendered a more favorable decision, but whether some reasonable postconviction review court might have done so. Applying that standard, prejudice is established. In finding the underlying claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel to be meritorious, the court reiterated the points made in its Martinez analysis and further observed that because the juror was likely to encounter the alleged victim at their mutual place of employment posttrial, "the case presented the potential for substantial emotional involvement that could adversely affect impartiality because the juror could feel pressure to resolve the credibility determination in [the alleged victim's] favor."

Azcarate v. Williams*, 2024 WL 1660659 (D. Nev. April 17, 2024), appeals pending, 24-3174 & 3443 (9th Cir.). In first-degree murder case involving the killing of petitioner's girlfriend where petitioner was sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, trial counsel was ineffective at the sentencing phase for failing to present evidence that petitioner suffered from a severe drug addiction problem and had never received treatment. Although petitioner's claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under Martinez and subject to de novo review.

Hubbard v. Ransom*, 2024 WL 1118978 (M.D. Pa. March 14, 2024). Plea counsel performed deficiently by informing petitioner that, per the plea deal, his new sentence would run concurrently to his backtime for the sentence petitioner was already serving. Pursuant to state law, this was not permissible. Post-conviction (PCRA) counsel was thereafter deficient in advising petitioner on the potential consequences of a grant of relief on the claim, which led petitioner to withdraw his PCRA petition and receive a procedural default of the plea counsel ineffectiveness claim. (PCRA counsel told petitioner that receiving a new trial or new guilty plea could not result in a concurrent sentence, as that was barred by statute.) Under existing state law, there was a remedy for petitioner's predicament that PCRA counsel did not advise petitioner of. If a defendant, like petitioner, reasonably relied upon the advice of his counsel and the expression of that specific promise stated in open court by the assistant district attorney, he was entitled to the benefit of the plea bargain irrespective of the statute otherwise prohibiting it. Under Martinez, the default is excused and merits relief is granted.

Eaddy v. Delbalso*, 2024 WL 776611 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 26, 2024). In murder case, post-conviction (PCRA) counsel performed deficiently in failing to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failure to object to an unconstitutional reasonable doubt instruction. "Given the extreme importance of accurately instructing the jury on the Government's burden of proof in a criminal case, there is 'simply no rational basis' for concluding that PCRA counsel's failure to raise this structural error in Mr. Eaddy's first PCRA petition was a strategic choice." And because the underlying trial counsel ineffectiveness claim was “substantial,” the procedural default of the trial ineffectiveness claim is excused under Martinez. PCRA counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise a claim that trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to properly object when a prosecution witness’s unsigned statement was admitted as substantive evidence. Although PCRA counsel did challenge trial counsel’s failure to object to admission of the statement, it was on a separate ground that was easily rejected by the PCRA court. “There is no conceivable strategic reason for failing to make the significantly stronger and obvious claim that [the witness’s] statement should have been excluded because it was unsigned.” Further, “[t]he fact that trial counsel flagged this line of cases on the record and PCRA counsel still neglected to raise it underscores the ineffectiveness of PCRA counsel.” Note: Because Martinez excused the default of these substantial claims, the merits of the claims were thereafter reached by the district court and habeas relief was granted.

2023: *Leonard v. Gittere, 686 F.Supp.3d 1083 (D. Nev. Aug. 10, 2023), appeal pending, 24-752 (9th Cir.). In prison killing case, ineffective assistance of post-conviction counsel in failing to present evidence that appeared to have been available at the time of the post-conviction proceedings provided cause and prejudice to allow consideration by the federal court of the supplemental evidence of ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failing to investigate and present evidence of petitioner’s traumatic upbringing and to present expert testimony to explain the impact of petitioner’s childhood traumas, addictions, and medical problems. Post-conviction counsel was also ineffective in failing to properly raise a meritorious claim that the penalty phase jury instructions failed to instruct the jury that aggravating circumstances needed to be found unanimously and that mitigating circumstances did not need to be found unanimously.

Benjamin v. Kelly, 2023 WL 405027 (D. Or. Jan. 24, 2023). Petitioner was entitled to relief from his manslaughter conviction due to ineffective assistance by his trial counsel in: (1) failing to object to the trial court’s response to a jury question about the manslaughter instruction; (2) failing to object to the instruction limiting the use of the three spontaneous confessions by the person petitioner claimed had actually stabbed the victim, causing his death; and (3) withdrawing a request for an instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. The case involved a violent encounter between four people: the victim, petitioner, Harris, and Harris’s stepson. According to Harris and her stepson, petitioner stabbed the victim as the victim had the stepson pinned to the ground. The defense theory, on the other hand, was that it was Harris who stabbed the victim. Harris was impeached by her confessions to third parties, two of which occurred the day of the incident. At the prosecution’s request, however, and without objection, the jury was instructed that Harris’s confessions could not be considered as substantive evidence of her guilt. Before the case went to the jury, defense counsel withdrew the request for an instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. The jury returned a guilty verdict of Manslaughter in the First Degree, acquitting petitioner of murder. The first identified deficiency by trial counsel concerned the trial court’s response to a question by the jurors during deliberations about what constituted causation for manslaughter. It appeared that the jury was confused about whether it necessary that petitioner himself was the person who stabbed the victim in order to convict him of manslaughter or whether his participation in the group melee was “aiding and abetting” conduct that would suffice. The trial court responded: “You should rely on your own reading of the instructions provided.

Capital Case*

Remember that you should—that you should view the instructions as a whole. The other instructions may provide context for your question.” Trial counsel’s failure to object to this response or propose a different answer was deficient given that state law mandated that petitioner’s own conduct, and not participation in a group activity, was necessary for conviction of manslaughter. In addition, the referral to other instructions, which included discussion of aider and abettor liability but failed to clarify that such liability was inapplicable to manslaughter, compounded the likely confusion about the law. That the jury made a finding during the sentencing enhancement portion of the trial that petitioner had personally used a weapon during the offense did not establish an absence of prejudice. Petitioner had struck the victim with a large umbrella during the encounter and the jury’s finding could have related to that instead of the knife that killed the victim. On the record of this case, there is a reasonable probability the jury’s answer to whether petitioner committed Manslaughter in the First Degree would have been different had trial counsel acted competently. Post-conviction counsel was ineffective under Martinez in failing to raise the claim, providing cause to overcome the procedural default. The next deficiency concerned trial counsel’s failure to object to the instruction that limited consideration of Harris’s three confessions to impeachment. This limitation was contrary to state law, under which the confessions satisfied a hearsay exception and could be considered as substantive evidence. In rejecting respondent’s contention that the limitation was not prejudicial, it is noted, inter alia, that substantive consideration of Harris’s confessions would have explained why her stepson’s alleged bias in pointing to petitioner as the actual assailant mattered: without the substantive evidence, there was no motive for him to lie. Lastly, trial counsel was ineffective in withdrawing the requested instruction on Manslaughter in the Second Degree. “[T]rial counsel left Petitioner in an ‘unenviable’ position in terms of substantive arguments, and then removed his best hope in terms of a lesser-included crime on which to be convicted, Manslaughter II. It was reasonably probable that the jury would have convicted Petitioner of Manslaughter II if given the chance and thus this error was prejudicial.”

2022: Nelson v. Payne, 2022 WL 2704639 (E.D. Ark. July 12, 2022) (adopting report and recommendation, 2022 WL 2709197 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 25, 2022)). In case involving convictions for second-degree murder and first-degree battery, granting habeas relief as to sentence enhancements as trial counsel was ineffective for failing to move for a directed verdict on the enhancements based on insufficient evidence. The enhancement at issue involved commission of a crime in the presence of a child. The trial testimony established that petitioner arrived at the scene of the crime after the children were asleep and they remained asleep when the offenses were committed. Additionally, there was no circumstantial evidence, such as toys, that would allow an inference that children were in the residence. “Thus, the State failed to sustain its burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that [petitioner’s] crimes qualified for the child enhancement.” Trial counsel was obligated to move for a directed verdict, which had a reasonable probability of being granted, and if it had not been, then the decision would have likely been reversed on appeal. Additionally, post-conviction relief counsel’s failure to raise the claim in the Rule 37 petition constituted ineffective assistance of counsel because the claim clearly had merit and it would have been procedurally defaulted if not for the exception created by Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1, 17 (2012), which “will not bar a federal habeas court from hearing the defaulted ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim, as long as the defaulted claim is substantial.”

2021: Chamberlain v. Clarke, 2021 WL 4487606 (W.D. Va. Sept. 30, 2021). In attempted capital murder of a police officer case, granting habeas relief on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for “failure to object to a crucial but defective jury instruction” regarding the elements of attempted capital murder. Although the claim was untimely under the AEDPA statute of limitations, and procedurally defaulted in state court, the ineffective assistance by state habeas counsel provided the basis for both equitable tolling and cause to overcome the default. The instructions provided to the jury failed to include an element of the charged crime: that petitioner’s actions were “willful, deliberate and premeditated.” The failure “to object to an instruction that omits an essential element of the crime falls below an objective standard of reasonableness, especially when the erroneous instruction materially lightens the government’s burden of proof.” As for prejudice, on the record of this case, [a]lthough the evidence may have been sufficient to support a finding that [petitioner’s] actions were willful, deliberate, and premeditated, the jury was never instructed on “willful, deliberate, and premeditated” as an element, and how that is a higher mens rea than malice. But the jury was instructed on the definition of malice. (Citation omitted.) From the evidence, the jury could also reasonably have concluded that [petitioner’s] conduct, while malicious, lacked premeditation. The jury could have found that [petitioner’s] original intent was to escape apprehension and that he impulsively determined to shoot the weapon when the officer drew his gun. Only by speculating, and taking that issue away from the jury, can one conclude as a matter of law that the shooting was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. Nor do references to premeditation in the closing arguments of counsel remove the taint of a jury not properly instructed on an essential factual element of the crime.

2019: Rogers v. Gittere*, 2019 WL 4655894 (D. Az. Sept. 23, 2019), aff’d, 25 F.4th 1171 (9th Cir. 2022) (1981 or 1982 trial and sentencing). In triple homicide death penalty case from Nevada on remand from the Ninth Circuit after it affirmed the grant of sentencing relief but reversed the procedurally-based denial of some guilt-related claims, habeas relief is granted on claim that trial counsel was ineffective with respect to their investigation and presentation of petitioner’s defense of not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI). Although the claim was deemed procedurally defaulted, that default was overcome by the ineffective assistance provided by post-conviction counsel. In the initial state habeas proceeding, post-conviction counsel did raise a claim that trial counsel was ineffective with respect to the NGRI defense. The claim was presented, however, in a pro forma manner, without supporting evidence. Post-conviction counsel conducted no investigation, failed to meaningfully interview trial counsel, failed to consult experts regarding petitioner’s mental state at the time of the offense and failed to present the testimony of experts on the issue, failed to interview trial witnesses, failed to obtain records from the institution (Lake’s Crossing) where petitioner was housed and where his competence to stand trial was assessed, failed to interview petitioner’s family or friends, and failed to obtain and examine the entire trial record. The evidence presented at a federal hearing on the claim included the complete trial record, petitioner’s daily progress reports from Lake’s Crossing, police reports, evaluations of mental health experts prior to petitioner's trial, declarations from friends and relatives, testimony of trial counsel, testimony of mental health experts, and testimony of a Strickland expert.

The evidence [petitioner] presents in this case, that was not presented in state court, places this claim in a completely different light, shows that [petitioner's] state post-conviction's counsel's performance was inadequate and substantiates his claim that his trial counsel were ineffective with respect to their handling of his NGRI defense. The Court determines that [petitioner's] initial state post-conviction counsel's presentation of this claim in state court fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, and [petitioner] was prejudiced thereby. And, as discussed below, [petitioner's] claim is substantial. Under Martinez, [petitioner] shows cause and prejudice, such as to overcome the procedural default of [the IAC claim].

Ramirez v. Tegels*, 413 F.Supp.3d 808 (W.D. Wisc. 2019), aff'd, 963 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 2020).

In case involving convictions for sexual crimes against a child, appellate/post-conviction counsel was ineffective in failing to raise Confrontation Clause challenges to admission of testimony by police officers and hospital personnel about statements made by the child and the child's brother. (At trial, the child's mother recanted her prior statements implicating petitioner and did not bring her daughter, the alleged victim, to court despite a subpoena ordering her to do so.) Initial appellate counsel had filed a no-merits brief which was ultimately rejected. Crawford was decided during the no-merit proceedings. Post-conviction counsel was then appointed. Under state law, a direct appeal can be initiated through a post-conviction petition. Although an argument was raised in the post-conviction petition challenging the admission of hearsay testimony under state law, post-conviction counsel neglected to invoke Crawford. On appeal, counsel, inter alia, repeated the claims raised in the post-conviction motion. Counsel did not argue that the out-of-court statements by the child and her brother failed the confrontation test in Crawford, even though petitioner wrote two letters to counsel asking her to make a Crawford argument. Petitioner's convictions were affirmed. He subsequently filed a pro se challenge in state court to the effectiveness of post-conviction counsel but this was rejected on the ground that Crawford did not exist at the time of trial and did not apply retroactively in post-conviction proceedings. But because Crawford was decided before petitioner's direct appeal became final, the district court ruled he was entitled to the benefit of that decision. Appellate counsel's failure to raise it could not be deemed reasonable strategy. The statements made by the child and her brother to police officers were properly characterized as testimonial, while statements made by the child to medical personnel presented a closer question. Although some of those statements appeared to be in response to questions related to medical treatment, others, tended towards testimonial. That the law on this area was not settled at the time of the appeal did not preclude a finding of deficient performance. "The question is whether the confrontation claim was 'nonfrivolous' and 'clearly stronger' than the claims appellate counsel did raise. . . . In this instance, the confrontation claim was 'genuinely arguable' and clearly stronger than the claims appellate counsel chose to raise." Additionally, the Crawford claim was obvious at the time of the post-conviction petition and when appellate/post-conviction counsel subsequently filed the direct appeal brief. Prejudice is easily found as to two counts where the only evidence presented were statements by the child to police and medical personnel. As to petitioner's other convictions, prejudice is also found. "If the jury had not heard the multiple statements from [the child] describing the assault, the jury might have credited the defense's theory that [the child's mother] had lied about everything, had planted the DNA evidence in her daughter's underwear, and then had told her daughter to wipe herself with toilet paper."

Risjan v. Wetzel*, 2019 WL 3146207 (M.D. Pa. July 15, 2019). Petitioner was entitled to reinstatement of his direct appeal based on trial counsel's egregious conduct in failing to file a direct appeal as petitioner desired. The merits of the claim are only considered after petitioner established a basis for equitable tolling of the AEDPA limitations period based on misleading communications from trial counsel about an appeal, as well as ineffective assistance by initial post-conviction counsel which provided cause to overcome the procedural default of the trial ineffectiveness claim. Although the state post-conviction court in a second post-conviction proceeding found that initial post-conviction counsel had not been ineffective, petitioner rebutted the second post-conviction court's finding of a certain deadline that formed the basis of concluding initial post-conviction counsel had not been ineffective. (The second post-conviction court had concluded, based on an incorrectly calculated deadline, that the time for filing a timely post-conviction petition had expired before initial post-conviction counsel were retained, thereby precluding a finding that they were ineffective in failing to timely file the post-conviction petition.) Supporting the finding that initial post-conviction counsel understood that a petition could be filed meeting an exception to the timeliness rule at the time they accepted the case is the fact that the post-conviction attorneys entered into an agreement to file such an application and charged a $30,000 retainer. "[A]ttorneys acting ethically and competently would not take a $30,000 non-refundable retainer to pursue a claim unless they believed it to have substantive merit and the possibility of success. This means they would have concluded that time remained on the sixty-day § 9545(b)(2) period at the time they entered into the Agreement and accepted the fee." Reasonably competent post-conviction counsel would have known they had a very limited amount of time to file a petition in which to plead and prove an exception to the time bar. Yet, initial post-conviction counsel accepted $30,000 from petitioner's grandmother to pursue petitioner's rights but did nothing for over a year after they were retained. By the time they got around to filing the post-conviction petition, the sixty-day time for invoking an exception to the time bar had long since passed. Post-conviction counsel were deficient in their representation of petitioner and, because the defaulted ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim was substantial, the Strickland test was satisfied for purposes of Martinez. Petitioner prevails on the merits as counsel's failure to file an appeal was objectively unreasonable and petitioner made it abundantly clear that he desired to appeal his convictions.

Alvarado v. Wetzel*, 2019 WL 3037148 (E.D. Pa. July 10, 2019). In robbery-murder case where petitioner was the get-away driver and tried as an accomplice, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on due process grounds to the trial judge's written response to a question from the jury during deliberations concerning accomplice liability that suggested that the jury could convict petitioner on an accomplice liability theory based on the actus reus element alone without any finding that she had the mens rea, or intent element, necessary for accomplice liability. Post-conviction counsel was also ineffective in failing to raise the trial ineffectiveness claim premised on a due process violation. (See subsection I.B.8. for a complete summary of the trial ineffective assistance claim.) Following petitioner's conviction for robbery and second degree murder, trial counsel represented her on direct appeal and raised a single issue: "Did the trial court commit legal error by instructing the jury that she could be convicted under the accomplice theory solely by aiding after the crime had been committed?” Petitioner’s judgment and sentence were affirmed with the appellate court finding that the instruction complied with state law. In state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner unsuccessfully argued that trial counsel had been ineffective in failing to object to the trial court’s written response to the final jury question. In the federal habeas proceedings, petitioner alleged that her due process rights were violated by the supplemental instruction and that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object on this basis. Because petitioner’s state counsel had relied only on state law on appeal and in state post-conviction proceedings, the claims were unexhausted. And because no available state remedy remained open, they were deemed procedurally defaulted. The default was overcome for the trial ineffectiveness claim based on post-conviction counsel’s ineffectiveness. Although post-conviction counsel did challenge trial counsel’s performance under state law, post-conviction counsel overlooked the “significant and obvious” due process implications of the written supplemental jury instruction and trial counsel’s failure to object on that ground. No strategic reason for the omission of the due process argument could be discerned. “Having shown that she presents a substantial claim of ineffectiveness of trial counsel and that her postconviction counsel’s performance was deficient for allowing the default of that claim, [petitioner] has shown that the procedural default of her ineffective assistance of counsel claim may be excused under Martinez.”

Nika v. Gittere, 2019 WL 2453658 (D. Nev. June 12, 2019) (1995 trial and sentencing) (initial state post-conviction proceedings 1998-2006). Habeas relief is granted as to the death sentence on three claims, including ineffective assistance of counsel for inadequately investigating and presenting mitigation and for failing to contact the Yugoslavian consulate for assistance. (See subsection II.A.3. for discussion of the merits of the IAC claims.) Nika grew up in Serbia and was 19 when he came to the U.S. Nika only knew his wife and her family about 5 years prior to the crime. Although Nika’s “entire biological family and all the records related to his childhood remained in Serbia,” trial counsel obtained no mitigation regarding Nika’s background in Serbia. With a reasonable investigation

[t]he jury would have heard of Nika’s upbringing as a member of a marginalized group [Roma], in abject poverty, in a cold and leaky one-room mud-brick house with no indoor plumbing. The jury would have heard that Nika worked as a child to help support his family and had to beg and scavenge for food. The jury would have heard that Nika’s father was an alcoholic for much of Nika’s childhood, and that he engaged in extramarital affairs. The jury would have heard that Nika was brutally beaten by his father throughout his childhood. The jury would have heard about Nika’s cognitive and impulse-control deficits, and his minimal education. The jury would have heard of Nika’s military service. The jury would have heard that, in Serbia, Nika had an extended family and circle of friends that cared about him.

The failure to develop such evidence was deficient performance and had such evidence been presented, there is a reasonable probability that Nika would not have been sentenced to death. Trial counsel was also found deficient in failing to contact the Yugoslavian consulate for assistance in obtaining mitigation evidence. Although state habeas counsel alleged trial counsel’s ineffectiveness for not making contact with the consulate, state habeas counsel failed to show what such contact would have produced. When the claim was raised again in a second state habeas proceeding with a showing of the assistance the consulate could have provided, the claim was found by the state court to be procedurally defaulted. The ineffectiveness of initial state habeas counsel in raising the claim without including evidence showing prejudice provided the cause necessary to overcome the default under Martinez v. Ryan. And prejudice was shown through evidence establishing the assistance that second habeas counsel received from the consulate. Serbian officials, inter alia, “facilitated interviews with family and friends of Nika in Serbia; obtained Nika’s school, medical and military records; helped secure a culturally competent expert; . . . and provided additional information regarding Roma culture.”

Jones v. Gavin*, 395 F.Supp.3d 440 (E.D. Pa. 2019). In murder case, petitioner’s trial attorney was ineffective in failing to call two police officers to impeach two Commonwealth eyewitnesses who identified petitioner as the shooter of the victim. Although the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under both the inadequate state rule doctrine and Martinez v. Ryan. During state post-conviction proceedings, petitioner repeatedly sought to raise the failure to impeach claim through pro se filings because neither petitioner’s initial post-conviction counsel nor replacement post-conviction counsel would raise the claim. After convoluted proceedings in the post-conviction and Superior Court, post-conviction counsel was ordered by the Superior Court to carefully evaluate the claim in an amended petition. Based on the new filing, the Superior Court vacated the order denying relief and ordered an evidentiary hearing on the claim. The Superior Court observed that identification of the shooter was the key issue at trial and that prior inconsistent statements made by the witnesses to police officers at the crime scene about what the shooter was wearing could have supported the defense theory that petitioner was not in fact the shooter. The Superior Court stated that “[h]ad the jury heard the evidence, it may have cast serious doubt on the veracity of the eyewitnesses.” Although trial counsel had suggested during cross-examination of the witnesses that they had given inconsistent statements in the past, counsel did not introduce evidence of those statements to confirm his suggestion. An evidentiary hearing was deemed necessary to determine if trial counsel had a reasonable basis for proceeding as he did. The hearing was not held, however, as the Pennsylvania Supreme Court ruled that the Superior Court had erred in requiring post-conviction counsel to address the claim. Ultimately, the claim was not addressed on the merits in the state court. Because the rule applied by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in finding error by the lower court was not firmly established at the relevant time, the resulting procedural bar was not adequate. In applying the Martinez analysis, the district court easily found that the defaulted claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel had “some merit,” by looking to the Superior Court’s statements about the claim. Turning to post-conviction counsel’s performance, the record showed that initial post-conviction counsel was aware through petitioner’s pro se attempt to amend his post-conviction petition that petitioner wished to raise the claim. Nevertheless, post-conviction counsel did not include the claim. This omission was not a tactical choice. At a federal evidentiary hearing, post-conviction counsel could not articulate a reason for not raising the claim and no strategy was invoked. Because post-conviction counsel was alerted to the issue, he had an obligation to determine whether it had arguable merit before deciding not to raise it. He did not do so. Had he, he would have recognized that the issue had merit. Because petitioner showed that post-conviction counsel was deficient and that the underlying trial ineffectiveness claim had merit, the default of the trial ineffectiveness claim was excused under Martinez. (For a full discussion of the merits of the claim, see section I.B.4.)

Gable v. Williams*, 2019 WL 1756468 (D. Ore. April 18, 2019), aff'd on other grounds, 49 F.4th 1315 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S.Ct. 1796 (2023). Granting habeas relief on claim that petitioner's constitutional rights were violated by the exclusion of evidence concerning a third party's confession to the murder petitioner was charged with, as well as on a claim that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present appropriate legal support, including citation to federal law, in support of the admission of evidence of third party guilt. (The substantive exclusion of evidence claim was raised in state court solely as a state law violation.) Although the claims were procedurally defaulted, petitioner satisfied the Schlup actual innocence test. Multiple witnesses recanted with persuasive explanations for why they had lied, including coercive interrogation tactics, and expert witnesses testified about how the unethical and flawed polygraph testing procedures and the improper and coercive interrogations combined to obtain false testimony from the examinees. In addition, there was the third party confession that had indicia of reliability. The showing of innocence overcame the default of both the substantive exclusion of evidence claim and the ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Regarding the defaulted trial ineffective assistance of counsel claim, the district court ruled in the alternative that Martinez was satisfied to overcome the default. In light of the prior merits resolution of the exclusion of evidence claim, it was easily found that trial counsel's failure to assert petitioner's rights under Chambers v. Mississippi stated a substantial claim. Petitioner also demonstrated a reasonable probability that, absent the deficient performance of his post-conviction counsel, the result of the post-conviction proceedings would have been different. Therefore, the procedural bar to the trial ineffectiveness claim is overcome under Martinez.

Vonville v. Kerestes*, 2019 WL 1040747 (M.D. Pa. March 5, 2019), appeal dismissed, 2019 WL 4668042 (3rd Cir. Aug. 13, 2019). In case where petitioner was convicted of third degree murder, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to a jury instruction allowing the jurors to infer guilt from petitioner's failure to testify. Although the claim was procedurally defaulted, the default was excused under Martinez due to the ineffectiveness of post-conviction counsel in failing to raise the claim. First, the defaulted claim was "substantial," i.e., it had "some merit." The inquiry into whether a claim is "substantial" is a notably lower standard than the proof of prejudice required by Strickland's second prong. The failure to object to a jury instruction that is expressly forbidden by Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), is clearly substandard under the first prong of Strickland. As to whether post-conviction counsel was ineffective for purposes of Martinez, at this stage of the analysis what is important is "that the underlying ineffective-assistance-of-trial-counsel claim is 'substantial,' not that a petitioner has, in fact, been 'prejudiced' by trial counsel's deficient performance under Strickland." (Citation omitted.) Thus, if petitioner "shows that his underlying ineffective-assistance-of-trial-counsel claim has some merit and that his state post-conviction counsel's performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, he has shown sufficient prejudice from counsel's ineffective assistance that his procedural default must be excused under Martinez." (Citation omitted.) The record was devoid of any strategic basis for post-conviction counsel's omission of the trial ineffectiveness claim. The omission of the significant and obvious issue rebutted the strong presumption that post-conviction counsel's inaction was tactical. The court was unpersuaded by the Commonwealth's argument that it was inconceivable that the trial court had in fact incorrectly instructed the jury, reading the instruction in the context of other contemporaneous instructions and given the trial court's extensive experience. Under these circumstances, the Commonwealth argued, the transcript must have been the result of a typographical or scrivener's error. The court responded that experience does not render one immune from error and that having given the correct instruction in other cases did not establish that the judge provided a correct one in the case at hand. Also unpersuasive was the argument that because trial, appellate and post-conviction counsel were experienced, the failure by any of them to raise the issue pointed again to a scrivener's error. Experience alone does not render a claim of ineffective assistance incredible. The court further rejected the Commonwealth's request to hold a hearing at which trial counsel and the prosecutors could provide their recollections of the actual jury charge. (The trial judge was deceased.) Notably, the Commonwealth made no proffer that any of the parties would testify that the correct instruction was given. In addition, although the Commonwealth took the position early on in the habeas proceedings that a typographical error explained the erroneous instruction, it never asked for a hearing on that assertion until after the Magistrate Judge recommended a grant of relief on the claim. The request for a hearing was therefore waived. Finally, no hearing was warranted because the transcript was certified as accurate by the stenographer and signed and approved by the trial judge. "This is essentially the testimony of the court reporter and the trial judge that the jury was, in fact, instructed that they 'may infer any inference of guilt from the fact that he did not testify in his own defense.'" Having overcome the default, the merits of the claim was addressed. (See subsection I.B.8. for a summary of the merits analysis.)

2016: McNish v. Westbrook*, 149 F. Supp. 3d 847 (E.D. Tenn. 2016) (trial and sentencing in 1984).

Counsel ineffective in capital sentencing for failing to adequately investigate and present mitigating evidence. This issue was first raised on appeal of the denial of state post-conviction. The District Court held the issue was procedurally defaulted but the Sixth Circuit remanded following the decisions in Martinez v. Ryan and Trevino v. Thaler. On remand, the District Court held that post-conviction counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert trial counsel's ineffectiveness and the issue was "substantial." Therefore, the procedural default was excused. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient because trial counsel "failed to explore a wealth of evidence that was available" concerning the defendant's social, mental, and family history. While counsel had available records that indicated "a history of attempted suicides, depression, blackouts, and drug abuse," as well as indications of the defendant's traumatic childhood, counsel "chose not to investigate petitioner's family history any further because of their decision to pursue a reasonable doubt defense." This decision was not a valid strategic decision "because counsel did not fulfill their obligation to independently investigate this evidence in order to make an informed decision." Moreover, the decision to "limit their investigation" was not reasonable, "particularly considering that counsel had a general knowledge of the difficulties of Petitioner's family history." Prejudice was established. "The sum of the testimony portrayed Petitioner as a good-hearted, tender, and compassionate person who was not violent and loved his family and friends," which was "undermined by the nature of the crime for which Petitioner had been convicted." If counsel had adequately investigated and presented the evidence, the jury would have heard evidence of the "degenerative environment Petitioner grew up in" with parents that ran a bootleg business in a dry county. The petitioner was physically and sexually abused by his parents, their customers, and his older siblings. He became addicted to prescription medications after back and head injuries. He attempted suicide and was admitted to a mental health center where he was diagnosed with “hysterical personality and drug dependence.”

2015: Bowers v. McFadden, 153 F. Supp. 3d 875 (D.S.C. 2015). Under AEDPA, counsel ineffective in failing to challenge imposition of mandatory life sentence under “two strikes” statute. The defendant was convicted of common law assault with intent to ravish in 1976. In 2004, he was convicted of armed robbery. In sentencing, the state asserted that the “two strikes” statute was applicable. Under the statute, only a “most serious offense” qualifies as a strike. Qualifying offenses, not including common law assault with intent to ravish, are listed in the statute, but some other criminal sexual conduct offenses (CSC) are. The CSC rubric was established by statute in 1977 and includes varying degrees of offense. First and second degree CSC offenses do qualify as a “most serious offense” under the two strikes law. Other CSC offenses do not. Trial counsel’s conduct was deficient because counsel failed to conduct any research which would have revealed that common law assault with intent to ravish included only two elements: (1) an assault by a male on a female, (2) with the intent to rape. No aggravated circumstance, such as force or coercion, was required. State v. Lindsay, 583 S.E.2d 740 (2003), which was decided just a year before trial, was all the research counsel would have needed. Nonetheless, in sentencing trial counsel conceded that assault with intent to ravish was “the same basically” as CSC 1st or 2nd and the mandatory life sentence was imposed. Prejudice was clear. Post-conviction counsel failed to raise the issue of trial counsel’s ineffectiveness until the appeal to the Court of Appeals from the denial of post-conviction. The state court recognized that assault with intent to ravish may not be a “most serious offense” for purposes of the “two strikes” statute but declined to reach the merits because of the procedural default. After reviewing the elements of the offenses, the federal court also rejected the state’s argument that the underlying facts of the assault with intent to ravish qualified as a “most serious offense.” The indictment did not contain sufficient information to reach this conclusion and the court held that it would be improper to rely on an affidavit from an arresting officer. South Carolina courts had never relied on this type of information and federal courts would not do so in the analogous circumstance of the Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA) where only “conclusive judicial record[s]” could be considered. Finally, under Martinez v. Ryan, 132 S. Ct. 1309 (2012), the federal court held that it could reach the merits of the trial ineffectiveness claim, despite the state court procedural default, because the claim “is a substantial one that state PCR counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the issue and such failure was obviously prejudicial.”

2014: Roberts v. Howton, 13 F. Supp. 3d 1077 (D. Ore. 2014). Under AEDPA, counsel was ineffective in manslaughter case for advising the defendant to plead guilty without adequately investigating beforehand. While this issue had not been asserted in state post-conviction, the procedural default was excused under Martinez. The defendant was convicted of killing a woman, who was involved with the defendant’s ex-lover. The state’s theory was that she had been killed at the defendant’s home and then her body was dumped in the park where it was found. The state’s case was premised upon circumstantial evidence involving the volatile lesbian “love triangle,” the defendant’s history of domestic violence, incriminating threats made by the defendant prior to the murder, and cell phone tower evidence. Counsel knew that the state’s case relied significantly on the cell tower evidence and had filed a motion for funding for an expert on this issue and filed a motion to suppress this evidence. While the defendant had been prepared to go to trial, she changed her plea less than a month prior to the scheduled trial based on defense counsel's advice. Counsel advised the plea because the prosecution informed defense counsel that the cell tower evidence would place the defendant in the vicinity of the park close to the time the pathologist believed the murder occurred. The prosecutor testified that he had a phone call with an employee of Verizon Wireless, who said that his "preliminary" review of "the call data 'code'" might show that the defendant was near the park. After that he met with the defense team and shared this information. The lead defense counsel offered an affidavit in state post-conviction asserting that he had investigated and his investigator reached the same conclusion. The defense investigator and co-counsel, however, disputed this information. Co-counsel had contacted an expert to say that the cell tower evidence could be disputed but the expert was never retained. Counsel's conduct was deficient in relying on the state's representation of the evidence without adequately investigating. Counsel's conduct was "particularly troubling" in light of the fact that the state's representation was admittedly based on "preliminary" information about what "might" be established. Prejudice was also established as there was a reasonable probability that the defendant would not have pled guilty if counsel had adequately investigated. This was clear in that several defense experts, and even the state's expert in the habeas proceedings, agreed that the state could not have pinpointed the defendant's location based on the cell phone tower data evidence available.

C. State Court Cases

2023: Mack v. State, 523 P.3d 1235 (Alaska App. 2023). "[A] criminal defendant in Alaska has the right to appeal a final criminal or post-conviction relief judgment, and a criminal defendant who is indigent is entitled to court-appointed counsel — and the effective assistance of that counsel — in pursuing a direct appeal or an appeal from a judgment on a first post-conviction relief application. If a defendant's attorney unreasonably fails to consult with the defendant regarding the appeal, and the defendant can show a reasonable possibility that the attorney's deficient representation was the but-for cause of their failure to appeal, then the defendant is entitled to reinstatement of the appeal, regardless of a showing of merit on any of the underlying claims of error."

People v. Addison*, 217 N.E.3d 1011 (Il. 2023). Petitioner was denied his state law right to reasonable assistance by appointed postconviction counsel where post-conviction counsel failed to raise in the amended petition allegations of ineffective assistance by direct appeal counsel in order to avoid a ruling that the claims of ineffective assistance by trial counsel were forfeited. Notably, in the pro se petition filed by petitioner, ineffective assistance of appellate counsel was alleged. Following her appointment, postconviction counsel determined that some of the claims in the pro se petition were worth pursuing in the amended petition but failed to include appellate counsel ineffectiveness in the petition even though the claims that were raised could have been brought in the direct appeal. When the State filed a motion to dismiss, it noted the absence of any appellate ineffectiveness allegations when contending that the claims that were raised were forfeited. And yet postconviction counsel failed to amend the petition in response. "We cannot hold that postconviction counsel provided reasonable assistance where she identified several claims that she believed were worth pursuing but did not make the necessary amendments to put the claims in their proper form." On this record, petitioner rebutted the presumption of reasonable assistance that arose from postconviction counsel's Rule 651(c) certificate stating that she had consulted with petitioner to ascertain his constitutional claims, she had examined the court file and trial record, and she had made any amendments to petitioner's pro se petition necessary to adequately present his claims. The proper remedy is remand for compliance with the certification rule.

Powell v. State*, 298 A.3d 966 (Md. App. 2023). Ineffective assistance by post-conviction counsel qualified as extraordinary cause to overcome the missed deadline for filing the post-conviction petition. Under state law, petitioner had a statutory right to the assistance of counsel in connection with his petition for post-conviction relief.

In failing to protect [petitioner's] rights by filing a timely post-conviction petition before the well-known statutory deadline, his counsel committed legal malpractice. In missing that deadline, counsel failed to adhere to "prevailing professional norms." . . . [Petitioner], therefore, has rebutted the presumption of professional competence.

(Internal citations omitted.) That the missed deadline was the result of negligence was sufficient to constitute extraordinary cause.

2022: People v. Delgado, 211 N.E.3d 872 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Post-conviction counsel was ineffective in failing to properly raise and support the sentencing claim that was outlined in the petition, resulting in the dismissal of the claim at the first stage of the proceedings. Although post-conviction counsel alluded to a constitutional issue, namely that the trial court incorrectly viewed the 20-year add-on to petitioner's sentence as mandatory when, because petitioner was a juvenile at the time of the offense, the add-on was actually discretionary, post-conviction counsel unreasonably failed to properly frame the issue. Post-conviction counsel should have alleged that petitioner's due process rights were violated where he was deprived of his right to elect the statute under which he should have been sentenced and also that appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to raise the issue on appeal. Prejudice is established because the ineffective assistance of appellate counsel claim had arguable merit so if post-conviction counsel had properly raised the claim, the petition would have survived the first stage of post-conviction proceedings. The case is remanded so petitioner has the opportunity to amend his petition to include the ineffectiveness claim and proceed to the second stage of post-conviction proceedings.

2018: Allison v. State, 914 N.W.2d 866 (Iowa 2018), abrogation by statute recognized by Sandoval v. State, 975 N.W.2d 434 (Iowa 2022). The Iowa Supreme Court, after a lengthy recitation of SCOTUS cases, cases of other states, and Iowa cases, determined that Iowa law permits a "variant of the equitable doctrine employed in Martinez [v. Ryan]" "[i]n order to avoid the difficult constitutional position that would result in denying a remedy where defense counsel allegedly provided ineffective assistance at trial and post-conviction counsel is ineffective in raising that claim," and held that where a post-conviction review petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel was timely filed under state law and a successive PCR petition alleging post-conviction counsel was ineffective in presenting the ineffectiveness of trial counsel claim, the timing of the filing of the second PCR petition relates back to the timing of the filing of the original PCR petition. 914 N.W.3d at 891. The “application of the relation-back doctrine ensures that the right to effective assistance of counsel in PCR is not cut off by the running of the statute of limitations.” Id.

Edward M. v. Commissioner of Correction, 201 A.3d. 492 (Conn. Ct. App. 2018). In case where petitioner was convicted of sexual assault in the first degree and risk of injury to a child, based upon petitioner’s alleged sexual abuse of his daughter, trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence to corroborate his assertion that he was circumcised, which conflicted with testimony presented by the prosecution. Counsel in petitioner’s first habeas proceeding was also ineffective in failing to challenge the omission by trial counsel. In this case, there was no physical evidence of sexual abuse and the state admitted during closing argument that the case was a contest of credibility between petitioner and his daughter. The second habeas court hearing petitioner’s case found that petitioner’s daughter had described his penis as having skin on it and wrinkles, and she and her mother both testified at trial that he was uncircumcised. Both petitioner and his girlfriend at the time testified that he was circumcised. Trial counsel did not offer available medical records, testimony from a neutral third party or medical witness, or photographs of the petitioner’s penis. During deliberations, the jury sent a note asking why such evidence had not been presented. The second habeas court granted relief to petitioner, which the state appealed. Under Connecticut law, “[t]he use of a habeas petition to raise an ineffective assistance of habeas counsel claim, commonly referred to as a habeas on a habeas, was approved by our Supreme Court in Lozada v. Warden, 223 Conn. 834, 613 A.2d 818 (1992).” In that case, the Connecticut Supreme Court had determined that the statutory right to habeas counsel includes an implied requirement that habeas counsel be effective. The state argued that the habeas court improperly determined that evidence of whether petitioner was circumcised at the time of trial, years after the alleged abuse, was relevant and admissible at trial, disregarded trial counsel’s tactical decision to present evidence of petitioner’s circumcised penis only through testimony, and relied on trial counsel’s admission that failing to present the medical evidence was a mistake. The Appellate Court of Connecticut affirmed the habeas court’s grant of relief, finding that the photographs and medical evidence of petitioner’s circumcised penis at the time of trial met the extremely low standard for relevance, even if they did not affirmatively prove that petitioner was circumcised at the time of the alleged abuse. Trial counsel’s failure to present this evidence was not a tactical decision; he admitted that he did not consider taking a photograph or having some appropriate person view the petitioner’s circumcised penis and testify. Trial counsel admitted that he was distracted from this issue by other evidence in the case and missed the importance of the medical records. Habeas counsel failed to raise this at petitioner’s first habeas trial even though petitioner had included this claim in his pro se petition, and even though trial counsel urged habeas counsel to raise this issue. The failure to present the evidence was prejudicial – given that the circumcision issue was the major point of dispute at the trial, there is a reasonable probability that further evidence of the petitioner’s circumcision would have caused a different result. The fact that the jury asked this question, did not receive an answer, and then convicted petitioner is significant.

2017: Kaddah v. Com’r of Corrections, 153 A.3d 1233 (Conn. 2017). Because there is a statutory right to assigned counsel in a second habeas proceeding, and that necessarily includes the right to competent counsel, Connecticut common law “authorizes a third habeas petition as a proper vehicle to vindicate that right,” i.e., a third habeas petition can properly allege a claim of ineffective assistance by second habeas counsel.

2016: People v. Groszek, 54 N.E.3d 982 (Ill. Ct. App. 2016). A defendant’s right to the reasonable assistance of post-conviction counsel applies to both appointed counsel and privately retained counsel. Here, retained post-conviction counsel was ineffective in his raising of challenges to plea counsel’s performance. Although deficiencies were alleged, prejudice was not. “The complete omission of the second prong of the Strickland analysis from the amended petition and the lack of oral argument in support of this prong was unreasonable. Without this necessary allegation and argument, the amended petition could never satisfy the ‘substantial showing’ of ineffective assistance required to advance the petition to an evidentiary hearing.”

2013: Grayson v. State*, 118 So. 3d 118 (Miss. 2013). “[B]ecause this Court has recognized that [post-conviction relief] proceedings are a critical stage of the death-penalty appeal process at the state level, today we make clear that PCR petitioners who are under a sentence of death do have a right to the effective assistance of PCR counsel” under state law.

State v. Quixal, 70 A.3d 749 (N.J. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 2013). “[D]efendants have a State constitutional right to counsel when raising ineffective assistance of trial counsel for the first time, whether raised on direct appeal or by way of PCR.”

2012: Lapointe v. Commissioner of Correction, 53 A.3d 257 (Conn. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in first post-conviction proceeding for failing to pursue Brady claim. The defendant, who suffered from Dandy-Walker’s Syndrome, which made him “slow and unsteady of his feet” and left him incapable of lifting heavy objects, was convicted of murdering his wife’s 88-year-old grandmother, who lived a 10-15 minute walk from his home. The defendant called 911 at 8:27 p.m. to report a fire at the victim’s apartment. She had been stabbed, sexually assaulted, and strangled. She died of a combination of asphyxia by strangulation and smoke inhalation. The murder was unresolved for more than two years before the case was reassigned to Detective Ludlow, who had previously been a crime scene evidence officer. During the initial investigation, Ludlow had made notes after speaking with two state fire marshals that indicated the fire had been burning for a minimum of 30-40 minutes before firefighters arrived at the scene. The defendant’s wife (who was divorced by the time of trial) had informed police that the only time the defendant was out of her sight the night of the murder was between 6:15-7:00 p.m. Trial counsel did not call her as a witness as he was unaware of the Ludlow note and the importance of this information to the defendant’s alibi defense. Counsel also did not obtain an arson expert because he was unaware of the notes. Even if the fire could have been set in the 45 minute window unaccounted for by the ex-wife (as state experts testified), the facts of the crimes, including walking to and from the scene, left a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different if the Ludlow notes had been disclosed to the defense. While the second habeas court found the state’s expert to be more credible, “[i]f the Ludlow note had been disclosed to trial counsel, however, it would have been the responsibility of the jury and not the court to weigh the credibility of the arson experts.”

Capital Case*

2011: Allen v. LeMaster*, 267 P.3d 806 (N.M. 2011). Under state criminal rules, it was improper for the post-conviction court to order the capital defendant to testify by deposition or to have his habeas petition dismissed as a sanction.

Keough v. State, 356 S.W.3d 366 (Tenn. 2011). The court erred in capital post-conviction proceedings in denying the petitioner's motion to limit the cross-examination of petitioner, which resulted in the petitioner declining to testify in support of his claims of ineffective assistance of counsel. Under a state rule, petitioner was entitled to have the scope of cross-examination limited to supporting "the allegations of the petition" or the state's rebuttal of the allegations. Thus, petitioner's motion to preclude cross-examination "related to the factual allegations of the criminal charges for which he was convicted" should have been granted. Here, lead counsel was physically unable to testify. Co-counsel could not "recall details of the representation." Thus, "Petitioner's testimony about the factual allegations supporting his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was critical to his ability to prove his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel by clear and convincing proof." Remanded to allow petitioner to testify with cross limited to the relevant issues.

Lado v. State*, 804 N.W.2d 248 (Iowa 2011). Post-conviction counsel constructively denied defendant the right to counsel. The defendant filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief. The court appointed counsel and ordered counsel to amend the application within 60 days if necessary or the case was subject to dismissal for failure to prosecute. Counsel filed a motion but did not respond to the state's answer and motion for summary judgment, did not amend the application, and did not move to extend the time file. Thus, the case was dismissed for failure to prosecute. The court held that the statutory right to counsel implied the right to "effective assistance." Counsel's failures amounted to a denial of counsel, which was a structural error rendering the proceeding "presumptively unreliable."

Ex parte Medina, 361 S.W.3d 633 (Tex. Crim. App. 2011). New state habeas counsel appointed due to counsel's deliberate failure to submit an application for writ of habeas of corpus that contained sufficient specific facts as required by clear state statute and case law. Counsel simply submitted an application which stated factual and legal conclusions, which resulted in dismissal of the application. Counsel's conduct was deficient because he failed to file a cognizable writ application not because of incompetence but because of counsel's "misplaced desire to challenge the established law at the peril of his client." In short, "[b]y all appearances, counsel has thrown his client under the bus." Counsel held in contempt and denied compensation. New counsel appointed with 180 days to file.

2010: State v. Hicks, 986 A.2d 690 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2010). Appointed post-conviction counsel failed to adequately prosecute the post-conviction petition. The petitioner submitted a pro se petition and brief asserting two issues and counsel was appointed. Counsel argued those two issues but demonstrated a "fundamental ignorance of the salient facts underpinning defendant's conviction." Counsel also did not file a brief in support of the petition or even personally and independently review the case to determine whether other grounds for relief were available. The relief was not based on Strickland or a constitutional standard but was based instead on state case law and court rules.

2008: Taylor v. State, 882 N.E.2d 777 (Ind. Ct. App. 2008). Post-conviction counsel's conduct was deficient and in violation of due process under state law in felony murder case. The defendant was jointly tried with two co-defendants. One co-defendant's conviction was reversed on direct appeal based on argument and finding of fundamental error by the trial court in failing to instruct on the elements of the underlying felony of robbery. The defendant asserted ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel in post-conviction proceedings for the failure to assert this same error. Post-conviction counsel presented no evidence or argument other than providing a copy of the co-defendant's direct appeal decision and asserting that it was binding on the trial court. Under state law, this was deficient, such that the defendant "was deprived of a procedurally fair hearing."

2006: Menzies v. Galetka*, 150 P.3d 480 (Utah 2006). Post-conviction counsel ineffective in capital case for "willfully disregard[ing] nearly every aspect of Menzies' case. As a result, the court imposed discovery sanctions, granted summary judgment in favor of the State, and ultimately dismissed Menzies' petition for post-conviction relief." With new counsel, the death-sentenced inmate filed a Rule 60(b) motion alleging gross negligence and ineffective assistance. The Utah Supreme Court held that the district court erred in denying the Rule 60(b) motion and in compelling disclosure of work product. The defendant had initially been represented in post-conviction proceedings by pro bono counsel. After the state imposed rules for qualification and payment of counsel, the court sought qualified counsel for four months and all declined, but then Brass volunteered for appointment. He was appointed without the court ever conducting an inquiry to determine whether he was qualified under the state rule. Brass served as counsel for over five years and it would "be an understatement" to say he did little. His representation was "deplorable" in that he "willfully disregarded nearly every aspect of this case" and, in effect, "defaulted Menzies' entire post-conviction proceeding, resulting in the dismissal of Menzies' case." Counsel only met with the inmate a few times, avoided or refused his phone calls and did not respond to letters and cards. Counsel never conducted or hired anyone to conduct an investigation, notwithstanding repeated prior requests and the fact that the record indicates that extensive investigation on actual innocence and mitigation was needed. Prior counsel had obtained $2,000, but counsel did not even request these funds or consult with the prior pro bono team. Counsel also never challenged the inadequacy of the funding as prior counsel had and collected only his initial $5,000 appointment fee. Counsel also failed to meet numerous court deadlines and, ultimately, filed an amended petition that did little more than re-state the arguments that had been made in the first amended petition by pro bono counsel. Counsel failed to oppose the state's discovery requests, which resulted in orders for disclosure of trial counsel's file and the inmate's deposition. Counsel did not even appear for the inmate's deposition and instead sent an unqualified counsel. Counsel was ultimately prohibited from presenting evidence in support of the claims because of his numerous violations of court orders and procedures. Likewise, counsel failed to respond to the state's motion for summary judgment, which was granted in its entirety with prejudice. For more than a year, counsel never even informed the defendant that the case had been dismissed. Counsel filed a notice of appeal, but never filed a docketing statement, which resulted in dismissal of the appeal. When the court allowed the appeal anyway, counsel never filed an appellate brief, despite being granted two extensions of time. Counsel did file a motion in the district court to set aside the summary judgment under Rule 60(b)

stating only that the grounds would be set forth in a subsequent memo, which counsel never filed. More than a year after the event, counsel finally informed the defendant that summary judgment had been granted. Counsel still did not communicate with the defendant beyond this other than to inform the defendant that he would need new counsel without telling him why. Ultimately, another attorney from the state attended a capital litigation seminar and was asked to check on the status of Utah's death row. When she followed up on the case and learned of the events, she contacted the inmate and then filed an appearance as counsel and a memorandum in support of the Rule 60(b) motion focusing primarily on counsel's ineffectiveness. Ineffective counsel finally withdrew and admitted his inadequacies to a great extent. On appeal, the court held that the defendant has a statutory right to effective assistance of counsel, which the court analyzed under Strickland.

While the ABA standards are not determinative of whether counsel's performance was ineffective and courts should examine counsel's conduct in light of all the contemporary circumstances, they do represent "well-defined norms" that provide guidance to courts. Because Utah's post-conviction rules do not currently contain any provisions regarding counsel's performance in post-conviction death penalty proceedings, and because it is traditionally the duty of the courts to supervise the performance of counsel, we rely on the ABA Death Penalty Guidelines to the extent they are relevant to our decision.

Id. at 512-13 (citations and footnotes omitted). The court analyzed the case under the Guidelines but found that counsel's "ineffective representation went far beyond a failure to comply with the ABA Death Penalty Guidelines" and that counsel's "willful disregard for Menzies' case cannot possibly be construed as sound strategy." Prejudice presumed due to counsel's complete failure to "provide meaningful adversarial testing" in the case. Relief was required on the Rule 60(b) because, while an attorney's negligent acts are ordinarily chargeable to the client, a client should not be held liable for the attorney's actions where those actions are grossly negligent and the defendant has alleged a meritorious defense. Here, the defendant had alleged multiple errors that, if proven, would require relief. Remanded to the district court to reinstate the post-conviction proceedings and to allow the defendant to investigate his claims.

7. PROBATION REVOCATION

- 2021: Mesko v. Pa. Bd. of Probation & Parole, 245 A.3d 1174 (Commonwealth Ct. of Pa. 2021). “[W]here an indigent parolee properly requests representation of counsel from the public defender’s office for an administrative review of a parole revocation decision and is impermissibly denied, as occurred here, prejudice is presumed.”
- 2019: Petgrave v. State, 208 A.3d 371 (Maine 2019). Recognizing a right to effective assistance of counsel in probation revocation proceedings and creating a procedure for raising a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. (The post-conviction statute does not allow for challenges to probation revocation rulings.) “[A] defendant who seeks to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel after a probation revocation hearing may do so by filing a Rule 33 motion for a new trial, which, after it is filed, will be directed to the judge who issued the judgment revoking probation. The motion must be filed within thirty-five days after the entry of the judgment, or within seventy days after the entry of the judgment if the motion is based on the ground of newly-discovered evidence.” In addition, “The motion for a new hearing must include at least one affidavit ‘stating, with specificity, the basis for the claim’ of ineffective assistance of counsel.” An ineffectiveness claim will be reviewed under the Strickland standard.
- 2017: Selby v. State, 525 S.W.3d 842 (Tex. Ct. App. 2017). In proceeding to revoke community supervision, trial counsel was ineffective in advising defendant to admit he violated the conditions of the community supervision without having conducted the necessary investigation in order to provide informed advice to defendant. Defendant had pleaded guilty to aggravated sexual assault of a child. The trial court deferred an adjudication of guilt and placed defendant on community supervision for a period of ten years. As a condition of his community supervision, defendant was ordered to submit to periodic polygraph evaluations. A motion to revoke his community supervision was filed alleging that defendant had violated the conditions of his community supervision by viewing or possessing sexually stimulating or sexually oriented materials and by having contact with a minor. On advice of counsel defendant pleaded “true” to both violations, and the trial court found that defendant had violated the conditions of his community supervision. After conducting a punishment hearing, the trial court sentenced defendant to a term of ninety-nine years in prison. Trial counsel at the revocation proceeding performed deficiently because he was unaware of potential challenges to use of the polygraph evidence where defendant had made the admissions leading to the motion to revoke community supervision. Had defendant’s trial counsel challenged the admissibility of the polygraph evidence at the revocation hearing, there is a reasonable probability that the evidence would have been excluded and there would have been no basis for revoking community supervision.
- 2008: Gonzalez v. State, 979 So. 2d 1257 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2008). Counsel ineffective in probation revocation case for filing the motion to reduce or modify the sentence in an untimely fashion. State law allowed a period of 60 days after imposition of the sentence and counsel’s filing was timely from the written sentence but not the oral imposition, which was the appropriate trigger under state law. 60-day period re-opened.

Capital Case*

- 2006: People v. Gayton, 40 Cal. Rptr. 3d 40 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006). Counsel ineffective in probation revocation proceeding for failing to review the defendant's probation file and to present it to impeach the probation officer's testimony that the defendant never reported and had otherwise failed to comply with the terms of probation. The probation file and the officer's own notes completely contradicted the probation officer's notes but counsel never bothered to review the file despite the defendant's statements to him, which were "from a different universe" than the probation officer's statements. The probation file would have corroborated the defendant's statements and revealed that the probation officer's testimony was, at best, "brutally incorrect." Counsel's conduct was deficient because, he interviewed the probation officer, but otherwise "assumed his client was lying and did not bother to take even the most basic steps to test that assumption." There was "no justification for counsel's failure to review the file." Prejudice was "inescapable" where probation was revoked and the defendant confined for seven years.
- 2005: Mikell v. State, 903 So. 2d 1054 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005). Counsel was ineffective in probation revocation proceedings for failing to inform the court that it had authority to continue probation. The defendant had entered a no contest plea to lewd acts and been sentenced to 10 years suspended and five years probation. After he committed several probation violations and was brought before the court counsel presented mitigation evidence and the defendant asked for mercy. The trial court indicated her belief that legally she could not extend mercy and sentenced the defendant to concurrent 10 year terms. Trial counsel's conduct was deficient because state law clearly allowed the court to continue probation. Prejudice was found because the record reflects that the trial court would have considered continuing the probation if she had known that she could do so. Remanded for resentencing by the same trial court without opposition from the state.
- 2004: Matton v. State, 872 So. 2d 308 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2004). Counsel in sexual battery case was ineffective in probation revocation plea case for failing to advise the defendant that he was entitled to credit for his previously accrued "gain time" in prison and that, by entering plea agreement for 9 years credit, he was waiving his right to this gain time credit to which he was otherwise entitled. Counsel was also ineffective for failing to challenge the victim injury points included in the sentencing guidelines score sheet simply because they had been included in the initial sentencing and counsel believed she could not challenge them. Counsel's conduct was deficient because she could have made the challenge. Prejudice was found because the defendant was entitled to the gain time absent a knowing and intelligent waiver and the state could not include the victim injury points without proof of actual physical injury to the victim. Admission to probation violation withdrawn.

8. JUVENILE HEARINGS

2021: State in Interest of R.J.H., 319 So.3d 964 (La. App. 2021). In rape case involving a juvenile, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to hearsay testimony from a police officer regarding defendant's age.

State in Interest of C.C.H., 319 So.3d 940 (La. App. 2021). In rape case involving a juvenile, defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to hearsay testimony from a police officer regarding defendant's age. Prejudice is established because the hearsay testimony that defendant was fourteen years of age resulted in the imposition of a harsher punishment.

Matter of C.L.E., 502 P.3d 1154 (Or. App. 2021). Intellectually disabled youth who admitted to sexual crime in juvenile court by virtue of a plea was denied the effective assistance of counsel by his delinquency attorney's failure to have the youth's competency evaluated before advising the youth to enter the plea. The attorney explained that her interaction with the youth did not lead her to question his competence. "In view of the performance standard for lawyers representing juveniles and the information about juvenile competency at the time, and in view of the specific information about youth available to counsel, counsel's choice to rely on her interactions with youth to evaluate competency reflects an absence of professional skill and judgment." The probable cause affidavit in this case "stated that youth had been diagnosed as developmentally disabled and functioned at the level of an eight-year-old. Proceeding to a plea to facts constituting a felony sex offense without obtaining a competency evaluation, in the face of information that a client has the capacity of an eight-year-old, represents an absence of profession skill and judgment." Additional information available to counsel about her client through his dependency case—handled by her own office—further called into question his decision-making capacity. Prejudice is established through a retrospective competency evaluation indicating that the youth was not competent to render the plea. The lower court's rejection of that assessment was based on its finding that the youth had suffered a cognitive decline between the time he entered his plea and the time his lawyer had his competency evaluated. Such a finding, however, was not supported by the record.

2020: State v. K.A.B., 475 P.3d 216 (Wash. App. 2020). Counsel was ineffective for failing to adequately prepare and present a diminished capacity defense. In case where juvenile defendant was charged with two counts of second degree assault against her maternal grandmother, each with deadly weapon enhancements, counsel informed the court of her intent to present a diminished capacity defense, but failed to follow the court's instructions and did not otherwise take the steps necessary to meaningfully present a diminished capacity defense. The court determined that the defendant was prejudiced by this deficient performance because the diminished capacity defense was the only defense offered, and there was a reasonable probability that had the juvenile court been presented with an expert opinion demonstrating that the defendant lacked criminal intent due to her mental health condition and her dosage of fluoxetine, the result would have been different.

2019: A.M. v. State, 134 N.E.3d 361 (Ind. 2019). In juvenile delinquency proceedings, juveniles are entitled to the effective assistance of counsel but the standard to be applied in assessing such claims is not Strickland. Instead, “a due process standard governs a child’s claim that he received ineffective assistance in a disposition-modification hearing during his delinquency proceedings. In assessing these claims, we consider counsel’s overall performance and determine whether that performance ensured the child received a fundamentally fair hearing resulting in a disposition serving his best interests.”

2013: In re Danielle J., 1 N.E.3d 510 (Ill. 2013). Counsel was ineffective in juvenile delinquency proceeding for misdemeanor battery for failing to timely make a request for a continuance under supervision, the successful conclusion of which would avoid an adjudication. Under a state statute, the juvenile could obtain continuance under supervision only if, prior to adjudication and with consent of the state attorney, the juvenile pled guilty. Prior to trial, the state offered to recommend a nine-month continuance under supervision in exchange for a guilty plea. The offer was rejected and the defendant proceeded to trial. Only after she was found guilty did defense counsel request a continuance under supervision. Counsel’s conduct was deficient in failing to be aware of the state statute. Prejudice established. Remanded for a new adjudication.

Commonwealth v. Robertson*, 431 S.W.3d 430 (Ky. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sodomy and sexual assault case for complete failure to provide representation during juvenile transfer hearing and for failing to object to the prosecution’s improper argument on the defendant’s failure to testify during trial. The defendant was charged with sexually molesting two young boys that he babysat when he was 16-17 years old. He was charged in August 1995 when he was six weeks shy of his eighteenth birthday. At the juvenile transfer hearing, counsel provided essentially no representation resulting in a presumption of prejudice under Cronic.

[C]ounsel called no witnesses and did not challenge the testimony of a witness called by the Commonwealth who testified incorrectly regarding programs which could assist with [the defendant’s] rehabilitation as a juvenile. The law at the time of the hearing clearly refuted this testimony.

Nonetheless, given the defendant’s age at the time of this opinion state law provided no remedy. Juvenile court jurisdiction ends at age 21. The defendant is now in his thirties. “To send [him] back before a juvenile court would be to ask the juvenile court to operate under the fiction that he could still benefit from a trial as a juvenile.” The defendant was entitled to a new trial, however, due to counsel’s ineffectiveness during trial for failing to object to the references to his failure to testify.

2012: State in Interest of D.L., 96 So. 3d 580 (La. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in juvenile adjudication for armed robbery case for failing to move to dismiss due to court’s failure to hold hearing within 30 days of the appearance as required by state law. Mandatory dismissal was required absent good cause showing by the state before the 30 days elapsed. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

State in Interest of S.L.*, 94 So. 3d 822 (La. Ct. App. 2012). Counsel ineffective in juvenile adjudication for possession of firearm while in possession of marijuana case for failing to move to suppress the defendant’s confession. After fleeing police on bicycles, the defendant and his co-defendant fled on foot. Neither the officers pursuing nor the officers who eventually cut off their flight from the front saw either boy drop anything. Along the path they ran, however, the police found a pistol and a bag containing 5.1 grams of marijuana. Although the 16-year-old defendant was never advised of his Miranda rights or given an opportunity to speak to his mother, he made statements to an officer admitting that the gun and drugs were his. The officer admitted that the conversation was an “extended one-on-one conversation at the police station” while the defendant was cuffed. The officer even told the defendant at the time that he knew the statement was likely inadmissible and the officer attempted to correct the problem by asking the defendant’s mother to execute an advice of rights form after the fact. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudicial in failing to move to suppress the statement.

2009: In re Edward S., 92 Cal. Rptr. 3d 725 (Cal. Ct. App. 2009). Counsel was ineffective in juvenile jurisdictional hearing in sex offense case for: (1) failing to investigate potentially exculpatory evidence; (2) failing to seek an adequate continuance based on a mistake of law; and, (3) failing to move for a substitution of counsel knowing he was unable to devote the time and resources necessary to properly defend the case. Counsel was aware that the state’s case was based almost entirely on the credibility of the ten-year-old alleged victim. The juvenile defendant provided counsel with information that the victim and her siblings had been molested by an uncle and perhaps her father and that the alleged victim and her mother had motives to fabricate the charges. Counsel was also given information about corroborating witnesses, but made no attempt to investigate. Counsel gave no strategic reason for the failure and explained only that he had an overwhelming caseload and a lack of resources and needed investigators and experts due to his supervisor’s denial of funds and his fear of being fired if he pushed too hard on those requests. “[N]o reasonable defense attorney would have declined to investigate the information [the juvenile] provided simply because it contained hearsay and he was an ex-felon (especially one who had been released from custody six years earlier and was presently gainfully employed).” Counsel also sought a continuance of only seven days, although he knew this was inadequate, because he mistakenly believed the state statutes did not allow for a longer continuance. Moreover, even if the statute had imposed a seven-day limit, counsel still could have requested a longer continuance, which would have waived speedy trial rights. Alternatively, counsel should have moved to withdraw because “a conflict of interest is inevitably created when a public defender is compelled by his or her excessive caseload to choose between the rights of the various indigent defendants he or she is representing.” Prejudice established.

Acknowledging that the prosecution’s case boiled down to the question “why would a ten-year-old child make this up?”, [counsel’s] only response was “well, it’s not the defense’s burden to provide an answer to that question. And I don’t think that anyone would have an answer to that question.” But [the juvenile] had provided [counsel] several potential answers.

The potential answers, however, were not investigated and corroborated with available evidence. The finding of prejudice was based primarily on: (1) the closeness of the case “because there was no eyewitness or physical evidence and the matter turned almost entirely on credibility”; (2) the evidence made available to counsel by the juvenile “was germane to the central issue of the victim’s credibility”; and (3) counsel “failed to produce available evidence indicating that [the juvenile] did not fit the typical personality or historical profile for juvenile sex offenders and lack[ed] the psychological sophistication necessary to steadfastly maintain his innocence over a long period of time and in the face of a polygraph test.”

2008: Houskeeper v. State, 197 P.3d 636 (Utah 2008). Counsel ineffective in attempted rape case for failing to adequately investigate and present evidence at defendant’s juvenile retention hearing. The 17-year-old defendant was initially charged with aggravated sexual assault, which is included in offenses for which state statutes create a “strong presumption that cases involving inherently violent and aggressive offenses by juveniles sixteen years of age and older will be transferred to the district court.” Due to stipulations, the only relevant issue once the state established “probable cause” of guilt was whether the defendant committed the offense in a “violent, aggressive, or premeditated manner.” Aside from cross-examination of the state’s medical experts, counsel presented only the defendant’s testimony. The defendant pursued and preserved “the bindover through a variety of legal actions,” but ultimately was tried as an adult. He was convicted of attempted rape, a lesser included offense of aggravated sexual assault, but acquitted of forcible sodomy. He was given a 3 year to life sentence, suspended to one year confinement and three years of probation, and required to register as a sex offender. Counsel’s conduct was deficient and prejudice was found because, “[w]ithout defense witnesses, [the defendant was bound over to answer the charge of aggravated sexual assault, a crime that requires proof of aggression and/or violence,” but “[w]ith defense witnesses [including two medical experts], [he] was convicted of attempted rape, a crime that does not require proof of any explicit element of aggression and/or violence.” The defendant asserted only that the result of his attempted rape conviction “was a harsher penalty than he would have received for the same or even greater conviction in juvenile court.” While he was given a fair trial, the court held that “the jury trial did not remedy the prejudice he suffered.” Because the defendant had already served his jail sentence and paid his fine, the only remedy available was restoration of the ability to petition for expungement of his records, which he would have had if convicted in juvenile court but did not due to adult conviction.

9. INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT OR MEDICATION PROCEEDINGS

2024: In re Carolyn JS, 248 N.E.3d 475 (Ill. App. 2024). In case involving an order allowing the involuntary administration of medication on a woman (respondent) being held at a mental health facility, respondent's state law right to the effective assistance of counsel was violated by appointed counsel's failure to move to dismiss the medication petition as facially insufficient. The petition failed to allege facts to support the statutory conclusions that respondent was subject to involuntary admission. Although the appeal was technically moot because the challenged medication order had expired, it was reasonably likely that respondent would again be subjected to involuntary medication proceedings with a result that left insufficient time to appeal.

2023: People in the Interest of Uwayezuk, 537 P.3d 377 (Colo. App. 2023). There is a statutory right to effective assistance of counsel in proceedings seeking to involuntarily medicate a defendant. And where the statutory right to effective counsel exists, a defendant on direct appeal of an order granting involuntary medication may assert an ineffective assistance of counsel claim.

2022: In re Harlin H., 217 N.E.3d 264 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). At Harlin H.'s involuntary medication proceeding, his counsel failed to subject the State's case to meaningful adversarial testing. There was no objection or challenge by counsel to the State failure to comply with several mandatory requirements of the relevant code. Harlin H. was prejudiced by counsel's failures because, if counsel had raised these issues, he would have had a viable argument for the denial of the State's petition.

In re Leo M., 217 N.E.3d 239 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). At Leo M.'s involuntary medication proceeding, his counsel failed to subject the State's case to meaningful adversarial testing. There was no objection or challenge by counsel to the State failure to comply with several mandatory requirements of the relevant code. Leo M. was prejudiced by counsel's failures because, if counsel had raised these issues, he would have had a viable argument for the denial of the State's petition.

In re Marcus S., 198 N.E.3d 636 (Ill. App. Ct. 2022). Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance during the involuntary admission and involuntary medication proceedings. State law provided the right to counsel in such proceedings and the Strickland standard is used in assessing whether the right was violated by counsel's acts and omissions in a particular case. Here, trial counsel failed to hold the State to various procedural and substantive requirements of the code sections governing involuntary commitments and involuntary medication. First, the State did not comply with the portion of the involuntary admission petition requiring family contact information, a failure that rendered the State's petition fatally defective. Yet trial counsel neither objected to the deficiencies in the State's petition nor moved to dismiss the petition. "This failure was so prejudicial to Marcus that it deprived him of a fair trial." Second, because the State's petition was conclusory and contained no supporting facts, it was facially deficient. Counsel's failure to move to dismiss the petition on this basis also constituted ineffective assistance. Finally, the State did not prove that Marcus was provided with all of the statutorily required written information on the side effects, risks, benefits, and alternatives to each of the 27 medications requested by the State. "By failing to object to the State's failure of proof on this issue, Marcus's counsel failed to protect Marcus's fundamental due process right, thereby depriving him of a fair trial."

2014: In re Jessica H., 17 N.E.3d 248 (Ill. App. Ct. 2014). Counsel was ineffective in involuntary commitment proceeding for failing to object to an untimely second recommitment petition. Under state law, a recommitment petition was required to be filed prior to the expiration of the prior commitment order. In this case, the patient had been initially committed for 90 days and then recommitted for 90 days. The second recommitment petition was not filed until eight days after the prior commitment period had expired. Prejudice was established, even though the state could have filed a new initial commitment petition even if the untimely petition had been dismissed because an initial commitment would have lasted only 90 days rather than the 180 days ordered based on the untimely recommitment petition.

2010: In re Daryll C., 930 N.E.2d 248 (Ill. App. Ct. 2010). Counsel ineffective in involuntary commitment to an inpatient mental health facility proceedings. Counsel failed to object to the state's failure to file a predisposition report, as required by state law. In essence, the state had not disproved the availability of alternative treatment settings and or why they were inappropriate.

10. SEXUAL PREDATOR COMMITMENT PROCEEDINGS

2013: People v. Smith, 152 Cal. Rptr. 3d 142 (Cal. Ct. App. 2013). Counsel ineffective in sexually violent predator proceedings for agreeing to procedures that violated the statutes and deprived the individual of valuable rights. Under state law at the time, a committed individual could petition for conditional release or release. If the individual had a favorable report from his annual review by a psychologist, he was entitled to a jury trial at which the state had the burden of disproving the conclusion of the examiner beyond a reasonable doubt. If, on the other hand, the individual did not have a favorable report from his annual review, the proceeding was before a judge and the individual had the burden of proving entitlement to relief by a preponderance of the evidence. These proceedings were initiated following a 2009 annual review in which the psychologist recommended conditional release. By the time the case was called, the individual also had a 2010 annual review recommending unconditional release. Nonetheless, counsel agreed to proceedings before the judge alone with the burden on the individual. Counsel's conduct was deficient. Even if counsel had some strategy for preferring proceedings before the court rather than a jury, there could be no strategy for agreeing to shift the burden from the state to the committed individual.

2012: In re Ontiberos, 287 P.3d 855 (Kan. 2012). Counsel ineffective for multiple reasons in sexually violent predator (SVP) civil commitment proceedings before jury. Under state law, "when there is a right to counsel there is necessarily a correlative right to effective counsel." While the right was one under due process, the court applied the Strickland analysis. There were 3500 pages of discovery, which counsel stipulated should be marked all together as one exhibit. Most of the exhibit was irrelevant, but four aspects are relevant here: (1) police reports and witness statements from alleged priors that did not result in conviction; (2) a discharge summary from a sex offender treatment program showing a Static-99 test result concluding the defendant was a "low risk" to reoffend; (3) the results of a penile plethysmograph test (PPT) administered in the prior treatment program; and (4) documents completed by evaluators in the prior treatment program. Counsel stipulated that "the exhibit" could be provided to all mental health experts, could be used to cross-examine them, and would be included in the appellate record. "The exhibit" was not provided to the jury. The state court-appointed examiner found the defendant was an SVP. She gave the Static-99, which placed the defendant in the "high risk" category for recidivism. The defense expert said the defendant was not an SVP. Although he did not do testing, he testified that the most reliable tests for recidivism were the PPT and the Hare Psychopathy Checklist Revised. The state examiner had not given these tests. Counsel's conduct was deficient in numerous specifics, but "[t]wo themes pervade these errors. The first is counsel's failure to familiarize himself with the evidence [in 'the exhibit']. . . . The second them is a failure to recognize the evidentiary rules governing expert testimony and cross-examination." The specific deficiencies were: (1) failure to cross-examine the state's expert with the prior Static-99 result; (2) failure to alert the defense expert to the prior PPT result; (3) stipulating that the state expert could review and base her opinion on hearsay and other evidence that was inadmissible at trial, which was precluded by state law at the time; and (4) failing to object to the state's cross-examination of the defendant and the defense expert with documents purportedly from "the exhibit," which were never admitted into evidence. State law requires that counsel admit extrinsic evidence, either by document or testimony, if the witness denies the impeaching fact. Here, generally, when the defendant or his expert said he did not recall or disputed the state's rendition, the prosecutor supplied "the facts" from "the exhibit" in his questions, but never showed the witness the document and never admitted the documents.

We find it disturbing that the State's method of cross-examination pervaded the trial without intervention by [defense counsel]. No evidence was admitted for the jury's review to determine the accuracy of the facts alleged to underlie the State's questions, and this was particularly egregious since some of the State's questions were not supported by the record.

In "the most poignant example of why attorneys must produce extrinsic evidence to avoid misquoting or mischaracterizing a document," the state cross-examined the defense expert about the defendant being disciplined in prison for possessing a homemade knife in 2003. The defendant had never been disciplined for possession of a knife. The report the State was relying on was from 1991 and listed "'less dangerous' contraband" only. Nonetheless, the State's questions, combined with the expert's answers made it appear that the defendant had been disciplined for a knife and had been dishonest with the expert by not disclosing the incident. Prejudice established "[g]iven the pervasive nature of counsel's errors." "While each individual error may not have required reversal, the accumulation of these errors undermines our confidence in the trial's outcome."

People v. Willingham*, 956 N.Y.S.2d 165 (N.Y. App. Div. 2012). Counsel ineffective in Sex Offender Registration Act proceedings for failing to contest the case at all. Counsel remained silent, except for two statements that showed complete ignorance of how to challenge the case.

2009: Smith v. State, 203 P.3d 1221 (Idaho 2009). Counsel ineffective in civil designation as violent sexual predator case for several reasons. First, counsel failed to timely challenge the denial of due process in the designation process due to "inadvertence or neglect." Prejudice found because the statutory scheme violated procedural due process principles by denying meaningful notice and an opportunity to be heard. Second, counsel failed to timely assert a challenge to the review board's failure to adopt and apply objective criteria for predator designation. Prejudice established where the trial court rejected this argument solely due to the untimeliness but otherwise stated "serious reservations concerning the constitutional validity" of the designation process. In addition, without objective standards, "due process rights could not be protected by the process of judicial review." Finally, counsel failed to timely assert due process claims regarding the district court's review, including the right to review the information considered by the district court from the board, which was not provided to the defense. Prejudice established because "the statutory denial of access to the information which the district court utilizes in making its decision deprives the offender of meaningful notice of that which he is attempting to challenge and consequently, it deprives the offender of any meaningful opportunity to be heard."

11. POST-TRIAL CLEMENCY (MILITARY) OR SENTENCE REVIEW (MONTANA)

2014: Avery v. Batista, 336 P.3d 924 (Mont. 2014). Counsel ineffective in proceeding before the Sentence Review Division for arguing for a more onerous sentence for the defendant in sexual intercourse without consent case. The defendant entered a plea agreement for a 30 year sentence, with 25 years suspended. The court rejected that agreement, but in response to defense counsel's question, indicated that it would accept a sentence of 30 years, with 10 years suspended. When the defendant plead guilty in light of this information, the court actually imposed a sentence of 30 years, with 20 years suspended. Nonetheless, in the Sentence Review Division, counsel urged the Division impose a sentence of 30 years, with just 10 years suspended and the Division increased the defendant's punishment, accordingly. Counsel's conduct was deficient in arguing "as a matter of equity" that the sentence imposed should be that initially approved by the trial court. There was no strategy. Prejudice was clear. "Not only did counsel fail to provide meaningful representation, but his statements actually undermined [the defendant's] interest."

2010: United States v. Fordyce, 69 M.J. 501 (Army Crim. App. 2010). Counsel's failure to advise the accused of his right to request waiver of mandatory forfeitures for the benefit of his wife and children, while not addressed as ineffective assistance of counsel, was found to be prejudicial post-trial error as there was "a colorable showing of prejudice."

United States v. Lind, 64 M.J. 611 (C.G. Ct. Crim. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in post-trial processing following guilty pleas and sentencing for wrongful use of ecstasy, wrongfully distributing ecstasy, conspiracy, and making a false official statement with intent to deceive. The accused was sentenced to reduction in grade, forfeitures of pay, confinement for four months, and a bad-conduct discharge. Counsel's conduct was deficient, because during post-trial clemency review, counsel did not contact the accused and did not submit matters on his behalf. Prejudice found because the accused's "intended clemency petition does present substantive reasons for clemency" in that he asserted it was a "one time" event and he had used the time between the incident and trial to re-certify for his positions in the Coast Guard. As relief for this and other errors, the court set aside all punishment except the bad conduct discharge.

12. DENIAL OF RIGHT TO COUNSEL ISSUES

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2021: United States v. Torres, 997 F.3d 624 (5th Cir. 2021). In conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine case, defendant was deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel when he was barred from all communication with his attorney during a 13-hour overnight recess that occurred in the middle of defendant's direct examination. "The facts of this case fall squarely within the Geders rule; that is, a trial court may not bar a testifying criminal defendant from all communication with his attorney during an overnight recess." Although defense counsel did not object, reversal was required irrespective of whether or not the error was preserved as defendant satisfied the plain error elements. First, the error was obvious. Second, a Geders violation is presumptively prejudicial and, on this record, the sequestration order actually affected defendant's substantial rights. The deprivation of counsel occurred "the last night before the end of trial. It was the last opportunity to discuss important case-related matters, such as conducting further examination of witnesses, closing arguments, a general recapitulation of how trial was going so far, and even the possibility of negotiating a plea bargain." Lastly, the error "seriously affect[ed] the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings."

2020: Pirkel v. Burton, 970 F.3d 684 (6th Cir. 2020). Petitioner, who pleaded no contest to numerous serious charges and unsuccessfully sought to withdraw his plea prior to sentencing, was entitled to a new direct appeal because the state court's procedures for allowing petitioner's appellate counsel to withdraw and leave petitioner unrepresented on appeal were unconstitutional. First, the state trial court made the determination that appellate counsel satisfied his duties in finding no appealable issues and so permitted withdrawal without replacement. However, "[e]ssential to all of the Anders-like procedures that have been upheld by the Supreme Court was a determination whether there were appealable issues by the appellate court, not the very court appealed from." Second, appellate counsel failed to file a brief drawing attention to anything in the record that might arguably support petitioner's appeal. Finally, the trial court failed to conduct an independent determination of the merits of petitioner's appeal. These flawed procedures denied petitioner of "adequate and effective appellate review" and, in deciding otherwise, the Michigan Courts reached a decision that "was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court." 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1). Because petitioner was effectively denied counsel on appeal, prejudice is presumed.

Hernandez Lara v. Barr*, 962 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 2020). Remand for further proceedings where illegal immigrant was denied her statutory right to counsel as a result of the IJ's denial of a continuance for retained counsel to appear and the record established that "the assistance of a lawyer likely would have affected the outcome of Hernandez's removal proceedings." The critical points where assistance could have changed the outcome are identified as: (1) the availability of an argument that an INTERPOL Red Notice identifying Hernandez as a gang member was a changed circumstance providing an exemption for the one-year filing deadline for asylum; (2) an argument that the unfounded allegation that Hernandez is a gang member would subject her to persecution by the El Salvadoran government because the police target suspected gang members for arrest, detention, and extrajudicial killings; (3) a lawyer likely would have corrected the IJ's erroneous factual finding in his oral ruling that contributed to his adverse nexus determination and further developed the record; and (4) "a lawyer would have marshaled the existing evidence and adduced additional evidence to support Hernandez's testimony that the government of El Salvador would not protect her from the gang." NOTE: This case is NOT governed by the Sixth Amendment but rather by Due Process principles.

2017: United States v. Pleitez, 876 F.3d 150 (5th Cir. 2017). Petitioner was represented by counsel and pleaded guilty in federal district court in Texas to conspiracy to engage in sex trafficking of children by force, fraud, or coercion. He agreed to pay restitution and waived his right to challenge the restitution order. At the sentencing hearing, petitioner objected to restitution requests by the victims that were made on the basis of "lost wages," arguing that the victims worked illegal jobs and were not legally present in the U.S. The court refrained from ruling on the restitution claims for lost wages, waiting to take the probation department's research into account. The probation department later reported that it was appropriate to award the victims restitution based on lost wages, and petitioner filed objections, as well as a notice of appeal. The court permitted trial counsel to withdraw, and following the withdrawal, the probation department filed another report that recalculated the amount of restitution owed for lost wages using a different method that increased the amount of restitution reportedly owed. The court adopted the probation department's final calculations in imposing its restitution order (while petitioner was unrepresented), and then appointed appellate counsel. The Fifth Circuit held that the increase of the restitution award during a gap in representation between trial and appellate counsel violated petitioner's Sixth Amendment right to counsel, because the district court's consideration and acceptance of the changed restitution amount constituted a critical stage in the proceedings. The final determination of a mandatory restitution award under 18 U.S.C. § 3664(d)(5) constitutes a critical stage during which a defendant is entitled to the assistance of counsel. No showing of prejudice is required and reversal is automatic under United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648, 659 (1984).

2005: Pazden v. Maurer, 424 F.3d 303 (3rd Cir. 2005). The trial court violated the defendant's right to counsel by denying a continuance, which forced the defendant to proceed pro se in this fraud case related to the sale of condominiums. In December 1993, the defendant was appointed counsel from the Public Defender Office on charges contained in a 131-count indictment. In October 1995, a new PD was assigned. Trial was scheduled for February 1996. Counsel requested a three-month continuance due to her late appointment and the state's delay in discovery, which ultimately involved almost 5,000 pages of discovery. The court denied a continuance. The defendant, while not hostile at all to counsel and supportive of her request for a continuance, "believing that he was more familiar with the case than his attorney, given the witnesses and materials his attorney had not had an opportunity to explore, . . . informed the court that he believed he had no alternative but to represent himself." Id. at 308. He was permitted to proceed pro se with the PD as stand-by counsel. Under AEDPA, the state court's ruling that the "waiver of counsel was both 'contrary to' and 'an unreasonable application of . . . clearly established' Supreme Court pronouncements" in Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938) and Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975).

Daniels v. Woodford, 428 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2005). Analyzing this capital case under pre-AEDPA standards, the court held that the defendant was constructively denied counsel due to a conflict created by a series of events related to the appointment of counsel. The defendant had previously been convicted of a bank robbery in which he had been shot nine times by police officers rendering him a paraplegic. He negotiated a plea in exchange for being permitted to remain free for six months so he could seek medical treatment and rehabilitation. Despite the agreement, the court sentenced him to 13 years and immediately remanded him to custody. On appeal, Roth, a new attorney (who had previously represented the defendant on other matters) took over and the defendant was released on bond. While on bond, he was mistakenly arrested by an officer who believed there was a warrant for him. He sued the state alleging mistreatment in jail and lack of appropriate medical care. After his appeal was denied, he failed to surrender to custody. When two officers went to his home, he shot and killed both officers. Following his arrest, the court appointed a Public Defender, who moved to substitute Roth because the PD had a conflict due to the prior representation on the robbery. The PD in that case that negotiated the plea and release left the PD's office to join the prosecutor's interest and the new PD assigned was unaware of the plea agreement so the judge was never informed of the deal for release. A federal habeas petition alleging IAC on the robbery was pending at the time of the murder case appointment. Nonetheless, the court refused to relieve the PD office and Roth remained in a pro bono capacity. Roth was ultimately appointed as co-counsel, but then the state moved to relieve him because he was be a witness for the state. Roth was relieved even though the defendant agreed to stipulate to the information the state sought to present through Roth and agreed to waive the conflict. After this, the PD assigned became ill and the case was reassigned to two new PD's. Ultimately, nine months into the case and only three months prior to trial, the court relieved the PD office on its motion due to the conflict. Appointed this time was a former prosecutor who had just started in private practice and had no capital case experience and a co-counsel with only a few years under his belt. From the beginning, the defendant's relationship with these lawyers "was strained." The defendant informed the court that he didn't trust his counsel and sent a letter to that effect before the trial started. The federal court held that, "[g]iven this history, it is understandable that the [defendant] would mistrust the judicial process and his counsel" and the trial court should have granted the defendant's motion to substitute counsel. In this instance, because of the "serious conflict" between the defendant and counsel, the court presumed prejudice and found error in the trial court's failure to inquire into the conflict even though the defendant informed the court three months prior to trial that he did not trust counsel and informed the court again prior to the beginning of the trial.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2023: Arocha v. Tribe, 2023 WL 7386193 (D. Mt. Nov. 8, 2023). Petitioner, who had been sentenced in tribal court without the presence of counsel in violation of 25 U.S.C. § 1302(c)(1), was entitled to habeas relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3). Although he was resentenced in tribal court with counsel present, this failed to cure the defect in the original sentencing "because it appears to be a mechanism by which the Blackfeet Tribal Court sought to validate the improperly imposed 2017 sentence after the fact."

Howell v. Brooks*, 2023 WL 3026698 (E.D. Pa. April 20, 2023). In murder case where the death penalty was sought but petitioner received a life sentence, habeas relief is granted on claim that the trial court committed structural error by its arbitrary denial of newly retained counsel's continuance motion, which violated petitioner's Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice. (Although the claim was untimely and procedurally defaulted, petitioner's actual innocence showing allowed consideration of the merits of the claim de novo.) The murder occurred in December 1982 and petitioner was arrested for the crime on January 12, 1983. He was appointed counsel who had only been admitted to the bar for fifteen months and had never tried a homicide case. Attorney Clark was contacted by petitioner's family on October 3, 1983. The family explained that they had been trying to secure funds to retain counsel for several months. The family hired Clark on October 6, 1983 and Clark went to court to enter his appearance that same day. A suppression hearing was scheduled for that afternoon and Clark appeared as counsel after the judge rejected his request for a continuance. Following the Commonwealth's presentation of its evidence, the hearing was continued until October 17th, the same day set for the trial. Clark sought to have the trial continued for 49 days, citing the preparation that was required. Although the Commonwealth did not oppose the request, the trial court denied the continuance motion without any explanation appearing in the record. Eleven days after taking the case, Clark represented petitioner at trial where petitioner was convicted of murder, robbery, and possession of instruments of a crime and was sentenced to life imprisonment. "Because Clark clearly stated he was not ready for trial and 'the state trial court offered no justification for denying the continuance motion,' concerns of judicial administration did not outweigh [petitioner's] rights. . . . As such, the denial of a continuance was arbitrary and violated [petitioner's] Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice." (Citations omitted.)

C. State Court Cases

2024: State v. Ellison, 241 N.E.3d 349 (Ohio App. 2024). In murder case where the state withdrew its plea deal with appellant after he refused to testify against the co-defendant as required by the plea agreement and appellant received a significantly harsher sentence than originally agreed to following a second plea deal, prejudice was presumed where appointed counsel was absent during a critical stage of the proceedings – when prosecutors met with appellant about his expected testimony against the co-defendant and again after appellant's initial refusal to testify in accordance with the agreement. At the time of the two meetings between the prosecutors and appellant, the criminal proceedings against appellant remained pending, as he had not been sentenced. Further, the prosecutors' office retained sole discretion to determine whether appellant had complied with the signed plea agreement. If there was a failure to comply, the prosecutors were permitted pursuant to the agreement to reinstate the charges against appellant and use his recorded proffer, in which he confessed his involvement in the murder, in their case-in-chief. In this case, the interactions between the state and appellant during the cooperation period made this distinguishable from cases concerning a non-adversarial, presentence interview, usually conducted by a "neutral" probation officer, which several courts have concluded is not a critical stage. "Encounters between the government and the defendant during the cooperation period remain 'essentially adversarial.'" The adversarial meetings between prosecutors and appellant constituted per se violations of appellant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel, under Cronic. This denial of counsel was not assuaged by the appointment of a new attorney, who knew nothing more than "a summary of the facts" provided by the prosecutors, who advised appellant and represented him at the hearing on the prosecution's motion to withdraw the plea agreement. The new attorney was not only unfamiliar with the details of appellant's case and lacked any established trust with appellant, the attorney was not privy to information appellant had shared with initial counsel regarding the charges against him or regarding his agreement to testify against the co-defendant.

He was, therefore, in no position to respond to or ease any anxiety or fear that [appellant] may have had about testifying. These circumstances are such that, although [new counsel] spoke with [appellant] in the hours leading up to the vacation of his guilty plea and stood beside [appellant] in the hearing at which that occurred, the likelihood that any replacement lawyer, even a fully competent one, could have provided [appellant] with effective assistance is so small that a presumption of prejudice is appropriate under Cronic.

Regarding the appropriate remedy, the trial court must proceed on remand from the time of the violations, i.e., prior to the revocation of appellant's original plea agreement. Although this provides appellant with the full benefit of his plea agreement despite his refusal to fulfill his obligations thereunder, the timing of the prosecution's and trial court's actions were what rendered it impossible for appellant to fulfill his obligations under the plea agreement. (Before formally moving the trial court to withdraw appellant's original guilty plea and to reinstate the charges against him, the prosecution resolved the charges against the codefendant via a plea agreement and proceeded immediately to sentencing. Thus, by the time the state moved to vacate appellant's plea agreement based on his refusal to testify against the codefendant and before the court confirmed with appellant that he would not testify, there were no pending proceedings against the codefendant for appellant to testify in.) Under these circumstances, the vindication of the Sixth Amendment violation requires the reinstatement of appellant's original plea agreement and sentencing thereunder.

State ex rel. Allen v. Carroll Circuit Court, 226 N.E.3d 206 (Ind. 2024). In double-murder case, court-appointed counsel who were removed over the objections of counsel and defendant are reinstated because the special judge failed to find that the removal was a necessary last resort after weighing the prejudice to defendant.

[W]hether as a product of a defendant's right to due process or the right to counsel, the bottom line is this: a trial court cannot disqualify court-appointed counsel over the objection of both the defendant and appointed counsel unless (a) disqualification is a last resort; (b) disqualification is necessary to protect the defendant's constitutional rights, to ensure the proceedings are conducted fairly and within our profession's ethical standards, or to ensure the orderly and efficient administration of justice; and (c) those interests outweigh the prejudice to the defendant.

The special judge had identified four mistakes made by court-appointed counsel that demonstrated a potential inability to assist defendant effectively: (1) they failed to secure confidential case materials, including crime scene photos; (2) one attorney misdirected an email (he says inadvertently) with confidential case materials to a non-party client without timely reporting the mistake to the trial court or prosecutor; (3) both attorneys made extrajudicial statements while the prosecutor's motion for a gag order was pending which the special judge thought might prejudice the case; and (4) statements in a defense motion turned out to be wrong. Each of these concerns, however, "could be addressed through a combination of procedural rules and court orders, including the gag order and protective order she entered." Further, "trial courts maintain both statutory and inherent authority to compel compliance with their orders and the procedural rules through contempt proceedings and sanctions that include fines and even jail." The special judge made no finding that these tools were inadequate. Additionally, the only basis for the special judge's action was a concern that appointed counsel could not assist defendant effectively. But there was no suggestion that the defense attorneys were "out of their depth." Combined, they had over fifty years of experience representing thousands of clients on serious charges including murder. Further, neither the State nor the special judge argued that counsel's extrajudicial statements or the statements in their motion harmed the defense. And although they did contend that the disclosure of case materials undermined defendant's defense, they failed to explain how. Importantly, neither the State nor the special judge argued that the mistakes identified by the special judge reflected an incompetence to handle the defense or explained why disqualification was "necessary" to protect defendant's right to the effective assistance of counsel. Finally, there was no showing that the identified concerns outweighed the substantial prejudice to defendant from substituting counsel. Appointed counsel had spent a year working with defendant, investigators, and experts developing a defense, and defendant asserted that he was ready to present it to a jury. The prejudice to defendant "begins with the fact that information and momentum spillage is inevitable as one trial team hands a complicated case like this over to another." Added to that was the fact that defendant had already been in jail for about a year and a half and substituting counsel required at least a nine-month delay in the trial date. Further, the murders themselves had occurred seven years ago, and "fact-finding only gets harder as time passes, memories fade, and evidence is lost." Because the record did not reflect that disqualification was a necessary last resort after balancing the trial court's concerns against the prejudice to defendant, reinstatement of appointed counsel was required.

Commonwealth v. Watt*, 224 N.E.3d 377 (Mass. 2024). In case involving conviction for murder and other related offenses, defendant was entitled to a new trial based on his defense attorney having slept during the trial. Observations of defense counsel sleeping at various points were contained in affidavits from defendant, his mother, one of the co-defendant's trial attorneys, one of the trial prosecutors, and the co-defendant. Although the motion judge credited the affidavits, the judge nevertheless denied the motion for a new trial, both on procedural grounds and based on a conclusion that trial counsel's slumber neither rose to the level of structural error nor prejudiced defendant's case. (Among the procedural rulings that permitted this appeal to be heard on the merits was a finding by the Supreme Judicial Court that first appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and raise this claim earlier. Although first appellate counsel had been alerted to the potential issue by defendant, that attorney chose not to pursue it. "[T]he failure to investigate an alleged error of this magnitude clearly was unreasonable.") Turning to the merits, a new trial is ordered under the state law right to counsel. Looking to Federal cases that address sleeping counsel, the court here concludes that under art. 12 of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, "a deprivation of counsel occurs when counsel sleeps for a significant portion of trial or sleeps through an important aspect of trial.” Applied here, the affidavits, which were from “both sides of the aisle,” corroborated defendant’s claim that trial counsel was sleeping throughout trial. “[A]s the affiants’ descriptions of when trial counsel slept varied, with some accounts more specific than others, we cannot discount the possibility that each account represents a separate occasion during which trial counsel was asleep.” Given this record, “that the trial judge neither contemporaneously addressed the issue nor provided an affidavit as to the defendant’s claim on appeal [wa]s not dispositive.” No showing of specific prejudice is required for the absence of counsel during a significant portion of the trial. The constructive denial of counsel created a substantial risk of a miscarriage of justice requiring a new trial.

2023: People v. Ruiz, 305 Cal.Rptr.3d 803 (Cal. Ct. App. 2023). At a resentencing proceeding that occurred because a portion of the original sentence was unauthorized by the relevant statute, resentencing counsel’s failure to provide any meaningful assistance amounted to the complete denial of counsel under Cronic. At a resentencing, the trial court is entitled to reconsider all prior sentencing choices. Petitioner had been convicted of carjacking, attempted robbery and arson, with gang enhancements connected to each of the three counts as well as enhancements related to a principal personally using a firearm in committing the carjacking and attempted second degree robbery. The trial court had sentenced petitioner to a total term of 26 years four months to life in state prison. At the resentencing, a different judge corrected the error but indicated she intended to remain as close as possible to the original sentence and ultimately increased the sentence by one year and four months. Petitioner was represented at the resentencing proceeding by original trial counsel but the attorney did not remember petitioner or the trial. Defense counsel did not file any documents in connection with the resentencing hearing, and spoke less than 50 words during the entire proceeding. Although eight years had passed since the original sentencing, when asked, trial counsel declined to speak on petitioner’s behalf. When the sentencing judge asked petitioner if he wished to be heard, petitioner expressed his remorse and indicated he had graduated high school in prison and was enrolled in college classes. The sentencing judge commended petitioner but noted that from her review of the probation report she would have imposed a harsher sentence had she been the original judge. At the conclusion of the hearing, trial counsel said he would prepare a notice of appeal but never did so. It turned out that trial counsel had a brain tumor which was diagnosed five months after the hearing. He died in the hospital later that same year. The complete absence of assistance from trial counsel was shown through the resentencing transcript, as well as from declarations from petitioner and trial counsel’s former secretary. And this was “not a case where counsel was silent because there was nothing to say.” Petitioner possessed documentation of his programming in prison, demonstrating that trial counsel would have had a basis to argue that petitioner had in fact been rehabilitating himself. Additionally, trial counsel had a legal argument to make to strike the gang enhancement.

Clark v. State*, 301 A.3d 241 (Md. 2023). Trial counsel’s failure to object to an order by the trial court prohibiting any consultation about the case, i.e., a no-communication order, between petitioner and trial counsel during an overnight recess prior to the final day of testimony in petitioner’s murder trial resulted in the actual denial of the assistance of counsel such that prejudice is presumed under the second prong of the Strickland test. (The recess occurred after petitioner’s direct examination had concluded and prior to his cross-examination.) Petitioner was not required to show or demonstrate that he wanted to confer or would have conferred with his counsel during the overnight recess but for the trial court's order as a condition precedent to the presumption of prejudice applying in light of the duration of the order (which covered a lengthy overnight recess) and the scope of the order (which applied to all communications about the case).

2022: State v. Lambert, 278 A.3d 71 (Del. Super. 2022). In case involving convictions for possessing a firearm and ammunition by a person prohibited from having those items, trial counsel performed deficiently in failing to offer any defense at all during the bench trial and remaining silent. Prior to trial, defense counsel had unsuccessfully moved to suppress the key evidence against petitioner. Because Delaware does not allow for a conditional guilty plea to permit appellate review of a denied suppression motion, trial counsel took the case to trial but without any argument or questioning of witnesses. This was deficient performance as it amounted to the functional equivalent of a guilty plea without petitioner being apprised of and questioned by the trial court about the knowing and voluntary relinquishment of his rights. To the extent that defense counsel attempted to engage in a "stipulated trial," this was deficient because, in contrast to other such trials, petitioner received no benefit from the procedure, there was no evidence that he was informed of and agreed to defense counsel's decision to remain silent during the trial, and the trial judge did not conduct an appropriate colloquy about the procedure given defense counsel's failure to inform the trial judge of his intention to offer no defense. Regarding prejudice, under the Delaware Supreme Court's interpretation of Cronic, petitioner was excused from demonstrating prejudice because defense counsel's failure to advocate for his client during a critical stage of the proceedings caused a constructive complete denial of counsel.

State v. J.R.*, 190 N.E.3d 1186 (Ohio App. 2022). Juvenile defendant who pleaded guilty in adult court to several crimes related to a burglary-murder was denied her constitutional right to the assistance of counsel under the United States and Ohio Constitutions when she was represented during the juvenile bindover proceedings by retained counsel who was suspended from the practice of law at the time. (Counsel's initial suspension was for failing to comply with Ohio's attorney registration requirements. A second suspension was based on his multi-year failure to comply with continuing education requirements.) The attorney's "knowing, willful violation of orders from the Ohio Supreme Court and his unlawful representation of clients while suspended reflects directly on [counsel's] lack of legal competence to provide effective assistance of counsel to accused juveniles such as J.R." That counsel did cross-examine witnesses and make some objections at the amenability hearing did not suffice to establish that J.R. received the effective representation mandated by Due Process. "Where a juvenile is facing the prospect of being tried in an adult court, no one should be left to doubt whether the juvenile received competent representation during those proceedings from an attorney who had been prohibited from practicing law in this state." Considering the totality of the circumstances here, "the circumstances warrant the presumption that J.R. was denied the effective assistance of counsel without the need for J.R. to establish specific attorney errors or prejudice as a result of the representation."

2021: State v. Brown*, 330 So.3d 199 (La. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S.Ct. 1702 (2022). (2016 trial and sentencing). Death sentence reversed where defendant chose to represent himself at the sentencing phase of his capital trial rather than have appointed counsel present mitigating evidence concerning defendant's mother over defendant's objection. "Because we find the defendant was misinformed by the trial court as to his Sixth Amendment right to limit the mitigation evidence presented during the penalty phase . . . , it necessarily follows that defendant's waiver was not knowing or intelligent and was involuntary"

State v. Cruz*, 486 P.3d 1 (N.M. 2021). Where defendant's conviction was obtained through an uncounseled plea of no contest to a single count of misdemeanor criminal damage to property of a household member, defendant's plea is void because the magistrate court deprived defendant of the right to counsel and due process by accepting his plea of no contest without providing him counsel. Defendant was arraigned the day after his arrest. At that time, defendant requested that a public defender be appointed to represent him. Although the magistrate entered an order conditionally appointing the Law Offices of the Public Defender, the magistrate in the same proceeding went ahead and adjudicated defendant guilty on a no contest plea. By finding defendant guilty under such circumstances, the magistrate court created a structural defect.

2020: State v. Simpkins, 838 S.E.2d 439 (N.C. 2020). In case involving charges related to failure to maintain a valid driver's license, defendant did not forfeit his right to counsel. (The trial court found the right to counsel was waived but the State, acknowledging that defendant was not provided with the necessary waiver colloquy, argued that the right had been forfeited by defendant's conduct.) In the twenty minutes before the court determined that defendant had waived his right to counsel, defendant "made an untimely objection, stating that there was 'no proof of jurisdiction,' asked questions of the court out of turn, stated, in response to the court's inquiry, that he 'would like counsel that's not paid for by the State of North Carolina,' asked four more questions of the court out of turn, and continued to speak out of turn and argue with the court." Notably, however, when the court instructed defendant to stop asking questions, he did so. And when the court asked defendant whether he wished to proceed with or without an attorney, "he responded, for the most part, appropriately, first requesting 'counsel that's not paid for by the State of North Carolina' and later acquiescing when the court suggested he be appointed standby counsel. Throughout the proceedings, including up to the point that he was required to proceed pro se, nothing in the record suggests that [defendant] was rude or disrespectful to the trial court. [Defendant's] conduct, while probably highly frustrating, was not so egregious that it frustrated the purposes of the right to counsel itself." On this record, there was no forfeiture, and a waiver of counsel colloquy was required before defendant was permitted to proceed without counsel.

Commonwealth v. Diaz*, 226 A.3d 995 (Pa. 2020). Where, as here, "the absence of a needed interpreter at a critical stage of trial obstructs [the defendant's] ability to communicate with counsel, Cronic applies such that the defendant need not prove that he or she was prejudiced by a Sixth Amendment violation."

2019: State v. Patel, 217 A.3d 1143 (N.J. 2019). "[W]hen facing a second or subsequent DWI conviction, an indigent or non-indigent defendant may file a petition for post-conviction relief to bar the use of a prior uncounseled DWI conviction as a predicate conviction for increasing a term of incarceration. . . . By 'uncounseled' we mean an unrepresented defendant who was not advised by the municipal court of his right to retain counsel or, if indigent, of his right to appointed counsel without cost; who otherwise did not know of his right to counsel in the proceeding and did not waive that right; and who, if properly advised of his rights, would have secured counsel or accepted appointed counsel. The defendant has the burden of proving he was uncounseled, but is not required to establish that the outcome would have been different had he been represented.” Here, the defendant met his burden of showing that his prior guilty plea to DWI was uncounseled.

Newland v. Commissioner of Correction*, 206 A.3d 176 (Conn. 2019). In case where petitioner reluctantly represented himself at trial as a result of the Public Defender’s misadvice to petitioner and the trial court about petitioner’s eligibility for appointed counsel, the habeas court properly found that petitioner’s claim concerning the Public Defender’s error was not procedurally defaulted. Respondent conceded that petitioner had established good cause for failing to raise the claim at the time of trial or on appeal, and the Connecticut Supreme Court agreed. Respondent argued, however, that the habeas court erred in finding that the denial of counsel at trial satisfied the prejudice requirement necessary to overcome the default. The Connecticut Supreme Court disagreed, explaining: “If we were to adopt the respondent’s application of the cause and prejudice standard and require the petitioner to establish actual prejudice from the denial of the right to counsel in order to avoid procedural default, we would ignore well established case law recognizing that ‘[t]he right to have the assistance of counsel is too fundamental and absolute to allow courts to indulge in nice calculations as to the amount of prejudice arising from its denial.’ Glasser v. United States, [315 U.S. 60, 76 (1942)].” Thus, the habeas court “properly determined that, for purposes of determining whether a habeas claim is barred by procedural default, prejudice is presumed when the petitioner is completely denied his right to counsel.”

Akau v. State*, 439 P.3d 111 (Hawaii 2019). Setting aside 1987 conviction for driving while under the influence of an intoxicating liquor because petitioner was denied his right to counsel. That the petition to vacate the conviction was filed some twenty-five years after the conviction did not preclude relief because the equitable doctrine of laches does not apply to HRPP Rule 40 petitions. The record showed that petitioner was referred to the Office of the Public Defender following his not guilty plea to the charge. He appeared without counsel on the trial date asking for a continuance in order to secure counsel. The request was denied and he was tried and convicted without counsel. Noting that petitioner (1) had never been represented either by court-appointed or privately-retained counsel with respect to the charge, (2) had received no prior continuance in the case, and (3) requested a continuance at the commencement of trial because he “wanted to get an attorney present,” the Hawaii Supreme Court ruled petitioner “was denied his right to assistance of counsel (whether court-appointed or privately retained) at trial and also at sentencing.”

Black v. State*, 825 S.E.2d 498 (Ga. App. 2019). The trial court violated defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel and to competent counsel of choice by failing to require retained counsel to properly withdraw from the case and forcing defendant to trial with unprepared counsel. Defendant was charged with aggravated sexual battery and child molestation. He retained counsel to represent him. Defendant later appeared at a Monday trial calendar call, unaware that his retained counsel had on the prior Thursday filed an untimely motion to withdraw. Retained counsel advised defendant at that time that he would not be representing him. Defendant then notified the assigned judge of what he had been told by retained counsel. Without the court addressing retained counsel’s motion to withdraw or considering its merits, the assigned judge told defendant that he should hire counsel or be prepared to conduct the trial pro se the following Monday. Later that day defendant obtained appointed counsel, who on the same day notified the court that he would be representing defendant. When he did so, the same judge instructed appointed counsel that no request for a continuance would be granted and the case would be tried the following Monday. One week later, despite trying two felony cases in the interim, appointed counsel stood in court and announced ready to defend defendant. One day after that, defendant was found guilty, taken into custody, and eventually sentenced to life (to serve 25 years) on one of the two charges against him. The untimely motion by retained counsel to withdraw was never ruled on. On this record, defendant was found entitled to a new trial. “The assigned judge deprived [defendant] of counsel of his choice by implicitly granting retained counsel’s flawed motion for withdrawal and by refusing any request for a continuance, all without exercising any discretion. The assigned judge wholly failed to balance [defendant’s] right to counsel of choice against the demands of her calendar, resulting in a structural error that forced [defendant] to trial with ill-prepared appointed counsel.”

2017: Zapata v. Commonwealth, 516 S.W.3d 799 (Ky. 2017). Defendant was denied his right to counsel at the hearing on his motion to withdraw his guilty plea where one of the grounds for the motion was the alleged ineffectiveness of the attorney representing him. That defendant had earlier successfully sought to be appointed hybrid counsel under state law did not cure the conflict appointed counsel faced in representing defendant on the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. Although defendant’s attorney did file a motion to withdraw the plea, she took no position on it and did not assist defendant at the hearing on the motion. In fact, she informed the trial court that in representing defendant, it would be better if she did not respond to his accusations, implying that her responses would be adverse to his position. On this record, an actual conflict existed. The case is remanded for further proceedings on the motion to withdraw the guilty plea.

2014: In the Interest of J.M.O., 459 S.W.3d 90 (Tex. Ct. App. 2014). Defendant in parental rights termination case was deprived of effective assistance of counsel when his appointed counsel failed to appear at trial and failed to make arrangements for the defendant, who was incarcerated, to appear at trial. The Cronic presumption of prejudice applied.

2012: Dennis v. Commissioner of Correction, 39 A.3d 799 (Conn. Ct. App. 2012). Denial of right to counsel on six of ten charges in consolidated guilty plea was a structural error requiring reversal. The defendant had three separate arrests over a six month period. Following the initial arrest on four charges, he retained counsel. Following the two subsequent arrests, the public defender declined representation until the court declared the defendant to be indigent. The retained counsel made it clear that he did not represent the defendant, except the initial charges. With the court taking no action on the question of counsel, the state offered to resolve all ten charges with a plea offer for a five year sentence. After the plea, the defendant moved to withdraw the plea because he had been denied his right to counsel on six charges, one of which had no factual basis such that the prosecutor agreed to file a motion to correct an illegal sentence. Even with one of the charges dismissed, the sentence remained the same. The denial of counsel was a structural error, such that prejudice was presumed.

Capital Case*

- 2011: State v. Chavez, 257 P.3d 1114 (Wash. Ct. App. 2011). Counsel provided no representation during motion to withdraw guilty plea to violations of no-contact order. The defendant was initially charged with domestic violence and ordered to have no contact with his wife, but he contacted her four times from the jail. The state amended the charges to add violations of the “no-contact” order and witness tampering. Due to statements made by the defendant and his wife in recorded jail calls, defense counsel expressed concern that he had a potential conflict of interest on the witness tampering count as, according to statements in the calls, he was a “purported accomplice to the witness tampering claim.” The court allowed counsel to withdraw and appointed new counsel on that charge only. With potentially-conflicted counsel, the defendant entered guilty pleas on the four no-contact order charges but, subsequently, moved to withdraw the pleas. The initial counsel was allowed to withdraw and the new counsel took over, but filed only an Anders brief in which counsel “clearly distanced” himself from his client and suggested “his client’s position was frivolous.” The court noted that an “Anders brief is an appellate procedure that is not appropriate for a trial court.” Here, counsel’s action amounted to a complete denial of counsel during a critical stage of the proceedings. Prejudice presumed.
- 2010: Commonwealth v. Grant, 992 A.2d 152 (Pa. 2010). Rape defendant denied effective assistance due to representation by attorney whose license to practice law had been put on inactive status due to attorney’s failure to comply with the continuing legal education (CLE) requirements for lawyers. This failure was not a “technical licensing defect” because it reflected “directly on his lack of competence to practice law” as counsel had not attended CLE programs for almost five years and could not regain his license simply by completing the CLE classes.
- 2008: State v. Hemphill, 186 P.3d 777 (Kan. 2008). Counsel ineffective in drug case following no contest pleas when the defendant filed a pre-sentence motion to withdraw his pleas. Counsel abandoned his advocacy role during the hearing. “Appointed counsel for the defendant argued against his client’s interest by explaining to the court why he did not believe the defendant’s motions had merit,” and the defendant had to argue his own motion. Prejudice established because the motion to withdraw raised questions about the voluntariness of the pleas and their factual basis sufficiently that the trial court did not summarily deny the motion and instead appointed counsel for the defendant. Counsel also failed to advise the defendant of his right to appeal the denial of his motion.
- Cannon v. State*, 252 S.W.3d 342 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008). The defendant was constructively denied counsel in misdemeanor DWI case by counsel’s refusal to participate in the trial following denial of a motion for continuance to obtain expert assistance and statements that he was not prepared for trial. Prejudice presumed under Cronic.
- 2007: Brown v. Commonwealth, 226 S.W.3d 74 (Ky. 2007). The defendant was denied his right to counsel in drug case when the court allowed counsel to leave the courtroom during the defendant’s testimony, cross-examination, and closing argument. Counsel informed the court that he had an ethical conflict with the defendant and implied that the defendant intended to offer perjured testimony. Counsel acted properly and the court appropriately addressed the defendant and allowed the defendant to testify in narrative form, but the error occurred in allowing counsel to leave the courtroom rather than remaining present to make appropriate objections to the state's cross-examination during portions of the testimony counsel did not believe were perjured.

State v. Blair*, 872 N.E.2d 986 (Ohio Ct. App. 2007). Counsel ineffective in violation of a protection order case where counsel's motion for continuance due to lack of notice and lack of preparation was denied and then counsel refused to participate in the trial. A trial date was set at a hearing where the defendant was represented by a member of the public defender office. A different member of the same public defender office appeared for the defendant during trial. Prejudice was presumed. In addition, the court found that prejudice was apparent because the defendant was forced to have a bench trial due to counsel's untimely request for a jury trial and the defendant was denied his best defense because counsel had failed to file a timely notice of alibi. While the state argued that counsel and the defendant "acted in concert as a trial strategy to create error and thereby gain additional time," the trial court did not question the defendant and the court declined "to presume such outrageous and clearly unethical behavior by counsel."

A. U.S. Court of Appeals Cases

2023: Paucar v. Garland, 84 F.4th 71 (2nd Cir. 2023). In proceedings seeking cancellation of removal for illegal immigrant, reversing denial of appeal by BIA where BIA, in assessing whether immigrant received ineffective assistance by his attorney at the initial hearing, erred by applying a heightened prejudice standard and by relying on the IJ's tainted findings when considering whether immigrant was prejudiced by prior counsel's deficient performance. On remand, the BIA is to differentiate between two types of hardship evidence presented by immigrant in his appeal and motion to remand: (1) hardship evidence that was available to prior counsel, for which immigrant must show that there is a "reasonable probability" of establishing his eligibility for cancellation of removal, and (2) evidence that was not previously available to prior counsel, for which immigrant must show that the evidence "would likely change the result in the case."

2015: Pidgeon v. Smith, 785 F.3d 1165 (7th Cir. 2015). The state appealed from the District Court's grant of habeas relief on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel only on the basis that the District Court erred in finding that the petitioner's burden was satisfied when the petitioner had not called trial counsel as a witness, which would have been required in state court. The district court held that counsel was ineffective in advising the petitioner to enter into a negotiated no-contest plea to sexual assault based on counsel's erroneous belief that the petitioner would face a mandatory life without parole sentence, under the state's persistent repeater law, if convicted in this case and a pending case in another county. The negotiated plea required the petitioner to serve a 10-year sentence on this case, but also required the state to dismiss the charges pending in the other county. Under state law, a third "serious felony" conviction results in a mandatory life without parole sentence. Counsel's advice was based on the erroneous belief that the petitioner had already been convicted of one "serious felony," as defined by Wisconsin's "persistent repeater" law. The prior conviction was an aggravated battery, which did not qualify under the statute because it did not carry the possibility of a life sentence. There was also some doubt whether the charge dismissed, pursuant to the plea agreement, would have qualified as a "serious felony." The District Court ordered a hearing and granted relief finding that the state court unreasonably applied Strickland and Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985). The state appealed only on the issue of whether counsel's testimony was required before the court could grant relief, which was a requirement under state law. The Seventh Circuit rejected this argument because "federal courts do not have to follow state procedural rules" in resolving federal constitutional issues and "[n]othing in Strickland or its progeny requires prisoners seeking to prove ineffective assistance to call the challenged counsel as a witness." Regardless, with the state conceding that counsel did, in fact, give the erroneous advice complained of, counsel's testimony would have been of little value. Either counsel failed to review the statute or reviewed the statute and misunderstood it, even though the "statute is relatively straightforward." There could be no "possible strategic explanation for counsel's mistake." On the question of prejudice, while the state argued that counsel might have testified that petitioner indicated that he would accept the plea offer even if he was not facing a life sentence, nothing prevented the state from calling counsel as a witness if it chose to do so. Thus, "[i]t makes little sense to penalize Pidgeon for her failure to do so."

2014: Gunner v. Welch, 749 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2014). Direct appeal counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to advise the defendant of the time limits for filing a post-conviction challenge to trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in drug trafficking case established cause for the procedural default in failing to timely file the state post-conviction challenge to trial counsel’s effectiveness.

United States v. Lopez-Chavez*, 757 F.3d 1033 (9th Cir. 2014). Counsel ineffective under due process in alien’s removal proceeding by erroneously conceding his removability, failing to appeal the removal order to the Board of Immigration Appeals (“BIA”), and failing to petition the Seventh Circuit for review. The deficient conduct prejudiced the alien in a subsequent prosecution for attempted illegal reentry. The alien was the son of a Mexican seasonal agricultural worker who entered the United States legally through the “Bracero Program” in 1984. In December 1990, the alien became a legal permanent resident. In February 2003, he was convicted in Missouri of possessing marijuana with intent to deliver. In June 2003, the alien was charged as being removable on the basis that he had been convicted of an aggravated felony for an offense relating to the illicit trafficking in a controlled substance as defined under the United States Code. Defense counsel conceded removability and did not appeal, although he had reserved the alien’s right to appeal. The ineffectiveness claim was asserted after the alien was arrested in California for attempted reentry. Counsel’s conduct was deficient because the Missouri statute covered conduct that could be a misdemeanor under the United States Code, as well as conduct that falls within the felony provisions. At the time of the alien’s removal, there was a circuit split as to whether a conviction that is treated as a felony under state law but as a misdemeanor under federal law could be treated as an aggravated felony for purposes of removal. In the face of the conflicting circuit law, the BIA adopted a bifurcated rule. Where a circuit had spoken, it would use the rule of the circuit. Where a circuit had not spoken, it would apply the Fifth Circuit’s rule that a state offense categorized as a felony would be treated as a felony for removal purposes, even if the conduct could only be punished as a misdemeanor under federal law. At the time of the alien’s removal proceeding, the Seventh Circuit had not yet decided the question. Thus, although the BIA’s default rule would have been followed, there was “a clear path to a contrary ruling by petitioning the Seventh Circuit for review.” Counsel’s conduct was deficient. “A competent immigration attorney would have been aware” of the BIA’s bifurcated rule requiring application of circuit law where the circuit had spoken and “minimal research” would have revealed that the Seventh Circuit had not addressed the question. While counsel generally cannot be ineffective for failing to anticipate changes in the law, here “counsel’s ineffectiveness did not depend on a later change in law” as the BIA had already made it clear that circuit precedent would be followed. Prejudice was also clear, as three years after the alien’s removal proceeding, the Seventh Circuit addressed the issue for the first time and joined the three Circuits that held that conduct that would be treated as a misdemeanor under federal law could not be the basis for removal even if state law categorized the offense as a felony. Thus, if counsel had challenged removal, appealed it to the BIA, and then petitioned the Seventh Circuit for review, the removal ruling “almost certainly would have been reversed.”

2007: Ege v. Yukins, 485 F.3d 364 (6th Cir. 2007). Under AEDPA, counsel’s ineffectiveness in murder case for failing to object to bite mark evidence established cause and prejudice to overcome the procedural default for the free-standing claim. The defendant was charged with murdering another woman, allegedly because of jealousy because they were both romantically involved with the same man and the victim was pregnant with his child. No physical evidence linked the defendant to the crime and no arrests were made for nine years after the crime. The state then exhumed the body to review a mark on the victim’s cheek listed in the autopsy report as livor mortis. Because of the condition of the body, the bite-mark expert was able only to examine photographs of the mark. From that the expert testified that the “bite-mark” matched the dentition of the defendant and no one else in the three and a half million people in the Detroit area would match up. Counsel did not object, but called a pathologist to testify that the mark was livor mortis and a dentist to testify that, even if it were a bite mark, it did not align with the defendant’s dentition. The defendant asserted ineffectiveness on direct appeal, but this claim was denied. Almost sixteen months later in 1999, a post-conviction application was filed asserting a free-standing due process claim, in part, because counsel had fortuitously obtained a copy of a letter from a state prosecutor from a news reporter. The letter noted that the expert's findings had been proven wrong with DNA evidence in one case and undermined by a second expert in another case and that the state would no longer rely on this expert as the "main evidence" in a case. This claim was denied under state law because counsel had failed to object. In federal habeas, the ineffectiveness and the due process claim were asserted. The ineffectiveness claim was found to be time-barred, but the court found that the "letter provided the factual predicate for" the due process claim and tolling applied. Therefore, the due process claim was not time-barred. The ineffectiveness of counsel in failing to object to the improper evidence established cause and prejudice to overcome the procedural default of the due process claim. Although bite-mark evidence had been used in other Michigan prosecutions, counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to object to the substance of the testimony here because the state expert was relying only on pictures of the alleged wound, which "appears to be novel." In addition, the need to object to the "unsubstantiated opinion evidence [based on statistical opinion] should have been obvious to defense counsel." In addition, where, as in the instant case, physical evidence is presented linking a defendant to the crime scene, and it is the only physical evidence showing such a link, then defense counsel must object to its admission if no proper foundation has been laid by the presenter. Anything else is objectively unreasonable. Furthermore, the fact that defense counsel chose to introduce counter-experts to [the state expert's testimony does not insulate counsel's performance. There is no reason counsel could not simultaneously have objected to [the expert's] testimony and attempted to rebut it with experts of his own.

Prejudice also found.

B. U.S. District Court Cases

2020: United States v. Bonilla-Garcia, 2020 WL 533139 (E.D. Wash. Feb. 3, 2020). Grant of motion to dismiss an indictment under 8 U.S.C. § 1326—reentry of removed noncitizens—because the charge was predicated on a removal proceeding where defendant suffered ineffective assistance of counsel. The district court determined that the "events surrounding [d]efendant's 1997 deportation proceedings were so fundamentally unfair that he was unable to present his case." (Retained counsel abruptly changed position and, apparently without defendant present, told the immigration judge that defendant waived any rights and agreed to deportation. The record did not show whether defendant reentered the courtroom after the waiver. Nor did the immigration judge confirm the waiver.) The district court rejected the government's request to presume competence where the record was incomplete and added that the case for ineffective assistance of counsel [was] buoyed by the fact that [retained counsel] later abandoned hundreds of clients when he fled to Chile, then was disbarred for his misconduct and what amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel. The disciplinary notice suggest[ed] that [retained counsel's] slapdash approach to

[this] case was his customary approach to practice. [Noncitizens] subject to immigration proceedings are particularly vulnerable to malfeasance. Poverty, the looming threat of deportation, and frequently evolving immigration laws force [noncitizens] to be particularly dependent upon their counsel. A deported [noncitizen] has no recourse to address ineffective assistance of counsel even if it is the ineffective assistance that caused their deportation.

Finally, the district court concluded defendant suffered prejudice. Failure to file necessary documents in immigration proceedings creates a presumption of prejudice which could be rebutted if the petitioner lacked plausible grounds for relief. In this case, defendant had a plausible asylum claim.

2015: United States v. Schneider, 112 F. Supp. 3d 1197 (D. Kan. 2015). Reversal required in conspiracy, unlawful drug dispensing resulting in death, health care fraud resulting in death, and money laundering case due to the court's failure to properly instruct on the element of "death. . . results from." The case involved a doctor and his licensed practical nurse wife as codefendants. They had set up a "medical clinic" that allegedly provided pain management treatment and prescription of dangerous and addictive drugs but provided no actual treatment and just dispensed dangerous drugs while the doctor and his wife got rich. In short, it was a "pill mill." Over a period of six years, from 2002-2008, 68 of the mill's "patients" died of drug overdoses, while another 100 "patients" were hospitalized for overdoses. In 2255, the defendants sought application of the Supreme Court's decision in Burrage v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 881 (2014), which held that the in order to establish a resulting death from distribution of heroin the drug distributed must be "a but-for cause of the death," which is not the case when the alleged victim's death resulted from multiple drugs and the heroin could only be considered a "contributing cause." While trial counsel had requested "but-for" instructions that claim was procedurally defaulted in 2255 based on the Tenth Circuit's rule that failure to assert the claim on direct appeal resulted in procedural default in 2255. The default was excused, however, due to the ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. Counsel's conduct was deficient in failing to assert this claim on appeal because there was a circuit split on the issue and the Tenth Circuit had not yet addressed the issue. Prejudice also established because, regardless of the outcome the Tenth Circuit would have reached, the claim would have prevailed at the Supreme Court. The Court, thus, proceeded to the merits of the Burrage claim. On counts 2, 3, and 5 of illegal distribution resulting in death, reversal was required because: (1) the victim died of "mixed drug intoxication," including drugs not obtained from the "pill mill," or (2) the victim died of "mixed drug intoxication with a contributing factor of atherosclerotic cardiovascular disease" that was pre-existing; or (3) the government did not even attempt to argue "but-for" cause. On count 4, the error in failing to give the "but-for" instructions was harmless, however, because the evidence was overwhelming that the victim died of a fentanyl overdose and the fentanyl had been prescribed by the "pill mill." On counts 7-9 of health care fraud resulting in death, the government failed to establish how false billing can lead to death. Likewise, the Count 1 conspiracy to commit health care fraud sentence folded because the maximum sentence was based on the "resulting death" aspect of the substantive charge. Thus, rather than a maximum sentence of life, the maximum was 10 years. Thus, of the 9 counts, the sentence of count 1 was vacated, count 4 was affirmed, and all other counts were reversed for new trial.

2003: Gutierrez v. Ashcroft, 289 F. Supp. 2d 555 (D.N.J. 2003), aff'd on other grounds, 125 Fed. Appx. 406 (3rd Cir. 2005). The district court held that the limitations period for the alien to file a habeas petition challenging removal would be equitably tolled due to counsel's affirmative and knowing misrepresentation to the alien that he had filed a habeas petition. The alien, who came to the United States as a legal resident in 1971, pled guilty to five burglaries in 1995. While he was still in confinement, he was notified of the INS's intent to deport him. Upon his release on parole from prison, he got a job, got married, and otherwise indicated full rehabilitation. He was represented by counsel at all times in immigration proceedings, which went to hearing in 1998, and appeal in January 2000. The appeal was based on the denial of discretionary relief. The majority in his appeal held that the former discretionary relief provision was no longer applicable since the law had been changed. The alien surrendered for deportation in April 2000 and was removed in May 2000. During this time period, the alien directed his counsel to pursue all legal appeals with the only option available to him at that time being to file a petition for writ of habeas corpus. Counsel did not do so and affirmatively misrepresented to the alien, to his wife, and to his mother, who was paying counsel's legal fees, that counsel had filed the petition. Because no petition was pending, the alien was deported. When he subsequently filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus, it was dismissed because petitioner was not "in custody" at the time of the filing of the petition. In his Rule 59(e) motion to alter or amend the judgment, the petitioner submitted additional facts and evidence alleging entitlement to equitable relief. The court held that an alien has a statutory right to counsel, although not at government expense. An alien in deportation proceedings is also entitled to due process. The ineffective assistance of counsel can constitute a denial of due process. Here, the court found a due process violation because counsel deliberately and knowingly misrepresented to the petitioner that he had filed petitioner's habeas corpus petition. Prejudice was found because the only way the petitioner could avoid removal from the country was through the discretionary relief he sought. While this relief was not available at the time of his removal, the strong dissent in the alien's appeal and the fact that the issue was pending in numerous appellate courts made it clear to the immigration law bar that it was possible if not probable, that discretionary relief would be held to be available for habeas petitioners with valid retroactivity claims. Here, the United States Supreme Court did hold, subsequent to the petitioner's deportation, the retroactive denial of the former discretionary relief provision the petitioner sought was unconstitutional. Thus, if petitioner's attorney had timely filed a habeas petition the change in law would have had a direct effect on petitioner's case and he would have had a right to a discretionary hearing. The court noted that over fifty percent of these discretionary claims are granted and that because petitioner had demonstrably been rehabilitated and maintained close family and work ties in the United States, he had a substantial likelihood of success. Under these circumstances, the court granted equitable relief in the form of deeming the petitioner's habeas petition to have been timely filed, granted the petition for habeas corpus, and ordered the government to conduct an INS discretionary relief hearing.

C. State Court Cases

2023: Alaska Public Defender Agency v. Superior Court, 530 P.3d 604 (Alaska App. 2023). In cases where defense counsel desire a continuance in order to adequately prepare for trial, criminal defendants may choose to proceed to trial against their attorney's advice without formally waiving any future ineffective assistance of counsel claims.

Under these circumstances, a trial court should explain to the defendant that a court evaluating a future ineffective assistance of counsel claim will take into consideration any reduced time the attorney had to prepare for trial. Ideally, the trial court will also inquire into the amount of preparation the defense attorney has conducted and what the attorney has not yet done in order to make a robust record for examination of any later post-conviction relief claims.

In re H.C.*, 220 N.E.3d 491 (Il. App. 2023). In wardship case where appellant-mother lost custody of her children, appellant was entitled to new proceedings because of her attorney’s “disconcerting acquiescence” in the State’s late admission of “a staggering 18,603 pages of medical records, which included a prejudicial legal opinion from a medical doctor upon which the trial court relied heavily,” and counsel’s “failure to shield her client from highly damaging evidence.” If defense counsel had acted reasonably and objected to a damaging medical report that was excludable, the remaining evidence was less than compelling. Thus, the requisite prejudice is established.

In re J.C.*, 210 N.E.3d 972 (Ohio App. 2023). In proceeding where appellant lost permanent custody of his two children, his attorney was ineffective in waiting until the day of trial to request a continuance in order for appellant to participate, a request that was denied. (Appellant was in prison at the time of trial, but was only months away from possible release.) The trial date had been set five months earlier, giving counsel ample time to either request a continuance or make arrangements for appellant to appear remotely. In denying the continuance request, the trial court provided counsel was the option of submitting an affidavit from appellant if videoconferencing could not be arranged, which it ultimately could not. Although there was a ten day break in the trial, giving counsel sufficient time to, “at the very least, obtain testimony via deposition or an affidavit,” the record was devoid of evidence suggesting that counsel took any steps to obtain appellant’s testimony through alternative means. This was deficient performance. Regarding prejudice, there was sufficient probability to undermine confidence in the outcome of trial as it related to permanent custody for appellant’s son, J.C. The record made clear that appellant and J.C. were deeply bonded and that J.C. had consistently wanted to return to his father’s custody. Appellant’s testimony “would have allowed him to address any concerns regarding non-compliance with portions of the FCCS case plan, and provide insight into how he intends to comply with the case plan in the future.” Notably, J.C. had not been thriving in the foster home he was returned to after appellant lost permanent custody.

Interest of JCH-P*, 673 S.W.3d 262 (Tex. App. 2023). Counsel was ineffective for failing to appear at trial in parental-termination proceeding. Over three years, the parent’s attorney appeared at various hearings for this case. At the 2022 bench trial, neither the parent nor the parent’s attorney appeared. Failing to appear was presumptively deficient and prejudicial.

2021: Mack v. State, 858 S.E.2d 160 (S.C. 2021). In case where petitioner sought post-conviction DNA testing under South Carolina’s DNA Act and assigned counsel failed to preserve an appeal from the denial of the application for post-conviction DNA testing, the South Carolina Supreme Court ruled that Anders “applies to the DNA Act to safeguard an applicant’s statutory right to seek appellate review and entitles him to the assistance of appellate counsel.” Where, as here, counsel fails to seek timely review of a denied application, the applicant may file a petition for belated review.

2019: People v. Lawson, 139 N.E.3d 663 (Ill. Ct. App. 2019). In armed robbery case, appellant, who raised a pro se claim of ineffective assistance by trial counsel, was entitled to appointment of new counsel to represent appellant on that claim. That trial counsel contended that his omission – declining to call a witness identified by appellant – was based on strategy, did not automatically insulate him from the allegation that he performed deficiently. The witness at issue would have impeached the victim’s testimony that the victim did not know appellant prior to the offense. While trial counsel explained that the case was going to be “a battle of narrative,” with the victim testifying about events that were not captured on videotape, his failure to impeach the sole witness may not constitute sound strategy. And while trial counsel alluded to the fact that using appellant’s witness could have strengthened the victim’s identification of appellant, trial counsel conceded this was not a false identification case.

People v. Dixon*, 139 N.E.3d 8 (Ill. Ct. App. 2019). Petitioner proceeding pro se in post-conviction proceedings who raised allegations of ineffective assistance by trial counsel was entitled to access to trial counsel’s file, with appropriate redactions, e.g., witnesses’ addresses. Regarding an argument that the work-product doctrine protected the trial file from petitioner, the appellate court observed, inter alia:

[Petitioner’s] request for the trial file cannot be thwarted by the work-product doctrine, given the nature of his ineffectiveness claims. The work-product doctrine allows defense counsel to freely develop trial strategy, and [petitioner] has called trial counsel’s strategy decisions directly into question by alleging ineffectiveness. The trial file may be the best place for [petitioner] to look to determine which of his counsel’s strategic decisions can be challenged in a postconviction petition.

Even assuming that the work-product doctrine applied, the balance of interests favored disclosure to petitioner. “[Petitioner’s] trial is over, and his postconviction claims necessarily depend on facts outside of the trial record. He must substantiate those claims with facts not previously known, which he cannot do without the complete file. Fully protecting his counsel’s strategic decisions and development of trial theories is of little moment.”

In re Child of Rebecca J.*, 208 A.3d 405 (Me. 2019). In termination of parental rights proceedings, a parent who consents to the termination has the same right to the effective assistance of counsel as a parent who contests the termination. Here, no deficient performance was established.

2015: In the Interest of S.S., 360 P.3d 16 (Utah Ct. App. 2015). Counsel ineffective in termination of mother’s parental rights proceeding. While the mother had complained about counsel’s failure to assist her and sought a continuance to retain different counsel, the proceedings went forward without inquiry by the court. Counsel made no opening statement, failed to cross-examine the state’s witnesses, failed to present evidence in mother’s favor, and made no closing argument.

Capital Case*

Counsel's only affirmative acts, including questioning the mother's credibility about her allegations that counsel had not communicated with her, were harmful to the mother. "In other words, not only did Mother lack an advocate in the courtroom, but her own attorney appeared to take an adversarial position against her." Counsel's conduct was deficient and prejudicial.

2013: Grayson v. State*, 118 So. 3d 118 (Miss. 2013). "[B]ecause this Court has recognized that [post-conviction relief] proceedings are a critical stage of the death-penalty appeal process at the state level, today we make clear that PCR petitioners who are under a sentence of death do have a right to the effective assistance of PCR counsel" under state law.

State v. Quixal, 70 A.3d 749 (N.J. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 2013). "[D]efendants have a State constitutional right to counsel when raising ineffective assistance of trial counsel for the first time, whether raised on direct appeal or by way of PCR."

2012: Allen v. LeMaster*, 267 P.3d 806 (N.M. 2011). Under state criminal rules, it was improper for the post-conviction court to order the capital defendant to testify by deposition or to have his habeas petition dismissed as a sanction.

Keough v. State*, 356 S.W.3d 366 (Tenn. 2011). The court erred in capital post-conviction proceedings in denying the petitioner's motion to limit the cross-examination of petitioner, which resulted in the petitioner declining to testify in support of his claims of ineffective assistance of counsel. Under a state rule, petitioner was entitled to have the scope of cross-examination limited to supporting "the allegations of the petition" or the state's rebuttal of the allegations. Thus, petitioner's motion to preclude cross-examination "related to the factual allegations of the criminal charges for which he was convicted" should have been granted. Here, lead counsel was physically unable to testify. Co-counsel could not "recall details of the representation." Thus, "Petitioner's testimony about the factual allegations supporting his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was critical to his ability to prove his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel by clear and convincing proof." Remanded to allow petitioner to testify with cross limited to the relevant issues.

2008: State v. Schoonmaker, 176 P.3d 1105 (N.M. 2008). The trial court deprived the defendant of effective assistance of counsel in child abuse case by denying the defendant's request for funds and denying retained counsel's motion to withdraw. Although the eighteen-year-old defendant was indigent, his family raised money to retain counsel. The family could not, however, afford to hire a defense expert or to pay the state's experts, who insisted on payment by the defense for pretrial interviews. The case essentially amounted to the question of whether the one-month-old child's death was due to violent shaking and shaken baby syndrome or was the result of a fall from a couch in combination with a premature birth and previously existing medical issues. Defense counsel requested funding for defense experts and to interview the state experts. The court denied this based on a previous state holding that indigent funding would be denied when the defendant chose to be represented by retained counsel. [The court noted that most states permit funding for indigent defendants even if counsel is retained.] Counsel then moved to withdraw so that the defendant would be represented by the public defender and entitled to indigent funding. The court also denied this motion. During trial, the state had four expert physicians on shaken baby syndrome, as well as the child's pediatrician and a pediatric ophthalmologist. The defense had no expert due to the court's rulings. Nonetheless, the state was permitted to comment in rebuttal closing on the lack of expert testimony supporting the defense theories. "A presumption of prejudice most certainly applies when counsel's potential ineffectiveness is expressly brought to the attention of the district court and is occasioned by the rulings of the court itself."

Cannon v. State*, 252 S.W.3d 342 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008). The defendant was constructively denied counsel in misdemeanor DWI case by counsel's refusal to participate in the trial following denial of a motion for continuance to obtain expert assistance and statements that he was not prepared for trial. Prejudice presumed under Cronic.

2007: State v. Hendershot, 153 P.3d 619 (Mont. 2007). The trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's request for appointment of new counsel in assault on wife case. Following his arrest, counsel was appointed to represent him on the assault charges and the probation revocation on a prior sentence. Counsel did not attend the probation revocation hearing, but sent his associate who did not question witnesses and agreed with the state's recommendation. The defendant immediately complained about the inadequate represent but the trial court simply forwarded his letter to counsel. Counsel scheduled a change of plea hearing without even discussing it with the defendant and failed to meet with the defendant outside of hearings despite his letters requesting a meeting. Counsel did not even attend the hearing on the motion for new counsel, but instead sent his associate again. While the associate disagreed with some of the defendant's allegations, he informed the trial court that the relationship had "broken down to such an irreparable state" that they could not provide adequate representation and the firm moved to be relieved. Under these circumstances, new counsel should have been appointed.

In re Dependency of G.A.R.*, 150 P.3d 643 (Wash. Ct. App. 2007). Mother in termination of parental rights case was denied the effective assistance of counsel. Counsel stipulated to the admission of relevant but highly damaging reports by nontestifying experts, which came in through lay witnesses who could not be cross-examined as to the substance of the reports.

2005: People v. Madera, 112 P.3d 688 (Colo. 2005). The trial court's order for in camera inspection of defense counsel's entire file was premature when the defendant had asserted ineffective assistance of counsel only with respect to the sentence expected from his guilty plea to attempted murder. Due to concerns about attorney-client and work-product privileges, "The decision of a trial court to conduct an in camera review of a defense counsel's case file has serious implications and should be undertaken only in the clearest of cases, when the information sought to be discovered is well defined and all other reasonable means of discovering the information have been excused."

In re Welfare of J.M.*, 125 P.3d 245 (Wash. Ct. App. 2005). Mother in termination of parental rights case was denied the effective assistance of counsel. Counsel stipulated to the admission of relevant but highly damaging reports by nontestifying experts, which came in through lay witnesses who could not be cross-examined as to the substance of the reports.

2003: State v. Meeks, 263 Wis.2d 794, 666 N.W.2d 859 (Wis. 2003). A former attorney's testimony during a competence hearing violated the attorney-client privilege. While the attorney did not testify concerning any actual statements by the defendant, "her opinions, perceptions, and impressions of her former clients mental state were necessarily premised upon her privileged and confidential relationship" with the client. Id. at 821. The court noted that courts have split on this issue and the majority have held that the attorney-client privilege only protects confidential communications and not the attorney's opinions, perceptions, and impressions of a former client's mental competency. The court adopted the minority position, however, and discusses other cases finding the attorney client-privilege applicable in these circumstances. Id. at 813-15 (citing *Gunther v.
